The Freemason's Chronicle November 1889 p9.

FREEMASONRY MEMORABILIA

Antients Grand Lodge published 1778, bequeathed by Thomas William to SRIA and now in the collection of the Freemasons' Library.

The Freemason's Chronicle July 1887 p9.

TWO WAYS INTO THE GD

Quatuor Coronati 2076: Ars Quatuor Coronati number 2076 published annually by the Lodge.

Volume I 1886-88 p137. Unnumbered pages of each volume list the full and corresponding members. [p14] for the entry for Rev T W Lemon, member of lodges 70, 189, 223, 1071, 1205, 2025; a PM of 2025; member of chapters 70, 189, 223, 494, 2025; PZ of 2025.

I didn't follow Thomas William year by year but I did look in Volume XIII issued 1900. He was no longer in the Lodge's corresponding members list.

Societas Rosicruciana in Anglia:

Ordinances privately printed 1905.

Transactions of Societas Rosicruciana Metropolitan College

- Volume for 1885 p4
- Volume for 1891-92 p3 meeting of 9 April 1891
- Volume for 1893-94 pp1-2 meeting of 12 April 1894
- Volume for 1909 p49 and Volume for 1910 p1: founding of SRIA's Robert Fludd College at Bath
- Volumes for 1914-1919 confirming how regularly he went to London for SRIA meetings, even in wartime
- Volume for 1920 p7: obituary.

History of the Societas Rosicruciana in Anglia by the MW Supreme Magus Dr William Wynn Westcott. Privately printed London 1900: pp14-15; pp31-32

Esoteric interests section: THEOSOPHY AND SPIRITUALISM

Theosophical Society Membership Registers 1889-1901.

AND NOW THE REST OF THOMAS WILLIAM'S LIFE:

ANY OBITUARIES/BIOGRAPHIES?

Apart from the short one in the SRIA Metropolitan College's Transactions for 1920, I haven't found one.

BIRTH/YOUTH/FAMILY BACKGROUND

There were two men called Lemon in the GD during the 1890s: Thomas William; and William George. They knew each other through freemasonry and its offshoots. However, from what little evidence I've come across, I would say that despite the fact that the surname is not a common one, they were not closely related.

While William George Lemon's family were Londoners, Thomas William Lemon was a member of a Cornish family, the Lemons of Carclew Park near Truro, whose wealth derived from the entrepreneurial and managerial skills of William Lemon (died 1760) who started out managing another man's smelting works and ended up owning the Wheal Fortune and Poldice mines at Gwennap and making a fortune from them. Lemon Street in Truro is named after him; he built his town house in it. He bought the Carclew Park estate, near Penryn, and had a house built on that, as well. His grandson entered politics, on the Whig side, and was made a baronet in 1774.

William Lemon's descendants had got into Debrett by its 1840 edition, but with family details designed to obscure the commercial origins of their wealth. The focus was on Sir Charles Lemon 1784-1868, who had succeeded his father as 2nd baronet. Sir Charles had three children, but they all died young. As he had no direct male heir, the baronetcy became extinct at his death. He left the Carclew Park estate to one of his sisters, Caroline Tremayne.

Thomas William liked to draw attention to the fact that he was distantly related to Sir Charles Lemon. In the late 1880s he presented photographs of Sir Charles to Sincerity Lodge 189 and St Anne's Lodge 970. However, the sketchy details in Debrett suggest to me that their common ancestor was most likely to be Sir Charles' great-grandfather, the William Lemon who died in 1760.

Thomas William's father and grandfather were both called Thomas Lemon and both of them served in the Royal Marines. As I've made clear above, I haven't discovered how either of them was related to the Lemons of Carclew Park. Thomas Lemon the grandfather reached the rank of Lieutenant-Colonel. He was married to a woman named Elizabeth and died in 1856. In 1807, he was stationed in Gloucester, which is where Thomas Lemon, Thomas William Lemon's father, was born and baptised. I don't know whether he had any other children.

The younger Thomas Lemon joined the Royal Marines in 1827. In June 1844 he married Anne Cowling, the daughter of another Royal Marines officer. At the time of the marriage both Thomas Lemon and Anne Cowling's father were stationed at the barracks in East Stonehouse in Plymouth. Thomas William Lemon was born at Taunton in 1846. He was Thomas and Anne's only child. One reason for this was that Anne did not go with her husband on his long tours of duty in the East. On the day of the 1851 census, Thomas Lemon was abroad, probably in India. Anne and Thomas William were living at 4 Caroline Place Plymouth, a district occupied by many men who served in the forces. Anne's mother Elizabeth was living with them, and Anne was running a modest household with one general servant only, not even a nurse for Thomas William aged 5.

In the late 1850s Thomas Lemon's battalion was stationed in Calcutta. It was sent to China in 1857 when the 2nd China War broke out, arriving in time to take part in the battle of Fatshan Creek in June; and missing the Indian Mutiny/First War of Independence altogether. Despite heavy losses, the Royal Marines occupied Canton city in January 1858. Thomas Lemon was injured at some point in the campaign. He was mentioned in despatches, and was promoted to Colonel.

By 1861, Thomas William's grandmother Elizabeth had died; and Thomas Lemon had been sent home on leave. He and Anne were living in the Royal Marine barracks, presumably in the same house Anne was occupying in 1851 though the census form isn't clear on this point. They were still employing just the one general servant. Thomas William, aged 14, was with them; either because it was the Easter vacation, or because he was at school in Plymouth.

After his leave was over, Thomas Lemon returned to his battalion, which spent the next 10 years in the Far East including a spell stationed in Yokohama. Thomas Lemon was promoted again, and ended his working life as a Lieutenant-General. He was not in the UK on the day of the 1871 census; but neither was his wife. Perhaps Anne had finally decided join her husband abroad; but I think it's more likely that Thomas Lemon had retired by then, and was enjoying a holiday. When they returned to England, Thomas and Anne settled at 9 Seaton Terrace, in the Mutley district of Plymouth; where they were next door neighbours to George Porter Rogers and his family. George Porter Rogers' eldest son George Frederick Rogers joined the GD in the mid-1890s.

Thomas Lemon died in February 1875. His personal estate was worth less than £12000; which doesn't sound like much, but in the mid-19th century a careful person could live well off the income from that, if it was carefully invested. I think that in the 1880s, Thomas William Lemon was able to do that.

Sources:

THE LEMON FAMILY OF CARCLEW PARK

The Great Cornish Families: A History of the People and their Houses by Crispin Gill. Published 1995, reprinted 2000. This edition pubd Halsgrove 2011. There's no chapter on the Lemons in the book as the house burned down and the baronetcy went extinct. However, the founder of the family fortune is mentioned three times: pi in the Introduction; p59 in the chapter on Molesworth St Aubyn of Pencarrow; and p105 on John Williams and his family who made a fortune smelting Cornish copper in South Wales. Gill disagrees with Debrett on when the Lemon baronetcy was created and who for; but I think Debrett is more likely to be correct on snobbish details like that. Carclew House burned down in 1924 but the gardens, laid out by various members of the Lemon family, are still there.

Debrett 1840 issue p348.

Thomas William's donations of photographs:

The Freemason's Chronicle November 1887 p4. Sincerity Lodge 189. An inscription on the photo reminded the members that Sir Charles Lemon had been a freemason and served as Provincial Grand Master of Cornwall from 1843 to 1863. I don't quite see the connection with a lodge based in the East Stonehouse district of Plymouth, so I presume that the donation was just a subtle piece of boasting on Thomas William's part.

The Freemason's Chronicle October 1889 p12.

THOMAS WILLIAM'S GRANDFATHER and FATHER

Modern English Biography compiled by Frederick Boase. Volume 2 I-Q p386 has a very short entry on Thomas William's father; with even briefer references to his grandfather.

Familysearch England-EASy GS film number 855617: baptism of Thomas Lemon 22 September 1807 at St Mary-de-Lode's Gloucester. Parents Thomas Lemon; and wife Elizabeth.

At //archive.lib.cam.ac.uk Thomas Lemon 1807-75, Royal Marines, is referred to; as mentioned in two archives now at Cambridge University:

- despatches concerning the occupation of Canton
- despatches to Lord Elgin.

At www.thegazette.co.uk a list originally published Edinburgh Gazette 16 April 1858 p757: Thomas Lemon's promotion to colonel.

Royal Marines Commandos: The Inside Story of a Force for the Future by John Parker. London: Headline 2006; seen via google so no page numbers. Royal Marines in the 2nd China War; and in Japan.

Seen at freepages.genealogy.rootsweb.ancestry.com but originally in the Times and elsewhere, a list brought together by George Wingrove Cooke and published 1861 by Routledge Warne and Routledge: pp350-52, casualties of the 2nd Anglo-Chinese War.

Hart's Annual Army List 1863 p38 in the list of current colonels: Thomas Lemon CB, Colonel Commandant Royal Marines. With his promotions so far.

Probate Registry 1875.

EDUCATION

I haven't found out anything at all about where Thomas William Lemon went to school. Some but not all of the public schools' registers are now on the web but he didn't appear in any of those. He may have gone to school at the grammar school in Plymouth, the school later attended by George Frederick Rogers.

From whatever school he attended, Thomas William went on to Magdalen College Oxford University and graduated BA in 1869, MA in 1872. Many years later, he returned to Oxford, this time to Hertford College; he graduated BD and DD in 1889.

Sources:

Crockford's Clerical Directory 1880 607.

Pall Mall Budget p37 issue of 19 January 1872 University Intelligence: Oxford.

The Freemason's Chronicle December 1889 p4

WORK/PROFESSION

It was probably obvious to Thomas William's parents from an early age that their son wasn't going to follow his father and grandfather into the army. However, the family was not wealthy and he would have to go into a profession. He chose the Church of England, and was ordained in 1870. As a new recruit to the Church, Thomas William spent several years as a curate in various parishes in Plymouth: at Stoke Damerel; at St Paul Devonport for two years; and finally at St Mary Devonport for one year. On the day of the 1871 census he had been in the first of those parishes, Stoke Damerel, for a few months. On census day he was living in lodgings at 12 Stoke Terrace Stoke Damerel; this may have been a temporary arrangement while his parents were abroad. In 1878, Thomas William was given what should have been a permanent appointment, as vicar of Buckerell, near Honiton in Devon. His mother Anne, now a widow, went with him. On the day of the 1881 census they were living at the vicarage in Buckerell. Anne had a visitor, a Mrs Catherine Brown who had been born in Ireland. The house normally only had two people living in it, and Anne was managing it without any live-in servants.

Anne Lemon died in May 1884. Probate was granted on her Will only a few weeks later but even before then, Thomas William had left Buckerell and moved back to Plymouth, to 5 Woodlane Terrace. As his parents' only heir, he was about to inherit a very comfortable income. He gave up his job with the Church of England and for the next ten years, he lived on that income, devoting his time to gaining his two theology degrees, and to freemasonry. By the day of the 1891 census Thomas William had moved from Woodland Terrace to Cheltenham Place and was living at number 1, as sole member of one of the two households at the address.

Not until he was about to get married, in 1894, did Thomas William ask the Church of England for another post.

Sources: census 1871, 1881, 1891; probate registry 1884.

Crockford's Clerical Directory issues 1880 p607.

Crockford's Clerical Directory 1889 p765.

Crockford's Clerical Directory 1895 p809.

ANY PUBLIC LIFE/EVIDENCE FOR LEISURE TIME? Bearing in mind, of course, that most leisure activities leave no trace behind them.

The social side of freemasonry is a very important part of it: all big meetings were followed by dinner at a hotel, for the members and their guests. Several reports of lodge and chapter dinners which Thomas William attended mentioned him as taking part with other lodge members in after-dinner songs and recitations; though without saying what he sang or recited. There's a certain theatricality about taking a Church service as well, of course; and about - say - being a Knight Templar.

I've already mentioned one book in Thomas William's collection of old volumes, and a second one, still in existence, proves he didn't just collect books on freemasonry. He had a copy of William Borlase's The Natural History of Cornwall, printed for the author in 1750 by W Jackson of Oxford. It is now in the library of the University of Toronto.

Sources:

The Freemason's Chronicle March 1888 p8.

The Freemason's Chronicle March 1888 p4.

The Freemason's Chronicle May 1885 p13.

For the William Borlase: search.library.utoronto.ca.

MARRIAGE AND LAST YEARS

In April 1894, Thomas William married Mary Louisa Brian. I think they had been engaged for about a year before they married. Mary Louisa (born 1862) was the eldest child of the wonderfully-named Thomas Cadwallader Brian, solicitor, and coroner for Plymouth from 1868 until his death in 1889. In 1891 Mary Louisa and her sisters Eleanor and Jessie were living with their mother Mary at 17 Woodford Terrace in Compton Gifford. Mary Louisa's brother Cadwallader was also at home while doing his legal articles; he qualified in due course and worked as a solicitor and I think his sons carried on the family business into the next generation. T C Brian had left surprisingly little money, for a man who worked in the law, and the Brians did not have any servants living-in, on census day.

After their marriage, Thomas William and Mary Louisa went to live in Cornwall. Evidence from freemasons' magazines shows that Thomas William was not so active in freemasonry in Plymouth after he moved away - as you would expect. In 1895 Thomas William and Mary Louisa were living in Erme House, on Station Road Ivybridge, possibly while repairs were being done to the vicarage in Thomas William's new parish. As part of the preparations for his marriage, he had gone back to the Church of England and been appointed vicar of Poughill near Bude, where in 1914 the yearly stipend will have added £200 to his income from other sources. A group of trustees controlled the appointment, and perhaps Thomas William had used his freemasonry contracts in order to be recommended to them. By 1901 he and his wife had been able to move into the vicarage. On census day they were at home there, with a visitor, Rev Henry D Wilkinson, who was probably a friend of Mary Louisa as he came from Derbyshire where her father had worked at one time. The Lemons were keeping house with a cook and one housemaid. They were still living at Poughill vicarage on census day 1911, and still had two servants living in, though they may no longer have been employing a specialist cook.

Thomas William Lemon was still in-post at Poughill when he died, at the Vicarage, in December 1919.

Mary Louisa and her nephew Cadwallader Brian - now in practice as a qualified solicitor - were the executors of Thomas William's Will. One of their tasks was to hand over to the Societas Rosicruciana in Anglia some books that Thomas William had left to the SRIA's library; the ones now in the Freemasons' Library collection.

Mary Louisa Lemon moved back to Plymouth and died there in February 1935.

Sources: census 1895, 1901, 1911; probate registry 1920, 1935.

Transactions of the Societas Rosicruciana Metropolitan College issue of 1920 p7 obituary.

Thomas Cadwallader Brian

Report and Transactions of Devonshire Association for the Advancement of Science, Literature and Art volume 140 2008 p203 mentions the Brian family as owners of the freehold of 22 George Street in Plymouth; the article seems to be suggesting that the Brians had owned the property at least since 1818.

Using google I saw several references to T C Brian practising law in Derbyshire and Yorkshire.

London Gazette 24 December 1861 p5561 has T C Brian of Freemasons' Hall Cornwall Street Plymouth acting in a bankruptcy case.

At www.plymouth.gov.uk a list of coroners who had worked in Plymouth.

The Freemason's Chronicle April 1894 p3: marriage announcement for Thomas William Lemon and Mary Louisa Brian. 9 April 1894 at Emmanuel Church Compton Giffard.

Crockford's Clerical Directory 1895 p809.

Erme House Ivybridge is Grade 2 listed. See www.britishlistedbuildings.co.uk.

Crockford's Clerical Directory 1908 p868

Crockford's Clerical Directory 1914 p916.

BASIC SOURCES I USED for all Golden Dawn members.

Membership of the Golden Dawn: The Golden Dawn Companion by R A Gilbert. Northampton: The Aquarian Press 1986. Between pages 125 and 175, Gilbert lists the names, initiation dates and addresses of all those people who became members of the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn or its many daughter Orders between 1888 and 1914. The list is based on the Golden Dawn's administrative records and its Members' Roll - the large piece of parchment on which all new members signed their name at their initiation. All this information had been inherited by Gilbert but it's now in the Freemasons' Library at the United Grand Lodge of England building on Great Queen Street Covent Garden. Please note, though, that the records of the Amen-Ra Temple in Edinburgh were destroyed in 1900/01. I have recently (July 2014) discovered that some records of the Horus Temple at Bradford have survived, though most have not; however those that have survived are not yet accessible to the public.

For the history of the GD during the 1890s I usually use Ellic Howe's The Magicians of the Golden Dawn: A Documentary History of a Magical Order 1887-1923. Published Routledge and Kegan Paul 1972. Foreword by Gerald Yorke. Howe is a historian of printing rather than of magic; he also makes no claims to be a magician himself, or even an occultist. He has no axe to grind.

Family history: freebmd; ancestry.co.uk (census and probate); findmypast.co.uk; familysearch; Burke's Peerage and Baronetage; Burke's Landed Gentry; Armorial Families; thepeerage.com; and a wide variety of family trees on the web.

Famous-people sources: mostly about men, of course, but very useful even for the female members of GD. Oxford Dictionary of National Biography. Who Was Who. Times Digital Archive.

Useful source for business and legal information: London Gazette and its Scottish counterpart Edinburgh Gazette. Now easy to find (with the right search information) on the web.

Catalogues: British Library; Freemasons' Library.

Wikipedia; Google; Google Books - my three best resources. I also used other web pages, but with some caution, as - from the historian's point of view - they vary in quality a great deal.

2 November 2016

Find the web pages of Roger Wright and Sally Davis, including my list of people initiated into the Order of the Golden Dawn between 1888 and 1901, at:

www.wrightanddavis.co.uk

**

William George Lemon was one of the earliest members of the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn. He was initiated at its Isis-Urania temple in London, in March 1888. He chose a Latin motto that reflected very well his outlook on life - 'Via crucis via lucis'. He did not resign from the GD until March 1893 but I'm not sure that he was ever a very active member of the Order.

My basic sources for any GD member are in a section at the end of the file. Supplementary sources for this particular member are listed at the end of each section.

This is what I have found on WILLIAM GEORGE LEMON. A more detailed biography of him is awaiting someone with time enough to follow up the evidence I've found, particularly on his life in local government.

Sally Davis

November 2016

IN THE GD

The GD records still in existence don't feature him very much.

ANY OTHER ESOTERIC INTERESTS?

William George was a very active freemason. He was one of the two most senior freemasons to join the GD. So active was he that when I searched the online database of freemasonry magazines to 1900, using 'W G Lemon' - the way he was usually referred to - I got 158 responses. I decided to concentrate on the lodges he was a member of; and the more exotic areas of freemasonry he was involved in. I took my basic information on William George's career in freemasonry from the Freemasons' Library catalogue: several items now in the collection were owned by him and the catalogue entries include the main details of his life in freemasonry, based on annual lodge returns to the United Grand Lodge of England. In the 'sources' section I call these details 'W G Lemon: FML freemasonry biography'.

CRAFT

An initiation into a craft lodge is the way into freemasonry: it is the basic requirement for involvement in other types of freemasonry.

CRAFT LODGE HONOR (sic) AND GENEROSITY 165

William George was initiated into the Honor and Generosity craft lodge 165 in January 1867. If a craft lodge has a low number it is one of the earliest to be founded: Honor and Generosity 165's constitution was written in 1767. It had been founded by a group of London businessmen but at the time William George joined it, most members were lawyers (like he was). It has always met in London; from 1837 at the London Tavern in Bishopsgate and from 1876 at the Inns of Court Hotel, Lincoln's Inn Fields, a very short walk from William George's office.

It was in William George's nature, and in his religious background as a Congregationalist, to want to take an active part in any institution he joined. In a freemasons setting this meant spending one year at a time rising up a ladder of different official levels until reaching the top with a year as the a craft lodge's Worshipful Master (WM) or its equivalent in other freemasonry organisations. William George did this climb for the first time at Honor and Generosity 165 and did his year as its WM in 1874. In 1876 he went as the lodge's steward to the annual festival of the masonic girls' school: each lodge sent one each year to these fund-raising meeting-cum-dinner which were the focus of the year's money-raising activities on behalf of the UGLE's two schools and the widows' and orphans' fund. The stewards were in charge of their lodge's fund-raising. This was probably his first time as a steward at an annual festival; he did the job several times more in the years to come.

CRAFT LODGE SAYE AND SELE 1973

William George was a founding member of this craft lodge, which was set up in 1882. However, he didn't stay a member for long, resigning the following year.

CRAFT LODGE RAVENSBOURNE 1601 and see the 'royal arch' section below for William George in this lodge's chapter.

Ravensbourne Lodge 1601 was set up in the village of Catford in 1876, before it was engulfed by the outward progress of London's suburbs. It was named for the river which flows through Lewisham and met in its early years at the offices of the Lewisham District Board of Works. William George was an elected representative on this Board, possibly as early as 1876, and perhaps that's how he came to be involved with the lodge, as a founding member and its treasurer for 21 years. Doing the accounts of this lodge was no joy - particularly in its early years it struggled to recruit members, and by 1886 William George had had to lend the lodge £74 to keep it functioning. When he finally retired as treasurer, in 1897, a dinner was held for him at the Holborn Restaurant, a favourite freemasons' venue. At the dinner, the lodge members presented William George with a rather sheepishly worded illuminated address in beautiful copper-plate handwriting, which is now in the Freemasons' Library collection. Within it is a note from the writer, W Spratling, hoping that William George's health would improve so that he could start going to lodge and chapter meetings again. But William George died only a few weeks after the dinner.

As well as being treasurer all those years, William George served as Ravensbourne Lodge 1601's WM in 1881-1882. He also went as steward to the annual festival of the masonic girls' school in 1894, perhaps one of the last large freemasons' functions he attended.

Craft and all the other freemasonries expanded with the British Empire in the second half of the 19th century; both in terms of the number of lodges and the number of countries in which freemasonry was busy; and in the number of new orders being set up, either from first principles or by importation of ideas from other countries. After focusing his freemasonry on just two craft lodges in his first 15 years, William George played an important part in the creation of three new ones in his next ten.

CRAFT LODGE UNIVERSITY OF LONDON 2033

This lodge was a conscious imitation of lodges already set up for undergraduates and past graduates at both Oxford and Cambridge universities (although its history doesn't actually say so!); and some members of Isaac Newton University Lodge 859, based at Cambridge University, were honorary members of it. William George and his son Frank were both active in getting the lodge set up: their names are on the petition sent to the United Grand Lodge of England in 1884, requesting permission for the lodge to be founded. William George served the lodge as treasurer and Frank was one of its later WM's. It met at the Freemasons' Hall in Great Queen Street, where the UGLE headquarters is now.

CRAFT LODGE CHANCERY BAR 2456

The consecration of this lodge, on 28 November 1893 in the library of Lincoln's Inn, was a very grand affair indeed: the Earl of Lathom, one of the country's most senior active freemasons, led the team that performed the necessary rituals and the evening was graced by the presence of the Prince of Wales, Grand Master of the UGLE, who couldn't spare the time to go to all that many freemasonry functions. William George was there as Past Assistant Grand Director of Ceremonies (more on that appointment below) but also as one of the lodge's members - he served as its Inner Guard (IG) in 1893-94 though he didn't do his year as WM.

CRAFT LODGE LONDON COUNTY COUNCIL 2603

The last craft lodge William George joined was the one set up in April 1896 for London County Council heads of department and elected councillors and ex-councillors. He was IG at its consecration at the Freemasons' Hall; though I doubt if he was an active member as his health was failing noticeably by then.

AS A SENIOR CRAFT FREEMASON

It was customary for the consecration of new lodges to be attended by WM's of other lodges and by other freemasons of high rank. Both William George and his freemasonry friend Webster Glynes went as guests to the consecration of Huguenot Lodge 2140 in May 1886. They were also both guests at a very different ceremony in January 1891, one which not many freemasons' lodges could have held - the centenary festival of Percy Lodge 198, in January 1891.

In 1890, William George made a big step onto the national stage in freemasonry: the UGLE appointed him Assistant Grand Director of Ceremonies; and its equivalent in Royal Arch masonry, the Supreme Grand Chapter, made him a Grand Standard Bearer. Being made a AGDC led to a series of invitations to take an official part in the consecration of craft lodges. William George was director of ceremonies when Columbia Lodge 2397 was consecrated, at the Café Royal in Regent Street, in March 1891. If he didn't know him already he may have been introduced to Issachar Zacharie during that evening; a few years later, Dr Zacharie founded an English offshoot of the Order of the Secret Monitor and William George was one of its first members (see below for more on that). And in 1892, William George was one of the officers at the consecration of St Stephen's Lodge 2424, at the Green Man assembly rooms in Lewisham.

For many masons, membership of one or more craft lodges is as far as they want to take their freemasonry. For those who wish to go further into its esoteric side, being 'exalted' into a Royal Arch chapter is a first step that will open up a number of choices. Though many don't choose to have one, a Royal Arch chapter is an offshoot of a craft lodge. William George Lemon was exalted in the Union Chapter 414 in 1869; it was based in Reading and he might have been introduced there by relations of his wife Selina, who came from Abingdon. It was some years before he served as its First Principal (the Royal Arch equivalent to a lodge's WM): he spent his year in that office in 1886.

Ravensbourne craft Lodge 1601 didn't have a Royal Arch chapter until 1880. William George was one of its founders when the chapter was set up. He was its First Principal in its first year, and was its treasurer until 1893. The chapter's history describes him as "long-suffering" because despite having only eight members and only two meetings per year, the chapter quickly spent £100 on furniture and committed itself to £4 per year towards its lodge's rent of the meeting rooms at the Lewisham District Board of Works; balancing the chapter's books exercised all William George's accounting skills.

A SENIOR ROYAL ARCH MASON

Under the wing of the UGLE, Royal Arch masonry governed itself through a Supreme Grand Chapter, which met quarterly. At the spring meeting of 1890, William George completed his arrival on freemasonry's national stage by being 'invested' as Royal Arch's Second Standard Bearer for the coming year.

By the mid-19th century England had two other forms of freemasonry, operating independently of the UGLE: Mark masonry; and the Ancient and Accepted Rite. William George was involved with both.

MARK MASONRY

Mark Masonry could trace its origins back to the 18th century but didn't have its own grand lodge until 1856. It expanded enormously, in membership and consequently in organisation, during William George's lifetime and the seal of approval of its existence was set upon it by the UGLE in 1893 when its Grand Master, the Prince of Wales, became Grand Master of the Mark masons' grand lodge too.

BON ACCORD

William George joined Mark masonry's Bon Accord lodge in 1880. Bon Accord had been the first Mark lodge to be founded in England, in 1851, as the London-based offshoot of a Royal Arch chapter of the same name, in Aberdeen. As such it was pre-eminent in Mark masonry and was deemed not to need an identifying number. It met at the Criterion Restaurant in Piccadilly. William George was almost certainly recommended as a good recruit by his freemasonry friend Webster Glynes. The two men served as lodge WM's in successive years, William George in 1886-87 and Glynes in 1887-88. Both were still attending the lodge's installation meetings in the early 1890s and in 1896, William George's son Frank became a member. In 1882, Dr Issachar Zacharie also became a member.

CHISWICK LODGE 357

In 1885, Chiswick Mark masonry lodge 357 was consecrated, at the Star and Garter Hotel Kew Bridge. I haven't found more details of who were the founders of this lodge but I think William George must have been one of them. A magazine report on the consecration described him as a representative of Bon Accord lodge - having a member of it at your consecration clearly being something to be proud of - but he was also elected Master Overseer (MO), one of the new lodge's officers for its first year. If he had made normal progress up the lodge's hierarchy from MO, he would have served as its WM in 1888.

William George reached national level in Mark masonry at around the same time he did so in craft masonry, being made Senior Grand Overseer at the meeting of the Mark Masonry Grand Lodge in June 1889. Shortly before, probably as part of making himself visible to the Mark masonry hierarchy, he had gone to the Holborn Restaurant to attend one of its charity functions, a dinner for its Grand Master's Lodge of Instruction. GD member Nelson Prower was also at the dinner.

William George was still just in post as Mark masonry's SGO when - after many years meeting at the masonic hall at 8a Red Lion Square - Mark masonry moved into its own headquarters building, the former Bacon's Hotel, next to the Freemasons' Tavern on Great Queen Street. Over the next two years, although his year in office was over, he was still attending the monthly meetings of Mark masonry's Board of Benevolence.

ANCIENT AND ACCEPTED RITE (AAR) also known as the Scottish Rite

Like both craft and mark freemasonry, the AAR could trace itself back to the 18th century. Unlike craft and mark, however, it was a foreign import, having gone from France to the southern states of the USA, and then back across the Atlantic to arrive in England in 1819. Its governing body in England, the Supreme Council, was set up in 1845. One of its attractions for William George - a regular chapel-goer at the Congregationalist church in Blackheath - must have that all candidates for membership had to believe in the Christian trinity of Father, Son and Holy Ghost. In addition, candidates had to have been a master mason (that is, a member of a craft lodge) for at least a year. And membership of the AAR was by invitation only. All in all, an exclusive group.

The AAR's equivalent of a lodge is called a Rose Croix chapter. Initiations within a chapter take the members as far as 18th degree of the AAR rite; above that, at national level, initiations and appointments go as far as 32° with the AAR's leader, its Sovereign Grand Inspector General, the only member at 33°. At least in William George's time it had its own offices and meeting rooms, at 33 Golden Square.

William George Lemon and Webster Glynes were both members of the AAR's Invicta 10 rose croix lodge. It had been founded in 1858 and held its meetings at the AAR's headquarters. Both men were members by 1880 and both served as the chapter's WM equivalent, Most Wise Sovereign (MWS), though I haven't been able to discover exactly when.

Getting into the AAR's national hierarchy required patience and spare cash. At any time, only 45 AAR members could be at level 32° and only 81 at 31°; so there was a certain amount of 'dead men's shoes' within the organisation. On the other hand, reaching those levels involved payment of large fees and I think it's significant that only one man who joined the GD - Thomas William Lemon - wanted to make it even as far as level 31°. Level 30°'s fees were not quite so high and there was no restriction on numbers, the main requirement being to have spent your year as MWS of a chapter. GD members Thomas Walker Coffin, Webster Glynes, Thomas William Lemon, Robert Roy, Eugène Henri Thiellay and William Wynn Westcott had all reached that level by 1880; William George had reached it by 1888.

Also by 1888, William George's son Frank had joined the AAR's University chapter 30 which was based in Cambridge University; he was still a member in 1900 though he was now back working in London and living in Surrey.

ALLIED MASONIC DEGREES

The AMD was an umbrella group, taking under its wing and control various orders which had previously been independent. It was formed in 1880. One of the orders that did join was the Order of St Lawrence the Martyr, a loose-knit group of lodges using rituals based on what might originally have been a medieval mystery play about the martyrdom (on a gridiron) of St Lawrence in Rome in AD258. Articles in The Freemason's Chronicle in 1876 and 1893 described the ritual as English (meaning that it was not an import from elsewhere) but also as "uncouth and quaint" and used now in the North of England but not much elsewhere. Modern sources suggest that there was a grand lodge of sorts, which issued certificates to new initiates; and there was some kind of list of the lodges it had charge of, in the usual order of date founded. I tried looking in freemasons' magazines for coverage of the Order of St Lawrence from before the AMD was set up. There were a few reports of meetings from the 1870s, particularly of an Ebor Lodge based in York, and a London Lodge; but none mentioned William George so I don't know for sure when he was initiated.

William George was a member of one of the loose-knit lodges. In 1891-92 he served as WM of the London-based lodge known as Metropolitan A and perhaps he had been in that lodge from his original initiation into the Order. At the end of his year in charge, the other members of the lodge presented him with a commemorative jewel, which is now in the Freemasons' Library. Renamed as AMD's Metropolitan Council 1, it was meeting in the Mark masons' new hall in Great Queen Street by July 1892, when William George was reaching the end of his year as its WM; and I think from the report I read that the GD's Nelson Prower was WM-in-waiting. In August 1892 he stood in as acting JW at that year's installation ceremony but this seems to have been his last act as an officer in the Council. At its meeting of July 1897, its first meeting since his death, the Metropolitan Council sent its condolences to his family, remarking on how active a member of the Council he had been.

Some organisational changes were made to the Order of St Lawrence once it joined the AMD. The AMD opted for the use of the word 'council', rather than 'lodge' for its basic units. And whereas before, craft freemasons did not need to be Mark Masons to join the Order of St Lawrence the Martyr, all new members of bodies belonging to the AMD had to be craft masons, Mark masons and Royal Arch masons already - quite a test of a freemason's commitment. William George, and Nelson Prower, are the only two members of the GD that I know of who were members of the AMD.

ORDER OF THE SECRET MONITOR (OSM)

The OSM started out in the Netherlands in the late-18th century but reached England in the 1890s from America, through the efforts of its founder here, Issachar Zacharie, who after training as a doctor in the UK spent several decades in the USA. I've mentioned above that Dr Zacharie and William George Lemon were acquaintances through Bon Accord Mark masons' lodge. In 1887 Dr Zacharie decided to start an English offshoot of OSM, which he'd known when he was living in California. He invited a group of freemasonry acquaintances to a series of meetings at his house, 80 Brook Street, to discuss the possibility. William George wasn't at the very first meeting, but he did attend the OSM's first official meeting in July 1887; all the men at that meeting became members of the OSM's first conclave (its lodge-equivalent), Alfred Meadows Conclave 1. A constitution was agreed on; William George might have played a part in drawing it up. A Grand Council to govern the Order in England was also elected - William George was a member - with Dr Zacharie as its Supreme Ruler. Very shortly afterwards, the OSM held its first annual festival, at the Hotel Victoria Northumberland Avenue, and a recruitment drive began with 30 new members inducted and several more conclaves founded. One of the new members was no less than the current Lord Chancellor - Hardinge Stanley Gifford, Earl of Halsbury - whom William George might have been acquainted with professionally. Another was William George's freemason friend Webster Glynes.

In 1895, the OSM attempted to become affiliated to the Allied Masonic Degrees. William George, played an important role in the negotiations, heading the committee that drew up a document outlining the OSM's position. Problems arose, however, and the process was only partially completed.

Despite his declining health William George was still managing to attend meetings of Alfred Meadows Conclave 1 as late as June 1896; by that time GD member Nelson Prower was also a member of it.

The ORDER OF THE TEMPLE (the Knights Templar) and the ORDER OF ST JOHN OF...MALTA

Today, one Great Priory governs both these orders. The orders were governed together in William George's time as well, but until the 1890s the chain of command was rather more complex. Both orders took their inspiration from the original, medieval, orders of knights who went to and fought in the Holy Land; and both orders did, of course, require members to be Christians. There were also other requirements of candidates; and the Order of Malta was an inner order, in that all candidates had already to be members of the Order of the Temple. The equivalent of a craft lodge in the knights templar Order is a preceptory. The Order of Malta doesn't seem to have been organised along those lines and there doesn't seem to be an equivalent to a lodge. It doesn't seem to have more than one meeting a year, either. It was held immediately after the annual meeting of the knights templar's National Great Priory, in May, and was followed - often after the minimum of business - by a banquet.

William George was probably initiated into the Temple Crossing Preceptory 45 in the early 1880s.

It had been founded in 1855 and in the 1880s was holding its meetings at the Ship Hotel in Greenwich. William George did his year as its Preceptor in 1884-85. The Freemasons' Library has a jewel that was presented by the preceptory at the end of that 12 months. During the 12 months he had attended the consecration of the Shadwell Clerke Preceptory and become its Prelate for the next year; GD member Eugène Henri Thiellay was elected a joining member at the meeting.

In May 1886 William George went to what was probably his first annual meeting of the National Great Priory, as Temple Crossing 45's representative and as a Constable in the Order's province of Kent and Surrey. His acquaintance Webster Glynes was there, also as a representative of Kent and Surrey, and as representative of Harcourt Preceptory 74. Glynes went home after the Great Priory meeting, but William George stayed for the meeting and dinner of the Order of Malta, where he was Guard to one of the banners. In May 1887, William George was given a national appointment for a year in the Order of Malta, as ADC; and he was also made Hospitaller.

In December 1887 a special meeting of the knights templar was called for an occasion that had become rather rare: a newly appointed provincial prior would be making his homage to the Order's hierarchy. The new provincial prior was William George's acquaintance and namesake Thomas William Lemon. As ADC, William George was part of Rev Lemon's escort as he processed through the Cannon Street Hotel to make his obeisance.

ADC was the highest level William George got to in the Order of the Temple hierarchy, perhaps he because he didn't have the spare time and money to invest in going any higher than that; but possibly for other reasons.

Though it was not acknowledged in any issues of the Order of the Temple's Calendar of the Great Priory, from 1878 to 1889 the knights templar were in the doldrums: very little new blood got into the Order's top hierarchy; provincial and even national posts went unallocated for years; very few preceptories sent representatives to the annual meetings; and a lot of preceptories were noted in the accounts as being behind with their yearly submissions to the Order's head office. I also read, in a freemasons' magazine, an assessment of the Order's status in Devon which said that although half a dozen preceptories existed in theory, in practice they had hardly enough members between them to make one going concern.

In the late 1880s the Order of the Temple finally decided it had to do something to make itself more attractive to freemasons, at a time when there were so many different freemasonries to choose from. A report was commissioned, but its main recommendations - making the entrance requirements less demanding and the initiation less expensive - were not popular with a lot of the members; who had, of course, met those requirements before they were allowed in. William George and GD members Thomas William Lemon, Thomas Walker Coffin, Webster Glynes and Nelson Prower had all had to be craft masons, Royal Arch masons, and Mark masons of two years' standing before they could even be considered for the Order of the Temple. They had also had to pay an initiation fee of £5/5. The Report's recommendations about membership, and others about the organisation, administration and finances of the Order at national level, did go through; but it might be significant that William George only attended one more national meeting between 1887 and his death in 1897. In 1892, Temple Cressing and Kemeys Tynte preceptories demonstrated that the Order's troubles were continuing: they amalgamated, presumably because neither had enough members to be viable on its own. I wonder how William George felt about that? - gloomily resigned to the inevitable, perhaps.

The annual meeting of May 1894 was the last annual meeting of the whole two orders that William George went to, though he may have continued to go to meetings of Temple Cressing Kemeys Tynte Preceptory (which were held the AAR headquarters at 33 Golden Square) as long as his health permitted.

RED CROSS OF CONSTANTINE

It's a pity that I couldn't find the Red Cross of Constantine's annual reports for the years between 1874 and 1887, because they would have covered William George's early years in the Order. The Red Cross of Constantine's equivalent to a craft freemasonry lodge is called a conclave. At least in the 1890s and probably from his initiation into the Order, William George was a member of Saye and Sele Conclave 122, which met in Belvedere in Kent. It had been founded in 1875 and although I couldn't find a list of founders, I think it's likely William George was one of them.

In 1885 William George was invested as Saye and Sele Conclave 122's Viceroy Eusebius for the coming year. The following year he moved onto the Red Cross of Constantine's national stage when he went to his first annual meeting and was elected Grand Standard Bearer. Most men only held the job for one year but he did it for two, retiring from it at the annual meeting of March 1888 after being appointed the Order's Grand Examiner.

Even at his first annual meeting William George took a very active part in its decision-making processes. In 1887 this willingness to take a lead in administrative matters led to his being elected to the Order's Grand Senate. The following year he got onto the Order's Grand Council, as its Grand Historiographer, and was also elected onto its executive committee where the Order's day-to-day decisions were made. He was re-elected to the executive committee each year until 1893, possibly 1894; and to the Grand Council for several years as well. At the same time, his progress up the national hierarchy continued: in 1890 he became a Grand Marshall; and in 1891 he reached the rank of Grand High Almoner. In 1891 he was also Chancellor General of two smaller orders that the Red Cross of Constantine had recently taken in - the Knights of the Holy Sepulchre and the Order of St John the Evangelist. In 1892 he became a member of their joint Patriarchal Council, as its Grand Chancellor General. That year seems to have been his high point, however, and in the years afterwards William George began to cut back his commitment to the Order. By 1892 he was no longer on its Grand Council and I think the annual meeting of March 1892 was the last one he attended. By 1894 he had left the executive committee as well.

ROYAL AND SELECT MASTERS OF ENGLAND AND WALES also known as Cryptic masonry.

Like Mark masonry (with which it had close links, at least to start with) the RSM was a freemasonry only recently founded in England; and like the AAR it had arrived in England from the USA. Its English Grand Council had been set up in 1873. The earliest list of RSM members that I found was from 1891, when William George was a member of RSM but not attached to any particular Council. However, there's evidence that he was in the RSM's Council number 1 in September 1889, as was GD member Nelson Prower. Webster Glynes had been a member during the 1880s but he resigned in 1889. Council number 1 met at 8a Red Lion Square in the late 1880s but followed the RSM Grand Council to the Mark Masons' hall in the early 1890s.

William George's commitment to the RSM was not strong: he was never elected a national officer.

SOCIETAS ROSICRUCIANA IN ANGLIA (SRIA)

SRIA is an anomaly within freemasonry: it does not acknowledge the authority of any grand lodge but on the other hand its colleges are run like any lodge or chapter, and only freemasons can join it. SRIA is a forum for freemasons who are interested in freemasonry's esoteric side. GD founders William Wynn Westcott and Samuel Liddell Mathers were both active members of it; and William Robert Woodman, William George's acquaintance from the Red Cross of Constantine and elsewhere in freemasonry, was its Supreme Magus in the 1880s. Woodman gave Westcott and Mathers his permission to found an order which would put into practice as ritual some of the mythology and symbolism SRIA studied in theory. Westcott and Mathers duly invited their SRIA acquaintances to join their Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn.

William George was already a member of SRIA's Metropolitan College in 1885, when the College first began to publish volumes of Transactions. In the next few years he made his way up the College's year-by-year hierarchy until, in April 1893, he should have been installed as its Celebrant (the equivalent of a craft lodge's Worshipful Master) except that he was ill and couldn't go to the meeting. He sent his apologies for absence in Latin! He did serve the rest of his year, however, his last duty being to instal his successor, GD member Thomas William Lemon. The Rev Lemon had got married a few days before his installation, at the age of nearly 50. William George - who had been married for nearly 40 years - made a "humorous" speech congratulating him.

There were limits to William George's involvement in SRIA, however. College meetings were organised around the reading of a paper on an esoteric subject by one of the members; but William George never read a paper. He also never served as a member of SRIA's governing body, the High Council. The Transactions issue of 1898 doesn't mention William George's death at all, so perhaps he had not been an active member since his year as Celebrant had finished.

THEOSOPHY

William George Lemon was not a member of the Theosophical Society.

SPIRITUALISM

I haven't found any evidence that William George had an interest in spiritualism. However, it is hard to tell whether people were spiritualists. Spiritualism was a very locally, even family-based pursuit and there was no over-arching organisation with a membership list that can be consulted now.

Sources for this very long and complex section:

FREEMASONRY

General: 'W G Lemon: FML freemasonry biography'.

CRAFT - HONOR AND GENEROSITY LODGE 165

Just confirming here that 'honor' (without the 'u') is the correct spelling of this lodge's name. A Short History of the Lodge of Honor and Generosity 165 1737-1967. No author is actually specified in this pamphlet, but the Acknowledgements are by A J Platt who says the booklet is based on notes originally written up by lodge member Ernest Franck from the lodge Minute Books. Passim. On p19: list of the lodge's worshipful masters, including (in 1848) C G Prideaux, author of the legal reference work Prideaux' Precedents.

William George's gradual progress towards serving as WM is noted in reports in these magazines:

The Freemason's Magazine and Masonic Mirror February 1870 p1.

The Freemason's Magazine and Masonic Mirror volume New Series 24 January-June 1871 p53.

The Freemason's Magazine and Masonic Mirror February 1871 p12.

William George at the masonic girls' school annual festival: The Freemason's Chronicle May 1876 p6: lodge Honor and Generosity 165 had raised £56/12.

CRAFT LODGE SAYE AND SELE 1973

History of the Saye and Sele Lodge number 1973 by "An Old Past Master". No publication details but the dedication is dated "March, 1912": p17, p35. The lodge meets at Belvedere Park in Kent.

CRAFT LODGE RAVENSBOURNE 1601

Ravensbourne Lodge 1601 1876-1976: A Short History of the Lodge. No author's name. Printed 1976 by Modern Press (Norwich) Ltd. Passim.

The Freemason's Chronicle April 1881 p6.

The Freemason May 1894 p1.

The Freemason's Chronicle May 1897 p8.

The illuminated address and note from Mr Spratling: FML call number BE 366 (1601) RAV.

CRAFT LODGE UNIVERSITY OF LONDON 2033

University of London Lodge 2033: By-Laws approved by the UGLE. Published 1884: [p20] list of members.

The Freemason 1905 p276 issue of 20 May 1905.

CRAFT LODGE CHANCERY BAR 2456

The Freemason's Chronicle December 1893 p2.

CRAFT LODGE LONDON COUNTY COUNCIL 2603

The Freemason's Chronicle April 1896 p2.

A SENIOR CRAFT FREEMASON

The Freemason May 1886 p7.

The Freemason January 1891 p2.

The Freemason's Chronicle March 1891 p9.

The Freemason's Chronicle May 1892 p4.

ROYAL ARCH MASONRY

Ravensbourne Chapter 1601 1880-1980. Author and publication details unknown. Passim.

MARK MASONRY

Masonic Calendar for 1888, its 3rd year of issue.

Masonic Calendar issue of 1898: especially p4.

Bon Accord Mark Masons' Lodge:

By-laws of the Regulation of the London "Bon Accord" Mark Masons Lodge which is not thought to need a number. There was a first edition of this booklet in 1856. The edition I saw was published in London: 1898 with (p18) membership details correct to September 1898. Especially pp3-5; p11; and unnumbered pages at the end for the members' list. In its early years Dr Benjamin Babington, the physician and translator, was a member; his grand-daughter Anna Mary Babington joined the GD. Webster Glynes joined in 1869.

The Freemason November 1884 p8.

CHISWICK LODGE 357

The Freemason's Chronicle July 1885 p6.

I haven't been able to find a history of this lodge.

MARK MASONRY GRAND MASTER'S LODGE OF INSTRUCTION

The Freemason's Chronicle April 1889 p11. Just noting here that both William George and Nelson Prower are near the bottom of a very long guest-list in hierarchical order!

MARK MASONRY GRAND LODGE

The Freemason's Chronicle June 1889 p1.

The Freemason's Chronicle July 1889 p1.

The Freemason's Chronicle June 1890 p8

BOARD OF BENEVOLENCE - I think this is Mark masonry rather than any of the other kinds.

The Freemason's Chronicle September 1890 p3.

The Freemason's Chronicle June 1891 p11.

ANCIENT AND ACCEPTED RITE

It's not possible for me to use the AAR's own archives, with whatever chapter histories they have in them. My information has come from the Rules and Regulations... volumes held at the Freemasons' Library: Rules and Regulations for the Government of the Degrees from the 4° to 32° Inclusive under the Supreme Council 33° of the Ancient and Accepted Rite [in the British Empire etc etc]; plus a List of Members. I looked at 1880, 1885, 1888 from which I took my information on the AAR's hierarchy, and 1900.

Rules and Regulations... correct to 30 June 1880 issued at 33 Golden Square: pp35-41, p43, p56.

Rules and Regulns... correct to 30 June 1888; issued by the Office of the Secretary General, 33 Golden Square: pp5-12 for the AAR's history and current rules; pp37-45 names of the current hierarchy; p53 for William George Lemon at level 30 now; p57, p66 for Invicta 10 chapter; p79 for Frank Lemon.

Rules and Regulations... to 31 July 1900 p74.

RED CROSS OF CONSTANTINE - the Imperial, Ecclesiastical and Military Order of Knights of the Red Cross of Rome and Constantine.

Statement of Accounts, Annual Report and List of Officers and Conclaves. Published in London by George Kenning, who was a member of it. Volume covering 1868 to 1899 but missing the years between 1874 and 1887 if any issues were published for those years.

Issue of 1893 was the first in the volume to have a list of past grand officers; going back to the 1860s: p18-21.

Issue of 1887 pp3-5.

Issue of 1888 p5.

Issue of 1889 is the first to include the orders of the Knights of the Holy Sepulchre and St John the Evangelist. Pp5-7.

Issue of 1890 pp3-5 just noting that as well as William George Lemon, GD members Eugène Henri Thiellay and Nelson Prower were also at the Grand Imperial Conclave (annual meeting) of March 1890.

Issue of 1891 p3, pp9-11.

Issue of 1892. A lot of senior members didn't attend this meeting. I think there was a flu epidemic that year. Pp6-7 W G Lemon did attend.

Issue of 1893 p3, p5, pp9-11.

Issue of 1894.

Issue of 1895 p4. On p24 begins the first full list of members of the Red Cross of Constantine in the volume: p36. According to the information on p56, William George was never MPS of Saye and Sele Conclave 122; very odd.

At meetings of the Order's Grand Imperial Conclave:

The Freemason March 1889 p3.

The Freemason's Chronicle March 1890 p10.

One report I found on a meeting of Saye and Sele Conclave 122:

The Freemason's Chronicle November 1885 p11.

ALLIED MASONIC DEGREES

The Order of the Allied Masonic Degrees first edition by Harold Prestige, privately printed 1979. I saw the 2nd edition, revised and edited by Frederick Smyth. Published Ian Allan Printing Ltd 1999: p6 in the book's Part 7: the Constituent Degrees: St Lawrence the Martyr. Also pp68-69. And Prestige/Smyth's Appendix A, beginning p83: Rulers and Administrators of the AMD; and from p95 full list of current AMD councils. Metropolitan A (later Metropolitan Council 1) doesn't need a warrant or date of confirmation. Just noting here the absence of any contemporary documentation of the early years of the AMD: no Proceedings volumes were issued until 1893.

See the online catalogue of the Freemasons Library for details and a picture of the jewel presented to William George in 1892.

The Freemason's Chronicle August 1876 p9.

The Freemason January 1879 p9 had a report on a meeting of what seemed to be all the members of the Order of St Lawrence or at least all the London-based ones; and yet the meeting was described as being that of a lodge, not of a whole Order. I think the Order must have been a rather small affair.

The Freemason's Chronicle January 1879 p10.

The Freemason May 1885 p13.

The Freemason November 1887 p5.

The Freemason July 1892 p11.

The Freemason August 1892 p11.

The Freemason's Chronicle August 1892 p5.

The Freemason's Chronicle Aug 1893 p7.

The Freemason July 1897 p15.

ORDER OF THE SECRET MONITOR

History of the Order of the Secret Monitor 1887-1963 by R J Wilkinson. Published 1964 by the Grand Council of the OSM in London and based (piii) on the Minute Books of the OSM's ruling council and executive committee. On p15 the Earl of Euston is mentioned as the current head of the Allied Masonic Degrees. The Earl's sister, Lady Eleanor Harbord, joined the GD. For the early years of the OSM in England: pp7-12.

Two further points about the OSM:

1) At some point I couldn't identify but definitely during its first five years, Alfred Meadows Conclave 1 changed its name to Premier Conclave 1.

2) In September 2016 I was talking to Susan Snell, archivist at the Freemasons' Library, about the OSM, and she told me that the OSM doesn't insist that its members be Christians. The OSM's rituals are based on the Old Testament stories of David and Jonathan, so it's a popular choice for Jewish freemasons who want to explore the esoteric side of freemasonry.

The Freemason's Chronicle June 1895 p5.

The Freemason June 1896 p4.

Dr Zacharie died in 1900: The Freemason's Chronicle September 1900 p3 has an obituary. He had a very exciting US Civil War! He's buried in Highgate Cemetery.

THE ORDERS OF THE TEMPLE AND OF MALTA...

Calendar of the Great Priory. I looked at 1878 to 1897.

Issue of 1881 p11 Thomas Walker Coffin was the only GD member at national level in either order.

Issue of 1883 p17 for details of Temple Crossing Preceptory 45.

Issue of 1884 p17 and Issue of 1885 p17.

Issue of 1886 p31, pp35-36. William George was Guard to the Banner of R; there are also banners of B, L, D, and A.

Issue of 1887 p1; p4; p15; pp31-32.

Issue of 1889 pp30-37.

Issue of 1892 pp6-7.

Issue of 1894 p29.

The publication previously known as Calendar and Reports of the Great Priory of England and Wales changed its title to Liber Ordinis Templi for its issue of 1896-1900. There was no mention of William George's death in the issue of 1897.

Ordo Templi Alphabetical List of Great Officers 1846-1915. Part 1 published 1888. Compiled by William Tinkler: p16.

The Freemason's Chronicle December 1887 p4.

The Freemason January 1885 p2.

ROYAL AND SELECT MASTERS also known as the Cryptic Rite, a reference to the basic layout of one of its rituals.

Annual Report of Proceedings of the Grand Council of RSM of Engl and Wales etc. The earliest of these in the Freemasons' Library collection is that of 1887.

Issue of 1887 printed 1888 George Kenning: pp3-6. At this time there were 15 councils in the RSM including four in London; however, five were in a dormant state. 51 new initiates had joined the RSM in the past 12 months, which the annual report described as a "slow but steady" progress.

Issue of 1891 re p3 ann mtg of March 1891. Beginning p20, list of current members, very few of whom were members of any of its councils at the time. On p22 the entry for William George Lemon says that he became a member in the RSM's first year of existence; I'm not sure which year that was!

Issue of 1896 re ann mtg p3 of March 1896. pp19-26 a list of current members: p22.

Some confusion in The Freemason:

The Freemason October 1889 p14. I think The Freemason's reporter got William George Lemon mixed up with Church of England clergyman (and GD member) Thomas William Lemon when preparing this item: a "Rev W Lemon" was described as attending the RSM meeting at which Webster Glynes' resignation was read out.

The Freemason March 1891 p12 at this meeting of the same RSM Council, number 1, the attendee is definitely William George; but he's described as "PG Chap" ie Past Grand Chaplain; and again must have been confused with Rev Thomas William. GD member Nelson Prower - ubiquitous in London freemasonry at the time - was at this meeting.

SOCIETAS ROSICRUCIANA IN ANGLIA

History of the Societas Rosicruciana in Anglia by the MW Supreme Magus Dr William Wynn Westcott. Privately printed London 1900 especially p7, p14.

Transactions of the Metropolitan College which were first published in 1885.

Issue of 1885 p1.

Issue 1891/92 inside front cover, p1.

Issue 1893/94 pp1-2.

Issue of 1897/98.

And finally: THEOSOPHY

Theosophical Society Membership Registers 1889-1901.

ANY OBITUARIES/BIOGRAPHIES?

Not really. What I thought was an obituary in The Bankers', Insurance Managers' and Agents' Magazine turned out to be a very short announcement of his death.

Source:

The Bankers', Insurance Managers' and Agents' Magazine volume 64 1897 p108: he had died on 26 May [1897].

BIRTH/YOUTH/FAMILY BACKGROUND

I have found only the most meagre information on William George's early life. The only references I've come across are vague: there's mention of a Rev George William Lemon (1726-1797) who might be a relation; and of a father called James Lemon (no dates given for him). The information may be accurate but I haven't found any evidence at all to corroborate it. As I was getting nowhere, I asked my contact in Canberra to check her family history sources (which are different from mine) to see if anyone in the family appeared on them; and to look at the censuses of 1841 and 1851 to see if she could spot him where I had failed.

Apart from finding what is probably him on 1851, she too drew a blank, and at that point I gave up.

The one piece of information that does seem to be born out by other evidence is that William George Lemon was born in 1831, possibly in Marylebone, in what is now London but was then Middlesex.

What I have failed to find out: confirmation of his year and place of birth; mother's name; father's occupation if any; names of siblings if he had any; where the family lived in the 1830s and 1840s; dates of death of both his parents. Neither I nor my contact in Canberra could spot William George, or James Lemon, on the 1841 census.

Though 'Lemon' is not a common surname, two members of the GD were called Lemon - William George, and Thomas William. I have not so far been able to find any relationship, however distant, between the two of them.

Source for this section:

Men at the Bar compiled by Joseph Foster; 2nd edition published 1885; p275. It's likely that the information in this volume was supplied by William George Lemon himself, what little there is of it. The book describes William George's father James as a "gentleman". When I set out to do this GD research I understood that term to mean a man who didn't need to work but lived off income from rents and shares. Now, however, I view it as meaning nothing in particular except an anxiety to be seen as such a man.

EDUCATION

Where William George went to school is another mystery. He probably went to a day school in London but I haven't actually found any evidence for that. On leaving school, he definitely did go to London University and graduated BA in 1853. If my contact in Canberra has identified him correctly on the 1851 census, he was doing his university courses while working as a teacher. Over a decade later, he went back to London University and did a law degree, taking the Oxford Local Exams and graduating for the second time in 1866. He began studying to be a barrister in 1863, passed the exams and was called to the Bar in June 1866.

Sources:

Law Times 25 May 1867 p24.

Via ioearc.da.ulcc.ac.uk to the Educational Times New Series volume XV number 19 issue of October 1862 p152.

Men at the Bar compiled by Joseph Foster; 2nd edition published 1885 p275.

WORK/PROFESSION. HE HAD TWO DIFFERENT CAREERS

CAREER ONE: AS A TEACHER

Both my contact in Canberra and I are fairly sure that on the day of the 1851 census William George had left home and was working as an assistant teacher at the school run by William Arnum and his wife Caroline, at 18 Upper Belgrave Place in central London. This was a large establishment, with four teachers including Mr Arnum. One teacher was a woman, as the school was willing to take very young pupils. There were 17 pupils on census day, ranging in age from 13 to 4.

The following year William George was appointed to a very prestigious post: headmaster of the school run by the London Missionary Society for the sons of its missionaries working abroad. David Livingstone's sons had been sent there. In theory, the London Missionary Society was non-denominational. However, it had always had strong Evangelical leanings and William George would not have been appointed unless he had shared those views. He was a Congregationalist; and soon after his appointment he married a Baptist. When he took up the post, the school was based in houses in Mornington Crescent, just north of Euston Road. In 1857, he helped supervise the school's move to a building at Blackheath that had been built for the purpose, where it remained until long after he left it in 1866.

CAREER TWO: AS A BARRISTER

William George gave up teaching and began working as a barrister as soon as he was called to the bar, in 1866 at Lincoln's Inn. He remained in practice, at 2 New Square, until his death. He specialised in conveyancing, and equity. In 1869 his expertise led to his being elected a director of British Equitable Assurance Company Ltd, whose offices at that time were at 4 Queen Street Place in the City of London (now EC4). Again, he remained a company director until his death.

I didn't find many references in the Times to William George's work as a barrister. The Times covered legal cases only when they involved the rich and famous or notorious, or interesting and difficult legal points; William George's specialisms didn't have much of either of those! However, in July 1887 his name did come up, as one of the men attending the 13th conference of the Association for the Reform and Codification of the Law of Nations. The Association was an international body with members from business and the law. Each year its conference had been held in a different country and I don't expect William George went to any of the meetings held in Europe. The 1887 conference was held at the Guildhall at the invitation of the Corporation of London. William George attended the day's meetings but wasn't on the guest-list for the evening's dinner at the Mansion House with the Lord Mayor.

Sources: censuses 1851-1891. Thanks to my contact in Canberra for spotting William George, listed as "Wm G", on 1851.

LONDON MISSIONARY SOCIETY whose records are now at SOAS.

For the London Missionary Society schools, see the Society's wikipedia page.

AS A BARRISTER

Times 7 June 1866 p9 and The Jurist volume 12 part 2 issue of 9 June 1867 p233.

Men at the Bar compiled by Joseph Foster. 2nd edition 1885 p275.

Law List 1893 p134.

BRITISH EQUITABLE

The company still exists. Its records are at the London Metropolitan Archive: see www.aim25.ac.uk/cats for a full list of its holdings.

References to William George as a director of the firm; which are mostly adverts:

Insurance Times and Organ of Insurance Associations volume 1 number 4 1870 p49.

Financial Register and Stock Exchange Manual 1879 p227.

The Insurance Guardian: A Chronology and Critique p97 issue of 20 August 1881.

Stock Exchange Year Book pages listing directors of British Equitable: 1880 p141; 1882 p170; 1883 p191.

The Bankers', Insurance Managers' and Agents' Magazine volume 64 July-Dec 1897 p108.

One source I found, at //radicalsocialistbritishplanning.files.wordpress.com: Guide to the 1892 Election stated that William George was head of the Prudential Insurance Co. I couldn't find any other reference to him in that role, and I think it must be a mistake.

Times Tues 26 July 1887 p10 The Law of Nations.

ANY PUBLICATIONS?

Only a very short time after he became a barrister, William George was asked by Rev Frederick Tomkins to contribute notes on points of law to his translation of The Commentaries of Gaius on the Roman Law. William George and Rev Tomkins were both Congregationalists and had both been students at University College London. Rev Tomkins went on to do two other translations of Roman Law into English; though with other collaborators. The translation was published in 1869 and seems to have been the standard work on the subject, at least for a while: I saw a great many references to it on the web and a large number of university libraries have a copy of it.

Sources:

The Commentaries of Gaius on the Roman Law with an English Translation and Annotations by Frederick J Tomkins and William George Lemon. London 1869: Butterworths of 7 Fleet Street; publishers to Queen Victoria and with agents in Edinburgh, Dublin and Boston Mass. Gaius had a great deal to say about Roman Law - the book has 771 pages!! It's laid out in what seems to me to be a modern style, with the Latin on one page and the English facing it. Introduction ppi-ii is mostly about the choice of extant texts and the errors therein. It also thanks George Long for suggesting the project. George Long's wikipedia page says that he was a professor at University College London: of Greek in 1828; then of Latin in 1842. And Reader in jurisprudence and civil law at the Middle Temple 1846-49.

I haven't been able to find out much about Frederick J Tomkins except this reference to time spent in Canada in the early 1850s working at Gorham College, which was a Congregationalist educational institution: Lives of Dalhousie University by Peter B Waite. Volume 1 1818-1925 published Montreal and London: McGill-Queen's University 1994: pp80-88.

POLITICS

This is the section where there's a lot of information waiting for someone who happens along and wants to take William George Lemon further. I've decided that with so many GD members to investigate, I'm not going to look through the records at the London Metropolitan Archive in search of W G Lemon the vestry-man, councillor and campaigner against Home Rule for Ireland. Instead I'm just going to indicate what he was involved in and - where I can find the information - for how long.

Most GD members seem to have taken no active part in politics, but William George was an exception to this rule. As to what political party he represented, that's a bit difficult to decide!

POLITICS - LONDON SCHOOL BOARD

I think this was probably William George's first effort at getting elected to something. He stood in the first ever elections to the newly-created London School Board, as a candidate for one of the four seats in Greenwich (which for these purposes included parts of what's now Lewisham). There was no active campaigning for the elections and there wasn't much in the way of party politics either, though some candidates did receive an endorsement from a local political party. William George wasn't endorsed by any political party but he did get an endorsement from one group of local ratepayers. Voting took place on 29 November 1870 and William George wasn't elected. I'm happy to say that Emily Davies, the great champion of education for middle-class women, topped the poll in Greenwich. William George never stood for the LSB again as far as I can tell.

Source: a wiki on these first-ever London School Board elections, with plenty of statistics.

Journal of the Society of Arts volume XIX November 1870 to November 1871 p26 issue of 25 November 1870 for the candidates in Greenwich; and p40 for the results.

Men at the Bar 2nd edition 1885, 2nd p275 confirms that William George did not stand in the LSB elections of 1885; though it doesn't say whether he stood - and failed - at other times.

POLITICS - POOR LAW BOARD

This is the area about which I've found least. In a profile of William George Lemon put together ahead of the LCC elections in 1892, he was described as being a Poor Law Guardian. The source didn't say where or give any dates. I think it was probably in Greenwich, and that he was probably still a Guardian in 1892.

Source: LCC Election 1892: The Elector's Guide. A Popular Hand-Book for the Election compiler and editor W T Stead; published by the magazine Review of Reviews at 125 Fleet Street. Short profile of W G Lemon, p89.

POLITICS - VESTRY OF LEWISHAM previously Lewisham Board of Works

Although I don't have a start date for it, this does seem to have been William George's longest-lasting political commitment. He was elected to the Lewisham Vestry while it was still being called the Board of Works. He retired from it in 1892, causing the other vestry-men a problem by not waiting for local elections.

Sources:

Men at the Bar 2nd edition 1885, 2nd p275 though without dates.

At www.ebooks.com, a collection of reports to the Charity Organisation Society: Reports of Council and Local Committees. Unfortunately I couldn't see which year! The COS had 38 district committees in the London area, each covering the same ground as the local vestry. On p12, W G Lemon was in a list of members of Lewisham Vestry elected by their fellows to represent the Vestry on the COS's local committee. The vicar of Lewisham and the chairman of the Lewisham Board of Guardians were members ex officio.

Blackheath Gazette Friday 20 January 1893 p5 report on the monthly meeting of the vestry, which had been attended by more ratepayers than vestry-men. W G Lemon had not been one of the 9 vestry-men who were present, as he had just retired.

POLITICS - the LONDON COUNTY COUNCIL

The first ever elections to the newly-formed LCC were held in 1889. William George and F S Brereton stood in Lewisham. No one stood against them and both men were elected unopposed. In 1892, ahead of the LCC's second set of elections, the councillors' work and attendance records were subjected to a lengthy scrutiny by W T Stead, and published for the voters to check through. Stead's analysis showed that William George had had an average overall attendance record, going to 234 of the 344 sessions of the LCC and its sub-committees. He had been chairman of the LCC's Corporate Property sub-committee.

William George was one of the LCC councillors who completed and returned Stead's questionnaire on the issues facing the voters: taxes; the LCC's powers (and their limits); and whether the LCC should take over the management of the metropolitan police. William George had said he was against the LCC extending its remit; he was one of few councillors (Stead noted) to feel that the LCC already had as much work as it could easily cope with and finance.

William George had been elected in 1889 as a Progressive (which equates to the Conservatives). The Progressives were in the majority after the 1889 election and William George had tended to vote with them, most of the time. For the purposes of the 1892 elections William George was being supported in Lewisham by the Progressive Party. However, he was being "hotly opposed" by two (other) Conservatives resulting, Stead remarked, in "a great deal of unpleasantness in the Unionist ranks" in the borough.

William George lost his LCC seat in the 1892 LCC elections. He chose not to stand in 1896.

POLITICS - IRELAND

In March 1893 the Conservative Party in Lewisham and Greenwich got together with the Liberal Unionists in the area to organise a joint meeting against Gladstone's second attempt to get an Irish home rule bill through Parliament. William George went to the meeting, which was held in Blackheath on 24 March. This was at a time when he was trying to reduce the number of his many and varied commitments, so he must have felt very strongly on the issue. It's likely that his views on home rule for Ireland were the same as they had been for many years - he was against it. However, on other issues, William George now found himself in the Liberal Unionist camp - hence the opposition to him from some Conservatives in Lewisham, which cost him his LCC seat.

Sources:

The Government of Ireland Bill 1893 has its own wiki. Unlike its predecessor it made it through the House of Commons. However, the House of Lords vetoed it.

Report on the meeting: via www.newspapers.com, the Blackheath Gazette Friday 24 March 1893 p5.

Times Saturday 5 January 1889 p6d The County Councils.

Times Monday 7 January 1889 p7c the County Council elections.

Times 15 January 1889 p6 The County Councils.

Times Friday 18 January 1889 p9e and f: the res of the LCC elections.

Times Friday 1 February 1889 p9b.

LCC Election 1892: The Elector's Guide. A Popular Hand-Book for the Election ed W T Stead published by the magazine Review of Reviews at 125 Fleet Street passim.

The New Hazell Annual and Almanack volume 8 1893. This being a google snippet I couldn't see a page number: in the 1892 LCC elections W G Lemon had stood as a Progressive/Liberal Unionist and had lost out by 200 votes to an out-and-out Progressive.

The Freemason and Masonic Illustrated volume 34 1896 issue of 2 February 1895 p62.

THIS IS PROBABLY POLITICAL AS WELL: MANAGEMENT OF THE UNIVERSITY OF LONDON

By the 1890s, London University was a sprawling organisation badly in need of reform and various bodies were set up to advise its Senate on how best to bring some kind of cohesion and overall control to it. William George was a member of the university's Senate, charged with overseeing the work of all the institutions that were now a part of it. One of the changes that the university as a whole was in need of was a new Charter, one whose clauses covered all its constituent colleges. In 1891 the Senate formed a sub-committee to draw up the new Charter's text. William George was on that sub-committee and was elected its chairman.

In 1892, William George's name was one of three put forward for possible election as a Fellow of the University; but he came second to another lawyer, Edward Henry Busk.

All graduates of the University are members of its Convocation. Most members (including me) are not very active, but in May 1893 and again in May 1894 William George was elected to the Convocation's Annual Committee, which spoke for all the graduates in any discussions with the Senate. He was also a member of the Joint Consultative Committee that tried to act as a bridge between Senate and Convocation. As a member of those committees he took part in a special debate in March 1894 as the university tried to make up its mind whether to accept the recommendations of the Gresham Commission on how it should be organised in future. William George was one of those who spoke against the Commission's recommendations. When it became clear that the Senate was going to accept them, he and five other members of the Joint Consultative Committee resigned. The five got together with other objectors to campaign against the changes to the Charter that the Commission's recommendations would require; but in the May 1895 elections to the Annual Committee they were all defeated. That was the end of William George's active involvement in the management of London University.

Sources:

Times 11 May 1892 p5 in ballot on wh 3 names to forward to QV as proposed fellows of Lo Univ, William George Lemon LLB had come 2nd.

University of London 1858-1900: The Politics of Senate and Convocation Francis M G Willson. The Boydell Press 2004.

Journal of Contemporary History volume 7 number 3 1972 pp243-62: University of London and Industrial Progress, by Michael Sanderson.

Public Administration volume 6 number 4 1928 pp350-60, article by Frank Heath on Lord Haldane's influence on higher education: p278 for background; pp31-11 and pp359-60 for the proposed new Charter; p335-36 for the Fellowship.

ANY PUBLIC LIFE/EVIDENCE FOR LEISURE TIME? Bearing in mind, of course, that most leisure activities leave no trace behind them.

You would think that a man who was married with a family, was self-employed and who had so many commitments in local government and freemasonry, would be too busy for hobbies; but William George Lemon found time to study the natural world and to encourage one of his sons to do the same. He was elected a member of the Geological Society of London in May 1862. By 1872 both he and his son Frank were members of the West Kent Natural History,

Microscopical and Photographic Society, which held its meetings at the London Missionary School and kept its library there. William George was the Society's hon sec in 1872 and one of its vice-presidents; he served as its president in 1881 and gave a series of talks, on the science of heat and light.

Sources:

Via archive.org to the Quarterly Journal of the Geological Society of London, volume 19 part 1 1863 ppvii-viii.

Via archive.org to the West Kent Natural History, Microscopical and Photographic Society Reports for 1872 with a list of members, and a list of officers for 1873-74; p1, pp36-37. The address for William George and Frank Lemon is Montpelier Lodge Blackheath.

At www.scribd.com publication of those talks in the Society's proceedings. The first of the lectures took place in February 1881.

FAMILY

In 1855, in Abingdon, William George Lemon married Selina Kent, a woman ten years his senior. Selina was from a baptist family, and they married in Abingdon's baptist chapel. Selina's father, John Kent, was dead by the time of the marriage. The Familysearch website suggested that Selina and her family were on the 1841 and 1851 censuses, but I couldn't find them. I have found a few references to a man (possibly more than one) called John Kent, in business as a carrier in the 1810s, and perhaps later as a coach proprietor. There's also mention in local records of a mayor of Abingdon in 1873 who was a John Kent; perhaps a brother of Selina.

In the early years of their married life William George and Selina lived in the London Missionary Society School. They had four children: William Kent Lemon (1858); Frank Edward (1859); Esther Elizabeth (1860); and Annie Selina (born 1862). By the day of the 1861 census, the School had moved to Lee in Kent and the Lemons had gone with it. As the wife of a headmaster Selina was running a large household: as well as the 56 school pupils, there were her husband and three children; three teachers (two men and one woman); a housekeeper and wardrobe keeper, a cook, three housemaids and a page.

All that changed, of course, in 1866 when William George qualified as a barrister and left the London Missionary School to set up in practice at the Bar. On the day of the 1871, the family were not in the UK. They had probably already moved to 20 Montpelier Row in Blackheath, the house they called Montpelier Lodge, where they were lived until the mid-1890s. On the day of the 1881 census, Frank was away at university. William, the eldest, was still living at home; he was working as an clerk in an assurance company while training as an actuary. Both Esther and Annie were also at home. Rather curiously for a barrister's household, William George and Selina did not have any live-in servants. By 1891, however, they might have felt more secure financially - they were employing a cook and a housemaid. Their son William had left home by the day of the 1891 census but Frank was back, setting out on his career as a barrister. Though Annie still wasn't working, Esther had gone out to work, as the superintendent of a training college. Also part of the household on census day 1891 was a niece of William George: Emily Duckett, an unmarried woman aged 48 who had previously worked as a governess - that is, teaching in a private household not in a school. Like William George, Emily Duckett had been born in Marylebone; she is the only relation of his that I've come across.

Sources:

Men at the Bar 2nd edition 1885 p275.

Selina Kent:

Familysearch England-ODM GS film number 583985: baptism of Selina Kent born 27 October 1821; daughter of John Kent and his wife Ann. The baptism took place at the Lower Meeting House, Ock Street Abingdon.

At discovery.nationalarchives.gov.uk papers at the PRO include B 3/2840 concerning the bankruptcy of a John Kent of Abingdon "common carrier". Date of bankruptcy originally July 1816 renewed 1825. There's also a Will of a John Kent of Abingdon PROB 11/1973/305 dated 12 January 1843.

Magazine Justice of the Peace volume 1 1837 p298 a list of magistrates appointed in 1836 in Abingdon includes a John Kent, coach proprietor.

At www.abingdon.gov.uk a list of the town's mayors includes one called John Kent: 1873.

The Baptist Reporter and Missionary Intelligencer New Series volume 12 1855: a marriage announcement for William G Lemon BA, of Mornington Crescent in London; and Selina, 4th daughter of the late John Kent Esq of Abingdon. The announcement was very short and didn't mention any other family members on either side.

DEATH

William George's health began to fail in the early 1890s, leading him to withdraw from as many of his social and political commitments as he could. In the early 1890s the Lemons had moved again. William George died at their new house, 2 The Retreat Blackheath, on 26 May 1897.

Sources: probate registry 1897.

The Bankers', Insurance Managers' and Agents' Magazine volume 64 1897 p108: short death notice.

DESCENDANTS? AND WHAT (IF ANYTHING) HAPPENED NEXT.

Selina Lemon died in 1900. I'm not sure that she and William George had any grandchildren: neither Esther nor Annie ever married and Frank and his wife were (I think) childless.

Frank Edward shared William George's interest in freemasonry and followed his father into many of the same lodges and chapters. He also kept up his youthful interest in nature study. In 1892 he married Margaretta Louisa Smith (died 1953), one of the founders of the Royal Society for the Protection of Birds. Frank drew up the RSPB's first constitution. He died in 1935.

Sources: probate registry 1900, 1923 (for the death of William Kent Lemon), 1927 (death of Esther) and 1953 (death of Annie).

ODNB volume 33 pp330-331: Margaretta Lemon.

BASIC SOURCES I USED for all Golden Dawn members.

Membership of the Golden Dawn: The Golden Dawn Companion by R A Gilbert. Northampton: The Aquarian Press 1986. Between pages 125 and 175, Gilbert lists the names, initiation dates and addresses of all those people who became members of the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn or its many daughter Orders between 1888 and 1914. The list is based on the Golden Dawn's administrative records and its Members' Roll - the large piece of parchment on which all new members signed their name at their initiation. All this information had been inherited by Gilbert but it's now in the Freemasons' Library at the United Grand Lodge of England building on Great Queen Street Covent Garden. Please note, though, that the records of the Amen-Ra Temple in Edinburgh were destroyed in 1900/01. I have recently (July 2014) discovered that some records of the Horus Temple at Bradford have survived, though most have not; however those that have survived are not yet accessible to the public.

For the history of the GD during the 1890s I usually use Ellic Howe's The Magicians of the Golden Dawn: A Documentary History of a Magical Order 1887-1923. Published Routledge and Kegan Paul 1972. Foreword by Gerald Yorke. Howe is a historian of printing rather than of magic; he also makes no claims to be a magician himself, or even an occultist. He has no axe to grind.

Family history: freebmd; ancestry.co.uk (census and probate); findmypast.co.uk; familysearch; Burke's Peerage and Baronetage; Burke's Landed Gentry; Armorial Families; thepeerage.com; and a wide variety of family trees on the web.

Famous-people sources: mostly about men, of course, but very useful even for the female members of GD. Oxford Dictionary of National Biography. Who Was Who. Times Digital Archive.

Useful source for business and legal information: London Gazette and its Scottish counterpart Edinburgh Gazette. Now easy to find (with the right search information) on the web.

For the GD and also for the freemasons in it, the various resources at the Freemasons' Library: see the website at //freemasonry.london.museum. Its catalogue has very detailed entries and the website has all sorts of other resources. You can get from it to a database of freemasons' newspapers and magazines, digitised to 1900. You can also reach that directly at www.masonicperiodicals.org.

Wikipedia; Google; Google Books - my three best resources. I also used other web pages, but with some caution, as - from the historian's point of view - they vary in quality a great deal.

Find the web pages of Roger Wright and Sally Davis, including my list of people initiated into the Order of the Golden Dawn between 1888 and 1901, at:

www.wrightanddavis.co.uk

***

Irene Augusta Ada Lloyd was initiated into the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn at its Isis-Urania temple in London on 27 August 1896. Marcus Worsley Blackden was also initiated that evening and it's possible (though not very likely) that he and Irene knew each other already. Irene Lloyd chose the Latin motto 'Per angusta ad augusta', a nice play on one of her own names. Despite working for her living she did the study required to be eligible for the GD's inner, Second Order, and was initiated into it on 1 July 1898. On the day of her second order initiation, she had been married a few weeks. A couple of months later, she and her husband left the UK.

