ART. III.—Vocabulary of the Maldivian Language, compiled by LIEUT. W. CHRISTOPHER, I.N. Communicated to the Bombay
Branch of the Royal Asiatic Society, by JOHN WILSON, D.D.

NOTE BY DR. WILSON.

THIS vocabulary was compiled by Mr. CHRISTOPHER during his residence on the Maldive Islands. I have prefixed to it an extract from a communication referring to it, with which I was favoured at the time that it was forwarded to me, and which will sufficiently explain several circumstances connected with its preparation.

There can be little doubt entertained, after the inspection of the vocabulary, of the Indian or Cingalese origin of the great body of the inhabitants of the Maldives. It is a curious fact, first pointed out to me by two natives of Hinzudn, that the alphabet now in use in the Maldives, is derived principally from the Arabic numerals.

J. W.

It is needless to speak of the difficulties of acquiring a language without any guide or assistance: all languages have presented much the same obstacles to the first students; I hope the knowledge I have acquired will be sufficient to ensure a correct beginning, and future progress, according to the old adage, will then be easy.

The construction of the Maldivian is evidently akin to that of the languages of the East (India,) so that no possibility of a doubt remains (if speech is a just criterion) as to their derivation from some eastern people.

The accompanying vocabulary contains the words which I have selected from notes, sentences, and translations, obtained through the medium of native Maldivians, and I think they may be fully relied on for accuracy. The orthography is the only questionable part, as few natives adopt the same mode of spelling words that are not in common, every day, use. They possess no grammar of their language amongst them, at least my inquiries uniformly met with a negative, although many have a very correct idea of the advantage of a standard book to teach from, or that might be referred to in difficulties.

In rendering the sounds of the Maldiv letters, I have followed the system generally styled the classical, in distinction from Gilechrist's Anglo-Roman method, avoiding, whenever practicable, diacritical marks, being fully confident that no one will pronounce a native dialect without persevering endeavours to imitate native speakers.

It is estimated that there are full twenty thousand persons on those islands at present, but their numbers are evidently diminishing rapidly, although very few, if any, of the people are known to reside permanently in a foreign land. So averse are the island authorities to anything like emigration, that a laudable attempt to translate the New Testament, by means of a Hindustani Munshi, failed at Bengal, the man who was engaged having been recalled by the Sultan of Mali, before the Gospel of Matthew was gone through. I have seen and conversed with the Maldivian above referred to (he is now venerably gray), and he spoke of his engagement under the Rev. Mr. Brown, with readiness and evident self-gratulation. This translation (so far as it goes) is, I believe, in the hands of the Serampore Missionaries.

The Alphabet consists of eighteen letters, consonants, the vowels being expressed by signs, placed over or under the letters, as hereafter to be mentioned. The language is written from the right hand to the left¹. None of the letters are joined in writing, but it is customary to intermix sentences, salutations, &c., in the Arabic character, which might, at first, mislead a person.

MALDIVE ALPHABET.

Ancient form.	Modern form.	Name.	Value.	REMARKS.
haviēni...	h	The ordinary aspirate.
rhaviēni..	rh	Like Rh in Rhine . With the sokun (°), it takes the sound of the following consonant. When final, it is silent. Its ancient sound was shri.
navieni...	n	As in English. When final, sometimes like ng .
ravieni...	r	As in English.
baviēni..	b	As in English. All vowels except o , coming before b , take the sound of m . (?)
lavieni...	l	L with the tongue reverting to the palate.
kavieni...	k	As in English.
aviēni....	a	Takes the sound of the vowel joined to it. With the sokun it is sounded like g .
waviēni..	w	Like the English w or v .
maviēni..	m	As in English.
faviēni...	f	Like the English f ; but sometimes interchanged with the aspirate h .
daviēni...	d	The dental d , as in dew .
taviēni...	t	The dental t . The sokun gives this letter the short sound of i .
lānu.....	l	As in English; sometimes it is liquid, as in million .
gaviēni...	g	As in guard . It is always hard.
navieni...	n	As in English. Sometimes it is liquid, as in minion .
saviēni...	s	As in English; never like z .
daviēni...	d	With the tongue reverted to the palate; like the Sanskrit cerebral d .

In addition to the former, some few letters have been adopted from other alphabets, classed as follows:—

PERSIAN.	ARABIC.

Some of the above are not in ordinary use, while others are continually occurring.

The vowel-marks are as follows, and require particular attention, as they usually govern the pronunciation of the words; they are called fili, by the natives:—

- a (') is called aba fili; it is placed over the consonant, and is sounded like u in mud.
- á (") is called ábá fili, is placed over the consonant, and is sounded as a in father.
- e (') called ebe fili, is placed over the consonant, and sounded like e in men.
- é (") called ébé fili, placed over the consonant, is sounded as in there.
- i (') called ibi fili, is placed under the consonant, and pronounced as in pin.
- í (") called íbí fili, is placed under the consonant, and is pronounced as ee in seen.
- o (") called obo fili, is placed over a consonant, and sounded as in dote, never like o in hot.
- ó (") called óbó fili, has the same sound lengthened.
- u (') called ubu fili, is placed over the letter, and pronounced like oo in foot never like u in mud.
- ú (') called úbú fili, is placed over the letter, and is sounded as in lute.

A final consonant following a long vowel is scarcely heard, merely adding its softening influence to the preceding vowel. There are only six consonants that can take the sokun over them, and consequently these only can terminate a syllable; they are a, n, rh, s, and t, and in this case, with the exception of s, their sounds receive some modification: a becomes g; n and n sometimes take the sound of ng; t is sounded like a very short i; and rh merely takes the sound of the following consonant, giving an emphasis to the syllable it terminates; but when rh terminates the word, it is silent, and appears wholly unnecessary, except for the division it causes, but the natives cannot understand writing without it.