This is one of my short biographies. There's a great deal of information available on the web, and in Bristol Record Office, on Irene's ancestors. However, information on Irene herself is lacking.

Sally Davis

June 2016

My basic sources for any GD member are in a section at the end of the file. Supplementary sources for this particular member are listed at the end of each section.

This is what I have found on IRENE AUGUSTA ADA LLOYD, married name Holtzer, later Lloyd-Holtzer.

IN THE GD

I'm always intrigued to know who had recommended new GD initiates as suitable recruits. Irene was related to Charles Lloyd Tuckey, who was initiated in 1894. However, they were connected through several marriages and they might not actually have ever met; in addition, Dr Tuckey had resigned from the GD by late 1895 and presumably was no longer in regular contact with its more dedicated members by the time of Irene's initiation. It must have been someone else who had put forward Irene's name to the GD's founders.

Although Irene became very interested in the western magical tradition, and worked hard to build up her understanding of it, her ability to take part in GD rituals was limited by her working hours: she was not an active member in that sense.

Irene doesn't seem to have told the GD's record-keepers what her married name was. I suppose she just forgot.

Irene was never a member of Stella Matutina or the Independent and Rectified Rite - the two daughter-orders of the GD.

ANY OTHER ESOTERIC INTERESTS?

Irene became involved in theosophy, but only after she left England; perhaps it compensated her for the loss of the GD. Her interest began after she and her husband, Alfred Holtzer, went to Cape Town. Theosophy came relatively late to South Africa, the earliest lodge (in Johannesburg) not being formed until 1899. The disruptions of the Boer War then intervened, and the TS lodge in Cape Town lodge was not set up until the autumn of 1904. Irene and Alfred Holtzer were mainstays of the lodge in its early years: Alfred was one of its founder members; it met in their house on Camberwell Road in Three Anchor Bay; and Irene served as its president in 1908 and in 1914. After 1914, however, neither of them was an active member; the reasons for Irene not being so are made clear below. A biography of the writer and political campaigner Ruth Schechter says that the TS lodge in Johannesburg had a reputation for political activism: many of its members knew Gandhi - he was a regular visitor at its meetings - and supported his campaign for more rights for Indians living in South Africa. There's no indication in the biography that members of the TS lodge in Cape Town were politically involved.

I haven't found any evidence that Irene was interested in spiritualism. This is a tricky one, however: spiritualism was a very locally, even family-based pursuit and there was no overarching organisation with a membership list that can be consulted now. What I can say is that if Irene was a spiritualist medium, it was not on such a level that her name became even nationally known.

Sources:

UK Theosophical Society Membership Registers 1889-1901, which had no membership entry for Irene.

www.theosophy.org.za/html/cape\_town.html is the history of the Cape Town lodge of the Theosophical Society.

Website theosophy.ph/encyclo/index gives a more general history of theosophy in South Africa.

There are biographies of two early members of the TS lodge in Cape Town:

Abraham de Smidt 1829-1908 artist and surveyor-general of the Cape Colony. Self-published (I think) by the author Marjorie Bull 1981: p95.

The Cape Town Intellectuals: Ruth Schechter and Her Circle 1907-34 by Baruch Hirson. Witwatersrand Univ Press 2001; pxxvi, pxxiv. Ruth and her husband arrived in Cape Town in 1907. There's no mention in the book of either of them being a member of the TS in Cape Town. .

IRENE LLOYD - BIRTH/YOUTH/FAMILY BACKGROUND

There is plenty on the web and elsewhere about the Lloyd and Moffat/Duncombe families.

HER FATHER'S FAMILY

On her father's side, Irene was a member of the Lloyd family of Tipperary who claimed descent from the Welsh Lloyds of Bodidris. I've found it difficult to tie down exactly how the Lloyds and the Tuckeys were related, but they definitely have common ancestors in the early 18th-century couple, John Lloyd of Lloydsborough and his wife Mary, née Otway. While navigating my way through Burke's Landed Gentry of Ireland and an exhaustive pedigree of the Tuckey family of Cork and Waterford, I formed the impression that people named Lloyd had often married people named Tuckey, so Irene Lloyd and Charles Lloyd Tuckey were probably distant cousins several times over. Charles' mother was a Lloyd, so their relationship may have been closer. There was also a connection over several generations, between the Lloyd family and Bideford in Devon, with some members of the family having houses there, and Irene's grand-father being a curate there in the 1820s and marrying a local woman.

The pride of the Lloyd family in the early 19th century was its one connection with the Irish aristocracy, formed in 1786 when Julia Vereker, sister of the second Viscount Gort, married Frederick Lloyd of Cranagh, a great-grandson of John Lloyd and Mary Otway. Irene Lloyd was a great-grand-daughter of the Lloyd/Vereker marriage, through their third son the Rev Charles Lloyd. After several chaplaincies in Devon and nearly twenty years as a missionary on Prince Edward Island off the coast of Canada, the Rev Charles Lloyd was appointed curate of St John the Evangelist Durdham Down in Bristol, and so met the Vanderhorst and Duncombe families of Clifton.

On her mother's side, Irene was a descendant of Elias Van der Horst of South Carolina. When he was appointed one of the first US Consuls to serve in the UK, he set up home in Clifton, the 18th-century suburb of Bristol. In 1798, his second daughter, Mary Cooper Vanderhorst, married John Duncombe Taylor of Brislington and Antigua in the Leeward Islands. Both families owned land in the Bristol area; and they also had an income from estates in America and the West Indies that were worked by slaves. John Duncombe Taylor had been born in Antigua, and he and his wife seem to have chosen to live there for most of his life; though the only child that survived him, Irene's grand-mother Cordelia Duncombe Taylor, was born in Clifton around 1807.

Between 1807 and 1840, the slave trade and slavery were abolished in all places ruled by the British. The Slavery Abolition Act of 1833 allowed the payment of compensation to owners of slaves, and in the 1850s and 1860s Irene's grand-mother was still doing nicely enough out of other investments; but as I was doing the research for this biography, I detected a slow decline in income and in social status in the family as the 19th century proceeded. The loss of the family's more-or-less-free labour played a part in that, but so too did mismanagement, debt, and costly legal cases. By the time John Duncombe Taylor died, in 1835, he had many creditors and part of his estate at Sion Hill in Antigua was mortgaged.

Cordelia Duncombe Taylor married Alexander Moffat, who worked as a doctor on Antigua. Their daughter Jessica Mary was probably born in 1835, but the year was dominated by the death of Cordelia's father and the cases brought by his creditors against his estate. Later in the year they were left money held in a trust fund by Cordelia's aunt, Eliza Cooper Vanderhorst. However, a condition of that money was that they change their surname to 'Duncombe'; so Alexander Moffat lost his surname. As Alexander Duncombe, he applied in 1837 for compensation for the freedom of two groups of slaves his wife had inherited from her father; but there were counter-claims from John Duncombe Taylor's creditors, and he and Cordelia were not paid the amount of compensation they might have been hoping for.

Cordelia and Alexander Duncombe continued to live on Antigua during the 1840s, perhaps trying to make a go of the Sion Hill estate. By 1851, however, Cordelia - now a widow - had returned to England and moved into 47 York Crescent, Clifton, Bristol. Although she may have visited Antigua again - she was not in the UK on census day 1861, for example - she spent most of her time from then on in England. On census day 1851 she was at home in Clifton with her son Charles Duncombe (aged 6 and born on Antigua) and three servants including a 38-year-old woman called Elizabeth Aika who had also been born on Antigua and was perhaps a freed slave. Cordelia didn't mention the estate on Antigua to the census official who interviewed her; perhaps it was no longer providing much of an income. She told the official that her income was derived from house rents (most likely in the Bristol area) and from investments (most likely in government bonds).

Sources:

Burke's Landed Gentry of Ireland editions of 1863; and 1871 p803: the Lloyd family of Lloydsborough and Cranagh/Cranna.

The Tuckey pedigree, compiled by Charles Lloyd Tuckey's brother, Rev James Grove White Tuckey. First published in Journal of the Cork Historical and Archaeological Society edition of 1919. Full text and same page numbers now available online at www.corkpastandpresent.ie beginning on p255, in 1627 with a Tuckey born in Worcestershire who settled in Cork.

At landedstates.rmigalway.ie I noticed that Lloydsborough House was for sale in 2014, owned up to that point by descendants of John Lloyd and Mary Otway.

The Gorts of Galway: see wikipedia.

The online version of Cracroft's Peerage sheds a little more light on the connection between the Lloyds and the Vereker/Gorts.

Irene's grandfather, the Rev Charles Lloyd:

Alumni Cantabrigiensis seen online so no volume number but p186 in that volume.

A Yearbook of Missions 1847 p295.

Gentleman's Magazine 1858 marriages p631.

The Vanderhorsts and the Duncombes, with one Moffat:

Via www.nationalarchives.gov.uk to a list of documents now held by Bristol Record Office: family and financial papers of the Vanderhorst, Duncombe and Cooper families, donated by Miss E I M Duncombe; accession number 5097. Catalogued as BRO 8032/...

One item I didn't mention in the main biography is 8032/14, an autograph book owned at one time by Irene's grand-mother Cordelia Duncombe. It covers 1806-28 and contains entries by various members of the Buonaparte family who were known to Vanderhorst and Duncombe family members living in Italy.

Seen online: Vital Records from the Gentleman's Magazine p274 has announcements of the marriage of John Duncombe Taylor and Mary Cooper Vanderhorst in 1798; and of his death, in Antigua, in February 1835.

Alexander Moffat's compensation claims after the abolition of slavery: www.ucl.ac.uk/lbs/claim/view/759 and view/761. University College London's Legacies of British Slave Ownership database.

Alexander and Cordelia Moffat's change of surname: The Court Journal issue of 1835 p758 issued 3 November [1835] at Whitehall. The details were also published in the London Gazette.

IRENE'S PARENTS who were very elusive!

I couldn't find Irene's mother Jessica Mary Duncombe, later Lloyd, on any census! She was always elsewhere. And I've only found Irene's father Charles Lloyd once; in 1891, after the death of his wife.

Rev Charles Lloyd had married Elizabeth Tyeth, daughter of William Tyeth of Bideford, in 1826 while he was curate of Bideford. They had three sons and three daughters. Charles Frederick Lloyd was the eldest of the six, born in Devonshire around 1834 when his father was curate at Abbotsham. Charles Frederick will have spent childhood to adulthood on the more remote coast of Prince Edward Island, at the small settlement where Rev Charles was a missionary for the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel. The family returned to England in 1857 and Charles Frederick set out on a military career by becoming an Ensign in the 3rd West India Regiment. I'm not sure, however, how much time he actually spent on active service, because in 1858 he married Jessica Duncombe, daughter of Cordelia and Alexander, and her family set up a trust fund which provided them both with an income. The family papers held at the Bristol Record Office suggest that Charles Frederick continued to be paid from this trust fund until his death; but that his children didn't ever benefit from it. Charles Frederick was promoted to Captain in 1863, and to Major in 1877; but in October 1869, he went on half-pay and was never on active service again.

I haven't found any record of Jessica Mary Duncombe's birth. Her age at death makes it likely that she was born in 1835; and she was probably born on Antigua. She married Charles Frederick Lloyd at St Andrew's Clifton in September 1858 and they had four children: Constance Julia Lloyd, born 1859; Irene Augusta Ada Lloyd born April 1861; Charles Vereker Lloyd born 1864; and Adelaide Camilla Lloyd born 1873.

On census day 1861, Constance Julia Lloyd was staying with her grand-parents Rev Charles and Elizabeth Lloyd. The rest of the family were not in the UK. It's just possible that Charles Frederick Lloyd was on military in the West Indies or elsewhere, but I think it's more likely that they were visiting his relations in Ireland - they were all back in Bristol for Irene to be born there a couple of weeks after census day.

Charles Frederick and Jessica Lloyd were not in the UK on census day 1871. They had left Irene, Adelaide and Charles with Cordelia Duncombe in Clifton; Constance was at a boarding school elsewhere in Clifton. The census official in 1871 noted down Cordelia's income as being solely from shares, including shares in railway companies; perhaps the income from the property she had had in 1851 was now being paid to her daughter. Cordelia was still very comfortably off, however: she employed a nursemaid for her grandchildren, a cook, a house-cum-parlourmaid, and a lady's maid for herself. The job of lady's maid may have been what Elizabeth Aika had been doing in the household in 1851; but Miss Aika was not living with Cordelia in 1871.

Cordelia Duncombe died in 1875. She left personal estate valued at under £4000 - less than I would have expected. There was a dispute over the Will's contents which ended in the Chancery Courts where one of the executors - William Cross, a Bristol surgeon - opposed one of the other executors - Cordelia's son Rev William Duncombe Vanderhorst Duncombe. Charles Frederick Lloyd was named on Rev William Duncombe's side in the dispute, as legal representative of his wife and daughters (but not his son for some reason). I haven't looked at the records of the case to see how it was resolved; but I think I can be sure that it further eroded the wealth of the family as a whole.

Charles Frederick and Jessica were not in the UK on the day of the 1881 census; and this time none of their children were either. However, at some point after Cordelia Duncombe's death they settled at 154 Elm Park Brixton Jessica died there in 1885 and the family scattered to the four winds (and three continents). Charles Frederick Lloyd - at least, I think it's him - is on the 1891 census, at Constantine Road in Hampstead, as a boarder in the household of Elizabeth Baker. If it is him, none of his children were with him on that day though Irene was visiting friends on that day and might have been living with him normally.

The trust fund records held at Bristol Record Office say Charles Frederick Lloyd died, in England, in 1901; they must be right, but his death doesn't seem to have been registered and there is no probate record for him.

Sources:

Charles Frederick Lloyd:

The South Wales Borderers 24th Foot 1689-1937 by Christopher Thomas Atkinson published 1937 by the Regimental History Committee and the University Press; p504.

Via google so it's a snippet to Bulletins and Other State Intelligence 1856 part 2 July-December, published 1857. I couldn't see the page number: Charles Frederick Lloyd to be an ensign.

United Service Magazine volume 121 issue 1869 p614.

London Gazette 30 April 1878 p2779.

Freebmd; probate registry records.

There are some details about him at family history website myheritage; but without any sources. BRO 8032/32/a-b which covers September 1881 to May 1900: details of trust funds benefiting Charles Frederick Lloyd and wife Jessica Mary.

BRO 8032/33: Will of Major Charles Frederick Lloyd of Tonbridge; and solicitors' letters 1887-1900 about his estate.

Marriage of Charles and Jessica:

Familysearch England-VR GS film number 1595529.

Via genesreunited to Western Daily Press of 1 October 1858, where the relationship of the groom to the viscounts Gort was part of the marriage announcement.

Familysearch England-VR GS film number 1596358: baptism of Constance Julia Lloyd 1859.

Familysearch England-EASy GS film number 1595532: baptism of Irene Augusta Lloyd at St Barnabas Bristol 25 April 1861.

Familysearch England-EASy GS film number 1749585: baptism of Charles Vereker Lloyd 28 October 1864 at St Andrew Bristol.

Familysearch England-EASy GS film number 1749585: baptism of Adelaide Camilla Lloyd 19 June 1873 at St Andrew Bristol.

Death of Cordelia Duncombe:

Probate Registry 1875.

At discovery.nationalarchives.gov.uk, records of Cross v Duncombe, PRO reference C16/997/C181.

Death of Jessica Mary Lloyd:

Probate Registry 1885

IRENE'S SIBLINGS seem to have accepted the family's declining financial status: her sisters married men who worked for a living; and her brother worked as an engineer in India.

Irene's older sister, Constance Julia Lloyd, was the only one of the siblings who remained in England all her adult life. She married Lewis Behrens in 1887. Lewis Behrens was a teacher, firstly in schools, later as a self-employed teacher of languages. Lewis and Constance lived in East Anglia - though true to the family form I couldn't find them on the censuses for 1891 or 1901. Constance died, in Sudbury Suffolk, in 1902.

Charles Vereker Lloyd was a civil engineer. He went to India to work for the Indian Civil Service but had retired and returned to England by 1911. On census day 1911, he and his wife Elizabeth were amongst the guests at the Blenheim House Hotel in Church Street, Brighton. They had been married for one year; but had probably got married in India as I couldn't find a registration on freebmd. Charles moved to Clevedon in Somerset; but died in Clifton in 1956.

Adelaide, the youngest of the four siblings, went to Australia; I don't know quite when. I never spotted her on any census after her childhood, and I think she had moved to Australia by the mid-1890s. She married Julius Homan, probably in 1895, and probably in Tasmania. They had one child, Tasman Vanderhorst Homan, born in Tasmania in 1897. He became an engineer and inventor. Tasman Homan lived all his life in Australia but Adelaide returned to England. She died, in Stockbridge Hampshire, in 1945.

I couldn't find any evidence of any children being born to Constance Behrens or Charles Vereker Lloyd.

Sources for Irene's sisters and brother:

Constance:

The very little I found on Lewis Behrens was, unfortunately, from after Constance's death: Kelly's Directory of Lincolnshire 1909 p423 Lewis Behrens is a teacher in a school whose name I couldn't see on the snippet.

Edinburgh Gazette 4 June 1926 p619, also in London Gazette in a list of people subject to receiving orders under the Bankruptcy Act 1914: Lewis Behrens "teacher of languages", living in lodgings at 25a City Road Cambridge.

Charles:

Minutes of Proceedings of the Institution of Civil Engineers issue of 1904 p180 Charles Vereker Lloyd is in the list of members. I also found him on the web, as a member, in the Minutes of Proceedings 1908 p195; and volume 190 1912 p241.

Probate Registry 1956

London Gazette 24 April 1956 p2440 list issued under the 1925 Trustees Act which is a set of procedures to be followed when winding up a Trust.

Adelaide Camilla.

My source for Adelaide's marriage is myheritage; which doesn't give sources for its statements.

Probate Registry 1945.

On Tasman Vanderhorst Homan, who seems to have been an only child:

Via Familysearch to www.findagrave.com only there's no grave as he was cremated. Record added in 2012. Tasman Vanderhorst Homan born 1897 Tasmania, died 1979 at Glebe NSW.

Also at Familysearch there are two records of journeys he made by ship; both of which give his year of birth as 1897:

1 = arriving Sydney New Zealand (not the one in NSW) from San Francisco. New Zealand Passenger Lists 1839-1973. Folder no 004440010 image 00138. Dated March 1941.

2 = New York Passenger Lists 1925-1957. GS film number 1758217 for an arrival in New York from Australia 1940.

At www.ipaustralia.com.au Intellectual Property in Australia. Patent number AU1956020650 filing date 10 August 1956 was filed by Tasman Vanderhorst Homan: a means for coating solid surfaces with comminuted material.

IRENE LLOYD: EDUCATION and WORK

I couldn't find any direct evidence at all about Irene's education. However, there are two pieces of indirect evidence that suggest she was well-educated for a middle-class girl of her time. Firstly, there was the job she was able to get (see below). And secondly, on census day 1871, Irene's elder sister Constance was a pupil at the small boarding school for girls run by Mary Jenkins at 10 Arlington Villas Clifton. Perhaps, in due course, Irene was sent there too. It's always hard to gauge the education given pupils in 19th-century girls' schools such as this, and I'm not going to speculate on it, except to say that it enabled her to get a job in the rapidly-expanding field of schools inspection.

On the day of the 1891 census, the official wrote down that Irene was working as an "Assistant Needlework Inspectress (Education Dept)". No more details were needed for the census return and I haven't found out anything more from any other source; but then, I haven't known quite where to look. I'm not able to say, therefore, what her qualifications were for the work she was doing; who her current employer was (although the entry reads as if it was the government); how long she had had that job; and whether she had been employed anywhere else previously. On census day 1891 Irene was 29 or 30, and she could easily have been in paid employment for a decade.

I shall assume that Irene worked until she got married; though I haven't any information on that either.

On census day 1891, Irene was visiting Edwin Luke and his wife Lucy in north London. Both Lucy and Edwin had been born in the west country. Edwin was working as the manager of a jewellery shop and Lucy was at home with her daughters Muriel and Marjory. They were able to employ two live-in servants: a nursemaid and the basic general skivvy. I would guess that it was Lucy Luke that Irene knew; they were the same age and had perhaps been at school together. Edwin and Lucy were living at 6 Quernmore Road Hornsey. George and Anne Holtzer and their family were living a few streets away, at 42 St Mary's Road Hornsey. In 1898, Irene married Alfred Holtzer.

Sources: 1891 census.

IRENE'S MARRIAGE

There has been a spot of social climbing on websites that mention Alfred Holtzer; when it comes to his father's work: several state that Alfred was the son of a barrister. I think the source of this is Alfred himself, speaking to the press later in life and allowing himself some dramatic licence when it came to his early days. The late 19th-century census returns all agree that George Holtzer, Alfred's father, worked as a barrister's clerk - that is, he was employed in the chambers of a barrister or firm of barristers, doing the financial and management side of the business while the barristers did the law and appeared in court. Quite a difference, not only in income, but also in social status.

While George Holtzer was a Londoner, his wife Anne was from Devonport; perhaps her family knew the Luke family, who came from Plymouth. George and Anne were living in Hornsey by census day 1871. Alfred was the youngest of their six children; born in 1869 and so several years younger than Irene Lloyd.

George and Anne's four sons all went into office work as clerks. On the day of the 1891 census, Alfred's work was noted down as "merchant's clerk"; so he was probably working, like so many others, in the City of London. He was stage-struck, though. One source says that he went as far as studying drama at the London Polytechnic (probably in the early 1890s); though he doesn't ever seem to have thought he could be a professional actor. Alfred was a regular at the West End theatres in the 1890s, though, and saw Henry Irving, Ellen Terry, Johnston Forbes-Robertson and Mrs Patrick Campbell.

Irene Lloyd and Alfred Holtzer married in the spring of 1898 and in October, they went to South Africa. Alfred's health was causing concern, and the sources for his life suggest that for several years at the end of the 1890s he was not well enough to work. He and Irene settled in Cape Town and Alfred's health improved so that in 1900 he was able to work again. He got a job with the Standard Bank and remained an employee until he retired, in the late 1920s. What he's remembered for in South Africa, though, is his contribution to Cape Town's intellectual and social life; and particularly for his part in the early days of amateur and professional theatre there.

Alfred Holtzer became one of mainstays of Cape Town's Owl Club, a (men only, I think) dining-cum-literary club formed in 1894. He was its honorary secretary from 1914 until he died. He did do some acting in South Africa but he is better known now for his work as a theatrical producer, lecturer in voice-production, playwright; and most importantly as one of the founders (in 1919) of the Cape Town Repertory Society.

All the references I found to Alfred's involvement in theatre in Cape Town date from 1914 and after. It's probably just a coincidence but in 1914, Irene went on her own on a trip back to England, and never returned.

Alfred Holtzer died in 1958 in Cape Town. There's a bust of him in South Africa, done by Moses Kottler at some stage before his retirement from the Bank; not as a commission but because "the man had an interesting face".

Sources:

freebmd; censuses 1901, 1911 on which they do not appear in UK.

Via Ancestry to UK Outward Passenger Lists 1890-1960: the ship 'Greek' left Southampton for Cape Province on 15 October 1898; amongst the passengers were Mr and Mrs Holtzer.

I couldn't find any evidence of Irene's return to England in 1914.

The Standard Bank is one of the biggest in Africa: see www.standardbank.co.za.

A family history tale of Alfred Holtzer, some elements of which are contradicted by evidence from other sources: via //genforum.genealogy.com/southafrica/page13.html, to a posting by Tony Davis dated 9 June 2003. The posting asked descendants of Alfred and Irene Holtzer to contact the site. None had done so as far as June 2016. In the absence of web-based family history data covering Cape Town, this is my main source for them having no children.

The Owl Club has a short wikipedia page. There are several histories; which draw on Alfred's reminiscences as a long-serving member. See, for example, The Third Tuesday: A History of the Owl Club 1951-1981 by Owl Club member Eric Rosenthal. Published for the Club in Cape Town 1982: 15-16.

Webpage esat.sun.ac.za/index.php/Alfred\_Hotzer is part of the online Encyclopaedia of South African Theatre, Film, Media and Performance (ESAT); hosted by Stellenbosch University. NB as well as exaggerating his family background, Alfred may have cut a few years off his age when reminiscing to people in Cape Town: his year of birth is given as 1874. The profile of Alfred uses these sources amongst others:

Eric Rosenthal's The Third Tuesday.

The Cape issue of 8 March 1929.

Who's Who in South Africa 1940.

The Flag is Flying by Leonard Schach.

ESAT's web page is the source for the break-up of Alfred and Irene's marriage.

Stage by Stage: The Leonard Schach Story by Donald P Inskip. Cape Town and Pretoria:

Human and Rousseau Pubns (Pty) Ltd 1977. Published in a limited edition; British Library's copy is number 146 of 1250: p41-42 where Alfred Holtzer is described as "the Grand Old Man of Shakespeare in Cape Town and protagonist of the Irving-Tree approach". Alfred gave Schach one of his earliest roles, as Curio in Twelfth Night. See pp118-23 Schach became one of the mainstays of classical theatre in South Africa in the years after World War 2.

Lantern volume 38 1989 p20.

The bust of Alfred is mentioned in Moses Kottler: His Cape Years by Kottler and J de P Scholtz. Tafelberg 1976 p61.

DEATH

Alfred divorced Irene in 1923. Irene continued to live in England. She may have started to call herself 'lloyd-holtzer' rather than just 'holtzer' because she is listed in the probate registry records under both surnames. She died in Wells, Somerset, in June 1959.

Source:

Probate Registry 1959.

BASIC SOURCES I USED for all Golden Dawn members.

Membership of the Golden Dawn: The Golden Dawn Companion by R A Gilbert. Northampton: The Aquarian Press 1986. Between pages 125 and 175, Gilbert lists the names, initiation dates and addresses of all those people who became members of the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn or its many daughter Orders between 1888 and 1914. The list is based on the Golden Dawn's administrative records and its Members' Roll - the large piece of parchment on which all new members signed their name at their initiation. All this information had been inherited by Gilbert but it's now in the Freemasons' Library at the United Grand Lodge of England building on Great Queen Street Covent Garden. Please note, though, that the records of the Amen-Ra Temple in Edinburgh were destroyed in 1900/01. I have recently (July 2014) discovered that some records of the Horus Temple at Bradford have survived, though most have not; however those that have survived are not yet accessible to the public.

For the history of the GD during the 1890s I usually use Ellic Howe's The Magicians of the Golden Dawn: A Documentary History of a Magical Order 1887-1923. Published Routledge and Kegan Paul 1972. Foreword by Gerald Yorke. Howe is a historian of printing rather than of magic; he also makes no claims to be a magician himself, or even an occultist. He has no axe to grind.

Family history: freebmd; ancestry.co.uk (census and probate); findmypast.co.uk; familysearch; Burke's Peerage and Baronetage; Burke's Landed Gentry; Armorial Families; thepeerage.com; and a wide variety of family trees on the web.

Famous-people sources: mostly about men, of course, but very useful even for the female members of GD. Oxford Dictionary of National Biography. Who Was Who. Times Digital Archive.

Useful source for business and legal information: London Gazette and its Scottish counterpart Edinburgh Gazette. Now easy to find (with the right search information) on the web.

Catalogues: British Library; Freemasons' Library.

Wikipedia; Google; Google Books - my three best resources. I also used other web pages, but with some caution, as - from the historian's point of view - they vary in quality a great deal.

24 July 2016mailto:Amandragora@attglobal.net

Email me at AMandragora@attglobal.net

Find the web pages of Roger Wright and Sally Davis, including my list of people initiated into the Order of the Golden Dawn between 1888 and 1901, at:

www.wrightanddavis.co.uk

***

Mrs Laura Gertrude LOVE who was initiated into the Golden Dawn in March 1897 and chose the Latin motto 'Veritas'. In December 1898 she was initiated into the GD's 2nd Order, the level at which you were allowed to start doing practical magic rather than just reading occult books and manuscripts.

I couldn't find this woman on any census; nor could I find a marriage registration for her so she was definitely not married in England. Not finding Laura's marriage means that I don't know what her original surname was. My thought that she had probably lived most of her life abroad was encouraged by her giving two addresses at the time of her GD initiation: 62 St John's Wood Terrace, Regent's Park; and the address of another GD member, which answers the question WHO DID SHE KNOW IN THE GOLDEN DAWN? - it was Henrietta Paget, one of the GD's best (strictly unofficial) recruitment agents.

BASIC SOURCES I USED for all Golden Dawn members.

Membership of the Golden Dawn: The Golden Dawn Companion by R A Gilbert. Northampton: The Aquarian Press 1986. Between pages 125 and 175, Gilbert lists the names, initiation dates and addresses of all those people who became members of the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn or its many daughter Orders between 1888 and 1914.

The list is based on the Golden Dawn's administrative records and its Members' Roll - the large piece of parchment on which all new members signed their name at their initiation. All this information had been inherited by Gilbert but it's now in the Freemasons' Library at the United Grand Lodge of England building on Great Queen Street Covent Garden.

Family history: freebmd; ancestry.co.uk (census and probate); findmypast.co.uk; familysearch; Burke's Peerage and Baronetage; Burke's Landed Gentry; Armorial Families; thepeerage.com; and a variety of one-family genealogy websites.

Famous-people sources: mostly about men, of course, but very useful even for the female members of GD. Oxford Dictionary of National Biography. Who Was Who. Times Digital Archive.

Catalogues: British Library; Freemasons' Library.

Wikipedia; Google; Google Books - my three best resources. I also used other web pages, but with some caution, as - from the historian's point of view - they vary in quality a great deal.

23 April 2012

AMandragora@attglobal.net

William Evan McFarlane (or MacFarlane) was initiated into the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn at its Amen-Ra temple in Edinburgh, on 22 March 1897. He chose the Latin motto 'Sic vos non vobis'. Miss Alice Jane Forsyth was also initiated that day; and the two of them are the last people on R A Gilbert's list of Amen-Ra members. The records of the Amen-Ra temple haven't survived but what evidence there is indicates that William Evan never pursued his membership of the GD any further. He was not initiated into the GD's inner, 2nd Order.

Kenneth Jack, who researches freemasons in Scotland, sent me details of William Evan's life when I hadn't been able to identify the man myself. Thanks for that Kenneth: he turned out to have led a most fascinating life. The GD attracted some keen travellers - Kate Bates; Henry Colvile and his wife Zélie; Mary Briggs Swan, for example - but I don't think any other members lived in so many far-flung places as William Evan McFarlane.

A NOTE ON THE SPELLING OF THAT SURNAME

Most members of the family spelled it McFarlane though of course both spellings appear in the census when census officials didn't ask for the correct spelling. The GD's William Evan was McFarlane for much of his life but then his surname seems to have morphed into the m-a-c spelling, possibly when he started work in Australia.

A MISSIONARY FAMILY

Missionary work sets my teeth on edge. My own spirituality isn't the proselytising kind. In this account of the McFarlanes I shall try to remember that people called to missionary work believed they were saving souls and bringing civilisation; not destroying cultures.

The London Missionary Society was one of the earliest missionary efforts to be founded in Britain, sending its first workers to Guangzhou (Canton) in 1807. China remained an important focus of its work until the victory of Communism made it impossible for any personnel to remain. LMS was also strongly represented in South Africa where Robert and Mary Moffat and their son-in-law David Livingstone made the society famous. Although in theory not restricted to any one denomination, it did favour recruits from the Congregationalists and Methodists.

The association of the McFarlane family with the London Missionary Society lasted about 80 years and two generations. It began with Samuel McFarlane (1837-1911), a man who had worked as a mechanic for a railway company in Manchester before being Called to take up the challenge of missionary work. Samuel was trained as a missionary-cum-teacher at Cheshunt College, founded in 1768 by the Methodist Lady Huntingdon and strongly Evangelical in its leanings. Originally based in a house in Cheshunt, Hertfordshire, since 1906 it has been one of Cambridge University's theological colleges.

In 1858 at the end of his course, Samuel married Elizabeth Joyce, a daughter of John and Rachel Joyce, Nonconformists who ran a grocer's shop and bakery in Kempston, Bedfordshire. One of Elizabeth's brothers had studied with Samuel at Cheshunt College. Very soon after the wedding, Samuel and Elizabeth left for the third and least well-known arena of LMS activity, the islands of the Pacific. They were bound for Lifou (often written as 'Lifu'), the largest island in the Loyalty Island group; geographically, a part of the archipelago named New Caledonia by James Cook when he came across it in 1774. Samuel and Elizabeth reached Lifou in time for their eldest child, Sewell Samuel, to be born there in May 1860, probably at Chépénéhé, where they had their house and church built and set up their schools. All their other children were born on Lifou - Harriet (1863); the GD's William Evan (5 April 1866); a daughter (probably 1868) whose name I could not discover, who died young; Alfred James (1870) and George Walter (probably 1872).

Samuel and Elizabeth McFarlane were not the only Europeans on Lifou in the 1860s, nor the only missionaries; though their arrival with their colleague Mr Creagh, did represent an expansion of the LMS's efforts there. The LMS had been there since 1841 and Christianity was at least familiar to the natives, some of whom had become converts. And Lifou was not quite as isolated as you would think, just nearly so. Trading ships did call in bringing letters from home as well as goods and news, so that the visits of the vessel John Williams were always a cause for celebration. The island received visits from bishops based in New Zealand. And all the LMS missionaries working on islands in the Pacific did try to meet once a year. However, although Pacific islands are often thought of as idyllic, they aren't: Lifou was devastated from time to time by typhoons, when floodwater several feet deep would sweep through the McFarlanes' house; fresh water will have been in short supply; the weather was hot and humid; and while the views of vast expanses of ocean might be awe-inspiring and breathtakingly beautiful, they can also encourage feelings of isolation - they certainly did in Samuel McFarlane although he tried hard to overcome them.

Though he never said so in his book on Lifou, Samuel McFarlane did not enjoy his time there and looked back at it with a sense of frustration and failure. His failure was not solely his own fault though his abrasive personality contributed to it. When he and Elizabeth started their work on Lifou it was still an independent nation or series of tribal nations; but in 1864 a French warship arrived from New Caledonia (a French possession since 1853) and deposited a small number of troops and a governor; and Jesuit missionaries soon followed. Samuel McFarlane argued furiously that the Loyalty Islands never had been part of New Caledonia; but the French just replied that they were now, and that all their inhabitants were subject to French law and administrative decisions. For several months the LMS was banned from doing any work at all while the governor sent to Paris to ask whether its workers could stay. When the answer came back, it was a good one, in theory: the LMS was allowed to remain, and even given the protection of the French government. However, there was a clever twist to the permission that made the work of the British missionaries all-but-impossible: their work and schools now had to abide by the French government's educational regulations, which required French to be everyone's main language, and that school lessons should be taught in it.

William Evan McFarlane was born a few months after the LMS grudgingly agreed to be bound by those rules; and in the wake of a breakdown of law and order on the island, during which the LMS church at Chépénéhé was burned down; and there was fighting, with casualties, at a mission station elsewhere on Lifou. In fact the French soon withdrew all their officials and most of their Jesuits from the island; but a Resident remained, to enforce French law and make sure the inhabitants couldn't forget who was now in charge. The LMS's missionaries on the Loyalty Islands began to think that they would do better elsewhere, and soon fastened on the Torres Straits Islands and Papua New Guinea; still outside the control of any empire (though Australia was comfortably nearby) and still without any missionary activity at all.

In May 1870, when William Evan McFarlane was about four, his father and the Rev A W Murray left Lifou on a fact-finding trip to the Torres Strait. They were away for nearly a year - much longer than expected, held up on the return voyage by contrary winds - and with no news of them reaching Lifou during that time, it must have been a very anxious period for Elizabeth and Mrs Murray, left behind with the children. The trip convinced Samuel and Rev Murray that a mission in New Guinea could work - a fine example of religious fervour overcoming the realities on the ground - and it also set the pattern for the next decade of the McFarlanes' lives. As a result of their report on the 1870 recce and one (possibly two) other trips made by Samuel around 1871/72, the LMS duly moved into the Torres Strait islands and Papua New Guinea; with Samuel McFarlane in charge of the whole operation. It's obvious from his book on the LMS in Papua New Guinea that not only did Samuel prefer the scenery of the Torres Strait; he also much preferred his new job. As he had done in Lifou, he quickly learned two local dialects to the extent of being able to make translations from English into it; but he did very little actual missionary work from this time on. Instead, his time was taken up with exploration, the logistics of mission stations, administration and management of the project, and fund-raising; and to these ends he was away from his family often for months at a time. It was left to Elizabeth McFarlane to hold her family - and indeed, all the European missionaries' wives - together through all the danger and uncertainty, which included attacks on newly-built missions and their occupants and being left behind to worry while her husband made continual voyages along the southern coast of New Guinea, whose waters were still completely uncharted. She also endured the death of one of her children. It was not unexpected in these tropical climates that children would die; and a Christian woman might console herself by thinking of her child as now with God and free of earthly care; but it wasn't any easier to bear the grief, I'm sure. She was a remarkable woman.

For William Evan McFarlane and his siblings - five at the start, four at the end - the years from 1872 to around 1879/80 were ones of change in an atmosphere which mixed religious fervour and the excitement of new places and new challenges, with an understanding that personal safety must be disregarded while bringing God to the heathen. Being martyred - killed by hostile natives - comes over in Samuel's books as something that might be in God's plan for you, and you were not to turn from doing God's work in order to avoid it. And LMS missionaries, both native and European, did not turn; and some were killed including people the McFarlanes knew, the best-known example being Rev James Chalmers, who was killed and almost certainly eaten in April 1901 in Papua New Guinea, along with one British LMS colleague and a number of local trainees.

Those years began in 1872 with the McFarlanes and other LMS missionaries packing up and leaving Lifou - the only home any of the McFarlane children had known so far. While Samuel McFarlane made a trip to England to take a period of leave, raise funds for the new mission, and see his book on Lifou through the publication process, I think his family remained behind, in Sydney NSW; the biggest town the McFarlane children will have seen, and full of Europeans. Samuel was in England in the middle of 1873 and was probably away for a year. In his books he doesn't mention his family being with him on this trip home; so I suppose they weren't. He came to collect them from Sydney in 1874, but rushed off ahead of them back to the new mission's temporary headquarters at Cape York; so he was not on board ship with them when his younger daughter - William Evan's nearest sibling - died, either of sea-sickness or a fever. She was buried at sea and it must have been a traumatic event for Elizabeth and the other children, made worse by having to leave her behind, buried at sea.

Samuel settled his family at Somerset, Cape York, where the new mission was temporarily based. When the mission station at Cooktown on Stacey Island was ready for them, they moved in there; this would have been in 1875, I think. By the end of 1877, though, they had moved on again, to Murray Island; and this was probably Samuel and Elizabeth's last posting as missionaries in the field. Whether Elizabeth McFarlane had time at either of those places to found a school like the one she had run on Lifou isn't clear. In his books, Samuel doesn't pay his wife anything like what I consider to be her due, for her part in her husband's missionary work; though he does seem to be suggesting that most of the teaching at the New Guinea mission was being done by natives of the Loyalty Island that he had brought with him for the purpose. Perhaps Elizabeth's efforts were concentrated on the education of her own children: Sewell, the eldest, was in his late teens by the late 1870s. The fact that the young McFarlanes were growing up and needing to be prepared for the working lives that lay ahead of them, probably influenced Samuel and Elizabeth's decision to return to Britain.

I think the evidence from William Evan McFarlane's later life shows that he thought of Australia as a place where he had felt at home. Though it might have been when he was just a toddler that he first became fascinated by the evidence of God's handiwork that he saw above him at night - the stars of the southern sky; his interest in astronomy continued throughout his life. How free the children of missionaries were to run about and play, and not wear many clothes if it was hot, I really don't know. But William Evan's choice, on two occasions, to accept work in remote districts in hot countries, suggests that he was never very keen on life in cities; nor on Britain's climate - they just weren't what he was used to.

Samuel McFarlane went home to a job at the LMS offices in Blomfield Street, near Liverpool Street station in the City of London. His family settled down near Elizabeth McFarlane's relatives. By 1881, they were living at 24 Cauldwell Street Bedford; later they moved to Elmstone Lodge on Bromham Road - they were living there in 1888 when Samuel was writing his book on the New Guinea mission. On census day 1881, Samuel was (yet again) away from home. Sewell was studying medicine at Edinburgh University but was home for the holidays. William Evan, Alfred and Walter were all still at school. Harriet had left school; she was listed as having no occupation but may have been studying to be a teacher or already employed as one - census officials didn't always ask women if they were working. All the family attended the Bunyan Meeting chapel in Mill Street.

The McFarlanes' lives might still be organised around missionary work and chapel-going but they had come back to a rather different Britain to the one they had left. Two developments in particular were making changes to the intellectual landscape that they might have struggled to ignore; and I think the evidence shows that the younger generation didn't ignore them completely. The first was the publication - on 22 November 1859, about the time that Samuel and Elizabeth reached Lifou - of Charles Darwin's On the Origin of Species. The second had been going on longer but was becoming more widely accepted as legitimate: biblical criticism. Biblical criticism treated the Bible like any other book - as the product of human endeavour. It was a product of the Enlightenment, and Evangelicalism was a reaction to it, a restatement of the Bible as the words of God, written down by God's chosen scribes, true in every detail and not for negotiation on any terms. During the mid-19th century the movement went on apace and began to move from its Protestant origins into Catholicism with the work of Renan (translated into English by the husband of GD member Katharine Julia Buckman). It reached a peak with Julius Wellhausen's two-volume Prolegomena zur Geschichte Israels published in Germany in 1878 and 1894 and seen as biblical criticism's equivalent to The Origin of Species in terms of being a point from which there was no return. Wellhausen himself produced a short summary of his argument for the 1881 edition of Encyclopaedia Britannica, introducing it to a much wider audience; and the full first volume, translated by J Sutherland Black and Allan Menzies, was published in English in 1885 while William Evan McFarlane was still at school and his older brother Sewell had just begun work as a doctor.

There had been other developments too, in the twenty years Samuel and Elizabeth had been away. One in particular benefited their sons - greatly increased access to higher education, for those who could afford to pay. Samuel and Elizabeth took full advantage of this, at least for their sons, though their daughter Harriet had a more stereotypic education, studying music, probably with a local teacher and not to 'professional' level. Perhaps Samuel and Elizabeth thought that their sons' upbringing would ensure that their faith would be proof against these intellectual challenges, and with Alfred and Sewell they seem to have been successful. However, I think the working life of William Evan McFarlane shows that he was influenced by the new intellectual environment, to the extent of believing that without due care for the body, you could not expect people to focus on the care of their soul.

MISSIONARY WORK - THE NEXT GENERATION

Sewell, William Evan and Alfred all went to university; something that had not been an option for their father. The youngest brother, Walter, doesn't seem to have done so: perhaps the money ran out at that point. Sewell studied medicine at Edinburgh University, and then spent several years in Bristol, gaining experience as a GP. He married Mary Dora Armstrong of Clifton in 1886 and the two of them went to China in 1887. Until 1900, Sewell was the senior doctor at the Chi Chou Medical Mission at Hsaio-chang. 1900, however, brought the anti-Christian, anti-foreign Boxer rebellion. Sewell and his wife and family hung on in Hsaio-chang until June 1900 when the rebels were virtually on their doorstep; but then they opted to live to do further missionary work, rather than stay put and be martyred. By 1907 they were back in England and Sewell had gone to work for the London Medical Mission at Endell Street, treating bodies and souls in the dark continent of St Giles Covent Garden. He died in 1920. Letters written by Sewell in 1894 and 1900 show that he had all his father's Christian fervour; and that he was able to combine his science-based medical training with a belief in God's providence.

Alfred James followed most closely in his father's footsteps, by doing missionary work as a teacher. As the rules barring Nonconformists had been repealed, he was able to study at Mansfield College Oxford, before joining the LMS on graduation. He was also sent to China, and worked at various places in Hubei province - Siao-kan (then spelled Siaokan) (1896-99) and Hankou (then spelled Hankow) (from 1899); apparently continuing at his post right through the Boxer rebellion and beyond. At the end of the first World War he married another Oxford-graduate missionary, Dorothy Margaret Thorpe (born 1889). They worked together in China until 1935, when they retired to Weston-super-Mare, where Dorothy had grown up. Alfred died in 1957, Dorothy in 1961.

Although you couldn't describe any of the McFarlane family as explorers in the purist sense, Samuel (elected 1886), William Evan (1895) and Sewell (1900) were all Fellows of the Royal Geographical Society. Samuel had work published in RGS publications and was for a time on an group which advised the RGS on affairs in New Guinea.

FOR COMPLETENESS: WALTER AND HARRIET

On the day of the 1891 census, Harriet was working in Bedford, teaching music; she didn't mention being employed in a school so I presume she was giving lessons in her pupils' homes. She married another teacher, Ralph Everitt Corbold, in 1893. They lived in Manchester where Ralph was on the staff of Manchester Grammar School. Walter was also working as a teacher in 1891 but his appearance on the 1891 census (still living with his parents) is the last information I have on him. I cannot find out what happened to him after that date.

WILLIAM EVAN MCFARLANE AS A MISSIONARY

The GD's William Evan McFarlane was the third missionary brother. I get a sense of him, at least in his early adulthood, as not leading, but following very closely examples set by his elders. He left school with his father's level of religious conviction and went to Cheshunt College as his father had done. Ordained in May 1891, he joined the LMS straight away and was sent out to join its mission in Mongolia, which was having a crisis of personnel to go with all its other problems.

When William Evan left England, the LMS was on its second attempt to find a foothold in Mongolia. Its first (1820-1841) had been authorised by one Russian tsar and then banned by another; so the second attempt went through China. It was essentially the work of one man, Rev James Gilmour, who had arrived in Mongolia in 1870 and finally got his first convert in 1885. It had been difficult to follow up even this small and belated success: Gilmour was on sick-leave in 1889 and 1890; and as soon as he returned to work his deputy, Dr G P Smith took leave of absence and doesn't seem to have gone back. The situation went critical in May 1891 when Gilmour died suddenly, while he was in Tientsin for a meeting of the LMS's North China Mission; so that Rev J Parker and his wife were the only LMS representatives left in Mongolia. They needed help; and William Evan was it. While William Evan was on his way, however, the political situation between the native Mongolians and newly-arrived

Han Chinese, deteriorated; and in November 1891 the Parkers had to retreat to Tientsin; where William Evan found them when he reached north China.

It was the following April before Rev Parker thought that it was safe to return to Mongolia. He, his wife and William Evan arrived at the mission at Ch'ao Yang on 3 May 1892. The one convert of 1885 had become 50 converts by the end of the year so there was some room for optimism; but during those few months, William Evan caught dysentery. Perhaps weakened by the long journey he had had to make to reach his posting, he was unable to shake the illness off completely. After enduring repeated bouts of it for about 18 months he had to admit defeat: he left Mongolia in May 1894 and returned to England. Soon afterwards, hostilities broke out between Russia and Japan and the Parkers also had to leave.

William Evan may have continued to be a devout Nonconformist Christian all his life but he was never employed by a missionary society again as far as I know. He decided to follow the example of his eldest brother Sewell, and study medicine, even going to Edinburgh University medical school where Sewell had done his training. He started there in 1895 and joined the GD two years into his studies. Throughout his time as a student he lived at the same address - 28 Montpelier Park Edinburgh.

EDINBURGH AND THE GOLDEN DAWN

The GD's Amen-Ra temple in Edinburgh had been set up in 1893. It had quite a few members who were doctors, including one whose name William Evan will have known: Dr Robert William Felkin, the medical school's Lecturer in Diseases of the Tropics and an ex-missionary himself (though on behalf of the Church of England rather than a nonconformist mission). However, William Evan might just have missed Felkin, who moved to London to set up in private practice around the time William Evan began his studies. A much more likely GD member to have recommended William Evan for initiation was William Peck, Amen-Ra's Hierophant (1896) and then its sub-Imperator (1897); husband of GD member Christina Peck, and brother of GD member Harriet Peck. Peck (1862-1925) was an inventor with a number of patents to his name; but he was also director of Edinburgh's City Observatory and a great populariser of astronomy, through books and talks - a Patrick Moore of his day. During his time in China and Mongolia William Evan will have had ample time to get familiar with the northern sky. The City Observatory will have offered him what might have been his first opportunity to look at stars through a telescope. I'm sure he made a beeline for Peck's domain whenever his medical studies permitted and it was inevitable that the two men should get friendly.

I've already said in the first paragraph of this biography that William Evan didn't follow up his GD initiation. Nor did he join Edinburgh's branch of the Theosophical Society - William Peck was an important member of that, as well. William Evan might no longer be a missionary but I think that some of the texts taught in the GD would have been rather too much like witchcraft and paganism for a man from such a devout Evangelical family. And the texts of the TS he might have regarded as heathen. He let the GD go and got on with his medical work; but perhaps he and the Pecks remained friendly.

William Evan graduated MB ChB from the University of Edinburgh in 1900 and went to gain some experience at the Wirral Children's Hospital in Birkenhead. I imagine he was offered the job through family contacts in Lancashire: Samuel McFarlane had friends in the Manchester area and he and Elizabeth had chosen to retire to Southport; and Harriet and her husband were living in Chorlton.

SOUTH AFRICA

1900 and 1901 were calamitous times: the Boxer rebellion was on; and the Boer War was on. In South Africa, Britain's scorched earth policy with regard to the farms of its Boer opponents had led to the displacement of thousands of women and children by mid-1900. The military authorities began to herd them into what the Secretary of State for War referred to (in June 1901) as "concentration camps"; but the numbers needing to go to the camps rapidly outstripped the manpower and organisation available to create suitable places to live out the rest of the war, however long it took. With only tents for shelter, no clean water, no properly-dug sewage treatment and not enough food, the measles epidemic that had already been raging got out of control and was joined by typhoid, diphtheria and William Evan's old enemy, dysentery. Death rates shot up, particularly amongst children, but information on what was going on was censored by the Government; so it was not understood in Britain just how bad things were, until well into 1901. Even then, not everyone was in favour of sending help to the camps: politicians who had voted against the war opposed it; and others argued against helping the wives and children of Britain's enemies. William Evan was not one of those who felt that way. He volunteered to go to South Africa as a medical officer. At the end of 1901, he arrived at his allotted camp: Mafeking.

MAFEKING

Mafeking (now called by its correct name, Mahikeng) was a name known throughout the Empire by the time William Evan set out for South Africa. Everyone knew about the 217-day siege (from October 1899 to May 1900) and its eventual relief by Colonel B T Mahon and his troops. I'm not sure that quite many people would have been able to say where the town was, however - it's on the Upper Molopo River near the border with Botswana.

The handing over - you can call it an abandonment - of the camps by the military to the civilian authorities was hasty and ill-thought-out. There weren't enough civilian workers to take over and there was no clear chain of bureaucratic command; so that decisions that desperately needed to be made, weren't. Supplies of food and transport to get food to the camps were both lacking; and most of the camps were on starvation rations for months. At Mafeking these difficulties were made worse by the camp's isolation and the lack of men in the camp to do the heavy work like digging sewers, and channels to drain off the rain which raged through the tents after every downpour. By the autumn of 1901 the situation at Mafeking was chaotic and deadly. At the end of October 1901 there were about 5000 people in the camp, mostly women and children; but until the end of that month the camp had no nursing staff at all; until December 1901 the camp also had no one of sufficient rank to take administrative decisions; two senior medical officers came and then went (their health broken by the conditions) between October 1901 and January 1902, without making any real impact on the appalling sanitary arrangements; and the epidemics continued to rage, felling even some members of the staff.

The tide began to turn at Mafeking late in 1901. Death rates peaked in November 1901 as the epidemics began to abate. Just before Christmas a good civilian administrator finally arrived: Herbert Kembell Cooke (or Cook, I've seen both spellings). A second replacement senior medical officer arrived and began work. The camp got a trained pharmacist/dispenser. An orphanage had been needed for several months, so many women in the camp had died; at last, one was set up. And - doing his bit to improve matters - William Evan McFarlane joined the staff, bringing the number of doctors to six (five men and one woman) and bringing also his welcome recent experience of work in a children's hospital.

A couple of months after William Evan's arrival, staff were at last able to have the odd evening off. To lighten the atmosphere in the camp and cheer people up, a series of concerts was organised during February and March 1902. And then, in late May, came the glad news of Peace.

ZEERUST

Despite the fact that the refugees didn't have farmhouses or crops to go back to, the British authorities began to hustle them out of the camps within days of peace being declared; most of the camps were empty by the end of 1902. The refugees in Mafeking concentration camp were all from the Zeerust and Rustenberg districts. It's not clear from any of the sources I've read, whether medical officers from the camps were expected to accompany refugees on their journey back whence they had come; but William Evan did so, at some point during 1902, and remained at Zeerust at least throughout 1903 and probably into 1904. The British had taken control of Zeerust and the area around it as part of the Peace deal. From July 1902, a British magistrate was in post at Zeerust; and one reference I saw on the web referred to a small hospital there having been set up at about the right time, by a Dr MacFarlane (sic); but I haven't been able to follow it up to confirm that William Evan was the man in the snippet.

SURREY

William Evan's name first appears in the General Medical Council register in 1903, care of a PO Box number in Zeerust. Ancestry doesn't have any registers between 1903 and 1907, but in 1907 his address was 53 Middle Hill, Englefield Green Surrey; though I think he had already left it by the time the register was published. One of the accounts of his life records him working for a Dr Beresford in Chertsey, Surrey; no date for that was given but I think it's probably now, and that the Dr Beresford in question was William Hugh Beresford, a GP living at Bentley, Egham Hill in 1901 and 1907 though by 1911 he had moved to Esher and might have retired. After several years working in a hospital or field-hospital environment, perhaps William Evan felt it was time to get some more experience as a general practitioner. He was, I think, looking at last for a permanent appointment. And an appointment eventually came up in Australia.

IRVINEBANK

Irvinebank, beneath the Atherton Tablelands of Queensland, was a mining and smelting town, renamed (from Glen Creek) promoted, organised and generally run by John Moffat of the Glen Smelting Company of Herberton, after he had bought up some leases on tin mines, around 1884.

People were drawn to the area by the prospect of well-paid work, but the town was always a small one, its population peaking at 1264 in 1911. In 1906, William Evan MacFarlane (note the changed spelling) was appointed as doctor in residence and doctor in charge of Irvinebank's Walsh District Hospital. Though most of his work was in Irvinebank he was also responsible for the Stannary Hills Hospital, making visits there twice a week. In fact, only a few years after he started work, Irvinebank began to decline, and people began to leave it, when the economic slump of the years before World War 1 drove metal prices down. Moffat was investing heavily in tramways and railways when this downturn occurred, and was badly caught out financially. He retired from the company in 1912 and Irvinebank's decline accelerated. William Evan, however, worked in Irvinebank for the rest of his life and became a popular and generous member of its community.

ASTRONOMY

A house next to the hospital came with the job; and possibly for the first time in his life, William Evan thought of himself as having a home. Certainly, he put down more roots at Irvinebank than he had ever done anywhere before. Some were roots of a particular and rather expensive kind - in 1917 he bought himself a telescope and built an observatory for it, in his garden. Whenever his work permitted - which wasn't as often as he would have liked - he went out to do some serious work observing double stars. Double stars are groups of two or more stars which appear to be in close proximity. Some really are close to each other and orbiting around a point in between the two; these are binaries. Other stars are not close at all, they just look that way from Earth. Félix Savary had computed the orbits of one binary system in Ursa Major as early as 1827; but there was still a lot of systematic work needing to be done on double stars when William Evan began his observations.

The telescope William Evan chose was a Cooke equatorial, a well-known brand whose users included the Royal Observatory at Greenwich as well as many serious amateurs. William Evan was able by 1917 to afford one of the larger ones - his had a 17.8cm (7inches) refractor. He was well set up, therefore, to see - in the constellation of Aquila - the brightest nova since 1604. Although it was just about visible to the naked eye the previous night, on the night of 8-9 June 1918 it outshone every other star but two, an instant astronomical sensation. At that time the life and death of stars was not well understood and there was as much bafflement as excitement amongst astronomers as the news spread and all telescopes were trained on it. It was probably statistics on the nova, gathered by William Evan during August 1918 and sent to the Royal Astronomical Society in London, that got him elected a Fellow in January 1919. Just noting, here, that if William Evan was still a Christian, he had no problem with using the scientific method, and the latest scientific equipment, to investigate God's handiwork further, to see how it worked. I'm not sure his brothers Sewell and Alfred would have felt the same. William Evan named the nova 'Vulcan Star' after the Irvinebank tin mine, and it continued to be called that locally for some years.

Novas are now known to be the ejection of extremely hot gas from an unstable star or binary system, making it shine far more brightly than up until then. The 1918 nova is rather dully called V603 Aquilae these days; there are photographs of it on the web. V603 Aquilae is one of the most studied novas. In 1964 Robert P Kraft was able to prove that the gas had been blown out of a binary system; observers in 1918 couldn't see enough detail to be sure. And since then, instruments in space and on land have peered at its light in the ultra-violet and X-rays.

I'm sure William Evan would have continued to use his telescope to observe the nova and other interesting features of the sky, and would have sent more data to the RAS; but the Spanish flu epidemic of 1918-19 intervened; decisively.

The Australian government put quarantine restrictions in place to keep out Spanish flu for as long as possible. However, it came ashore at last, in January 1919, with more or less simultaneous outbreaks in Hobart, Melbourne and Sydney. As Irvinebank was rather isolated, the disease eventually broke out there in July 1919. For several weeks after he tended the first cases, William Evan was kept extremely busy, working through the kind of vile weather that the disease thrived on: statistics have shown that in hot and humid climates it was particularly virulent. By mid-August the worst seemed to be over and he began to contemplate taking a deserved holiday, perhaps visiting India. But the flu came for him (and it often came very quickly indeed): on a Thursday he didn't feel well; by the Friday he was thinking he wasn't up to making his usual visit to Stannary Hills Hospital; and on Sunday 18 August 1919 he died. The Spanish flu is known for having picked off the young (aged 20-40) rather than the older and youngest, so at 53 William Evan was a little above the age of maximum danger. However, he had lived for a great deal of his life in sapping climates; he had not spared himself, in those climates, to tend to the health (physical and spiritual) of others; and he had had dysentery in the past, which can weaken the heart. Virtually the whole of Irvinebank turned out for his funeral; he's buried in the town cemetery.

RIVERVIEW OBSERVATORY

William Evan died suddenly. All the evidence I've found indicates that he never married. And he lived far away from his closest relations. Consequently his legal affairs took some time to sort out. By 1921, however, his telescope was up for sale. It was bought by St Ignatius College Sydney NSW for the observatory Father Edward Francis Pigot was setting up in the school grounds. It's still in use today.

BASIC SOURCES I USED for all Golden Dawn members.

Membership of the Golden Dawn: The Golden Dawn Companion by R A Gilbert. Northampton: The Aquarian Press 1986. Between pages 125 and 175, Gilbert lists the names, initiation dates and addresses of all those people who became members of the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn or its many daughter Orders between 1888 and 1914. The list is based on the Golden Dawn's administrative records and its Members' Roll - the large piece of parchment on which all new members signed their name at their initiation. All this information had been inherited by Gilbert but it's now in the Freemasons' Library at the United Grand Lodge of England building on Great Queen Street Covent Garden. Please note, though, that the records of the Amen-Ra Temple in Edinburgh were destroyed in 1900/01. I have recently (July 2014) discovered that some records of the Horus Temple at Bradford have survived, though most have not; however those that have survived are not yet accessible to the public.

For the history of the GD during the 1890s I usually use Ellic Howe's The Magicians of the Golden Dawn: A Documentary History of a Magical Order 1887-1923. Published Routledge and Kegan Paul 1972. Foreword by Gerald Yorke. Howe is a historian of printing rather than of magic; he also makes no claims to be a magician himself, or even an occultist. He has no axe to grind.

Family history: freebmd; ancestry.co.uk (census and probate); findmypast.co.uk; familysearch; Burke's Peerage and Baronetage; Burke's Landed Gentry; Armorial Families; thepeerage.com; and a wide variety of family trees on the web.

Famous-people sources: mostly about men, of course, but very useful even for the female members of GD. Oxford Dictionary of National Biography. Who Was Who. Times Digital Archive.

Useful source for business and legal information: London Gazette and its Scottish counterpart Edinburgh Gazette. Now easy to find (with the right search information) on the web.

Catalogues: British Library; Freemasons' Library.

Wikipedia; Google; Google Books - my three best resources. I also used other web pages, but with some caution, as - from the historian's point of view - they vary in quality a great deal.

SOURCES FOR WILLIAM MACFARLANE

OUTLINE OF WILLIAM EVAN'S LIFE: sent to me by Kenneth Jack in two emails over the weekend of 16-18 May 2015.

A very short biography was in Loxton's Medical Directory of Australia etc published by F W Loxton 1910: p146.

THE MACFARLANE FAMILY

See clanmacfarlanegenealogy.info for information on Rev Dr Samuel MacFarlane DD's Scottish birth and upbringing.

LONDON MISSIONARY SOCIETY

Most LMS documents are now at School of Oriental and African Studies, London University. Some of the artefacts collected by its employees are in the Horniman Museum, south London. And the National Library of Australia also has a large archive collection bought from LMS in 1961 and not just covering Australia and its dependencies: see www.nla.gov.au for a short hist of the LMS. And see wikipedia. There's also The London Missionary Society in Australia by Anna Johnston. Cambridge University Press 2003 though it appears only to cover 1800-60.

SAMUEL McFARLANE

Familysearch England-ODM GS film number 952396 for his marriage to Elizabeth Ursula Joyce.

Biographical Dictionary of Christian Missionaries p448. This source did not have entries for any of Samuel's sons.

A rather less positive view of Samuel's career can be seen at adonbline.anu.edu.au/biogs.

Several works in the British Library:

As MacFarlane:

1863 La Evangelia hna cinihane hnei Mataio. As translator. Published Nengone: LMS Press.

1873 Tusi Salamo. As translator, with John Sleight. The BL's copy is London: British and Foreign Bible Society though there may also have been copies printed in Lifou.

1888 British New Guinea Vocabularies Part II is by Samuel, edited by R N Cust. London: SPCK though printed by James Chalmers of Port Moresby.

As McFarlane:

1885 Euangelia Mareko Detarer: Gospel of St Mark in the Language of the Murray Island. Sydney NSW: NSW Auxiliary Bible Society.

Given the kind of person he was and the kind of work he did, you wouldn't expect Samuel McFarlane to be interested in native artefacts. However, the British Museum has one item collected by him at Mabuig in the Torres Strait - catalogue number Oc.2489, a mask in the style of a crocodile. It was first exhibited in 1886.

MCFARLANE HARBOUR at Port Moresby is probably named after Samuel.

Adventures in New Guinea by Rev James Chalmers. London: Religious Tract Society 1886 p69.

MURRAY ISLAND, which isn't mentioned in Samuel's book on the New Guinea mission:

Via the latrove online newspapers to Sydney Morning Herald 28 March 1878: letter written to a friend in Sydney by Mrs Chalmers on 27 January 1878 at the Chalmers' base at Stacey Island.

REV JAMES CHALMERS

See wikipedia: 1841 to 8 April 1901. And for his death:

Times Mon 22 April 1901 p6 Murder of British Missionaries.

Times Tue 23 April 1901 p9

Times Tue 30 April 1901 p5.

None of the reports in the Times suggest that Chalmers and his companions had been eaten.

SEWELL MACFARLANE

Family history details, DOB and DOD, from rootsweb.ancestry.com

At h-net.msu.ed two items posted by michelle.renshaw@adelaide.edu.au in May 2006; transcriptions of letters written by Sewell in China during the 1890s.

Cross and Crown by Mary Isabella Bryson of Tientsin. Published London Missionary Society 1904: p153.

Via the latrove newspapers website to South Australian Register of 2 October 1900 p7: Hardships of Missionaries in China, a report based on a letter written 21 July [1900] at Kobe, Japan by Sewell S MacFarlane.

Burdett's Hospitals and Charities: Being the Year Book of Philanthropy editor Sir Henry C Burdett. Published Scientific Press 1912: entry for the London Medical Mission.

ALFRED JAMES MCFARLANE

Report of London Missionary Society vols 123-25 1918 p108, list of current staff with details including which chapel they had attended when young; and where they were educated.

At www.bunyanmeeting.co.uk a history of the Bunyan Meeting of Mill Street Bedford. See also wikipedia.

The Rise of the Laity in Evangelical Protestantism, editor Deryck Lovegrove. London: Routledge 2002.

Familysearch: Manifests of Passengers Arriving from Canada into Vermont 1929-49.

CHESHUNT COLLEGE

At www.british-history.ac.uk: histories of the current Cambridge University theological colleges, using information from the Victoria County History series: History of the County of Cambridge and the Isle of Ely, Volume 3: City and University of Cambridge. Published London 1959.

NEW CALEDONIA, LIFU (LIFOU) AND THE LOYALTY ISLANDS

Wikipedia on New Caledonia. Also on the Loyalty Islands but this entry doesn't give its sources. On Lifou.

More information in The Discovery of the Pacific Islands by Andrew Sharp. Oxford University Press 1960.

CAPE YORK

Wikipedia.

Reports of the Cambridge Anthropological Expedition to the Torres Strait Islands; by Alfred Cort Haddon 1901: Introduction p3.

PAPUA NEW GUINEA

At web.esrc.unimelb.au details of that part of the London Missionary Society collection owned by the National Library of Australia which is now stored at the Papua New Guinea University Library with catalogue number NLS MS 3720.

Torres Strait Islanders: Custom and Colonialism by Jeremy Beckett. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press 1897: p242 in its bibliography, two reports made by Rev A W Murray and Rev S McFarlane 1871 and 1872.

WILLIAM EVAN AS A MISSIONARY IN MONGOLIA

Via archive.org to The History of the London Missionary Society 1795-1895 by Richard Lovett. Published in two volumes 1899 by Oxford University Press for the LMS: pp585-588; p610-614

When Lovett was preparing the book, the LMS still had not been able to return to Mongolia.

ROYAL GEOGRAPHICAL SOCIETY

Royal Geographical Society Year-Book and Record published by the RGS 1 Savile Row. The British Library only has the issues for 1898 to 1901; these seem to have been the first 3 of the series. Year- book 1898 p135, p189. Year-Book 1900 p135. Year-Book 1901 p139.

EDINBURGH

Robert William Felkin:

www.academia.edu/1906812/The\_extraordinary\_life\_and\_work\_of\_Robert\_Felkin\_-

Bahai_Mage. Article by Lil Osborn with details of early life based on his obituary in the British Medical Journal.

Who Was Who 1916-28 p824 entry for William Peck.

WIRRAL CHILDREN'S HOSPITAL

At discovery.nationalarchives.gov.uk, an introduction to the Hospital's records which are now in Wirral Record Office.

MAFEKING

There's plenty on the web about the siege, which made Robert Baden-Powell (founder of the Scouts) a household name.

See wikipedia and other sites which concentrate on the military aspects of it.

Wikipedia on what was known to the British as Mafeking but was later called Mafikeng and is now called Mahikeng.

Programmes of the Weekly Promenade Concerts held at the Burgher Refugee Camp Mafeking, February and March 1902.

Times Mon 7 July 1902 p5 a report on the land that was being annexed by the British in the wake of the war, which included the area around Zeerust.

MAFEKING CONCENTRATION CAMP

Further Papers relating to the Working of the Refugee Camps in South Africa which continues from an earlier report Cd853 issued December 1901. This report: HMSO, issued January 1902 and presented by the king to both houses of Parliament. The documents contained in it were all prepared October-November 1901. P5, p42, p45, p88-89.

The Brunt of the War and Where it Fell by Emily Hobhouse. London: Methuen and Co 1902: p93-94; pp118-126. On p130 Emily prints a letter from St John Brodrick MP, Secretary of State for War, which specifically describes the camps in South Africa as "Concentration Camps".

Wikipedia for the career of St John Brodrick 1856-1942. And Emily Hobhouse 1860-1926.

Further on Emily Hobhouse: John Hall's That Bloody Woman: The Turbulent Life of Emily Hobhouse. Cornwall: Truran Press 2008.

Modern accounts of the concentration camps, which both use the papers of Herbert Kemball Cook (or Cooke).

Mourning Becomes...Post/Memory, Commemoration and the Concentration Camps of the South African War by Liz Stanley. Manchester and New York: Manchester University Press 2006. Especially Introduction; p15; p16n11; p85; p122p pp138-140; pp157-159; p167-168n56; pp183-85; p190; p326. A succinct account of the war, and lots of camp statistics.

Collective Violence and the Agrarian Origins of South African Apartheid by John Higginson. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press 2014: p100.

ZEERUST

Wikipedia for the founding and the geography of the district.

Royal Geographical Society Year-book and Record issue of 1902 has an entry for W E McFarlane (sic) giving Zeerust as his address.

Through Lands that Were Dark: Being a Record of a Year's Missionary Journey in Africa and Madagascar by F H Hawkins LL B, Foreign Secretary for the London Missionary Society with responsibility for Africa, China and Madagascar. Published: LMS 1914. I could have sworn I saw, via google, a reference in this book to a hospital at Zeerust started by a "Dr MacFarlane". I ordered the book at the British Library, but couldn't find the reference anywhere. Hawkins was making his journey in 1913, long after William Evan had left Africa. P60 has the only reference to Zeerust that I could find in the book: Hawkins passed through the town in order to catch a train from there to Johannesburg. He didn't stop.

IRVINEBANK QUEENSLAND

Two good websites for Irvinebank's geography and history and the important role played by John Moffat in the development of the town:

queenslandplaces.com, and particularly www.athertontablelandnetguide.com which reproduced contemporary accounts of the town; and had on it reproductions of articles in The Northern Herald of 20 August 1919 p9 including a photograph of him at his telescope; and The Cairns Post of 19 August 1919 p4.

The find-a-grave index has William Evan MacFarlane as buried in Irvinebank cemetery.

ASTRONOMY

At www.ulo.ac.uk website of the University of London Observatory, which has a Cooke telescope named the Joynson telescope after the man who gave it to them in 1932. Made 1863, 6" refractor.

At the Royal Museums Greenwich website www.portcities.org.uk short report on the equatorial-style telescopes bought by Royal Observatory and sent with five different expeditions in 1874 to observe the 1874 transit of Venus; including Cooke refractors.

Classic Telescopes by Neil English. Published New York: Springer 2013. On p2 Figure 2.7 shows a 3" Cooke refractor built around 1900.

Wikipedia on double stars and binary stars; and V603 Aquilae - a white dwarf and a red dwarf orbiting a central point every 3 hour and 20 minutes.

Cataclysmic Events and How to Observe Them by Martin Mobberley. Published Springer 2009: p46.

For the excitement at the time: via the latrove newspaper website at trove.nla.gov.au to Western Mail (published Perth Western Australia) Friday 14 June 1918 p20.

At www.ras.org.uk/library/obituaries/1314-ras-obituaries-38 a one-paragraph obituary of William Evan. It gets a lot of its facts about his early life wrong though of course it's pretty good on the reasons why he was elected FRAS.

Journal of the British Astronomical Association volume 28 1918 p236.

Australian Journal of Astronomy volumes 1-2 , published Astral Press 1985 p66.

SPANISH FLU

See virus.stanford.edu/uda for some general statistics.

In Australia:

Website www.emknowledge.gov.au, www.migrationheritage.nsw.gov.au and www.themonthly.com.au, article by Malcolm Knox published in the edition of April 2010. Knox had interviewed Dr Keith Horsley who was writing a book on the history of flu in Australia.

RIVERVIEW OBSERVATORY still exists and is a weather-station, see www.bom.gov.au. Pigot began taking weather observations in 1905.

Journal for the History of Astronomy volumes 3-4 1912 p211 suggests that some attempt at systematic observation of the night sky was going on at St Ignatius College in 1909; but without a telescope.

Explorers of the Southern Sky: A History of Australian Astronomy by Raymond Haynes. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press 1996: pp124-126.

5 August 2015

Find the web pages of Roger Wright and Sally Davis, including my list of people initiated into the Order of the Golden Dawn between 1888 and 1901, at:

www.wrightanddavis.co.uk

***

The Laings.

This is a file on the family background of three members of the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn. The first two are sisters: Cecilia Macrae and Florence Kennedy, daughters of Samuel and Mary Laing. The third is GD member Agnes Cathcart, née Baxter, who was a first cousin of theirs.

My basic sources for any of my GD member biographies are in a section at the end of the file. Supplementary sources for this particular member are listed at the end of each section.

THE COMMON ANCESTOR: SAMUEL LAING OF PAPDALE

Records of the Laing family in Orkney go back to James V's time but I'm only going to start with Samuel Laing (1780-1868), known as 'of Papdale', the family home he inherited in 1818, to differentiate him from his son, who had the same name. He was grandfather of all three GD members.

Samuel Laing of Papdale had a varied career: he served in the army in the years just before the Peninsular War; he managed various businesses owned by relatives. Back on Orkney he made a fortune from the kelp industry and helped developed Orkney's herring industry; before losing a lot of the money he had made, trying to establish himself in politics. He's best known now for his last careers, as a travel writer and commentator on the European political and social scene; and as translator of the Icelandic sagas of Snorri Sturluson.

Samuel Laing of Papdale married Agnes Kelly in 1809. They had two children: Elizabeth Dorothy, mother of Agnes Cathcart; and Samuel, father of Cecilia Macrae and Florence Kennedy. Agnes née Kelly died in 1812 and her sister Mary came to manage the household and act as mother to the children.

Samuel Laing of Papdale travelled a great deal in Europe at different times in his life. He spent 1799-1801 in Germany, learning the language well and establishing a connection with Germany and German culture that his son's family continued, at least to the 1880s. His time in the army took him to Portugal and Gibraltar. In the early 1830s he stayed in several different places in France and Germany so that daughter Elizabeth could learn both languages. In the mid-1830s, he was living in Norway; where he began his saga translations. After his son had graduated from university, they travelled around Europe together.

Samuel Laing of Papdale began work on an autobiography. He got as far as 1856 but it was left unfinished when he had a severe stroke. Its final paragraph recorded the marriage of his grand-daughter, future GD member Agnes Baxter, to Robert Cathcart of Pitcairnie. Samuel Laing spent his last years living in Edinburgh with his daughter Elizabeth Dorothy Baxter. He died at her house, 4 Lynedoch Place Edinburgh, on 23 April 1868.

Sources:

I've drawn heavily on the book and online article below - both by R P Fereday:

The Autobiography of Samuel Laing of Papdale 1780-1868 edited and with supplementary information by R P Fereday. Bellavista Publications 2000. Dedicated to the group of local residents who saved Papdale House from being knocked down and used for road-making in the 1960s. Fereday says that there are very few records in Orkney on the Laing family. He was using a manuscript copy of Samuel Laing of Papdale's autobiography, owned by Molly Somerset, a descendant of Cecilia and Florence's elder sister Mary Eliza, who married Edward Kennard.

Seen at www.ssns.org.uk: Samuel Laing of Papdale Orkney: A Kelp-Laird's Political Ambitions 1824-1834 by R P Fereday.

Some of Samuel Laing of Papdale's publications, found in the British Library catalogue:

1836 Journal of a Residence in Norway in the Years 1834, 1835, 1836. London. BL has later editions of this.

1839 A Tour in Sweden. London.

1842 Notes of a Traveller on the Social and Political State of France etc. London. BL also has later editions of this.

1844 The Heimskringla; or Chronicle of the Kings of Norway. Volume 2. SLP as translator from Icelandic of Snorri Sturluson. I didn't see volume 1; maybe the BL doesn't have a copy.

1850 Observations of the Social and Political State of the European People 1848, 1849. Longman Brown Green and Longmans

1852 Observations on the Social and Political State of Denmark. London.

1899 The Heimskringla... Volume 3. 2nd edition London: John C Nimmo.

ELIZABETH DOROTHY BAXTER née LAING, the elder child of Samuel Laing of Papdale, and Alice née Kelly.

Samuel Laing of Papdale's daughter married Henry Baxter of Idvies in two separate ceremonies in March 1834, one in Edinburgh and one at Kirkwall in Orkney. The marriage pleased her father: the Baxter family of Dundee was wealthy, and both families were Whig/Liberal in politics.

Henry Baxter had graduated from Edinburgh University in 1817 and qualified as an advocate; during the 1830s he also acted as a Church of Scotland Commissioner. He had succeeded to his father's estate at Idvies in 1833.

Elizabeth and Henry had two daughters, Agnes and Mary, before Henry died in August 1837. After his death Elizabeth, Agnes and Mary lived not at Idvies but at a house called Bangholm Bower until 1844 when they moved into Edinburgh so that the two girls could go to school. Both daughters inherited money from the Baxter family: their grandfather noted that they had £30,000 each as a marriage portion.

Sources:

The Autobiography of Samuel Laing of Papdale 1780-1868 edited and with supplementary information by R P Fereday. Bellavista Publications 2000.

Seen at www.ssns.org.uk: Samuel Laing of Papdale Orkney: A Kelp-Laird's Political Ambitions 1824-1834 by R P Fereday.

Henry Baxter and his family:

The Faculty of Advocates in Scotland 1532-1943 published 1944 by the Faculty: p11.

Acts of the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland p1031 Henry Baxter as representative of Forfar in 1834.

Familysearch:

Scotland-ODM GS film number 1066694: marriage of Henry Baxter to Elizabeth Dorothy Laing 9 March 1834 in Edinburgh.

Scotland-ODM GS film number 990505: marriage of Henry Baxter to Elizabeth Dorothy Laing 20 March 1834 at Kirkwall, Orkney.

Via www.genesreunited.co.uk to the Perth Courier of 3 April 1834: marriage announcement.

SAMUEL LAING 1812-97

Samuel Laing, father of Cecilia and Florence, was the younger child of Samuel Laing of Papdale and his wife Agnes née Kelly. He was born in Edinburgh on 12 December 1812. After some time at grammar school in Houghton-le-Spring, and lessons with a private tutor, Samuel went to St John's College Cambridge in 1827, graduating as second wrangler in 1831 and being elected a fellow in 1834. While he was training as a barrister, he also worked in Cambridge giving maths coaching. He was called to the bar in 1837, at Lincoln's Inn. Although he described himself to the 1851 census official as a barrister, he was also the managing director of a railway company by that stage and his business involvement was always more important than his legal practice.

After a short period travelling in Europe with his father, Samuel Laing went to work as private secretary to the president of the Board of Trade, Henry Labouchere. In 1842 he moved within the Board of Trade to become secretary to its railway department, the start of fifty years of involvement in the law and finance of railways, and of investment in railways and other new technologies. In 1844 he persuaded the Liberal government to have a clause in their Railway Act forcing companies to have third-class carriages with fares no higher than 1 penny per mile. It led to a huge rise in the number of people using the railways, from which the British economy as a whole and Samuel Laing personally both benefited. After a few months in 1860 as financial secretary to the Treasury, he was sent to India by the Prime Minister, Lord Palmerston, to take charge of its finances; he was in India from 1860 to 1862, or possibly as far as 1865 (my sources differed on that point). During the period there was a great turnover of men at the top in India, that Samuel Laing will have had to deal with: Viscount Canning was governor-general until March 1862; he was replaced by the Earl of Elgin who was in charge until November 1863; for the next two months two men did the job temporarily before Sir John Lawrence took office in January 1864.

Samuel Laing was an MP; for Wick from 1852 to 1857, 1859-60 and 1865-68; and then for Orkney and Shetland 1873-85.

The railway company Samuel Laing was associated with for longest was the London, Brighton and South Coast Railway; he was made chairman of the Company in 1848, stepped down when sent to India, and took the helm again in 1866, staying in charge until 1894. In 1852, he and his deputy-chairman, both living in the Sydenham area, helped set up the company that moved the crystal palace from its original 1851 exhibition site in Hyde Park, and built a railway so that people could travel easily from London to see it at its new, Crystal Palace home. He was also a director of the Great Eastern Railway Company, at least in the 1860s; the General Credit and Finance Co, at least in the 1880s; the Railway Share Trust Ltd; and the Railway Debenture Trust Ltd.

It was inevitable that Samuel Laing's involvement with railways should bring him into contact with Robert William Kennard. R W Kennard was a member of the banking family, partners in Denison, Heywood and Kennard, but he didn't work for the bank himself. He invested in railways and also in two works (at Falkirk and Blaenavon) that supplied high quality iron and steel for the building of railways. The Laing and Kennard families were friendly by the 1860s and became family when the Laings' daughter Mary Eliza married the Kennards' son Edward in 1870. A new company was formed in 1879 to run Blaenavon iron and steel works - the latest in a series of companies known as Blaenavon Company Limited. Samuel Laing was an investor in it and became its first chairman; later his shares passed to other members of his family, and his son-in-law Charles Colin Macrae was a director.

Samuel Laing's investments were not confined to railways. In the late 1850s he put money into firms laying cables for telegraphs. Through these companies he will have known Ernest Bunsen, John Molesworth and John A M Pinniger; relations of all three of those men later joined the GD. He was also on the board of Scottish Widows Mutual Life; and on the management committee of the Royal Scottish Corporation, of Fetter Lane.

Scaling down his business and political involvement in the mid-1880s Samuel Laing began to write more. Most of his publications up to that time had been short works, often printed editions of lectures or contributions to particular political debates. The books published in the last decade of his life tackled different issues. He had long been one of the Rationalists - not an official society, more a loose group of people (the men are the ones whose names are known) committed to scientific enquiry and to bringing new approaches to old problems. Samuel Laing may have been the eldest of this association of like-minded thinkers. Thomas Henry Huxley was an important, vocal member with a very high public profile. Huxley's one-time student, Edwin Ray Lankester, was the most prominent of the next generation. Lankester in his turn taught the likes of H G Wells... and so on. With more time on his hands, Samuel Laing began to publish the results of many years of discussions with this group.

His publications included three pamphlets on Ireland and two works arguing for agnosticism. His book Problems of the Future (published in 1889) contained essays on a range of subjects from astronomy to finance. The essay on mesmerism showed that he had read some at least of the recent publications on the subject; but he was not convinced that its effects were genuine. In the essay on spiritualism he admitted to having gone to one seance in his life, but said that he had left it with no desire to go further into the subject. Spiritualist phenomena seemed to him to be too easy to fake, and he was critical of scientists like William Crookes (a GD member) and Alfred Russell Wallace for believing so easily that the dead are communicating with us.

Samuel Laing had always had an interest in evolution and the origins of Man - hence, probably, his friendship with T H Huxley. In 1866, back from India and spending the summer at Stromness with his family, he took part in an archaeological dig, in which human remains were found, and what sound like some grave goods. He published an account of the dig at the time, including in it some notes on the human remains by Huxley. In the late 1880s Laing went into the question further, publishing two works which put into lay terms the latest scientific thinking on the origins of Homo sapiens.

Many of the ideas Samuel Laing was expressing in these later books were controversial - when looking through the British Library catalogue I came across several pamphlets issued as angry ripostes to them. After Samuel Laing's death, several were re-issued in cheap, mass editions by the Rationalist Press Association. A book on the history of the RPA suggests that Samuel Laing may have put money into the RPA. It did have a number of wealthy backers including Huxley, Herbert Spencer and Leslie Stephen (father of Virginia Woolf and Vanessa Bell), all identifying themselves as agnostics.

Samuel Laing died at his home in Sydenham on 6 August 1897. His personal wealth at his death was £96000-and-odd; using the formulas on website www.measuringworth.com/ukcompare, that equates to £65 million in modern terms.

Sources:

The Autobiography of Samuel Laing of Papdale 1780-1868 edited and with supplementary information by R P Fereday. Bellavista Publications 2000. Dedicated to the group which saved Papdale House from being knocked down and used for road-making in the 1960s.

Oxford DNB volume 32 p229.

Alumni Cantabrigiensis seen via google where volume numbers aren't given; p77

Wikipedia for a list of governor-generals and then viceroys of India.

The archaeological dig: Times Fri 31 August 1866 p7 quoting a report originally in the Orkney Herald.

In business, taking 1867 as an example year:

Some of the many appearances of Samuel Laing in the business columns of the Times that year. I was looking at 1867 to see if Cecilia Laing appeared in the Social Columns at all: she was of an age to be making her debut. However, the Laings don't seem to have bothered with a court presentation for her.

Times Sat 5 January 1867 p3f notice from Scottish Widows' Fund; Samuel Laing MP as a member of its London honorary board.

Times Wed 13 February 1867 p10 Money Markets and City Intelligence: Samuel Laing elected a director, and deputy chairman, of the Great Eastern Railway Company.

Times Wed 26 June 1867 p10 Railway News. A reference to Samuel Laing as chief negotiator in the attempt to merge the London Brighton and South Coast Railway with the News:News:South Eastern Railway.

Blaenavon iron and steel works:

History of Technology vol 11 by Norman Smith pubd 2016 and already up on google: section cldn see p numbers The Kennards and the Crumlin Viaduct. Crumlin Viaduct was blt by the Kennards. Rise of Kennard family began 18th cent w John Kennard who ran a bank in Lombard St. Robert William Kennard was John K's 2nd son ((perhaps the first is the John Peirse Kennard mentioned above)): 1800-70, ironmaster, railway financier ((he must know Laing)), partner in Denison, Heywood and Kennard later the Consolidated Bank. RWK got into railways 1830s when he invested ((big time)) in iron-smelting: he bought Falkirk Ironworks and Blaenavon Ironworks which made high-qual wrought iron. Supplied ironwork f railways. He also had a depot at 67 Upper Thames Street. He was a director of Northern and Eastern railway and other railways.

In South Wales Coal Annual 1907 p105 a ref to the current Blaenavon Company Ltd having been formed in 1879 w Samuel Laing as its first chairman.

Stock Exchange Yearbook 1882 p247 lists the current directors of the Blaenavon Company Ltd: Samuel Laing who is chairman; J Brand; A C Kennard; H J Kennard. E F Quilter; W Smith; Capt F Pavy.

Investment in early cable-laying and telegraph companies: in a biography of John Watkins Brett, seen at //atlantic-cable.com which is a History of the Atlantic Cable and Undersea Communications. Written by Steven Roberts. Samuel Laing was on its board by 1857, by which time it was the largest telegraph company in Britain. Its other directors at that time were John Watkins Brett;

Arthur Anderson chairman of P&O; and Lord de Mauley. In 1853 Brett had set up a company to undertake cable-laying for the French government. Directors of this were Samuel Laing; Ernest Bunsen (a relation by marriage of GD member Albertina Herbert); John Molesworth (a relative of GD member Hilton Molesworth); and Napoleon III's brother, the Comte de Mornay.

Solicitor for John Watkins Brett in his various enterprises was John A M Pinniger, father of GD member George Cope. John Pinniger changed the family surname to Cope in order to inherit an estate in Ireland.

Moving the crystal palace to Sydenham:

Website www.foreshillsociety.com doesn't give sources but is a lcl hist group. A/c put on website 2004 re Crystal Palace High Level Line blt to bring pp from London to area after the crystal palace itself was moved there. Co formed 1851 w 9 directors, 4 of whom lived in the area incl Samuel Laing who had moved there in 1847; and Leo Shuster of Penge Place who was deputy chair of the London Brighton and S Cst Railway at the time, succ as its chairman when SL ret'd 1855.

And others: Debrett's HofC and the Judicial (sic) Bench 1884 p110 lists SL as ((currently)) a dir of the Lo/Br/S Cst; Genl Credit and Finance Co; and of the Sydenham Crystal Palace Co. Times Wed 1 December 1897 p10d.

See wikipedia for more on Thomas Henry Huxley and Sir Edwin Ray Lankester. They were both much younger than Samuel Laing: Huxley was 1825-1895 and Lankester was 1847-1929.

Publications:

Some of Samuel Laing's publications are in the British Library catalogue although the BL seems to be lacking some first editions: of The Modern Zoroastrian (1887); and of Modern Science and Modern Thought (1889).

1849 Railway Taxation. Westminster: Vacher and Sons.

1855 Vindiciae Palmerstonenses. By Vindex [Samuel Laing]. Edinburgh: Adam and Charles Black.

1862 Lecture on the Indo-European Languages and Races. Calcutta: no details of the publisher.

1866 Pre-Historic Remains of Caithness...with Notes on the Human Remains by T H Huxley. London: Williams and Norgate.

?1885 Agnosticism and Christianity. A Lay Sermon. London: Watts and Co.

1886 A Sporting Quixote. London: Chapman and Hall. Perhaps this is a novel.

1886 Irish Land and Home Rule. London: National Press Agency.

1887 A Visit to Bodyke; or the Real Meaning of Irish Evictions. London: Irish Press Agency.

1888 Coercion in Ireland. London: National Press Agency.

1888 The Modern Zoroastrian. London: no details of the publisher. BL also has a revised edition 1904 London: Watts and Co.

1890 The Antiquity of Man. A Paper. Brighton: Southern Publishing Co.

?1890 An Agnostic View of the Bible. Issued for the Propagandist Press Committee. London: Watts and Co.

1891 Modern Science and Modern Thought. London: Chapman and Hall. BL also has a revised edition 1903.

1905 Problems of the Future. Revised edition London: Watts and Co. I didn't spot the original issue.

1909 Human Origins. London: Watts and Co.

A hostile review of Samuel Laing's Problems of the Future:

Light: A Journl of Psychical Occult and Mystical Research volume IX January-December 1889. London: Eclectic Publishing Co Ltd of 2 Duke St Adelphi. Issue no 466 Sat 7 December 1889 p584 review by "M.A.I.": Mr Samuel Laing on Spiritualism.

The Rationalist Press Association:

Blasphemy Depot: A Hundred Years of the Rationalist Press Association by Bill Cooke. An official history, published by the RPA 2003.

Death and funeral:

Times Sat 7 August 1897 p1b death notices.

Times Wed 11 August 1897 p8a the Court Circular page: an account of the funeral. A lot of acquaintances were out of town for the summer; amongst those who sent apologies for being unable to attend was Baron Rothschild.

There was nothing in Times about his Will but there was coverage of it in The Railway News volume 68 1897 p442.

THE COWANS OF ORKNEY

Samuel Laing, father of Cecilia and Florence, married Mary Dickson Cowan in August 1840. Though the marriage took place in Paddington, both families were from Orkney and had known each other for generations. From Samuel Laing of Papdale's autobiography it looks as though Samuel and Mary were also distantly related by marriage: the autobiography mentions an Isabel Laing (born 1735) who married a Captain Cowan.

Mary Dickson Cowan was the daughter of Captain Malcolm Cowan RN (1788-1833) and his wife Elizabeth Degraives of Edinburgh. Malcolm and Elizabeth married in Marylebone in 1807 and always lived in London - Elizabeth was still living there in 1851. They had four sons and Mary, the only girl and middle child, born in 1819.

Sources:

The Autobiography of Samuel Laing of Papdale 1780-1868 edited and with supplementary information by R P Fereday. Bellavista Publications 2000.

At www.bayanne.info/Shetland/ the Shetland Family History database: family history information on Malcolm Cowan and Elizabeth Degraives.

At www.tandfonline.com there's an article Captain Cowan's Sails: pp181-186, by Y M Capper, a descendant of Malcolm and Elizabeth Cowan. It gives details of Captain Cowan's naval career and his design (1805) for a sail that was easier to reef.

At discovery.nationalarchives.gov.uk at Public Record Office; General Office of the Admiralty Accountant General. File reference ADM 45/2/495 is an application from Malcolm Cowan's executors for money owed to him by Navy at his death which had taken place on 1 March 1833.

SAMUEL AND MARY LAING AND FAMILY

They had the typical mid-Victorian family: large, and with several children who died young:

- Samuel born 1843 died 1870
- Malcolm born 1846
- Robert probably born late 1847/early 1848; died before 1861, probably 1858
- Cecilia Mary Bruce the future GD member, born 1848
- Mary Eliza born 1850
- Agnes born 1851
- Florence Elizabeth the future GD member born 1853
- Francis Kelly born 1854 died 1874
- Theresa Margaret later always given as Theresa Uzielli, born 1855
- Henry Rudolph born 1858.

Samuel Laing and Mary lived in a number of different places during their married life; depending on the season, whether Parliament was in session, and presumably other factors as well. They continued to live in the Brighton area until the 1890s, off and on. They also rented houses in Sydenham from the 1840s to the 1890s, though they were never at home in Sydenham on census day. From time to time they also had houses in central London.

Samuel and Mary Laing were in Brighton on census day 1851, at 37 Montpellier Crescent, and the list of people in their household that day also shows two other characteristics of their life: wealth - as indicated by the number and type of servants they employed; and visitors - they were a very hospitable couple! Their visitor in 1851 was a Scottish woman, Miss Elizabeth Traill, aged 27. There were no men on the Laings' household staff at this stage in the century; instead, in addition to the cook and one housemaid, they had a nurse an under-nurse, a sick nurse and a wet nurse, to look after Mary and five children aged four or under - Malcolm, Robert, Cecilia, Mary Eliza, and Agnes who had been born less than a month before. The eldest child, Samuel, was also at home.

On the day of the 1861 census, Samuel Laing was in Calcutta. Mary Cowan Laing and her household were in Edinburgh that day and Mary may have chosen to live in Scotland throughout her husband's tour of duty in India. Mary Cowan Laing's older sons were away on census day but Cecilia, Mary Eliza, Agnes, Florence and Theresa, and the younger boys Francis and Henry were all at home. Also listed was Sabine Reigammer, aged 34 and born in Kirkwall Orkney. Her relationship to Mary as head of the household is a bit of a puzzle - she is listed as a sister, but Mary did not have a sister and Samuel had only the one, Elizabeth Baxter; so I'm not sure who she is. Mary Laing was keeping house with five female servants; they must have included a cook and one or more housemaids and probably a nurse, though the tasks of each servant are not specified.

On census day 1871 Samuel and Mary Laing were back in Brighton at 1 Eastern Terrace, Kemp Town. The changes to the family over the last decade had been great. Some of the children had married; one was away visiting; some had set up their own households; and the eldest had died a few months before, leaving a widow and posthumous child. However, Samuel and Mary's son Francis and their daughters Agnes, Florence and Theresa were at home, and they also had three visitors, Edith Boulderston, Ann Heartley and a man incorrectly written down as Marmaduke B Sampston - Sampson is the correct spelling. Marmaduke Sampson was someone Samuel Laing knew through his business connections: employed at the Bank of England for a while, from 1846 to 1871 he worked for the Times newspaper, probably as a financial correspondent, and was also consul general in London for the states of Argentina and Bolivia. He was on the committee which raised the money for the London Homoeopathic Hospital; through that committee he will have met Mr Rosher and Dr Charles C Tuckey, whose sons later joined the GD.

The servants in the Laing household on census day 1871 were indicative of how wealthy the Laings now were. Samuel and Mary now employed three men - a butler, a footman and a page; male servants cost a lot more than female ones however skilled and experienced. Another step up in financial and social terms was the presence of a ladies' maid. There was also a cook, a housemaid, a kitchen maid and a scullery maid.

On census day 1881 Samuel Laing was in Buckingham, visiting his daughter Theresa and her husband Arthur Byass. Mary was at the Laings' house in London - 5 Cambridge Gate Regent's Park - with Henry Rudolph, now working as a stockbroker. Though the number of family members living at home was at its lowest for several decades, the Laings still had a staff of eight: butler, footman, cook, lady's maid, two housemaids, kitchen maid and scullery maid.

By 1891 Samuel Laing was as retired as he was prepared to be, though he still described himself as working as the chairman of the London, Brighton and South Coast Railway - a fact the census official was probably well aware of, as the conversation was taking place in 9 Brunswick Terrace, Hove. He and Mary were still housekeeping on a lavish scale, employing seven servants to look after the pair of them.

When Samuel died, in August 1897, he and Mary were at their house in Sydenham. Mary went to live with her eldest daughter, GD member Cecilia Macrae, after she was widowed, and died in 1902.

Sources: census 1851-91.

Marmaduke Sampson:

Because of his connection with homoeopathy, he's on Sue Young's web pages: sueyounghistories.com. She says of him that on money matters he had more influence than Queen Victoria.

Probate Registry 1876.

THE OTHER LAINGS - siblings of Cecilia and Florence; and first cousins of Agnes Cathcart. I include short notes on them because I found the family interesting. Only Cecilia and Florence Laing joined the GD.

SAMUEL LAING, the eldest child. 1843-1870

After going to Harrow School, Samuel was the only son of Samuel and Mary Laing to follow his father to Cambridge University. He started at his father's old college, St John's, but later transferred to Trinity College. He graduated in law in 1865. He trained as a barrister at the Inner Temple and was called to the bar in November 1866.

In August 1869 he married Martha, daughter of Thomas W Riddel Webster. He died in the spring of 1870, aged 26, a few months before his only child - another Samuel Laing - was born. Ironically, given the views of his grandfather, Samuel Laing born 1870 became a Church of England clergyman.

Sources:

Alumni Cantabrigiensis seen via google so I don't know the volume number, but p77 of that volume.

MALCOLM LAING 1846-1918

Malcolm followed his elder brother Samuel to Harrow. He then went to Sandhurst military college, where was an outstanding student, coming first in his class of 1864. He joined the 14th Hussars in 1865 as an ensign but had no real interest in a military career and retired from active service in 1870, having only reached the level of Captain. In such a wealthy family, he had no need to work for money and doesn't seem to have done so after 1870. From 1892 he was the Lord Lieutenant of Orkney and Shetland, but that's an unpaid post. Like his sisters Mary Eliza and Theresa, he was primarily a sportsman; though he didn't share their interest in hunting, preferring horse racing, shooting and fishing.

He wasn't in the UK for the censuses of 1881 and 1891 but by 1901 he was living at 18 Queen Street, just north of Piccadilly. His was a bachelor household, with just a cook/housekeeper and one general servant; but perhaps he was not at home very often. Like most of the other Laings, he was not in the UK on census day 1911.

He died in December 1917.

Sources: censuses 1881-1911; probate registry 1918; Who Was Who volume 2 p600.

MARY ELIZA LAING 1850-1936

I've mentioned in my account of Samuel Laing that his daughter Mary Eliza Laing married Edward Kennard. They married in 1870. Edward Kennard was the youngest son of Robert William Kennard (1800-1870), financier, investor in railways and owner of iron and steel works in Falkirk and Blaenavon. After R W Kennard's death, Samuel Laing invested in the Blaenavon works and the two families ran the works between them until about the 1920s, with Cecilia Laing's husband Charles Colin Macrae succeeding to Samuel Laing's share; and Edward Kennard and his older brothers succeeding to R W Kennard's share.

Mary Eliza and her youngest sister Theresa shared a passion for hunting; a passion not shared by the sisters who joined the GD, Cecilia and Florence. Edward Kennard was also a hunting fanatic and by 1891 he and Mary Eliza had a country house at The Barn, Little Bowden near Market Harborough, in the excellent hunting country of Leicestershire.

Edward Kennard died in the summer of 1910.

Mary Eliza and Edward Kennard had two sons, Lionel Edward (born 1872); and Malcolm Alfred (born 1876) who was best man at the wedding of Cecilia and Charles Colin Macrae's son Frank, in 1910. Neither of the sons went into the Kennard family businesses. Lionel Edward joined the army, and Malcolm Alfred the navy. They both died before their mother, possibly as a consequence of serving through the first World War. Lionel Edward died in December 1919; and Malcolm Alfred in 1934.

Mary Eliza was the only child of Samuel Laing to have any writing published. Charles Godfrey Leland, who met the Laings in 1870, described her as a "sporting" novelist. As 'Mrs Edward Kennard' she wrote four books, all published in the late 1880s, in Canada.

Mary Eliza died in Leamington in 1936, leaving personal estate of £56409/0/7. Samuel Laing of Papdale's biography was eventually inherited by her descendant (or possibly descendant-in-law) Molly Kennard.

Sources: census 1891, 1911; probate registry 1910, 1919, 1934 1936.

History of Technology volume 11 by Norman Smith published 2016. I read this via google and couldn't see the page numbers. For other information on the Blaenavon works, see the section on Samuel Laing.

Mary Eliza as author. The British Library only has her books in microfilm versions. They were all published in Toronto by the National Publishing Company. The dates of publication are uncertain.

?1888 A Crack County

?1888 The Girl in the Brown Habit

?1889 Matron or Maid

?1889 Landing a Prize: A Novel

Memoirs by Charles Godfrey Leland "(Hans Breitman)". 2 volumes. London: William Heinemann 1893. Volume 2 p261 which covers the Lelands' visit to Brighton in August 1870, just after Mary Eliza was married. I don't think the Lelands met Mary Eliza, they just heard of her by repute.

AGNES LAING 1851-1933

Agnes is the odd Laing out. She married Charles Albert Leslie Attila French in 1873. Charles French's family owned land in Galway and the estate of Ballybay in Monaghan, and Agnes spent most of the rest of her life in Ireland. Agnes and Charles had two sons, a second Charles Albert Leslie French (born 1876); and Cecil Francis French (born 1879). The younger Charles Albert Leslie French joined the British army and was stationed at Aldershot in 1901. Cecil Francis French was living in England by the 1900s.

At some point - probably when Eire gained Home Rule - Agnes and her husband moved to England. They settled in Leamington Spa, near where Mary Eliza Kennard may already have been living. Agnes' husband Charles French died in East Leamington in 1929; and Agnes died at Thornbridge, 42 Kenilworth Road Leamington Spa in June 1933.

Sources: freebmd; censuses 1881-1911 - she doesn't appear on any of them in UK; probate registry 1929, 1933.

Oxford Dictionary of National Biography has nothing on Agnes' husband but in volume 20 p973 there's a short entry for a Robert French 1716-79, landowner in Galway; member of a family of Anglo-Norman origins.

Geneal and Heraldic Dictionary of the Peerage and Baronetage Burke 1868 pp305-07.

Geneal and Heraldic Dictionary of the Landed Gentry Burke 1871 p784 Charles French's mother Emily Eleanora Wilhelmina Leslie; only surviving child and heiress of Charles Albert Leslie of Ballybay county Monaghan.

Familysearch Ireland-EASy GS film number 255953: Charles Albert Leslie son of Charles Albert Leslie French and Agnes Laing French. Baptised 24 February 1876 at Kildare Ireland. At www.monchique.com information, though without sources, saying that he married Idonea Mary Mina daughter of Jocelyn Henry Watkins Thomas.

Familysearch Ireland-ODM GS film number 256022 re b of Cecil Francis French on 7 March 1879 in Dublin.

Familysearch tax assessment lists: Cecil Francis French living in the St George Hanover Square district 1911 and several years previously.

THERESA LAING, registered at birth as Theresa Margaret but at her marriages as Theresa Uzielli. 1855-1943.

Theresa, the youngest of the five Laing sisters, made two very wealthy marriages.

The first took place on the same day her eldest sister Cecilia married Charles Colin Macrae; in July 1877. Theresa married Arthur Byass, whose father had made a fortune as a partner in the Gonzalez Byass sherry importing firm. Arthur's elder brother Robert Byass ran the firm after their father's retirement in 1870; but Arthur also had a substantial stake in it.

Theresa and Arthur had two daughters: May (born 1878) and Kathleen (born 1881). Both Theresa and Arthur were keen on hunting (keen is probably understating it). In the years after they were first married they hunted with the Duke of Grafton's pack. On census day 1881 they were at their house at The Mount, Chandos Road Buckingham, where Samuel Laing was visiting them and their daughters. To serve the four of them plus their visitor the Byasses employed a housekeeper, lady's maid, nurse and nursemaid, two housemaids, a kitchen maid, two scullery maids and a footman; and for the horses, two grooms, two stable boys and two other stable staff.

By census day 1891 the Byasses had moved to North Hall, Norton near Daventry in Northamptonshire. There, the stable staff had their own household. Employed in the main house were a butler, two footmen, a cook, a lady's maid, three housemaids, a dairy maid, two laundry maids, two kitchen maids, and a scullery maid. A man called Walter Faber, who described himself as a brewer from Northampton, was visiting them on census day.

The Byasses had probably moved into Northamptonshire to be nearer the Pytchley Hunt. On genesreunited I could see some references over the next few years to Arthur, Theresa and their daughters attending the Hunt's social functions. Theresa's daughters got married on the same day in 1904. May married James Sidney Mason; they were living in Market Harborough on census day 1911 with their son. Kathleen married Douglas Knyvett Courage; he died in 1920 and I think she married again.

Arthur Byass died suddenly, in the spring of 1910. By census day 1911 Theresa had left North Hall and moved nearer her daughter May, to Bosworth House, Husband's Bosworth near Market Harborough. She had scaled down her household a little, to just five servants.

Theresa Byass married for the second time in 1915 and I think her husband may have been the man who was visiting her and Arthur on census day 1891: Walter Vadasour Faber. Walter Faber died at Thornby House, Thornby Northamptonshire in 1928.

Theresa Faber herself died in Scotland in August 1943, leaving personal estate alone of £487,640/13/2. Kathleen, wife of George Graham Middleton was one of her executors; I take it this is Theresa's daughter Kathleen.

Sources: census 1881-1911; probate registry 1910, 1929, 1943.

Gonzalez Byass:

See its wikipedia page and its own web pages as gonzalezbyassuk.com

Investors' Chronicle 8 January 1870 p37: announcement that the two partners in the firm will be taking their sons - including Arthur Byass - into partnership; and that the firm will now be known as Gonzalez Byass and Co.

The Statist: A Journal of Practical Finance and Trade volume 39 1897 p652 issue of 24 April 1897 has a list of the current major shareholders in the firm, and the estimated value of their shareholdings. The single largest shareholding was that of Robert N Byass £159,090; Arthur Byass had £55,000; B W Kennard and others to sum of £130,000, the 'others' possibly including members of the Laing family.

Royal Blue Book: Fashionable Directory and Parliamentary Guide 1908 p700 has a business address or flat in London for Arthur Byass at 25 Jermyn Street.

On Arthur Byass:

Web pages www.bayanne.info is the Northern Isles Family History site; information on Arthur Byass is included by virtue of his marriage to Theresa Laing.

Marriage announcement: Shetland Times 14 July 1877.

Hark Away: Sketches of Hunting, Coaching, Fishing etc by Frederick Feild Whitehurst. Tinsley Brothers 1879 p49, p316.

Times Thurs 26 May 1910 p1 and again Fri 27 May p1: short death notice for Arthur Byass.

HENRY RUDOLPH the youngest of the Laing children. 1858-1941.

Henry was the only one of Samuel Laing's sons who had a career in investment. He and his friend Fletcher H G Cruickshank founded the stock-broking firm Laing and Cruickshank in 1882. Later, Cecilia Macrae's son Frank Laing Macrae joined the firm.

It is likely that the rest of the family didn't know about the most important relationship in Henry's life for many years after it began; for a very Victorian reason – the woman in question was from several rungs further down the long ladder of 19th-century social class. Bridget Maria Barnard was born in Great Amwell in Hertfordshire in 1855. Her father, James, had moved to Hertford by 1871 and was running a clothing shop there. On the day of the 1871 census, James and his wife Elizabeth had nine children living at home, aged from 18 years to 7 months: Bridget was the third of the six girls; and there were three boys. Victorian social mores made it very difficult for a Henry Laing to meet a Bridget Barnard on anything other than an employer/servant basis, and perhaps that's how the relationship began. It had developed, however, by census day 1881, a day on which Henry was at home with his mother: in December 1881, Bridget gave birth to their only child, a daughter, Florence Maude.

The relationship continued through the 1880s. Henry and Bridget may have been able to live more openly as a couple when they were able to spend time at a house Henry had at Costello in Galway, but were more discreet when they were in London. Maybe Henry was waiting for the right moment to tell his parents? Or – worse – for them to die so that he could make the relationship with Bridget public, and legitimise his daughter, without shocking them. After 12 or more years, however, the right moment had still not arrived and Henry's patience ran out: he and Bridget got married in a registry-office in February 1893. In the next few years they moved several times around the Sloane Street/Belgravia district, funded by some killings Henry was making on the stock market. They settled into 5 Cadogan Gardens Chelsea, in 1902.

In 1906 Florence Maude married Collingwood Ingram, grandson of Herbert Ingram, founder of the Illustrated London News. Some at least of Henry's siblings went to the wedding and more gave gifts – especially of jewellery – to the bride. The wedding reception was held at 5 Cadogan Gardens, with Bridget as hostess.

There's a wiki on Collingwood Ingram who was an ornithologist and plant collector, an authority on the Japanese flowering cherry, and creator of the well-known garden at The Grange Benenden. Two of Florence and Collingwood's children - Ivor Laing Ingram and Mervyn Jeffrey Ingram - were staying with Henry and Bridget on the day of the 1911 census, while their parents were in Leicestershire for the foxhunting. Bridget was coordinating two sets of servants that day: a cook, two footmen, two housemaids and a lady's maid probably worked for the Laings; and the Ingrams had lent the Laings a nurse and a children's maid while their sons were in residence.

As the adverts' small print tells us – share values can go down as well as up. Henry seems to have lost his touch with shares – or his interest in them - in the years before World War 1 and began to lose money rather than make it. Though he was still listed as a director as late as 1927, he had stopped being involved in Laing and Cruickshank on a daily basis many years before. He and Bridget moved to Mundesley in Norfolk. Henry died in January 1941, while staying with the Ingrams at The Grange; Bridget had died in 1935.

Sources: census 1901, 1911; probate registry 1936, 1941.

City of London: The History by David Kynaston. 2012. In chapter Playing the Game p113. Apparently Laing and Cruickshank were on their way to a poker game when they decided to go into the stock-broking business together.

Laing and Cruickshank: the First Eighty Years by R F Pearson and A D B Smith. Printed privately, published 1968.

The Directory of Directors 1927 p902.

Bridget Maria Barnard: Familysearch England-ODM GS film number 104 2051 IT 2; census 1871-1891. Birth certificate 1882 of Florence Maude Barnard. Probate Registry 1936.

Marriage certificate of Henry Rudolph Laing and Bridget Maria Barnard. I'm not sure how many of either family were in attendance: neither of the witnesses look as though they are related to the bride and groom. Although you can understand why Bridget might have entered into an unmarried relationship with a man rich enough to keep her in comfort, she might still have been cast off by her family.

There's coverage of Florence Maude and Collingwood's wedding in the Lady's Pictorial issue of 27 October 1906 p657. The Lady's Pictorial was owned by the Ingram family.

Wiki on Collingwood Ingram. He also collected netsuke; his collection is now in the British Museum.

BASIC SOURCES I USED for all Golden Dawn members.

Membership of the Golden Dawn: The Golden Dawn Companion by R A Gilbert. Northampton: The Aquarian Press 1986. Between pages 125 and 175, Gilbert lists the names, initiation dates and addresses of all those people who became members of the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn or its many daughter Orders between 1888 and 1914. The list is based on the Golden Dawn's administrative records and its Members' Roll - the large piece of parchment on which all new members signed their name at their initiation. All this information had been inherited by Gilbert but it's now in the Freemasons' Library at the United Grand Lodge of England building on Great Queen Street Covent Garden. Please note, though, that the records of the Amen-Ra Temple in Edinburgh were destroyed in 1900/01. I have recently (July 2014) discovered that some records of the Horus Temple at Bradford have survived, though most have not; however those that have survived are not yet accessible to the public.

For the history of the GD during the 1890s I usually use Ellic Howe's The Magicians of the Golden Dawn: A Documentary History of a Magical Order 1887-1923. Published Routledge and Kegan Paul 1972. Foreword by Gerald Yorke. Howe is a historian of printing rather than of magic; he also makes no claims to be a magician himself, or even an occultist. He has no axe to grind.

Family history: freebmd; ancestry.co.uk (census and probate); findmypast.co.uk; familysearch; Burke's Peerage and Baronetage; Burke's Landed Gentry; Armorial Families; thepeerage.com; and a wide variety of family trees on the web.

Famous-people sources: mostly about men, of course, but very useful even for the female members of GD. Oxford Dictionary of National Biography. Who Was Who. Times Digital Archive.

Useful source for business and legal information: London Gazette and its Scottish counterpart Edinburgh Gazette. Now easy to find (with the right search information) on the web.

For the GD members who were freemasons, the membership database of the United Grand Lodge of England is now available via Ancestry: it gives the date of the freemason's first initiation; and the craft lodges he was a member of.

To take careers in craft freemasonry further, the website of the the Freemasons' Library is a good resource: //freemasonry.london.museum. Its catalogue has very detailed entries and the website has all sorts of other resources.

You can get from the pages to a database of freemasons' newspapers and magazines, digitised to 1900. You can also reach that directly at www.masonicperiodicals.org.

Wikipedia; Google; Google Books - my three best resources. I also used other web pages, but with some caution, as - from the historian's point of view - they vary in quality a great deal.

16 May 2017

Find the web pages of Roger Wright and Sally Davis, including my list of people initiated into the Order of the Golden Dawn between 1888 and 1901, at:

www.wrightanddavis.co.uk

***

Cecilia Mary Bruce Macrae was initiated into the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn at its Isis-Urania temple in London, in May 1891. It was a busy evening. As well as Cecilia, five other people were initiated: Cecilia's sister Florence Kennedy; her sister-in-law Louisa Ida Macrae; Augustus Montague Cooper; Agnes Alicia de Pallandt; and Emily Katherine Bates.

Cecilia chose a Latin motto, 'Macte virtute', but shortly afterwards she changed her mind and substituted another Latin phrase, 'Vincit Qui Se Vincit', usually shortened to VQSV or 'Vincit'. She was initiated into the GD's inner, 2nd Order 18 months later, on 3 October 1892. She was one of the GD's longest-serving members, still active in its daughter order Stella Matutina in the early 1920s.

My basic sources for any GD member are in a section at the end of the file. Supplementary sources for this particular member are listed at the end of each section.

This is what I have found on CECILIA MARY BRUCE MACRAE née Laing. For more on her background, there's a separate file on the Laing family.

IN THE GD

As the wife of a prominent lawyer and businessman, and as a mother, Cecilia had many commitments. She managed large households and had a busy social schedule. However, it's clear from the GD's surviving documents that she was very serious about her membership of the Order.

CECILIA RECRUITS SOME NEW MEMBERS

A few months after Cecilia joined the GD, Grace Aurelia Murray was initiated. The address Mrs Murray gave the GD for correspondence was Cecilia's house in Cheyne Walk; she was a friend of both Cecilia and Florence Kennedy. It's likely that Cecilia was also responsible for recommending Mary Eliza Haweis to the GD: Mrs Haweis and her family moved into 16 Cheyne Walk, a few doors down from where Cecilia was living, over New Year 1884 and Mary Eliza was initiated into the GD a few weeks later. Agnes Cathcart, first-cousin of Cecilia and Florence, also joined the GD, in March 1894. It's possible she first heard of its existence from her cousins. However, she was initiated in Edinburgh, not London, where she also knew GD members John and Frances Brodie-Innes, and her introduction to the GD is more likely to have come from them.

SECOND ORDER STUDY

Candidates for initiation into the GD's 2nd Order had to study a wide range of different esoteric subjects, and pass some exams. It looks like Cecilia began working through this daunting programme in May 1892, when she took advantage of William Wynn Westcott's willingness to lend his own books and manuscripts, to borrow a large number of magical texts. She was ready for her second initiation only a few months afterwards.

MAGICAL SUB-GROUPS

In the late 1890s, members of the GD began to meet in small groups to do magic together in addition to and apart from the Order's formal rituals. It's an indication of how skilled a magician Cecilia wanted to be, and how much she enjoyed her membership, that she was a member of two of these.

Frederick Leigh Gardner and Francis W Wright started to set up the first of them, in the spring of 1897. William Wynn Westcott was keen to join this group and eventually it became his group rather than Gardner's and Wright's. Cecilia and Reena Fulham Hughes accepted Westcott's invitation to join. Westcott also asked Florence Kennedy, who said she was willing provided its meetings were at a convenient time for her. The group - including Florence Kennedy - did meet, but no records of what it did have survived and it's also not clear how long its meetings continued.

Cecilia and Florence also joined the Sphere Group, founded to focus on Florence Farr's speciality of Egyptian symbolism and invocation. More information has survived about this group. At some point, Robert Felkin compiled a list of its members. As well as beings from the astral plain, the members were Felkin himself; Florence Farr and her sister Henrietta Paget; Cecilia, and Florence Kennedy; Ada Waters; Marcus Worsley Blackden (another Egyptian magic expert); Helen Rand; Robert Palmer Thomas; Edmund Hunter, his wife Dorothea and his cousin Fanny Hunter. There's also reason for thinking Reena Fulham Hughes was a member though she is not on Felkin's list. The Sphere Group continued to operate at least until 1901.

CECILIA IN TIMES OF TROUBLE IN THE ORDER

Perhaps Cecilia saw the GD as a place where she and her sister could spend time away from the social engagements that took up so much of the rest of their days. When life in the GD started to get very turbulent, in the mid-1890s, she worried about its future. Once or twice she trembled on the verge of resigning from the Order, at times of particular stress in it, but she always decided to keep up her membership.

In 1896, Annie Horniman was ejected from the GD by Samuel Liddell Mathers. Many members felt that Annie had been treated unfairly and Frederick Leigh Gardner began to organise a petition to reinstate her. Around Christmas 1896/early January 1897 (the letter is undated) Cecilia signed the petition. However, when Mathers saw the petition as a challenge to his authority, Cecilia was also amongst those who agreed to accept him as the final arbiter of who should or should not be in the Order. The petition was dropped and Annie remained outside the GD for several years.

Cecilia's relations with Frederick Leigh Gardner were good; she found him "fraternal, and Kind in manner". (She means 'fraternal' in the magical sense of fratres and sorores, of course). However, many GD members, especially the younger women, found him abrasive and intimidating. And when he was put in charge of the organisation of Isis-Urania's rituals, his approach to them was considered by many to be too rigid to allow the action to develop spontaneously. In the end, weary of listening to so many complaints about him, Florence Farr, as head of the GD in England, suspended him from Isis-Urania and sent him to run the Horus Temple at Bradford instead. On hearing this news, in October 1897, Cecilia took the trouble to write to Gardner saying how sorry she was to hear of his enforced departure from the London temple. This latest disruption of life in the GD had come at a particularly emotional time for Cecilia - her father, Samuel Laing, had died two months before. Consequently, she found herself unable to decide what if anything she should do about Gardner's suspension, except to wait upon events. She wrote again to Gardner a few days later, saying that she had talked the situation over with her sister. With many misgivings, she and Florence had agreed not to make any noise about the way Gardner had been treated, at a time when the GD seemed so unstable it might disintegrate any day.

Cecilia and Florence Kennedy were thus still members of the GD and of the Sphere Group at the beginning of 1900. Between February and April 1900 the Order broke dramatically with the past. The sequence of events began with Mathers telling Florence Farr that the documents allowing the GD to be founded were fakes; and ended with the expulsion of Mathers and some of his closest supporters from the Order and the setting up of a new hierarchy to run it. The new hierarchy was largely composed of members of the Sphere Group; but neither Cecilia nor Florence were involved. Florence Kennedy's husband Edward had died in January 1900, and they were thus both in mourning during the upheaval. Florence left the GD altogether at this point. Cecilia's name isn't in any of the records that survive (they are pretty sketchy) for the period 1900 to the GD's final disintegration into two daughter orders during 1903; but she may have been - probably was - going to some rituals and meetings.

AFTER THE GD - AMOUN TEMPLE AND STELLA MATUTINA

Another period of mourning prevented Cecilia from taking a more active part in the GD's collapse during 1903: her mother Mary died in the summer of 1902.

After several months of fruitless negotiations about the GD's future as 1903 wore on, Robert Felkin decided to go it alone with a solution: at the end of the year, he founded the Amoun Temple. He intended it as a new temple within the GD and the names of its first new members were added to the GD's membership roll. However, it soon began to be thought of as the first temple in a new order, Stella Matutina. The first new recruits were initiated in 1904. Although W B Yeats was the temple's most senior member - having been in the GD longer than any of the other founders - Amoun Temple was dominated by Robert Felkin and his acquaintances. One of them was a neighbour of the Felkins, Christina Mary Stoddart: she was initiated in October 1907, when she was living at 56 Bassett Road. Until the first World War Amoun Temple even held its meetings and rituals in the Felkins' house at 47 Bassett Road North Kensington.

It's through Christina Stoddart that I'm able to say that Cecilia was an active member of Amoun Temple; despite her name not appearing on either of the lists of its members that still exist from before World War 1. In a letter to Georgie Yeats, written in 1919, Christina mentioned that she'd recently spent an enjoyable evening with Cecilia. Christina referred to Cecilia by her GD motto, not her name; and as a friend of long-standing to both women, known to them both through magic.

In 1919 Robert Felkin - now living in New Zealand - ordered that the Amoun Temple be shut down. However, it was still going two years later and its members were fighting back. In April 1921, Cecilia agreed to join a committee of Amoun Temple which would investigate claims Christina Stoddart had been making, that Robert Felkin had never been given authority to run any daughter order of the GD. The other members of the committee were Dr William Carnegie Dickson (son of GD member Dr George Dickson of Edinburgh) and John Brodie-Innes. I couldn't find any evidence that the committee had ever reached a decision on the matter they had been asked to research. Once again, deaths were probably what intervened: that of Cecilia's husband in November 1922 and that of John Brodie-Innes himself in December 1923.

Information is lacking but it looks as though Cecilia didn't take an active role in SM after her husband's death.

ANY OTHER ESOTERIC INTERESTS?

SPIRITUALISM

The involvement of GD members in spiritualism is a tricky thing to investigate. Communicating with spirits, or with the dead, was a very locally-based, even family-based, pursuit and there was no over-arching organisation with a membership list that can be consulted now. However, in Cecilia's case there's one piece of evidence that suggests she won't have been involved in it on a regular basis: her father Samuel Laing published an essay arguing against it. Cecilia may have attended spiritualist seances at the homes of friends; but it's very unlikely the Laing family ever got round a table to contact the dead in their own home.

THEOSOPHY

Cecilia's membership of the Theosophical Society is listed in the membership register covering June 1898 to February 1901. Her entry is in the middle of a group whose dates of application aren't noted down, but she paid her first annual subscription to the TS in 1901. 1901 was a particularly disturbed year at the GD, and perhaps Cecilia was thinking it would be a good idea if she joined another organisation where she could meet people with similar interests. She was originally a member of the TS's London Lodge, before changing to Blavatsky Lodge. She resigned from the TS altogether in March 1909; a lot of members did so at that time, disturbed by Annie Besant's reinstatement of Leadbeater as a TS member, against whom so many unpleasant allegations had been made.

Alfred Percy, author of Esoteric Buddhism, and his wife Patience, had helped found London Lodge in June 1878. The Sinnetts went to stay with the Macraes in the country in the summer of 1905 and the friendship survived Cecilia's move to London Lodge's main rival lodge; and Patience Sinnett's death in 1908. Cecilia and her husband were still friendly with Alfred Percy Sinnett many years after Cecilia had left the TS - he went to stay with them in Bournemouth in August 1918.

THEISM AND UNITARIANISM

Cecilia's curiosity about western and eastern esotericism was given permission, you could say, by ideas she must have been familiar with through the men in her life. Her father, Samuel Laing, was an agnostic who was not afraid to say so at a time when few were prepared to go that far in public. And her husband, Charles Colin Macrae - while never being a member of either the GD or the TS - had religious views that were definitely Christian, but very unorthodox. He was acquainted with two radical preachers, Moncure Daniel Conway and Rev Charles Voysey.

Moncure Daniel Conway (1832-1907) was the Unitarian minister of South Place chapel in Finsbury, London, from 1864 to 1865 and again from 1893 to 1897. Born in Virginia into a Methodist family that supported the Confederacy, his views on religion and politics had been changed in 1854 when he met Ralph Waldo Emerson. He had come to England in 1862 as a prominent supporter of the abolition of slavery; and had stayed on at South Place chapel and as a pamphleteer, biographer (of Thomas Paine and Nathaniel Hawkins for example) and literary agent. In 1884 Conway went to India on a fact-finding mission, travelling with Helena Petrovna Blavatsky. Like any 19th century traveller, he took with him letters of introduction to people who would ease him into their social circles, including one from Charles Colin Macrae to Lewis P Delves Broughton, a barrister colleague from the 1870s when Charles Colin had been working in Calcutta. Perhaps, in the mid-to-late 1860s Charles Colin had been a member of Conway's congregation; I imagine he had at least read some of Conway's books.

Rev Charles Voysey must be one of the last people to be accused of heresy in England. He was called before a meeting of the archdiocese of York in 1869 and found guilty of beliefs inconsistent with employment in the Church of England. He appealed to the Privy Council but in 1871, the PC confirmed the decision reached in York. Rev Voysey was given one week to recant (coverage of the trial has a very 16th-century ring to it) but refused to do so. In the 16th century he might have been burned at the stake but in 1871 he just lost his Church of England living. A committee - the Voysey Establishment Fund - was set up to pay for a church building in which he could continue preaching the kind of sermon that had brought him to the attention of the Church of England authorities. While the money was being raised, the Fund paid for him to hold a service each Sunday in St George's Hall in Langham Place, London. Early members of the VEF included other radical clerics and two of the scientists whose researches had done so much to undermine belief in the central tenets of Christianity: Charles Lyell the geologist; Charles Darwin and several other members of the Darwin family; and bishop J W Colenso whose views had got him exiled by the Church of England to an appointment in South Africa. The feminist writer Frances Power Cobbe was also a vocal supporter.

Most of the views that the Church of England found so horrifying in the 1860s would probably not cause much uproar now; though some still would. In the first pamphlet issued by the VEF, Rev Voysey's beliefs were set out:

- people should think for themselves in matters of religion
- people should do good without expectation of reward
- that God is unity, there is no Trinity
- that Jesus was not divine or even partly divine: he was human and there was no miraculous birth
- there was no Fall and therefore no need for atonement
- everyone has a hope of everlasting life; there is no eternal torment
- no revelation should be accepted by anyone without question: a person's reason and their conscience are the supreme authority
- knowledge of God is a process towards better understanding; there is no such thing as sudden, complete enlightenment.

In refusing to believe in the trinity of father, son and holy ghost, Rev Voysey was in the same corner of that particular debate as the Unitarians. Rev Voysey came to call this set of beliefs 'theism' although a core belief in the Christian god still remained.

I've written out what Rev Voysey believed because in 1878 - shortly after he and Cecilia Laing were married - Charles Colin Macrae became vice-President of the Voysey Establishment Fund; which suggests he was a regular listener to Rev Voysey's Sunday lectures and a reader of his publications. In 1885 Rev Voysey was finally able to open his Theistic Church when the VEF bought the lease of an unused chapel in Swallow Street, Piccadilly; a move that Charles Colin Macrae must have guided through its financial and legal pitfalls. Voysey continued to preach there until his death in 1912 though the congregation dispersed very soon afterwards.

Two of Rev Voysey's daughters were initiated into the GD: Frances, wife of John William Brodie-Innes; and her sister Henrietta Voysey who was a professional, trained nurse. I think that the Macraes knew all the Voysey family before the GD was thought of, and they also hired Rev Voysey's architect son, C F A Voysey (who was never a GD member), to do work for them on their country house.

It's clear that Charles Colin Macrae was an active theist and defender of Rev Voysey's very modern take on Christianity. Although I do not know of any lists of those who went to the Theistic Church on Sundays in the late 1880s and 1890s, I'm assuming that Charles Colin Macrae did so regularly; and that Cecilia did as well.

Sources:

GOLDEN DAWN

Introductions to the GD:

Grace Aurelia Murray: RAG p147;

Mary Eliza Haweis: RAG p152. There is a biography: Arbiter of Elegance by Bea Howe, although it is not good on dates. Published London: Harvill Press 1967 p164; p265.

Agnes Cathcart: see my biography!

Cecilia in the GD:

GD collection at the Freemasons' Library; formerly owned by R A Gilbert. Call number GBR GD2/2/8a: a receipt dated 1 May 1892, written by Cecilia, for books and manuscripts on loan from William Wynn Westcott's own library.

Warburg Institute Gerald Yorke Collection catalogue number NS73, which contains a number of letters to Frederick Leigh Gardner from different GD members, spanning the 1890s to the 1920s; with a few copies of letters Gardner sent to GD members. There are letters by Cecilia and references to her in some others.

- Cecilia to Gardner [December 1896/January 1897]
- in a letter William Wynn Westcott to Gardner 17 May 1897
- Cecilia to Gardner 19 October [1897]
- Cecilia to Gardner 24 October [1897]

The Sphere Group:

Cauda Pavonis was the newsletter/journal of the Hermetic Text Society, published by the Department of English, Washington State University at Pullman. It's no longer published, alas! But some issues from the early 1908s are at www.alchemywebsite.com/cauda.html Volumes 11-16 1992 pp7-12 article by Sharon E Cogdill on Florence Farr's Sphere Group.

Collected Letters of W B Yeats Volume 3 1901-04 p32 note 4; p33 give the same list of members.

AFTER THE GD

Yeats's Golden Dawn by George Mills Harper. London: Macmillan Press 1974. George Mills Harper's book is based on documents that were in Yeats's library when he died. When Harper was using them, they were in Anne Yeats' possession. They're now (April 2017) in the collection of the National Library of Ireland: see www.nli.ie/yeats. Founding of Amoun Temple: p124; its closure by Felkin p129. Christina Mary Stoddart's evening with Cecilia p130. Appendix R pp287-89: list of GD members issued 26 June 1902, which doesn't include Cecilia. Amoun Temple in 1921: p138, pp311-12.

STELLA MATUTINA from RAG's Companion: beginning p161 for lists of members; Cecilia isn't on either of them; Christina Stoddart is on p164. P41 for the history of Amoun Temple to 1916 when the Felkins emigrated to New Zealand.

Death of John William Brodie-Innes: Probate Registry 1924.

THEOSOPHY

At www.theosophy.wiki a history of the London Lodge based on writings by Emily Kislingbury and other prominent members of it.

Theosophical Society Membership Register June 1898-February 1901 p261.

The Theosophical Society's journal Lucifer volume 3 September 1888 to February 1889 issue of 15 September 1888 p82 an uncredited review of Samuel Laing's booklet: Agnosticism and Christianity.

Autobiography of Alfred Percy Sinnett; an un-edited version published by the Theosophical History Centre London 1986 and now easily available online. The autobiography was signed off in June 1912 but Sinnett then wrote an additional few pages in 1916: p83 of original and p5 of the 1916 additional section.

THEISM

For Moncure Daniel Conway 1832-1907 see his wikipedia page.

See Conway Hall's web pages for more on the South Place chapel, which changed its name in 1888 from the Religious Society of Finsbury to South Place Ethical Society. Conway Hall, named after Moncure Daniel Conway, is the home the South Place chapel's descendant, the Ethical Society. There's also a wiki at en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Conway\_Hall\_Ethical\_Society

At www.blavatskyarchives.com/conway3.htm is an extract of Conway's book about his trip to the east: My Pilgrimage to the Wise Men of the East published 1906. He mentions the letter of introduction Charles Colin Macrae had given him.

Rev Charles Voysey:Oxford Dictionary of National Biography volume 56 pp608-09: Charles Voysey 1828-1912.

Lewis P Delves Broughton:

Thacker's Bengal Directory 1870 issue when Charles Colin Macrae was practising as a barrister in Calcutta. On p27 of the residents' list: L P Delves Broughton, barrister and registrar of the diocese of Calcutta.

Bengal Directory 1884 p973 in the residents' list: L P D Broughton was still a barrister but he was now also the administrator-general of Bengal; home address, 3 Outram Street Calcutta.

Cornish Sermons H-V 1-19 British Library catalogue reference 4478.f.82. Number 16 of the set is a publicity pamphlet, Voysey Establishment Fund, issued after the meeting that founded it, in July 1871. For Voysey's theology: p15. Beginning p9: list of contributors so far. On p10: "Miss F P Cobbe" had given £1. There was no donation from Charles Colin Macrae; he was in India at the time.

At www.darwinproject.ac.uk, in web pages run by the University of Cambridge: letter from F A Hanbury on behalf of the VEF; to Charles Darwin 4 September 1871 acknowledging his donation of £5. Footnote 2 for other donors to the VEF at this early stage. Hanbury's address was 24 Old Square Lincoln's Inn and the list of donors was very City and law-based.

Theological Tracts British Library catalogue reference 4372.g.6 1-18 includes An Historical Sketch of Theism. Published Williams and Norgate of Henrietta Street Covent Garden and South Frederick Street Edinburgh. It was originally a talk given at a meeting of the VEF on 27 November 1878 by Charles Colin Macrae as the VEF's new vice-chairman. Just noting here that on its p4, Macrae had defined modern theism as belief in "one God" which nevertheless "rejects all traditional religion". For Macrae, theism was the opposite of atheism.

CECILIA MACRAE: BIRTH/YOUTH/FAMILY BACKGROUND

Cecilia was a daughter of Samuel Laing and his wife Mary Dickson Cowan. For more details on Cecilia's parents, see the first file in this set: the Laings. Here I'll just say that the families of both Samuel and Mary were from Orkney; and that Samuel Laing (1812-97) was an MP and advisor to Liberal governments on the legalities and finance of railways. At the same time, he made a fortune as an investor in, and manager and director of, railway and other companies.

Samuel Laing and Mary Cowan married in 1840. They had ten children:

- Samuel born 1843 died 1870
- Malcolm born 1846
- Robert probably born late 1847/early 1848; died before 1861, probably 1858
- Cecilia Mary Bruce the future GD member, born 1848
- Mary Eliza born 1850
- Agnes born 1851
- Florence Elizabeth the future GD member born 1853
- Francis Kelly born 1854 died 1874
- Theresa Uzielli born 1855

and

- Henry Rudolph born 1858.

The family lived in increasing affluence between houses in central London, Brighton and Sydenham; though while Samuel Laing was on government business in India in the early 1860s, Mary Cowan Laing and the children were living in Scotland.

None of the Laings' daughters 'came out' by being presented at court and doing the round of the high-society balls and garden parties. Though the Laings were very wealthy, they moved in political, business and industrial circles rather than aristocratic ones. Samuel Laing wrote books on Darwinian evolution and the origins of man and the Laings' friends also included scientists and challengers of accepted ideas like T H Huxley and Edwin Ray Lankester.

The American journalist, playwright and traveller Charles Godfrey Leland, (who wrote as Hans Breitman) described the kind of social gatherings the Laings were able to hold as "brilliant and refined". Leland and his wife were on a prolonged tour of Europe while Leland's latest play was on the stage in the West End. They reached Brighton in August 1870 after several months doing the social round in London. They were soon introduced to the Laings, who were in Brighton for the summer. Despite the fact that the Laings were supposedly in mourning for their son Samuel, who had died in the spring aged only 26, they were still organising dinners, hunts, balls and excursions. The day trips included one to Lewes in a special train laid on by Samuel Laing as managing director and chairman of the London, Brighton and South Coast Railway. In July of the following year the Lelands met Mary Cowan Laing, Cecilia and Florence in Germany, at the Hotel des Quatres Saisons in Homburg on the Rhine, where they had all gone to enjoy the celebrations surrounding the unification of Germany under the Prussian king who now became Emperor Wilhelm I.

Census day 1871 fell between those two marathons of socialising. On census day Cecilia was engaged in the visiting that was such a necessary part of the life led by her social class. She was staying with Robert Lowther and his wife Laura, at 57 Queen's Gardens Marylebone. They were an elderly couple - he was 81, she was 48 - but perhaps Cecilia was a friend of Laura Lowther's niece Laura Martindale, who was 20 and living with them. I couldn't quite read what was written in the 'occupation' box for Robert Lowther but there was definitely a reference to his having been in India. I found some references to a Robert Lowther present during the siege of Lucknow (1857-58); perhaps Cecilia's host was that man and Samuel Laing had met him during his spell in India in the 1860s. Robert Lowther was wealthy enough to employ a butler, footman, cook and under cook, a lady's maid and a housemaid.

I have no idea what education Cecilia and her sisters had received. It's safe to assume that it would have prepared them for continuing in their parents' social circle, as wives and mothers and mistresses of a large household that entertained a great deal; but what exactly was taught them and by whom is a mystery. Census days shed light on just 24 hours in a decade; but the Laings did not have a governess in their household on any census day between 1851 and 1891. My guess is that their daughters may have gone to school in Edinburgh during the early 1860s and had lessons later from individual teachers who came to their parents' houses by the hour. Cecilia and Florence, at least, showed a willingness to pursue excellence in some subjects: Charles Leland wrote that Cecilia was described as the "first amateur pianiste" in England by no less a person than George Henry Lewes; and Florence's paintings were accepted for exhibition by major art galleries including the Paris Salon.

Most of what I know about Cecilia in her later life comes from a memoir written by her close friend, the artist Anna Lea Merritt. Wealthy Americans making prolonged visits to Europe were a feature of the social scene in which the Laing daughters grew up, but the Laings met the family of Joseph and Susannah Lea of Philadelphia in a rather less typical way, after Florence Laing and Anna Lea took the same art classes in Dresden in the winter of 1869-1870. When the classes were over, Florence Laing went back to England and Anna Lea went to Basel and then to Paris. Anna meant to make a long stay in France to get some more art training, but had to escape to London in July 1870 when the Franco-Prussian war broke out. Florence invited Anna to meet the rest of the Laings at dinner and Sunday tea, and that led to the two families meeting and becoming friendly.

The Leas went back to the USA in 1871 or 1872 but Anna - now determined to be a professional painter - was allowed stay in Europe. She continued to be friends with Florence but was closer to Cecilia and there's no mention of Florence in Anna's memoir after 1900.

Anna painted Florence, Cecilia and Charles Colin Macrae, and Mary Cowan Laing. Florence's portrait was probably done while they were both in Dresden, certainly before 1879. Anna painted Cecilia and her husband in 1879; their two sons in 1888; and there's a portrait of Charles Colin alone, dressed in highland costume, from 1900. The portrait of Cecilia's mother was done in 1898.

Cecilia and Anna both married in 1877; but Anna's husband, the painting conservator and art critic Henry Merritt, died only a few months later while Cecilia's lived until the 1920s. Both women's mothers then died in the same year, 1902. Cecilia's mother was living with Cecilia and her husband when she died. Once again, Anna was the unlucky one: her mother died in Pennsylvania and Anna hadn't seen her for many years. Anna describes Cecilia as "pouring out sympathy and faith in the spirit world around us" and Anna needed that ability in Cecilia, in the months after her mother's death. And it was Cecilia, not Florence, that gave timely help when Anna was struggling financially, especially in the early 1890s when she moved out of London to Hurstbourne Tarrant, north of Andover in Hampshire, and took on a house that needed a lot of repair work done on it. Samuel Laing helped too, sending her a lot of books.

Anna had left London for health reasons, not because she preferred country life, and during her first years in Hampshire she felt very lonely. Cecilia was one of three women friends who visited her regularly at that time. It was Cecilia who first encouraged Anna to write stories about village life; and then encouraged her to try and get them published. They first appeared in Century Magazine and then in book form, published by Kegan Paul, where Cecilia's friend A P Sinnett worked as a manager. Anna thought of Cecilia as more a sister than a friend - a substitute for Anna's own sisters (five of them) who had returned to the US with her parents.

Sources:

Charles Leland:

Memoirs by Charles Godfrey Leland "(Hans Breitman)". London: William Heinemann 1893. In two volumes. There's no index. Volume 2 p270; p215 mentions that while in Belgium, the Lelands had met the London-based publisher Nicholas Trübner and his wife. The Trübners were the people who introduced the Lelands to their friends when they reached England in 1870, including George Eliot and G H Lewes, Edwin Arnold, Lord Napier of Magdala, Lord and Lady Tennyson; Lord Bulwer-Lytton; and Richard Monckton-Milnes. The Laings definitely knew George Lewes and probably all the other people on that list though I don't have direct evidence for them knowing the others. The Lelands in Brighton: pp253-263; meeting Mary Laing, Cecilia and Florence again in Germany in 1871: p270.

Census 1871.

Robert Lowther:

At www.myheritage.com, which has interesting information but no sources.

Familysearch India-EASy GS film number 498985 for the marriage of Robert Lowther to Laura daughter of Benjamin Martindale; 10 June 1847 at Allahabad.

Anna Lea Merritt:

Love Locked Out: the Memoirs of Anna Lea Merritt with a Checklist of Her Works edited by Galina Gorokhoff. Boston: Museum of Fine Arts. No publication date but BL stamp has "Sep [19]83". On meeting the Laings: p55, p81. The books' checklist of Anna's paintings doesn't list anything earlier than 1867. On p241: Anna's portrait of Florence Laing must be the "Miss Laing"; which was probably done as a student-to-student work. On pp241-242 the post-honeymoon portraits of Charles and Cecilia Macrae were almost certainly commissions - Cecilia giving Anna Lea Merritt work, at the outset of her career. They were never exhibited. They are in a list of works from 1879. On p241, the painting of Charles Alexander and Frank Laing Macrae was done in 1888 (when they were 8 and 6) and exhibited that year; this will also have been a commission. On p246 Anna's best-known painting was her Love Locked Out. It was exhibited at Royal Academy in 1890 and is now in the Tate's Chantrey Collection. P249 the list of Anna's works from 1898 includes two copies of a small portrait of a Mrs Laing which I would take to be Mary Cowan Laing, Cecilia's mother. And p250 for the portrait of Charles Colin in highland costume, from 1900.

By 1878 Anna Lea Merritt's work was good enough to be accepted by the Royal Academy:

The Royal Academy Exhibitors 1769-1904 volume 3. Edited by Algernon Graves. Published London: Henry Graves and Co Ltd and George Bell and Sons 1906. Entry p231 for Mrs Henry Merritt formerly Anna Lea.

1879 catalogue number 28: Florence daughter of Samuel Laing Esq MP; and two other paintings

1886 catalogue number 134: St Cecilia, with a reference to Tennyson. I was wondering if Cecilia might have been the model for this painting 1888 catalogue number 323: sons of C C Macrae Esq.

CECILIA'S MARRIAGE

Cecilia Laing married Charles Colin Macrae and her youngest sister Theresa married Arthur Byass on the same day in July 1877, at the fashionable St Paul's Church Knightsbridge. Arthur Byass' family were partners in the Gonzalez Byass sherry importing firm. Charles Colin Macrae's mother Charlotte had died only a few weeks before. She was 57 and must surely have died very suddenly. The families decided that the preparations for the double marriage were too far forward to be cancelled or postponed.

Source:

Shetland Times of 14 July 1877 marriage notices. Seen 20 April 2017 at:

archiver.rootsweb.ancestry.com/th/read/SCT-SHETLAND/2000-06/1086776084.

CECILIA'S HUSBAND, CHARLES COLIN MACRAE

Samuel Laing will have met Charles Colin Macrae's father, Alexander Charles Macrae, in Calcutta in the early 1860s. It's likely he also got to know Alexander's brother, Colin Wilson Macrae, who was a partner in Pearce Macrae and Co, import/export agents, of 1 Clive Ghaut Street Calcutta. When Samuel Laing arrived in India in 1860 as its finance minister, Surgeon-Major Dr Macrae was a senior Civil Surgeon and Marine Surgeon in the Bengal Presidency. In 1863 he was promoted to surgeon to the viceroy. I'm not sure whether Samuel Laing was still in India in 1863, but when Dr Macrae retired in 1865 and returned to England, their acquaintance was resumed and their children became acquainted.

Alexander Charles Macrae married Charlotte Isa Reid or Reed, the daughter of a naval officer, at Fort William Bengal in November 1842. They had five children, though only three survived their Indian childhood:

- Charles Colin future husband of Cecilia Laing: August 1843 at Dorundah
- Fanny Catherine Ouseley born 1845
- Henry George Vernon Martal or Maptal born 1847 at Howrah; probably died young
- Edgar Elliott Maptal 1853-54
- Louisa Ida the future GD member born 1856 at Fort William Bengal.

Most sources I've seen say that Charles Colin Macrae was the only son; so I think that Henry Macrae must have died as a child. I've certainly found no references to him as an adult. In 1866 Fanny Macrae married Robert George Currie of the Indian Civil Service. She died in 1870 but the friendship between the Curries and the Macraes continued. Robert George married again, in 1872, and his son with his second wife - Alexander Charles Currie - was a close friend of Charles Colin and Cecilia Macrae, and executor of Charles Colin Macrae's Will.

There's more about the family in my biography of Colin Charles' sister Louisa Ida Macrae.

COLIN CHARLES MACRAE - EARLY LIFE

Alexander Charles and Charlotte Macrae sent their only surviving son to Eton. He went on to University College Oxford, and qualified as a barrister in 1868, at Lincoln's Inn. He then went back to India and spent 11 years in legal practice and as a court official in Calcutta before returning to England in the late 1870s. He set up in practice in the City of London as a barrister, member of the Parliamentary Bar and as Standing Counsel to the India Office. He retired from work as a barrister in 1889 but expanded an involvement he had already begun - probably through Samuel Laing - as director of a number of different companies. Many of them were railway companies, including the London, Brighton and South Coast Railway; Charles Colin was elected company chairman as his father-in-law had been, in 1920 when the chairman in between them - the 8th Earl of Bessborough - died. However, one company Charles Colin succeeded Samuel Laing in was a company on the supply-side of railway building - the Blaenavon Company Limited.

The Blaenavon iron works had been bought by Robert William Kennard (1800-70) during the 1830s and even during Charles Colin's lifetime, the Kennard family were still managing it and were its most important shareholders. The Kennards had invested heavily in Blaenavon, moving into steel as well as iron and buying land and mineral rights around the town, but it was a risky industry and various companies set up by the family to run the works had gone into liquidation. The Blaenavon Company Limited was founded to try to salvage something from the wreck in 1879, after an economic downturn had forced the Kennards to put the whole works up for sale. Samuel Laing had led the rescue bid and was the new company's first chairman. Charles Colin's shares - or perhaps Cecilia's shares - must have come to them from Samuel Laing; Laing was still a director of the company at his death in 1897. See the file The Laing Family for more on Cecilia's sister Mary Eliza who married R W Kennard's son Edward in 1870.

During the years he was working as a barrister Charles Colin Macrae published a few books, mostly on issues and controversies in Indian law.

Sources:

The Macraes are part of the clan Macleod:

See www.macleodgenealogy.org taken from The Macleods: The Genealogy of a Clan Section III: Cadet Families Edinburgh 1970 by Dr Donald MacKinnon and Alick Morrison:

ALEXANDER CHARLES MACRAE

Roll of the Indian Medical Service 1615-1930 compiled by Lt-Col D G Crawford. Limited edition of 200. London: W Thacker and Co; Calcutta: Thacker Spink and Co: p113 as number 1307 in the Roll.

His entries in the local directories show how quickly he was able to rise up the ranks; due to the natural wastage of personnel in India's notorious climate and all the small wars that were being fought against native rulers.

Bengal Directory and Annual Register 1840 p245 with him in the list of Assistant Surgeons, first appointed January 1839.

Bengal and Agra Directory and Annual Register 1845 p153: stationed with the Ramgurh

Light Infantry Battalion p269 a native militia based at Dorundah in Nagpore.

Bengal and Agra Directory and Annual Register 1850 p274 now on the civil (not military) list and based at Howrah

Bengal Directory and Annual Register 1854 p275 promoted to Surgeon January 1853.

Times 27 January 1858 p6 originally London Gazette Tue 26 January [1858] appointed staff surgeon of the 10th Foot; he would move there from his present post with the 6th Light Dragoons.

New Calcutta Directory 1859 p70 A C Macrae is no longer in its list of military medical officers. On p222 in its list of residents of Calcutta: A C Macrae Presidency Civil Surgeon and Marine Surgeon. Home address 9 Middleton Street.

Thacker's Post Office Directory of Bengal issue of 1863 p37.

New Calcutta Directory 1863 Part 9-11 p253 Surgeon-Major A C Macrae, Presidency Civil Surgeon and Marine Surgeon is now also officiating surgeon to the viceroy and governor-general of India. Home address 9 Middleton Street which is also given as the home address of the next person in the listing: Colin Wilson Macrae of Pearce, Macrae and Co.

Thacker's Bengal Directory 1866 p124 he's no longer listed.

Alexander Charles Macrae's family:

Familysearch India Marriages 1792-1948. India-EASy GS film number 498980: marriage of A C MacRae MD to Charlotte Isa (sic) Reid (sic), daughter of late Captain Reid RN.

Familysearch India Births and Baptisms 1786-1947. India-EASy

- GS film number 498983: Charles Colin Macrae born 16 August 1843. Mother's former surname given as Reed
- GS film number 498983: Fanny Catherine Ouseley Macrae born 19 May 1845
- GS film number 498985: Henry George Vernon Martal (sic) Macrae born 5 June 1847
- GS film number 498991: Edgar Elliott Maptal (sic) Macrae born 10 January 1853.
- GS film number 498994: Edgar Elliott Macrae buried Bishop's College Bengal 19 May 1854.
- GS film number 498994: Louisa Ida Murixa (sic) Macrae born 28 July 1856 at Fort William, St Paul Bengal.

Fanny Currie's marriage: via www.genesreunited.co.uk to Brighton Gazette of 3 May 1866 in a list of marriage announcements: Robert George Currie, son of Sir Frederick Currie Bart; to Fanny Catherine Ouseley Macrae, eldest daughter of Alexander Charles Macrae.

Her husband, Robert George Currie:

Thacker's Bengal Directory 1870 issue, the year of Fanny's death. On p50 in the list of residents: R G Currie, Bengal Civil Service, is settlement officer at Shahjehanpore.

Thacker's Bengal Directory 1875 issue. On p1386 in the list of residents: R G Currie was still based in Shahjehanpore and was still settlement officer there; but he was now also working as a magistrate and tax collector.

Bengal Directory 1884 issue: there's no entry for him in the list of residents p1607 so he had left India.

Armorial Families entry for Robert George Currie, Bengal Civil Service; 1835-80.

Charles Colin Macrae:

Law Times volume 45 1868 issue of 2 May 1868 p11.

Who was Who volume 2 p689.

In India:

Thacker's Bengal Directory 1870 p143 in its list of residents and pp147-148 in its law list.

Thacker's Bengal Directory 1874 p213, p1379.

Thacker's Bengal Directory 1877 p207, p633.

Thacker's Bengal Directory 1879 he was in the residents' list on p683 but was described as being on leave. In fact if he married Cecilia in 1877 he must have been on leave for quite a while before this issue of the Directory was published.

Thacker's Bengal Directory 1880 p1031 of the residents' list: no entry for him.

Charles Colin's legal publications in the British Library:

1870 Report of the Proceedings in the Cases of Ameer Khan and Hashmadad Khan. Calcutta: "Englishman" Press.

1871 The Law of Divorce in India. Calcutta.

1874 The Indian Contract Act. Act IX of 1872. Calcutta: Thacker and Co

1883 Criminal Jurisdiction over Englishmen in India. Originally an article published August 1883 in Fortnightly Review. Published by the British India Committee.

1883 The Art of Advocacy. Selected from The Legal Companion. Serampore: M C Ghosh of The Law Press, 28 Grand Trunk Road.

Times Mon 9 March 1891 p9 Court Circular. Charles Colin was amongst those at a dinner at the Whitehall Club, called to honour and congratulate Sir Francis Jeune, who had just been appointed a judge. The dinner was given by the "members of the Parliamentary Bar".

Charles Colin Macrae in business; not by any means a full list:

Company matters are well reported in the Times. I looked for Charles Colin Macrae in 1877 - the year he married Cecilia Laing - and 1910.

Times 1877 had no mentions of him at all.

By 1910 it was a very different matter:

Times Fri 25 November 1910 p22 Public Companies. 12th AGM of the British and Chinese Corporation held "yesterday" at the Cannon St Hotel. Charles Colin Macrae must have been a director by now: he made the speech seconding chairman W Keswick MP's proposal to adopt the Annual Report. Both men got a rough ride from shareholders who thought they were being too optimistic about the Corporation's next few years, in unpredictable times; but the Annual Report was accepted.

Times Fri 22 April 1910 p16 report on the 61st AGM of Gresham Life Assurance Ltd. Charles Augustus Hanson was the company chairman. Charles Colin Macrae made a speech in favour of adding Lord Monk Bretton to the board of directors; a motion that was passed. C H Beadnell and Henry Hoare were re-elected to the board.

Times Sat 2 July 1910 p15: big advert for a Gresham Life share issue, listing Charles Colin Macrae as one of the company's eight directors. He was also chairman of the Railway Debenture and General Trust Co and director (though not chairman at this point) of the London, Brighton and South Coast Railway.

The Post Magazine and Insurance Monitor volume 71 1910 p569 has the announcement of Charles Colin Macrae's election as deputy-chairman of the London, Brighton and South Coast Railway Ltd. As a JP and already chairman of the Railway Debenture and General Trust Co Ltd of 3 Bank Buildings.

Times 4 August 1910 p12 had a report on a half-year general mtg of the London, Brighton and South Coast Railway Co, with Charles Colin Macrae as deputy-chairman and the Earl of Bessborough as chairman. The company ran a ferry connecting Newhaven and Dieppe. The chairman and deputy-chairman had recently been in Paris improving relations with French railway companies.

Times Sat 28 May 1910 p17 report on a meeting of the Quebec and Lake St John Railway Company; called because the Railway Share Trust and Agency Co, as trustees of the Company, wanted to raise some money. Charles Colin Macrae chaired the meeting so he must have been a director of it, if not necessarily the chairman. Alderman Charles Augustus Hanson (see Gresham Life above) was involved with this company too.

A very Laing-Kennard-Macrae affair:

In South Wales Coal Annual 1907 p105 a reference to the current Blaenavon Company Ltd having been formed in 1879 with Samuel Laing as its first chairman.

Stock Exchange Yearbook 1882 p247 lists the current directors of the Blaenavon Company Ltd: Samuel Laing who is chairman; J Brand; A C Kennard; H J Kennard; E F Quilter; W Smith; and Captain F Pavy.

Mining Yearbook 1908 p650 has an advert-like entry for the Blaenavon Co Ltd. The current chairman is R W Kennard (who must be a grandson of the R W Kennard Samuel Laing knew). Other directors are: James R Baillie; A A Brand; E Kennard (Mary Eliza Laing's husband); F J Gordon; and Charles Colin Macrae. Its head office is at 86 Cannon Street.

At www.dmm.org.uk Durham Mining Museum's database of coal companies, using information originally published in the Colliery Year Book and Coal Trades Directory 1923: entry for Blaenavon Co Ltd which was by this time also mining coal. Charles Colin Macrae and an R W Kennard were in the list of directors. Neither of them was company chairman and most of the other directors were men who had not figured as directors in any of the earlier sources I found.

A very Laing-Macrae affair:

Times Sat 19 February 1910 p15 series of reports on the meetings of various railway companies, including the 37th AGM of the Railway Debenture and General Trust. Charles Colin Macrae was its current chairman, so it was his duty to make the speech urging the shareholders to adopt the annual report. He was heckled about the Trust's liabilities, when he said he couldn't understand the current low share price; and when he'd finished, he was asked awkward questions from the floor about what the Board was going to do about the situation. In due course Captain Malcolm Laing (Cecilia's brother, born 1846) was able to second the proposal - so he must be a director of the company - and the annual report was adopted in the end.

At en.wikipedia.org/wiki/White-Pass-and-Yukon, some pages on the history of the White Pass and Yukon Railway, which was built after the Klondike gold rush. Charles Colin Macrae was an early shareholder in the company, which bought the rights to build the railway in 1898.

Times Tues 15 November 1910 p17 a report on the 13th OGM of the White Pass and Yukon Railway Company, which was chaired by Charles Colin Macrae. Since last meeting the Company's Board of Directors had had to authorise expenditure on heavy machinery. There was mention in Times' coverage of the meeting, of the problems of operating on the Yukon River during the winter (when of course it was iced over for several months). As result of the expenditure, the Company was restricting its dividend to 2% this year.