The ancient character is called evéla, and the modern gabuli tána.

In the following vocabulary, the words are transcribed from the original characters into the corresponding Roman letters given in the alphabet. The final a when it takes the sound of g, is represented by an italic g; the final t, which takes the sound of a very short i, is written ī. The final rh which is silent, is represented by an apostrophe, as in the word muli', all, in the original characters mulirh. When the rh takes the sound of the following letter, the two letters are separated by a stroke placed at the foot, as in the word maibaf, fakíyang, to abuse, in the original maibarhfakíyang. Where the rh takes another sound, the original characters are transcribed in brackets, as under the word Brass.

The following is a specimen of the language; it is a copy of a letter written by the Maldivian Malin of a boat at Columbo, to his countrymen at Galle:—

This letter is given in the original characters in the accompanying plate.

The meaning of the above letter appears to be as follows:—

“The Malim of the Arab boat to all the people of the Maldives stopping at Galle.

“The chief's greeting: the boats now at this port are the Arab boat of Finladu, the offering boats¹ of Fadiyaru and Ahammadidi, and the boats of Manduge and Hiti-gas-darhu-ge; all the people are in good health; send what news you have at your port: I hereby send what news there is at this port. A new governor is come from Europe; the king of England is dead. Very many greetings. We have sold at this port Himiti fish for seventy-seven dollars, Maleatolu fish for sixty-seven, and Fadingfulu fish weighed (?) for forty-seven; having sold the fish, we are waiting for the price. Very many greetings. This is written on Thursday. If God permits, I shall sail in fourteen days; such is my wish.”

NOTE.

IN consequence of the commercial intercourse which subsists between the inhabitants of the islands of Maldiva and those of the island of Ceylon, Sir A. Johnston, when Chief Justice and President of His Majesty's Council at Ceylon, made a collection, at the time he was preparing a customary code for the observance of the different classes of people on the island of Ceylon, of the customs and usages observed by the natives of the islands of Maldiva, as well in criminal as in civil cases, and procured from some of the natives who came over to Ceylon, for the purposes of trade, such information as they could afford him relative to the religion, history, language, written characters, fisheries, the variety of the vegetable productions of the islands, and the coral formations on them and in their neighbourhood. In the course of his inquiries he procured several copies of the Maldiva alphabet, a vocabulary in the Maldiva language, with translations opposite each word in Cingalese and Tamul, one of the letters from the sultan to the governor of Ceylon, a copy of a song which was popular amongst the Maldiva mariners, and sung by them when they were working, in order to enable them to keep time; two copies of their charts; a copy of the Maldiva translation of the New Ephemeris; one of the fore-staffs; and a copy in the Maldiva language of the book of astrology, according to which their navigators decided upon the days of departure from, and the days of arrival at, different places, and the probable success of their voyage. Sir Alexander some time ago presented the above things to the Asiatic Society, and gave the following memorandum respecting the inhabitants of Maldiva, as the result of his inquiries.

The inhabitants of the islands of Maldiva are supposed to be descended from some Cingalese inhabitants of Ceylon, who were wrecked on one of the Maldiva islands between four and five hundred years ago. In consequence of that circumstance, a commercial intercourse has been kept up between the islands of Maldiva and Ceylon for many ages. The sultan of the Maldiva islands sends an agent or minister every year to the government of Ceylon, with presents consisting of some very curious mats, manufactured on the Maldiva islands; some sweetmeats of many different descriptions; a considerable quantity of dried fish, consisting of bonitos, albicores, and a fish called by the inhabitants of the Maldivas the black fish, or comboli mas; a piece of the sea cocoa-nut, to which the natives of the Maldivas attribute great medical properties; and some of the small shells, known throughout India by the name of Cowries, which are found in great numbers in the neighbourhood of the Maldiva islands, and which are used as a description of circulating medium in Bengal. As soon as the Maldiva agent arrives at Colombo, the governor of the island appoints a day for his landing and for his reception, and receives him with considerable form at the Government-house, a guard of soldiers, with an officer at their head, being appointed to attend him when he lands at the beach. After his public audience with the governor is over, and he has delivered all his presents, and a letter from the sultan of the Maldivas to the governor, he asks, and always receives, permission for himself and his countrymen to trade for the season during which they remain in Ceylon. As soon as he has done his commercial transactions, and is ready to return to the Maldivas, he receives a certain number of presents from the governor for the sultan, consisting of broad-cloth, and stationery of all descriptions, and having received a letter from the governor to the sultan, takes his departure, and returns to the Maldivas. During the S.W. monsoon, a great many Maldiva vessels come to trade both at Point de Galle and Colombo. They are much better built, and are of a prettier shape, than the dhonies or vessels which come to those ports from most parts of India, and are said to sail very well.

The late Marquis of Londonderry, when Secretary of State for the colonies, had determined, upon the suggestions of Sir Alexander Johnston, to have a scientific man permanently residing as an agent on behalf of the British Government on Mali, the principal of the Maldiva islands, for the purpose of acquiring a thorough knowledge of the natural history of the islands, particularly of the coral formations by which all these islands are surrounded, and of everything connected with their fisheries ; and also for the purpose of forming a commercial treaty between the sultan of the Maldivas and the British Government, the principal object of which was to induce the sultan to open the ports of all the different islands to every British subject who might wish to trade directly with any of them ; and to allow a surveying vessel to be sent from Ceylon for the purpose of making an accurate survey of the whole of the islands. This plan, however, was given up upon Lord Londonderry retiring from the office of Colonial Secretary, and his successor in office not authorizing the governor of Ceylon to incur the expense of such a measure.

It is understood that a most accurate survey has lately been made of the whole of these islands, by Captain Moresby and the officers under his command.