Stock Exchange Handbook The Manual of Statistics volume 35 1917 Charles Colin Macrae is the chairman of the British Columbia Yukon Railway Co. Other directors include Henry Rudolph Laing (Cecilia's youngest brother). The company's head office was at 7 Moorgate St and its Company Secretary was there, but its Treasurer worked in Chicago and other senior employees were based in Canada. The annual meetings were held in October, in London.

Times Fri 9 September 1910 p11 the Court Circular page had a report on a meeting of those interested in investing in Mexico. Charles Colin Macrae was elected - with many others - to the organising committee of a dinner which would be held to celebrate 100 years of Mexican independence.

The Directory of Directors published by the Stock Exchange. Issue of 1914 p691: Charles Colin Macrae still had an office at 8 Bank Buildings EC. The snippet showed the beginning of the list of his current chairmanships:

Blaenavon Co Ltd

British and Chinese Corporation Ltd; chairman

Chinese Central Railways Ltd; chairman

Gresham Fire and Accident

A longer list of the companies Charles Colin Macrae was involved with are listed in his obituary in the Times Fri 1 December 1922 p15f Railway Debenture Trust; Railway Share Companies; British and Chinese Corp; Chinese Central Railway Co; London Caledonian Trust; Law Debenture Corp; the Newhaven Harbour Co; Gresham Life and Fire Insur Soc; the Trust Union Ltd; the Stirling Trust.

MARRIED LIFE

Cecilia and Charles Colin Macrae had two children, both boys: Charles Alexander Macrae, born in October 1878 in Scotland; and Frank Laing Macrae, born in London a few days before census day 1881. On census day 1881, Cecilia and Charles Colin were at home at 7 Lancaster Street, near Lancaster Gate on the north side of Hyde Park - a wealthy neighbourhood but not as wealthy as the streets on the south, Knightsbridge side. As Frank was only a few days old, a month nurse had been added temporarily to their normal staff of cook, two housemaids, parlour maid and a skivvy. Although Charles Alexander was only two, the Macraes did not have a nursemaid in the household on census day; perhaps they were between nursemaids, but the absence might also indicate Cecilia wanting to do at least some child-care herself - which was rather unusual for a woman of her social status.

The 1891 census was taken a few weeks before Cecilia was initiated into the GD. Cecilia and Charles were living at the address she gave William Wynn Westcott (the GD's administrator) for correspondence: 26 Cheyne Walk Chelsea. It was a wealthy neighbourhood but also popular in artistic circles. The Macraes were still keeping house with a cook, two housemaids, and a parlourmaid; but with a kitchen maid, rather than the general skivvy. They had no male servants as yet. Also in the household that day were Charles Alexander, aged 12; and Cecilia's nephew, Samuel Laing born 1870, the son of her eldest brother - another Samuel - who had died before his son was born. Frank was at school, at New College Eastbourne. Frederick Schreiner, brother of novelist Olive Schreiner, had set up the school in 1872 and it had quickly established a reputation for being progressive - its religious stance was Nonconformist; it took pupils with backgrounds in trade; and from the number of non-teaching staff it employed, I'd say it took good physical care of its pupils. I find it interesting that Charles Colin Macrae had not wanted to send his son to Eton, the school he had attended himself.

Charles Alexander may have been attending a different school, where the Easter holidays had already begun, on census day 1891. However, I couldn't find any evidence of his being at school elsewhere, and he may have been educated at home. I think he might have had what the Victorians might have termed 'delicate' health: in her memoir, Cecilia's friend Anna Lea Merritt remembered that he had not been "fit for military service".

Cecilia's father Samuel Laing died in August 1897. His estate of £96000-odd (about £65 million in 2017 terms) was divided up and Mary Cowan Laing went to live with the Macraes. With Cecilia's inheritance and her mother's widow's jointure, the Macraes had more money to spend in the succeeding years: they started to employ expensive servants like butlers; in London they moved from rather bohemian Chelsea to Onslow Gardens off the Brompton Road; and they were able to afford a second house for weekends and summers in the country.

The Macraes may have leased or rented Oakhurst, in Oxted, Surrey - the first of their country retreats - before Samuel Laing's death. I've had some trouble tying down exactly when the Macraes moved into Oakhurst, but they were definitely there by October 1897 when Cecilia sent two black-bordered letters from that address to GD member Frederick Leigh Gardner. The choice of Oxted must have been because it was only a couple of miles from Florence's country house at Edenbridge in Kent; the Kennedys were spending most of their time there from about 1891. In 1898 the Macraes had some alterations done to Oakhurst; for which they employed the architect Charles Francis Annesley Voysey, son of Rev Charles Voysey and brother of GD members Frances Brodie-Innes and Henrietta Voysey.

On census day 1901, Cecilia and Charles Colin were at their London house, 93 Onslow Gardens; with Mary Cowan Laing and their son Frank. After New College Eastbourne, Stubbington School and Cheltenham College, Frank Laing had gone to Oxford University, to University College, his father's old college. Census day 1901 must have come at about the time he went to work for the stockbroking firm of Laing and Cruickshank, founded by Cecilia's brother Henry Rudolph Laing. I couldn't see Charles Alexander Macrae anywhere in the UK on census day 1901; as his health was not good, perhaps he had gone abroad for the winter. The Macraes were employing more staff than on previous census days: in addition to the basic set of cook, two housemaids and kitchen maid that they had had in 1891, they also had a nurse - to help Mary Cowan Laing, I presume, as she was now 80 - and that expensive butler; though there wasn't a footman.

Mary Cowan Laing died in the summer of 1902.

When the lease or rental agreement at Oakhurst expired the Macraes chose to pick a weekending house much further out of London. There was no longer any reason to choose somewhere near Edenbridge. Florence's husband Edward Sherard Kennedy had died in January 1900 - Charles Colin Macrae was one of his executors - and in December 1902 Florence had got married again, to a man who was a Londoner to the core, though he was not British. After the death of her first husband, Florence had let her membership of the GD lapse and she never joined any of its daughter orders and temples; perhaps the two sisters were not so close now.

Meonstoke House was in a rather remote part of Hampshire and it makes me wonder whether the wealthy Macraes now had a car or cars; Cecilia certainly her own car - meaning that the family had more than one - by 1915. The house still exists and in 2017 was for sale: Grade II listed as it's built in the vernacular style of the area; nine bedrooms, seven bathrooms, five reception rooms, and long gardens; though it is on the corner of two roads, and the stable-block which was part of the property in the Macraes' time is now a separate house.

The Macraes moved into Meonstoke House in 1905, in time for Alfred Percy Sinnett and his wife Patience to visit them during that summer. In 1907 or 1908 Anna Lea Merritt was their visitor - she published a book which included paintings she had done of some of Meonstoke Houses' garden and kitchen-garden borders. The following year Anna Lea Merritt began to create her own garden at her house in Hurstbourne Tarrant. In her memoir she wrote "My dearest Cecilia insisted on giving me the all-important flowering shrubs, which her experience selected admirably". Despite being hampered by continual changes of address, Cecilia was a gardener.

In 1910, Cecilia's son Frank got married and two of her brothers-in-law died; and two of the events show how much the German connection still mattered to the Laings.

In February 1910 Frank Macrae married Irene, only child of Friedrich von Mack and his wife. The Laings had not previously sent notices of family events to the Times, but this marriage was covered by the Times at some length; so I know quite a lot about it and about the bride. One set of Irene's grand-parents were Scottish - Colonel Archibald Campbell of Craignish and his wife. Her parents, the von Macks, were both German and lived in Homburg - the town Mary Cowan Laing, Cecilia and Florence had visited, definitely in 1871 and probably many times. The wedding was very much a Laing affair: Cecilia's nephew, Rev Samuel Laing (born 1870) helped conduct the marriage service; the best man was Frank's first cousin Malcolm Alfred Kennard; the bride wore a dress of white satin and Brussels lace which Cecilia had given her; and the reception was held at 93 Onslow Gardens where Cecilia and Charles Colin were still living.

The first of the two brothers-in-law to die that year was Theresa's husband Arthur Byass, on 24 May. He died at home in Northamptonshire, but Edward Kennedy was on holiday in Freiburg - Germany again - when he died on 14 July.

In 1910 Frank was made a partner in Laing and Cruickshank. After a honeymoon on the Riviera, he and his wife set up house in Hill Street, in wealthy and fashionable Knightsbridge. They were at home there on census day 1911, keeping house with a small staff of cook and parlourmaid. There were no children with them on census day and I think the marriage was childless. Cecilia and Charles Colin Macrae are not on the census for 1911 in England, and neither is Charles Alexander; perhaps they had all gone off together somewhere. I've found no evidence that Charles Alexander was working. There was no financial necessity for the son of such rich parents to work, of course, and by 1903 he was even able to finance a separate household at 16 Drayton Gardens, a few streets away from his parents. He might have been married: the marriage of a Charles Alexander Macrae was registered in the Axbridge registration district in 1900. (Though there are several contemporaries with that set of names and I'm inclined to think that the bridegroom of 1900 is one of the others.) Cecilia's son is on the Electoral Rolls in the borough of Chelsea from 1909 to 1911 but I don't know where he was from then until the first World War broke out; nor what he was doing.

Sources: census 1901, 1911, freebmd, probate registry entries.

Solicitors' Journal and Reporter volume 22 1878 p963 birth announcement for a son born to the Macraes 12 October 1878 at Brahan Castle Dingwall. The infant's names were not given but this is the birth of Charles Alexander Macrae.

On Schreiner and New College:

Robert Edwards Holloway: Newfoundland Educator by Ruby Gough. Montreal Quebec: McGill-Queen's University Press 2005: p22.

For Olive Schreiner see her wikipedia page. She and Frederick were the sons of missionaries, and grew up in the Eastern Cape, South Africa.

Oakhurst:

Warburg Institute Gerald Yorke collection: letters from Cecilia to Frederick Leigh Gardner.

Royal Geographical Society Year-Book and Record from 1898 p136 in a list of current Fellows, Charles Colin Macrae's address is Oakhurst.

Charles Francis Annesley Voysey: see his wikipedia page and www.voyseysociety.org for more information. There's a biography and list of the works of C F A Voysey by Voysey and Wendy Hitchmough. Phaidon 1995 p233 though Hitchmough notes that no drawings for the project at Oxted have survived.

Men of Note in Finance and Commerce 1901 p146 has 3 addresses for Charles Colin Macrae: 4 Bank Buildings EC; 93 Onslow Gardens; and Oakhurst.

Meonstoke House:

Seen on zoopla on 10 April 2017; featured in Country Life volume 201 2007 p165 when it was for sale again.

It's listed: www.britishlistedbuildings.co.uk as Grade II, 6 March 1967 NGR: SP6205507840.

A reference to the stables as a separate residence at www.rightmove.co.uk: they were being sold as Long Meadow House in February 2015; conversion from stables to house took place 40 years ago (so, mid 1970s-ish).

Proceedings of the Royal Colonial Institute volume 34 1903 p390 a list of current members has an Arthur R Pontifex at Meonstoke House.

The Orchid Review volume 13 1905 p26 has an E J Lovell at the address.

Autobiography of Alfred Percy Sinnett published Theosophical History Centre London 1986: p83.

Two of Anna Lea Merritt's paintings of the garden of Meonstoke House appear in An Artist's Garden by Anna Lea Merritt. George Allen and Sons 1908. Opposite p168: Phlox and Nicotiana at Meonstoke House. And opposite pp189-90: Mixed Borders at the Kitchen Garden at Meonstoke House, either side of a 200 foot-long grass walk.

Cecilia's contribution to Anna Lea Merritt's garden at The Limes, Hurstbourne Tarrant:

Love Locked Out: the Memoirs of Anna Lea Merritt with a Checklist of Her Works editor Galina Gorokhoff. Boston: Museum of Fine Arts. No publication date but British Library stamp has "Sep [19]83". Anna's dates are 1844-1930: p210.

CHARLES ALEXANDER MACRAE

Freebmd marriages registered in 1900. The Charles Alexander Macrae whose wedding was in Axbridge married either Ruth Gurney or Ada Mabel Holl. Though I've struggled to find evidence for Cecilia's son's life, I haven't found any for him having a wife.

Royal Blue Book 1903 p1121.

Familysearch: electoral rolls for London Borough of Chelsea 1909-11.

FRANK LAING MACRAE

Times 8 February 1910 p1 marriage announcement: Macrae to von Mack, on 7 February at St Peter's Cranley Gdns.

It's been difficult to find information on Irene von Mack though one website I reached via google did give her year of birth as 1886/87. There was no registration for her on freebmd.

THE FIRST WORLD WAR

Despite all their long-standing cultural contacts with Germany and despite the fact that Frank's wife was at least partly German, both Cecilia's sons must have volunteered to fight in the early days of World War 1 because they were both sent to Europe in 1915. Anna Lea Merritt recorded that Charles Alexander had been declared "not fit for military service" but he joined the army service corps as an ambulance driver. Frank was declared fit, and joined the 8th Seaforth Highlanders as a Lieutenant.

In February 1915, the 8th Seaforth Highlanders were sent to Chisledon Camp on Salisbury Plain to train for combat. They were moved to Tidworth Camp in May and set off from there for France, landing at Boulogne in July 1915. On the day they were due to begin the journey across the Channel, Cecilia went in her car to see them off, picking up Anna Lea Merritt from her house in Hurstbourne Tarrant on the way. At first they couldn't see Frank amongst so many soldiers but they stood on a vantage point to watch the troops march past, and Frank dashed out from the ranks and "clasped his dear mother in his arms; no time for words". That was the last time Cecilia ever saw him: Frank's name appeared in the Times on 14 October 1915 in a list of soldiers missing in action. His body was never found, but in the end he was deemed to have been killed in action on or shortly after the first day of the battle to take the village of Loos (25 September 1915), somewhere near the village. Charles Alexander died in Belgium the following April; there is a grave for him, in the St Riquier British Cemetery. Anna Lea Merritt said that he had "died from over-exertion".

Charles Colin Macrae had been 70 in 1913 and by the time the war broke out he had retired from most of his directorships and from being the chairman of the London, Brighton and South Coast Railway; However, according to Anna Lea Merritt during the war he had been a special constable, in London, during what she refers to as "some emergencies" - which I take to be the riots in London and other towns during 1917 as the price of bread and potatoes went beyond most people's ability to pay (rationing wasn't introduced until the end of that year). After the war was over, he took on the task of restoring order to the finances and assets of the London, Brighton and South Coast Railway, which had been under government control during the fighting. Anna Lea Merritt reckoned that the effort the process had required of him wore him out; and the sorting-out of the chaos had still not been finished when he died.

Sources:

Love Locked Out: the Memoirs of Anna Lea Merritt with a Checklist of Her Works ed Galina Gorokhoff. Boston: Museum of Fine Arts. No publication date but BL stamp has "Sep [19]83".

Anna's dates are 1844-1930. For the account of Frank Laing Macrae: pp220-221.

At discovery.nationalarchives.gov.uk, WO 339/12354 is Charles Alexander Macrae's war record: Lt, Royal Service Corps 1914-1916.

See www.ipernity.com for details of men listed on the War Memorial at St Andrew's Meonstoke. Frank Laing Macrae and Charles Alexander Macrae are both on it and Charles Alexander's date of death is given.

Charles' death wasn't in the Times' list of deaths in combat. There was no Probate Registry entry connected with it.

At www.roll-of-honour.com list of those on the Stock Exchange Memorial Roll of Honour, unveiled October 1922; with short biographies.

Times Thurs 14 October 1915 p3 Roll of Honour, issued by the Admiralty. A list of officers missing includes F L Macrae of 8th Seaforth Highlanders.

For information on the Seaforth Highlanders:

www.1914-1918.net/seaforth.htm

www.rbls-kirkwall.org.uk which lists quite a few men born on Orkney who joined the 8th Seaforth Highlanders and died at the battle of Loos; though Frank isn't amongst them as he wasn't born on the islands.

Probate Registry 1916: Frank Laing Macrae.

Some of Frank Laing Macrae's estate wasn't sorted out at the time:

Probate Registry 1943 re death of Louisa Ida Macrae on 24 January 1943.

Probate Registry 1943 re death of Frank Laing Macrae.

AFTER THE FIRST WORLD WAR

Cecilia and Charles Colin Macrae kept a house in London at least until Charles Colin's death; though by 1922 they had left Onslow Gardens for 40 Cheniston Gardens, off Kensington High Street. That was probably where Cecilia spent the evening with Christina Stoddart, that Stoddart mentioned in her letter to Georgie Yeats in 1919. At some point after 1917 - probably after the Armistice - they left Meonstoke House, with all its agonising memories, and chose a weekend house in Bournemouth. The house was called Ravenshall, 2 Chine Crescent Road. A block of flats with an entrance at 19-21 West Cliff Road is on the site now, built before the 1970s. Charles Colin died at Ravenshall on 22 November 1922. A memorial service was held in London but he was buried in Bournemouth. He left personal estate to the value of £37,575, nearly £2 million in 2017 terms. His executors were solicitor Ernest Burrell Baggallay, partner in Devonshire and Co of 38 Old Jewry; and Alick Currie.

ALEXANDER CHARLES CURRIE

Fanny Macrae, sister of Charles Colin and Louisa Ida Macrae, had married Robert George Currie of the Bengal Civil Service in 1866. Fanny had died in 1870 and her widower had married again. Alick and his twin brother George Hugh Currie (born 1873) were the sons of Robert George's second wife; but the Macraes regarded them as all-but-first-cousins. They were closer to them, it seems, than to Fanny's own daughter Lucy Alexa Heathcote Currie - I haven't found any mention of her in any source for the Macraes. Alick Currie went into the Indian Civil Service. He married Dorothea Crickett in Eastbourne in 1902, during a period of leave. Alick and Dorothea left India at the start of World War 1 and settled in Sussex, nearer to Louisa Ida than to Charles Colin and Cecilia.

With Charles Colin, Alick Currie had the painful task of sorting out the legal affairs of Frank Laing Macrae after he was killed. Probate on Frank's estate was initially granted to them both in May 1916 but the work wasn't finally finished until April 1943. Alick had to make a second probate application while he was acting as executor for Louisa Ida Macrae, who had died in January 1943. Alick died, in Sussex, in 1953.

CECILIA'S LAST YEARS

As Anna Lea Merritt said, ..Alas, for my dear lonely friend."

Aged 91, in September 1939 Cecilia was still living at Ravenshall in Bournemouth, with four servants including a butler - a very large number for the late 1930s after all the social change that the first world war had brought about. Apart from the housemaid, who had been born in 1917, the staff were all elderly and had probably been working for Cecilia for many years; though none had been with her on census day 1901, the last census I've been able to find her on. Alfred Pampton her butler had been born in 1876; Eva Cole, the cook, was born in 1885; Eleanor J Lawes her lady's maid had been born in 1876.

Cecilia's sisters Theresa and Florence were also still alive in September 1939 and so was her sister-in-law, Louisa Ida Macrae. However, all the other Laing siblings had died. So too had Anna Lea Merritt (in 1930) and some of the next generation of nieces and nephews. Irene Macrae had gone back to live in Germany and had stayed through the rise of the Nazis and the outbreak of the second World War; she died in Homburg in August 1941.

Cecilia finally died on 10 March 1942. She was 93. Her sisters Theresa and Florence survived her and so did her sister-in-law Louisa Ida Macrae. The economic crashes of the past twenty years, and her loyalty to servants - keeping them on when perhaps she didn't need such a large household any more - meant that Cecilia left less than half what her husband had left: £12636. Even in modern terms it was still a tidy sum though: the measuringworth website calculated its 2017 worth as £540,000.

Sources:

Ravenshall:

The Cambridge Review volume 38 1917 p27 refers to Herbert and Emma Sutton living in it.
London Gazette 1975 part 5 p6392 has a reference to flats at the address, which may be a newly-built block rather than a conversion of the house the Macraes lived in.

Death of Charles Colin Macrae:

Times Thur 30 November 1922 p15c announced the memorial service.

Times Fri 1 December 1922 p15f: obituary.

Probate registry 1920: entry Charles Colin Macrae

CURRIE, Alexander Charles

Wikipedia on the Currie baronetcy which has been dormant since 1978. Robert George Currie was one of the many children of Frederick Currie first Baronet (1799-1875) Foreign Secretary to the Indian Government and member of the Supreme Council of India.

Armorial Families entry for Robert George Currie (1835-80) Bengal Civil Service; 1835-80. His second marriage, in 1872, was to Annie Flora, daughter of A C MacKinnon.

At tacadrum.blogspot.co.uk some information on Fanny and Robert George Currie's daughter Lucy Alexa Heathcote Currie. She married John Orlando Summerhayes MRCS LRCP in the Punjab in 1895. He was director of the mission hospital where she was working as a missionary-cum-teacher. They and their family returned to England around 1909 and settled in Thame.

At www.haine.org.uk, some information on Alexander Charles Currie born 1873 in Shahjehanpore West Bengal; died 1953 Mayfield Sussex.

In the Indian Civil Service:

Thacker's Indian Directory 1900 issue Part 4. List of residents p1663: A C Currie was Assistant Commissioner of Buldana.

Thacker's Indian Directory 1910 issue Part 2. List of residents p84 A C Currie was still in Buldana but he had been promoted, to Deputy Commissioner.

Thacker's Indian Directory 1914 issue Part 2. List of residents p93 A C Currie was still Deputy Commissioner at Buldana. He was currently on leave and I think that he didn't go back to India again: he's not in the residents' list in the Thacker's Indian Directory issue of 1916.

At www.dnw.co.uk, a bit more on Alexander Charles Currie from the website of auction house Dix Noonan Webb, in a 2008 sale of Life Saving Awards, including a reference to his twin brother.

Probate Registry entries 1916 and 1943: estate of Frank Laing Macrae.

Probate Registry entry 1943: Louisa Ida Macrae.

BAGGALLAY, Ernest Burrell

There's an entry for him at london.wikia.com: 1879-1940.

Times 23 Jan 1940: obituary.

The Law Times volume 186 1938 p414.

The Solicitor's Journal volume 84 1940 p57

Love Locked Out: the Memoirs of Anna Lea Merritt with a Checklist of Her Works ed Galina Gorokhoff. Boston: Museum of Fine Arts. No publication date but British Library stamp has "Sep [19]83": pxix.

Via Findmypast to 1939 Register, taken on 29 September 1939.

Probate Registry 1944 and 1952: death of Irene Alexandra Caroline Cecilia Elfriede Claudia Bernhardine Johanna Agnes Macrae of Dorotheenstrasse 33 Bad Homburg. The 1952 probate was granted to the Administrator of German Enemy Property.

CECILIA'S DEATH

Probate Registry 1942.

London Gazette 19 May 1942 p2204 legal notices includes one issued under the Trustee Act 1925 with reference to the death of Cecilia Mary Bruce Macrae.

BASIC SOURCES I USED for all Golden Dawn members.

Membership of the Golden Dawn: The Golden Dawn Companion by R A Gilbert. Northampton: The Aquarian Press 1986. Between pages 125 and 175, Gilbert lists the names, initiation dates and addresses of all those people who became members of the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn or its many daughter Orders between 1888 and 1914. The list is based on the Golden Dawn's administrative records and its Members' Roll - the large piece of parchment on which all new members signed their name at their initiation. All this information had been inherited by Gilbert but it's now in the Freemasons' Library at the United Grand Lodge of England building on Great Queen Street Covent Garden. Please note, though, that the records of the Amen-Ra Temple in Edinburgh were destroyed in 1900/01. I have recently (July 2014) discovered that some records of the Horus Temple at Bradford have survived, though most have not; however those that have survived are not yet accessible to the public.

For the history of the GD during the 1890s I usually use Ellic Howe's The Magicians of the Golden Dawn: A Documentary History of a Magical Order 1887-1923. Published Routledge and Kegan Paul 1972. Foreword by Gerald Yorke. Howe is a historian of printing rather than of magic; he also makes no claims to be a magician himself, or even an occultist. He has no axe to grind.

Family history: freebmd; ancestry.co.uk (census and probate); findmypast.co.uk; familysearch; Burke's Peerage and Baronetage; Burke's Landed Gentry; Armorial Families; thepeerage.com; and a wide variety of family trees on the web.

Famous-people sources: mostly about men, of course, but very useful even for the female members of GD. Oxford Dictionary of National Biography. Who Was Who. Times Digital Archive.

Useful source for business and legal information: London Gazette and its Scottish counterpart Edinburgh Gazette. Now easy to find (with the right search information) on the web.

For the GD members who were freemasons, the membership database of the United Grand Lodge of England is now available via Ancestry: it gives the date of the freemason's first initiation; and the craft lodges he was a member of.

To take careers in craft freemasonry further, the website of the the Freemasons' Library is a good resource: //freemasonry.london.museum. Its catalogue has very detailed entries and the website has all sorts of other resources.

You can get from the pages to a database of freemasons' newspapers and magazines, digitised to 1900. You can also reach that directly at www.masonicperiodicals.org.

Wikipedia; Google; Google Books - my three best resources. I also used other web pages, but with some caution, as - from the historian's point of view - they vary in quality a great deal.

To put contemporary prices and incomes into perspective, I have used www.measuringworth.com/ukcompare which Roger Wright found for me. To help you interpret the 'today' figure, measuringworth gives several options. I pick the 'historic standard of living' option which is usually the lowest, often by a considerable margin!

14 May 2017

Find the web pages of Roger Wright and Sally Davis, including my list of people initiated into the Order of the Golden Dawn between 1888 and 1901, at:

www.wrightanddavis.co.uk

***

Louisa Ida Marina Macrae was initiated into the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn at its Isis-Urania temple in London, in May 1891. Five other people were initiated during the ritual: Louisa Ida's sisters-in-law Cecilia Macrae and Florence Kennedy; Augustus Montague Cooper; Agnes Alicia de Pallandt; and Emily Katherine Bates. Louisa Ida chose the Latin motto 'Fortudine' and gave the GD's administrators an address for correspondence - Cecilia Macrae's address - but that was as far as her membership ever went. She never followed up her initiation and by as early as July 1892 was no longer a member of the Order.

This is one of my short biographies. As with so many of the GD members, especially its women members, I have found virtually no information on Louisa Ida's life.

Sally Davis

May 2017

My basic sources for any GD member are in a section at the end of the file. Supplementary sources for this particular member are listed at the end of each section.

This is what I have found on LOUISA IDA MARINA MACRAE.

DID SHE HAVE ANY OTHER ESOTERIC INTERESTS?

A WORD ON SPIRITUALISM

I haven't found any evidence that Louisa Ida was interested in spiritualism. However, it is hard to tell whether people were spiritualists: spiritualism was a very locally, even family-based pursuit and there was no over-arching organisation with a membership list that can be consulted now. Meetings of the British National Association of Spiritualists, and of other major London-based groups did receive coverage in the spiritualist press of the day; but I didn't see Louisa Ida's name mentioned in any of the issues of magazines like Light that I looked at.

THEOSOPHY

Louisa Ida was never a member of the Theosophical Society either.

Sources:

Theosophical Society Membership Registers 1889-1901.

BIRTH IN INDIA

Louisa and her brother Charles Colin Macrae were children of Dr Alexander Charles Macrae and his wife Charlotte Isa Reid (or Reed; unfortunately I've seen both spellings).

Alexander Charles and Charlotte were both of Scottish descent. Charlotte was born in Scotland, but neither of them spent much of their lives living there. Alexander Charles was born in Demerara, Guyana (formerly British Guiana) in 1816. He studied medicine at Edinburgh University, qualifying in 1838. In January 1839 he joined what was then the East India Company's medical service. He spent all his working life in Bengal, beginning as an assistant surgeon with its Ramgurh Light Infantry regiment, based in Dorundah. He was with the regiment all through the 1840s, serving in the First Sikh or Sutlej War (1845-46) but by 1850 he had moved to a civilian posting in Howrah. He was promoted to Surgeon in January 1853 and became surgeon and marine surgeon to the Bengal Presidency. During the first Indian War of Independence/ Indian Mutiny he was seconded to the military, as staff surgeon with the 10th Foot and then with the 6th Light Dragoons. He was promoted to Surgeon-Major after the War, returning to his civilian work in Calcutta. In 1863 he was officiating surgeon to the governor-general and viceroy of India. The family were living in Calcutta, at 9 Middleton Street at that time. They were not the only Macraes in India: living with them was Colin Wilson Macrae of the merchants and agents Pearce, Macrae and Co of 1 Clive Ghaut Street.

Alexander Charles Macrae had married Charlotte, the daughter of a naval captain, at Fort William Bengal in 1842. Their five children were all born in India. Charles Colin Macrae, who married GD member Cecilia Laing, was the eldest; born at Dorunda in 1843. Louisa Ida Marina was the youngest; born at Fort William in July 1856. In between Charles Colin and Louisa Ida were one sister and two brothers. The two boys died as infants. Fanny Macrae (born 1845) survived long enough to marry and have a child, but died in 1870.

Alexander Charles Macrae retired from the Bengal medical service in January 1865 and the family returned to Britain; but not to Scotland, they lived most of the year in London, with some summers spent on the south coast. Charles Colin Macrae was sent to England before his father retired, to be a pupil at Eton College.

Sources:

ALEXANDER CHARLES MACRAE:

Roll of the Indian Medical Service 1615-1930 compiled by Lt-Col D G Crawford. Limited edition of 200. London: W Thacker and Co; Calcutta: Thacker Spink and Co: p113.

Bengal Directory and Annual Register 1840 p245.

Bengal and Agra Directory and Annual Register 1845 p153, p269.

Bengal and Agra Directory and Annual Register 1850 p274.

Bengal Directory and Annual Register 1854 p275.

Times 27 January 1858 p6 originally in London Gazette Tue 26 January [1858].

New Calcutta Directory 1859 p70, p222.

Thacker's PO Directory of Bengal issue of 1863; residents' list p37.

New Calcutta Directory 1863 Part 9-11 p253.

Thacker's Bengal Directory 1866 p124 list of residents: no entry for him.

B/M/D records:

At //indiafamily.bl.uk: birth of Alexander Charles MacRae 21 December 1816.

Familysearch India Marriages 1792-1948. India-EASy GS film number 498980: marriage of A C MacRae MD, son of Colin Macrae to Charlotte Isa (sic) Reid (sic), daughter of the late Captain Reid RN; 1 November 1842 at Fort William Bengal.

Familysearch India Births and Baptisms 1786-1947:

- India-EASy GS film number 498983: birth of Charles Colin Macrae 16 August 1843. Baptised November 1843 at Dorunda. This region has Charlotte as Charlotte Isabel Reed.

- India-EASy GS film number 498983: birth of Fanny Catherine Ouseley Macrae 19 May 1845. Baptised August 1845 at Dorunda.

- India-EASy GS film number 498985: birth Henry George Vernon Martal (sic) Macrae 5 June 1847. Baptised December 1847 at Bishop's College Howrah. This time Charlotte's full name is given as Charlotte Isabella Reid.

I haven't found any other records at all of Henry Macrae either in India or elsewhere; and as biographical information on Charles Colin Macrae calls him an only son, I assume Henry died as a child.

- India-EASy GS film number 498991: birth Edgar Elliott Maptal (sic) Macrae 10 January 1853. Baptised February 1853 at Howrah. This regn has Charlotte as Charlotte Isabella.

GS film number 498994: Edgar Elliott Macrae buried Bishop's College Bengal 19 May 1854.

- India-EASy GS film number 498994: Louisa Ida Murixa (sic) Macrae born 28 July 1856 at Fort William, St Paul Bengal. Baptised September 1856 Calcutta. Parents Alexander Charles and Charlotte Isa.

IN ENGLAND

The Macraes' first address after their return to England was probably Hastings, where Fanny Macrae married Robert George Currie in 1866. Currie was on leave from the Bengal Civil Service and Fanny went back to India with him. By 1866 Charles Colin Macrae was at Oxford University. After graduating, he qualified as a barrister in 1868 and went back to India to practice law in Calcutta. So on census day 1871, only Louisa Ida (now aged 14) was living with her parents at their London address of 38 Gloucester Gardens, Bayswater. However, two young cousins were living with them - Charlotte Mackenzie aged 19 and her brother Thomas, aged 15. Alexander Charles Macrae's pension and perhaps a contribution from the Mackenzie family allowed the Macraes to employ a cook, a housemaid, a nursemaid and a footman.

Charles Colin Macrae returned to England in 1877. The family had moved a few streets to 119 Westbourne Terrace by then, and Charles Colin lived with them there for a short time until he married future GD member Cecilia Laing in July 1877. Charlotte Macrae died a few weeks before the wedding took place. She was 57, and I can't believe that the wedding would have been arranged for a time when she was seriously ill; so I assume she died very suddenly. The wedding went ahead; it was probably too late in the day to cancel the arrangements.

Louisa Ida continued to live with her father until his death at age 92. By 1881, Charlotte and Thomas Mackenzie had left the household but a woman who was probably their mother had joined it, contributing a private income to the household budget: Alexander Charles Macrae's sister-in-law Alexandrina Mackenzie, a widow aged 65. I think she may have lived with the Macraes until her death. On census day 1881, the Macraes also had a visitor, a Miss Campbell (I'm not sure of her forename but it might be 'Catherine'). Miss Campbell was 26, of an age to be a friend of Louisa Ida's. The Macraes and Mrs Mackenzie were able to employ a butler, a cook, two housemaids and a kitchenmaid.

Electoral Rolls show Alexander Charles Macrae living in the borough of Paddington until 1895, so they were probably still at 119 Westbourne Terrace until then. However, I can't be sure because none of the Macraes were in the UK on the day of the 1891 census, which took place a few weeks before Louisa Ida and her sister-in-law Cecilia joined the GD.

If I have got the right person, Louisa Ida's aunt Alexandrina Mackenzie died in 1899, aged 81. By then, Alexander Charles Macrae had moved to 11 Mattock Lane Ealing, where he and Louisa Ida were on census day 1901. Something was written against Alexander Charles Macrae's census entry in the column which was asking about disabilities; I couldn't read what it was, but he was 85 by now so an entry in that column isn't surprising. The Macraes no longer had a butler. However, they still were able to employ a cook, housemaid and parlourmaid. They could have afforded a nurse, I should think, but perhaps Louisa Ida - now 44 - could manage her father's frailty without one.

Louisa Ida and her father made one more move before Alexander Charles Macrae died: they went to Eastbourne, to 7 Hartington Place. Alexander Charles Macrae died in Eastbourne in July 1908. Louisa Ida was 52 and had spent all her life as part of his household. He left very little - his pension died with him, of course, and his personal effects amounted to £196/13 - and I do wonder what Louisa Ida lived on for the rest of her life. There's some indication that Charles Colin Macrae helped her. When she died, her executor - Alick Currie - had to apply for a second probate registration for her nephew, Charles Colin's son Frank Laing Macrae; as if he had found financial papers belonging to Frank amongst Louisa Ida's possessions. Frank had been killed at the Battle of Loos in 1915; perhaps Charles Colin had persuaded Louisa Ida to have the income from some of Frank's investments. That's just a speculation of mine. Alick Currie was not Fanny Macrae's son but seems to have been regarded by both Louisa Ida and Charles Colin as if he might as well have been. He was the son of Fanny's widower, Robert George Currie, and Robert's second wife. After a couple of decades working for the Indian Civil Service, Alick had retired to Sussex around 1915.

Louisa Ida Macrae was not in the UK on the day of the 1911 census. Neither were Charles Colin or Cecilia, or their elder son Charles Alexander, so perhaps they had all gone somewhere together. Louisa Ida may have gone to live with Charles Colin and Cecilia after her father's death; but what little evidence I have found of her, after 1908, suggests not. I couldn't find her on the 1939 Register (taken in September 1939). I thought that was odd but perhaps her name hadn't been transcribed very well. She died in January 1943 and at that time, she was living at White Cliff, Southdown Avenue Peacehaven, in Sussex.

Sources: censuses 1871-1911; freebmd; Familysearch electoral rolls; probate registry 1943.

Law Times volume 45 1868 issue of 2 May 1868 p11: Charles Colin Macrae called to the bar, a member of Lincoln's Inn.

Times Fri 1 December 1922 p15f: obituary of Charles Colin Macrae.

BASIC SOURCES I USED for all Golden Dawn members.

Membership of the Golden Dawn: The Golden Dawn Companion by R A Gilbert. Northampton: The Aquarian Press 1986. Between pages 125 and 175, Gilbert lists the names, initiation dates and addresses of all those people who became members of the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn or its many daughter Orders between 1888 and 1914. The list is based on the Golden Dawn's administrative records and its Members' Roll - the large piece of parchment on which all new members signed their name at their initiation. All this information had been inherited by Gilbert but it's now in the Freemasons' Library at the United Grand Lodge of England building on Great Queen Street Covent Garden. Please note, though, that the records of the Amen-Ra Temple in Edinburgh were destroyed in 1900/01. I have recently (July 2014) discovered that some records of the Horus Temple at Bradford have survived, though most have not; however those that have survived are not yet accessible to the public.

For the history of the GD during the 1890s I usually use Ellic Howe's The Magicians of the Golden Dawn: A Documentary History of a Magical Order 1887-1923. Published Routledge and Kegan Paul 1972. Foreword by Gerald Yorke. Howe is a historian of printing rather than of magic; he also makes no claims to be a magician himself, or even an occultist. He has no axe to grind.

Family history: freebmd; ancestry.co.uk (census and probate); findmypast.co.uk; familysearch; Burke's Peerage and Baronetage; Burke's Landed Gentry; Armorial Families; thepeerage.com; and a wide variety of family trees on the web.

Famous-people sources: mostly about men, of course, but very useful even for the female members of GD. Oxford Dictionary of National Biography. Who Was Who. Times Digital Archive.

Useful source for business and legal information: London Gazette and its Scottish counterpart Edinburgh Gazette. Now easy to find (with the right search information) on the web.

For the GD members who were freemasons, the membership database of the United Grand Lodge of England is now available via Ancestry: it gives the date of the freemason's first initiation; and the craft lodges he was a member of.

To take careers in craft freemasonry further, the website of the the Freemasons' Library is a good resource: //freemasonry.london.museum. Its catalogue has very detailed entries and the website has all sorts of other resources.

You can get from the pages to a database of freemasons' newspapers and magazines, digitised to 1900. You can also reach that directly at www.masonicperiodicals.org.

Wikipedia; Google; Google Books - my three best resources. I also used other web pages, but with some caution, as - from the historian's point of view - they vary in quality a great deal.

To put contemporary prices and incomes into perspective, I have used www.measuringworth.com/ukcompare which Roger Wright found for me. To help you interpret the 'today' figure, measuringworth gives several options. I pick the 'historic standard of living' option which is usually the lowest, often by a considerable margin!

14 May 2017

Find the web pages of Roger Wright and Sally Davis, including my list of people initiated into the Order of the Golden Dawn between 1888 and 1901, at:

www.wrightanddavis.co.uk

***

George MARTIN who was initiated into the Golden Dawn at the Horus Temple Bradford in September 1896. He took the Latin motto 'Semper paratus'. His address at the time was 18

Hanover Square Bradford.

I haven't been able to identify this person on the census either in 1891 or 1901; he was not living at his 1896 address in either of those years. Another one of my failures.

BASIC SOURCES I USED for all Golden Dawn members.

Membership of the Golden Dawn: The Golden Dawn Companion by R A Gilbert. Northampton: The Aquarian Press 1986. Between pages 125 and 175, Gilbert lists the names, initiation dates and addresses of all those people who became members of the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn or its many daughter Orders between 1888 and 1914. The list is based on the Golden Dawn's administrative records and its Members' Roll - the large piece of parchment on which all new members signed their name at their initiation. All this information had been inherited by Gilbert but it's now in the Freemasons' Library at the United Grand Lodge of England building on Great Queen Street Covent Garden.

Family history: freebmd; ancestry.co.uk (census and probate); findmypast.co.uk; familysearch; Burke's Peerage and Baronetage; Burke's Landed Gentry; Armorial Families; thepeerage.com; and a wide variety of family trees on the web.

Famous-people sources: mostly about men, of course, but very useful even for the female members of GD. Oxford Dictionary of National Biography. Who Was Who. Times Digital Archive.

Catalogues: British Library; Freemasons' Library.

Wikipedia; Google; Google Books - my three best resources. I also used other web pages, but with some caution, as - from the historian's point of view - they vary in quality a great deal.

27 April 2012

AMandragora@attglobal.net

Alfred MONCK or possibly Monk, who was initiated into the Golden Dawn in September 1890 and chose the Latin motto 'Vincit veritas'. From the information given by R A Gilbert, Alfred doesn't seem to have had much of the commitment necessary to get very far in the GD, and in 1892 he let them know that he was resigning. When he was initiated his address was 35 Seckforde Street Clerkenwell London EC.

Alfred appears in R A Gilbert's The Golden Dawn Companion with his surname spelled two different ways. On p145, in Gilbert's list of members in order of initiation, it's spelled with the 'c' in it. However, when Mathers prepared a list of people who were no longer members, in 1894, he left the 'c' out. I think MONCK is the correct spelling. But I couldn't find Alfred anywhere, spelled either way.

BASIC SOURCES I USED for all Golden Dawn members.

Membership of the Golden Dawn: The Golden Dawn Companion by R A Gilbert. Northampton: The Aquarian Press 1986. Between pages 125 and 175, Gilbert lists the names, initiation dates and addresses of all those people who became members of the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn or its many daughter Orders between 1888 and 1914. The list is based on the Golden Dawn's administrative records and its Members' Roll - the large piece of parchment on which all new members signed their name at their initiation. All this information had been inherited by Gilbert but it's now in the Freemasons' Library at the United Grand Lodge of England building on Great Queen Street Covent Garden.

Family history: freebmd; ancestry.co.uk (census and probate); findmypast.co.uk; familysearch; Burke's Peerage and Baronetage; Burke's Landed Gentry; Armorial Families; thepeerage.com; and a variety of one-family genealogy websites.

Famous-people sources: mostly about men, of course, but very useful even for the female members of GD. Oxford Dictionary of National Biography. Who Was Who. Times Digital Archive.

Catalogues: British Library; Freemasons' Library.

Wikipedia; Google; Google Books - my three best resources. I also used other web pages, but with some caution, as - from the historian's point of view - they vary in quality a great deal.

23 April 2012

AMandragora@attglobal.net

Andrew NEILSON who was one of the earliest members of the Golden Dawn, being initiated in August 1888 and taking the Latin motto 'Perseverando'. In GD records from 1903 he was described as "demitted": that is, at some point between 1888 and 1903 he had not paid his subscriptions for three years and so his membership had lapsed.

A man who gives as his address the Union Bank of Scotland, Ingram Street, Glasgow, is not going to be easily found. He might have been employed at the bank, of course; but I think not. I wouldn't want mail from a group of magicians turning up at my place of work. It's much more likely that he moved around a great deal or actually lived abroad, using the bank as a poste restante address. I certainly haven't found anyone who might be him, in my searches of the usual family history websites.

The only thing I know for certain about him is that he joined the Theosophical Society (TS) a year or so after his GD initiation; perhaps he found the TS more to his taste than the GD. He gave the same bank as his address, though, so finding him in the TS membership registers didn't lead me to any identification of him.

WHO DID HE KNOW IN THE GOLDEN DAWN? Despite knowing so very little about Andrew Neilson, I have a very tentative answer to that, based on the very early date he joined the GD. A large group of the earliest members were freemasonry friends of William Westcott, and it's possible that Andrew Neilson was one of them. He wasn't a member of any of the English lodges that Westcott had contacts with, however. It's much more likely that if Neilson was a freemason he was a Scottish one. Scotland is separate from England for freemasonry purposes and keeps its own records. I haven't checked the Scottish archives of freemasonry for more information on Neilson - it helps the archivists look, if you can give them a date of birth for the man in question, and of course I haven't got one.

BASIC SOURCES I USED for all Golden Dawn members.

Membership of the Golden Dawn: The Golden Dawn Companion by R A Gilbert. Northampton: The Aquarian Press 1986. Between pages 125 and 175, Gilbert lists the names, initiation dates and addresses of all those people who became members of the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn or its many daughter Orders between 1888 and 1914. The list is based on the Golden Dawn's administrative records and its Members' Roll - the large piece of parchment on which all new members signed their name at their initiation. All this information had been inherited by Gilbert but it's now in the Freemasons' Library at the United Grand Lodge of England building on Great Queen Street Covent Garden.

Family history: freebmd; ancestry.co.uk (census and probate); findmypast.co.uk; familysearch; Burke's Peerage and Baronetage; Burke's Landed Gentry; Armorial Families; thepeerage.com; and a variety of one-family genealogy websites.

Famous-people sources: mostly about men, of course, but very useful even for the female members of GD. Oxford Dictionary of National Biography. Who Was Who. Times Digital Archive.

Catalogues: British Library; Freemasons' Library.

Wikipedia; Google; Google Books - my three best resources. I also used other web pages, but with some caution, as - from the historian's point of view - they vary in quality a great deal.

For the Theosophical Society: membership books for the period 1889-1901, held at the TS headquarters on Gloucester Place London W1.

24 April 2012

AMandragora@attglobal.net

Robert Baird Brash Nisbet was initiated into the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn at its Horus temple in Bradford in January 1892, taking the Latin motto 'Ex animo'. A few months later, in September 1892 Robert's wife Agnes Nisbet was initiated, also in Bradford. Rachel Taylor who later married GD member Joseph K Gardner; and J W S Callie (James) were initiated in the same ritual. Both of them were from Liverpool and both were good friends of Agnes and Robert through the Theosophical Society. Agnes chose the Latin motto 'Psyche'. Then, in June 1894 Robert's sister Jean Gillison was initiated, but at the GD's Isis-Urania temple in London. Julian Levett Baker, Henry Herbert Weltch and Harold N Lancaster were initiated in the same ritual as Jeanie; but I don't think she had met any of them before that evening. After some uncertainty - the motto 'Servabo fidem' is crossed out in her GD records, she settled on the Latin motto 'Cogito ergo sum'.

All three were keen initiates and I think they did at least some of the study-work together. They certainly worked through it at roughly the same pace: all three of them reached the stage where they were eligible for the GD's inner, 2nd Order during 1895. Robert underwent that second initiation in April of that year, Jean in August, and Agnes in December. However, Robert and Agnes must have had theirs in Paris, because they had moved there by early 1894. Jeanie probably had hers in London.

As Robert, Agnes and Jean were so closely related, this biography is of all three of them. There was a certain amount of official confusion, during her lifetime and at her death, as to what Mrs Gillison's Christian name was - Jane, or Jean; but I shall be calling her Jeanie, which I think is what she was called in the family.

THE NISBETS

Robert and Jeanie's parents were Thomas Nisbet and his wife Jane, née Brash. They were both Scottish. They married in Eastwood, then a suburb of Glasgow, in 1847; and only moved to Liverpool after Jeanie - their eldest child - was born. I couldn't find a baptism for Jeanie and no births in Scotland were registered at the time, but all her census responses suggest she was born, in Glasgow, in late 1847 or 1848. It's a pity about the lack of official information on Jeanie's birth: I still don't know whether she was baptised Jane, Jean, or Jeanie; but clearly she was named after her mother. Robert Baird Brash Nisbet was one of the younger members of the family, born in Liverpool in 1857. Between Jeanie and Robert were Helen (born 1849), Elizabeth (born 1850), and Alexander (born 1852); after Robert came George, the youngest, born in 1861.

On the day of the 1861 census the Nisbets were living at 39 Upper Hope Place in the Abercromby district of Liverpool. Thomas Nisbet was working in the offices of a shipping firm. I haven't been able to find out which shipping firm employed him - Liverpool had so many! But the shipping connection was an important feature in the Nisbets lives for the next 50 years or so.

While their children were young, Thomas and Jane Nisbet may have had to be careful of their money but by the day of the 1871 census the family was in a comfortable financial position, with not only Alexander but also Helen and Elizabeth working: this was a family where the women were expected to work - at least until they were married - not just the men. Probably on the strength of all the extra money that was coming in, the Nisbets had moved to 22 Queen's Road Everton; and - another improvement in their living standards since 1861 - they were able to employ the basic, live-in general servant. Helen was teaching English, possibly in a school; and Elizabeth was employed as a day-governess which I think means that she was employed by a family, working in their home. Alexander was in the middle of his apprenticeship at a ship-broking firm. Robert and George were still at school. Jeanie was not at home on census day; she was in Scotland where (it seems) only the householders were asked to give their source of income; so I don't know whether she was working like her sisters or helping her mother run their big household. She was at 254 Bath Street in the Blythswood district of Glasgow, visiting Jane Binnie, who was either her aunt or her great-aunt (the census transcription was a bit vague on that point). Perhaps Jeanie had gone to see her aunt to give her some good news. In the autumn of 1871, Jeanie got married, to Robert Gillison. news:news:

THE GILLISONS

The Gillisons were also a Scottish family; they had come to Liverpool from Dumfriesshire. On the day of the 1851 census they were living in West Derby, Liverpool: Thomas and his wife Jane; and their children Margaret (an important person in Jeanie's life); James; Susan; Robert whom Jeanie married; the twins Isabella and Janet; John; and baby Thomas. There was one more child to come: William. Despite their large family, Thomas and Jane Gillison were well-to-do or wished to give that impression: West Derby was then a new suburb; and the Gillisons had two servants, not the basic one. The family were still living in the West Derby district in 1861. Though they had left school Margaret and Susan were not listed as having any source of income. It's possible - probable - that they were not asked whether they were doing any paid work but I think that in fact, they weren't working; the Gillisons were both better-off financially than the Nisbets and perhaps had a different attitude (more conservative, less practical) to the whole question of women's work. James and Robert were both at work. James had gone into the shipping industry as a shipbroker's clerk; in view of what happened later (see below) it's likely he was working for Joseph Chadwick. Robert had been apprenticed to a tea importing firm. The family had a visitor on census day, a Richard Bell, who ran a ship- and cattle-dealing business. He was probably a business associate of Thomas Gillison, whose source of income I could read this time (I couldn't in 1851). Thomas Gillison was in business as a farmer and cattle salesman, and in 1862 he was important enough in the local economy of Dumfriesshire to be elected a member of the Highland and Agricultural Society of Scotland. On census day 1861 the Gillisons had four servants living in who reflected the family's sources of income and social status neatly: a housemaid and nursemaid; one farm labourer and a ploughman.

James Gillison, Thomas and Jane's eldest son, was the dynamic member of the family. In 1878 he and Joseph Chadwick founded the Gillison and Chadwick shipping line, often known as the 'drum' line as they gave their ships names beginning with Drum... The company's offices were at Mersey Chambers Liverpool when it was founded though by the 1890s they were at 10 Tower Buildings North. The firm was still in existence in 1915. Joseph Chadwick had been in the shipping business since 1872 and although I can't prove it, I do wonder whether members of the Nisbet family - Alexander, for example - actually worked for him, and then for Gillison and Chadwick.

Certainly James' youngest brother, William, worked for the firm: a merchant seaman, he was master of Gillison and Chadwick's barque British Sovereign, when it was wrecked and all hands were lost, somewhere off Dunnet Head on 2 or 3 May 1881.

Jeanie's husband Robert doesn't seem to have shared the Gillison interest in land, cattle and shipping. He preferred tea and having served his apprenticeship, worked in the tea business all his life. By 1891 he had been promoted to the challenging and delicate job of tea tasting - essentially, assessing quality and preparing blends - and it's a pity that I haven't been able to find out who he worked for. My guess, though, is that he worked for a big firm, in which promotion was marked by new job titles and (presumably) rises in pay. Although Liverpool was not as important in the world tea business as London, it did have a lot of firms that imported and sold tea. Amongst the biggest were Edward Billington and Son Ltd. Billingtons still exists but it's best known now as a sugar importer. However it was founded, in 1858, as a tea and coffee importing concern. From 1864 the firm was based in Liverpool. Rathbone Brothers - another firm known better for other things - also dealt in tea from China and coffee from Brazil; though their involvement in the tea trade ended in 1898. Other firms that Robert Gillison may have worked for imported tea along with other items. Two that I spotted in directories from around 1870 were Adair and Dawson of 73-77 London Road who dealt in Italian foodstuffs as well as tea; and Peek Brothers of 21 Harrington Street, importers of tea, coffee and spices.

It looks as though Robert Gillison's job occasionally took him abroad - perhaps as far as China - because he was not in the UK on census day 1881. In his absence, Jeanie had gone to stay with Robert's sister Margaret, who had married Alexander Armour. Much more about Alexander Armour below, but here I'll just say that he owned a firm which dealt in iron; perhaps he used Gillison and Chadwick's ships for transporting it. In 1881 Alexander and Margaret were living at 21 Percy Street Liverpool and like the Thomas Gillisons and James Gillisons, were comfortably off, employing a nurse and two maids of all work. Jeanie's stay with them and her visits to them must have had their sad side; because the Armours had six children while Jeanie and her husband remained childless. Perhaps Jeanie and Robert made up for the children they did not have, by taking a close interest in their nieces and nephews; particularly Alexander and Margaret's third son Robert Gillison Armour (born 1871); and Jeanie's sister Helen's daughter Jean Brash Price (born 1879).

I'll leave Jeanie at 1881, staying with her in-laws and close friends; and turn to her brother Robert. On leaving school, Robert trained and qualified as a book-keeper, which from my point of view is a pity: those skills are so widely useful he could have been welcomed as an employee by any firm in Liverpool. That's why he chose that work, I'm sure. But as the census officials didn't usually note down exactly who anyone's employer was, I have no idea which firm or firms Robert worked for. What is clear, however, is that he could afford to contemplate marriage and the setting up of his own household by the time he was in his late twenties - of course, by this time he will have been working for nearly two decades. In 1886 he married Elizabeth Agnes Williams, who was always called Agnes.

AGNES WILLIAMS

Agnes Williams was the elder daughter of Samuel Fletcher Williams and his wife Elizabeth. Samuel Fletcher Williams had a working life sharply different from the usual; it has a very modern feel to it, even, because unlike what was expected of Victorian men, he changed career at least twice. Born in Shrewsbury in 1842, he started out there as a clerk in an auctioneer's office, probably in the late 1850s. Then he moved on to working as a reporter for the local newspaper; until the late 1860s. Then, in an even more dramatic shift, he joined the Unitarian Methodists and trained as a minister. There were those in Victorian England who felt strongly that you could hardly think of the Unitarians as Christians at all - their very name announced the fact that they didn't believe in the trinity of Father, Son and Holy Ghost; and they also denied the divinity of Jesus. However, because of the kind of person who attended their churches, they had an importance out of all proportion to their numbers.

Samuel Fletcher Williams had married Elizabeth Lloyd, in Shrewsbury, in 1862. Their family, by Victorian standards, was very small: Elizabeth Agnes was born in 1865 and her only sibling, Mary Emma, in 1867. By census day 1871 Rev Williams had begun his work as a Unitarian minister and had been sent to the Bethlehem Chapel at Newchurch-in-Rossendale (near Rochdale) and the family were living at a house nearby. Elizabeth's mother, Mary Lloyd, was living with them but they did not have any live-in servants at that time. Mary Lloyd had died by 1881 and Rev Williams had been moved on as well, to Hamilton Road Chapel in the Everton district of Liverpool. He and Elizabeth, Agnes and Mary Emma were living at 85 Everton Road Cherton. Agnes and Mary Emma were no longer at school; but they weren't working either and as far as I know neither of them did paid work before they married - the Nisbet daughters were very unusual in this respect. I don't suppose Agnes and Mary Emma were idle, however. As the family had only the one general servant, they will have been doing their share of household management. And as the daughters of a minister they would have been expected to set an example to his parishioners with an involvement in charity work. They also will have had to help their mother organise the many meetings that were part of their father's work. Looking on the web I found two examples of the kind of event I mean - a tea-cum-meeting of ministers in October 1879, and the spring meeting of the Liverpool and North Wales district of the United Methodist Free Churches, which took place over two days in 1882.

I've said that Robert Nisbet and Agnes Williams met in Liverpool, but it may not have been at her father's church services, which may have been rather too Unitarian for the Nisbets' liking. Robert and Jeanie's sister Elizabeth had married a Presbyterian minister, Robert Gilbert Flett, in 1872. Robert Flett had arrived in Liverpool from Edinburgh to take up an appointment as a minister. I would imagine all the Nisbets were regular attenders at Flett's church, and that's how he and Elizabeth had met; possibly the Gillisons were also in his congregation. Robert and Elizabeth's eldest child was Margaret Jean Flett (born 1873), probably Jeanie's god-daughter. It all suggests a close-knit community of Presbyterians originally from Scotland, keeping up the religion of their parents and their youth. But Robert Nisbet married a woman of a very different Christian persuasion.

Times were changing. Other ways of understanding the cosmos were beginning to creep into English society: amongst which were theosophy, and western esotericism.

THEOSOPHY

Helena Petrovna Blavatsky and Colonel Henry Olcott had founded their Theosophical Society in New York in 1874. But until Isis Unveiled was published, in New York in September 1877, the TS did not really have a text that those who were interested could refer to. I haven't been able to find out when it was first possible to buy a copy in England, but residents of Liverpool - which had such strong links with North America - might have been able to obtain American copies very shortly after the publication date. Isis Unveiled was divided into two volumes. The first - Science - might have seemed to be offering an alternative to Christianity which took account of recent scientific research. The second - Religion - was Blavatsky's first attempt to offer the West a philosophy based on the religions of the East. Blavatsky has been accused of plagiarism many times, but I'm not sure that her borrowing is relevant, really: to some people, including many people who were initiated into the GD, it offered a way of understanding the world, and the purpose of human existence, when the tenets of Christianity were being challenged as never before.

Theosophy made some headway in London in the 1880s but it reached a lift-off point with regard to the rest of England, late in the decade - just around the time when the GD was being founded - because of two things: firstly the arrival of Blavatsky to take up permanent residence in London in May 1887; and secondly, the publication of her great work, The Secret Doctrine in 1888. In the years immediately after The Secret Doctrine's publication, membership of the TS in England grew hugely and quickly, with groups coming together to form lodges in every town. In addition, members of Blavatsky's entourage (though never Blavatsky herself) went on public lecture tours, explaining theosophy to the public. Although each lodge had to have permission to exist from the TS's headquarters in Regent's Park, they were self-supporting and self-governing, organising their own programme of talks (usually with speakers chosen from amongst the members), study groups (focusing particularly on The Secret Doctrine which even loyal followers found almost impenetrable) and social evenings. Federations of lodges were quickly established, one Europe-wide, one encompassing the USA, and even one just covering the north of England.

Robert and Agnes Nisbet, and Jeanie Gillison, were important members of the TS in Liverpool. I would suppose they were beginning to investigate the subject of theosophy by the late 1880s, but it does seem to have been The Secret Doctrine that made the difference. They might even have read Samuel Liddell Mathers' 1887 translation of part of Christian Knorr von Rosenroth's Kabbala Denudata to which Mathers gave a title in conscious imitation of Blavatsky - The Kabbalah Unveiled. Mathers was one of the founders of the GD.

All these ideas must have added to a general atmosphere of change in the family. Robert and Agnes began their married life by moving out of the city of Liverpool, to 8 Piercefield Road Formby - that was one change. Their two children were born in Formby - Dorothy in 1887 and Kenneth in 1889 - and that's where the family was on the day of the 1891 census, with a visitor from Birmingham, a friend of Agnes's, probably - Lizzie Dingley, a music teacher. In January 1891 had come an even bigger break with the past: Thomas Nisbet, Robert and Jeanie's father, died. Robert, their mother Jane, and Robert Flett were his executors. Though both Roberts were at home on census day 1891, neither Jane Nisbet nor Jeanie was, and I wonder if Jeanie had gone with her mother on some business connected with the estate; though if they had, it was not to a place anywhere in the UK - perhaps they had had to go to Ireland. Robert Jeanie's husband was staying with his father Thomas Gillison and his widowed sister Susan Hamilton at 3 Dryden Road West Derby, on census day.

In the months immediately after Thomas Nisbet's death - almost as if his going had released them to do so - Robert (in February) Agnes (in April) and Jeanie all joined the TS; though none of Robert and Jeanie's siblings ever did so, and nor did Jeanie's husband. At this point in the TS's history, all prospective members needed to have two sponsors who were members already, to support their application. The applications of Robert, Agnes and Jeanie suggest there was already an informal theosophy discussion group in Liverpool. In 1892 the members of this group would found the TS's Liverpool Lodge. In due course, most of them would also be initiated into the GD: John Hill; William Ranstead; Joseph K Gardner; J W S Callie; Mrs J M Stewart Walker; and Sophia Moffat from Edinburgh. Rowland Jevons was an important member of the group; he didn't join the GD but his sister Eliza did. Two people who joined the lodge after it had been founded also went into the GD: Robert Sandham, and Rev Thomas Appleton Duncan who was a Church of England vicar.

Jeanie was not quite so quick to join the TS. Perhaps she was more shaken by her father's death than Robert; and in the first few months after his death she may also have been spending a lot of time supporting her mother. She left it until September 1891. She was not quite so committed a member of Liverpool TS Lodge as her brother and sister-in-law either - though I don't mean that as a criticism of her; Robert and Agnes were exceptionally committed. Robert was Liverpool TS Lodge's first president and Agnes was the only woman member of its council in its first year (1892); though they persuaded Jeanie to join its council in 1893. As well as organising a series of public lectures at the YWCA in that first year, the lodge also had a discussion class on The Secret Doctrine - probably a continuation of what the lodge's original members had been doing before the lodge was officially founded. Also in 1892, Isabel de Steiger (née Lace) started coming to the meetings, back living in her home city after many decades of residence abroad and in London. See my life-by-dates biography of Isabel for more details of her long life in the occult, but here I'll just say that she brought with her to Liverpool TS Lodge the cachet of having met Blavatsky as early as the late 1870s; and having been a close friend of the woman you can think of as Blavatsky's opposite number in western esotericism, Dr Anna Bonus Kingsford. Isabel and Jeanie became friends.

By 1893, the lodge was looking for new, bigger rooms and in the meantime, its AGM was held at Robert and Agnes' house in Formby. The lodge members eventually decided to rent some rooms at 62 Dale Street in the centre of Liverpool, easy for all members to reach. Lodge meetings were held there every Thursday, with one member leading a discussion on a subject chosen beforehand. In 1893 Robert Nisbet took the lead on The Zodiac, Akasha and Astral Light and Karma; and Agnes took the lead on The Aryans. By the end of the year the meetings had moved to Crossley Buildings 18 South Castle Street and a new discussion group had begun, held on Sunday evenings to study The Key To Theosophy.

As if there was not enough change going on in their lives, and as if they were not busy enough already, it was during the first year of the Liverpool TS Lodge's existence that Robert and Agnes Nisbet were initiated into the GD - the western esoteric alternative to the TS. I haven't yet found out exactly how - through whom - the GD's members in Bradford and Liverpool were connected; though I imagine there was not one connection but several, through different people who knew each other through work or friendship, in these two great cities. In both cities the connection between the GD and the TS was very close, with nearly every member of one organisation also being a member of the other.

1893 was Liverpool TS Lodge's high point. They were able to attract as speakers at the meetings some enthusiastic theosophists from other lodges, Sidney Coryn and William Williams. Sidney Coryn was from south London where his family were very active TS members; his brother Herbert had been one of Blavatsky's inner circle. Sidney, Herbert and their sister-in-law Jessie Horne were all GD members. William Williams was a member of Bradford TS Lodge and the GD; he had come to give a talk on the Kabbalah, an important text for both groups.

In 1893, theosophy showed how far it had come in only a few years by being represented at the Parliament of Religions, which was held in Chicago as part of that year's World Fair. Robert Nisbet was one of the members of the council the TS set up to advise its representatives at the Parliament, though I don't think he actually went to Chicago in September 1893 to attend the Parliament; he's certainly not on the list of the people who gave speeches at it.

Jeanie - older than Agnes and probably with a more conservative outlook; perhaps more nervous of stepping that far outside the usual female role of listener - didn't lead any discussions at Liverpool TS Lodge meetings. She had also yet to be persuaded to join the GD although - perhaps under Isabel de Steiger's influence - she was broadening her reading. She became a subscriber to Borderland, the magazine founded by journalist W T Stead in 1893 after he had become (rather belatedly) a convert to spiritualism. It's hard to tell, though, how deeply Jeanie was involved in spiritualism and whether she was a medium or just an attender of seances: spiritualism was a rather informal thing; there was a British National Association of Spiritualists by the 1890s but in general, spiritualist groups were small and very locally based; and much spiritualism went on in people's living room with only the family involved. So there's a lack of records.

Maybe spiritualism didn't convince Jeanie in any case: the following year, she did join the GD, where spiritualists and the skills of spiritualist mediums were not particularly welcome. I'm going to speculate a bit, here, because I find it a bit odd Jeanie should give the GD and the publishers of Borderland an address of 14 Freehold Street Liverpool to send their post to. That was her mother's home, not her own; and it wasn't either of the addresses Jeanie gave to the TS. The TS knew of her as living at a house called Breffni in the suburb of Egerton Park Rock Ferry; and then at 5 Sandringham Drive, back on the city side of the river.

In addition, Jeanie chose not to be initiated into the GD at the Horus temple as her brother and sister-in-law had been; she opted instead for the London temple, Isis-Urania, and probably went to the initiation ritual from her sister Helen Price's house in Barnet. Perhaps she didn't have quite as many friends in Bradford as Robert and Agnes did; but in London she could trade on Isabel de Steiger's acquaintances in the Order, or even on Isabel herself as Isabel was still making frequent trips there. My speculation, however, is that Jeanie and her husband didn't agree about Jeanie's curiosity about other ways of seeing the universe and man's existence in it: Robert Gillison could just about take her interest in theosophy though he didn't have much use for it himself; but spiritualism, and the western magical tradition, were a couple of steps too far for him. GD member Florence Maitinski faced similar objections from her husband and William Wynn Westcott in particular was against allowing her to be initiated in the circumstances. However, Mrs Maitinski went ahead and was initiated. And if my speculation is right, so did Jeanie, but she took steps to make sure her husband wouldn't find out. I end this speculation with a bit of wild speculation: were Jeanie and Robert Gillison living apart when he died? One or two small bits of information make me wonder about that.

Robert and Agnes left Liverpool to live in France at the end of 1893, and Jeanie might have decided she wouldn't bother with the GD herself, if they weren't going to be around. However, the TS helped Jeanie make up her mind the other way, by all-but tearing itself apart over the direction it should take now that Blavatsky was dead. Helena Petrovna Blavatsky had died in May 1891, while the Nisbets and Jeanie were still coming to terms with Thomas Nisbet's death. Controversy over who should succeed her didn't break out at once, but by mid-1894 two candidates had emerged: Annie Besant, who had Colonel Olcott's blessing; and William Quan Judge, an American who had the support of the American lodges and was also president of the TS's European federation. The struggle that ensued was not even ended by the death of William Quan Judge in 1894. The result of it was a victory for Annie Besant and her supporters but at a terrible cost: the bitterness of the debate, between theosophists who were supposed to be trying to rise above worldly considerations, caused droves of TS members to resign or drift away; entire lodges closed down for lack of support, including Bradford Lodge; and the lodges in the USA declared themselves independent of the TS in London. World theosophy has not been united since.

Robert, Agnes and Jeanie will all have known Annie Besant as she often visited the north of England on lecture tours and had also been very active in the Parliament of Religions; though they probably didn't know William Quan Judge all that well. Unlike some members of the TS, including some of their friends, they chose not to get too involved in the battle for supremacy, which became very vitriolic and (in the end) humiliatingly public. And also unlike most people who were members of the TS as the argument began to rage, they did continue to be members of it. Liverpool TS Lodge managed to survive but the TS Membership Registers show clearly just how few new members were attracted to it in the years after 1893. But Robert and Agnes Nisbet, and Isabel de Steiger, all deserted it - they went to Paris, she moved to Edinburgh.

As the TS in England limped along, a public laughing-stock, Jeanie in Liverpool and Robert and Agnes in France pursued western esotericism more than theosophy in the late 1890s. The records of the GD's Ahathoor temple in Paris show that Robert and Agnes were two of its first members and in March 1894 Robert took over as its Cancellarius when his predecessor, Oswald Murray became ill and resigned.

It's just possible that Robert was sent to Paris by an employer needing an English accounts man in the Paris office. There were business contacts between Paris and Liverpool, and Liverpool had a French Chamber of Commerce, staffed by at least some French nationals. But I do feel that Robert and Agnes may have moved to Paris because Samuel Liddell Mathers was there; the Ahathoor temple was under his personal supervision. If that's the case, Robert might have arrived without a job. They took Dorothy and Kenneth, and will have needed to find a school for them. And a house or rooms to rent. And I bet neither of them could speak French well - though of course there's nothing like needing to earn some money, to help you learn.

Moving to Paris to be at what they considered to be the heart of the GD was a big commitment of faith and energy. In 1900, however, Robert and Agnes found their commitment being tested to its limit, by Mathers' behaviour; and in the end Robert in particular felt he had to choose between loyalty to the Order, and his friendship with Mathers. Mathers' behaviour was beginning to worry Robert very much indeed in the first few months of 1900 - so much so that he made a quick trip to London to discuss it with senior GD members there. He first went to talk it over with William Wynn Westcott. Westcott - a good record-keeper - later made some notes on what Robert had told him. Robert was concerned on a number of counts. Firstly, that Mathers should tell one person in London (Florence Farr) that the Order had been founded on faked documents; but then swear them to secrecy about it, and refuse to provide any proof. Secondly, that Mather's wife Mina (née Bergson) was either unable or unwilling to exercise any influence over her husband's increasingly bizarre decision-making. But mainly - and this was what had caused Robert to decide that a trip to London was necessary - because Mathers had been giving unprecedented privileges to a couple claiming to be long-serving occultists but who were not yet initiated into the GD. He had introduced them to the members of the Ahathoor temple as living proof that the GD's foundation documents were genuine after all. He had allowed them to be present at a GD ritual; and he had lent them manuscripts of GD rituals. The couple were the infamous Mr and Mrs Horos; and the borrowed manuscripts (never returned) were part of the evidence against them when they were prosecuted in London late in 1901.

Robert was a shrewd man; or he was a man who believed that the rules should be kept in all circumstances; or perhaps he was both. The rules of secrecy in an occult order are there for a good reason, after all. Robert had been sufficiently suspicious of Mr and Mrs Horos to ask Mathers whether he had been given any proof that the couple were the people Mathers claimed they were. Mathers had said he'd provide evidence later. When he didn't do so, Robert had tracked the couple to their hotel; to find that they'd left without paying their bill and the police were searching their rooms. With his fears confirmed, Robert had left Paris to warn the GD in London. After the meeting with Westcott he also saw Percy Bullock, to warn him as well; and to talk over the breach between Mathers and the GD's senior members in London, who were now running the GD on their own, with Percy as secretary. Thanks to Robert's prompt action, when the Horos couple arrived in London and attempted to edge their way into the GD there, the London members were ready for them. But damage had already been done to the Order which couldn't be wiped out merely by Percy Bullock sending the Horoses away; as was made very public 18 months later.

It's difficult to see how Robert could have remained a member of the Ahathoor temple after this; perhaps he no longer even wanted to be involved. I would suppose that Agnes was equally worried by what was going on. But he and Agnes do seem to have stayed in Paris. In 1902, they burned their boats with English theosophy and moved their membership to the TS in France; and the GD in England lost contact with them.

The last information I have on Robert, Agnes and their children is that change of TS membership from England to France. I've searched the web and my normal family history references, but I can't find any mention at all of any of them after that date. So whether they stayed in Paris or returned to Liverpool or moved on somewhere else, I really haven't a clue.

Very unsatisfactory. However, I can say what happened to Jeanie.

JEANIE IN LIVERPOOL

Jeanie, of course, was a married woman whose husband's job was based in Liverpool (here I am assuming that my wild speculation above is completely wrong): no going to Paris for more than a holiday, for her.

In 1895, Jeanie was still a committed member of the GD, working towards initiation into its 2nd Order. At the end of that year she was preparing to make what was perhaps a regular just-before-Christmas visit to her sister Helen Price for a week. She wrote to Westcott asking if he could put her in touch with Frederick Leigh Gardner, who at that time was in charge of the GD's study programme. Jeanie wanted to meet Gardner during her time in London and get some hints on how to tackle the exams she was about to take. I hope she got on with him when they met: Gardner's abrasive personality and his quickness to take offence had led to a lot of complaints, particularly from the GD's women.

At the very end of the 1890s, around the time Robert and Agnes moved to Paris, Liverpool TS Lodge started to show some signs of revival; and Isabel de Steiger returned to Liverpool from Scotland. During 1900 Jeanie and Isabel co-sponsored several new TS members. But then, on 11 January 1901, Robert Gillison died, aged only 57. On the day of the 1901 census, Jeanie seems to have told the census official that she had a job. This is one of the small items that make me wonder if she and her husband had separated; although it might mean that Jeanie had had to find a job - as far as I know, the first she had ever had - because Robert was too ill to work. Oh, and alas that I can't read what she did for a living, other than being a "superintendent" of something. There's so little evidence of any of the GD's women members working, and when I come across one piece of evidence, it's too splodgy to read what this woman was working at! Census day came only a few weeks after Robert Gillison's death. Jeanie was living with her mother Jane Nisbet at 14 Freehold Street, Fairfield - the address where the GD thought she had lived all along, and which the TS don't seem to have known about. Pooling their income, Jane and Jeanie were able to afford live-in general servant.

Jeanie's next three years were tough. Her mother, Jane Baird Nisbet, died in the spring of 1902, aged 78. In the spring of 1904, Jeanie's sister-in-law and good friend Margaret Armour died, followed in 1905 by another sister-in-law, Margaret Armour and Robert Gillison's sister Susan Hamilton. In the midst of all this death and mourning, the demise of the GD as originally constituted (in 1903), must have seemed irrelevant and there's no evidence that Jeanie joined either of its daughter orders. She did keep up her membership of the TS, though, at least until 1906 - she told them her new surname. And in the end, there was a happy sequel to the death of Margaret Armour, née Gillison. In the autumn of 1905 Jeanie married Margaret's widower, her brother-in-law Alexander Armour.

ALEXANDER ARMOUR

Jeanie's second husband came from the same circle as the first: that close group of Scottish-born people from dissenting communities who had gone to live in Liverpool. He ran his own company dealing in iron; and in 1871 had made a patent application in the UK for an "an ammoniacal gas engine" designed by Emile Lamin of New Orleans. However, Armour was more involved in the civic life of Liverpool than other person in that close Presbyterian group. This involvement seems to have been at its height in the 1880s: in the 1900s, in his mid-60s, he may have been scaling it back. Still, as his wife, Jeanie would have been invited to more formal social gatherings than she had been as the wife of Robert Gillison. Armour had been on the boards of Mount Pleasant School and the Liverpool Institute; as late as 1899 he was on the governing committee of Liverpool's public museum; he was a member of Liverpool Chamber of Commerce. He was also active in the organisation and management of Presbyterianism: one reference I found seemed to be indicating that he was a member of the Synod of the Presbyterian Church of England in 1883 though I wasn't able to follow it up to confirm it. And he was also a trustee of Lady Hewley's Charity, which handed out money to the right kind of dissenting minister and might have helped pay the salary of Rev Samuel Fletcher Williams.

Alexander Armour and Margaret Gillison had married in 1863 and had had the typically mid-Victorian large family, though two at least of their children had died young. On marrying Alexander Armour, Jeanie will have become step-mother and step-grandmother to a large number of people; though some of them may not have liked the speed at which their father had remarried - only 18 months or so after their mother's death. She may have had two of her new husband's children living with her and her new husband: Thomas and Robert Armour, both unmarried, were both still living at home on the day of the 1901 census and freebmd didn't have details of a marriage for either of them, between 1901 and 1910. Neither of them were involved in Alexander's business; they were both working as salesmen in the cotton industry.

JEANIE ALONE

Jeanie and Alexander Armour had two years of marriage before Alexander died, in the autumn of 1907, aged 72. His household was broken up and Jeanie didn't take either Thomas or Robert with her. By 1911 census she had moved into 12 Gambier Terrace, Hope Street Liverpool. On census day, Jeanie was in mourning again: her sister Elizabeth Baird Flett had died the previous summer.

11-12 Gambier Terrace was two houses run together as a boarding house by Mary Scott Simpson. It was very big but possibly uncomfortably crowded nevertheless - 13 lodgers lived there, as well as Mrs Simpson and her servants. The lodgers were a varied bunch though there were no families: men, young women, widows. Most of the widows, including Jeanie, described themselves as having private financial resources - pensions, share dividends etc. Most of the men were working - a physician/surgeon, a dentist, a businessman dealing in goods from Africa. All except one were born in the UK; though most had not been born in Liverpool. Gambier Terrace was one of the older parts of Liverpool, built in the early 19th-century on a scarp above where the Anglican cathedral is now. It was handy for central Liverpool while being above the worst of the pollution. Jeanie seems to have liked it: she was still living there when she died.

Isabel de Steiger will have known Gambier Terrace very well: the house at the north end of the row had been her childhood home. Both women gave up being members of the TS in the 1900s. Jeanie paid her last subscription in 1906 and Isabel finally despaired of it when Annie Besant was elected its president for life in 1908. Isabel moved around a lot in the early years of the 20th century but she also in Tranmere from 1911 to 1914; and finally moved to Rock Ferry in early 1917 and didn't leave the Liverpool area again. So perhaps the two women were able to keep up their friendship.

Jeanie died, at 11-12 Gambier Terrace, on 22 February 1920.

BASIC SOURCES I USED for all Golden Dawn members.

Membership of the Golden Dawn: The Golden Dawn Companion by R A Gilbert. Northampton: The Aquarian Press 1986. Between pages 125 and 175, Gilbert lists the names, initiation dates and addresses of all those people who became members of the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn or its many daughter Orders between 1888 and 1914. The list is based on the Golden Dawn's administrative records and its Members' Roll - the large piece of parchment on which all new members signed their name at their initiation. All this information had been inherited by Gilbert but it's now in the Freemasons' Library at the United Grand Lodge of England building on Great Queen Street Covent Garden. Please note, though, that the records of the Amen-Ra Temple in Edinburgh were destroyed in 1900/01. I have recently (July 2014) discovered that some records of the Horus Temple at Bradford have survived, though most have not; however those that have survived are not yet accessible to the public.

For the history of the GD during the 1890s I usually use Ellic Howe's The Magicians of the Golden Dawn: A Documentary History of a Magical Order 1887-1923. Published Routledge and Kegan Paul 1972. Foreword by Gerald Yorke. Howe is a historian of printing rather than of magic; he also makes no claims to be a magician himself, or even an occultist. He has no axe to grind.

Family history: freebmd; ancestry.co.uk (census and probate); findmypast.co.uk; familysearch; Burke's Peerage and Baronetage; Burke's Landed Gentry; Armorial Families; thepeerage.com; and a wide variety of family trees on the web.

Famous-people sources: mostly about men, of course, but very useful even for the female members of GD. Oxford Dictionary of National Biography. Who Was Who. Times Digital Archive.

Useful source for business and legal information: London Gazette and its Scottish counterpart Edinburgh Gazette. Now easy to find (with the right search information) on the web.

Catalogues: British Library; Freemasons' Library.

Wikipedia; Google; Google Books - my three best resources. I also used other web pages, but with some caution, as - from the historian's point of view - they vary in quality a great deal.

SOURCES FOR ROBERT, JEAN AND AGNES

HELENA PETROVNA BLAVATSKY

Plenty about her on the web, of course. See blavatskyarchives.com for the important dates in her life - those that can be ascertained, that is.

Isis Unveiled: A Master-Key to the Mysteries of Ancient and Modern Science and Theology. I looked at the edition published in 1972 by the Theosophical Publishing House. On its p1 it gives the publication details of the first edition of 1000 copies: New York: J W Bouton September 1877.

The Secret Doctrine: the Synthesis of Science, Religion and Philosophy Two volumes were published in London by the Theosophical Publishing Co, 1888. A third volume, supposedly compiled from papers Blavatsky was working on at her death, was published in 1897 and was controversial even at the time.

ROBERT, AGNES AND JEANIE IN THE THEOSOPHICAL SOCIETY

Theosophical Society Membership Register volume for January 1889-September 1891 p204 for Robert. Sponsors: John Hill, W Gardner. And p214 for Agnes. Sponsors: Robert Nisbet and John Hill. P256 for Jeanie. Sponsors: Robert Nisbet and I A Duncan. This volume also has plenty of evidence of Robert sponsoring other people's applications for membership. The subsequent volumes show Robert and Jeanie sponsoring people; but not Agnes: Membership Register for September 1891-January 1893; Membership Register for June 1893-March 1895 - though the numbers of sponsorships is very low in this one. Robert does not sponsor anyone in any subsequent volume. Jeanie appears sponsoring 3 new members in the Membership Register for March 1895-June 1898; and 8 in Membership Register June 1898-February 1901, all but one with Isabel de Steiger as a co-sponsor.

The Theosophical Congress held by the TS at the Parliament of Religions. World's Fair 1893 Chicago Illinois September 15-17 [1893]. Report of Proceedings and Documents. Published TS American Section headquarters, 144 Madison Avenue New York 1893: p10.

LIVERPOOL TS LODGE

Lucifer was the TS in London's official magazine: edited during the 1890s by Annie Besant and then by Annie Besant and G R S Mead; and published by the Theosophical Publishing Society of 7 Duke Street Adelphi London WC.

Lucifer: A Theosophical Magazine Volume X March-August 1892. Volume X number 56 issue of 15 April 1892 p166. Volume X number 58 issue of 15 June 1892 p340.

Lucifer: A Theosophical Magazine Volume XI September 1892 to February 1893. Volume XI number 66 issued 15 February 1893 p517-18.

Lucifer: A Theosophical Magazine Volume XII March-August 1893. Volume XII number 67 issued 15 March 1893 p78. Volume XII number 69 issued 15 May 1893 p253.

Lucifer: A Theosophical Magazine Volume XIII September 1893 to February 1894. Volume XIII number 73 issued 15 September 1893 p71.

There was virtually no coverage of local lodge news in subsequent editions.

JEANIE AND SPIRITUALISM

Via the web to Borderland Quarterly Rvw vol 1 1893 p286 a list of subscribers incls Jean Brash Gillison of 14 Freehold Street Fairfield.

Borderland: Telepathy, Clairvoyance, Crystal-Gazing, Hypnotism, Automatic Writing; Quarterly Review and Index. Published London 1893-97: Horace Marshall. Editor W T Stead.

IN THE GOLDEN DAWN

The Kabbalah Unveiled:

See wikipedia on Christian Knorr von Rosenroth, who published volumes called Kabbala Denudata: in 1677-78 and in 1684.

Samuel Liddell Mathers' translation was of two only of those volumes. The Kabbalah Unveiled published 1887 and still in print. The first edition may have been a small one though; and no one thought to send any of the copies to the British Museum so the British Library still doesn't have one.

Robert and Agnes in the Ahathoor temple:

The Golden Dawn Companion by R A Gilbert. Northampton: The Aquarian Press 1986: p39.

Warburg Institute. Gerald Yorke Collection catalogue number NS73. Letter from William Wynn Westcott to Gardner, writing on behalf of Mrs Gillison. Dated only 7 December; the year of 1895 seems most likely to me.

Westcott's two-page account of his meeting with Robert Nisbet is at the Freemasons' Library, their catalogue number: GD 2/4/4/3. It's not signed but a handwritten note identifies the handwriting as Westcott's. It's dated 15 June 1900.

TRIAL OF FRANK DUTTON AND LAURA JACKSON alias Mr and Mme Horos.

Robert Nisbet was quite right to be worried about the Horoses; though even in his worst moments I can't imagine that he guessed what the outcome of their short period observing GD rituals in Paris would be. The Horoses used the rituals Mathers had so unwisely lent them to set up a little Order of their own in Regent's Park north London. Several young women were lured in. GD-style rituals were used to frighten them into staying, and swear them to secrecy; but eventually one ran away and went to the police. The trial of Dutton and Jackson received massive newspaper publicity. The reports in the Times are very thorough, with exhaustive coverage even of the series of committal hearings at Marylebone Police Court:

Times Friday 11 October 1901 p10: Extraordinary Charge of Conspiracy. The charges against Mr and Mrs Horos at this stage were conspiracy to cheat and defraud a particular young woman of jewellery etc.

Times Friday 18 October 1901 p7 had the first indications that the police were investigating more serious allegations.

Times Monday 18 November 1901 p22 with more charges including some under the Criminal Law Amendment Act.

Times 22 November 1901 p13 it was not until this hearing that the couple's real names were known. This is also the hearing in which the Order of the Golden Dawn was named in court; and its leader was mentioned by name as well: "Mr McGregor Mathers". Although the court was assured that the GD was a very respectable organisation; and the impression was given by the evidence that it existed only in Paris; members of the GD in the UK were aghast; and the GD's name was changed.

All through the committal hearings the couple had been remanded in custody. Eventually the police court sent them to the Old Bailey for trial. It was not until they appeared there that the seriousness of the charges against them became public. Dutton and Jackson could not afford a barrister and conducted their own defence.

Times Thursday 19 December 1901 p4 Dutton was charged with the rape of Daisy Pollex Adams; and Jackson with aiding and abetting that rape. The original charge of conspiracy to defraud was now one of three other, somewhat less serious charges concerning young women who were part of the Horos couple's supposed esoteric Order.

Coverage of the trial continued in the Times made it very clear to what use the Horoses had put the GD's rituals. The last day of the trial was reported in Times Saturday 21 December 1901 p14, with the GD mentioned by name again. On the trial's last day, the defence case was concluded; the judge summed up; and the jury took all of 5 minutes to find both of them guilty. They were both sentenced to prison with penal servitude: Dutton got 15 years; Jackson 7.

THE GILLISON FAMILY

The Liverpool Commercial List published Seyd and Co 1883. Entry number 1113.

Proceedings of the Institution of Mechanical Engineers (GB), published by the Institution 1898 pxx Institution member Richard Chubb gives Gillison and Chadwick's offices as his address.

Gillison and Chadwick and their ships named 'drum...':

At collections.rmg.co.uk, the Maritime Museum at Greenwich has a builders' model which formed basis for three ships built 1883 on the Clyde by Russell and Co, for Gillison and Chadwick: Drumblair; Drumburton; and Drumeltan. All three were subsequently wrecked on journeys across Pacific: Drumeltan in 1894; Drumburton in 1904; and Drumblair after a collision in 1915.

The Last of the Windjammers volume 1 by Basil Lubbock. Published Brown Son and Ferguson 1927 p256.

There is plenty of coverage of the some of the line's ships on the web - the ones that were wrecked! In order to minimise the financial damage to them as partners in the business, James Gillison and Joseph Chadwick created a limited company for each ship's voyage. In the event of a wreck, Gillison and Chadwick then acted as liquidators of the company. Two examples:

London Gazette 5 August 1892 p4452 notice issued 29 July 1892 by James Gillison and Joseph Chadwick acting as liquidators of the steamship company Drumburly Co Ltd.

And London Gazette 3 April 1900 p2230, liquidators under the Companies' Acts 1862-1890 this time of the Steamship Drumelzier Co Ltd. Notice issued 30 March 1900.

See www.plimsoll.org for Wreck Reports after investigations by the Board of Trade under the Merchant Shipping Act 1894 which ordered that after any wreck, an investigation into the circumstances must be held. For example: the investigation held 1-3 February 1898 into what happened to SS Drummond, owned by the Steamship Drummond Co Ltd of 10 Tower Buildings North, Liverpool. SS Drummond had left Maryport for Bahia Blanca on 24 December 1897 loaded with steel rails and coal. In hurricane conditions off Portugal, her cargo had shifted and the rudder had come off. The crew had been taken off by the steamer Melita Bohlen. Another ship towed the Drummond into Lisbon on 2 January 1898.

James Gillison married Mary Jane Affleck in 1869. Their sons Thomas and James went into the business as well in due course though they did not take it over when their father retired.

James Gillison retired in 1903: London Gazette 21 August 1903 p5298 list of Partnerships Dissolved included that of James Gillison and Joseph Chadwick who had traded as Gillison and Chadwick, steamship owners and insurance brokers; from 10 Tower Buildings North, Liverpool. Joseph Chadwick would be carrying on the business in partnership with Robert Barton Chadwick, as Chadwick and Son.

James Gillison died in 1910.

THE GILLISONS are one of several of the families mentioned in this biography who bought plots in Toxteth Park Cemetery. Via www.medialinkuk.co.uk to details of grave inscriptions in Toxteth Park Cemetery. Grave reference H 17 has buried in it:

- Jane Currie (died 1877) wife of Thomas Gillison (died 1892)
- their 2nd son Robert (Jeanie's husband) who died 11 January 1901 aged 57
- their daughter Susan (died 1905) widow of J W Hamilton.

The gravestone is also a memorial to Jane and Thomas' youngest son William Gillison, master of the barque British Sovereign; missing 2 May 1881, presumed drowned.

At www.theshipslister.com a few details on William Gillison's ship, the British Sovereign.

ROBERT GILLISON IN THE TEA BUSINESS

Background information at www.tea.co.uk/east-india-company-UK the website of the UK Tea and Infusions Association.

Website www.ebsgroup.co.uk is the home of the Billington Group previously known as Edward Billington and Son Ltd.

Webpages at www.liv.ac.uk/library which holds the papers of the various firms run by the Rathbones. The pages have a good introduction to the manuscripts and the Rathbone family businesses.

A Green and Company's Directory for Liverpool and Birkenhead issue of 1870.

The Commercial Directory of Liverpool and Shipping Guide issue of 1871.

AGNES WILLIAMS

Her father Samuel Fletcher Williams:

As a clerk in an auctioneer's office:

The Law Times Reports volume 9 p831 Clarke v Fuller, heard at Shrewsbury County Court.

Rev Williams is described in the sources I found as a Unitarian; though after further investigation, I'm more confused about that than I was before I started:

For what Unitarians believe see the website www.unitarian.org: At www.liverpoolhistorysociety.org.uk/liverpool-unitarians-faith-and-action some names of notable Liverpool Unitarians.

At www.rathbones.com, William Rathbone IV, anti-slavery campaigner, was both Quaker and Unitarian.

At www.libraryofbirmingham.com a series of carte de visite portraits include one of the Rev Samuel Fletcher Williams (1842-1901).

Bethlehem Chapel:

The Methodist Unitarian Movement by Herbert McLachlan. Manchester University Press and London: Longmans Green and Co 1919: p68 has Bethlehem Chapel Newchurch as methodist-unitarian.

At discovery.nationalarchives.gov.uk - marriage registers from after Rev Williams' time there are now in Lancashire Archives. The chapel's full address was Newchurch-in-Rossendale, which is near Rochdale.

Hamilton Road Chapel: The History of the County Palatine and Duchy of Lancaster volume 5 1893 p160 includes it in a list of United Methodist Free Churches. Built 1809 in Hamilton Road Everton.

Amos: the Rev Amos B Matthews, Victorian Methodist Traveller by John Matthews; published 1992 by the Self-Publishing Association, with John Matthews: p122.

United Methodist Free Churches Magazine issue of 1882
p424.<http://www.libraryofbirmingham.com>

Via www.unitarians.org.uk to a book Record of Ministers in Lancashire and Cheshire Until 1896 compiled by George Eyre Evans and published Manchester 1896: p88, pp142-43 which covers Rev Williams moves once he left Liverpool: New Hall Hill Birmingham: April 1884 to December 1889. Then Scarborough Unitarian church January 1889 to September 1893. Then Hackney Unitarian church: October 1893 and he was still in post there when the book was compiled.

Elsewhere at www.ukunitarians.org.uk Rev Samuel Williams' later went to work in Calcutta, but his health broke down and he had to return to the UK.

Obituaries:

Bye-gones Relating to Wales and the Border Counties issue of 1901 p238 an obituary, which mentions his work as a newspaper reporter.

Probate Registry: Rev Samuel Fletcher Williams died in Brighton on 19 November 1901. None of his family were named as executors.

Mary Emma Williams: at www.lan-opc.org.uk, a list of marriages at St Peter's Formby includes 10 May 1888: Mary Emma Williams to Howard Prime Bowen, jewellery manufacturer of St Michael's Handsworth Birmingham. Howard is the son of George Bowen, electroplate manufacturer. LDS film 1849657.

ROBERT AND JEANIE'S PARENTS

Familysearch Scotland-ODM GS film number 0102929: marriage of Thomas Nisbet to Jane (sic) Brash took place 28 January 1847 in Glasgow. Slightly different information is given at Familysearch Scotland-ODM GS film number 1041057: marriage of Thomas Nisbet to Jane Baird Brash on 23 January 1847 at Eastwood, Renfrew.

I couldn't see a baptism record for Jeanie and the only one of her siblings that I found was Helen. Familysearch Scotland-ODM GS film number 1042982: baptism of Helen McKean Nisbet, on 1 July 1849 in the Gorbals; daughter of Thomas and Jane.

Robert Baird Brash Nisbet was born in England and so appears in freebmd: July-September quarter 1857.

THOMAS GILLISON'S SCOTTISH CONNECTIONS

Transactions of the Highland and Agricultural Society of Scotland, issue of 1866, on a members' list: Thomas Gillison of 3 Dryden Road Liverpool, admitted as a member 1862.

ROBERT GILBERT FLETT

Familysearch had the baptism of Robert Gilbert Flett in 1836; son of John Flett and his wife Margaret née Tait.

Via archive.org to Harvard University's History of the Dialectic Society privately printed; undated but the Note at the beginning is dated Edinburgh University 1887. In the list of members p317 Rev Robert Gilbert Flett, a Presbyterian minister, joined 1858.

At www.toxtethparkcemeteryinscriptions.co.uk the Flett family plot is H 22 FLETT (G.N. 319). The grave contains: Rev R G Flett who died January 1919

Elizabeth Baird Flett (Jeanie's sister) who died in 1910

And three of their children, who died as infants.

ALEXANDER ARMOUR

London Gazette issue of 6 March 1874 p1540 in a page of patent applications, application number 517, dated 2 February 1871.

Via genesreunited to issues of the Liverpool Mercury:

Liverpool Mercury 10 November 1885 re Mt Pleasant School.

Liverpool Mercury 21 December 1887 and 20 June 1894 as a member of Liverpool Chamber of Commerce.

Liverpool Mercury 24 May 1888 re Liverpool Library.

Liverpool Mercury 23 December 1890 at a dinner for old boys of the Liverpool Institute.

Via google to Annual Report of...The Free Public Museums published by Liverpool Museum 1899 p2, p42 and p44.

The Congregational Year-Book for 1901 p117 re Lady Hewley's Charity. The address for applications to its trustees is c/o Alexander Armour at Cereal Court A, Brunswick St Lpl.

At www.medialinkuk.co.uk is the page Toxteth Park Cemetery Inscriptions. Cemetery plot I19 (G.N. 363) is that of the Armour family. In the grave are:

- Margaret Armour died 20 May 1904; aged 66
- Alexander Armour died 15 November 1907; aged 72 and two of their child: Alexander Dow Armour died 1869 aged 6mths; and Annie Armour died 1889 aged 8.

HELEN MCKEAN NISBET

Helen married Charles Thomas Price in 1873 and they had eight children. Price was a Londoner but he ran a hardware and ironmongery business which had Liverpool connections - perhaps he was a customer of Alexander Armour. Once married, he and Helen always lived in north London, starting out in Finsbury. In the 1890s they lived in the pleasantly green suburb of New Barnet, at Lytton Villa, Lytton Road. This house was where Jeanie was probably staying when she had her GD initiation; and where she was going to be visiting just before being initiated into the 2nd Order. By 1901, however, the Prices had moved back into London and were living at 39 Leigh Road, a couple of minutes' walk from where I'm typing this. By this time, their son Charles was working in the family business. The Prices lived in Leigh Road until Charles Price died in 1915. Helen then moved back out of town, and died in 1927 at Glenlea, Woodville Road New Barnet. Jeanie Armour left no Will when she died in 1920; Helen took charge of the Letters of Administration process. She never joined either the TS or the GD.

24 July 2016

mailto:Amandragora@attglobal.net

Email me at AMandragora@attglobal.net

Find the web pages of Roger Wright and Sally Davis, including my list of people initiated into the Order of the Golden Dawn between 1888 and 1901, at:

www.wrightanddavis.co.uk

***

Richard Joseph NUNN was initiated into the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn at its Isis-Urania temple in October 1889, taking the Latin motto 'Fortiter in re'. At his initiation his address was York Street, Savannah, Georgia USA and he wasn't an active member of the GD.

THE NUNN FAMILY OF WEXFORD

Richard Joseph Nunn appears on several US censuses; always as someone born in Wexford in Ireland. A variety of genealogical sources show men called Nunn as prominent in the county from the 17th century. One family in particular, the Nunns of St Margaret's Wexford, can be traced from 1675 to the mid-19th century. Perhaps Richard Joseph was a member of that family. I can't be more precise, however, as I haven't found any birth information about him other than what appears in those US censuses; and in his obituaries.

NUNN AS A DOCTOR

Richard Nunn was born in Wexford in December 1831. In his late teens he began to train as a doctor, spending time learning in both London and Dublin. Half-way through the process, he emigrated to Georgia USA. He finished his training at Savannah Medical College, graduating in 1854 and settling down to general practice in the city.

Richard Nunn spent almost all the rest of his life in Savannah, and came to identify strongly with his new home. During the US Civil War he served with Confederate Army in the Oglethorpe Siege Artillery, rising to the rank of captain before his health broke down and he had to quit active service. He returned to Savannah and judged himself well enough to continue his GP practice, but he had periods of ill-health, when he could not work, throughout the rest of his life.

He had gone abroad in search of better health in 1875 and was travelling in Europe when news reached him in the summer of 1876 of an outbreak of yellow fever in Savannah following very severe rains. He returned home to help with this very serious epidemic, which continued into the autumn. As the number of cases mounted, one doctor recorded that he was having to make 100 house-calls each day. Several of the medical volunteers caught the disease from their patients and died, but Richard Nunn was lucky, and survived.

By the end of the century Richard Nunn had been a physician for over 40 years. However, he was not resting on his laurels and was keen to try a few new ideas in his treatment of some patients. He joined American Electro-therapeutic Association - he may even have been one of its founders - and at its 1906 annual meeting he took part in the discussion which followed the reading of one of the papers. He described his use of two new techniques: cataphoresis - the use of electricity to force medicinal substances through living tissue; and the Roentgen (or Röntgen) Ray - an early form of radio-therapy using X-rays. He served as the Association's treasurer from 1903 to 1907 but I think that around that time, his health began to fail again, this time permanently. He died in June 1910 after a year of severe illness, and is buried in Savannah's Bonaventure Cemetery.

NUNN'S HOME LIFE

Richard Nunn appears on the 1880 US Census as a married man. This might be a mistake, though, as in all the census information I could find, he is never shown as living with a family; and the Will he made is not the Will of a man with a wife or children to provide for. The Will set up a Trust Fund to make donations to a list of Savannah charities, including a freemasons' lodge, a girls' orphanage and the YWCA.

FREEMASONRY

Richard Nunn was an active freemason within the state of Georgia. By 1889 he was a member of 15 lodges and three chapters and had served his year as the lodge's most senior officer in all of them - an extraordinary level of commitment.

Nunn was one of the prime movers in bringing the Scottish Rite to Georgia. He helped to explain how it worked to his fellow freemasons in 1882, did a great deal to popularise it in the state over the next few years, and in 1888 he was elected the state's Sovereign Grand Inspector General. The first lodge to use the Scottish Rite in Georgia was its Alpha Lodge of Perfection, whose charter is dated 17 October 1888. I can't prove that Richard Nunn was a member of that lodge but given his importance, surely he must have been.

This paragraph on the Scottish Rite is one I've also used in my biography of Alpheus Butts Simmons, trying to explain why the Scottish Rite held such a fascination for English freemasons in the late 19th century. It's my paraphrase of the detailed wikipedia page on the subject. Influential books in the 18th and 19th centuries had claimed that Charles II, James II and James II's son the Old Pretender had all been initiated into the Rite in their exiles. There's no historical evidence for the claims, but they gave the Rite a romantic and dramatic aura; and as the centuries passed, the Catholicism of the Stuarts, and (in Great Britain at least) the treasonable political leanings of those who succumbed to their glamour, faded away. Such historical evidence as there is shows the Rite starting out in mid-18th century France before travelling via the West Indies and New Orleans to the southern states of America. It was codified at a conference held in May 1801 in Charleston, South Carolina, when the 33 degrees of which it currently consists were established, and a hierarchy set up to rule the lodges who used it. The Rite thus constituted then travelled back across the Atlantic and into Europe. Though the Rite has never been recognised by English freemasonry's governing body, the United Grand Lodge of England, individual members of English lodges are allowed to get involved with lodges that use the Rite, if they choose.

NUNN AND THE GD

It was Richard Nunn's involvement in freemasonry which led him to being offered initiation as a member of the GD and I do think that the fact that he knew a great deal about the Scottish Rite was a decisive factor. In the autumn of 1889 Nunn made a trip to England, and as freemasons do (it's part of what being a freemason is for) he came armed with introductions to freemasons here, and attended a number of lodge meetings. One of Nunn's introductions was probably to William Wynn Westcott, a founder of the GD and member of many freemasons' organisations. It was an accepted thing in freemasonry to compliment senior freemasons, and gain their good will, by initiating them into your lodge. I think that's what happened with Richard Nunn and the GD: both sides of the deal probably understood it as a nominal membership only, and Nunn may never have attended another meeting after his GD initiation.

It was almost certainly Westcott who arranged for Richard Nunn to become a corresponding member of Quatuor Coronati lodge, number 2076: Nunn was present at its November 1889 meeting. As a corresponding member, Nunn wouldn't have been expected to be able to go to lodge meetings; he would also have no right to take any part in the election of lodge officers. However, he would receive copies of the lodge's journal. Quatuor Coronati lodge had been founded in the mid-1880s, with the intention of providing a forum for freemasons interested in the history and symbolism of the Craft. The members of Quatuor Coronati were delighted, I should imagine, to have at one meeting someone who knew so much about the Scottish Rite. Nunn, too, will have been pleased at being put in touch with so many freemasons who were interested in the history of the modern rituals: one of Nunn's obituaries mentions that he published several works on freemasonry, although I've only been able to find one book myself.

Richard Nunn was also a very senior member of the Georgia Knights Templar, an order within freemasonry which claimed to be based on rituals passed down in secret from the medieval Knights Templar military order. The GD's A E Waite saw the contemporary Knights Templar as bringing together medieval chivalry and an active Christian commitment and perhaps Richard Nunn also saw the Order in that way. Nunn didn't live quite long enough to be present at the first annual conclave of the Georgia Knights Templar - it took place in the year of his death. However, before that time he had served as a Grand Commander of the Order in Georgia. William Wynn Westcott was of course a member of the Knights Templar in England.

NUNN AND BORDERLAND

Nunn may not have come to England all that often but at least during the 1890s he kept in touch with people here. In January 1895 he appeared in a list of people who were regular readers of W T Stead's magazine Borderland, a kind of news digest of developments in the occult. People on that list may have been more than mere subscribers to the magazine: they were called members of "Our Circles". They were listed by country or county, and though some were denoted only by a number, others had allowed their names and addresses to be given, so that other circle members could get in touch and perhaps arrange to meet. William Wynn Westcott was also on the list - perhaps he had told Richard Nunn about the new magazine. Borderland was not a financial success; it was published between 1893 and 1897 before being forced to close down. There were other British-based occult magazines to try, though - the spiritualist magazine Light, for example; perhaps Richard Nunn was able to read those.

RICHARD JOSEPH NUNN and ALPHEUS BUTTS SIMMONS

I'm pretty sure that it was his connection with Richard Nunn that led to Alpheus Butts Simmons being initiated into the GD in 1894, probably during exactly that kind of trip to England that Nunn had made in 1889. Although Nunn was a generation older than Simmons (Simmons was born in 1864) they were united both by their profession and by their involvement in freemasonry. Like Richard Nunn, Alpheus Butts Simmons was a medical practitioner working in Savannah Georgia; and like Nunn, Simmons was a member of the American Electro-therapeutic Association so they were both using that kind of new technique. On the freemasonry side they had a lot in common. Though I can't prove it, I believe that one of the 15 lodges that Nunn was a member of was the Zerubbabel Lodge of Savannah; it was one of the organisations he wanted to benefit from the trust fund he set up in his Will. Simmons was also a member of the Savannah-based lodge Zerubbabel Lodge number 15 and served as its Worshipful Master twice. Simmons was definitely in Georgia's Scottish Rite lodge, the Alpha Lodge of Perfection, which I'm sure Nunn was a member of as well. Those are close links between the two men, but there's more to link them: Simmons was also a member of the Georgia Knights Templar, and it occurs to me that perhaps Simmons might even have been a kind of freemason protégé of Nunn's. Certainly, when Simmons was preparing for his 1894 visit to England, Nunn was happy to supply letters of introduction to the people he himself had met there a few years before.

BASIC SOURCES I USED for all Golden Dawn members:

Membership of the Golden Dawn: The Golden Dawn Companion by R A Gilbert. Northampton: The Aquarian Press 1986. Between pages 125 and 175, Gilbert lists the names, initiation dates and addresses of all those people who became members of the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn or its many daughter Orders between 1888 and 1914. The list is based on the Golden Dawn's administrative records and its Members' Roll - the large piece of parchment on which all new members signed their name at their initiation. All this information had been inherited by Gilbert but it's now in the Freemasons' Library at the United Grand Lodge of England building on Great Queen Street Covent Garden.

Family history: freebmd; ancestry.co.uk (census and probate); findmypast.co.uk; familysearch; Burke's Peerage and Baronetage; Burke's Landed Gentry; Armorial Families; thepeerage.com; and a variety of one-family genealogy websites.

Famous-people sources: mostly about men, of course, but very useful even for the female members of GD. Oxford Dictionary of National Biography. Who Was Who. Times Digital Archive.

Catalogues: British Library; Freemasons' Library.

Wikipedia; Google; Google Books - my three best resources. I also used other web pages, but with some caution, as - from the historian's point of view - they vary in quality a great deal.

SOURCES FOR RICHARD JOSEPH NUNN

THERE'S A SHORT PROFILE OF HIM AT ghs.galileo.usg.edu, the web page of the Georgia Historical Society. The web page also gives details of Nunn's WILL AND TRUST FUND - the Society still holds Nunn's papers though the Trust Fund was wound up in the 1970s. The money held in the trust fund was to be distributed as a regular income to these local organisations:

- Zerubbabel Lodge no 15
- the Board of Trustees of the Ancient and Accepted Rite
- the YWCA
- Savannah Female Orphan Asylum

- Society of the Cincinatti in the State of Georgia.

THE NUNN FAMILY OF WEXFORD

Burke's The General Armory of England, Scotland, Ireland and Wales: people called Nunn and living in Wexford in the 17th century, seen via google.

Wikipedia: list of high sheriffs of Wexford.

Alumni Cantabrigiensis has Edward Westby Nunn of St Margaret's Wexford in it. He's also in wikipedia's list of high sheriffs and looks about the right age (born 1819) to be an older brother of Richard Joseph Nunn, or perhaps a cousin.

NUNN ON THE US CENSUS in GEORGIA. All seen at Familysearch.

1860 GS film number 803115.

1880 GS film number 1254138.

1910 GS film number 1374191.

NUNN AS A DOCTOR

A detailed account of the 1876 yellow fever outbreak in Savannah, based on contemporary issues of the Savannah Morning News: see www.kristinekstevens.com/2012/01/yellow-fever-epidemic-savannah-1876.

Via www.sciencemag.org/content/18/459/508.full.pdf to Science magazine, New Series volume XVIII number 459 1903. A report on the annual meeting of the American Electro-Therapeutic Assoc, held at Atlantic City New Jersey from 22 to 24 September 1903.

Transactions of the American Electro-therapeutic Association 1906 p5, p118.

Transactions of the American Electro-therapeutic Assoc 1907 p5. This was the last volume I was able to see on the web.

SOME DEATH NOTICES/OBITUARIES. None of them are very long and one gets his age at death wrong.

Journal of the American Medical Association 1910 volume 55 number 1 p235.

Proceedings of the American Institute of Electrical Engineers volume 29 numbers 7-12 1911 p1432.

Pharmacology magazine volume LV number 3 1910 p235.

Charlotte Medical Journal volume 62 July-December 1910 p9.

BURIAL: records originally from www.findagrave.com: but seen at Familysearch: record ID 61889045.

FREEMASONRY

Nunn was such an important figure in freemasonry in the state of Georgia that he has a lodge named after him.

Photo of him via www.atmaslib.org, the Atlanta Masonic Library and Museum.

And also see his Will.

The New Age Magazine issued by the Ancient and Accepted Scottish Rite of Freemasonry and published by its southern USA jurisdiction: volume 61 1953 p22.

Via Google to www.gascottishrite.org/SavSR/html/history.html

QUATUOR CORONATI 2076

Ars Quatuor Coronati 2076 Volume II 1889 unnumbered pages at end of the volume listing current full and corresponding members: [p17] as corresponding member number 510 and as a member of 15 lodges and three chapters.

THE ONE PUBLICATION I'VE BEEN ABLE TO FIND (September 2015): At www.biblio.com the 2nd-hand bookshop, two copies of Nunn's The Building of a Rite privately printed in Savannah 1899.

AND FREEMASONRY'S OFFSHOOT THE KNIGHTS TEMPLAR

General information:

The Secret Tradition in Freemasonry by A E Waite. London: Rider and Co 1937: pp305-310; p311; p321.

A E Waite: Selected Masonic Papers edited and with an introduction by Edward Dunning. Wellingborough: Thorson Publishing Group's Aquarian Press 1988: p73, p97.

Proceedings of the Knights Templar (Masonic Order) Grand Commandery of Michigan issued 1911: p121, p125.

BORDERLAND

Borderland: A Quarterly Review and Index volume 2 1895. Editor W T Stead. Editorial office: Mowbray House Norfolk St London WC; publishing office 125 Fleet Street. Volume 2 number 7, issued January 1895 has the list: pp88-92.

SEE ALSO MY BIOGRAPHY OF ALPHEUS BUTTS SIMMONS

21 September 2015

Email me at

Find the web pages of Roger Wright and Sally Davis, including my list of people initiated into the Order of the Golden Dawn between 1888 and 1901, at:

www.wrightanddavis.co.uk

***

Joseph O'REILLY who was initiated into the Golden Dawn in January 1892 and chose the Latin motto 'Meus agitat molem'. He was initiated in London, but can only have been on a visit there, because he gave 61 Upper Grangegorman, Dublin as his address for GD correspondence.

Anyone attempting to trace their ancestors in Ireland will know how difficult that is: so many census and other records were destroyed in the 1920s. WHO DID HE KNOW IN THE GOLDEN DAWN was actually easier to discover than details of Joseph's family history and employment, if any, because he had joined the Theosophical Society (TS), in Ireland, in 1891. One of the TS members who sponsored Joseph's application was George W Russell. Russell wrote regularly for the theosophical journals and also published poetry, all under the initials 'AE'. Russell was active in the burgeoning Celtic revival in Dublin, and so if you knew 'AE' you were also likely to know W B Yeats; though no one called Joseph O'Reilly appears in W B Yeats' letters. Perhaps the two of them didn't have time to get to know each other very well, because I think tragedy may have intervened: Joseph's entry in the TS membership books has a note "Dead Jan 94" on it. It's probably an indication of Joseph's priorities that the GD's records don't contain a note that he had died. There's only a note, dated 1903, that he had let his membership lapse.

BASIC SOURCES I USED for all Golden Dawn members.

Membership of the Golden Dawn: The Golden Dawn Companion by R A Gilbert. Northampton: The Aquarian Press 1986. Between pages 125 and 175, Gilbert lists the names, initiation dates and addresses of all those people who became members of the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn or its many daughter Orders between 1888 and 1914. The list is based on the Golden Dawn's administrative records and its Members' Roll - the large piece of parchment on which all new members signed their name at their initiation. All this information had been inherited by Gilbert but it's now in the Freemasons' Library at the United Grand Lodge of England building on Great Queen Street Covent Garden.

Family history: freebmd; ancestry.co.uk (census and probate); findmypast.co.uk; familysearch. They don't cover people living in Ireland of course. Burke's Peerage and Baronetage; Burke's Landed Gentry; Armorial Families; thepeerage.com; and a variety of one-family genealogy websites.

Famous-people sources: mostly about men, of course, but very useful even for the female members of GD. Oxford Dictionary of National Biography. Who Was Who. Times Digital Archive.

Catalogues: British Library; Freemasons' Library.

Wikipedia; Google; Google Books - my three best resources. I also used other web pages, but with some caution, as - from the historian's point of view - they vary in quality a great deal.

Theosophical Society: Membership Register September 1891 to January 1893 p18 Joseph O'Reilly application dated 7 November 1891, subscription paid 1891-93. Sponsors: A W Dwyer and George W Russell. Address as for GD initiation.

AE: eg articles etc in Lucifer: A Theosophical Magazine which ran from 1887 to 1897 and was published by the TS in London.

Collected Letters of W B Yeats volumes 1-III don't contain any letters to Joseph O'Reilly.

24 April 2012

AMandragora@attglobal.net

Charles Chase Parr was initiated into the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn at its Isis-Urania temple in London, on 27 November 1892. He must have chosen a motto on or before that day, but it wasn't recorded, and in fact his name is not on the GD Members' Roll. He wasn't a keen member - never passed any of the exams new initiates were expected to take - and left the Order in August 1893.

Charles Chase Parr and GD member Florence ffoulkes were distant cousins; she was initiated several years after him.

THE PARR FAMILY

Parrs in Charles Parr's time claimed descent from the same Lancashire family that produced Katharine Parr, last wife of Henry VIII and her brother William, Marquis of Northampton. Charles' daughter later claimed to be a direct descendant of the Marquis, but that's impossible as neither he nor Katharine had any children that survived beyond infancy. The earliest ancestor that Burke's Landed Gentry's 1852 edition was prepared to vouch for was a 17th-century John Parr who owned land at Rainford, near Liverpool. A grandson of this John Parr - another John - moved to Liverpool around 1700 and became a businessman. He had a son John who successfully continued the business. The son John married Anne Wolstenholme, daughter of the rector of Liverpool, and served as mayor of Liverpool in 1773. The mayor John Parr and wife Anne had several sons. Charles Chase Parr was the eldest son's grandson; Florence ffoulkes was the youngest son's great-granddaughter. I don't know whether either of them knew this! Though they were probably aware of being related in some way.

John Parr and Anne's eldest son (born 1757) was another John, generally called John Owen Parr to distinguish him from his father. In 1775 John Owen Parr was still working in Liverpool, probably in the family business, but later he moved to London, where he continued as a businessman but also worked as secretary to a group of businessmen involved in trading with Africa. In 1792 John Owen Parr married Elizabeth Patrick. They had ten children. Their sons did not work in business, they went into the professions. The eldest - another John Owen Parr - became a Church of England clergyman and kept the family connection with Lancashire by serving as rector of Preston. His younger brothers Thomas Chase Parr and Samuel both went into the army run in India by the East India Company.

Thomas Chase Parr was Charles Chase Parr's father. Born in 1802, he joined the East India Company's 4th Bombay Native Infantry (NI) and was probably in Bombay by August 1819 when his father died, in a very modern way, from injuries received when a carriage overturned in a street in Kentish Town. Thomas Chase Parr was nearly eaten by a tiger in 1825 but survived (it was shot by James Outram) to rise slowly through the ranks, making it to Major in 1839 and to Lieutenant-Colonel in 1846. From 1854 to 1856 he was Commandant at Karachi, his most prominent appointment. During the Indian Mutiny he was Colonel of the 2nd European Regiment but on census day 1861 he was back in England.

Thomas Chase Parr was 44 when in 1846 he married Harriet Pott (probably born 1817), a daughter of businessman Charles Pott. In 1857 a second marriage took place which linked the two families: Thomas' elder brother Rev John Owen Parr (rector of Prescott in Lancashire) married Harriet's sister Mary Emily Pott.

Harriet and Mary Emily's father Charles Pott owned a vinegar-making factory in Southwark Bridge Road; he was elected to the Grocers' Company in 1822. In the 1820s he'd also been an early investor in the Phoenix Gas Company - his house in Southwark was one of the first in London to be lit by gas. It was probably this man who was a supporter of the Southwark-based Surrey Dispensary. And like many members of his family, he was an active supporter of the Foundling Hospital founded by Thomas Coram - lots of Potts are mentioned in the British History Online article on the building. Charles Pott served the Foundling Hospital as treasurer, probably taking over from his wife Anna's father, the barrister Samuel Compton Cox. On census day 1851, Charles Pott, Anna, and Harriet's younger sisters were actually in residence at the Foundling Hospital. However, they had a country house as well: since the 1820s, Charles Pott had leased Freelands, in the Plaistow district of Bromley, from local landowner Sir Samuel Scott; and in May 1846, Harriet Pott and Thomas Chase Parr were married in Bromley.

Charles Chase Parr was the oldest child of Thomas Chase Parr and Harriet: baptised at St Pancras Old Church in March 1847 and probably born in the staff quarters of the Foundling Hospital. Then came Alfred Arthur (1849), Harriet Bertha (1851), Willoughby (1853), Agnes (1856), Emily (1858) and Percivall (baptised early January 1860). Thomas and Harriet took Charles and Alfred to India and they were all living in Bareda, Bombay in 1851 when Harriet Bertha was born there, but all the younger siblings were born in Bromley. Although Thomas Chase Parr was still on active duty in India for perhaps as much as 20 years more, it was considered such a dangerous place to take children that the Parris seem to have opted for the strategy of Harriet and the children remaining in England, with Thomas Chase Parr coming back when he could - which seems to have been fairly often. I don't think Charles Chase Parr returned to India after those two or three childhood years; and he probably didn't retain clear memories of it.

On the day of the 1861 census, his father was on a long leave and back in England. Thomas Chase Parr and Harriet were visiting Harriet's brother, the Rev Arthur Pott, at his rectory in Northill, Bedfordshire. Charles Chase Parr and his brother Alfred (both on holiday from Harrow School) and their younger siblings were at Freelands with their grandparents the Potts. Charles Pott and Anna ran a fairly lavish household - they employed butler, footman, groom, cook, lady's maid, two housemaids, kitchen maid, one nurse and there was also one nurse specifically to wait on the children. Charles Pott was a wealthy man. When he died in 1864, his personal effects alone were worth about £70,000 (contemporary values).

I think Thomas Chase Parr must have been back in India again on the day of the 1871 census. Harriet Parr was living in Harrow and she told the census official that she was the head of the household. She was employing a governess for her two younger daughters, as well as a cook, a parlourmaid and a housemaid. Charles Chase Parr was living at home, able to contribute to the household expenses. He was working, as a solicitor.

I can't find any evidence that Charles had gone to university on leaving school. In fact, university study of the law was not necessary to qualified as a solicitor at that time; solicitors learned and did the exams while on the job. However, I do find it odd that Charles chose to be a solicitor, and have wondered whether - for a few years - money was tight in the Parr family. One reference I found to Thomas Chase Parr suggested that he had lost money when a bank in Bombay failed, around 1868: Thomas Chase Parr was amongst those signing a petition to the House of Commons arguing for compensation on the grounds that the bank's directors had broken the rules laid down for the Bank by Act of Parliament. (They never change, do they? - bankers.) Thomas Chase Parr certainly was not officially listed as retired until he was 76, in 1878; perhaps he couldn't afford to retire until then. He'd been promoted to General two years before: perhaps that helped ease the financial strain in the family. However, with regard to the oddity of Charles Chase Parr's line of work, I would suppose that a boy at Harrow School would go on to university at Oxford or Cambridge and then - if his family were wanting him to follow a legal career - would train as a barrister. This was the career path followed, at least to start with, by Charles' brother Percivall a few years later.

Charles Chase Parr qualified as a solicitor in 1871 but the earliest evidence I found for his working as one was from 1879 and he was only listed as one in Kelly's Directory from 1883 to 1885. Perhaps it was not his choice to be a solicitor, or even to choose the law as a profession, but the Parr family were probably less wealthy than the Potts, and couldn't afford for their sons not to work. Only certain types of work, however, would ensure the Parrs kept their middle-class status; so Charles might have been offered the choice of solicitor, clergyman, or following his father into the army (though the army could turn out to be a rather expensive investment). Charles' next brother, Alfred, went into the navy, another career which didn't involve much financial outlay by parents. The third brother, Willoughby, chose the Church of England option. The Parrs' financial situation seems to have been in better health, though, when they had to decide about Percivall.

If Charles Chase Parr would have preferred to be a sporting man-about-town, he wouldn't be the only young man to have wished for such a life while not having the income to support it. He did do what he could, though: in the memoirs of Raymond Blathwayt (journalist, writer and definitely a man-about-town), Charles is named as one of a group of young men who frequented Jem Mace's boxing saloon in St James's Street in the early 1870s. He was also a keen cricketer, though he was a late developer at the game - he never played for his school and it wasn't until he became a member of West Kent Cricket Club (WKCC) that his skills blossomed in the less competitive atmosphere of weekend cricket. He must have joined WKCC around 1874: he's first mentioned in a team which played against Eton College in June of that year, though he didn't actually get to the crease as the game was abandoned (rain, I expect). He developed into "a very fine hitter" and appears three times in a list of WKCC's highest-scoring batting performances. Only three WKCC batsmen between 1822 and 1896 scored more centuries for WKCC than he did. Charles' brothers Willoughby and Percivall were also members of WKCC in the 1880s. Willoughby wasn't very good! But Percivall was another big hitter; he was the best all-round sportsman of the three, playing football for Oxford University and England, and both sports for several amateur old-public-schoolboy teams.

Behind the sporting life, however, there must have been a more sober side to Charles Chase Parr, because he married a woman with deeply-felt religious beliefs and a serious commitment to church-based social work. Katherine Anne Parr was the daughter of Joseph Millar, who at least in the early 1850s was a Wesleyan minister in Liverpool. Both Joseph and his wife Ellen were born in the Liverpool area. In 1872 Katherine and Charles were married in the Church of England church of St John the Evangelist Knotty Ash, but they had probably met in Harrow, because on the day of the 1871 census, that is where not only Harriet Parr but also Joseph Millar, Ellen, Katherine and her brother Gaskell were living. On that day, Joseph Millar told the census official that his main source of income was as a landowner; and that he was a Wesleyan minister but not currently working as one. I mention where Katherine and Charles were married, and that Joseph Millar was no longer employed by the Wesleyan methodists by 1871, because at some stage, Katherine Parr at least became a convert to Roman Catholicism.

I wish I knew when this conversion happened, and whether Charles Chase Parr was also converted. I haven't been able to find out anything about it. I think I can say that Joseph Millar was still a methodist at the time of his daughter's marriage. If anyone in the Millar family had become a catholic, having been brought up as a methodist, that would have caused a sensation amongst their friends (many of whom they might have lost as a result). If it had been Joseph Millar who had undergone such a profound change in the nature of his Christian belief he would, of course, no longer have been eligible to work for his old employer. However, his mentioning that he had worked for the Wesleyan ministry to the census official suggests a different story to me in his case: one of inheriting land and becoming able to live off the rents. I think it is Katherine Parr who is the convert; and that her conversion took place probably in the late 1870s/early 1880s.

My main sources for my belief that Katherine Parr at least was a Roman Catholic convert are the Who's Who entry and biographies of Charles and Katherine's daughter Olive Katharine, the writer Beatrice Chase. All these sources agree that she attended the school run by the Roman Catholic nuns of the Convent of the Holy Child Jesus, which was originally in a house in Marylebone High Street but moved to 11-12 Cavendish Square around 1890. The biographies also agree that later in her life, Olive Katharine made the first moves towards becoming a nun in the Dominican Order, before changing her mind; and that she and her mother built small Roman Catholic chapel near their house in Devon.

Olive Katharine Parr's being at a Roman Catholic school gives me a rough date before which this conversion must have taken place: Charles and Katherine's elder daughter was born in 1874 and should therefore have been a pupil at the school in the 1880s, though none of the sources I found give exact dates. I take it that her sister Hilda (born 1876) was a pupil there as well; though I haven't found any proof in her case.

Two biographies of Olive Katharine Parr, now summarised on a web-page, mention the charity work done by Katherine her mother as well as Olive Katharine's own. No dates are given but mother and daughter were working together, so it will have been in the 1890s, with 1903 probably bringing their efforts to an end at least in London. Katherine and Olive Katharine did their social work in the working-class districts of London (the biographies don't say exactly where), and also in workhouses. They may have been part of the project the Convent ran to teach working-class children. In addition, Olive Katharine undertook the management of Cardinal Vaughan's Catholic Children's Crusade.

The biographies of Olive Katharine don't mention Charles Chase Parr at all: both were written quite recently, nearly a century after he died, and both are by writers local to Devon and focused on its history. I haven't found any evidence that Charles Chase Parr became a Catholic; though that's not to say that he didn't do so, I just haven't found proof. My hunch is that he either remained within the Church of England; or continued to search for something to believe in - the sort of frame of mind that might encourage you to join the Golden Dawn when the chance arose.

The 1881 census was the only one on which Charles Chase Parr was working as a solicitor. He, Katherine and their daughters were living in a house on The Common, Chislehurst, very near to where West Kent Cricket Club played their home games. Percivall (still at Oxford University) was staying with them on that day and they also had a boarder, Houghton Baldwin, who worked for a firm trading with the Far East. A nurse, cook and housemaid were employed. Thomas Chase Parr (now retired) and Harriet were living at Powis Lodge, the house Anna Pott had lived in between Charles Pott's death and her own (in 1876). It was next to the station master's house on Southborough Road in Bickley. Charles Chase Parr's sisters Agnes and Emily and son Willoughby were living with them. Willoughby was curate of Bickley at the time and the household's income ran to a governess, cook, parlourmaid, housemaid, nurse and gardener.

In June 1883, Thomas Chase Parr died and this inevitably led to changes in the family, to Charles' benefit if he didn't like working as a solicitor. On the day of the 1891 census, Charles Chase Parr and his family were described as living off "private means" - census short-hand for an income derived from investments. To me it looks as though Charles had inherited enough from his father for him to persuade himself that he could stop work and still provide for his family - provided he made some economies. The economies included moving himself, wife and daughters into Powis Lodge with mother Harriet and sisters Agnes and Emily. Harriet Parr was still a home-from-home for her children (a nice reflection on her character, I think). Even Percivall was living back home with her on that day: although qualified as a barrister he'd been working for W G Allen the publisher, and was a partner as well, with money invested; but the firm was in financial trouble and he may have lost or been about to lose his shirt over it. Harriet was listed as head of this three-generation household, and she ran it with the help of a lady's maid, a cook and one housemaid. To my modern ears, that doesn't sound nearly enough to cook and clean up after six adults and two schoolgirls, especially as the lady's maid would not be about to do any housework; though it was not untypical of the manoeuvres between status, comfort and income that I've seen in other households involving GD members at that time.

It was as a man with private means that Charles Chase Parr was initiated into the Order of the Golden Dawn in 1892. Who did he know who could recommend him as a possible candidate? I have no idea! I haven't found any evidence that he was a freemason - in the GD's first year or two, most initiates were. And he wasn't a member of the Theosophical Society (TS) - in the early 1890s, most initiates were already in the TS. Sometimes the address new initiates gave the GD for correspondence has given me a clue; but not in Charles Chase Parr's case. He told the GD administrators (that is, William Wynn Westcott) to send letters to an address in Queen Anne's Gate - but either he forgot to give the number at the time, or the information has disappeared from the GD records since 1892, because R A Gilbert's book doesn't give the house number. I looked at Kelly's Directory for 1892 and 1894 but they were only helpful in the negative sense. No householder in the street had the surname Parr, and none had a surname I associate with the GD. There were two solicitors' offices in the street; but Parr was not listed as a partner in either and in any case I have a feeling that's not the answer to the puzzle. I can only suppose that Charles asked a friend who was not in the GD if he minded taking in letters to him. He was not the only GD member to be wary of giving the people they lived with a chance to be curious, but I couldn't help wondering if in Charles' case, he was worried about what his newly-Catholic wife would say if she found out. A belief in the one god was actually a requirement of those wanting to join the GD, and its rituals were based on the symbolism of the Christian Rosenkreuz legends, written by 17th-century German Protestants; but it might have been difficult to persuade Katherine Parr of those things. Perhaps nothing that Charles saw or took part in at the GD was able to overcome his reservations.

I do know of two GD members who have tenuous links with Charles Chase Parr and might have suggested to Westcott and Samuel Liddell Mathers that Charles would make a good recruit - Florence ffoulkes his distant cousin; and Hugh Elliot who had been at school with Charles' younger brother Percivall. But they both joined the GD after Charles had resigned. A much longer shot is the Farr sisters, Florence and Henrietta. The Farris had lived in Bromley around 1860; but they moved away after only a few years and in any case I haven't found any evidence that Charles knew them. So it's a mystery, who Charles Chase Parr knew in the GD.

Living off investment income has its problems, but it does give you time. Though he had time to take his GD membership further, to do the study initiates were required to do to reach the GD's second, inner Order and try some practical magic, Charles never did so. He was willing to donate time to WKCC, however: though he didn't actually play after the early 1880s, he was an active member of the club's management committee for many years.

Just as Charles Chase Parr is missing from accounts of the life of his daughter Olive Katharine, so is any mention of Charles' younger daughter Hilda. My searches on the web and elsewhere didn't come up with any information on her at all after census day 1891, and in the end I decided that she must have died young. I found a death registration from the summer of 1894 for a Hilda Parr aged 18; I think this is Charles and Katherine's daughter. I suggest, too, that Charles' only known poem may date from this time.

Death at a young age came to Charles himself a few years later: he died on 3 January 1897, aged only 49. His mother survived him by nearly a year.

Around 1903, Katherine and Olive Katharine left London and settled in Venton, just outside Widecombe-in-the-Moor in Devon. For more on their lives in Devon, see the websites I've listed in the Sources section.

I'll end this biography with the text of Charles Chase Parr's only published literary work - perhaps the only poem he ever wrote. It's undated, but I would suppose it was composed in the mid-to-late 1890s, an epitaph for daughter Hilda, or perhaps for himself.

LOVE MADE PERFECT

By many devious paths through weary days
Have I sought Love made perfect; in the spring
When wakening birrds and hawthorn blossoming
Made glad at dawn the dewy woodland ways;
In summer noonday, when a golden haze

Broods on the murmurous reaches of the tide;
In autumn twilight on the mountain side
Lulled by the dirges the wet hill-winds sing.

Now in the winter midnight, as alone
I mourn a life expended in vain quest,
And listen to the fir-wood's fitful moan,
One steals beside me - an unbidden guest -
And murmurs in mine ear with icy breath:
"In me is Love made perfect: I am Death".

BASIC SOURCES I USED for all Golden Dawn members.

Membership of the Golden Dawn: The Golden Dawn Companion by R A Gilbert. Northampton: The Aquarian Press 1986. Between pages 125 and 175, Gilbert lists the names, initiation dates and addresses of all those people who became members of the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn or its many daughter Orders between 1888 and 1914. The list is based on the Golden Dawn's administrative records and its Members' Roll - the large piece of parchment on which all new members signed their name at their initiation. All this information had been inherited by Gilbert but it's now in the Freemasons' Library at the United Grand Lodge of England building on Great Queen Street Covent Garden. Please note, though, that the records of the Amen-Ra Temple in Edinburgh were destroyed in 1900/01. As far as I know, the records of the Horus Temple at Bradford have not survived either.

Family history: freebmd; ancestry.co.uk (census and probate); findmypast.co.uk; familysearch; Burke's Peerage and Baronetage; Burke's Landed Gentry; Armorial Families; thepeerage.com; and a wide variety of family trees on the web.

Famous-people sources: mostly about men, of course, but very useful even for the female members of GD. Oxford Dictionary of National Biography. Who Was Who. Times Digital Archive.

Useful source for business and legal information: London Gazette and its Scottish counterpart Edinburgh Gazette. Now easy to find (with the right search information) on the web.

Catalogues: British Library; Freemasons' Library.

Wikipedia; Google; Google Books - my three best resources. I also used other web pages, but with some caution, as - from the historian's point of view - they vary in quality a great deal.

SOURCES FOR CHARLES CHASE PARR

A Genealogical and Heraldic History of the Landed Gentry Burke 1852 ed vol 2 p1052 re Parr of Grappenhall Heyes.

Charles' grandfather JOHN OWEN PARR. Beware, though! - there are several other John Owen PARRs, all descendants of this one Remains, Historical and Lit... Edited by Jeremiah Finch Smith. Published 1866 by the Chetham Society of Manchester Grammar School. P187 gives a date of death for John Owen Parr: 5 August 1819. It also is the source of the information about the Africa trade committee.

The Remembrancer, or Impartial Repository of Public Events issue of 1775 by John Almon and Thomas Pownall. Beginning pp205-06 John Owen Parr is one of a large number of men from the Liverpool business and professional community signing a lament addressed to George III on the trouble he's having with the American colonies.

The Gentleman's Magazine volume 126 1819 p189 list of deaths that had occurred during 1819.

Charles' father THOMAS CHASE PARR

From Ancestry's baptism lists: Thomas Chase Parr was baptised at St Nicholas Brighton on 17 Sep 1802. DOB = 21 August 1802. Parents were John Owen Parr and wife Elizabeth Mary.

East India Register and Directory 1819 p314.

James Outram: A Biography by Major-Genl Sir F J Goldsmid CB KCSI. In 2 volumes, London: Smith Elder and Co 1880. Thomas Chase Parr's tiger incident is in volume 1 pp102-03.

Journal of the Royal Asiatic Society of GB and Ireland volume 8 1846 p31 Major Thomas Chase Parr is a member of its Bombay branch.

The Gentleman's Magazine vol 180 p88.

United Service Magazine 1849 issue 1 p141.

United Service Magazine 1854 p469 Thomas Chase Parr of the Bombay Infantry is in a list of those recently promoted to colonel.

Accounts and Papers of the House of Commons 1868 p231-232 in a section called Correspondence - Old and New Banks of Bombay.

New Annual Army List 1869 p452 as a major-general.

Hart's Army List 1870 p308 in a list of lieutenant-generals.

Times Wed 20 June 1883 p14a obituary of Thomas Chase Parr who had been put on the army's retired list in 1878.

Modern English Biography by Frederic Boase; volume II I-Q p1359 Thomas Chase Parr D Powis Lodge Bickley 15 June 1883.

THE POTT FAMILY of Southwark and Bromley

For Pott family connections with the Foundling Hospital, see www.british-history.ac.uk, British History Online.

CHARLES POTT, Charles Chase Parr's grandfather:

A possible reference to Charles Pott, Harriet's father via www.nationalarchives.org to LMA, archives of the Surrey Dispensary of Southwark, records of the personal estate of Goswell Johnson of Bromley.

Probably him, in a List of the Wardens of the Grocers' Co 1345-1907, copy now at Harvard University. On p48 a Charles Pott; and an Arthur Pott. Both elected 1822.

Definitely him:

At a blog though no sources are given for the information on it: marysgasbook.blogspot.co.uk a page posted Aug 2009: Early London Gas Industry, list of subscribers to shares in the Phoenix Gas Co.

The Gentleman's Magazine issue of 1824 on p364: Domestic Occurrences in April has a list of private members' bills currently before the House of Commons. One concerns legislation to set up the Phoenix Gas Co.

The History, Antiquities, Improvements etc of the Parish of Bromley by Charles Freeman. Published Bromley: William Beckley 1832. On p103 a short section on the house called Freelands.

At www.kentarchaeology.org.uk a list of inscriptions at saints Peter and Paul, Bromley, orig published in The British Archivists volume 1 Sep 1914-June 1915.

At www.findagrave.com Memorial Number 113070083: burial of Charles Pott of Freelands who died 1 February 1864; and wife Anna 1788 to 24 December 1876. Both burials are in the churchyard of Sts Peter and Paul Bromley.

CHARLES AND ANNA POTT marriage and children:

Familysearch England-ODM GS film number 598179. Marriage of Anna Cox and Charles Pott 10 August 1809 at St Pancras Old Church.

Familysearch has no baptism record for Harriet Pott, though it does have them for some of her siblings. There is some information about Harriet and her parents in the familysearch 'submitted genealogies' section, posted by kpendleton1038988. Assuming the submitted genealogy is correct, www.thepeerage.com has a few brief details of Samuel Compton Cox, Master in Chancery, information taken from Burke's Peerage 107th edition volume 2 p2178. The only child of Samuel known of by thepeerage.com is Charlotte, who must be a sister of Anna Pott; Charlotte married Edward Leigh Pemberton 1795-1877, who was later an MP.

CHARLES CHASE PARR AS SOLICITOR

My information on Charles' working life is very sketchy. I went to the Society of Genealogists to look in their Law Lists for him but unfortunately they don't have volumes for some of the years I needed: 1872 to 1883.

Law List 1872: Charles Chase Parr is not listed.

I found one reference to him in legal notices published in the Times: 8 April 1879 p15; I'd have expected him to appear a lot more in it, as a busy London-based solicitor.

Kelly's Directory street directory issues of 1880, 1883, 1888 and 1890 and law directory issues of 1885 and 1889.

THE BOXING

Through Life and Round the World by Raymond Blathwayt; seen via google, a copy now at UCLA Library. Published London: George Allen and Unwin 1917 and dedicated to Herbert Beerbohm Tree and Harry de Windt as old friends of the author. P37. Around 1890, Percivall Parr had been a shareholder in W G Allen (as it was known then - the firm went bankrupt that year).

THE CRICKET

Scores and Annals of the West Kent Cricket Club 1812-96 compiled by Philip Norman data collected by Hugh Spottiswoode, up to the end of the 1896 season. London: Eyre and Spottiswoode 1897. Pp38; 258-259; 266; 306; 357; 362 for the date of death; 367-68. This is a very posh cricket club: the index is full of men with titles, and members who were at Eton, Harrow and the other well-known public schools.

ADDRESS CHARLES CHASE PARR GAVE THE GOLDEN DAWN which in R A Gilbert's book lacks a street number: Kelly's Directory street directory in issues of 1892, 1894.

KATHARINE ANNE MILLAR

Forenames like Katharine - or Katherine - or Catherine - or Catharine, to name but four spellings - are the bane of census users' existence! This particular Katharine or Katherine was registered as Catherine. None of the records of her that I found used the 'c', however, she seems to have preferred the 'k' spelling all her life. Sometimes with 'e', sometimes with the second 'a': not all public officials asked, I think - they just wrote. MillAr/MillEr isn't too helpful a name either. In this case, MillAr is correct.

22 November 2013: I saw evidence that Joseph Millar was working for the methodists in Liverpool around 1850 in a snippet from www.trove.nla.gov, the Australian online newspaper project. I could see that it was a marriage announcement: the ceremony took place at the Wesleyan church in Pitt St Liverpool on 29 September 1851 and was performed by Rev Joseph Millar. However, I couldn't get the website to download properly so I can't give details of the publication date of the newspaper.

Wesleyan Methodist Magazine Series IV 1851 p487 list of ministers currently working in Liverpool includes Joseph Millar, based at the Brunswick Chapel.

I didn't see any incidences to Joseph Millar as a minister after this relatively early date; but it might just be that the later information isn't on the web.

Marriage of Katherine Anne Millar to Charles Chase Parr:

At www.lan-opc.org.uk, the Lancashire Online Parish Clerk Project, LDS Film 2147887: marriages 1837-1917 at St John the Evangelist Knotty Ash; p90 entry 180 6 February 1872. I couldn't help noticing that although the register was signed by Charles' father, his mother and his sister Harriet Bertha; none of the Millar family signed it; perhaps not wanting to lend their Wesleyan names to a Church of England ceremony, or maybe there wasn't room for everyone to sign.

Times 2 December 1925 p1b death notice for Katharine Anne widow of Charles Chase Parr and mother of Beatrice Chase.

OLIVE KATHARINE PARR, professional name BEATRICE CHASE

Convent of the Holy Child Jesus: website www.kingsfund.org.uk gives a detailed history of the 11-13 Cavendish Sq; the King's Fund moved into it in 1995. At least on the web, I couldn't find anything about the Convent's time at its previous address.

For information on Olive Katharine and on Charles' wife Katherine, I used a biography at www.legendarydartmoor.co.uk which was based on two books on her, both published in Devon:

J Chard, 1994 The Mysterious Lady of the Moor. Newton Abbot: Orchard Publications.

C Green 1975 My Lady of the Moor Ideford: Ideford Publications. Also on the website are some photographs of Venton House, where Katherine and Olive Katharine lived from about 1903; and of the Roman Catholic chapel they built. Note that they were both buried in the Church of England churchyard at Widecombe-in-the-Moor, in Olive Katharine's case, against her wishes.

CHARLES CHASE PARR'S POEM

It appeared in The Irish Monthly volume 27 1899; editor Rev Matthew Russell, published by M H Gill and Son of Dublin. Seen on web via archive.org in a copy now in the library at the University of Harvard: p179. On p160 there's a review of Olive Katherine Parr's Poems published London: R and T Washbourne.

OLIVE KATHARINE PARR AS BEATRICE CHASE:

Dictionary of Pseudonyms: 13000 Assumed Names and Their Origins by Adrian Room; p102; her dates are 1874-1955.

Via the web to Mariale issue of 1930 an article on Catholic Authors in which Olive Katherine Parr is included.

Further information on Olive Katharine's prayer-work during World War I: via archive.org to Olive Katharine Parr/Beatrice Chase's Completed Tales of my Knights and Ladies London/NY: Longman's Green 1919.

The Catholic Who's Who and Yearbook volume 35 1952.

Who Was Who volume 5 1951-60 p850. Just noting that the people listed in Who's Who write their own entry.

27 November 2013

AMandragora@attglobal.net

***

Catherine Amy Passingham was initiated into the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn at its Isis-Urania temple in London in its early days, in October 1889. She took the Latin motto 'In te domine speravi'. She didn't follow up her initiation; perhaps because she was living in Devon at the time and couldn't get to meetings. In September 1892 she must have been asked by the GD's administrators whether she still wanted to be a member, because there's a note on her papers saying that she did. However, she resigned in May 1893.

This is one of my short biographies. There may be more information on Mrs Passingham out there, but it will be in Leeds University archives, record offices, the local papers in a large number of towns... I'd need to be on the spot to look at them, and I've had to admit that life's too short!

Sally Davis

July 2016

My basic sources for any GD member are in a section at the end of the file. Supplementary sources for this particular member are listed at the end of each section.

This is what I have found on CATHERINE AMY PASSINGHAM, née STAPLE (sometimes given as StapleS but I think Staple is correct).

IN THE GD

Not much.

ANY OTHER ESOTERIC INTERESTS?

Yes, and it's likely that she was invited to become a member of the GD because of the people she knew through them.

SOCIETY FOR PSYCHICAL RESEARCH

Catherine joined the Society for Psychical Research (SPR) in 1884, almost as soon as it was founded. She and her husband were living at Milton on the outskirts of Cambridge at the time. They had a lot of acquaintances at the University, including some of the SPR's founders. The SPR held monthly meetings in London, some of which Catherine must have gone to because there's evidence that she knew some of the other members. She will have been acquainted with Dora de Blaquièrre, Violet Tweedale and Lina Rowan Hamilton, all of whom became GD members; Lina wasn't a member of the SPR herself, it was her husband, Colonel Gawen Rowan Hamilton, who was the member. Catherine definitely knew George Frederick Rogers, through the Theosophical Society as well as the SPR; and he was also a Cambridge University student. Catherine's most enduring Society friendship was with Clara Jeffreys of Glandyfi Castle; they seem to have still been in touch in 1902. Mrs Jeffreys never joined the GD but her daughter Florence Wynne ffoulkes did.

The SPR encouraged members to send in accounts of their psychic experiences. In the first volume of its Journal, there's an account Catherine had sent in, of a strange story told to her daughter Mrs Gillig - actually a typical psychic tale of one person hearing the voice of someone who was dying somewhere else. In 1890, Catherine also donated to the SPR's library a book that had impressed her - Mary Boole's Logic Taught by Love. Despite the number of times she changed address in the ensuing decade, Catherine kept up her SPR membership at least until 1901.

SPIRITUALISM

It's often difficult to find out whether GD members were actively involved in spiritualism; it was a very locally-based, even family-based interest and has left few records. If Catherine considered herself to be a spiritualist medium, it was only in a minor, and non-professional way. It's likely that she was interested in spiritualism and probably attended séances; but her membership of the Society for Psychical Research shows that she wanted to know, at the very least, how spiritualist phenomena actually worked; and perhaps, even, to face the fact that most of them could be explained in rationalist terms and were not communications from the dead.

I've said already that it was difficult for Catherine to get to meetings held in London, once she left Cambridge. However, in January 1894 she was in London and went to one of the conversaciones organised by London's spiritualist umbrella group, the London Spiritualist Alliance. The centrepiece of this particular meeting was a talk on the Rev Stainton Moses' spiritualist experiences. Also there that evening were quite a few people who were initiated into the GD at one time or another, and perhaps Catherine knew some of them: Alice Gordon; Arthur Lovell; a "Miss Moffat" who is probably Sophia Moffat; Charles Lloyd Tuckey, an acquaintance of George Frederick Rogers; Constance Wilde; and the siblings Henry, Charlotte and Margaret Wright.

W T Stead began to publish an esoteric magazine in 1895, the review he called Borderland. Catherine was a keen reader of it while it lasted and shared Stead's hope that through the magazine, like-minded people could be brought together in locally-based groups all over the country. When the names of people willing to join such a group were published in Borderland in January 1895, her name was on the list for Devon. Perhaps she was able to set up just such a group in Exmouth; but she left England soon afterwards and probably lost touch with the other Borderland readers that she had met. Borderland wasn't a success as a business venture and ceased publication in October 1897.

THEOSOPHY

Perhaps I should have started with this, as Catherine's longest-running and most active esoteric commitment was to the Theosophical Society (TS). Theosophy was also the only venture into esotericism that Catherine shared with her family - her husband and two of her daughters were also TS members.

Catherine and her husband George Augustus Passingham are listed in the TS's membership registers as having joined between 1889 and 1891. News items in the theosophical magazine Lucifer make it plain that they were both members by late 1888, when they and their eldest daughter, Amy Gillig, were all helping to draft the rules of the TS's new Cambridge Lodge. Catherine served as the lodge's first president, with Mrs Gillig as its secretary. The lodge had at least one Indian member, a Mr C V Naidu, who was probably a university undergraduate. George Frederick Rogers of Gonville and Caius was another member.

The Passinghams left Cambridge early in 1889 and had moved to 11 Morton Crescent, Exmouth, by 1891. As part of a lecture tour in November 1892, Annie Besant gave a talk on theosophy at Barnfield Hall in Exeter, a talk that Catherine had probably organised. A few days later, Catherine and another senior member of the TS in London, Countess Wachtmeister, held a talk and discussion on theosophy in Exmouth. After the talks, the Passinghams tried to set up a TS lodge in Exmouth. There were not enough interested people in the town, but they did manage to form one in Exeter. Catherine's daughter Adelaide was secretary of the Exeter Lodge in 1893-94.

Another result of the visit of Mrs Besant and Countess Wachtmeister to Devon was Catherine being recruited to play a small part in the Parliament of Religions, held as part of the 1893 World's Fair in Chicago. A sub-section of that Parliament was a Theosophical Congress and Catherine was a member of the Congress' English advisory committee; other members included Annie Besant, Colonel Olcott and A P Sinnett. Some English TS members went to the Congress as delegates but I don't think Catherine was one of them.

In the period 1894-96 the TS worldwide tore itself apart over who should lead it and in what direction after the death of Helena Petrovna Blavatsky. The TS in England was particularly badly hit, with the closure of most of its lodges as hundreds of members resigned, or let their memberships lapse. One of the consequences was less news of local lodges in the TS's magazines, though information in the TS's membership registers indicates that the lodge in Exeter closed down. During this turbulent period, in 1895, the Passinghams moved to Ireland. It was difficult to keep up with the TS under those circumstances. George Augustus Passingham's membership of the TS in England lapsed in 1897 and, as he never renewed it, his decision to stop paying his yearly subscription must have been in response to the schism. Catherine, however, kept her membership going through that crisis, one that followed it in the early 1900s, and a third in 1908, before finally resigning in 1909.

A thread - only a thread - running through spiritualism and theosophy (though not through western magic as far as I know) was a debate about whether or not serious spiritualists and theosophists should eat meat. As early as 1885, Catherine had become a subscriber to the magazine The Dietetic Reformer, which turned into the Vegetarian Messenger in 1887. A regular contributor to both was Thomas Allinson MD, founder of the Natural Food Company and campaigner for what he called hygienic medicine and birth control.

Perhaps Catherine and her family were vegetarians.

Sources:

SOCIETY FOR PSYCHICAL RESEARCH

Journal of Society for Psychical Research volume 1 1884-85 p156 and p478-79.

Proceedings of the Society for Psychical Research volume II 1884. London: Trübner and Co of Ludgate Hill. Pp317 begins the list of members as at December 1884.

Journal of the Society for Psychical Research volume 4 1889-90. Just noting it is for members only, it's not on sale to the general public: p264 donations to the library.

See wikipedia for some information on Mary Everest Boole (1832-1916) mathematician and feminist. Boole's Logic Taught by Love - London: Francis Edwards 1890.

Proceedings of the Society for Psychical Research volume 9 1893 and 1894. Published Lo by Kegan Paul Trench Trübner and Co; for the Society. p386 Catherine's current address is Lanina, Llandyssil, Cardiganshire.

Proceedings of the Society for Psychical Research volume XI 1895 p618 Catherine's current address now is Fermoy, Castle Gregory co Kerry.

Proceedings of the Society for Psychical Research volume XV 1900-01 p502 Catherine is still a member, at Lake House, Prestbury nr Cheltenham.

LONDON SPIRITUALIST ALLIANCE

Light: A Journal of Psychical, Occult and Mystical Research. Published London: Eclectic Publishing Co Ltd of 2 Duke St Adelphi. Volume 14 number 681 Saturday 27 January 1894 p38.

Borderland: A Quarterly Review and Index volume 2 1895. Editor, W T Stead. Editorial office: Mowbray House Norfolk St WC; publishing office 125 Fleet Street. Volume 2 number 7 January 1895 p88-92 Catherine is at 11 Moreton Crescent Exmouth (actually it's Morton without the 'e').

Seen on the web: The Dietetic Reformer 1885 p280 Catherine was a subscriber at her Milton address. So also was another future GD member, the Rev Thomas Travers Sherlock. This was the only issue of the magazine I've been able to see. Issues of the Dietetic Reformer 1872-76; and its successor, the Vegetarian Messenger 1887-1935 are at Leeds University. I can't justify the expense of going there to go through them though I think it's likely I'd find more GD members' names in the lists of readers.

See wikipedia for the career of Thomas Allinson.

THEOSOPHY

Theosophical Society Membership Register January 1889 to September 1891 pp126-127. George Augustus is "lapsed 12 97"; Catherine is "Resigned 14.1.09".

Theosophical Society Membership Register September 1891-January 1893 p221, p250.

Lucifer: A Theosophical Magazine Published by Theosophical Publishing Co at 7 Duke St Adelphi volume III September 1888 to February 1889; issue of 15 October 1888 p105 news section.

Lucifer: A Theosophical Magazine Pubd by Theosophical Publishing Co at 7 Duke St Adelphi. Volume IV March to August 1889 issue 15 March 1889 p83.

The Theosophical Congress held by the Theosophical Society at the Parliament of Religions. World's Fair 1893 Chicago Illinois September 15-17 [1893]. Report of Proceedings and Documents. Published TS American Section, 144 Madison Avenue NY 1893: p10.

Lucifer: A Theosophical Magazine September 1892- February 1893. Published London: Theosophical Publishing Co 7 Duke Street Adelphi. Volume XI number 64 issued 15 December 1892 p342.

Lucifer: A Theosophical Magazine September 1893- February 1894. Published London: Theosophical Publishing Co 7 Duke Street Adelphi. Volume XIII number 73 issue of 15 September 1893 pp71-72.

BIRTH/YOUTH/FAMILY BACKGROUND

Catherine Amy Staple was born in Exmouth in April 1840, the elder child of John Staple and his wife Sarah. She had one brother, John Charles, born in 1844. A quick online search produced evidence of people called Staple living in and around Exmouth in the 18th century, who may be ancestors of Catherine. A Richard Staple was paid for building and maintenance work on the parish church and vicarage in the 1730s. A John Staple and his wife were living in the town in 1780. I also saw plenty of men called John Staple, living in Devon, in the 19th century; part of a wider clan with that surname.

Catherine's father had been born in Withycombe Raleigh on the outskirts of Exmouth. He trained as a surveyor and in the 1850s was employed as clerk of works at Dorchester Abbey. On census day 1851 John Staple, Sarah and John Charles were living in a house in the abbey precincts which went with the job. They were keeping house modestly with just the one general servant. However, they were paying for Catherine's to attend the boarding school run by Anne Kellaway and her mother at Knapp House, Milborne Port Somerset. There were 12 pupils at the school, including Catherine, with ages ranging from 4 to 14. Three women taught there, one of whom as an assistant only; only one of them was a specialist, a music teacher.

John and Sarah Staple had been elderly parents and by 1861 John had retired and moved back to Exmouth. 1851 was the only census on which I could identify John Charles Staple. He was, apparently, alive in 1875 and living in Brompton; but I haven't been able to trace him.

On census day 1861 Catherine and her parents were living at the Manor House in Withycombe Raleigh.

Sources: census 1851-81.

Memorials of Exmouth published Exmouth 1872 by William John Wesley Webb: p125.

Exmouth Milestones, a History by Eric R Delderfield. Raleigh Press 1948 p196.

THE PASSINGHAM FAMILY

In 1863, Catherine married George Augustus Passingham. Later in his life, George Augustus published a genealogy of his family. Mention was made in it of his descent from Passinghams in Cornwall and Merioneth, but George Augustus went back in detail only as far as his grandfather, Colonel Jonathan Passingham of the 37th Foot (died 1835), who established his branch of the family in Heston, Middlesex in the early 19th century.

Colonel Jonathan and his wife Prudence had a large family. George Augustus was a son of their third son, another Jonathan, who married a cousin, Ellen Passingham. George Augustus was the second son of Jonathan and Ellen; born 1842 in Heston. There were also several sisters including one, Augusta Louisa, who went to Italy and entered the Roman Catholic Trappistine Order's convent at Perugia.

Sources:

The Visitation of England and Wales volume 18. Privately printed 1914; editor F A Crisp: pp57-61.

GEORGE AUGUSTUS PASSINGHAM

Catherine's husband had a private income which was enough for them to live comfortably on - though not extravagantly - for most of their married life. Perhaps that was what persuaded John and Sarah Staple to allow Catherine to marry him when she was 23 and he only 21. In the late 1860s and into the early 1870s he also earned money from a business based in Cambridge in which he was joined with his elder brother Jonathan. It was a very modern-sounding business, a gymnasium where young men at the university could learn fencing and practice other athletics skills.

George Augustus' main passion, however, was mountaineering and it looks like he gave up his association with the gymnasium in Cambridge because it was restricting his time in the Alps. He was known even while at Oxford University as a gymnast, and during the 1870s he gained a reputation amongst climbers as a man able to tackle the very toughest ascents and to do them in one long day, rather than sleep out on the mountain-side overnight. In the 1870s and early 1880s, Zermatt was his favourite base. In September 1872, with Dr Clinton Thomas Dent of St George's Hospital and their local guides, he made the first successful ascent of the south-east ridge of the Rothhorn from the Zermatt side. In 1879, at the third attempt, he became the first Englishman to climb the west face of the Weisshorn. And in 1880 he climbed Obergabelhorn. However, in the 1880s, after the death of his most trusted guide, Ferdinand Imseng, George Augustus began going further afield to climb. He had already done one year in Norway. Later went several times to the the USA. When not actually climbing in Switzerland, George Augustus was keen on shooting chamois. When he was older he developed a passion for salmon fishing, in Scotland and (seeing where they lived from the 1900s) on the Wye. An outdoor man.

Catherine accompanied her husband when he went abroad to climb; but she was never a climber herself and remained down in the valleys - presumably with the children - while he went off.

Sources:

GEORGE AUGUSTUS PASSINGHAM

Britain and Japan series Volume 2 Biographical Portraits. By Ian Hill Nish for the Japan Society of London. Published Folkestone Japan Library; I couldn't work out which year! Section p154-155 the Mutsu family. It has passing references to the gymnasium and to George Augustus as a mountaineer. It also mentions an article, maybe more than one, written by George Augustus and published in The Alpine Journal. Jonathan Passingham's daughter Ethel married a Japanese man. The author of the book is a descendant of theirs.

For my Grandson: Remembrances of an Ancient Victorian by Sir Frederick Pollock. London: John Murray 1933: p21 refers to the gymnasium, which he attended as an undergraduate. A biography of Pollock: Sir Frederick Pollock Bart 1845-1937 by Harold Dexter Hazeltine p237 says that Pollock was elected a member of the Alpine Club in 1867.

The Alpine Journal volume 9 August 1878-May 1880, numbers 61-68. Editor Douglas W Freshfield. London: Longmans Green and Co. Issue of February 1880 pp427-31: The Weisshorn from Zinal by G A Passingham. George Augustus' only published piece of writing is an account of the first ascent of the Weisshorn from Zinal, which he made with the Swiss guides Ferdinand Imseng and Ambrose Supersax in August 1879. Anything but triumphalist, it's a practical description of how the climb was done, and a warning to future climbers of the dangers they would face.

The Alpine Journal volume 30 February-October 1916 number 211 pp65-70; p185; and opposite p66 and p179: In Memoriam George Augustus Passingham, by J P Farrar. George Augustus' reputation was such that his obituary was included in the Journal despite the fact that he had never been a member of the Alpine Club.

Wikipedia for John Percy Farrar 1857-1929. He was the son of a doctor and born in Chatteris, Cambridgeshire; though his obituary of George Augustus doesn't read like one written by a friend. In 1883, Farrar became the second Englishman to climb the west face of the Weisshorn. He was a long-time editor of The Alpine Journal; President of the Alpine Club 1917-19; fund-raiser for the Everest Committee from 1921.

Wikipedia again, for Clinton Thomas Dent 1850-1912. Dent was one of the family which ran Dent and Co, the Hong Kong and China-based import/export business. If I've worked this out correctly, Dr Dent was a first cousin of GD member Vyvyan Dent, though they may not have known each other very well as Vyvyan Dent spent almost all his life in China.

Above the Snow Line: Mountaineering Sketches between 1870 and 1880. By Clinton Dent, as vice-president of the Alpine Club. London: Longmans Green and Co 1885: p35-53. Unfortunately the book has no index so I may have missed other references to George Augustus in it.

The climb is mentioned in The Valley of Zermatt and the Matterhorn: A Guide by Edward Whymper. London: John Murray 1897. Chapter IX: Zermatt and the Matterhorn p151; with the ascent's exact date.

Ancestry has several entries into the USA made by George Augustus Passingham; and one arrival, in August 1888, in Madeira. I imagine these were mountaineering expeditions.

CATHERINE PASSINGHAM'S FAMILY

Catherine and George Augustus Passingham began their married life in Exmouth where their first two daughters were born: Amy Passingham in late 1864; and Inez Ansell Passingham in the summer of 1866. In between those two births came a death, that of Catherine's mother Sarah, in late 1865. Shortly after Inez's birth, the Passinghams moved to Cambridge, in time for their last child, Adelaide Passingham, to be born there in the summer of 1867. The move was to allow George Augustus and his brother to set up the gymnasium; but it might also have been influenced by John Staple's decision to remarry. His second wife, Hyppolita Josephine, may have been French (I think; he certainly didn't marry her in England); she was also 29 to his 71, in 1871. John Staple died in 1875 and his widow soon remarried.

On census day 1871 Catherine, George Augustus and their three daughters were living at 5 High Street Milton, a village on the road from Cambridge to Ely. George Augustus described himself as a "teacher", so I'm assuming he was still involved in the gymnasium business at the time; though this was the year the Passinghams began going to the Alps for the summer and early autumn. Perhaps in preparation for this, they were housekeeping on a very small scale on census day: despite having three children under seven, they weren't employing a nurse or a cook, just the one general live-in servant.

On census day 1881 Catherine, George Augustus and Amy were not in the UK. It seems a bit early in the year but perhaps they had already gone on a mountaineering expedition. A friend from Devon, Catherine Yelverton, was looking after Inez (15) and Adelaide (13) at 3 Cambridge Road Milton. Inez answered the census official's enquiries as head of the household; she told the official that her father was a "retired gymnast". The Passinghams' financial situation had improved since 1871 and they now employed two servants.

Sources: census 1871, 1881

The Alpine Journal volume 30 February-October 1916 number 211 pp65-70: In Memoriam George Augustus Passingham.

CATHERINE'S DAUGHTERS

All three of Catherine's daughters married graduates of Cambridge University. One of them was a university graduate herself, though not from Cambridge.

Amy Passingham continued the family trend of marrying young. In 1883, when she was 19, she married Charles Alvin Gillig, who was 20. They had two children in their three years together, but then separated. Amy got a divorce, in South Dakota, in 1891. In June 1892 she married Edward Armitage, someone she must have known while the Passinghams still were living in Cambridge. They had three children and lived at a house called Green Hills, at Tilford near Farnham in Surrey. Edward Armitage was an active freemason even in his undergraduate years, and will have known GD member George Frederick Rogers through Isaac Newton University Lodge number 859, of which they were both members.

In her father's Passingham genealogy, Amy's first marriage wasn't mentioned. However, George Augustus and Catherine can scarcely have pretended it hadn't happened: the Gilligs' son Charles William was living with them by 1891 and probably continued to do so until his death. By census day 1891, Charles William Gillig was being known as Charles William Passingham. It's possible that George Augustus and Catherine also took in Charles William's sister Margaret Amy Gillig; though there's no census evidence for that, in fact I can't find Margaret Gillig (later Passingham) on any census to 1911.

ADELAIDE

Adelaide's marriage is another that isn't mentioned in George Augustus' Passingham genealogy. I can't remember how I came across evidence of it; but I know it was quite by accident. Adelaide married solicitor Henry William Saw in May 1902, at Aberdovey, near where Clara Jeffreys (Catherine's acquaintance from the Society for Psychical Research) lived. Henry Saw had graduated from Cambridge University in 1887, so he and Adelaide are likely to have known each other from that time, when the Passinghams were still in Milton. He did his years as an articled clerk in Saw and Son, his father's firm in London; and qualified in 1893.

For all that she had probably known her husband for many years before she married, Adelaide's marriage lasted no longer than her sister Amy's. The divorce was heard in 1905

(in camera - I wonder why?) Adelaide had not had any children. And unlike Amy, she never married again. She died, in Ampthill Bedfordshire, in 1954, and left such a large personal estate that I've been trying to discover where she acquired it - without success.

INEZ

Compared to the ups and downs of her sisters' married lives, the middle sister Inez's life was positively tranquil. She married William Stuart MacGowan in 1889, after he had found work as assistant master at Cheltenham College. They stayed married, and had three children. William MacGowan taught at Cheltenham College until 1902 when he was appointed Principal of St Andrew's College at Grahamstown in the Cape Colony. He held that appointment until 1908 or 1909. He had been ordained while at Cheltenham College and after he and his family returned to England, he worked as a curate in various churches in London before being appointed vicar of Holy Trinity Kingsway, in Holborn, in 1919; he was still in post when he died in 1939.

William was a prominent freemason both in England and South Africa.

Sources for Catherine's daughters:

General:

Armorial Families volume 2 1929 p1506 .

The Passingham genealogy with its editing-out of two marriages which ended in divorce:

The Visitation of England and Wales volume 18. Privately printed 1914; editor F A Crisp: pp57-61.

AMY

Freebmd, which shows that Amy's children Charles William (1883) and Margaret Amy (1885) were both registered as Gillig.

A few details of the marriage, at The Green Bag volume 18 2001 p310: Charles Alvin Gillig was an American citizen. The Gilligs got a deed of separation 1886 and never lived together again. Mrs Gillig qualified as a teacher of cookery in 1889.

Amy was probably well off out of the life of Charles Alvin Gillig:

The Selected Papers of Elizabeth Cady Stanton and Susan B Anthony by Stanton and Ann Dexter Gordon. London and New Brunswick New Jersey: Rutgers University Press 1997: p241 which covers 14-25 May 1883. Footnote1, actually about Charles Alvin's brother Henry.

Charles Alvin Gillig is the compiler of Charles A Gillig's London Guide, a publication aimed at US travellers. Published London: Gillig's United States Exchange 1885. Via google I saw a reference to its 14th edition, published 1900; and one from 1902 but I didn't see any later editions. I also saw one reference to a follow-up work: Tours and Excursions in Great Britain, published 1888.

Times Wednesday 2 June 1886 p11 originally published in London Gazette Tue 1 June 1886: a bit more about C A Gillig's business affairs.

Familysearch has tax assessments Charles Alvin Gillig; in Westminster 1888-91; and then in St Martin in the Fields from 1893.

There's a 2nd marriage for him, registered Strand 1899.

Probate Registry 1915: Charles Alvin Gillig's personal estate amounted to £97.

London Gazette volume 5 1915 p4944 creditors' notice after the death of Charles Alvin Gillig. There were 177 executors!

Times Fri 21 May 1915 p2 creditors' notice giving several addresses for Charles Alvin Gillig during his lifetime, including the National Liberal Club.

Charles Alvin Gillig accepted the legality of Amy's 1891 divorce at the time. Several years later, wanting to be rid of a second wife, he challenged it:

A Selection of Cases on Conflict of Laws volume 1 editor Joseph Henry Seale. Harvard University Press 1927 p26 reporting that Charles Alvin Gillig had been in court in South Dakota bringing a counter-claim against his wife's allegations of cruelty and desertion. The court had accepted Mrs Gillig's account of the marriage's break-down.

Law Reporter issued by the Law Times office; volume 94 1906. This was a snippet and I couldn't see a page number. An English court had declared that by bringing the counter-claim in 1891, Charles Alvin Gillig had accepted the legality of her South Dakota divorce.

Seen via www.newspapers.com, The Elyria Reporter of Elyria Ohio, issue of 22 February 1906 p5. A more detailed report on what Charles Alvin Gillig had been trying to do in 1906: he had been trying to get his second marriage declared null and void on the grounds that he'd never been legally divorced from his first wife. Judge John Gorrell Barnes rejected Gillig's arguments and so the South Dakota divorce stood.

Worried about the legal status of her three children with Edward Armitage, Amy Armitage clarified the issue by bringing a case under the Legitimacy Act 1858:

The Law Times Reports of Cases Decided in the House of Lords New Series volume 94 1906 p614.

The Times Law Reports and Commercial Cases volume 22 pp306-07: Armitage v Attorney General (Gillig Cited). This report gives the exact date and place of Amy's marriage to Edward Armitage: 30 June 1892 in the cathedral of St John Evangelist, Denver Colorado.

Amy's second husband Edward Armitage:

Visitation of England and Wales volume 18 1914 p61 as the 5th son of Rev Francis James Armitage, vicar of Casterton near Kirkby Lonsdale.

Alumni Cantabrigiensis Abbas-Cutts part 2 p70 citing Times 15 March 1929.

Use the 'search the collections' facility at www.freemasonrylondon.museum to find a very detailed account of Edward Armitage's busy life in freemasonry. Here I'll just mention: of Quatuor Coronati Lodge number 2076 1913-14; contributor of two articles to the journal; and lodge treasurer from 1922 until his death. There are discrepancies, however, between this obituary and Alumni Cantabrigiensis as to his year and place of birth. Having taken a look at freebmd, I'm not at all surprised there's some confusion. The birth registration of an Edward Armitage April-June quarter 1859 in the Axbridge district of Somerset looks more likely than the alternatives.

Ars Quatuor Coronati volume LXII part 1 pp137-138: an obituary of Edward Armitage, WM

The Freemasons' Library catalogue has a couple of works by Armitage:

Catalogue of books in the library of the Supreme Council of Ancient and Accepted Rite; 33 Golden Square. As compiler. Printed London: Spottiswoode and Co 1900.

Robert Samber. Printed Margate: offices of Keble's Gazette 1898. This had originally been published in Ars Quatuor Coronati.

Although I have found virtually no information on Amy's elder daughter Margaret Amy Gillig, I did find an obituary of her husband, a distinguished geologist and academic. See www.encyclopedia.com an entry for William Bernard Robinson King 1889-1963.

INEZ

William Stuart MacGowan was of Scottish descent. He appears somewhere in the pages of boyle-genealogy.webs.com

See //thepeerage.com (which uses Burke's Peerage as its source) for Rev MacGowan's two marriages (the second, as a widower in 1937), and for his and Inez's three children.

At prabook.com some detailed information on him, though without sources, particularly focusing on him as a language specialist and on his time in South Africa.

African Review volume 31 1902 p190, p534 the announcement of his appointment as Principal of St Andrew's College, Graham's Town South Africa.

Alumni Cantabrigiensis; via google so no volume number but p265 in that volume.

British Library has two works by him:

A Second German Reader and Writer originally published 1888; 7th edition 1900. Published by E A Sonnenschein in its Parallel Grammar Series.

The Religious Philosophy of Rudolf Eucken with an introduction by Eucken. London: David Nutt 1914.

At discovery.nationalarchives.gov.uk WO 339/50547 information on his first World War service, as 2nd Lt Manchester Regiment 1914-22.

At search.lma.gov.uk/LMA\_DOC/P82\_TRI1.pdf, the list of archives held at LMA: items from Holy Trinity Kingsway Holborn include one letter dated 1924 from William Stuart MacGowan, home address 10 Middleton Road Golder's Green.

The All English Law Reports 1942 p310 evidence in a Chancery Court case heard December 1941 included MacGowan's date of death: 6 July 1939.

Visitation of England and Wales volume 20 pxxx short obituary.

ADELAIDE

As a student at Bedford College: census 1891.

Via the web, reached National Portrait Gallery site with photo of her c1890 taken by Evelyn Tennant Meers, with a note saying that Adelaide was "associated with 29 portraits" - presumably all photos by Meers. I think you can now (July 2016) see this photo online.

Her husband Henry William Saw:

Alumni Cantabrigiensis A-C volume 2 p429.

The Law Students' Journal volume 14 1892 p64.

The Solitors' Journal volume 75 part 1 p279.

Probate Registry 1949. Details here show that he married a second time and had children. He died in December 1948.

The marriage:

Via genesreunited to Bath Chronicle and Weekly Gazette issue of 29 May 1902.

The divorce:

The Law Journal volume 39 1905 p551 list of forthcoming cases in the Probate, Divorce and Admiralty division includes Saw v Saw otherwise Passingham; to be heard in camera (I wonder why!)

Times 29 October 1954 p10 Wills and Bequests.

BACK TO CATHERINE PASSINGHAM: HER LATER LIFE AND DEATH

The Passingshams brothers' gymnasium business must have been given up by 1889 because George Augustus and Catherine left Cambridge early that year. They lived in several different places over the next decade, but none were anywhere near Cambridge. Their immediate destination was Catherine's home town and on the day of the 1891 census they were still living in Exmouth, at 11 Morton Crescent on the Esplanade. At this time Adelaide was studying at Bedford College London University; but as census day fell during the Easter vacation, she was at home with her parents. I couldn't identify Amy Gillig or her daughter Margaret on that census; I suppose they were in the USA or on the way there, in search of Amy's divorce. Amy's son Charles William Gillig - now with the surname Passingham - had been left with George Augustus and Catherine. Catherine was managing the household with a cook, a housemaid and a parlourmaid.

The Passingshams lived in Exmouth until 1895, I think; though with a break in 1893 when they spent some time at Llandyssil in Cardiganshire. Then they went to the west of Ireland, to Castle Gregory where they rented a house called Fermoye. I'm not sure how long they stayed there, but they were definitely back in England in 1900, staying for the summer at Westgate-on-Sea. By census day 1901 they had moved again, to Charlton Kings near Cheltenham. Their daughter Inez and her family were living at 2 Earlston, in Cheltenham. On the day of the 1901 census Catherine, George Augustus and Charles William were living at Lake House on Mill Street in Charlton Kings. I suppose Adelaide - not yet married - was normally living with them but on census day she was not in the UK. The Passingshams were managing with one fewer servant than they had 10 years before: they now only employed a cook and a kitchen-maid.

The MacGowans left for South Africa later in 1901 and though I don't think the Passingshams stayed much longer in Cheltenham themselves, there's a gap in their addresses. I can't find them again until 1909, when they were living near Cambridge once more, but on the other side of the city, in the village of Toft, at the former rectory, then called Toft Manor. Charles William Passingham died at Toft Manor in January 1909, aged 26; and the Passingshams left Cambridge for the last time.

During the gap in addresses Adelaide Passingham had left home to be married (1902) and returned home after the marriage failed (before 1905). On the day of the 1911 census, she was living with Catherine and George Augustus at Berrow House, in the village of Berrow near Ledbury in Worcestershire. George Augustus, filling in the census form as head of the household, gave his daughter's surname as Passingham, and described her as an unmarried woman. He and Catherine had changed their in-house staff slightly again. They still had their cook, but instead of the 1901 kitchen-maid they had reverted to having a housemaid. They probably had a local woman coming in to do cleaning by the day.

The three Passinghams were still living at Berrow House when George Augustus died of a heart attack in July 1914. Catherine and Adelaide then moved from Berrow to Eastnor in Herefordshire, to a house called Woodside, where Catherine died in April 1918.

Sources: census 1891, 1901, 1911. Freebmd. Probate Registry 1914, 1918.

The Alpine Journal volume 30 February-October 1916 number 211 pp65-70: In Memoriam George Augustus Passingham.

BASIC SOURCES I USED for all Golden Dawn members.

Membership of the Golden Dawn: The Golden Dawn Companion by R A Gilbert. Northampton: The Aquarian Press 1986. Between pages 125 and 175, Gilbert lists the names, initiation dates and addresses of all those people who became members of the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn or its many daughter Orders between 1888 and 1914. The list is based on the Golden Dawn's administrative records and its Members' Roll - the large piece of parchment on which all new members signed their name at their initiation. All this information had been inherited by Gilbert but it's now in the Freemasons' Library at the United Grand Lodge of England building on Great Queen Street Covent Garden. Please note, though, that the records of the Amen-Ra Temple in Edinburgh were destroyed in 1900/01. I have recently (July 2014) discovered that some records of the Horus Temple at Bradford have survived, though most have not; however those that have survived are not yet accessible to the public.

For the history of the GD during the 1890s I usually use Ellic Howe's The Magicians of the Golden Dawn: A Documentary History of a Magical Order 1887-1923. Published Routledge and Kegan Paul 1972. Foreword by Gerald Yorke. Howe is a historian of printing rather than of magic; he also makes no claims to be a magician himself, or even an occultist. He has no axe to grind.

Family history: freebmd; ancestry.co.uk (census and probate); findmypast.co.uk; familysearch; Burke's Peerage and Baronetage; Burke's Landed Gentry; Armorial Families; thepeerage.com; and a wide variety of family trees on the web.

Famous-people sources: mostly about men, of course, but very useful even for the female members of GD. Oxford Dictionary of National Biography. Who Was Who. Times Digital Archive.

Useful source for business and legal information: London Gazette and its Scottish counterpart Edinburgh Gazette. Now easy to find (with the right search information) on the web.

Catalogues: British Library; Freemasons' Library.

Wikipedia; Google; Google Books - my three best resources. I also used other web pages, but with some caution, as - from the historian's point of view - they vary in quality a great deal.

24 July 2016mailto:Amandragora@attglobal.net

Email me at AMandragora@attglobal.net

Find the web pages of Roger Wright and Sally Davis, including my list of people initiated into the Order of the Golden Dawn between 1888 and 1901, at:

www.wrightanddavis.co.uk

***

George POLLEXFEN who was initiated into the Golden Dawn in December 1893, taking the Latin motto 'Festina lente'. In October 1895 he underwent the second-level initiation ceremony and became a member of the GD's 2nd Order, the level at which you moved beyond reading occult texts and could try some practical magic. In 1893 he gave as his address the bald and not very helpful 'Sligo'; but it was easy for the GD to get in touch with him, and for me to find out more about him and say WHO DID HE KNOW IN THE GOLDEN DAWN, because he was W B Yeats' uncle - the brother of W B's mother.

Anyone who was important in the life of W B Yeats has had plenty of literary coverage, so I won't be giving a biography of George here, just a list of references. Though I will say that he does illustrate rather neatly a conclusion I have reached about so many GD members: that they were bit-part players in the lives of the more famous.

George's role in the GD was rather larger than the judgement I've just made above implies however, and not just because he aided and abetted W B Yeats as a member. A note by the editors in Yeats' collected letters says that George was sent the birth details of people who were being mooted as possible members of the GD, so that he could do a horoscope as part of the process of deciding whether they were suitable to be offered initiation into the Order. As all initiates into the GD had to learn some astrology as part of their basic training, this argues a widespread admiration for George's skills at it, amongst senior GD members who could probably do a good-ish horoscope themselves. One of those would-be members who horoscope was checked out by George Pollexfen was W B Yeats' artist friend William Thomas Horton.

George may also have been a member of the Theosophical Society (TS). I didn't find his name in the TS membership register but I might have missed him. He didn't write for the theosophical magazines but Lucifer in 1893 noted that a "G T Pollexsen" (I'm sure all the family suffered a wide variety of mis-spellings of their name!) had donated 10 shillings to the London-based theosophical group the League of Philosophical Workers, who were trying to raise enough money to rent some rooms. In the mid-1890s a group led by George W Russell and Frederick Dick was given permission by TS in London to form a lodge based in Dublin. I haven't been able to find a list of its members but George Pollexfen may have been one.

SOURCES in which George Pollexfen appears in books about W B Yeats:

Yeats and Women edited by Deirdre Toomey, 2nd edition Macmillan Press Ltd 1997.
Chapter 3: "The Music of Heaven", by Warwick Gould, based on letters and possibly an interview with GD member Dorothea Butler Hunter so many GD members are mentioned in it. Gould was particularly interested in Dorothea's memories of the group W B Yeats brought together to use astral travelling to help Yeats get a better idea of the functions of the old Irish gods. The group included Dorothea and her husband Edmund, uncle George Pollexfen, the Mathers and Annie Horniman; as well as some acquaintances of Yeats' who were not in the GD.

Collected Letters of W B Yeats Volume II 1896-1900 P 665 et seq also has something to say about this group, which Yeats called the Celtic Order, and some more names of the members including Mary Briggs, who was in the GD, and whom Dorothea Hunter seems to have forgotten.

Lady Gregory's Diaries 1892-1902 edited and with an introduction by James Pethica.
Gerrard's Cross: Colin Smythe 1996. George Pollexfen's first appearances in the diaries isn't until rather late in my GD period - p149 July to August 1897, when (footnote126 p149) W B Yeats was staying with his uncle at George's house at Rosses Point county Sligo. The source for the footnote is the biography of W B Yeats' father: The Prodigal Father by William M Murphy; p176 says that during 1894/95, uncle George paid W B an allowance of £1 per week while W B struggled to make a living as a writer.

For a reference to George Pollexfen doing a horoscope for a prospective GD member:

W B Yeats and W T Horton: The Record of an Occult Friendship by George Mills Harper.
Macmillan Press Ltd 1980.

BASIC SOURCES I USED for all Golden Dawn members.

Membership of the Golden Dawn: The Golden Dawn Companion by R A Gilbert.
Northampton: The Aquarian Press 1986. Between pages 125 and 175, Gilbert lists the names, initiation dates and addresses of all those people who became members of the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn or its many daughter Orders between 1888 and 1914. The list is based on the Golden Dawn's administrative records and its Members' Roll - the large piece of parchment on which all new members signed their name at their initiation. All this information had been inherited by Gilbert but it's now in the Freemasons' Library at the United Grand Lodge of England building on Great Queen Street Covent Garden.

Family history: freebmd; ancestry.co.uk (census and probate); findmypast.co.uk; familysearch. They don't really cover people living in Ireland, however. Burke's Peerage and Baronetage; Burke's Landed Gentry; Armorial Families; thepeerage.com; and a variety of one-family genealogy websites.

Famous-people sources: mostly about men, of course, but very useful even for the female members of GD. Oxford Dictionary of National Biography. Who Was Who. Times Digital Archive.

Catalogues: British Library; Freemasons' Library.

Wikipedia; Google; Google Books - my three best resources. I also used other web pages, but with some caution, as - from the historian's point of view - they vary in quality a great deal.

Theosophical Society: membership registers held at the TS headquarters, Gloucester Place, London W1 and covering most of Europe but not, I think, Ireland.

For the donation, which I think is made by George Pollexfen despite the fact that the magazine got his name wrong:

Lucifer: A Theosophical Magazine Volume XI covering September 1892 to February 1893, editor Annie Besant. London: Theosophical Pubg Soc, 7 Duke Street Adelphi. Volume XI no 66 issued 15 February 1893 P515.

24 April 2012

AMandragora@attglobal.net

Nelson Prower was initiated into the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn at its Isis-Urania temple in London in October 1888. He chose the Latin motto 'Tuteger vitae' but never followed up his initiation in any other way. At some point, he resigned from the Order; but the exact date he did so is not known now.

This is one of my short biographies. While there's a genealogy of his family, and massive coverage of his years as an active freemason, I've not found much information on the rest of Nelson Prower's life.

Sally Davis

November 2016

My basic sources for any GD member are in a section at the end of the file. Supplementary sources for this particular member are listed at the end of each section.

This is what I have found on NELSON PROWER.

IN THE GD

Nelson was one of the first people to be initiated into the GD. William Wynn Westcott and Samuel Liddell Mathers had only started to recruit people in March 1888. Nelson was one of a group of men who were freemasons and members of the Societas Rosicruciana in Anglia (see the Freemasonry section below for more on SRIA). I think Westcott and Mathers hoped that they could give advice on the rituals they would be using in the Order. They were probably not expected to be active Order members.

ANY OTHER ESOTERIC INTERESTS?

Particularly in the late 1880s and early 1890s, Nelson was a very active freemason. Indeed, that might be one reason for his not wanting to continue as a member. The freemasonry activities he was already committed to when he was initiated are likely to have taken up most of his leisure time.

Evidence for before Nelson's involvement in freemasonry before the mid-1880s and after 1898 has proved less easy to come by.

GLYNES, LEMON AND PROWER

In the years that Nelson was most active as a freemason, he will have been constantly meeting Webster Glynes and William George Lemon. Both Glynes and Lemon were in that group of freemasons initiated into the GD in 1888; only to drop out quite soon afterwards. Nelson was slightly the odd one out of the three; not working in the legal and local government circles that Glynes and Lemon did. But they were all less interested in craft masonry than they were in the other, newer types that sprang up during the second half of the 19th century, a boom time for freemasonry of all kinds.

FREEMASONRY

I'm not quite sure of my identifications here, but I think I've found evidence from the early 1860s that Nelson's father - John E M Prower - was a freemason. I think it was him who was a member of a military lodge in Gloucestershire; he had certainly been stationed when on active service. And someone called Prower - I presume it's John E M - served as an officer in the Wiltshire Provincial Grand Lodge. Nelson himself doesn't seem to have belonged to any Wiltshire-based freemasonry, but as a guest he attended at least two important Wiltshire occasions: the consecration of Swindon Keystone Mark Masonry Lodge 401; and the installation of the Earl of Radnor as the county's new Provincial Grand Master, an occasion at which he may have met the Prince Arthur, Duke of Connaught, for the first time. In 1901 Prince Arthur succeeded the Prince of Wales as Grand Master of the United Grand Lodge of England.

CRAFT MASONRY

Despite the explosion of other types of freemasonry in the 19th-century, most freemasons' first initiation was still into a craft lodge; and membership of a craft lodge was a requirement of all candidates for some of the newer freemasonries. Probably in 1886, Nelson was initiated into Farringdon Without Lodge 1745, a recently founded one which met at the Holborn Viaduct Hotel and was part of a closely-knit group of lodges whose members worked in the City, in the law or in business. I'm not quite sure how Nelson was recruited as he never worked in either, though he was studying for the Bar at that time. I couldn't find the exact date of Nelson's initiation either; but by June 1888 he had been a member long enough to be chosen to act as steward at that year's installation meeting, which had a particularly large number of guests. He was making his way up the lodge's hierarchy of officers by that year and in May 1891 he was installed as Worshipful Master for 1891-92. He continued to attend meetings after that year, but not as often as he attended meetings of the lodge's Chapter; and he had resigned from the lodge by 1897.

One source I found said that Nelson was also a member of the Friars' Lodge 1349, which met at the London Tavern Fenchurch Street until 1886 and then at the Ship and Turtle Leadenhall Street. There is no mention of him in the lodge history I found at the FML; so I can't offer proof of this. If he was a member, his initiation must have taken place before February 1886.

ROYAL ARCH

Farringdon Without Lodge 1745's royal arch chapter was consecrated in 1886. It met at Anderton's Hotel, Fleet Street, a popular venue for freemasonry meetings. You were eligible to join a royal arch chapter if you had been a Master Mason for one month, and Nelson went to his first Chapter meeting in May 1886. Over the next 10 years he attended far more chapter meetings than lodge ones; suggesting a greater commitment to that kind of freemasonry. He served as MEZ (Most Excellent Zerubabel) from July 1892-93. Nelson seems to have let his hair down a bit more at chapter meetings than at lodge ones. Maybe they were more relaxed occasions. In July 1893 as he stood down as MEZ and was presented with a jewel to mark the occasion, he joined in the singing with piano accompaniment. The last meeting before 1900 that I found him attending was in 1897.

Perhaps meetings of royal arch chapters were more fun: Nelson was a regular visitor at two of them in the early 1890s. The first was Mozart Chapter 1929 which met at the Greyhound Hotel in Croydon. Nelson was a visitor at meetings every summer from 1890 to 1895. The second was Albion Chapter 9, which met at another popular freemasonry venue, the Ship and Turtle in Leadenhall Street. After attending the odd meeting as a guest over several years, he went with the members, their guests and their wives on their August 1896 summer outing, taking a train with them from Paddington to Reading and then a trip on the Thames in the launch Marion.

MARK MASONRY

If Nelson preferred royal arch masonry to craft masonry, he was more committed to Mark Masonry than to either. Nelson's initiation into the Prince Leopold Mark Masonry and Royal Ark Mariners Lodge 238, in March 1885, was the earliest for which I've got evidence. From that date until 1897, Prince Leopold 238 was the lodge he attended most regularly. Like Farringdon Without Lodge 1745, it met at Anderton's Hotel Fleet Street. Once again, Nelson showed himself very willing to serve as a lodge officer. He was as its WM twice: once in March 1889-90 and again - when none of the current wardens would do the job - in March 1890-91. And on at least one occasion (December 1892) he stood in as WM when the serving one was unable to get to a meeting. He acted as treasurer of the lodge from 1892 to 1896, when he resigned. It looks like it took a year for the lodge to accept his resignation - resignations letters from him were read out at two separate meetings.

I couldn't find any references to Prince Leopold 238's Council before 1894 so perhaps it was founded in that year. As treasurer of the lodge, Nelson attended a couple of the Council's meetings in 1894 and 1895.

Nelson didn't attend meetings of the Lodge so regularly between late 1894 and spring 1897; but I'm fairly sure Nelson was not spending all of the year in England between those dates. His commitment to Prince Leopold Lodge 238 probably continued after 1900, at least for a few years. However, my sources for his involvement - the freemasons' magazines - have only been digitised as far as 1900. I've looked at some issues of The Freemason from the 1910s and haven't found the lodge meetings in its news columns quite so often; so I can't tell whether Nelson went to the meetings as often as he had done.

Unlike with craft masonry, Nelson got involved with the higher echelons of Mark Masonry. In 1890 he was chosen to represent Prince Leopold Lodge 238 at the Mark Masonry annual benevolent fund dinner. In 1889 he went to another fund-raising event, the annual festival of Mark Masonry's Grand Master's Lodge of Instruction, at the Holborn Restaurant; William George Lemon was a fellow guest. In 1890 and again in 1893, he went to meetings of the Mark Master Masons' Grand Lodge of Middlesex and Surrey; at the Ship and Turtle Leadenhall Street. And in the mid-1890s, as PPSGO he went to some (but not all that many) of the quarterly meetings of Mark Masonry's Grand Master's Lodge.

ANCIENT AND ACCEPTED RITE

Nelson was also pretty active in the Mount Calvary Chapter 3 of the Ancient and Accepted Rite, which met in the AAR's masonic hall at 33 Golden Square in Soho. It wasn't easy to get into the AAR. Membership was by invitation only; you had to have been a master mason for at least a year; and you had to be willing to state your belief in the Christian Trinity of Father, Son and Holy Ghost. Nelson was elected a member of Mount Calvary Chapter 3 and underwent the AAR rite of perfection in February 1886. Thomas Walker Coffin, who was initiated into the GD, was a member of this Chapter though he doesn't seem to have gone to many of its meetings during the period Nelson was active in it. Nelson went to its meetings regularly for the next eight years, making steady progress upwards through the AAR's ranks. In 1890 he reached the AAR's 30° level; though he never got any higher. That year he served as Raphael. From December 1892 to 1893 he was Grand Master (GM). By February 1894 he was at Second General level; in May 1895 he became First General; and in March 1896 he reached the top of the AAR hierarchy and served his year as MWS (Most Wise Sovereign). By 1900 however, he was no longer a member of Mount Calvary 3; though he was still in the AAR.

As well as becoming involved in Mark Masonry and the Ancient and Accepted Rite, both of which are independent of freemasonry's United Grand Lodge of England, Nelson also joined several other independent orders of freemasonry, some of which were very new to England.

ORDER OF ALLIED MASONIC DEGREES

Nelson went to his first meeting at the AMD's Metropolitan Council in November 1887. The Allied Masonic Degrees was a new institution - its hierarchy was only fully set up in 1879.

Like Mark Masonry and the AAR, it was not affiliated to the UGLE. It had its own Grand Council, headed by a Grand Master who in Nelson's time was the Earl of Euston, brother to Lady Eleanor Harbord who joined the GD. Having no premises of its own at the time, the AMD met at the Mark Masonry Hall in Great Queen Street. Only freemasons who were master masons, Mark master masons and royal arch masons were eligible. William George Lemon was already a member of the Metropolitan Council, which was the equivalent of a craft masonry lodge, when Nelson joined it; he might have been the man to recommend Nelson as a suitable recruit. Nelson served as the Metropolitan Council's secretary from 1890-91; and as its Organist from July 1892 to 1893; but in his first few years as a member he went to very few meetings. Probably he had just been too busy with other freemasonry commitments. As the Council's organist he began to go to meetings more often and over the next three years he began to climb the Council's ladder towards serving as its WM. However, he never reached the top: he didn't attend any meetings after that of July 1895 and in 1897, sent in his resignation.

KNIGHTS TEMPLAR ie Order of the Temple; and the ORDER OF ST JOHN OF...MALTA

Like the Ancient and Accepted Rite, no one would be considered for installation as a knight of either order who was not a believer in Christianity. At the time Nelson became a knight of the Temple, candidates also had to have been a master mason for two years and be a member of a royal arch chapter; and requirements of candidates for the Order of St John of Malta were even more strict. Though I haven't found the exact date he joined, Nelson must have been a member of Mount Calvary D Encampment or Preceptory well before 1887. Perhaps the Order's combination of the religious and the militaristic appealed to him more than the ideas behind the AAR, because for the next few years, he went to the Mount Calvary D Encampment's meetings more often than the AAR's Mount Calvary Chapter 3. Mount Calvary D met for most of the year at the Inns of Court Hotel in Lincoln's Inn Fields; but for the summer meeting the members went out of town, to the Mitre Hotel at Hampton Court. He was elected auditor in October 1887 at the same meeting he became preceptor for the first time, that of October 1887. After his first year as preceptor was over, in October 1888, there was a pause of 12 months and then Nelson became Second Standard Bearer in 1889; first Standard Bearer in 1890; and Captain of the Guards in 1891. In 1892 he began to go to more meetings than previously, though in this year, as for the past four, he had a lot of other freemasonry commitments. He went for a second time up the ladder of the preceptory's hierarchy, being Second Captain in 1892; First Captain in 1893; and served a second year as preceptor from October 1893 to 1894, being given a jewel on his second retirement from the post.

The orders of the Temple and of St John of Malta were administered together; though relatively few men were members of both. Nelson was amongst seven new members of the Order of Malta "admitted" during the annual meeting of both orders in May 1887 at the City Terminus Hotel, Cannon Street. GD members W G Lemon and T W Lemon were also members of both orders. Nelson attended the annual meetings of the orders the following year and acted as "Guard to the Banner of R" at the meeting of the Order of Malta.

There were big changes in the next few years in the ways both orders were governed, as their national officers tried to prevent the continuation of a period of serious decline. The venue of the annual meetings, and the Order's administrative offices were both moved to what were thought to be more accessible locations; a systematic attempt was begun to take control of the Orders' accounts; preceptories that hadn't paid their annual subscription to the knights templar national hq were struck off. And in particular, it was made easier to become a knight templar: the Royal Arch chapter requirement was kept but the two years as a master mason was dropped to one year and the fee was lowered. Not every man who was already a member agreed with the changes and perhaps Nelson didn't: he remained in the Order but he didn't go to any joint annual meetings between 1889 and the end of 1900. I haven't been able to find out whether he continued as a knight of Malta, but I would suppose that he did. He was still going to meetings of Mount Calvary D Encampment/Preceptory in 1901, after his return from a possible period abroad; but he continued to hold aloof from the Order's national management and never rose to national prominence.

ORDER OF THE SECRET MONITOR

The Order of the Secret Monitor (OSM) was so new to England that Nelson was able to become a member while it was actually being set up here. Its rituals emphasised brotherly love, drawing on the biblical story of David and Jonathan, and it arrived in England from the USA due to the enthusiasm of Issachar Zacharie, an English doctor who had worked in America during and immediately after the Civil War. Once again, William George Lemon got into the order before Nelson and may have encouraged him to think of being a member: Lemon was at the first official meeting of the OSM, in July 1887, when its Grand Council was formed (with Zacharie as its Supreme Ruler) and its first sub-group, Alfred Meadows Conclave 1, was founded.

Nelson was one of 21 men who were inducted into Alfred Meadows Conclave 1 at a meeting of the OSM at the Victoria Hotel, on 15 July 1887; also in that group were Nelson's freemasonry acquaintance Captain T C Walls; and William Robert Woodman, Supreme Magus of Societas Rosicruciana in Anglia (SRIA). It's possible that Webster Glynes was one of the 21 as well. He was definitely a member of the Conclave by 1889.

Nelson doesn't seem to have been all that impressed with the OSM; or perhaps he was just too busy to commit himself too much to it. He didn't go to Conclave meetings very often; though by April 1889 he had got himself onto the lower rungs of its ladder of hierarchy, as Alfred Meadows Conclave 1's WJ. In November 1890 he was serving as the Conclave's Guarder; but that seems to have been as far up the ladder as he went. He didn't go to any meetings of the Conclave at all between 1890 and late 1896, as far as I can tell. He went to one in June 1896; but that was the last one he bothered with. He will have met William George Lemon at that meeting, one of the last Lemon will have gone to, as he died a few months later.

RED CROSS OF ROME AND CONSTANTINE

Although its name clearly refers to the first Christian convert to rule the Roman empire, freemasons wanting to join the Order of the Red Cross of Rome and Constantine did not have to be convinced Christians; though they did have to be royal arch masons. Like many other freemasonry organisations that weren't craft-based, it used the Mark Masonry Hall at Great Queen Street for its meetings. Nelson joined the order in 1886 and was PJ Warden in the Order's Premier Conclave by October 1887. He became Prefect in 1888. He was Junior General in 1889, a year in which a man called Edwin Prower attended the January meeting. I haven't found any other references to Edwin Prower in all my freemasonry researches; but as the surname 'Prower' is so rare, he must have been some relation of Nelson's, and perhaps his guest at the meeting. By November 1890 Nelson was Venerable and Eminent Viceroy (VE) and in March 1891 he reached the top of the ladder, being installed as the Conclave's

Most Puissant Sovereign (MPS). He was so conscious of the honour his fellow-members had bestowed on him by electing him as MPS that at the end of his year, he marked the occasion by giving the Conclave a banner.

Nelson went to the annual assemblies of the Order's Grand Imperial Conclave regularly between March 1888 and March 1893, by which time - using the Premier Conclave as his springboard - he was its Grand Vice-chancellor. However, he doesn't seem to have gone to any subsequent ones and over the next year his commitment to the Premier Conclave lessened dramatically. I couldn't find any evidence of Nelson at a meeting of the Premier Conclave after March 1895 though he was still nominally a member of the Order in 1899.

ROYAL AND SELECT MASTERS also known as CRYPTIC MASONRY

Another freemasons' organisation that Nelson was eligible for by 1886 was the Royal and Select Masters: candidates had to be Mark master masons and royal arch masons. Like many smaller freemasons' groupings it had no premises of its own when Nelson was a member; it met at the Masonic Hall in Red Lion Square, the headquarters of Mark Masonry and then moved with MM moved into its new hall in Great Queen Street.

Nelson was admitted into the RSM's Grand Master's Council number 1 in May 1886. One of the officers carrying out the ceremony was Rev T W Lemon, who in due course became another of the freemasons invited to join the GD in its first year. Robert Roy, who also joined the GD in due course, was already a member of Grand Master's Council 1 when Nelson joined it. As the RSM was new to England, having only arrived from the USA in the early 1870s, movement up its national hierarchy could be quite quick: as early as 1888, Nelson Prower attended the RSM's annual meeting to be elected one of its two Grand Marshalls for the coming year. That level was as far up as Nelson chose to go, however.

Nelson went to a couple of meetings of the GM's Council number 1 most years between his admittance and 1896 but at its meeting of July 1897 his resignation from the it was acknowledged. In 1899 he was still in the RSM but was not a member of any of its councils.

FREEMASONS' CHARITIES

Just once, in November 1891, Nelson went to a meeting of craft freemasonry's Board of Benevolence. I think I would have come across him at more of its meetings if he had been a member of the board. Again just once, in July 1889, he was Prince Leopold Lodge 238's steward at the Mark Benevolent Fund festival; he managed to collect £5/5-worth of donations that evening. In June 1894 and again in May 1895 he made a donation to a freemasons' charity I haven't been able to identify; perhaps it was the Mark Benevolent Fund again. On each occasion he gave £10/10; a substantial sum for one man.

GUESTING

WM's, PM's and other high ranking freemasons were often invited to take part in important occasions. Despite having so many freemasonry commitments already, Nelson did accept some invitations. I've already mentioned two lodges whose meetings he went to quite often, though he was not a member of either. He also visited other lodges.

He went to an ordinary meeting of the Peace and Harmony craft Lodge 60 in February 1888; and to its installation meeting in February 1893. Perhaps tempted by the scale of the post-meeting banquet, he went along to the Greyhound Hotel Hampton Court for a meeting of Hemming Lodge 1512 in February 1892; The Freemason magazine described this lodge as “influential and prosperous”. In May 1892 he went to that year’s installation meeting of the Pegasus Lodge 2205 at the New Falcon Hotel in Gravesend; in 1901 he was actually working in Gravesend, perhaps as a result of meeting some influential local people. In June 1894 he attended a meeting of the Earl of Carnarvon Lodge 211, another lodge which met at Anderton’s Hotel in Fleet Street. In April 1895 he was back at Anderton’s Hotel as one of the guests and possibly one of the organisers, of a testimonial dinner for his freemason friend Captain T C Walls. And in May 1896 he went to the installation of Paxton Lodge 1686, at the Surrey Masonic Hall in Camberwell New Road.

And he also forged a visiting relationship with two freemasons’ organisations in Larnaca on Cyprus. This began in December 1891 when he went to the consecration of St George’s Lodge 2402. Then there was a gap of three years until December 1894, when he was at that lodge’s installation meeting and also went to a meeting of St Paul’s Chapter 2277. A source that I spotted using Google but wasn’t able to find in the online freemasons’ magazines, mentioned Nelson giving a speech in 1894 - presumably after one of the two freemasons’ meetings he’d just attended - praising the hospitality his hosts had shown him. After that month there was another gap between visits, until January 1897 when - although a visitor - he stood in as Senior Warden during St George’s Lodge 2402's installation meeting. There are both Greek and Turkish surnames in a contemporary list of members of this lodge.

SOCIETAS ROSICRUCIANA IN ANGLIA

As so many early members of the GD were freemasons, Nelson could have been recommended as a good recruit by any number of the freemasons he knew. However, it’s most likely that he was initiated as a member of Societas Rosicruciana in Anglia (SRIA); which was not a freemasons’ lodge or chapter although only freemasons could join it. As its name suggests, it was founded to focus on the myths and symbolism of Christian Rosenkreuz; and the GD was founded to put some of the SRIA’s research into ritual practice.

The SRIA was sub-divided into colleges. In 1886, Nelson was admitted into its Metropolitan College, which met in central London. William Robert Woodman was SRIA’s Supreme Magus, its highest office, held for life; he was a member of the Metropolitan College. GD founder William Wynn Westcott was its secretary and he succeeded Woodman as the SRIA’s Supreme Magus in 1892. GD founder Samuel Liddell Mathers went to the Metropolitan College’s meetings from time to time. T R Coffin, William George Lemon and Rev T W Lemon were members before Nelson joined. The centrepiece of each meeting of the various colleges was a paper read by one of the members and then commented on by his audience. Papers read at the Metropolitan College’s meetings were subsequently published in its Transactions.

Nelson contributed papers to Metropolitan College meetings on three occasions. That was a lot - most SRIA initiates remained members for years without reading a paper at all. In 1890 Nelson’s topic was the “present revival of mystic study”. Then, for four years, he was just too busy and it was not until 1894 that he was able to do the research-work necessary to prepare a paper for such a well-informed audience. In October 1894, Nelson's topic was The Influence of Temperament on the Reception of Evidences of Things Unseen. In January 1896 it was The Relative and the Absolute.

As was usual with him, in the 1890s Nelson also began to make his way up the SRIA hierarchy towards serving a year as Celebrant, its equivalent to WM. He got as far as taking office as deputy celebrant in April 1897, but then - in January 1898 - he sent in his resignation. I've shown above that this was a time when he was resigning from quite a few other freemasonry commitments.

I hope I've managed to give the impression of Nelson Prower as - at least between 1886 and 1896 - a freemason committed to it, to the extent of being willing to take on a lot of official roles, often several at the same time. His initiation into the GD came in the middle of that decade; just as he was starting his busiest five years as a freemason.

I couldn't find evidence of any involvement by Nelson in English freemasonry in the early 1880s. Evidence from another source suggests he was in Canada. And after 10 hectic years in English freemasonry, his involvement does tail off around 1895-96 and I'm not sure of the reason for this. He may have been out of the country again; and perhaps found it difficult to get back into the swing of it once he returned. Perhaps there was too much else going on in his life. The digitised freemasons' magazine issues on which I've relied, end at 1900. I have been through the issues of The Freemason for 1905, 1910 and 1915. I didn't find any evidence of Nelson still being active in freemasonry in those years.

And to end the section on freemasonry, an apology:

This has been a difficult section for me to write. I don't suppose I've done a very good job. But I wouldn't have even been able to begin, without the information and explanations of two experts at the Freemasons' Library - Susan Snell the archivist; and Peter Aitkenhead, the assistant librarian and expert on freemasonry degrees. They recommended these books, which I have drawn on very heavily:

Beyond the Craft by Keith B Jackson. Original edition 1980. I used the 6th edition, 2012, to which Jackson has added details of several orders left out of the 1st edition. Hersham Surrey: Lewis Masonic, an imprint of Ian Allan Publishing Ltd. See www.lewis-masonic.co.uk

A good introduction.

A Reference Book for Freemasons. Compiled by Frederick Smyth. Published London: Quatuor Coronati Correspondence Circle Ltd 1998. Recommended by Peter Aitkenhead.

If, as an experienced freemason, you have spotted some glaring errors, please email me at the address at the bottom of this file and tell me what I should have said!

OTHER ESOTERIC OPTIONS:

SPIRITUALISM

Some spiritualists did join the GD, but not that many; and even fewer stayed for very long after their initiation. I haven't found any evidence that Nelson was interested in spiritualism. However, this is a tricky area to research: spiritualism was a very locally, even family-based pursuit and there was no over-arching organisation with a membership list that can be consulted now.

Nelson's earliest encounter with the world of esotericism was with spiritualism. However, he approached it in a way that suggested he had reservations: during 1884 he joined the Society for Pyschical Research, which had been founded to see whether there was any scientific basis for the claims spiritualists were making. His name doesn't appear in any membership lists after 1884 so he must have not renewed it.

THEOSOPHY

More GD members were recruited from the Theosophical Society than from freemasonry. However, Nelson was definitely not one of them - he was never a TS member.

Given the kind of religious beliefs Nelson held, he may have regarded both theosophy and spiritualism as not being suitable subjects of enquiry for the devout.

Sources for the Esoterics section:

FREEMASONRY

Database of the collections at the Freemasons' Library (FML): go to //freemasonry.london.museum

and take the option 'Explore'. You don't have to have a reader's ticket to search the catalogue; or to use the other online resources, which include searchable online copies up to 1900, of the main freemasons' magazines.

The FML is the headquarters and archive of craft masonry; not of the other kinds, which have their own hq buildings and archives. The FML is the only freemasons' library I have an introit into. If there are histories of the other organisations Nelson was a member of; I can't get at them.

For the freemasonry involvement of the Prince of Wales and then Prince Arthur Duke of Connaught, see the FML's website for its Information Leaflet 1: English Royal Freemasons.

WILTSHIRE

The Freemason November 1860 p14.

The Freemason May 1862 p12.

The Freemason June 1889 p4.

The Freemason November 1891 p3.

CRAFT

Farringdon Without Lodge 1745; 1878-1978. By P D Colton, PZ. No publication details and the pages were unnumbered. No list of all members with dates of initiation, unfortunately. However, it's clear from the lodge's history and its WM lists how close it was to lots of other City-based lodges - many men were members of several of them at the same time, making a very tightly-bound community.

The Freemason June 1888 p11; December 1888 p11.

The Freemason June 1889 p11; December 1889 p11.

The Freemason February 1890 p7; April 1890 p9.

The Freemason April 1891 p8; June 1891 p8.

The Freemason June 1892 p6; October 1892 p8.

The Freemason February 1893 p10; June 1893 p10.

The Freemason September 1894 p6.

The Freemason April 1895 p7; December 1895 p10.

The Freemason February 1896 p8; July 1896.

On one occasion only, Nelson was a guest at a meeting of St Dunstan's Chapter 1589. It had even closer than usual links with Farringdon Without Lodge and Chapter 1745: The Freemason March 1895 p7.

ROYAL ARCH

FARRINGDON WITHOUT CHAPTER 1745

The Freemason May 1887 p13, in which Nelson was described as a member of the Royal Sussex Chapter. The Freemasons' Library had this book: A Sketch History of the Royal Sussex Chapter 342 AD 1905 compiled by G F Lancaster, a PZ of the Chapter. Portsmouth: Holbrook and Son Ltd of 154-155 Queen Street. On pp22-23, its members so far were listed; Nelson's name was not on the list. The Chapter's Roll of members covering 1870-1895 was one of the sources for the list; so I don't think Nelson was ever a member.

Back to Farringdon Without Chapter 1745:

The Freemason March 1888 p11; May 1888 p13; July 1888 p12.

The Freemason March 1889 p14; July 1889 p13.

The Freemason March 1890 p12; May 1890 p12; July 1890 p15, this was the installation meeting and he was made SN for the coming year.

The Freemason Mar 1891 p10; July 1891 p10.

The Freemason May 1891 p9.

The Freemason March 1892 p9; May 1892 p10.

The Freemason March 1893 p10; May 1893 p12-13; July 1893 p8.

The Freemason July 1893 p8.

The Freemason March 1894 p3; May 1894 p8.

The Freemason March 1895 p11; May 1895 p12; July 1895.

The Freemason March 1896 p10; May 1896 p12.

The Freemason May 1897 p10.

ROYAL ARCH - MOZART CHAPTER 1929.

The Freemason June 1890 p12; June 1891 p9; July 1893 p14; September 1892 p9; September 1893 p7; September 1894 p8; June 1895 p12.

ROYAL ARCH - ALBION LODGE and CHAPTER 9

The Freemason December 1890 p9.

The Freemason December 1891 p8.

The Freemason Mar 1892 p1.

The Freemason April 1892 p6.

The Freemason August 1896 p11.

MARK MASONRY

PRINCE LEOPOLD LODGE 238 for which I couldn't find a history.

The Freemason March 1885 p9; this meeting was such an important one for Nelson, leading to many opportunities, most of which he took up. It was the one in which he was "advanced" to the mark master mason degree.

The Freemason June 1885 p11.

The Freemason February 1886 p15; November 1886 p10.

The Freemason January 1887 p10; May 1887 p14; November 1887 p12.

The Freemason March 1888 p13; December 1888 p13.

The Freemason March 1889 p10, p14; May 1889 p13; November 1889 pp13-14.

The Freemason March 1890 p16, p18; May 1890 p12, p13; December 1890 p10.

The Freemason March 1890 p16.

The Freemason March 1891 p11; May 1891 p10, p12; August 1891 p11; November 1891 p13; December 1891 p13.

The Freemason February 1892 p5, p11; May 1892 p10; December 1892 pp10-11.

The Freemason March 1893 p10; May 1893 pp10-11; December 1893 p5, p12.

The Freemason March 1894 p7; May 1894 p9; December 1894 p11.

The Freemason March 1895 p13, p16; May 1895 p13; December 1895 p14.

The Freemason March 1896 p5, p10; July 1896 p5; Dec 1896 p10.

The Freemason February 1897 p16; March 1897 p7.

Prince Leopold Lodge's Council which is definitely a separate thing from its lodge:

The Freemason May 1894 p5.

The Freemason December 1895 p15.

MARK MASONRY GRAND MASTER'S LODGE

The Freemason April 1889 p10 with another account of the same meeting in The Freemason's Chronicle April 1889 p11.

The Freemason March 1895 p3.

The Freemason March 1896 p4.

MARK MASONRY SUSSEX

The Freemason February 1890 p7.

The Freemason Jan 1893 p6.

The Freemason February 1886 p12. This report described Nelson as a member of lodge 1349.

Friars' Lodge 1349: the First 125 Years 1871-1996 compiled by David Taylor PM using the lodge records including its attendance records. No publication details. From 1886 to 1919 the lodge met at the Ship and Turtle Leadenhall Street, a venue Nelson would have been very familiar with. However, there was no mention of him in the history of the lodge; nor as a WM or as doing any of the administrative work of the lodge. He might have been an ordinary member; but there's no evidence of that in this book, alas.

ANCIENT AND ACCEPTED RITE

Rules and Reguls for the Govt of the Degrees from the 4° to 32° Inclusive under the Supreme Council 33° of the Ancient and Accepted Rite [in the British Empire etc etc]; plus a List of Members.

Rules and Reguls... as correct to 30 June 1888 is the first one Prower is in; issued by the Office of the Sec Genl, 33 Golden Sq. On p57 a list of the current AAR lodge equivs, called Rose Croix chapters; in order of founding; w p58 the latest being founded earlier 1888, chapter number 108 bsd Jersey CI. Beginning p59 fur dtls on ea indiv chapter, also in order of founding:

On p57 Mount Calvary 3 meets 33 Golden Sq. Warrant 6 June 1848. P62 T W Coffin is a member though he hasn't sent in this year's sub yet. Nelson Prower and T C Walls are members.

Rules and Regulations... to 31 July 1900. On p59 list of members at level 30°: p69 Nelson Prower 1890. On p260 Prower is still an AAR member but he isn't in any of the chapters.

The Freemason March 1886 p9; July 1886 p12; May 1886 p13.

The Freemason January 1887 p14; March 1887 p10; April 1887 p10; July 1887 p9; November 1887 p13.

The Freemason February 1888 p12; Mar 1888 p13; April 1888 p14; July 1888 p13; November 1888 p15.

The Freemason March 1889 p14; July 1889 p13; November 1889 p13.

The Freemason March 1890 p18; April 1890 p5; July 1890 p17; November 1890 p10.

The Freemason April 1891 p11; June 1891 p10; Aug 1891 p12; November 1891 p13.

The Freemason Feb 1892 p11; April 1892 p10; July 1892 p10; December 1892 p11.

The Freemason March 1893 p11; May 1893; July 1893 p11 GM.

The Freemason February 1894 p10; April 1894; August 1894 p8; November 1894 p10.

The Freemason February 1895 p12; May 1895 p13; Nov 1895 p7.

The Freemason March 1896 p9; May 1896 p15; November 1896 p10.

The Freemason March 1897 p14.

ALLIED MASONIC DEGREES

The Freemason November 1887 p5.

The Freemason February 1888 p13.

The Freemason May 1890 pp12-13.

The Freemason August 1890 p11.

The Freemason May 1891 p10.

The Freemason August 1892 p11; September 1892 p10.

The Freemason July 1892 p11.

The Freemason July 1893 p16; August 1893 p10; September 1893 p10.

The Freemason July 1894 p8; August 1894 p8; September 1894 p9.

The Freemason July 1895 p13.

The Freemason July 1896 p12.

The Freemason July 1897 p15.

ORDER OF THE SECRET MONITOR

History of the Order of the Secret Monitor 1887-1963 by R J Wilkinson. Published by the Grand Council of the OSM London: 1964.

The Freemason July 1887 p9.

The Freemason November 1887 p15.

The Freemason April 1889 p11.

The Freemason November 1890 p11.

The Freemason June 1896 p4.

Once, he went to the meeting of another OSM Conclave, as a visitor:

The Freemason October 1890 p13 report of a meeting of Horatio Shirley Conclave number 5.

KNIGHTS TEMPLAR ie Order of the Temple

Calendar of the Great Priory wh changes its name to Liber Ordinis Templi in 1896.

Published yearly for the Orders members. Each issue contains brief accounts of the annual meetings of the Orders of the Temple and of St John of Malta and the names of those who attended the annual meetings. For the Order of the Temple only, there is also a list of national officers; a list of the preceptories including those in suspension; and the Order's yearly accounts.

I looked at all issues of the Calendar from the early 1870s to 1900. Nelson first appeared in 1887 pp39-40; p12 for brief details of Mount Calvary D Preceptory - where it meets and how regularly; date of its warrant (1842); current preceptor. The preceptories which have letters rather than numbers are the oldest.

Calendar 1888 pp30-32.

Calendar 1894 p12: as preceptor of Mount Calvary D for the second time in only a few years; which suggests there was a shortage of members willing to take on the role.

Liber Ordinis Templi volume 1; issued 1900 for members of the Order and including the annual reports of 1896 to 1900. The issues of 1897 and 1898 had full lists of Order members. I saw 1898 first so the page numbers are for that year: p266 Nelson Prower is still a member; initiated into Mount Calvary D but not the member of any particular preceptory at present. GD members T W Coffin (p252) and Eugene E Street (p269) were still in the Order but Webster Glynes (p256) and T W Lemon (p261) had left it, and W G Lemon had died.

MOUNT CALVARY D as an Encampment:

The Freemason March 1887 p10; July 1887 p12; October 1887 p10.

The Freemason February 1888 p7.

The Freemason January 1889 p15; July 1889 p13; Oct 1889 p12.

The Freemason January 1890 p14; June 1890 p13; October 1890 p10.

The Freemason January 1891 p13; March 1891 p10; July 1891 p14; October 1891 p12.

The Freemason January 1892 p15; March 1892 p10; July 1892 p11; October 1892 p11.

The Freemason March 1893 p9; July 1893 p16; October 1893 p11.

The Freemason January 1894 p3; March 1894 p3; July 1894 p17.

The Freemason October 1894 p13.

The Freemason January 1895 p10; March 1895 p11; July 1895 p13; November 1895 p10; December 1895 p10.

The Freemason February 1896 p13; March 1896 p5; July 1896 p5. That was the last time it was referred to as an Encampment.

MOUNT CALVARY as a Preceptory:

The Freemason October 1896 p11.

The Freemason February 1900 p12 although he was at this meeting, Nelson was listed as a visitor, not as a member of the Preceptory.

The Freemason and Masonic Illustrated seen using Google, not as one of the digitised freemasons' magazines: Volume 39 1901 p74.

RED CROSS OF CONSTANTINE properly the Imperial, Ecclesiastical and Military Order of Knights of the Red Cross of Rome and Constantine.

Statement of Accounts, Annual Report and List of Officers and Conclaves published for the Order in London by George Kenning, who was a member of it. I looked at a volume at the Freemasons' Library which purported to cover 1868 to 1899. However, it did not contain any annual reports between 1874 and 1887, if any were published.

The first list of past grand officers that I found in the volume was published with the Issue of 1893; Prower appeared on p20 as, Grand Vice-Chancellor and member of the Order's Grand Senate 1893.

The first issue in which Prower was mentioned was that of 1889 for which there was a name-change of the Red Cross of Constantine to include two newly-recruited orders, those of the Knights of the Holy Sepulchre (KHS) and of St John the Evangelist: p3 and just noting here that future GD member Eugène Henri Thiellay was in the same Council as Nelson.

Issue of 1891 p3.

Issue of 1893 p3 with Nelson not on the list of those at the annual meeting of March 1893.

Issue of 1895 p3 Prower at the last meeting of his spell as Grand Marshall. Beginning on p24, the first full list I came across, of members of the Red Cross of Constantine; p41, p49 and just noting here that Nelson's current address was c/o the St Stephen's Club, suggesting he wasn't living in London, at least not all the year.

The last in the volume was the Issue of 1899 re mtg p3 of March 1899: p45 confirming that Grand Marshall level was as high as Nelson had got.

Grand Imperial Conclave meetings, which were held quarterly.

The Freemason March 1888 p3.

The Freemason March 1889 p3.

The Freemason March 1890 p4.

The Freemason March 1893 p3.

Meetings of its Premier Conclave:

The Freemason October 1887 p10.

The Freemason June 1888 p10.

The Freemason Jan 1889 p13; March 1889 p10; June 1889 p10; November 1889 p13.

The Freemason January 1890 p3; March 1890 p13; June 1890 p10; November 1890 p5.

The Freemason January 1891 p13; March 1891 p11; June 1891 p15; November 1891 p5.

The Freemason January 1892 p10; June 1892 p10; July 1892 p11; November 1892 p10.

The Freemason March 1892 p10.

The Freemason January 1893 p10; July 1893 p16; July 1893 p16; October 1893 p11.

The Freemason January 1894 p11; March 1894 p3; November 1894 p6.

The Freemason January 1895 p10; November 1895 p10; March 1895 p11.

ROYAL AND SELECT MASTERS also known as the Cryptic Rite, a reference to the basic layout of one of its rituals.

Annual Report of Proceedings of the Grand Council of RSM of Engl and Wales etc.

Published each year by George Kenning. I read the reports of 1887 to 1899; in a volume at the Freemasons' Library.

Issue of 1887: p3, pp8-9.

Issue of 1888 p3.

Nelson was not mentioned again until the Issue of 1891 in which there was a list of senior officers since 1871: p19. There was also the first list I'd come across of current RSM members and details of which council they belonged to: p23. Grand Master's Council 1 was one of the four original RSM councils and thus was not thought to need a warrant. It met in London.

Issue of 1896 p3 with annual meetings now at the Mark Masons' hall. P24.

Issue of 1899: p26.

RSM meetings Nelson went to:

The Freemason May 1886 p12.

The Freemason October 1886 p13; December 1886 p11.

The Freemason June 1887 p12; October 1887 p11.

The Freemason March 1888 p16; April 1888 p14; May 1888 p13.

The Freemason May 1889 p15; December 1889 p15;

The Freemason October 1889 p14.

The Freemason March 1890 p12, p14; May 1890 p13.

The Freemason March 1891 p12; June 1891 p10; December 1891 p13.

The Freemason March 1892 p9.

The Freemason February 1893 p11; March 1893 p10; June 1893 p11; December 1893 p9.

The Freemason June 1894 p9; October 1894 p13.

The Freemason March 1895 p11; June 1895 p7; Dec 1895 p7.

The Freemason March 1896 p10.

The Freemason July 1897 p13.

FREEMASONRY CHARITIES

The Freemason November 1891 p10.

The Freemason July 1889 p5.

The Freemason's Chronicle June 1894 p8 and May 1895 p1.

GUESTING

The Freemason February 1888 p8.

The Freemason June 1889 p4.

The Freemason November 1891 p3.

The Freemason February 1892 p8.

The Freemason May 1892 p8.

The Freemason November 1893 p7.

The Freemason June 1894 p8.

The Freemason April 1895 p15

The Freemason May 1896 p11.

LARNACA

ST PAUL'S CHAPTER 2277

The Freemason December 1894 p5.

ST GEORGE'S LODGE 2402

The Freemason December 1891 p14.

The Freemason December 1894 p11.

The Freemason Jan 1897 p12.

The reference I saw using Google was supposedly The Freemason and Masonic Illustrated volumes 32-33 1894 p231, p248. This should have turned up in the digitised online freemasons' magazine database; but it didn't.

SOCIETAS ROSICRUCIANA IN ANGLIA (SRIA)

The Metropolitan College began to publish its Transactions in 1885.

Transactions of the Metropolitan College secretary and editor, William Wynn Westbrook. Privately printed, for the SRIA

1885 issue with membership details as at 1 January 1885: p1-3.

1886 issue p3

1890-91 issue p1.

1897-98 issue p1, p6.

For a general history of SRIA so far; Nelson's not mentioned in it:

History of the Societas Rosicruciana in Anglia by its Supreme Magus Dr William Wynn Westcott. Privately printed London 1900. Especially pp14-15 for its Metropolitan College.

OTHER ESOTERIC OPTIONS

Proceedings of the Society for Psychical Research volume II 1884. London: Trübner and Co of Ludgate Hill. P317 begins the list of members at December 1884; p321 Nelson Prower MA of 12 Cambridge Terrace Hyde Park. Because several GD members were also in the Society for Psychical Research, I went through the Proceedings volumes for the 1890s, and also the Journal issues. Nelson's name didn't appear in any of them.

In the course of my research into other GD members, I've read quite a few magazines which feature spiritualism. I've not seen Nelson Prower's name in any of them.

Theosophical Society Membership Registers 1889-1901.

Now for the rest of Nelson's life!

BIRTH/YOUTH/FAMILY BACKGROUND

Prower is a very rare surname. On the day of the 1871 census (for example) there were only 28 people called Prower living in the UK.

The Prower family were rather proud of their descent from the much older Mervyn family of Wiltshire and Dorset; through the marriage of heiress Frances Mervyn of Sturminster Newton to Dr Robert Prower of Cranborne, around 1745. From the 18th century until 1869 members of the Prower family were vicars of Purton, a couple of miles north-west of Swindon in Wiltshire; starting with Frances and Robert's son Rev John Prower (1747-1827); and going on with Nelson's grandfather Rev John Mervin Prower (1784-1869) who was still vicar there when Nelson was a child. Rev John married Susannah Coles of Neath in Glamorgan. She died giving birth in 1811 to their only child, Nelson's father John Elton Mervin Prower.

John Elton Mervin Prower continued the connection with Purton, but didn't become a clergyman. He went to Charterhouse School and then spent a period travelling in Europe with William Makepeace Thackeray, a schoolfriend. After his return to England, he joined the army for a short time, serving a captain in the 67th Regiment. Later he was a major in the Royal Wiltshire Militia but the RWM was a voluntary regiment; Captain John Prower retired from the professional army around the time of his marriage. In July 1844 he married a woman of similar social background - Harriet Payn, a daughter of William Payn of Kidwells, Maidenhead, who had worked for the Thames Commissioners. Her brother William Payn was a writer; he also worked as editor of Chambers's Journal and then Cornhill Magazine; his daughter Alicia married George Earle Buckle, editor of The Times, in 1885.

After their marriage, John and Harriet Prower moved into Purton House, next door to the Rev John's vicarage; and that was where Nelson grew up. Nelson was born on 2 July 1856; the birth doesn't seem to have been registered. The name 'Nelson' hadn't been used in the family before; so I think he was named after the hero of Trafalgar. He had two elder brothers: Mervyn (sic, born 1847) and John Elton (born 1852); and three sisters - Maude (born 1854), Marion (born 1859) and Beatrice (born 1860).

On the day of the 1861 census, John Elton Mervin Prower and Harriet were at home at Purton House. Eldest son Mervyn was away at school, but the younger children were all at home and Harriet's young niece Blanche Payn had come to stay. They also had an aristocratic visitor, Lord Ashley MP, the eldest son of Anthony Ashley-Cooper, 7th Earl of Shaftesbury, the great reformer and campaigner. Six servants lived in: a footman, a cook, two nurse-maids, a governess for the daughters, and one housemaid; and I would suppose that a coachman and grooms and some gardeners were also employed by the Prowers in this rural village, while living separately. A very comfortably-off family.

I didn't find Nelson living at home with his parents and siblings on any census after 1861. On census day 1871, Nelson was the only member of his family in the UK - as it was still term-time, he was at Rugby School. His grandfather and his brother Mervyn were dead (see below for how Mervyn met his end); and Nelson's parents and siblings were abroad. In 1881, it was Nelson's turn to be travelling. John and Harriet had left Purton House and moved into London, to 9 Ashburn Place, South Kensington; Maude and Marion were with them on census day though Beatrice was elsewhere.

John Elton Mervin Prower died in 1882, while staying in Ramsgate. His personal estate was valued at £45,000. I haven't seen his Will but much of how Nelson spent the following years would be explained if Nelson had inherited from John Elton Mervin Prower enough money to live on without needing to work. When Nelson reappears on a census, in 1891, he doesn't admit to having a private income, so perhaps he had spent his and had nothing left; but census information and probate registry entries for his siblings show that Maude and Marion at least were living off inherited money.

Although they never lived in Purton House after the 1880s, members of the Prower family did continue to live in the village of Purton at least until the 1940s, at the house called Sissells.

Sources:

THE MERVYN FAMILY

Notes Historical, Generalogical and Heraldic of the Family of Mervyn was compiled by family member Sir William Richard Drake FSA, and privately printed in 1873: on pvii is printed Nelson's date of birth. Nelson's father was one of the people who had helped Drake in his researches.

JOHN ELTON MERVIN PROWER and HARRIET

Via www.myheritage.com to The County Families of the United Kingdom published London 1868: p441.

Familysearch England-ODM GS film number 425423: baptism of John Elton Mervyn Prower, son of John and Susannah; at St Michael Gloucester 20 October 1811.

Times Monday 1 January 1912 p13 a reference to the first publication of a youthful poem by Thackeray this month's Cornhill Magazine. It was a drinking song written in Weimar in the notebook of his "schoolfellow J.E.M. Prower".

See wikipedia for William Makepeace Thackeray, born 1811 so an exact contemporary of John Elton Mervyn Prower. Thackeray did not enjoy his time at Charterhouse School.

At www.purtonhouse.com there's a short history of the house, which still exists and is available for hire. The history was written by its current owner, using Ethel Richardson's A History of Purton. Unfortunately there's no mention of the Prower family on the website. They must, however, have left Purton House by 1908: Ethel Richardson lived in it from 1908 to 1922. The house was built 1810 in Regency style; with alterations to the building and a great deal of planting in the garden done around 1840, perhaps by John Elton Mervyn Prower and Harriet. At some point it was rented for three years by James Brooke, rajah of Sarawak.

THE PAYN FAMILY

For Harriet's brother James Payn see his wiki.

Times Saturday 26 March 1898 p5 Death of Mr James Payn. This is the source for his father's employment by the Thames Commissioners; he found time to run a pack of harriers as well.

Times 31 March 1898 p6 coverage of William Payn's funeral. Nelson's mother, his brother and one of his sisters went to it; though Nelson himself did not. I think he was working in Kent; if it was still term-time he may not have been able to get away. It's a pity, because amongst those attending the church service he would have encountered Henry James; Conan Doyle; Rider Haggard; members of the Ingram family who owned the Illustrated London News; representatives of Smith Elder and Co; and George Earle Buckle.

See wikipedia for George Earle Buckle (1854-1935) who married Alicia Isobel Payn in 1885. Buckle became editor of the Times in 1884 when still only 29. He stayed in post until ousted by its new owner, Lord Northcliffe, in 1911.

Gentleman's Magazine 1844 p201: marriage of John E M Prower to Harriet Payn.

NELSON'S SIBLINGS

MERVYN

Nelson's brother Mervyn Prower was the last person to die as a result of fighting between young townsmen and undergraduates in the streets of Oxford. He went to Rugby School; and then to Oxford University, to Brasenose College, in October 1866. On 9 November 1867 he was attacked in the street, hit on the head, and then kicked as he lay on the ground. He died three weeks later, in his rooms in college, having only regained consciousness for a few minutes after the assault.

Sources:

Times Saturday 30 November 1867 p12: Death of an Undergraduate.

Times Monday 2 December 1867 p1: death notice for Mervyn Prower.

Brasenose: the Biography of an Oxford College by Joseph Mordaunt Crook. Oxford University Press 2008 p206.

None of the sources give details of exactly what happened; nor whether anyone was ever arrested.

JOHN ELTON joined the Royal Engineers and ended his career as a Major. He was serving in Quebec with the Canadian Militia from 1881 if not earlier, until 1893; and then spent nearly a decade based at Falmouth in Cornwall, with the Royal Engineers' Submarine Branch.

In 1881 John Elton married Adèle Thérèse Kimber, daughter of René Édouard Kimber, the second man to hold the post of Usher of the Black Rod (Canada). He was in post from 1875 to 1901, succeeding his father, René Kimber, who had been appointed in 1867. John Elton and Adèle had three daughters - Cecile, Phyllis and Harline - and one son, John Mervyn Prower. Through their children their links with Canada were kept up: Phyllis married a man who had emigrated to Canada; and John Mervyn served with the Canadian Expeditionary Force in World War 1.

In the 1900s John Elton and Adèle had 9 Ashburn Place South Kensington as their London address; and Sissells, in Purton village, as their country residence.

John Elton Prower's politics were Conservative: he was a member of the Constitutional Club. He died, in Bath, in 1915.

Sources:

At www.myheritage.com, a copy of Armorial Families which might date from 1905: p1220
At search.ancestry.com JEP is in Canada on census day 1881.

Evidence for John Elton Prower in Canada: Canadian census 1881, seen at search.ancestry.com.

Times 16 May 1883 p1 announcement of the death of John Elton and Adele's daughter

Harline; in Quebec; aged three weeks.

A wiki on those who have been Usher of the Black Rod (Canada).

Times 16 November 1886 p1 birth announcement: a son to John Elton Prower and his wife; on 1st inst [1 November 1886] in Quebec. Though the child wasn't named, other evidence indicates this was John Mervyn Prower.

Canada Census 1891 seen at Familysearch: John Elton Prower - but not the rest of the family - is a lodger in a household in the St Louis Ward of Quebec City.

Times 24 April 1893 p13 originally published in London Gazette: John Elton Prower's appointment as Captain Royal Engineers Submarine Branch.

Times Tuesday 30 May 1893 p11 John Elton Prower of the Falmouth Division Royal Engineers at a levee given by the Prince of Wales was present.

Without taking down the details, I saw several other references to John Elton Prower in his job at Falmouth; in the Times between 1893 and 1898. Not afterwards, though, and I wonder if he had been sent to South Africa.

Familysearch British Columbia Marriage Registrations 1859-1932 GS film number 1983977: marriage of Phyllis Prower to Cyril W Hoske, 6 January 1912 at Kamloops BC.

Probate Registry 1915 for death of John Elton Prower. His brother-in-law Henry Phillipson Spottiswoode was one of his executors. Immediately below it in the list for that year was an entry for Una Catherine Prower whose normal address 166 Church Road Norwood, Henry Spottiswoode's home. She was the wife of John Elton's son John Mervyn Prower, at that time serving as Captain in H M Army.

At www.cefresearch.ca, pages of the Canadian Expeditionary Force Study Group: John Mervyn Prower fought for the 8th Canadian Infantry Battalion. DSO and bar.

MAUDE and MARION PROWER both died unmarried. They lived with their mother Harriet until her death in 1903; then in Chelsea, until Marion's death in 1908. Maude then returned to Purton, to Sissells, now owned by the Prower family. She died in 1941.

BEATRICE PROWER was the only sister of Nelson to marry:

Times 10 June 1891 p1 marriage announcements: marriage of Beatrice Prower of 9 Ashburn Place South Kensington; to Henry Phillipson Spottiswoode who's the son of a General. At St Peter's Cranley Gardens; by Rev Elton Lee who is a cousin of the bride.

Henry Spottiswoode was a solicitor. In 1911 he and Beatrice were living in Norwood, south London. Three of their five children were at home with them: Arthur, working as an articled clerk; and John and Henry who were still at school.

NELSON PROWER: EDUCATION

Nelson followed his two elder brothers to Rugby School (in 1869) and then followed Mervyn to Brasenose College (in 1875). Unlike Mervyn, he survived his years at Oxford University and graduated in 1878, with a third-class degree in history. In 1882 he became an MA; but I think you could pay for those, then.

The records of the Middle Temple suggest that Nelson began the process of qualifying as a barrister: he registered in October 1883 and passed the Roman Law examination in April 1885. On the day of the 1891 census he was still a law student - or so he told the census official - but I can't find any evidence that he passed any more of the exams; and he never practised law.

Sources: 1891 census

Rugby School Register 1675-1874 compiled by A J Lawrence. Published 1886 p176 Nelson arrived at the school aged 13 (1869).

Brasenose College Register 1509-1909 volume 55. Published by the Oxford Historical Society at the Clarendon Press 1909; p307.

Times 6 December 1878 p5 and Times Friday 13 December 1878 p10.

Oxford Historical Register 1220-1900 p816.

Times Saturday 10 June 1882 p10 University Intelligence: Nelson in a group getting their MA degree.

At archive.middletemple.org.uk the Register of Admissions 1850-85 published by the Middle Temple: p640 entry for Nelson Prower of 10 Clifford's Inn Fleet Street; registered 31 October [1883].

Times Wednesday 15 April 1885 p10 The Inns of Court. List of those who had passed the recent Council of Legal Education exams.

WORK/PROFESSION

POSSIBLY CONSIDERS AN ARMY CAREER

While he was at university, Nelson joined the Oxfordshire Rifle Volunteers. Joining a volunteer regiment was not an unusual thing for a young man to do; especially if his father was already an officer in one. It didn't necessarily lead to a life as an army professional - in fact, usually not - and it looks from the lack of records that Nelson's involvement in the regiment ceased when he graduated. However, in 1886 he was actually presented to the Prince of Wales at a levee in London, as an officer in the Central London Rangers. He was presented by Major Florence, who was probably his immediate superior in the regiment. I haven't come across any other GD members who were presented to royalty on the grounds of being a member of a voluntary militia; and my other subject of research, Henry George Norris of Arsenal Plc, never was; so I'm wondering whether Nelson was considering following his brother into the army as a full-time career. If he was considering it, the plan came to nothing: for a couple of years, when he is mentioned in issues of The Freemason, it's always as a 'Lieutenant'; but from then on, he's just plain 'Mr'.

There wasn't much on web on the Oxfordshire Rifle Volunteers.

See Wikipedia for the Central London Rangers, a nickname for the 22nd Middlesex Rifle Volunteer Corps.

APPARENTLY, AS AN EDITOR

On census day 1891, Nelson was one of the three lodgers and one boarder at 5 Doughty Street Bloomsbury. As well as being a law student, Nelson also told the census official that he was an editor. I haven't been able to find out where he was working as an editor; though he did have a relation by marriage, in George Earle Buckle, who could probably have found him that kind of employment. This was the time, though, of Nelson's greatest involvement in freemasonry. Perhaps he edited a freemasons' magazine - it would certainly explain the amount of coverage his freemasonry activities were getting. The Freemason's Chronicle is one magazine Nelson could have edited, and it happens that in 1891 its offices were very near where he was living. Freemason William Wray Morgan ran the Chronicle from his premises at the Belvidere Works, Hermes Hill, Pentonville; between King's Cross and The Angel. There's no clue in the weekly issues as to who the editor was and it's most likely that Morgan did the work himself; but Nelson could have been the editor.

Wherever he was working, and for however long he did the work, it would not necessarily have been a paid post.

AS A TEACHER

Nelson did not tell the 1901 census official that he was an editor. Either he forgot that part of his working life; or he was no longer employed that way. By 1901 he was a teacher at Clarence College in Gravesend. The college was a boarding school, with 13 boarders that census day. It was run by Charles Wimpres and his wife Elizabeth. They both taught at the school and Nelson was one of four teachers working for them and living on its premises at 72 Windmill Street in Milton. By 1905, the Wimpresses had gone and been replaced by a Mr Bishop who was a member of the Society for Psychical Research; but evidence from the Electoral Rolls shows Nelson living in St Pancras from 1903, perhaps teaching in that borough. He was still doing some teaching on the day of the 1911 census; but this time he described himself as a "tutor" - that is, he was teaching private pupils, rather than in a school.

The two census references are the only evidence I've been able to find about Nelson's work as a teacher. Even in the preface of a novel which was set in a boys' public school, Nelson didn't give any details of which schools he had worked in. I'm afraid his lack of willingness leads me to suppose that the schools were not particularly well-known or highly regarded.

Sources: census 1891, 1901, 1911

Army List 1878 Nelson Prower is in the Oxfordshire Rifle Volunteers. No details were given about his rank.

Times Monday 28 June 1886 p9 errata: Nelson's name had been omitted from the list of those presented at the levee "on Friday last" [25 June 1886]. Presented by Major Florence; as a member of the Central London Rangers.

Via archive.org to a few items on Clarence College ((see 1901 census)):

Journal of the Society of Psychical Research volume XII 1905-06 p159 the current principal of the College was Mr M S W Bishop BA; he had sent in one of the issue's curious incidents.

In Whitaker's Almanack 1909 p831 there's a reference to Clarence College merging with Cumberland House School, to form the Gravesend Boys' Grammar School.

Familysearch: Electoral Rolls St Pancras 1893-1895; 1901; 1903, 1904; 1906; 1908

Freddy Barton's Schooldays by Nelson Prower MA. London: John Ouseley Ltd of 6 Fleet Lane Farrington Street. Published early 1911. Preface, on an unnumbered page.

TRAVELS

Nelson's first long published work was written and printed in Canada. Its date of publication is uncertain; the British Library catalogue - which only has a microfiche copy without its title page - has "?1885". It's hard to keep up with Nelson's whereabouts between 1878 and 1885. He's not on the census in 1881, but must have been in London in October 1883 and April 1885 to start at the Middle Temple and take his first (what turned out to be his only) exam there. So 1881-82; or 1884-1885 are possible dates for a trip to Canada. He may have been working: the published work is about the religious attitudes of young Canadian men, whom Nelson might have met through work as a teacher. But it's just as likely, to my mind, that he went on a visit to John Elton Prower and his wife, while his brother was stationed in Quebec. Teaching does seem to have been somewhat of a last resort for him!

Though he didn't publish a book about his Canadian trip, Nelson was elected a Fellow of the Royal Geographical Society in 1887. Canada may not have been the only place he travelled to: his first novel (see below) takes place in Sweden, Poland, Constantinople and the Greek Islands; though I have to say that none of those places is described, so he could just as easily have written the book without spending a day in any of them.

In 1889-90, Nelson definitely did go to the Holy Land, a journey he clearly thought of as a pilgrimage. If the poems he published in 1894 are a guide, he travelled to the east coast of Italy by train; took a boat from Brindisi to Jaffa; and then went to Jerusalem, where being able to see the sites Jesus visited in His last days moved him to write his long narrative poem Gethsemane. On his way back to England, he visited Greece.

In the winter of 1891 he went back to the eastern Mediterranean, to Cyprus. Using his apologies for absence from freemasonry meetings to try to work out where he was, it looks as though he stayed on the island over the winter of 1894-95; possibly for part of the summer in 1896; and for the winter of 1896-97. During these long stays on the island he might have been based at Larnaca - he went to some freemasonry meetings in the town. He may have continued to go back to Cyprus after 1897 but the evidence from the freemasonry magazines isn't so good for the late 1890s.

Sources:

Proceedings of the Royal Geographical Society seen online; volume 9 1887 p254.

Royal Geographical Society Year-Book and Record issue of 1898 seen online; p152.

Cyprus:

The Freemason December 1891 p14.

The Freemason December 1894 p5, p11.

The Freemason January 1897 p12.

And a lot of 'apologies for absence': see the FREEMASONRY section above.

Familysearch electoral rolls data for Nelson Prower:

St Pancras      1893-1895; 1901; 1903, 1904; 1906; 1908

Clapham        1912 only.

ANY PUBLICATIONS?

Despite what was thought at the time, Nelson was NOT the author of BOY-WORSHIP

A pamphlet called Boy-Worship was printed in Oxford in 1880. It's not clear now how many copies there were of it, as it was meant for circulation within the University. Few copies have survived and I haven't been able to see any of them. However, the pamphlet is mentioned in several modern studies of homosexuality in 19th century England. According to one of those modern studies, it was a 'how-to' book for the seduction of fellow students.

Although homosexual acts between consenting adults weren't illegal in England until the Labouchere Amendment of 1885, the pamphlet's author may still have feared the wrath of the University authorities. He wasn't taking any chances and published it anonymously. It's now known to have been the work of Charles Edward Hutchinson (born 1854), a graduate of Brasenose College whom Nelson must have known; but at the time, with nobody sure who had written it, Nelson Prower was amongst the men being rumoured to have done so. It's interesting that Nelson's name was bandied about in University circles until Boy-Worship's author owned up, and I have wondered myself about the sexuality of some of the GD members. The pamphlet was written on the understanding that homosexual relationships were very common at Oxford University, between staff and students, as well as between students. However, I think that Nelson's devout Christianity might have prevented him from acting on any homosexual tendencies he did feel.

Sources:

There's a full text of the pamphlet on the website of the Hathi Trust; but you can only read it if you are resident in the USA. The British Library doesn't have a copy, which isn't surprising.

At onlinebooks.library.upenn.edu its catalogue entry is: Boy-Worship author Charles Edward Hutchinson born 1854; with Nelson Prower as a contributor to it. Published Oxford 1880.

However at //dp.la, the Digital Public Library of America, the catalogue entry for the copy at Cornell University notes that it was "unjustly ascribed to Prower" of Brasenose.

The modern references to it:

Aestheticism and Sexual Parody 1840-1940 by Dennis Dennisof. New York: Cambridge University Press 2006 p39.

Secreted Desires - The Major Uranians: Hopkins, Pater, Wilde by Michael Matthew Kaylor. Published Masaryk University Press and originally a D Phil thesis: pxvii.

Mapping Male Sexuality: the Nineteenth Century by Jay Losey and William Dean Brewer. Madison New Jersey: Fairleigh Dickinson University Press p262 in Part Two: Victorian.

THEOLOGY AND MORALITY

This 60-page booklet was printed - presumably at Nelson's expense - by the Gazette Printing Company of Montreal; probably in 1884 or 1885. In it, Nelson addressed the older generation of immigrants from the UK to Canada. He voiced his anxiety about the decline of Christian belief he had found in the immigrants' sons, and worried about where it might lead - possibly as far as the younger generation demanding independence from Great Britain. Nelson's own beliefs are stated very clearly in the booklet: he is an unquestioning Christian. He sees belief in Christianity as the bedrock of the Empire; is sure that other religions (past and present) offer no basis for ethical behaviour or social cohesion; and demonstrates over 20 pages or so that the decline of religious belief has always led to a collapse in moral values in the past. He urges the older generation to lead the country's youth away from rationalism and back to Christianity.

REGGIE ABBOTT

Reggie Abbott or the Adventures of a Swedish Officer by Nelson Prower was the first of two novels Nelson wrote. Published London: George Redway 1890 with the British Library date stamp "13/2/90". Quotes: p2, p311.

The British Library's copy had its pages still uncut so it was quite difficult for me to get the gist of the plot. However, it was about religious differences between Reggie Abbott and his mother; with a reconciliation of sorts at the end (I think). It was set in the early 19th century, when Reggie was born, the son of an Englishman with a "natural taste for travel" and the widow he married when he reaches Sweden. It ended with Reggie declaring (in a manner rather removed from Nelson's views from only a few years before) that "that there is about as much probability of truth in one creed as in another". Perhaps a few years as a freemason had altered Nelson's religious opinions somewhat, though he was still a convinced Christian.

Even the reviewer in The Freemason was not very complimentary about the book, saying that its three main female characters were not well drawn; and suggesting that the author would be better off writing essays, than novels.

Source for the review:

The Freemason March 1890 p6

VARIOUS VERSES published London: Hayman Christy Lilly Ltd of 20-22 Bride Street EC. Times 3 January 1894 p10 Various Verses is in the Publications To-day column.

There are works by three authors (all men) in it: W F Harvey; Nelson; and the Rev R C Fillingham. There doesn't seem to be any over-arching theme to the book as a whole; so maybe the three poets just got together to lower the costs of each of them publishing a very small book on their own.

Poetry is a closed book to me so I'll just list the titles of Nelson's poems with comments on what some of them are about; and say that most are sonnets and only a page long, though the last, Gethesmane, is a long narrative work, begun by Nelson in 1889 during his time in the Holy Land, completed the following year, and then altered slightly for this book. Gethsemane had been published already, but anonymously. The comments of Nelson's friends had been "kind" so this time, it was published with his name attached. Though the poems are all probably from around the time Gethsemane was written, the only one that's dated is Gethsemane.

Nelson's poems:

p25 Charles the Second.

P26 Non Angli Sed Angeli.

This describes modern male Christian youth as a realisation of the Pope's comment - fighting for Christianity, in Christian brotherhood.

P27 On Landing at Jaffa.

The thrill of reaching the Holy Land.

P28 The Stoic and the Epicurean Conceptions of Death.

P29 On Seeing the Old Ships in Portsmouth Harbour.

Celebrating the young men of the Empire, joining the navy to free the world from tyranny.

P30 To the Archbishop of Canterbury.

As the poems are not dated, it's a bit difficult to suggest which archbishop Nelson is writing about. The most likely is probably William Thomson, who was installed in 1862 and died in 1890. He had previously been bishop of Gloucester and was perhaps known to the Prower family.

P31 On the Starting of Dr Nansen.

Describing the explorer as a "gallant Viking"; he's off not to the South Pole but to the source of the Nile.

p32 Toulon and Spezia.

P33 Ad Matthaeum Arnold. A tribute to the poet.

P34 On a First View of the Acropolis.

As a "Homage to the slain!"

P35 The White Chalk Cliffs.

With the poet glad to be home after travel in the South.

P36 On Passing Loretto in the Train.

P37 The "Victoria".

p38 Imperium et Libertas. On the Opening of the Imperial Institute.

This poem is another reference to anti-Imperialist tendencies Nelson had come across in Canada. He describes those who are agitating for greater independence as equivalents of King Lear's Goneril and Regan.

P39 The Muezzin.

This is an interesting one - it equates the Muslim call to prayer with the bells of a Christian church; both announcing that God is good.

P40 Abide With Me. In Latin.

P41 Translation from Newman.

That is, a translation into Latin.

'Newman' is Cardinal Newman, who wrote 'Abide with Me'. Theologian and academic John Henry Newman (born 1801) was racing up the Church of England hierarchy in 1845 when he converted to Roman Catholicism and began to race up that hierarchy instead. Nelson's two translations were perhaps written to commemorate Newman's death, in August 1890.

Pp42-67 Gethsemane.

In which Nelson criticises those brought up as Christians only to lose their faith; and those who call themselves Christian while not following its doctrine.

The Freemason found Nelson's poems more to its liking than his earlier novel.

Source for the review:

The Freemason January 1894 p6

TALKS AT SOCIETAS ROSICRUCIANA IN ANGLIA

Nelson's talks at meetings of Societas Rosicruciana in Anglia, in 1894 and 1896, were published in the SRIA's Transactions volumes; but you could also buy them as free-standing leaflets, at least in the USA and as late as 1907.

Seen at www.iapsop.com/archive/materials, a list of talks given at SRIA. The list was published in The Rosicrucian Brotherhood volume 1; published by S C Gould of Manchester New Hampshire 1907 p35.

FREDDY BARTON'S SCHOOLDAYS

Freddy Barton's Schooldays by Nelson Prower MA. London: John Ouseley Ltd of 6 Fleet Lane Farrington Street. No year of publication in the book; and the stamp on the British Library's copy doesn't have the date on it. However, The Westminster Review published a review of it in its April 1911 edition. Nelson wrote a very short preface to the novel, in which he referred to another novel in this genre, Charles Turley's Maitland Major and Minor. Nelson implies that though "a delightful story" Turley's work lacks an extra dimension which Nelson has put into his new work, "a study of conditions of life in a private school"; including "the abuses that disfigure the prefect system", and the inevitable problems that arise in a school where power is divided between two men.

Maitland Major and Minor by Charles Turley (professional name of Charles Turley Smith). Published London: William Heinemann 1905. This work was in its 3rd edition by 1926; Nelson's own novel was never reprinted.

The Westminster Review volume 75 January-June 1911P p475. London: E Marlborough and Co of 51 Old Bailey EC.

NELSON'S POLITICS

Perhaps this is as good a place as any to mention Nelson's politics. If you have read this far you'll have a pretty good idea of them. When he was initiated into the GD in 1888, the address he gave for correspondence was the St Stephen's Club of Westminster. The St Stephen's Club had been founded in 1870. In 1879, Charles Dickens' son (another Charles Dickens) remarked on its very close relations with the Conservative Party, so that if you didn't have "Constitutional and Conservative Principles" you would never get in. The club's premises until the 1960s were at the corner of Embankment and Bridge Street, where Portcullis House is now. The club still exists and its connection with the Conservative Party continues.

Source for the club: wikipedia, which has the quote from Charles Dickens' son.

FAMILY

Nelson's mother Harriet died in June 1903. She had moved out of the Prowers' house in 9 Ashburn Place; probably so that John Elton, Adele and their family could move in. On the day of her death she and her daughters Maude and Marion were living at 110 Elm Park Gardens in Chelsea.

In 1909, at the age of 53, Nelson Prower married a widow, Maria Bowles. Their marriage was registered in the densely-populated St Pancras area of north London, where Nelson had been living for a few years; and I suggest that they had met there, a maximum of two years before the marriage. I don't know how they would have come across each other earlier in their lives - they moved in very different social circles.

Maria Coleman had been born in Reading in 1859. In 1884, she married Henry James Bowles, who worked for a railway company. In 1891, Maria and Henry were living at the station house at Hoo, near Maidstone in Kent, where Henry was the station manager. Three sons were with them on that day: Henry junior, William, and Alfred. Servants of any sort were not an option for a family on a railway wage, and Maria was doing the housework and looking after her children without paid help. I would have liked to know whether Henry and Maria had any more children, as a son called 'Ben' had an influence on Nelson and Maria's lives; but I couldn't find the family on census day 1901; perhaps one of the three sons I've found out about was usually called Ben. They were still living in north Kent at that time, I think, because Henry Bowles died there in 1907.

Nelson and Maria Prower moved south of the Thames after their marriage: Nelson was on the Electoral Roll for Clapham in 1912. Unfortunately, on census day 1911 they were visiting William Owston and his wife Ada, at 28 Crescent Lane Clapham Park; so I don't know where they set up home. When William Owston filled in the census form, he described Nelson as "Author and Tutor" - presumably because Nelson had asked him to. Freddy Barton's Schooldays had probably just been published. In addition to whatever royalties the novel was earning, Nelson was doing some tutoring to help pay the bills. It's most unlikely that Maria had more than a small amount of money of her own.

I don't know how long Nelson and Maria continued to think of England as their home, but records indicate they may have been living in Canada by 1921. I presume that all the anxiety Nelson expressed in the early 1880s, about Canada's future, had been set aside or overcome. Nelson may have carried on teaching in Canada for some years, but by 1937 he had retired. The various passenger lists at Ancestry.co.uk show Nelson Prower making several trips from Canada to England: one arriving in England May 1921 and then departing in May 1922; one arriving in June 1928 and I couldn't find a return journey for that; and a last one in March 1937, returning in June.

In the 1920s Nelson and Maria were probably living on the eastern side of Canada but in the end they went to Vancouver, following Maria's son Ben. Nelson Prower died in Vancouver in October 1943. Maria died at Burnaby, BC, in 1947.

Sources: freebmd, census entries 1891-1911, probate registry entries.

Familysearch Electoral Rolls for Clapham 1912.

Seen at Familysearch: Canada Passenger Lists 1881-1922 show Maria Prower but apparently not Nelson, arriving at Halifax Nova Scotia on the Aquitaine, June 1919.

Passenger Lists UK to Canada, seen at Ancestry.co.uk though without paying an extra amount in subscription I couldn't see the full details of most of the voyages.

UK Incoming Passenger Lists seen at Ancestry.co.uk.

Seen at homepages.rootsweb.ancestry.com, transcriptions of the details of deaths in British Columbia Deaths 1943; LDS microfilm 1953640, item number 7348.

Seen at Familysearch: British Columbia Death Registrations 1872-1986, GS film number 2032471. The entry for Maria Prower gives her date and place of birth, and her original surname.

BASIC SOURCES I USED for all Golden Dawn members.

Membership of the Golden Dawn: The Golden Dawn Companion by R A Gilbert. Northampton: The Aquarian Press 1986. Between pages 125 and 175, Gilbert lists the names, initiation dates and addresses of all those people who became members of the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn or its many daughter Orders between 1888 and 1914. The list is based on the Golden Dawn's administrative records and its Members' Roll - the large piece of parchment on which all new members signed their name at their initiation. All this information had been inherited by Gilbert but it's now in the Freemasons' Library at the United Grand Lodge of England building on Great Queen Street Covent Garden. Please note, though, that the records of the Amen-Ra Temple in Edinburgh were destroyed in 1900/01. I have recently (July 2014) discovered that some records of the Horus Temple at Bradford have survived, though most have not; however those that have survived are not yet accessible to the public.

For the history of the GD during the 1890s I usually use Ellic Howe's The Magicians of the Golden Dawn: A Documentary History of a Magical Order 1887-1923. Published Routledge and Kegan Paul 1972. Foreword by Gerald Yorke. Howe is a historian of printing rather than of magic; he also makes no claims to be a magician himself, or even an occultist. He has no axe to grind.

Family history: freebmd; ancestry.co.uk (census and probate); findmypast.co.uk; familysearch; Burke's Peerage and Baronetage; Burke's Landed Gentry; Armorial Families; thepeerage.com; and a wide variety of family trees on the web.

Famous-people sources: mostly about men, of course, but very useful even for the female members of GD. Oxford Dictionary of National Biography. Who Was Who. Times Digital Archive.

Useful source for business and legal information: London Gazette and its Scottish counterpart Edinburgh Gazette. Now easy to find (with the right search information) on the web.

Catalogues: British Library; Freemasons' Library.

Wikipedia; Google; Google Books - my three best resources. I also used other web pages, but with some caution, as - from the historian's point of view - they vary in quality a great deal.

Find the web pages of Roger Wright and Sally Davis, including my list of people initiated into the Order of the Golden Dawn between 1888 and 1901, at:

www.wrightanddavis.co.uk

***

Henry Pullen-Burry now (2015) has a page on wikipedia. However, it concentrates on the occult side of Henry's life; and doesn't have much information on Rose. So I decided to do a life-by-dates biography myself.

Dr Henry Pullen-Burry was initiated into the Hermetic Golden Dawn at its Isis-Urania temple in London, during November 1892; taking the Latin motto 'Anima pura sit'. The month was a busy one for new members: Harriett Emily Lammin, Charles Chase Parr, Albert Duncan Macmillan and Alfred J Hailey were also initiated. I imagine it was all done in one ceremony though the GD records aren't clear on that point. Despite his professional and family commitments Henry completed the study necessary to progress further in the Order in less than 18 months, and was initiated into the GD's inner, 2nd Order on 14 March 1894 - a date which had great significance for him later in life.

During the mid-1890s Henry was a very active member of the Order. The GD's Flying Roll 8 - A Geometrical Way to Draw a Pentagram - is by him; and he also contributed the fourth vision to Flying Roll 33 - Seven Visions of Squares upon the Enochian Tablets. He was acknowledged by other GD members as one of the Order's authorities on the Kabbalah. He and Annie Horniman met regularly to go astral travelling together. And around 1897-98 he did his best to recruit Arthur Conan Doyle to the GD; though without success. He was also willing to play his part in the mundane-but-necessary administrative work of the Order. But then, in 1898, he left England, ostensibly to get rich quick in the Klondike goldrush; and never returned.

Henry's wife Rose Pullen-Burry, née Anwyl, was initiated the week after her husband joined the GD's 2nd Order - on 20 March 1894, choosing the Latin motto 'Urge semper igitur'. That GD meeting was another busy one: Frederick Leigh Gardner and sisters Charlotte and Margaret Elizabeth Wright were also initiated. Rose probably didn't know the Wright sisters; but Gardner was an acquaintance of Henry's, through Mark freemasonry, and had possibly been recommended to the GD by Henry, though several other members knew him as well. Rose's progress to the GD's 2nd Order was nearly as quick as her husband's had been - she was initiated into it on 3 August 1895 - though she was never as prominent a member of the GD, and didn't serve as an administrative volunteer. She did continue as a member of the GD after her husband left her. When the original GD fell apart into its two daughter orders in 1903 she became a member of the Independent and Rectified Rite (or Order) the one founded by A E Waite and Marcus Worsley Blackden; though she was not one of the IRR's founder members.

This is the first of my three life-by-dates files on Henry and Rose Pullen-Burry. It covers their family background and Henry's professional life up to the time of their marriage in 1882.

Update September 2016: in August 2016 I was contacted by someone in Australia who had recently begun to research the Burry family of Sompting in Sussex. The someone didn't want to be named or even acknowledged, but I like to pay my debts. The someone - I shall call her 'my contact in Canberra' - sent me digital copies of original documents, and transcripts of newspaper announcements. Using them, the history of Henry Pullen-Burry's family in the decades just before he was born, has become a lot clearer. So many many thanks to my contact in Canberra.

THE BURRY FAMILY OF SOMPTING

People called Burré, Bury or (more recently) Burry were living in the parish of Sompting near Worthing in Sussex. Two 19th-century antiquarians found evidence that the contemporary Burrys of Sompting could trace their ancestry back to the nephew and heir of Richard Burré, whose tomb in the parish church dates from 1527.

Source: The Herald and Genealogist volume 1 1863 letter to the editor from a Mark Antony Lower: A Curiosity of Heraldry at Sompting. Mr Lower traced the family back to a Walter Burry who was MP for New Shoreham in 1319.

Via archive.org to Sussex Archaeological Collections volume 41 1898 printed by Farncombe and Co of Lewes for Sussex Archaeological Society: pp8-21, article by J Lewis André FSA: Sompting Church; plus the article's Appendix pp22-24 which mentions 15 headstones of members of the Burry family; latest listed was from 1784.

17th to EARLY 19TH CENTURIES

In 1689 an Edward Burry was a sheep farmer on a leased estate at Sompting Peverel. An 18th-century Henry Burry leased the demesne of Cokeham Manor.

Sources:

Victoria County History of Sussex volume 6 part 1 by A Constable published 1980: p35.

Sussex Archaeological Collections volume 41 1898 p24.

Sussex Poll for 1820 a list of current freeholders in the rape of Bramber includes p29 a Henry Burry of Sompting and p30 a George Pullen of Lancing

Via archive.org to Sussex Archaeological Collections volume 41 1898, J Lewis André's article, see above.

1780s

Among the children of Henry Burry of Sompting, and his wife Elizabeth, were another Henry (born 1787) and his sister Ann (born 1785).

Information from: my contact in Canberra who saw transcripts of the baptisms on Ancestry.com. I've only got access to Ancestry.co.uk. At Familysearch GS film number 001068515 I saw the baptism of Ann Burry daughter of Henry and Elizabeth; on 29 July 1785 at Sompting. But Familysearch didn't have the baptism record of Henry Burry born 1787.

1813

Ann Burry and George Pullen were married in Sompting.

Source: Familysearch England-ODM GS = 1068992. Plus information on the marriage at www.myheritage.com.

1816

Henry Pullen-Burry's father John Pullen was born at Lancing, Sussex; son of George and Ann Pullen.

Source: Familysearch England-ODM GS film number 0915460, 0416749: birth of John Pullen 28 January 1816 at Lancing.

EARLY 19TH CENTURY

The Burry family rented out some of their property as lodgings for summer visitors to the south coast. Their holiday tenants included (in July and August 1827) Mary Wollstonecraft Shelley, widow of the poet and author of Frankenstein.

Source:

The Letters of Mary Wollstonecraft Shelley volume 1. Editor Betty T Bennett. Published Baltimore and London: The Johns Hopkins University Press 1980; p556-570.

Comment by Sally Davis: the woman from whom Mary Wollstonecraft Shelley rented her holiday home was possibly Jane Maria Burry, née Scott, who had married Henry Burry (born 1787) in 1814. Source for the marriage was seen by my contact in Canberra: entry of the marriage in the register of St James Clerkenwell; 24 December 1814.

1838

Henry Burry (born 1787) prepared his Will. The Will set up a trust fund which would give both his wife Jane Maria, and his niece Elizabeth Pullen, an income for life, based on the profits of the various land-holdings Henry had in and around Sompting. As Henry and Jane Maria had no children, Henry's nephew John Pullen would work the land. If Elizabeth Pullen had no children, John Pullen would inherit the land after the deaths of the other beneficiaries. John Pullen was named as one of the Will's executors; and also as a trustee of the trust fund.

Sources:

Will of Henry Burry, prepared 1838, copy of which is now at the Public Record Office: PROB 11/2046 Image Reference.

Freebmd for the marriage of Elizabeth Pullen.

Comment by Sally Davis: the Will is a long and complex document; and the clerk who prepared the copy now at the PRO had handwriting that was very difficult to read. I hope I've got the gist of what Henry Burry wanted done; but I may have misunderstood, and left things out. I think the Will indicates that Henry Burry was thinking of his nephew John Pullen as his heir.

1841

John Pullen and his sister Elizabeth were living in Sompting with their uncle Henry and aunt Jane Maria Burry.

Source: 1841 census.

Comment by Sally Davis: perhaps Henry and Jane Maria had taken in John and Elizabeth around 1838, which was why Henry Burry's Will was drawn up then.

1846

Death of Henry Burry in Sompting.

Source: freebmd and see 1852 below.

MID-19TH CENTURY but apparently not before that

Sompting became an important centre of market gardening, especially fruit farming.

Source: Victoria County History Sussex volume 6 part 1 pp34-35, p53, p59-60 which comments on the opportunities offered Sussex farmers and gardeners by the expansion of towns like Brighton, Worthing and Hove as holiday resorts.

1849

John Pullen's sister Elizabeth married George Baker.

Source: freebmd.

Comment by Sally Davis: George Baker ran a grocery and drapery business in Littlehampton. This marriage might have made a very big difference to John Pullen's future, if any children had been born to it. But Elizabeth and George Baker were childless.

BY APRIL 1851 AT THE LATEST

John Pullen was living in Sompting with his aunt Jane Maria Burry, widow of Henry. Under the terms of Henry Burry's Will, John was running Henry's market garden business on 20 acres in the village. The business was employing 13 men.

Source: census entry for an unnamed house in Sompting.

Comment by Sally Davis. Jane Maria was 79. Although she gave her source of income as money derived from property she owned, she wasn't doing any farming or market gardening herself. John Pullen was working the land for her, as Henry Burry had intended. Aunt and nephew were employing two servants who lived in: a housekeeper and a skivvy.

SUMMER 1851

Jane Maria Burry died.

Source: freebmd.

Comment by Sally Davis: I'm not sure I've read the Will of Henry Burry correctly on this; but I think that on her death, the income received by Jane Maria for her lifetime went to Elizabeth Pullen, now Baker, for her lifetime (and she survived John Pullen).

28 DECEMBER 1852 - the marriage of Henry Pullen-Burry's parents:

John Pullen of Lancing and Sompting married Emily, only daughter of George Heather of Broadwater.

Sources: freebmd; and via www.genesreunited.co.uk to Sussex Advertiser of 4 January 1853 p7.

I found very little information on Emily's father. This was probably him, via www.genesreunited.co.za to Brighton Gazette of 3 May 1855: a man called George Heather was chosen as a constable for the hundred of Worthing.

At genesreunited and elsewhere on the web, there was mention of a George Heather Smith of Worthing who owned a drapers' shop later in the 19th century; possibly a relation.

?BY 1855

Elizabeth Pullen Baker's husband George had died.

Source: discovery.nationalarchives.gov.uk, document C17/3/65 now housed at the Public Record Office, is papers connected with a Chancery case dated 1855: Baker v Baker ex parte George Baker, late of Littlehampton Sussex, grocer and draper. The Applicant is Elizabeth Baker of Sompting, his widow; and the defendants were: Alfred Baker of Ashington Sussex.

1855

Birth of the GD member later known as Henry Pullen-Burry, at Sompting. His birth was registered as: Henry Burry Pullen. His siblings Louisa (1856); Bessie (the traveller and writer, 1858); Horace John (1860); Mary (1861); Emily (1863); and Arthur (1867) were also registered with the surname 'pullen'; but after Arthur, there was a change.

Sources: freebmd

1859

Earliest reference I could find to John and Emily Pullen living at Rectory House, Sompting.

Source: Victoria County History Sussex volume 6 part 1 p60 which cites Kelly's Directory of Sussex issue of 1859.

1861

John and Emily Pullen and their family were living at Rectory House Sompting. They employed a housekeeper, two nurses and a housemaid. John Pullen's market gardening business covered 54 acres and employed 28 workers.

Source: 1861 census.

FAMILY LIFE

IF these are Henry's parents, his family life was uncomfortable: the father, "pious and calvinistic", a regular church-goer and a good employer within his limits, but "hot-tempered and dictatorial" with his family; the mother, also pious, well-read and cultured, enjoying music and painting especially, but enduring a life of "intense and prolonged physical suffering" before dying of heart failure. Both parents were curious about spiritualism and held seances; all the family believed in ghosts; and one of their sons was a gifted psychic. If Henry's father is the man meant, he believed that his dead uncle visited him in dreams and gave him advice about how to manage his market-gardening business.

Although Henry never joined the family business, his writings show that he knew a lot about how to organise a productive, low carbon (though of course he didn't put it that way) market garden. They also show a habit of close observation that would have stood him in good stead in his work during the first part of his life.

Later in his life, Henry's views stood outside normal politics. However, he rejected the concept of private property and privately-held wealth. He also saw the traditional Victorian family as a very low point in the evolution of human society, lower (for example) than tribal life; and advocated that all children be removed from their parents to be educated. In one lecture he related an anecdote about family life with Rose where a morning conversation with her caused him to forget important information passed to him in a dream.

Sources are all in the unpublished set of typescripts at the Freemasons' Library catalogued as SRIA1938m.

?The parents: Volume 3: Science and Hermetic Philosophy part 2. December 1919 Lecture 101 p606 and Lecture 102 p607. As with the ?evidence for 1852, no names are given.

Low opinion of family life: Volume 3: Science and Hermetic Philosophy part 2: January 1919 Lectures 54-56 especially Lecture 55 when he declares that being reincarnated into a family means a soul has been condemned to a life of very little educational value to it. Also January 1920 Lecture 106 p641.

The close observation: Volume 3: Science and Hermetic Philosophy parts 1 and 2 passim.
The low carbon market garden: Volume 4: The Aquarian Age. July 1921 Lecture 56 pp334-336.

The separation of children from their parents: Volume 4: The Aquarian Age May 1921 Lecture 48 p283 though he does say that no one will need to pay for their children's education.

MARCH 1868

John Pullen officially added the surname 'Burry' to his own one of Pullen.

Source: a deed dated 25 March 1868 and registered at the High Court of Chancery. An official notice prepared by his solicitors and dated 30 March 1868 was published in the Chichester Express and West Sussex Journal p1.

Comment by Sally Davis: Henry Burry who died in 1846 was the last man called Burry to live in Sompting; though Familysearch shows another branch of the family living in Hampshire by the late 18th century. By taking the extra surname, John Pullen was doing what he could to keep the surname alive in the village; and acknowledging how his uncle had helped set him up in business.

Comment by Sally Davis on the naming of John and Emily's children, after this important change. The entries in freebmd show that Anne Elizabeth (born 1869) was the only one of John and Emily's children to be registered with the surname 'pullen burry'; Walter (born 1871) and Hubert (born 1872) were registered as 'burry'. The official notice of the added surname covered only John Pullen, not his wife or any of his children, but all the children used both surnames later in their lives. Though the surnames weren't joined by a hyphen in the official documents of 1868, it was soon added on.

John Pullen Burry and Emily were still living at Rectory House Sompting. On census day they were employing a household staff of cook, housemaid and nurse. Their children Henry, Louisa, Horace, Mary, Emily, Arthur and Anne were all at home on census day. Henry, now 16, was not listed as still at school, or as working; so I'm not quite sure what he was doing - studying at home perhaps. Source: 1871 census.

Comment by Sally Davis: the addition of 'burry' to 'pullen' is another bit of indirect evidence that John had inherited land from someone called 'burry'. The 1871 census didn't have information on how many people John Pullen Burry employed in his business but the 1881 census does indicate that it was continuing to expand.

SCHOOLING

I have found a small amount of information on where and how Henry and his siblings were educated. Bessie, Horace, Mary and Emily were all at school on census day 1871; the three youngsters were still living at home but Bessie was one of the pupils at Emily Davis' boarding school at Liverpool Terrace, New Shoreham. Later, Bessie spent some time continuing her education in Germany; perhaps some of her siblings also did so. On the day of the 1881 census, Henry's two youngest brothers were the only ones still at school: Arthur at Cranford College in Cookham near Maidenhead; and Walter at Helen Pollard's school at 15 Dyke Road Brighton. Perhaps Henry had gone to Miss Pollard's and then Cranford College in the late 1860s/early 1870s.

Sources: 1871 census; Victoria County History Sussex volume 6 part 1 p60; 1881 census. Who Was Who 1929-40 p1110 entry for Bessie Pullen-Burry.

Comment by Sally Davis:

If John and Emily were regular attenders at the Church of England parish church - which it seems as though they were - they will have been able to begin their children's education by sending them to Sompting's National School. This was only the equivalent of a primary school, however. John and Emily wanted their children to be better educated than that and were willing to pay the price that level of ambition entailed - both the school and college fees and the loss of the income they could have had if the children had been sent to work very young.

PROBABLY EARLY 1870s - MEDICAL TRAINING

Henry Pullen-Burry is in a list of students taking London University exams in 1874; they may have been medical exams, but I think they were entrance exams. He was a medical student in 1877, at University College London and at the London Hospital, probably doing his year as hospital houseman. In January 1878 he became a member of the Royal College of Surgeons and was licensed to practice by the Royal College of Physicians. From that date he could work as a private general practitioner and was eligible to apply for posts in the public sphere.

Sources:

London Medical Record 1874 p508.

London Medical Record volume 5 1877 p391.

Source for Henry's time as a house surgeon in London: Unpublished set of typescripts at the Freemasons' Library catalogued as SRIA1938m. Volume 3: Science and Hermetic Philosophy part 1; Lecture 50 December 1918: p229.

??MID-1870s TO AT LEAST 1884

Henry Pullen-Burry served in a volunteer militia.

Sources: only one definite, from 1884. Plus an anecdote about a spiritualist experience he had later in life but which referred to a time he had been in the army. Recounted without any specific dates, in Unpublished set of typescripts at the Freemasons' Library catalogued as SRIA1938m; Volume 3: Science and Hermetic Philosophy Part 2: Lecture 114 March 1920: p680 though without any firm date.

Comment by Sally Davis: it was nothing unusual in the late 19th century for young a young man to join a volunteer regiment. Several other GD members did so and so did the subject of my other history research project, Henry George Norris.

FROM 1878 TO 1898

Henry Pullen-Burry worked as a doctor. However, later in life he viewed doctors as the worst kind of materialist scientist. Although he thought that an occultist needed to be, in some senses, a physician, in 1921 he also noted how many medical practitioners were atheists and suggested that they were being recruited as black magicians. Doctors ranked with salesmen in his eyes - about as low as you could get in terms of morals.

Sources: Unpublished set of typescripts at the Freemasons' Library catalogued as SRIA1938m.

Occultist as physician: Volume 3 Science and Hermetic Philosophy part 2 Lecture 118 April 1920 p703. Doctors and black magic: Volume 4: The Aquarian Age. Lecture 36 January 1921: eg pp211-216 but he sticks the knife into doctors pretty regularly.

Comment by Sally Davis: by the 1920s Henry's hostility towards doctors had extended to the whole concept of science as practised in the materialist society of the West. He thought modern biological science in particular had lost the plot - if it had ever had it - of history as a progress of the soul through reincarnation in different species. He particularly condemned Darwin's theory of evolution by natural selection, as expounded by Thomas Huxley whom Henry called a "pseudo-scientist", and I get the impression that he just couldn't stomach the idea of his soul having spent time as an ape; despite what he said about animals, plants and even rocks having some level of soul.

Sources: Unpublished set of typescripts at the Freemasons' Library catalogued as SRIA1938m. Evolution of the soul through reincarnation: Volume 3: Science and Hermetic Philosophy parts 1 and 2 passim.

The description of Huxley: Volume 3 Science and Hermetic Philosophy part 2 March 1920 Lecture 113 p673. The reference to Huxley comes in a passage where Henry was telling his audience that the work of Gustave Geley and Juliette Bisson with the medium Eva Carrière had proved the existence of life after death. His information on the work of Geley and Bisson had come from an article by Stanley de Brath in Occult Review volume 29 number 3: 149-156: Super-Normal Physiology and Materialization. De Brath was convinced; and so, therefore, was Henry - especially as he wanted to be.

There's coverage of Geley and Juliette Bisson on wikipedia; pretty sensationalist some of it is, too. For a calmer view, which disputes the idea that Bisson and Carrière had a lesbian relationship, see:

The Spiritualist Movement: Speaking with the Dead in America and Around the World published 2013, editor Christopher M Moreman. I saw this on the web; the British Library doesn't seem to have a copy or hasn't catalogued it yet, so I couldn't see the publisher. P234 describes how photographs were found amongst Geley's papers after his death which showed how Eva's materialisations had been faked - you could see the wires if you looked carefully.

A bit more background on Bisson and on Carrière, and the involvement of a Munich-based psychiatrist:

Unruly Spirits by M Brady Bower. Urbana Illinois: University of Illinois Press 2010: p117 in the chapter The Limits of Method

PROBABLY 1878 to MID-1880

Henry worked at the London Hospital, firstly as house physician, then as house surgeon.

Source:

Reports from Committees Session 1890 volume XI covering 11 February to 18 August 1890 in the House of Lords; Paper 225. Together with the Proceedings of the Committee, Minutes of Evidence, and Appendix. GB House of Lords Select Committee on Children's Life Insurance Bill. Published Eyre and Spottiswoode 1890, printed by Henry Hansard and Son. Online version found by Roger Wright in the outer reaches of archive.org. Minutes of Evidence 16 July 1890 pp23-24 evidence of Henry Pullen Burry about his medical qualifications and experience, though he didn't give exact dates.

UNCERTAIN DATE BUT PERHAPS DURING HIS TIME AT LONDON HOSPITAL

Henry was a voluntary fireman.

Source: an anecdote Henry told, in Volume 3 Science and Hermetic Philosophy Part 1: Lecture 50 December 1918: p299 though again with no definite date.

Comment by Sally Davis: a date of the late 1870s, while Henry was still working in London, seems a likely time for this to have happened: surely fighting fires was young men's work.

1879

Henry's name was in the General Medical Council list for the first time.

Source:

GMC Register 1879 p142.

Comment by Sally Davis: the address Henry gave for this first listing was Sompting, probably because he didn't have a fixed address in London.

EXPANSION OF JOHN PULLEN'S BUSINESS

In 1881 John Pullen Burry told the census official that his market garden now covered 600 acres, and employed 45 labourers. Horace, now 21, was now working for his father; by 1891 so were Arthur and Walter. Only Horace, Anne and Hubert were living at home on census day 1881. John and Emily employed a cook and a housemaid; but - for the first time - there was also a live-in governess in the household.

Source: 1881 census.

Comment by Sally Davis: Henry's long medical training probably couldn't have taken place without his father's business abilities and energy; however badly they may have got along.

There are quite a few references to the Pullen-Burry market gardening business, on the web. The firm is also mentioned in: Market Gardening: The History of Commercial Flower Fruit and Vegetable Growing by Ronald Webber. David and Charles 1972: p80.

This is a bit speculative, but while working my way through the history of Sompting in the Victoria County History Sussex volume 6 part 1 I noticed on p60 mention that the Crofts family - who owned most of the land around - leased out the 340-acre Upton Farm in 1859. The lessee or lessees weren't name but I'm wondering if John Pullen took on part at least of that land. There must be some basis for the rapid expansion of acres involved in John Pullen's business between 1851 and 1881.

PROBABLY MID-1880 TO MID-1884

Henry was in general practice in Hertfordshire, with patients in Baldock, Stotfold and Arlesey. He was living in a house on the High Street in Baldock, and his sister Mary was keeping house for him. He had consulting rooms at Baldock, probably in the house on the High Street, with an occasional surgery in Arlesey.

Sources:

Reports from Committees Session 1890 volume XI covering 11 February to 18 August 1890 in the House of Lords; Paper 225. Together with the Proceedings of the Committee, Minutes of Evidence, and Appendix. GB House of Lords Select Committee on Children's Life Insurance Bill. Published Eyre and Spottiswoode 1890, printed by Henry Hansard and Son. Online version found by Roger Wright in the outer reaches of archive.org. Minutes of Evidence 16 July 1890 pp23-24 evidence of Henry Pullen Burry about his medical qualifications and experience, though he didn't give exact dates. In the course of his evidence pp23-26 Henry mentioned that he was often not paid for the work that he did, especially by his poorer patients. He also said that he was often not called out to his poorer patients until the patient was on the point of death; if he'd been asked for medical help sooner, a lot of lives could have been saved.

GMC Register 1881 p173. Census 1881.

17 MAY 1882

Henry Pullen-Burry married Rose Anwyl at St Mary's Balham.

Sources: The Lancet 1882 p935 and Medical Times and Gazette 1882 p598.

Comment by Sally Davis: I haven't found any clue as to how Henry and Rose met. It's just a hunch that they did not know each other until they were in their 20s and Henry was living in London.

ROSE

THE ANWYL FAMILY

Anwyl is an unusual surname. On the web I found information on two families called Anwyl, who claim descent from Owain Gwynedd, ruler of the Welsh kingdom of Gwynedd from 1137 to 1170. I presume Rose's father was a member of this family but I couldn't actually find his name in any of the genealogical sources I looked at.

Sources: wikipedia; Annals and Antiquities of...the county families of Wales by Thomas Nicholas published Longmans 1872; Section V pp664-700. And at landedfamilies.blogspot.co.uk.

Rose's father Thomas Anwyl was born in London around 1824; and worked as an auctioneer though he had retired by the 1870s.

Source: census entries.

Comment by Sally Davis: My knowledge of Thomas Anwyl is very limited and I've been hampered with all the family by the number of ways you can mis-hear and mis-spell that surname.

Thomas Anwyl married Maria Adams in November 1850. They had four daughters, all born in central London: Florence (1855); Rose (1859); Gertrude (1862); and Blanche (1864).

Source: for the marriage: Familysearch England-EASy GS Number 413318. Freebmd.

1871

By 1871 the Anwyl family had moved out of London and were living at Cornwall Cottage, Devonshire Road Streatham. Thomas and Maria only employed the one, basic, general servant. Florence, Rose, Gertrude and Blanche were all described as still having lessons; perhaps at a day-school or with a governess who came by the day, as there was no live-in governess in the household on census day.

Source: 1871 census.

Comment by Sally Davis: the Victorians, not understanding exactly how germs caused illness, laid great emphasis on better air. As Gertrude was perhaps a delicate child (see below) the search for a more healthy environment for her would have been one reason for the move out of central London. However, in 1871 the Anwyls were living very modestly - they were much less well-off than the Pullen-Burrys - and rents were lower out of town. As to what education Rose Anwyl had and where she had it, I haven't found any real information. In the lectures Henry gave around 1918-1920, Rose is hardly mentioned but when she is, Henry is often disparaging of her intellectual abilities. If she lacked the spirit of intellectual enquiry, it was more likely to be as a result of the typical, unchallenging education given to middle-class girls, than any lack of intelligence.

SPRING 1872

Rose's youngest sister Gertrude died, aged 10.

Source: freebmd.

1881

The Anwyl family were still living at Cornwall Cottage, Devonshire Road Streatham. They were still employing just the one general servant. The three remaining daughters were all still unmarried, and still living at home. It was from this house that - the following year - Rose Anwyl was married.

Source: 1881 census.

Rose and Henry Pullen-Burry's married life and their time in the Golden Dawn are covered in the next file of this set of three.

BASIC SOURCES I USED for all Golden Dawn members.

Membership of the Golden Dawn: The Golden Dawn Companion by R A Gilbert. Northampton: The Aquarian Press 1986. Between pages 125 and 175, Gilbert lists the names, initiation dates and addresses of all those people who became members of the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn or its many daughter Orders between 1888 and 1914.

The list is based on the Golden Dawn's administrative records and its Members' Roll - the large piece of parchment on which all new members signed their name at their initiation. All this information had been inherited by Gilbert but it's now in the Freemasons' Library at the United Grand Lodge of England building on Great Queen Street Covent Garden. Please note, though, that the records of the Amen-Ra Temple in Edinburgh were destroyed in 1900/01. I have recently (July 2014) discovered that some records of the Horus Temple at Bradford have survived, though most have not; however those that have survived are not yet accessible to the public.

For the history of the GD during the 1890s I usually use Ellic Howe's The Magicians of the Golden Dawn: A Documentary History of a Magical Order 1887-1923. Published Routledge and Kegan Paul 1972. Foreword by Gerald Yorke. Howe is a historian of printing rather than of magic; he also makes no claims to be a magician himself, or even an occultist. He has no axe to grind.

Family history: freebmd; ancestry.co.uk (census and probate); findmypast.co.uk; familysearch; Burke's Peerage and Baronetage; Burke's Landed Gentry; Armorial Families; thepeerage.com; and a wide variety of family trees on the web.

Famous-people sources: mostly about men, of course, but very useful even for the female members of GD. Oxford Dictionary of National Biography. Who Was Who. Times Digital Archive.

Useful source for business and legal information: London Gazette and its Scottish counterpart Edinburgh Gazette. Now easy to find (with the right search information) on the web.

Catalogues: British Library; Freemasons' Library.

Wikipedia; Google; Google Books - my three best resources. I also used other web pages, but with some caution, as - from the historian's point of view - they vary in quality a great deal.

6 January 2017

Email me at:

Find the web pages of Roger Wright and Sally Davis, including my list of people initiated into the Order of the Golden Dawn between 1888 and 1901, at:

www.wrightanddavis.co.uk

***

This file continues the life-by-dates of Henry Pullen-Burry and his wife Rose Pullen-Burry née Anwyl: it covers 1882 to 1898 and includes the period when they were both members of the Order of the Golden Dawn.

17 MAY 1882

Henry Pullen-Burry married Rose Anwyl at St Mary's Balham.

Sources: The Lancet 1882 p935 and Medical Times and Gazette 1882 p598.

Comment by Sally Davis: I haven't found any clue as to how Henry and Rose met. It's just a hunch that they did not know each other until they were in their 20s and Henry was living in London.

HENRY AND ROSE TOGETHER

JUNE 1883

Henry and Rose's first child, Ethel Pullen-Burry, was born, in Baldock.

Source: Familysearch England-ODM GS number 1537857 IT 2-5.

JANUARY 1884

Henry went to Colchester to take an exam in military tactics. At that time, he was a Lieutenant in the First Hertfordshire Royal Volunteers. He passed the exam and was awarded a certificate the following April.

Source: announcement in the Hertford Mercury and Reformer 12 April 1884, p2, found online for me by my contact in Canberra.

Comment by Sally Davis: other than his own spiritualist anecdote, told many years later and without dates, this is the only source for Henry in the volunteer force. I would think that he didn't join another regiment once he had moved away from Hertfordshire.

1884, PROBABLY AFTER APRIL THAT YEAR

Henry was appointed to the medical staff of the Midhurst Poor Law Union in Sussex; working in its Milland District. Henry and Rose moved to the small village of Bramshott in Hampshire.

Sources:

For the appointment: Lancet 1884 p807.

For his working in general practice as well: Reports from Committees Session 1890 volume XI covering 11 February to 18 August 1890 in the House of Lords; Paper 225. Together with the Proceedings of the Committee, Minutes of Evidence, and Appendix. GB House of Lords Select Committee on Children's Life Insurance Bill. Published Eyre and Spottiswoode 1890, printed by Henry Hansard and Son. Online version found by Roger Wright in the outer reaches of archive.org. Minutes of Evidence but especially pp23-24 for Henry's qualifications and experience.

1884 TO EARLY NOVEMBER

Charles Webster Leadbeater was curate of Bramshott and Liphook.

Comment by Sally Davis: thanks are due to Rose and Henry's descendant Anwyl, who emailed me in June 2017 to alert me to this curious coincidence. Rose and Henry were never in the Theosophical Society but by the time they arrived in Liphook, C W Leadbeater was a member of its London Lodge. Even if the Pullen Burrys were not regular church-goers, they must have at least been introduced to Leadbeater as a fellow resident of the villages of Liphook and Bramshott. Leadbeater had been ordained in the Church of England, and given the job as curate, as the result of efforts made by his mother's brother-in-law, Rev William Wolfe Capes. Capes was rector of Bramshott and Liphook from 1869 to 1901, but as he was often away, he needed a curate to take care of the parish in his absence. Giving the job to Leadbeater also solved the problem of finding an income for Charles and his widowed mother Emma. Early in November 1884, Leadbeater resigned from the Church of England in order to go to India with Helena Petrovna Blavatsky and Colonel Olcott.

Sources: see their wikipedia pages for information on Charles Webster Leadbeater and Rev William Wolfe Capes. Capes was an historian; he published a series of works using documents in the library at Hereford Cathedral; and some classical histories.

At theosophy.ph/encyclo the entry for Charles Webster Leadbeater describes his very sudden decision to abandon the CofE and follow Blavatsky. They sailed from England on 5 November 1884. Leadbeater became a Buddhist shortly after.

Evangelicalism in the Church of England c 1790 to c 1890: A Miscellany editors Mark Smith, Stephen Taylor. Woodbridge: Boydell 2004. In footnotes: p149 footnote 56: William Wolfe Capes 1834-1914 was rector of Bramshott 1869-1901.

The 1881 census shows Charles and his mother Emma living at Hertford Cottage, Headley Road in the hamlet of Liphook.

LATE 1884

Henry and Rose's only son, Henry, was born and registered with the confusing name Henry Burry Burry.

Source: freebmd. As an adult and in the permanent absence of his father, the GD Henry's son used the surname Pullen-Burry.

AFTER 1884 BUT POSSIBLY QUITE SOON AFTER

Henry was initiated into the freemasonry craft lodge Carnarvon Lodge 804. He then joined its Royal Arch Chapter. The lodge and chapter were based in Havant, where they had their own masonic hall.

Comment by Sally Davis: my information is about the Chapter rather than the lodge it was attached to; but I think I'm OK in assuming that Henry joined the Chapter as a member of the Carnarvon craft Lodge 804.

Source:

Generally on freemasonry:

Freemasons' Library at freemasonry.london.museum, which has a searchable catalogue and access to digitised freemasons' magazines to around 1900. In August 2016 I searched the digitised magazines. There were plenty of responses to the search term 'Burry'; but all but the one from 1896 (see below) turned out to refer to G C Burry - George Cook Burry - Henry's distant relation from the branch of the Burry family based in Christchurch Hampshire.

Source for Henry in Carnarvon Chapter 804:

The Freemason's Chronicle March 1896 p4: report on that year's installation meeting of the Carnarvon Royal Arch Chapter 804.

General source for Carnarvon Lodge 804 and its Chapter:

Carnarvon Lodge 804 Havant: By-Laws and History, prepared by W W B Beach; J le Feuvre; and E Goble who are all members and were able to base their account on the lodge's Minute books, account books and a Manuscript lodge history. Printed 1893. Particularly pp22-32. The lodge had been consecrated in 1860. As the lodge and chapter were in Havant, Henry was unlikely to have known about them, or have been acquainted with any of their members, until he went to work for the Midhurst Poor Law Board. Henry is not named in the account of the lodge's history. However, the history does mention that a group of members left to found their own lodge, in the early 1880s. Carnarvon Lodge 804 then made a big effort to recruit new members, beginning in the mid-1880s just when Henry and Rose arrived in Bramshott. Carnarvon Lodge 804's Royal Arch Chapter had been consecrated in 1873. In 1879, one of its members was Eugene Edward Street, who later joined the GD.

PROBABLY BETWEEN 1884 AND 1897

Henry was initiated as a Master Mark Mason, a group of freemasons independent of the United Grand Lodge of England.

Source for Henry being an MMM: Gerald Yorke Collection of GD and Crowley papers, now at the Warburg Institute University of London. Catalogue number NS73: letter sent by Frederick Leigh Gardner to Henry on 30 September 1897.

General sources for Master Mark Masonry: the Grand Lodge of Master Mark Masons has a website at www.glmnm.com but there's not much on it about its history. There's a wiki on its history and [www.markmastermasons Cornwall.org.uk](http://www.markmastermasons Cornwall.org.uk) has a history page in preparation. I haven't got access to the Mark Masonry Grand Lodge in London so if there are any lodge/chapter histories there, I can't get at them.

1885-98

Henry and Rose lived in Bramshott, where Henry worked as a GP in addition to doing his workhouse duties. Yew Tree House, on Station Road, was where they were living when they were in the GD. The GD only took its first initiates in 1888 and I don't think Henry and Rose knew any of the early members; but later in his life Henry mentioned that he and Rose were having spiritualist seances before they joined the GD; sitting at the kitchen table, sometimes with guests but sometimes with just the two of them. When there were just the two of them, Rose acted as the medium using the automatic writing technique.

Sources:

For when they arrived in Bramshott: GMC Register 1885 p194.

Comment by Sally Davis: Liphook was a small place and Bramshott even smaller but when the Pullen Burrys lived there it did have one resident of note - the botanist Mary Ann Robb who built Chitlee Place and its arboretum in 1880.

Source for the seances: Unpublished set of typescripts at the Freemasons' Library catalogued as SRIA1938m. Volume 3, Science and Hermetic Philosophy Part 2: March 1920 Lecture 111 p665.

1886

Winifred Margaret Pullen Burry was born, Henry and Rose's last child.

Source: freebmd; Winifred was registered in Wandsworth - perhaps born while Rose was visiting her parents.

1887 or 1888

Henry acquired a manuscript of mystical writings by a Kabbalist he later called 'Heer Rose' or 'Heer Rose of The Hague'. Although he did not pay the writings any real attention for nearly 20 years, when he was older he saw his coming across them or being offered them as a defining moment in his life. It certainly was an important staging-post in his progress towards being the Adept he considered himself to be, when preparing a set of lectures around 1920.

Source for Henry's acquisition of the manuscript and his attitudes towards it: unpublished set of typescripts at the Freemasons' Library catalogued as SRIA1938m. Volume 3, Science and Hermetic Philosophy Part 1: February 1919 Lecture 60 p355; though by this time Henry couldn't remember exactly when Heer Rose's works had come to his hand.

Comment by Sally Davis on Heer Rose, 27 January 2016. While I was working my way through the typescripts SRIA1938m, I was never very sure I believed in Heer Rose's existence. I could see how very useful it would be if Henry invented such a person and efforts by me, Roger Wright and Adam P Forrest of Portland Oregon failed to find anything more than a photo. Eventually I asked Susan Snell, archivist at the Freemasons' Library, if she had any contacts in the Netherlands that she could ask to search Dutch-language sources. She offered to email Jac Piepenbrock of the library of freemasonry in the Netherlands. I was grateful, but I didn't expect anything to come of it. Imagine my surprise, then, last week, when Susan forwarded me information rooted out by Mr Piepenbrock, which proved not only that Heer Rose was real, but also that - in his professional sphere - he was quite well-known, at least in the Netherlands. I can now do a short biography, based on the sources Jac Piepenbrock forwarded to Susan Snell. A note of warning, however: I was only able to get google to translate one of the sources into English; so I might have got some of it wrong!

Willem Nicolaas Rose was born in 1801 at Cheribon in the Dutch East Indies (now Indonesia). From 1819 to 1822 he was a pupil at the artillery school in Delft, training as an engineer/architect. He was employed by the city of Rotterdam from 1839 to 1855. His last project for the city - a sewage and water purification system - brought him to national attention, and in 1858 he accepted the job of chief architect to the Dutch government in The Hague. He retired in 1867 and died in 1877. In 1824 he had married Johanna Maria van Alphen, a member of another Dutch family with East Indies connections. So far, so respectable, but in his spare time Heer Rose was a spiritualist medium, using the automatic writing technique to convey messages from the beyond which described (amongst other things) great battles between angels and devils. It was the language in which Heer Rose wrote these messages down - very Book of Revelations - that convinced some people who attended seances with him that he was an Old Testament prophet updated, writing down the exact words of God. His visions were publicised in the Netherlands by the magazine Spiritistisch tijdschrift, edited by Frederik Willem Roorda van Eysinga (1827-97) and published intermittently between 1872 and 1881.

Many thanks to Susan, and to Jac, for doing so much to bridge the gap between Heer Rose and Henry Pullen-Burry. However, there are still gaps left. It's a nuisance, but none of the Dutch information on Heer Rose mentions the Kabbalistic writings that Henry Pullen Burry acquired: perhaps for the very reason that he had acquired them and they had thus gone beyond the knowledge of Dutch historians. And how did Henry get to know about them? The way Henry spoke of Heer Rose in his later lectures, I don't think the two men ever met. Did someone take them to England, intending to sell them there, after Heer Rose's death? Or did Henry come across them in the Netherlands somehow? There's a small clue in Oliver Gee's thesis that at least in the early 1900s there was contact between spiritualists in England and the Netherlands; but it's all rather tenuous.

Sources for Willem Nicolaas Rose (all in Dutch of course):

The photo of Heer Rose found by Roger Wright can be seen at //media-kitlv.nl, website of the Universiteit Leiden Digital Image Library, digital collection of the University of Leiden.

Sources found by Jan Piepenbrock:

There's a wiki on him at https://nl.wikipedia.org/wiki/Willem\_Nicolaas\_Rose, using these sources:

C A A de Graaf in Rotterdam jaarboekje 1954: 177-208 on the water purification works. The wiki has a link to the article.

E M Berens W N Rose 1801-77 published Rotterdam 2001; Stedenbouw civiele techniek en architectuur.

Entry in www.stadsarchief.rotterdam.nl

Oliver Gee's thesis presented to the University of Amsterdam in 2011: Wolken met Gouden Boorden. Google translated it as: Clouds with Golden Edges. Its subtitle in English is: the Last Two Historical Novels of H J Schimmel in the Light of his Spiritualist Beliefs.

On p3 a note on the cover photos says that the one of H J Schimmel, probably taken in 1903, shows him reading a copy of Light, the magazine of the London Spiritualist Alliance.

Information on S F W Roorda van Eysinga: dates and early life - p7, p24. His support of the ideas of the French spiritualist Allan Kardec (who believed in spiritualism and reincarnation) - p24. Spiritistisch tijdschrift and its publication of automatic writing by Heer Rose as medium - p33 footnote 34, p36 footnote 55. Roorda van Eysinga's client/guru relationship with Willem Nicolaas Rose - p36 and p36 footnotes 53, 55, 56. The information on Roorda van Eysinga and Heer Rose is from letters Roorda van Eysinga wrote between 1872 and 1886, with Rose's influence continuing after his death. The letters are now at Harmonia, the Collection of the Dutch Association of Spiritualists.

That Willem Nicolaas Rose was not a freemason although his father was: membership lists for Dutch and Dutch-speaking freemasons' lodges at

<http://dare.uva.nl/cgi/arno/show.cgi?fid=343363>

Simon Hendrik Rose (1769-1823) was member of Lodge 'La Vertueuse' in Batavia (Djakarta).

A final comment: Spiritistisch tijdschrift is the only magazine to publish any of Heer Rose's spiritualist writings. And if the Kabbalistic manuscript Henry Pullen Burry had in his possession is still in existence, someone is keeping very quiet about it. It was probably thrown away decades ago - the only evidence of Heer Rose as a scholar of the Kabbala.

Comment by Sally Davis 16 March 2016 on Heer Rose and English spiritualism; based on sources hunted out for me by my co-worker on Henry Pullen-Burry, Adam P Forrest of Portland Oregon.

It was always a puzzle to me when I was going through those typescripts as to how Henry could have come across automatic writings made by Heer Rose as a medium. Thanks to Adam, I now see that Henry could have been aware of Heer Rose as early as 1872, though that seems rather early for him. The spiritualist newspaper The Medium and Daybreak reported in November 1872 on the visit to the Netherlands of Mr Herne and Mr Williams, English spiritualists, who took Katy King with them to act as medium at several seances organised by Dutch spiritualist A J Riko of The Hague. Heer Rose and Roorda van Eysinga attended one of those seances.

Henry's a bit more likely to have seen an extract from an article in The Herald of Progress in 1881. The Herald of Progress was published in Newcastle-upon-Tyne but was easily available in London through E W Allen of 11 Ave Maria Lane EC. The article had originally been published in Revue Spirite, Journal d'Études Psychologique, the French spiritualist monthly; which was also relatively easy to gain access to in London - there was an advert for it in the same edition of The Herald of Progress in which the article appeared. The article in The Herald of Progress was in English, a translation of what I suppose must have been an original in French; and this explains something else I've wondered about, with Henry and Heer Rose: surely Heer Rose's writings must have been in Dutch, which I'm quite sure Henry couldn't understand. Now it seems some of them at least could be read in French, the whole idea of Henry being so influenced by Heer Rose is much more of a going concern. The article as it appeared in The Herald of Progress was called Transitional Man. Even if Henry didn't read the article in 1882, Heer Rose's automatic writings on this species supposedly sitting between Man and the Apes were in the papers Henry obtained in the late 1880s and had with him even in his last years. See the last file in this sequence for how important Henry thought Heer Rose's idea of a transitional species was; for him, they did away with the need for Darwin's theory of descent by natural selection - Henry hated the idea that Man was descended from the apes.

The final references Adam Forrest found were from the very time that Henry thought he had obtained the manuscripts of Heer Rose's writings. Two articles appeared in the English spiritualist journal Light..., both attributed to a writer with the writing name "1st M.B. (Lond)". The first was published in 1888: How to be Happy. It used writings by Heer Rose as a guide to achieving a happy life. The second - The Object of History - was published in 1890 and subtitled Spirit Communications Through W N Rose. In it, the author described how Heer Rose's automatic writing explained history, as "great events...arranged in due order, for the attainment of a definite purpose"; and progress, as part of the Creator's plan for His universe, moving towards a "universal civilisation" based on virtue and wisdom. Like the Transitional Man species, Heer Rose's concept of where modern progress was heading, was fundamental to Henry's later understanding of the purpose and meaning of his own life.

Almost I'm tempted to say that "1st M.B. (Lond)" was Henry Pullen-Burry himself. I've decided to stop myself from doing so, because he published so little: only one item that I know of, a short book on the Kabbalah, and that right at the end of his life. Even the typescripts of Henry's lectures to his spiritualist group in Portland (late 1910s/early 1920s) were not published, just circulated amongst occultists.

Sources for the early references to Heer Rose in the English press:

The Medium and Daybreak: A Weekly Journal Devoted to the History, Phenomena, Philosophy and Teachings of Spiritualism. Published London, from offices in Southampton Row WC and available through agents in most British cities; editor and publisher is James Burns. Volume 3 number 139 issue of 29 November 1872 p465-66 and p470 for the publishing details.

In the 1890s, A J Riko was editing a Dutch spiritualist magazine called Sphinx: see Light: A Journal of Psychical, Occult and Mystical Research, published in London by the Eclectic Publishing Co Ltd of 2 Duke St Adelphi. Volume 14 1894 number 710 issue of Saturday 18 August 1894 p386.

The Herald of Progress: A Weekly Journal devoted to the philosophy and teachings of spiritualism. Volume 2 1881. Publication and distribution details p344; small ads p351 including adverts for Revue Spirite and also The Theosophist. Volume 2 number 44 issue of Friday 13 May 1881 pp299-300 and volume 2 number 47 issue of Friday 8 June 1881 pp340-41: The Transitional Man. At the end of the article was a letter from John Yarker, written after reading the first part of it. Yarker says that at seances that he'd been present at in 1876 and 1877, the medium had seen creatures similar to those described by Heer Rose: at the end of the short letter, brief synopses of what the medium had desc at those sessions, w dates in 1876 and 1877. So the idea of a transitional species was not just confined to Heer Rose in the late 1870s. John Yarker was a freemason and a well-known figure in occult circles.

And the two articles by "1st M.B. (Lond)":

Light: A Journal of Psychical, Occult and Mystical Research published in London by the Eclectic Publishing Co Ltd of 2 Duke St Adelphi. Volume 8 1888 number 410 issue of Saturday 10 November 1888: pp550-51. And volume 10 1890 number 481 issue of Saturday 22 March 1890 p139.

After that long digression on Henry and Heer Rose of The Hague, back to the life-by-dates:

EARLY 1889

Henry's mother Emily Burry (sic) died, aged only 57. IF she's the person referred to in the source below, on the evening of her funeral, her family held a seance with her psychic son as the medium. At that seance the recently-dead mother (possibly Emily Burry) spoke through her psychic son to say that she had already seen the Saviour, who had recognised her.

Sources:

For the death freebmd. I couldn't find any newspaper coverage of the funeral.

For the seance and ?Emily's communication with her son:

Unpublished set of typescripts at the Freemasons' Library catalogued as SRIA1938m. Volume 3, Science and Hermetic Philosophy Part 1: December 1919 Lecture 102 p 607.

ALL DAY ON 14TH APRIL 1890 AND AGAIN ON 16 APRIL

Henry and other important figures in the parishes of Headley, Bramshott and Selborne walked the boundaries between the parishes to reach agreement on exactly they were.

Comment by Sally Davis: with the Poor Law operating at parish level, this was not just an interesting day out for antiquarians. This beating of the bounds had been called for by the parish overseers and financial and legal issues would be decided by the results of it. Despite the effort's serious purpose, everybody does seem to have had a good time, especially on the first of the two days, when they were treated to lunch at Mr Whitaker's house in Headley.

Source: local history webpages at www.johnowensmith.co.uk/headley/bram1890.htm: Contemporary Account of the Perambulation of the Bounds of Headley and Bramshott Parishes in the Year 1890.

Quick comment by Sally Davis: just to say that at least in 1890, in outward appearance Henry was still living as a middle-class professional and responsible member of a rural community.

FRIDAY 27 JUNE 1890

Henry gave was one of several doctors who gave evidence to the House of Lords Select Committee in connection with a proposed Children's Life Insurance Bill. He made allegations about patients he had had in Arlesey in Hertfordshire that were very upsetting to the people of Arlesey; most of which were challenged or even refuted by local officials.

Sources:

At hansard.millbanksystems.com/lords/1890/jun/16/second-reading coverage originally in volume 345 pp961-91 of the Bill's 2nd reading in the House of Lords, on 16 June 1890.

Reports from Committees Session 1890 volume XI covering 11 February to 18 August 1890 in the House of Lords; Paper 225. Together with the Proceedings of the Committee, Minutes of Evidence, and Appendix. GB House of Lords Select Committee on Children's Life Insurance Bill. Published Eyre and Spottiswoode 1890, printed by Henry Hansard and Son. Online version found by Roger Wright in the outer reaches of archive.org. Minutes of Evidence but especially pp23-26 for what Henry said.

Times Mon 30 June 1890 p9 Children's Life Assurance: Select Committee. There was no coverage of the evidence heard, but the names of the Committee members and those who had given evidence on 27 June 1890 were listed.

Comment by Sally Davis: though he had been in general practice in Liphook for six years by this time, Henry evidence was about his practice in Hertfordshire, specifically about the patients he had in the village of Arlesey. He wanted to tell the Committee that he had come across quite a few cases of suspicious deaths amongst infants of families living in Arlesey, and thought that the children had been allowed to die - when medical treatment could have saved them - so their parents could claim on the child's insurance policy. He said that the practice was particularly widespread amongst the village's most "wretched" and "depraved" group of families, whose fathers drank and whose children were nearly all illegitimate. Pressed by several Committee members, he had to admit that his opinion was hearsay - based on what was 'common knowledge' in the village; that he had never refused to issue a death certificate, however suspicious he might have been as to the circumstances; and that he did not know of any case where a parent had been prosecuted as the result of a child's death in Arlesey. Asked which insurance companies were operating in the district, Henry referred to the Prudential by name, and mentioned another firm though he couldn't remember the name of that one.

In justice to Henry, I will say that other witnesses giving evidence to the Committee were saying the same things. However, they seem to have been a bit more discreet about naming names and places. The Bill had been sponsored by the NSPCC, and was being guided through the House of Lords by the bishop of Peterborough, Dr William Connor Magee, who had been made the Select Committee's chairman.

Source for Dr Magee: see wikipedia.

16 JULY 1890

Letters challenging Henry's assertions about the residents of Arlesey were handed to the Select Committee as part of the evidence of Thomas Charles Dewey, senior manager at the Prudential Insurance Company.

Sources:

Reports from Committees Session 1890 volume XI covering 11 February to 18 August 1890 in the House of Lords; Paper 225. Together with the Proceedings of the Committee, Minutes of Evidence, and Appendix. GB House of Lords Select Committee on Children's Life Insurance Bill. Published Eyre and Spottiswoode 1890, printed by Henry Hansard and Son. Online version found by Roger Wright in the outer reaches of archive.org. Minutes of Evidence 16 July 1890 pp146-147 evidence of Thomas Charles Dewey.

Comment by Sally Davis: the outraged Arlesey locals included the Medical Officer of the Poor Law Union; the clerk to the local School Board, who sent statistics showing the relatively low number of illegitimate children in the village; the Registrar of births, marriages and deaths, stating how few of the death certificates signed by Henry were of children who were insured; and the vicar of Arlesey, saying how upset the villagers were and saying that most children's deaths could be attributed to ignorance of basic child and sick care, they weren't the result of wilful neglect.

17 JULY 1890

The anger at Arlesey about Henry's Select Committee evidence was mentioned in the Times; and Henry was named as having caused it.

Times: 17 July 1890 p12 Child Life Assurance. The report was short and only the vicar of Arlesey's letter of objection was mentioned. No details were given of all the facts collected by local officials to challenge Henry's allegations. Perhaps the Times reporter agreed with Henry's point of view, despite the evidence.

For a modern assessment of whether Henry and his medical colleagues were justified, see www.tandfonline.com/doi: article by Daniel J R Grey: Liable to Very Great Abuse. The article's purport is that there was no good evidence of widespread child murder for the sake of collecting on the dead child's life insurance; and the lack was widely acknowledged as early as 1914. The attitudes of witnesses like Henry Pullen-Burry was indicative of a middle-class hostility towards working-class lifestyles which came out in more than just allegations about wilful child neglect. The 1890 Bill was sponsored by the NSPCC, which had recently been founded.

Final comment by Sally Davis, 5 January 2017: thanks are due to two people for galvanising me to produce this new section on Henry's evidence to the House of Lords, and its consequences: Henry's great-great-grand-daughter who asked if I could find a copy of the Select Committee evidence, after the House of Lords had lost theirs; and Roger Wright, who found one in the further reaches of archive.org after I'd been defeated, trying to pin it down in the British Library catalogue.

18 NOVEMBER 1890

Henry (but not Rose) attended one of the London Spiritualist Alliance's regular evening meetings, held at their headquarters, 2 Duke Street Adelphi, London WC. The main speaker that evening was Alice Gordon, whose talk was about Helena Petrovna Blavatsky's powers of telekinesis. Mrs Gordon was already a member of the GD - she was initiated in December 1889. So it's possible that Henry first found out about the GD's existence, through Alice Gordon.

Source: Light: A Journal of Psychical, Occult and Mystical Research published in London by the Eclectic Publishing Co Ltd of 2 Duke Street Adelphi. Light... was a major spiritualist weekly, published from 1880 into the 1930s. Volume 10 number 517, issue of Saturday 29 November 1890 p575.

Comment by Sally Davis: as well as checking out 1890, I also looked at the volume of Light... published in 1895. I only found the one reference to Henry, so he wasn't a very active member of the London Spiritualist Alliance; but then, he lived out of town.

5 MARCH 1891

Henry's father John Pullen Burry died. IF it's his father Henry is talking about, in the SRIA 1938m source below, John's ghost wandered around the market garden for a couple of weeks after he'd died, unwilling to let the business go; and then made a last appearance in front of one of his sons who lived quite a long way off (possibly Henry himself). On a more down-to-earth note, John's executors were his son Horace, his daughter Emily, and Ernest Henry Blaker. He left a personal estate of £7337.

Sources: freebmd and Probate Registry 1891.

Unpublished set of typescripts at the Freemasons' Library catalogued as SRIA1938m. Volume 3, Science and Hermetic Philosophy Part 1: December 1919 Lecture 101 p 606 though not all the details Henry gives seem to fit John Pullen as the subject of the anecdote.

Comment on strife in the Pullen-Burry family, by Sally Davis: my contact in Canberra sent me a transcript of quite a long report on the funeral of John Pullen Burry, published in the Sussex Agricultural Express 10 March 1891 p3. Three of his children didn't attend: Louisa, who had died; Hubert, who was probably in New Zealand; and Henry, with less excuse. I've suggested that Henry Pullen-Burry and his father didn't get on; the absence of Henry and Rose at this crisis tends to confirm my guess. Though it might have been Henry's siblings that he wanted to avoid, there's something about the tone of the report, that makes me wonder whether John Pullen Burry was a respected man, but not one who was well liked. Amongst the other mourners were George Cook Burry, of the branch of the Burry family that was now based in Hampshire; and Ernest Henry Blaker, as the family solicitor. John Pullen Burry was buried in Sompting churchyard, near his Burry ancestors.

Comment by Sally Davis: Ernest Henry Blaker was based in Chichester. Source: The Law Journal volume 85 1938 p115 an obituary of him, as solicitor and for 30 years the Registrar of Chichester County Court.

John Pullen Burry's sons Horace John and Arthur took over the business; and his daughter Emily may also have played an active role in it though one less acknowledged in the sources I found.

Sources:

At www.familychest.co.uk a Conveyance of October 1893 was up for sale; to which Horace John, Emily and Ernest Henry Blaker were signatories, as they tidied up John Pullen's estate.

The Gardener's Chronicle 1913: by this time the firm is known as H and A Pullen-Burry.

Municipal Yearbook and Public Utilities Directory 1924 p220 shows Arthur Pullen-Burry living at Rectory House, Sompting.

At www.roll-of-honour.com/Sussex/Sompting, there's a photo of the Sompting war memorial. Hilary, son of Horace John and Alma; and Cyril son of Arthur; were both killed in World War 1.

APRIL 1891 - not long after the funeral

On census day 1891 Henry and Rose Pullen-Burry were still living at Yew Tree House, Station Road, Bramshott, with Ethel (6), Henry (5) and Winifred (3). They employed two live-in servants - their tasks aren't specified but they were probably a skivvy and a housemaid, or a skivvy and a nurse. As this was a rural household, they also employed a groom to look after either a horse or (depending on how prosperous Henry was) a carriage, for Henry to use to visit patients.

Less than a month after their father's death, Henry's sisters Mary and Emily, and his brothers Arthur and Walter were all still living at Rectory House Sompting; employing a cook and a housemaid. Horace and his wife Alma were living at West Cottage Sompting with their daughter Dorothy and two servants. Henry's brother Hubert wasn't on the census; he had probably already gone to New Zealand. Bessie, who always seems to have lived a life completely apart from the rest of the family, was staying in a boarding house at 20 Old Steyne, Brighton.

Source: 1891 census.

Further on Hubert by Sally Davis: website www.thepeerage.com which uses Burke's Peerage as its source, says that Hubert Pullen-Burry married Marion Hariette Olivia Cooke in 1896; she was the daughter of a civil engineer, Charles Edward Cooke. 1931 edition of Debretts says Hubert and Marion were living in Auckland NZ at that time. See www.geni.com and familysearch for him having died in Wellington NZ in 1956.

EARLY 1890s

Henry was elected as an officer in the Carnarvon Royal Arch Chapter 804.

Comment by Sally Davis: any freemasons' lodge or chapter has a hierarchy of officers which administer the lodge and carry out its rituals. Anyone willing to be an officer is first elected at a low level. They then spend one year at each higher level, ending with a year in the top post - Worshipful Master in a craft lodge.

Source for Henry in the hierarchy of Carnarvon R A Chapter 804:

The Freemason's Chronicle March 1896 p4 Ryl Arch. Rpt of the quarterly mtg of Carnarvon Chapter 804, Tues 18th ult; no venue gvn. It was the installn mtg: "H B Pullen Burry" was one of the officers f cmg year: "N". He's 2 down from the chapter's WM-equiv. After the mtg, the banquet but again no venue gvn.

NOVEMBER 1892

Henry's initiation into the Golden Dawn's outer order.

Source: RAG p150.

14 MARCH 1894

Henry was initiated into the GD's 2nd Order. Once in the 2nd Order you were allowed to do practical magic. All members of the 2nd Order had a second motto. Henry chose the Latin phrase 'Deus et lex'.

Sources:

For the date of the initiation: RAG p150.

For Henry's 2nd Order motto. The records of the Isis-Urania temple's 2nd Order have not survived and as a result hardly any 2nd Order mottos are known. However, Henry used his in a series of letters to Paul Foster Case in the early 1920s. The letters have not been published but in March 2010 Jim Eshelman posted extracts from them onto the Temple of Thelema website at www.heruraha.net. Thanks to Adam Forrest of Portland Oregon for sending the extracts to me.

AFTER 14 MARCH 1894 TO END 1895

Henry served as the GD's sub-cancellarius.

Source: RAG p32, and p50-51 for the work of the cancellarius and sub-cancellarius.

Comment by Sally Davis: the job title 'cancellarius' or 'sub-cancellarius' sounds impressive but on a daily basis it involved helping to manage the Order's budget, by way of sending out reminders of yearly subscriptions due; notifying members of the dates and places of rituals and other formal meetings; supervise the exams initiates needed to take to progress to the 2nd Order; and keeping track of members' addresses (no easy task when people moved house so often). Just noting that RAG p32 doesn't give an exact date for when Henry became sub-cancellarius, the date of after 14 March is mine; I don't think that - given the requirement to supervise exams - the job would have been thought appropriate for someone not in the 2nd Order.

20 MARCH 1894

Rose Pullen-Burphy's GD initiation.

Source: RAG p152.

PROBABLY 1895 though possibly as early as 1893

Two GD Flying Rolls were compiled to which Henry contributed: numbers 8, and 33.

Sources for the texts:

RAG The GD Companion p115, p117 but neither are dated.

Try also: Francis King's Ritual Magic in England 1887 to Present Day published Spearman 1970; or his Magic, The Western Tradition published Thames and Hudson 1975.

The dates of both flying rolls are uncertain.

In their The Chronology of the Golden Dawn Mary K Greer and Darcy Kuntz give a specific date for Flying Roll 8 of 25 February 1893 (p24); they assign Flying Roll 33 to some time in 1895 (p27). Holmes Publishing Group, Postal Box 2370 Sequim Washington 98382 USA; 2007.

However, Adam P Forrest is not so sure about Flying Roll 8:

Argument for an 1895 date for Flying Roll 8, by Adam P Forrest, using R A Gilbert's transcription of Westcott's Catalogue of the Flying Rolls: Flying Roll VIII was originally "Enoch Suggestions", and the original issue date was 25 February 1893. "Enoch Suggestions" was later erased, and replaced with "Geometric Pentagram." According to R A Gilbert, the date was changed to 1895 when the name of the Roll was replaced. If you're interested, William Wynn Westcott was apparently willing to have the Roll copied for a fee, and the price was 1 shilling.

A bit more on Flying Roll 8, including some information which might indicate a date, by Sally Davis:

Flying Roll 8 is A Geometrical Way to Draw a Pentagram. All Henry's own work. Assuming that you must be in the 2nd Order to take part in building the flying roll library of rituals, Flying Roll 8 must be from after March 1894. The Gerald Yorke Collection of GD and Crowley papers, now at the Warburg Institute University of London: Catalogue Number NS57 is a notebook of uncertain origin, bought by Gerald Yorke in 1950 at Sothebys. On its p63 someone has written out Flying Roll VIII; and on p64 they've drawn the pentagram according to its instructions, in red and black ink and with some annotations as to the meaning of the pentagram's points. You need a pair of compasses to get the pentagram right.

Adam P Forrest agrees with Greer and Kuntz about Flying Roll 33:

Flying Roll 23, by Adam P Forrest, again using R A Gilbert's transcription of Westcott's Catalogue of Flying Rolls: Flying Roll XXXIII had originally been "New Regulations," which NOM had erased and replaced with "Enoch Visions" on his catalogue list.

Unfortunately, he had stopped dating the Rolls in his catalogue entirely by then. The last dated Roll was number XXIX, issued November 3, 1894, so the Enochian Visions was probably issued in 1895. As it was a long Roll, the price for copying it was listed as 5/6.

Some more information on Flying Roll 23, and a hint at a date of after mid-1894, by Sally Davis:

Flying Roll 33 is Seven Visions of Squares upon the Enochian Tablets, to which 5 people contributed: Helen Rand (visions 1 and 2); Annie Horniman (vision 3); Henry (vision 4); Pamela Bullock (visions 5 and 6); and Edward William Berridge (vision 7). . As Pamela Bullock's married name is used rather than Carden, her maiden name, Flying Roll 33 must be later than June 1894, the month she married Percy Bullock.

16 MARCH 1895

Rose Pullen-Burry's father Thomas Anwyl died.

Sources: freebmd; probate registry records.

Comment by Sally Davis: I think, from what happened to Rose's mother and sisters after her father's death, that he had not left them much money.

EARLY 1895

Henry did his best to prevent Alice Isabel Simpson from being initiated into the GD. Many years later he said of Mrs Simpson: "I knew the woman well, and protected in words as well as in action as Cancellarius against her advancement" before being over-ruled by Mathers.

Sources and comments by Sally Davis. The source is Henry, writing to Paul Foster Case; date unknown but in a sequence of letters written between January and July 1921; that is to say, over 25 years after the events he's mentioning. See a long extract from the letter at website www.heruraha.net. It's interesting that Henry knew Alice Isabel before she joined the GD, but perhaps he didn't; perhaps his involvement was as one of those chosen to investigate whether she was a suitable candidate - a process of enquiry which took place with virtually every potential recruit (see 1897/98 below for an account of the process from the receiving end, by Arthur Conan Doyle). Why the subject of Alice Isabel Simpson came up in Henry's letter: Paul Foster Case's 2nd Order motto was Perseverantia - see www.golden-dawn.org/biocase.html; he was a member of the Alpha et Omega Order's New York-based Thoth-Hermes Temple. Alice Isabel's GD motto was Perseverantia et Cura Quies, usually shortened to 'perseverantia'.

Source for initiation and motto of Alice Isabel Simpson on 12 July 1895: RAG p155. She was initiated into the 2nd Order on 27 May 1899. If he'd been around, Henry would probably have tried to stop this second initiation but by then, he was long gone to the Klondike and couldn't have done anything about it even if he'd known it was going to happen. Alice Isabel and her daughter Elaine Mary did take an active part in Aleister Crowley's attempt to take over the GD on Mathers' behalf, in April 1900, and were expelled from the Order as a result; but again, Henry was either still in northern Canada, or in the USA, in April 1900 and couldn't have done anything to help or hinder them.

An easy-to-read account of what happened in April 1900: Ellic Howe chapter 15 pp219-232.

ALL OF 1896 AND 1897; and possibly EARLY 1898

Henry must have done a good job as sub-cancellarius: at the beginning of 1896 he was promoted to cancellarius when the previous holder of the post, Percy Bullock, became sub-imperator. The cancellarius' duties included producing some yearly accounts for the Order's hierarchy to consider; and a list of current members and their progress as magicians - a kind of end-of-term report.

Source: RAG p32.

Comment by Sally Davis: Henry will have prepared the accounts for 1896 and 1897; but probably not those of 1898 and that might have been the point at which the GD members began to wonder where he was.

MARCH 1896

In Carnarvon Royal Arch Chapter 804, Henry reached the level of 'N' - Nehemiah; a few levels down from the Chapter's top job of First Principal.

Source:

The Freemason's Chronicle March 1896 p4.

Comment by Sally Davis: if things had followed their usual plan - which they didn't - Henry should have served his year as the Chapter's First Principal around 1899/1900.

LATE AUGUST 1896

GD member in Glasgow and active Scottish freemason Edward Macbean wrote to Henry as one of the GD's experts on the Kabbalah; asking how two particular Hebrew words should be transcribed. A copy of Henry's reply has survived: he signed it 'fraternally yours' but he also ticked Macbean off on two counts: because Henry had had to pay excess postage on Macbean's letter, which hadn't had enough stamps on it; and because Macbean had signed with his own name, rather than his GD motto.

Source: Freemasons' Library GD collection item GD 2/5/5/1, undated but with a pencil note saying "Rec'd 25/8/96".

Comment by Sally Davis: no doubt Henry thought that, as an official of the GD, he should strive to maintain standards; but the letter is short and abrupt, he comes over as unnecessarily officious and surely the excess postage he'd had to pay can't have been a great deal. Perhaps the letter played upon worries he had about money on quite other counts.

WINTER 1896-97

Henry staved off trouble in the GD's Isis-Urania temple.

Source: Henry, writing to Paul Foster Case; date unknown but in a sequence of letters dated January to July 1921. See a long extract from the letter at website www.heruraha.net.

Comment by Sally Davis: 1897 was a turbulent year and perhaps Henry did more behind the scenes to guide the GD through it than is evident from the sources that have survived. However, he was not able to make Mathers change his mind about Annie Horniman; nor was he able to prevent the disturbance caused by two major withdrawals of committed members of the Isis-Urania temple later in 1897: William Wynn Westcott and Frederick Leigh Gardner. I think that Henry is making himself out to be more influential in the GD in the late 1890s than in fact he was, to impress Foster Case, a rising star in the occult in America.

?3 DECEMBER 1896

Samuel Liddell Mathers expelled Annie Horniman from the GD. Rose and Annie were good friends. Through Annie's visits to Yew Tree House to go astral travelling with Henry, the two women had, of course, known each other since before Rose had been initiated into the GD; perhaps Annie had helped persuade Rose to join. So Rose was as outraged as many other GD members by the injustice of Mathers' action, which had everything to do with his personal finances and very little to do with magic. A petition was quickly circulated, organised by Frederick Leigh Gardner; begging Mathers to reinstate Annie. Mathers chose to make the issue one of command and obedience and, in the end, all the petition's signatories knuckled under to him, Rose included. Annie remained in exile from the GD, though still friends with many members, until Mathers in his turn was expelled, in April 1900.

Sources:

Gerald Yorke Collection of GD and Crowley papers, now at the Warburg Institute University of London. Two items:

Catalogue number NS73 letter from William Wynn Westcott to Frederick Leigh Gardner gives the date of Annie's expulsion as 3 December [1896] though Westcott admits that Mathers hasn't told him it had happened, as yet, he'd found out from Percy and Pamela Bullock.

Catalogue number NS73: a number of letters all dated December 1896 or January 1897, from various GD members to Frederick Leigh Gardner; most of them signing the petition to reinstate Annie Horniman; though some explaining why the writer felt they couldn't sign. Including the one from Rose Pullen-Burry, but not one from Henry.

And see also Ellic Howe who describes exactly how Annie Horniman came to be expelled, with quotations from letters that passed between her and Mathers during autumn 1896; and gives an account of the petition and Mathers' hostile reaction: pp126-144.

BY 22 DECEMBER 1896

Henry had gone to Paris to see Mathers. He stayed with Samuel Liddell Mathers and his wife Mina for about a fortnight, ample time for him to study Mathers with a physician's eye and reach the conclusion that Mathers had become mentally disturbed by “unbalanced Mars work”.

Source: Gerald Yorke Collection of GD and Crowley papers, now at the Warburg Institute University of London: letter from Rose Pullen-Burry written at Liphook 22 December 1896 in response to one from Frederick Leigh Gardner wanting her to sign the petition to reinstate Annie Horniman.

Comment by Sally Davis: Rose apologises that Henry is not at home to sign the petition; and does seem to be implying that Henry’s trip to Paris was on Annie Horniman’s behalf. For certain causes, Henry seems to have been willing to abandon his patients (and the income that some of them represented) to rush off on GD affairs; or had he been going to visit the Mathers in any case?

Source for Mathers’ mental state: Henry himself, writing to Paul Foster Case BUT many years later. The date of the letter is unknown but it’s one of a sequence of letters Henry wrote to Foster Case between January and July 1921; that is to say, over 25 years after the events he’s mentioning. See a long extract from the letter at www.heruraha.net the Temple of Thelema website.

MARCH 1897

Someone wrote a letter to William Wynn Westcott’s employers telling them he was a prominent member of a rather dubious society. As a result, Westcott felt obliged to resign as an officer of the GD. Florence Farr took over as the most senior GD member resident in the UK but power in the Order passed to Samuel Liddell Mathers in Paris.

Source: Gerald Yorke Collection of GD and Crowley papers, now at the Warburg Institute University of London. Catalogue number NS73: two letters from Westcott to Frederick Leigh Gardner, dated 17 March 1897 and 18 March 1897. The first letter makes it clear that this occasion was not the first time information about Westcott’s occult activities had been drawn to his employers’ attention.

Comment by Sally Davis: it’s generally assumed by historians of the GD that the anonymous letter was sent by Mathers. I must say that the change of personnel at the top in England was a blow to historians: record-keeping in the GD went downhill badly after Westcott had to give up doing it!

SEPTEMBER 1897

Frederick Leigh Gardner was declared persona non grata at the GD’s Isis-Urania temple after a series of complaints about his behaviour, particularly towards the women members, and particularly as organiser of its rituals. Gardner resigned from the GD as a whole on hearing that a recent Isis-Urania members’ meeting had declined to hear his side of it. When it became clear to Gardner that Henry had supported the meeting’s decision, he wrote a very angry letter to Henry as a fellow Mark mason, reminding him of the obligations imposed on freemasons to support each other; pointing out that Henry had often enjoyed hospitality at Gardner’s house; and declaring him not fit for the company of “moral and upright men”. Henry wrote back, resenting Gardner’s “abuse”; and their acquaintance-ship ceased.

Comment by Sally Davis: Gardner sent a copy of his abusive letter to William Wynn Westcott, who wrote back dismayed that Gardner had made “such a slashing onslaught on the poor man”; and advising Gardner just to let the matter go (rather than upset anybody else, presumably).

See Ellic Howe for why and how Gardner came to be expelled: pp175-186.

Source: Gerald Yorke Collection of GD and Crowley papers, now at the Warburg Institute University of London. Catalogue number NS73: set of 3 letters Frederick Leigh Gardner sent to Henry, dated 22 September 1897, 28 September 1897 and 30 September 1897; plus Henry's reply to the last one, also dated 30 September 1897; and one letter from Westcott to Frederick Leigh Gardner dated 1 October 1897.

UNCERTAIN DATE but not later than mid-1898

Writing in 1923 or 1924, Conan Doyle gives "1898" but for reasons I outline below, it's more likely to have been 1897

Henry paved the way for Arthur Conan Doyle to join the GD. But Conan Doyle declined the offer of membership.

Source:

Any paperwork connected with people being considered as possible GD initiates has not survived as far as I know. Particularly with people who declined membership, I imagine that all letters and memoranda about them were thrown away at the time. Conan Doyle's own recollection of what happened is the only source that I know of for his being offered GD membership. He published it in an article, long after the event: Pearson's Magazine volume 57 January-June 1924, issue of March 1924. Article by Arthur Conan Doyle: My Adventures in the Spirit World: pp203-09; in which Henry is named, but the other GD member that Conan Doyle met is not.

Comment by Sally Davis, based on Conan Doyle's article and at some length because it sheds some light on what happened to you if you were being considered for GD membership:

Conan Doyle and Henry Pullen-Burry got to know one another in the late 1880s when they were both general practitioners in Hampshire. As personal information on GD members and their habits are rare, I give Conan Doyle's description of Henry here: according to Conan Doyle, Henry was "a small doctor...small in stature, and also, I fear, in practice"; he smoked a pipe; and shared Conan Doyle's interest in spiritualism and theosophy. In the article Conan Doyle portrays himself as reading widely on the occult at this time, but as far more wary of it than Henry was, though he was swayed by the belief expressed in spiritualism by two scientists he admired, William Crookes the chemist (who was a GD member though Conan Doyle won't have known that) and Alfred Russell Wallace the traveller and evolutionary biologist. Conan Doyle was intrigued to discover that Henry had a room in his house "reserved for mystic and philosophic purposes", which no one but himself was allowed to go in (I wonder where Rose did her magic, in that case? Actually, having a room set aside for occult purposes was not so unusual amongst GD members - those who could afford a house big enough, that is.) Although Conan Doyle gave up his practice at Southsea, took some extra training, and set up as an ophthalmologist in London, he and Henry must have kept in touch and in due course Henry recommended Conan Doyle to the GD hierarchy as a future member. Did Henry have one eye on gaining the kudos of having brought on board the creator of Sherlock Holmes? Probably. The usual discreet enquiries were made; Conan Doyle was judged a suitable candidate; and Henry was authorised approached to him with an invitation to join. Conan Doyle seems to have interviewed Henry (not the other way round). He wanted to know exactly what he might be getting into if he accepted; and on what it would do for him. Henry told him that he would gain "powers which people would call supernatural ...knowledge of deeper forces of nature". This sounded good to Conan Doyle, he asked to join, and few mornings later he awoke with a sense of having had some kind of psychic exam during the night, which he took to be his suitability being checked out by GD members. Conan Doyle still wasn't sure though: he checked out what would be expected of him as an initiate, and began to worry about the level of commitment Henry said would be required - after all, he had his medical work and Sherlock Holmes to attend to. After thinking it over further, he decided not to be initiated.

Henry wasn't that easily put off, however. A couple of months after apparently having accepted Conan Doyle's change of mind, he called on him bringing another GD member with him, someone Conan Doyle knew of as "famous and much-travelled". A letter written by William Wynn Westcott confirms that the second caller was Robert William Felkin, (future founder of Stella Matutina) a well-known authority on the treatment of tropical diseases, having spent time in east Africa as a medical missionary before qualifying fully as a doctor. The two GD members proceeded to have a conversation about astral travelling that put Conan Doyle right off. Looking back from 1924 he remembered having "brushed against something strange, which I am not sorry that I avoided". He worried that people willing to develop these powers might - in the process - lose their sense of Christian ethics.

Henry's original idea of bringing to see Conan Doyle a GD member he knew of and would be impressed by was a good one. But that conversation about astral travelling: not so clever. Reading Conan Doyle's account in a copy of Pearson's Magazine sent to him by Frederick Leigh Gardner, Westcott commented that both Henry and Felkin "appear to have spoken in a wild manner" - reflecting, perhaps, on the Famous Initiate That Got Away.

Source for Westcott's comment: Gerald Yorke Collection catalogue number NS73: letter written 17 April 1924 by Westcott, to Gardner.

Sources for Conan Doyle: wikipedia; and GMC Registers.

1898

Henry set out for the Klondike.

Sources for his getting at least as far as a boat on the Yukon River (though without dates):

Unpublished set of typescripts at the Freemasons' Library catalogued as SRIA1938m. Volume 3, Science and Hermetic Philosophy Part 1: November 1918 Lecture 47 p282 and December 1918 Lecture 51 p301.

What on earth was he doing? Comment by Sally Davis:

People had been finding small deposits of gold in the Klondike River valley in north-west Canada for a while; but the big strike was made in August 1896 by George Carmack, his Indian wife Shaaw Tháa and her family. IF Henry had been a reader of the Times newspaper with enough spare time to peer into its smallest news items, he might have noticed a reference to "wonderful discoveries of gold" being reported to members of a Royal Geographical Society expedition stationed at Fort Cudahy, in February 1897. But the news didn't really break in the USA until 16 June 1897, with the arrival at San Francisco of an American steamer from Alaska; and in Britain not until the end of July 1897, with published confirmation in the Times including advice issued by the Canadian Emigrants' Information Office and warnings of the dangers of this isolated place with six-month-long frozen winters. Amongst the instructions was the advice to leave setting out for the Klondike until next spring - that is, spring 1898. If Henry was struck by gold fever in July 1897 he seems to have paid attention to the advice; but huge numbers did not. Result: sky-rocketing prices for even basic groceries; frostbite; and places which had been tiny settlements with no real infrastructure of roads or sewers, suddenly having to accommodate thousands of new, ill-equipped, exhausted and fractious arrivals.

Sources:

wikipedia, which focuses on the American experience of the gold rush.

Times Friday 23 October 1896 p10 review of Warburton Pike's Through the Subarctic Forest published Arnold 1896.

Times 23 February 1897 p5.

Times 5 April 1897 p8 - the British government hadn't yet been able to confirm that the rumours are true.

The Klondike Stampede of 1897-98 by Tappan Adney. New York and London: Harper and Brothers Publishers 1900: p1.

Times Thursday 29 July 1897 p11 article: The Yukon Goldfields.

15 JANUARY 1898

Henry made a passport application.

Source: Index to the Register of Passport Applications 1898, seen at findmypast: applicant H B P Burry.

SPRING 1898

Henry left England, headed for the Klondike River.

Possible source for the Atlantic crossing but not the exact date: findmypast passenger lists show one male H Burry travelling by ship from Liverpool to Halifax Nova Scotia at some point during 1898. It might not be the GD's Henry, of course.

Comment by Sally Davis on the date Henry sloped off. As soon as the news reached the USA's East Coast, Harper's Weekly magazine sent their reporter Tappan Adney to the Klondike as their man on the spot. He left New York on 28 July 1897 and went by the recently-opened Canadian Pacific Railway to British Columbia; stopped off to get well kitted-out at Victoria British Columbia and again at the Fort Selkirk trading post; and reached Dawson City by boat along the Yukon River on 23 October 1897, 92 days after he set out. Perhaps other people, not bothering to get so well-prepared (there were plenty of those) might have made the journey more quickly; but on the other hand, Henry had to cross the Atlantic before he could get to the start. For reasons I give below, I think Henry must have set out not later than mid-1898 and probably earlier than that.

There's some doubt about whether Henry meant to come back.

Comment by Sally Davis: this is all rather speculative, based on the addresses he and Rose gave for 1898 to 1901. For most of that time both the General Medical Council and the GD thought that both Henry and Rose Pullen-Burry could be reached at 185 Victoria Street in London, care of a Mrs Wreford. The entry for Henry in the GD's address book was "Away at Klondike" as if the writer fully expected Henry to come back. However, for 1901 and after there's no known address for Rose; and in 1901 the GMC had an address for Henry in Thornton Heath. It's hard to reach a conclusion but I'll make two suggestions: either that originally, Henry did mean to return to Britain eventually, but changed his mind; or that he never intended to return but didn't want to say so, especially to Rose.

Sources:

RAG p150 and p152, with details taken from the GD address book.

GMC Register 1898 p277 and GMC Register 1899 p288.

Kelly's Directory 1898 street directory p745.

Kelly's Directory 1901 street directory p818.

GMC Register 1901 p295.

ROSE AFTER HENRY LEFT

Rose and the two daughters, at least, moved to London, to rooms at 185 Victoria Street; they lived there until 1901.

Comment by Sally Davis: the Kelly's Directory entries for 185 Victoria Street suggest that in 1898, there were people living in the rooms above a tailor's business which occupied the street level. But the 1901 issue has the building occupied solely by business tenants. So it's likely that by 1901 Rose and her daughters had to go and live elsewhere. I expect they were glad of it: although there was a temperance hotel right next door which would have been quiet enough, next door to that was the entrance to Victoria Station.

At some point Rose realised that her husband was not going to come back. She and her three children were left with very little money. Annie Horniman stepped in to help.

Sources: Gerald Yorke Collection catalogue number NS73: letters from William Wynn Westcott to Frederick Leigh Gardner, written 12 November 1921, 6 January 1922 and 17 April 1924. Although the letters were written long after the event, Westcott had met up with Annie Horniman shortly before leaving England for South Africa in mid-1921. He'd probably got the information from her - asking after old friends. However, though he says that Annie Horniman had helped Rose and her family, he doesn't give details. By 1924 he had also received a letter from Henry Pullen-Burry; I suppose he Henry could have told him how Annie had helped, but somehow I doubt it. I'm still looking, but so far I haven't found any other sources for the help Annie gave to Rose and her children: that is, sources saying what the help was (school fees? Rent?) And how long it went on for.

Comment by Sally Davis: who knows how long it took Rose to realise that her husband was gone for good. Perhaps he sent her a letter. Or perhaps she eventually had to admit it to herself after many months of gradually diminishing hope. Her predicament was a grim one. I presume that like most young women of her age and class, Rose Pullen Burry had had the kind of education that prepared her for marriage and motherhood, not for work, in any field. There's no evidence that she ever had a job, even after her husband left her. Annie Horniman had inherited a fortune from her grandfather, the founder of the Hornimans tea importing firm. Before Rose was left with no income, Annie had already been very generous with money towards Mina (and thus Samuel) Mathers. Although I haven't found any evidence specifically saying that Annie's help was financial in Rose's case, money was what Rose will have been most in need of, however embarrassed and humiliated she might have felt by needing to accept it from her wealthy friend. Rose's daughters were educated for work - they were both teachers - and fees for them to get the necessary qualifications would have been something Annie could offer and Rose would be glad to accept. Probably Annie paid the fares for Ethel and later Winifred to travel to South Africa, where they both found jobs. In one of the biographies of Annie Horniman she's mentioned as taking Helen Pullen-Burry on holiday with her in Europe.

The theatre group:

Collected Letters of W B Yeats Volume IV 1905-1907. Editors John Kelly and Ronald Schuchard. Published Oxford University Press 2005: p437-38. Ethel did not find this involvement with the theatre company wholly delightful: she and her fellow volunteer Miss Gildea were so upset by J M Synge's behaviour in public with his various mistresses, that they complained to Annie about it.

The holiday in Europe: this is a tricky one. I read the information in Annie H: A Pioneer in the Theatre by Sheila Gooddie. Methuen 1990: p89. In the notes for the information, on p199 footnote 17, the source is given as "Helen Pullen-Burphy's unpublished reminiscences; Horniman Collections, John Rylands University Library of Manchester". What worries me is that I haven't come across anyone called Helen Pullen-Burphy in my other reading; she certainly wasn't a child of Henry and Rose.

Rose may have changed her name from 'pullen-burphy' to Burry.

Comment by Sally Davis: though it may just be the way Annie Horniman had always thought of her.

Source for the change of name, if it is one: Collected Letters of W B Yeats Volume IV 1905-1907, editors John Kelly and Ronald Schuchard. Published Oxford University Press 2005: p430 letter from Annie Horniman in Edinburgh, to W B Yeats 27 June 1906, where Annie tells Yeats she'll be back in London on Thursday, at which time "Mrs Burry is coming to the flat".

Rose may have got married a second time, to a man called Wreford.

Source for a remarriage of Rose to someone called Wreford is:

Collected Letters of W B Yeats Volume IV 1905-1907 editors John Kelly and Ronald Schuchard. Published Oxford University Press 2005; footnote 10 p430 in connection with Annie Horniman's letter of 27 June 1906, p430.

Comment by Sally Davis: I don't think Rose married a second time, though I can see how the idea arose that she did: "Address as Mrs Wreford" does make it sound as though Rose has remarried someone else. But I haven't found evidence of a divorce; or a marriage registration - at least, not in England - and the evidence from Annie Horniman in 1906 and William Wynn Westcott in the 1920s suggests that she remained Mrs Burry or Pullen-Burphy. I can think of two possible reasons for the appearance in Rose and Henry's lives of a 'mrs wreford'. The first is that Rose was using an assumed name - which leads me to wonder whether she and Henry were hiding from creditors. The second is that Mrs Wreford was Rose's landlady at the Victoria Street address, a woman running a boarding house and taking in post for her lodgers. I have to say that I haven't been able to confirm either of these theories: I don't know how I could confirm the first without a court case involving Rose masquerading as Mrs Wreford; Kelly's Directory for 1898 lists only the business on the ground floor, not the residents of the rooms above. I haven't got lucky trying to find Mrs Wreford on the 1901 census; I can't see Rose or her daughters either - perhaps they were abroad with Annie Horniman.

Further comment by Sally Davis 6 January 2017: I am now in contact with the great-granddaughter of Ethel Bauristhene, née Pullen-Burphy, and there's been no mention of a second marriage for Rose.

Rose's son, the younger Henry Pullen-Burphy, went to live in the USA.

Thanks to Adam P Forrest for finding him there.

Comment by Sally Davis: Henry Pullen-Burry the younger was the only member of the family I could find on the 1901 census: he was working as a stable-man on a stud farm in Orpington Kent, and lodging with his boss, Tom Olliver, and Tom's wife Alice at 1 Gray's Cottages Cudham. Perhaps he had chosen the work; but it's just as likely that his future had been thrown into chaos when his father joined the gold rush and didn't come back. By 1911 he had left England for North America. He fought in the first World War as a soldier with the Canadian Expeditionary Force. The US census of 1930 has him living with his wife Mayna and their three sons at Hennepin Minnesota.

Sources:

At //livesofthefirstworldwar.org details of the members of the Canadian Expeditionary Force.

Via Familysearch to US Federal Census 1930.

Update January 2017: Ethel's great-grand-daughter has sent me a very detailed family tree compiled by one of Henry's American descendants.

Rose went to live in South Africa. ?probably before 1911. And finally, having qualified as a sports and medical masseur, Winifred went to South Africa, in 1916. At some point, probably in South Africa, Ethel and Winifred were both members of a co-masons lodge. Ethel's husband, Antonio Bauristhene, had some correspondence with Alister Crowley in the mid-1920s.

Ethel and Winifred both married in South Africa, and they both have descendants.

Sources:

ETHEL to South Africa:

findmypast passenger lists: Miss E Pullen-Burry travelled from Southampton to Durban, sailing on 10 March 1906 on the Donald Currie and Company ship German.

Collected Letters of W B Yeats Volume IV 1905-1907 editors John Kelly and Ronald Schuchard. Published Oxford University Press 2005; footnote 10 p430 in connection with Annie Horniman's letter of 27 June 1906; and p524 footnote 10 which mentions a 'thank you' letter Annie Horniman wrote to Yeats in November 1906, after he had sent her a presentation copy of his Poems 1899-1905. Annie told him that she'd already bought several copies and sent one to "Ethel Burry in Natal".

WINIFRED to South Africa:

On the day of the 1911 census, Winifred was one of the students at the Physical Training College in Dartford.

Source for Winifred going to South Africa: findmypast passenger lists have a Miss Pullen-Burry, aged 29, going from London to Durban on the Union Castle line's Walmer Castle, leaving 19 February 1916.

Winifred's profession:

Seen at google, the 1936 issue of Directory of Masseuses and Masseurs covering July 1920 to June 1936. Published London: Chartered Society of Massage and Medical Gymnastics. On p552 Winifred is listed under her married name, as Winifred Margaret Pullen Gillmaster. There's no address for her and it's not clear whether she was still working; though she was still a member of the Society.

ROSE to South Africa:

Source: I couldn't find an obvious candidate on findmypast. The most likely one was a woman called Rose Burry, date of birth unknown, who sailed from London on 14 June 1909 on the John T Rennie and Son's ship Inchange, bound for Durban; though the marital status of this woman was given as "Single". I couldn't find Rose on the 1911 census, so perhaps she'd left the country by then.

ETHEL AND WINIFRED AS CO-MASONS

Unlike the freemasonry that most people know of, co-masonry allows women. When she first contacted me, in December 2016, Ethel's great-grand-daughter sent me a photo which she asked me to identify, saying that both Ethel and Winifred Pullen-Burry were in it, but that that was all she knew about what was going on. Roger Wright managed to find on the web a website selling official co-masonry regalia; and to identify some of the items being worn or held by people in the photo. I'm now fairly comfortable with the idea of the photo as showing the men and women members of a co-masons lodge, possibly at the end of a lodge meeting. Ethel is sitting on an ornate chair in the middle of the front row, and I think she is the current Worshipful Master of the lodge. Winifred is sitting to her right (as you look at the photo) one of two women and one man carrying a rod of office; I would guess she is one of the other lodge officials for the year. As at 6 January 2017, the lodge name and number, and the date of the photograph, are still a mystery.

ETHEL AND WINIFRED'S MARRIAGES AND DESCENDANTS are on the family tree sent me by Ethel's great-grand-daughter.

Rose was living in Johannesburg in 1921.

Source: Gerald Yorke Collection catalogue number NS73: letter from William Wynn Westcott to Frederick Leigh Gardner written 6 January 1922. Though he does not say so, I believe Westcott got the information from Annie Horniman, whom he met up with in England in 1921 before leaving to live in Durban. Just as Westcott was living in South Africa with his daughter (Lilian Gee), Rose must have been living with one of her daughters.

Rose died in South Africa, in 1922.

Source though without a specific date: Gerald Yorke Collection catalogue number NS73: letter from William Wynn Westcott to Frederick Leigh Gardner, 17 April 1924 in which Westcott calls Rose "Mrs Pullen-Burry" and says she died about 18 months ago. He doesn't say where he had come by the news; but I note that he had received (after years of silence) a letter from Henry Pullen-Burry during 1923; perhaps Henry knew that his wife had died.

For what happened to Henry after 1898 you'll need to go to the third file in this life-by-dates sequence.

BASIC SOURCES I USED for all Golden Dawn members.

Membership of the Golden Dawn: The Golden Dawn Companion by R A Gilbert. Northampton: The Aquarian Press 1986. Between pages 125 and 175, Gilbert lists the names, initiation dates and addresses of all those people who became members of the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn or its many daughter Orders between 1888 and 1914. The list is based on the Golden Dawn's administrative records and its Members' Roll - the large piece of parchment on which all new members signed their name at their initiation. All this information had been inherited by Gilbert but it's now in the Freemasons' Library at the United Grand Lodge of England building on Great Queen Street Covent Garden. Please note, though, that the records of the Amen-Ra Temple in Edinburgh were destroyed in 1900/01. I have recently (July 2014) discovered that some records of the Horus Temple at Bradford have survived, though most have not; however those that have survived are not yet accessible to the public.

For the history of the GD during the 1890s I usually use Ellic Howe's The Magicians of the Golden Dawn: A Documentary History of a Magical Order 1887-1923. Published Routledge and Kegan Paul 1972. Foreword by Gerald Yorke. Howe is a historian of printing rather than of magic; he also makes no claims to be a magician himself, or even an occultist. He has no axe to grind.

Family history: freebmd; ancestry.co.uk (census and probate); findmypast.co.uk; familysearch; Burke's Peerage and Baronetage; Burke's Landed Gentry; Armorial Families; thepeerage.com; and a wide variety of family trees on the web.

Famous-people sources: mostly about men, of course, but very useful even for the female members of GD. Oxford Dictionary of National Biography. Who Was Who. Times Digital Archive.

Useful source for business and legal information: London Gazette and its Scottish counterpart Edinburgh Gazette. Now easy to find (with the right search information) on the web.

Catalogues: British Library; Freemasons' Library.

Wikipedia; Google; Google Books - my three best resources. I also used other web pages, but with some caution, as - from the historian's point of view - they vary in quality a great deal.

6 January 2017

Email me at:

Find the web pages of Roger Wright and Sally Davis, including my list of people initiated into the Order of the Golden Dawn between 1888 and 1901, at:

www.wrightanddavis.co.uk

***

This is the third file in my sequence of life-by-dates biographies of Henry Pullen-Burry and his wife Rose. This file puts together all I've found out about Henry in the USA: 1898-1927. There's also a section by Adam P Forrest (see 1908) giving some good reasons why Henry chose to live there.

A huge thank-you to Adam Forrest, of Portland Oregon, who inspired me to do the biographies of Henry and Rose; and then provided me with lots of information on the occult scene that Henry was part of in Portland.

HENRY AFTER ROSE

1898 TO 1927

Though he was often registered to practice, with the General Medical Council in the UK, Henry never worked as a doctor again.

Sources: it's difficult to prove a negative, but there's no evidence for him in general practice and (see below) some evidence suggesting he tried a number of other jobs instead.

PROBABLY OCTOBER 1898 TO SPRING 1899

Henry and his travelling companions (he describes the group as a "family" which I think is significant; a family of "four rough men") - were marooned on a boat stuck in the frozen Yukon River, somewhere upstream of Dawson City.

Comment by Sally Davis: I just can't see Henry Pullen-Burry as a "rough" man! However, I imagine the journey from Hampshire had toughened him up a bit.

That Henry did enter the USA during 1898: via Familysearch to US NARA 1910 census entries GS film number 1375299.

Source for winter's length and conditions in the Yukon valley: The Klondike Stampede of 1897-98 by Tappan Adney. New York and London: Harper and Brothers Publishers 1900: passim as the book is about his journey; but also p162 for the fact that the river was iced up each winter; p165 in 1897 the icing-up had begun by 23 October 1897 and it was 50 degrees below at 7am, when Adney left Fort Selkirk; and p175 the river ice was four inches thick a couple of days later when Adney finally got to Dawson. P366 for the first signs of the 1898 thaw - 1 May; but p370 the melt water promptly put Dawson under water.

Sources for Henry being iced-up: typescript of evening-class given by Henry Pullen-Burry in Portland Oregon 1918-1919; now at the Freemasons' Library in Covent Garden with catalogue number SRIA1938m. Volume 3: Science and Hermetic Philosophy part 1. Lecture 47 given November 1918 p281-82 which has the quote about the 4 rough men; and Lecture 51 given December 1918 p301.

Later source: The Man who created Sherlock Holmes: the life and times of Sir Arthur Conan Doyle by Andrew Lycett. Weidenfeld and Nicolson 2007: p209-10; pp209-10, p423.

MAY 1899

The ice on the Yukon River melted, freeing the boats that were trapped but destroying a lot of them.

Source for the destruction of some boats by ice floes: Adney (see above) p162, Adney quoting the man who ran the trading post at Fort Selkirk.

Comment by Sally Davis: with the melting of the ice, Henry and his three travelling companions would have been able to finish their journey to the Klondike goldfields. I haven't found any direct evidence at all for whether they got to them or not; whether they stayed as a group or all went their separate ways; and how long it was before Henry went south again.

Henry did not make his fortune in the Klondike goldrush.

Source: another negative, but that Henry spent the rest of his life living from hand to mouth is clear from the few sources that exist for his later years, when he was living in Portland Oregon.

?1899?1900 TO 1908

Henry moved from job to job and possibly from place to place as well. He spent time as a salesman, and loathed it; and also worked in the office of a saw mill.

Sources:

Henry as a salesman:

Appearances in the set of 4 volumes at the Freemasons' Library in Covent Garden, catalogued as SRIA 1938m, typescripts of lectures given by Henry Pullen-Burry between 1918 and 1920 to an occult group in Portland Oregon. Volume 4 of the set: The Aquarian Age. Lecture 36 given January 1921 and one of a group of them on the existence of black magic in the modern world: 211-216.

Henry as a clerk in a sawmill, and generally about this period in his life:

Letter from Henry to Michael Whitty, publisher of the occult magazine Azoth; written 7 June 1919. You can read the letter at www.heruraha.net, the Temple of Thelema website. It and a series Henry sent to Paul Foster Case were posted there in March 2010 by Jim Eshelman who was able to see the original letters but doesn't say where they are now; as at March 2010 they hadn't been published.

Comment by Sally Davis: Henry is writing to another occultist so he would say this wouldn't he (and he's also on the lookout for sympathy for his plight) but in the letter to Whitty he implies that his main effort at this time was being put into his occult studies. He describes himself at this time as "a sort of Elijah in the wilderness". It's not clear from the letter exactly where this wilderness was - whether in the Yukon; elsewhere in Canada; or in the USA; or in all those places; but Henry ended up in Oregon.

1904 to 1911

Henry was in what he called his "passage through the 6=5", a particularly hard time.

Source: letter to Whitty 7 June 1919 see above.

Comment by Sally Davis: it seems as though, even if he had wanted to return to the UK and his wife, Henry didn't have the money to pay for the journey. I wonder if he would have come back, if he had raised the fare?

PROBABLY 1906, definitely before 1908

Henry was a member of an occult group, possibly the New Thought Circle he lectured to in 1908 (see below). Through a conversation with another member, he became convinced of the truth of the writings of the man he referred to as 'Heer Rose of The Hague'. He'd acquired them around 1888 but had not paid them much attention. From this time on, however, the writings became more and more important to him, as predicting the Age of Aquarius.

Source: Appearances in the set of 4 volumes at the Freemasons' Library in Covent Garden, catalogued as SRIA 1938m. These volumes are all typescripts, apparently of lectures given by Henry Pullen-Burry between 1918 and 1920 to an occult group in Portland Oregon. Volume 3: Science and Hermetic Philosophy part 2: Lecture 60 given February 1919 p355 though he's a bit vague about when this life-changing conversation took place.

Comment by Sally Davis: in Lecture 60 Henry described how he had listened to another student describing a vision he or she had had, and gradually realised that a lot of what the student was telling him had been described in the writings of Heer Rose, including the existence in the past of creatures that looked like apes but were nevertheless human. The existence of this missing-link creature was very important to Henry, who had come to hate the Darwinian idea that our species is descended from apes. After this encounter, Henry began to study Heer Rose's writings with very close attention and they formed the basis for a lot of what he later wrote about the Aquarian Age. By early 1908 he had enough information to hand on Heer Rose's ideas, to give a lecture on "The Eternal Memory", one of the two extra sephiroths that Heer Rose had postulated in his writings. Source for the lecture: Morning Oregonian 10 January 1908 p9.

JANUARY 1908

Although he was still registered with the British GMC at an English address, this year is the earliest evidence for Henry living in Portland. He had probably been there for a while and got to know people because he was already a member of Portland's New Thought Circle, which met on Friday evenings at Miss Eisner's house, 454 Columbia Street.

Sources:

GMC Register for 1908 p307 and for 1909 p312. In both issues, Henry's address was 11 Osney Crescent Paignton. I don't know who was really living there.

Morning Oregonian 10 January 1908 p9.

Comment by Sally Davis: new thought circles exist at the moment, though it wasn't clear to me whether they are continuations of the one Henry was a member of, or more recent foundations. A New Thought Circle existed in Medford Oregon in 1917, but I couldn't see any other evidence of the Portland one. Source for Medford's New Thought Circle: Medford Mail Tribune Saturday 3 February 1917 p4: a thank you note to its women members.

WHY PORTLAND? Here are some very good reasons why, researched and written by Adam P Forrest:

Referring to events in the 1920s, Emma Hardinge Britten scholar Marc Demarest (Chasing Down Emma, 2011, July 11) described Portland with wry affection as "the strange wooded attractor of the weird".

Portland had been an active centre of New Thought (the equivalent of today's New Age) and other forms of alternative spirituality since long before Pullen-Burry arrived. In 1850, within two years of the birth of Spiritualism in upstate New York, séances were being held in Portland. As early as 1867, the First Society of Progressive Spiritualists was meeting weekly in Portland. The New Era Spiritualist Camp was founded a few miles south of Portland in 1873, to serve as a site for Spiritualist camp meetings.

Theosophy has been active here since at least the foundation of the Willamette Lodge in 1890. The Prometheus Lodge was founded in 1895. Another lodge, the Theosophical Society in Portland, celebrated its centennial in 2011. During the course of the 1890s, Annie Besant, William Quan Judge, and Countess Wachtmeister all lectured in Portland.

From 1886 to 1918, a very influential New Thought periodical, The World's Advance Thought, describing itself as "the Avant-Courier of the New Dispensation" was published in Portland by Lucy A. Rose Mallory, whom no less an admirer of New Thought than Leo Tolstoy described as “the most important woman in America”.

In 1901, astrologer Llewellyn George founded both the Portland School of Astrology and Llewellyn Publishing in Portland. Now located in Minnesota, Llewellyn Worldwide has become the world’s largest publisher of New Age and occult books.

In Pullen-Burry’s time, popular Rosicrucianism arose in the United States, and took ready root in Portland. Max Heindel’s Rosicrucian Fellowship established a group in Portland within months of the Fellowship’s founding in 1909. Public classes studying Heindel’s books met regularly in the Portland public library. By 1923 The Triangle, a periodical of Spencer Lewis’ AMORC, was able to report that in Portland “the work is going on . . .with the usual enthusiasm”, and that the Emperor of the Order would be visiting the Portland AMORC group for a week. Also in 1923, J C F Grumbine relocated his Rosicrucian and mystical Order of the White Rose from Cleveland to Portland, where it continued to operate until his death in 1938.

Azoth: The Occult Magazine of America was edited from 1917 to 1921 by two consecutive Adept Praemonstrators or chief teachers of the New York temple of the AO (the Mathers loyalist branch of the Golden Dawn), firstly Michael Whitty and then (briefly) Paul Foster Case. In August 1921, in the same issue in which Pullen-Burry advertised his course of 123 mail-order lectures on Occultism, the magazine posted its statement of ownership. One of the ten owners was William E. Lillie of Vancouver, Washington USA, an integral part of the Portland metropolitan area.

At the Vernal equinox in 1920, a significant event transpired in Portland for another Golden Dawn Adept, for it was here that William Butler Yeats, on a lecture tour of America, received his famous samurai sword as a gift from Junto Sato.

End of Adam Forrest’s section; so back to Sally Davis who would like to comment that although there isn’t any direct evidence for it, surely Henry must have known most of the people Adam mentions; and most of the societies and magazines.

Sources and follow up for Adam Forrest’s section:

Chasing Down Emma: see Marc Demarest’s blog on the history of spiritualism, at ehbritten.blogspot.co.uk. Though you do have to be patient!

Lucy A Rose Mallory: a number of references to her on the web, and you can read copies of her magazine The World’s Advance Thought at www.iapsop.com

Max Heindel, writing name of Carl Louis von Grasshof. There’s a wikipedia page on him: 1865-1919, born Denmark. Worked as an engineer for the Cunard Line. Settled 1903 in Los Angeles, joined the TS and studied astrology. Author of several works on Rosicrucianism, particularly The Rosicrucian Cosmo-Conception (1909). Important work with Rudolf Steiner. Died 1919 in California.

Harvey Spencer Lewis, also known as Sar Alden; and Wisar Spenle Cerve. There’s a wiki on him: 1883-1939. Author, commercial artist. Founder (1915) and first imperator of the Ancient and Mystical Order Rosae Crucis (AMORC). I could see copies of the journal The Triangle via google; all from the 1920s.

Jesse Charles Fremont Grumbine; no wikipedia on him as yet. Upstate Cauldron: Eccentric Spiritual Movements in Early New York State by Joscelyne Godwin. SUNY Press 2015: p253 Grumbine BD heads a list of what looks like the teachers in an academy; as chair of metaphysics, ontology and divinity. On p311 Cayuga is listed as where Grumbine had his first ministry, in 1884 as clerk to the Universalist Society. As founder of the Order of the White Rose also known as the Order of Melchisedek.

At www.iapsop.com magazine The Rosicrucian Brotherhood volume 2 number 8 July 1908 announced the founding of the Ancient Order of Melchisedek, Brotherhood of Jesus.

I noticed a very large number of publications by Grumbine on a wide range of esoteric subjects including Auras and Colors; Clairvoyance; Clairaudience; Spiritualism and Channeling; Psychometry and Psychic Skills - etc.

1910

Henry appears on the US Census, living in Mr and Mrs Martin's lodging house in Multnomah, Portland Ward 4. This year, for the first time, his entry in the British GMC also gave an address in Portland - 247½ Fifth Street Portland.

Sources:

GMC Register 1910 p217.

Via Familysearch to US NARA 1910 census entries GS film number is 1375299: household in Portland Ward 4, Multnomah. Just noting that Henry was still describing himself as married. The census didn't ask people their occupation, unfortunately.

JULY 1910

Henry began offering private tuition in chemistry and natural philosophy.

Source: Henry's advert, in the Morning Oregonian 6 July 1910 p15 in the small ads.

Comment by Sally Davis: this is probably the point at which he gave up his job at the saw mill, the last work he had (it would appear) in which he was an employee, rather than self-employed.

DATE DIFFICULT TO ESTABLISH BUT AFTER 1910, PROBABLY AFTER 1918

Henry tried to make a living by selling typescripts of individual lectures from the set of evening classes now at the Freemasons' Library and catalogued there as SRIA 1938m.

Sources:

Letter from Henry to Michael Whitty, publisher of the occult magazine Azoth; written 7 June 1919. You can read the letter at www.heruraha.net, the Temple of Thelema website. It and a series Henry sent to Paul Foster Case were posted there in March 2010 by Jim Eshelman who was able to see the original letters but doesn't say where they are now; as at March 2010 they hadn't been published.

Set of 4 volumes at the Freemasons' Library in Covent Garden, catalogued as SRIA 1938m. In Volume 1: The Hermetics of the Bible p67 a little note dated November [1920] says that copies of the lectures contained in the volume could be bought for 25cents per lecture.

1912/1913 AND POSSIBLY LATER

Henry was living at 311 East 48th Street Portland.

Source: GMC Register 1913 p222.

Comment by Sally Davis: I do find it curious that Henry was still wanting to be registered with the British General Medical Council; because after many years of rootlessness he had now found himself a niche in the USA. He continued to send in his details to the GMC for its register until his death.

20 DECEMBER 1914; 3pm, Room 300 of the Alisky Building, Portland Oregon

Meeting - possibly the first meeting - of a group calling itself Ekklesia Number 1 of the Ekklesiae Autochristophysis. Henry was an important member of this group; possibly its leader and founder. It still existed in 1920.

Sources: announcement of the meeting, called a public "service", in the Sunday Oregonian of 20 December 1914; published Portland.

Source confirming Henry's involvement in the group: set of 4 volumes at the Freemasons' Library in Covent Garden, catalogued as SRIA 1938m. In Volume 1: The Hermetics of the Bible, p1 and on the first page of each lecture, a Mrs Helen Bailey of 251 West Broadway Portland is named as honorary secretary of Ekklesia 1. Lecture 67 p67 announced that the annual meeting of Ekklesia 1 would take place on Sunday 21 November [1920] at the K P Hall at 409 Alder, Portland.

?FROM DECEMBER 1914 TO 1921 (though possibly not continuously)

Henry gave a series of weekly lectures to the group known as Ekklesia 1 of the Ekklesiae Autochristophysis. His lectures were typed up and bound in the volumes now in the Freemasons' Library and catalogued as SRIA 1938m.

Sources: the four volumes (one in two parts) SRIA 1938m.

Long comment by Sally Davis on the four volumes of typescript now in the Freemasons' Library as catalogue number SRIA 1938m.

This is a monumental work: there are 1789 pages which contain 912,390-ish words; it's the result of research, astral travelling and writing by Henry over 35 years, and meetings of one or more occult groups in Portland over eight years. Though I'm not sure what Henry intended when Ekklesia 1 was set up in late 1914, by the time he was finishing off the last of the volumes he did have a clear sense of what they were all for, a purpose very much at the heart of the occult world of his times - and you can include some at least of the GD members in that, he was not the only member writing along the same lines. All the volumes are laid out as a series of lectures, a set of evening classes in hermetics.

First and second volumes of the four: The Hermetics of the Bible; and The Occultism of the New Testament. Although they were typed up during 1920, the lectures resulted from discussions and other work, that Henry mentioned as having gone on several years before; so they were the first set of classes he thought of. Henry's thesis was that the Bible is an occult text book, and its full meaning will only be made clear if you read it as a Kabbalistic text. The Hermetics of the Bible concentrates on the Old Testament, particularly the Book of Ezra, the Psalms especially 82 and 119, the causes and results of the Jewish captivity in Babylon, and a Kabbalistic interpretation of the creation myth in Genesis. The Occultism of the New Testament focuses on St John's Gospel, and on what is predicted in it about the new Age in which Henry now believed he was living.

Third volume of the four, which is so big it's in two parts: Science and Hermetic Philosophy. Each lecture has a date on it and the full set of lectures was delivered weekly between January 1918 and May 1920. In it, Henry (I suppose inadvertently) showed why he was no longer a practising doctor. He now hated the methods and the assumptions - essentially the whole idea - of contemporary, mechanistic science; on the grounds that it discounted the idea of the constantly re-born, ever-developing soul; rejected the idea of god or gods; and suggested the descent of Homo sapiens from apes. Henry hoped that the new Age would bring forth a hermetic science, based on axiom verified by means of astral travel to other realms and communication with their non-human inhabitants, rather than hypothesis verified by observation and experiment; and carried out by trained Adepts rather than scientists. In the two parts of the course, Henry argued that evolution is not about species, but about souls. He believed that everything on this planet, even rocks, had some form of consciousness and a soul, however basic and inert, which could move forward - essentially upward through reincarnations in ever-more-complex species - towards reincarnation in a human body, a particular high point but not the last stage in a soul's development. He also believed that elsewhere in the cosmos, entities existed that were at a higher level of consciousness than humans. In Part 2 (begun in December 1918) Henry concentrated on human biology and psychology and social organisation. The importance to Henry of the writings of Heer Rose of The Hague is clear in it - Rose and the French advocate of reincarnation Allan Kardec appear in Henry's list of the few people chosen to receive some hints as to what the imminent next Age of history would consist of. (Henry had read Kardec's work probably in the English translation made by GD member Anna Blackwell.) Rose and Kardec had been given their information by what Henry describes as (Part 2 Lecture 89 p533) entities representing the "great Cosmic Order of super-man souls...the Adepts of spiritual science". Science and Hermetic Philosophy ends with a series of lectures on Death and After - what happens to the soul after the death of its latest human body.

Henry was aware of some at least of the most recent discoveries of materialist science. In Part 1 Lecture 2, given January 1918, p2 he said that "Substance...is matter in vibration" with different substances vibrating at different rates - a description with string-theory overtones; and he described the atom as an arrangement of electrons in balance. He was also very excited by the discovery of radium and X-rays; and by experiments with spiritualist mediums: he was convinced that they provided evidence of the continuation of the soul - of life after death. However, most 19th and 20th-century science only indicated to Henry how far Mankind had to go before the souls that inhabited the human bodies of the contemporary world could move to any higher level of existence.

Fourth and last volume: The Aquarian Age, lectures delivered by Henry between May 1920 and September 1921. These lectures make clear - or clearer - what was now the purpose of Ekklesia 1 (I'm not at all sure that its purpose at the outset was the same). Its members were not just students of hermeticism listening to Henry as their occultist teacher. Henry now thought of himself as an Adept successor to Heer Rose of The Hague, whom he now met regularly on his astral travels. In Henry's astral travelling and other occult practices he had also met entities that had confirmed the arrival of the Age of Aquarius and told him what would be the main differences between it and its Piscean predecessor. The people of Ekklesia 1 - the people listening to the lectures - were to be trained as mediums and would use that training to find out more still about the Aquarian Age. They would communicate those findings to the public at large. The result would be the re-establishment of the Golden Age of Ibez, a civilization that had existed first in the Mexican Gulf and later in the Pacific, around 1 million years ago; led by the group known as the White Lodge who were now in charge of the rescue of Mankind from the state it had got into when Ibez sank into the ocean. The lectures gave details of what Aquarian society would be like; but warned the mediums-to-be of the dangers of the Aquarian Age being prevented from taking root by the efforts of black magicians in the world (by which Henry meant most scientists, and big business). He ended the whole great effort by denying the Brotherhood of Man - as each soul has two unique parents, each human is an only child-cum-soul - and proclaiming instead (Lecture 66 given September 1921, p393) a “universal Father-Mother” of all souls.

How typical Henry’s beliefs were, amongst occultists of the time, I really wouldn’t know, I’m not an occultist myself although I gather from some that are, that Henry’s views were not original. Other GD members (Ellen Gaskell for example) certainly shared the conviction that the world was (at last) leaving the Piscean Age of unquestioning monotheism and moving into the Aquarian Age of religion based on knowledge: an age in which hermeticists would come in from the margins to take their proper place at the centre of soul and social development. Both Ellen Gaskell and Henry thought of themselves as heralds of the Aquarian Age. It was, I think, how Henry had come to justify to himself his desertion of his family; and his poverty and loss of social status since: he had a higher purpose and could not expect reward in this life - which, after all, was only the latest life of his soul’s progress through reincarnation to another level of existence.

I also wonder about whether Henry would still have counted himself as Christian at this stage in his life. In Science and Hermetic Philosophy and again in The Aquarian Age, he describes Christianity as being degraded and commercialised and part of the problem not the solution.

For more on this business of the astrological ages:

Ibez became most widely publicized as part of the Theosophical legends on Atlantis and Lemuria in Alice Bailey’s A Treatise on White Magic (1934). You can read the relevant section online at:

<http://www.light-weaver.com/bk/magic/magi1161.html>

Alice Bailey A Treatise on White Magic published 1934 in London by J M Watkins and in New York by the Lucis Publishing Co.

For some of the Theosophic teachings about Ibez with footnoted sources, try:

<http://www.hiddenhistoryhumanity.com/8A%20Shamballa%20Mayans%20Brazil%206th%20RR%20I.htm>

Comment by Sally Davis on whether the Bible is a kabbalistic document. All I know about the Kabbalah is contained in Kabbalah: A Very Short Introduction by Joseph Dan, Gershom Scholem Professor of Kabbalah at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem. Published Oxford University Press 2007. On p13 Dan says that Jewish esotericism dates from the first century CE and later; and (p6) that the “kabbalah...first appeared in southern Europe in the last decades of the twelfth century”. The Sefer Yezira, much used by my GD members, appears first (p17) in the Jewish European culture of the tenth century. Though most modern scholars assume that its origins were third or fourth century, it’s in the absence of certain evidence as no copies exist from that early.

BY 1919

Henry had moved from East 48th Street Portland; though I don't know where he went to.
Medical Register 1919 p147 with Henry's address as "Portland Oregon USA".

JUNE 1919

Henry began to correspond with Michael Whitty; so he had found out about the existence of the occult magazine Azoth. The correspondence ended (as Henry no doubt hoped it would) with Henry writing an article for the magazine.

Source: letter from Henry to Michael Whitty, publisher of the occult magazine Azoth; written 7 June 1919. You can read the letter at www.heruraha.net, the Temple of Thelema website. It and a series Henry sent to Paul Foster Case were posted there in March 2010 by Jim Eshelman who was able to see the original letters but doesn't say where they are now; as at March 2010 they hadn't been published.

More information on Azoth:

Azoth: A Monthly Magazine Devoted to... Volume 7 numbers 1 to 6; and Volume 8 number 1. You can read volumes 7 and 8 at www.iapsop.com/archive/materials/azoth/ and there are a few more details about the magazine, which was published by the Azoth Publishing Co Inc of Cooperstown New York, from 1917 to August 1921. Editor: Michael Whitty; sub-editor (by 1920) Paul Foster Case; with specialist editors including Frank C Higgins, whose specialism was freemasonry - works by Higgins are mentioned by Henry in one of the volumes catalogued as SRIA 1938m.

Comment by Sally Davis: I'm not sure how and when Henry found out about Azoth - I guess he heard it on the American occult grapevine. If he hadn't known of its existence already, he would have learned through Michael Whitty, that an offshoot of the Alpha and Omega Order (founded by Samuel Liddell Mathers after he'd been expelled from the GD in 1900) existed in New York - the Thoth Hermes Temple. Whitty was its senior figure in the late 1910s, and his protégé Paul Foster Case its rising star. Henry would have found some familiar names amongst the writers who appeared in Azoth: as well as Mathers, E W Berridge had items published in it. Whitty died late in 1920. There's an obituary in Occult Review volume 33 number 2 February 1921 p75 though it has virtually no coverage of Whitty's time in the USA. Whitty turns out to have been English by birth (born 1862). He was the grandson of the original Michael John Whitty, founder of the Liverpool Daily Post.

JULY 1920 TO JANUARY 1921

Henry's article appeared in Azoth: Occult and Religious Symbolism.

Source: see iapsop website details immediately above.

?AROUND 1920, 1921

Ekklesia Autochristophysis either morphed into or was taken over by a more dynamic Portland-based group.

Source: this is a bit of speculation by Adam Forrest, based on his knowledge of occult activity in Portland Oregon in the years after the first World War and a careful reading of the local sources for both groups.

BY 1921

The Brotherhood of Atlantis and Ibez had been founded.

Sources, both discovered by Adam P Forrest: Morning Oregonian of 20 March 1921, obituary notice for Linus M Clark of 10½ 16th Street North, Portland; who is described as a member of that Brotherhood. Source for Henry as another member of the Brotherhood, possibly its leader after Clark's death: announcement of Henry's funeral, in Oregonian 3 January 1927.

DECEMBER 1920 TO MID-1921 and possibly later but I couldn't find evidence of later Henry corresponded with Paul Foster Case.

Comment by Sally Davis: Henry's letters to Whitty and to Foster Case are more or less the only source for what he'd been doing in the years between 1898 and (say) 1908; and also the only source I know of for his comments on the struggles of the GD in the late 1890s.

Source: extracts from Henry's letters (but not the replies), posted in March 2010 at www.heruraha.net, website of the Temple of Thelema, by Jim Eshelman. Eshelman seems to have been able to see the letters but doesn't say where they are now; as at March 2010 they hadn't been published. Eshelman had been intending to write an article on HPB as a 7=4; but the set of letter-extracts were as near as he got to that.

For further information on Paul Foster Case: wikipedia; and a timeline compiled by Lee Moffitt and dated 26 September 1997 at kcbventures.com/pfc/documents/timeline.pdf. Moffitt suggests that Foster Case was grateful to be noticed by a member of the original GD - he felt it gave his position at the Thoth Hermes Temple greater legitimacy - he had only been a member of it for a few years when he took over as the Temple's senior occultist after Whitty's death.

EARLY 1923

Henry met Arthur Conan Doyle again, in Portland. Conan Doyle found Henry much like he had been in the 1890s - "full of Rosicrucian lore, and occult knowledge".

The Man who created Sherlock Holmes: the life and times of Sir Arthur Conan Doyle by Andrew Lycett. Weidenfeld and Nicolson 2007: p209-10; p210, p423-26. Conan Doyle passed through Portland during a lecture tour.

1925

Henry's book Qabalism was published.

Source: Qabalism originally published by The Yogi Publication Society of Chicago; available on demand now through Kessinger Legacy Reprints.

Comment by Sally Davis: in his book, Henry puts forward a lot of the arguments that figured in the lecture series volumes (SRIA 1938m). I did notice a couple of changes in his thinking, though. In the Preface to Qabalism he said that the Kabbalah is the secret wisdom of the White Lodge of the Ibez civilization, and seemed to be trying to deny that the Jews had anything to do with it other than uncomprehendingly passing the wisdom on, via the Bible. Henry also included a chapter on the life and work of Philo Judaeus; who was hardly mentioned in the SRIA 1938m volumes. Henry did mention the mystical writings of Heer Rose of The Hague; but only ever referred to 10 sephiroth, rather than the 12 he suggested Heer Rose was advocating in the SRIA 1938m volumes.

30 DECEMBER 1926

Henry Pullen-Burry died of toxaemia in Multnomah Hospital. The soul that had occupied his body was released to await its next rebirth.

Source: Oregonian 3 January 1927: death and funeral announcement.

GMC Register 1927 p168 had an entry for Henry Pullen-Burry for the last time. His address was given as 413 Goodnough Buildings Portland. That's not his house, or at least I think not: it was the meeting place where Henry was delivering his lecture series during 1920 and 1921.

AFTERMATH - SRIA 1938m. How the volumes might have come to end up in the Museum of Freemasonry in London.

All the volumes have a name handwritten on the inside of the leather binding: "C C Adams". That's Cecil Clare Adams (1891-1963) son of the architect Henry Percy Adams of the London-based practice Adams Holden and Pearson. After Winchester and RMA Woolwich, in 1910 Cecil went into the Royal Engineers. He survived the first World War and the second, being awarded the MC and retiring with the rank of Colonel. In 1917, during a tour of duty in Ontario Canada, Cecil married Louisa Augusta Kirkpatrick. They had one child, Margaret Cecil Adams, born back in England in 1921.

Cecil had a lifelong interest in the occult. In 1913 he was initiated into A E Waite's Independent and Rectified Rite. By the early 1920s he was a freemason and member of Societas Rosicruciana in Anglia's Metropolitan College; from which so many of the GD's original members had come, around 1888-89. He also joined the freemasons' lodge Quatuor Coronati 2076, founded in the late 1880s as a forum for the study of the history and symbolism of freemasonry. Though the demands of his profession meant that he couldn't always attend meetings of the SRIA or QC2076, he rose through the ranks in QC2076 and served as its WM in 1940. In 1949 he was paid the compliment of being asked to give the United Grand Lodge of England's annual Prestonian Lecture. The subject of the lecture was always left to the chosen lecturer; Cecil spoke about Our Oldest Lodge.

All in all then, a likely reader of lectures on the Kabbala and the Aquarian Age. Quite how Cecil found out about Henry's sets of lectures I don't know; perhaps he stumbled across Azoth, the first issues of which were published while he was stationed in Canada; or perhaps he knew through IRR friends of the existence of the Thoth-Hermes Temple and went to Canada with letters of introduction. Somehow, he got plugged into occult circles in the US, and eventually bought what is probably a full set of the lectures Henry gave to his Ekklesia 1 between 1918 and 1921. It was probably Cecil that had the typescripts bound in leather; and in due course either he or his heirs gave them to the SRIA, where they are now part of its library at the FML.

Sources for Cecil Clare Adams: see en.wikipedia.org/wiki/ for Cecil's father and www.mallandain.com/rf.fulcher.mathieson.htm, for his father's affair with Cecil's step-mother Alice Mathieson whom he married in 1898 when her divorce came through.

Familysearch Ontario Marriages 1869-1927 now housed at Toronto, GS film number 002130760

There's an obituary in Royal Engineers' Journal published by the Institution of Royal Engineers; volume 77 1963 p318.

Initiation into the Independent and Rectified Rite: RAG p174 C C Adams, taking the motto Verum exquiro.

For SRIA: I looked at the Metropolitan College's Transactions of 1920-25; edited by W John Songhurst and privately printed. The issue of 1921 p17-18; issue of 1922 p30-31; and issue of 1924 p20 show Cecil beginning to progress up the ranks of the College's officers towards spending a year as its Celebrant. However he doesn't appear in the issue of 1924, presumably because he had been posted abroad. He was still a member though (p64), at level V°. He also appeared in the issue of 1925 p57 as VII°.

Quatuor Coronati 2076: via google to Ars Quatuor Coronati 2076 volume 52 1941 p283 Cecil C Adams as the previous year's WM, installing the coming year's one.

His lecture: at public.76465.fr01.ikeepincloud.com a list of those giving the UGLE's Prestonian Lecture.

Either Cecil Adams was lending his copies around, or there were other copies of some of Henry's lectures in circulation in London in the 1920s. In the Gerald Yorke collection there are some notes by Dr Carnegie Dickson on that part of The Hermetics of the Bible which covers Genesis chapter 1, the creation story days 1 to 3 (but not 4 to 6); and on the earlier part of The Occultism of the New Testament, where Henry considers St John's gospel up to the end of its chapter 5.

Source: Gerald Yorke Collection NS32, notebook at least partly used by Carnegie Dickson.

Comment by Sally Davis: Carnegie Dickson was the son of Dr George Dickson who was a member of the GD in Edinburgh in the 1890s. Carnegie Dickson was initiated into the GD's daughter order Stella Matutina in July 1909. Stella Matutina suffered in the years after its founder, Dr Robert William Felkin, emigrated to New Zealand; but was revived by Carnegie Dickson and other London-based members in the 1920s.

Sources:

RAG p41, p142, p165.

Gerald Yorke Collection of GD and Crowley papers, now at the Warburg Institute University of London. Catalogue number NS32: Notebook used by Rev A H E Lee and Dr Carnegie Dickson. Carnegie Dickson's notes of Hermetics of the Bible Lectures 34 to 44; and notes on part of The Occultism of the New Testament.

BASIC SOURCES I USED for all Golden Dawn members.

Membership of the Golden Dawn: The Golden Dawn Companion by R A Gilbert. Northampton: The Aquarian Press 1986. Between pages 125 and 175, Gilbert lists the names, initiation dates and addresses of all those people who became members of the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn or its many daughter Orders between 1888 and 1914. The list is based on the Golden Dawn's administrative records and its Members' Roll - the large piece of parchment on which all new members signed their name at their initiation. All this information had been inherited by Gilbert but it's now in the Freemasons' Library at the United Grand Lodge of England building on Great Queen Street Covent Garden. Please note, though, that the records of the Amen-Ra Temple in Edinburgh were destroyed in 1900/01. I have recently (July 2014) discovered that some records of the Horus Temple at Bradford have survived, though most have not; however those that have survived are not yet accessible to the public.

For the history of the GD during the 1890s I usually use Ellic Howe's The Magicians of the Golden Dawn: A Documentary History of a Magical Order 1887-1923. Published Routledge and Kegan Paul 1972. Foreword by Gerald Yorke. Howe is a historian of printing rather than of magic; he also makes no claims to be a magician himself, or even an occultist. He has no axe to grind.

Family history: freebmd; ancestry.co.uk (census and probate); findmypast.co.uk; familysearch; Burke's Peerage and Baronetage; Burke's Landed Gentry; Armorial Families; thepeerage.com; and a wide variety of family trees on the web.

Famous-people sources: mostly about men, of course, but very useful even for the female members of GD. Oxford Dictionary of National Biography. Who Was Who. Times Digital Archive.

Useful source for business and legal information: London Gazette and its Scottish counterpart Edinburgh Gazette. Now easy to find (with the right search information) on the web.

Catalogues: British Library; Freemasons' Library.

Wikipedia; Google; Google Books - my three best resources. I also used other web pages, but with some caution, as - from the historian's point of view - they vary in quality a great deal.

12 September 2015

">

Find the web pages of Roger Wright and Sally Davis, including my list of people initiated into the Order of the Golden Dawn between 1888 and 1901, at:

www.wrightanddavis.co.uk

***

George Frederick Rogers was initiated into the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn at its Isis-Urania temple in London on 18 June 1895; he chose the Latin motto 'Omnium frater'. That evening was a busy one at the GD: Mary Palethorpe Reynolds, Harold John Levett and George Cope Cope were initiated in the same ritual. Though George knew many members of the GD already, I'm not sure that he had met any of the other new initiates. The GD records that have survived suggest that George never followed up his initiation; though he didn't ever go so far as to resign from the Order either.

This is one of my short biographies. They mostly cover GD members who lived in Bradford, Liverpool and Edinburgh. I've done what I can with those people, using the web and sources in London. I'm sure there's far more information on them out there, but it will be in record offices, the local papers...I'd need to be on the spot to look at them, and I've had to admit that life's too short!

Sally Davis

November 2016

My basic sources for any GD member are in a section at the end of the file. Supplementary sources for this particular member are listed at the end of each section.

This is what I have found on GEORGE FREDERICK ROGERS; known at least at university as 'Long' Rogers - he was 2.03 metres tall (6' 8")!

IN THE GD

When he was initiated into the GD, George Rogers had been a member of the Societas Rosicruciana in Anglia for two years, and the Theosophical Society for at least five years. Both of those organisations were good recruiting grounds for the GD though I think the SRIA is the more likely route in George's case.

In the GD's earliest days many members of SRIA had received a GD initiation, probably in order to advise the GD's founders on the rosicrucian details of the rituals they were going to set up. Most of them had not wanted to be a member of an order that was intending to do practical magic, and let their membership lapse. By the time of George's initiation, the GD's earliest days were six if not seven years into the past and the original flow of initiates from SRIA was more of a trickle. However, George might still have been offered initiation by on the grounds that he had information and advice to offer. The most likely person at SRIA to have wanted George in the GD was William Wynn Westcott - one of the two main founders of the GD, and from 1892 the SRIA's most senior member, its Supreme Magus.

One other person who could have recommended George for initiation was Charles Lloyd Tuckey, who had been initiated in July 1894. Charles was a member of SRIA, probably because George had recommended him. The two men were both doctors and had been members of the Society for Psychological Research for several years. They shared an interest in mesmerism and hypnotism.

ANY OTHER ESOTERIC INTERESTS?

George was very interested in some aspects at least of the western esoteric tradition, and while he was not an active member of the GD, he kept up active membership of several other esoteric groupings.

FREEMASONRY

George became a freemason at a very young age. He joined the Isaac Newton University Lodge number 859, which was based in the university and had a reputation for bringing on young freemasonry talent. I think George had already set his foot on the ladder of the lodge's hierarchy of officers by the time he took his BA exams in 1887. He continued up that ladder while studying for his MB and BS. It was an expensive business: lodge officers were expected to wear a modified version of Court evening dress while carrying out their duties. It was also an exacting business: the lodge was known for the high standard of its ritual work. And once they were sufficiently senior, officers of the lodge were given a rank in the Provincial Grand Lodge of Cambridgeshire, with its attendant duties. In addition, there were exchange visits between Oxbridge-based lodges that senior officers of the lodges were expected to attend. George reached senior warden level at the installation meeting of November 1890 and went to the annual festival meeting of the equivalent lodge at Oxford University, Apollo University Lodge number 357.

On 27 November 1891 George reached the top of Isaac Newton University Lodge's hierarchy, the first student from Gonville and Caius College to serve as its Worshipful Master. As WM of one Cambridgeshire lodge he was invited to important meetings in other ones. He led a delegation of Isaac Newton University Lodge 859 members to the installation of Lt-Col Robert Townley Caldwell as the new Provincial Grand Master of Cambridge; and attended that year's installation meeting of Etheldreda Lodge 2107 in Newmarket, in February 1892. His year as WM was particularly busy as the Lodge was in the process of building its own Masonic Hall. It had owned land on Corn Exchange Street for many years but had only just raised enough money to commission architects and pay builders. George had the good fortune to be WM when the Earl of Lathom (standing in for the Duke of Connaught as the most senior freemason in England) laid the new building's foundation stone, on 6 May 1892; though he had handed on the baton to his lodge successor Francis Carr by 1893 when the first meetings were held in it. George's own installation had been held at the lodge's earlier meeting place, the Red Lion Hotel; meetings of the lodge from 1916 to 1920 were held there again, after the military requisitioned the Masonic Hall.

After his year as WM was over in November 1892, the number of freemasonry functions George attended dropped. In the summer of 1893 he had more important exams to take; and then he started work, in London. However, he was going back to Cambridge for freemasons' meetings when he could spare the time. He was still involved with Cambridgeshire's Provincial Grand Chapter and in 1895 had made it to the rank of Principal Sojourner. And in 1897 he went as a visitor to a meeting of the Scientific Lodge number 88, Cambridge University's other - much older - freemasons' lodge.

As far as I can tell, George didn't join any freemasons' lodges while he was living and working in London in the late 1890s. He joined a Rosicrucian group of freemasons instead - see the next section for more on that. The formation of London Hospital Lodge 2845 came a little late for him - the process of setting up it up didn't begin until after he had got a job back in Cambridge. He didn't attend the early meetings of the lodge's founders but later on, he added his name to the petition to the United Grand Lodge of England; probably at the request of the lodge's first WM, Ernest Sansom, the hospital's senior physician and consequently George's ex-boss. George was present at the lodge's consecration, on 2 October 1901 at Hotel Cecil; and was one of that year's officers though quite a long way down the list of them. I imagine that Isaac Newton University Lodge 859 will have been his main freemason's lodge now he was back at the University.

THE ROSICRUCIANS

If you were particularly interested in the esoteric side of freemasonry there was a group of colleges that you could join which specialised in research into the legend and symbolism of Christian Rosenkreuz; and George joined it. This was Societas Rosicruciana in Anglia; not exactly a freemasons' lodge, but you had to be a freemason to be a member. George was admitted to the SRIA's Metropolitan College on 13 April 1893. After business had been dealt with, college meetings were organised around the reading of a paper by one of the members, followed by a discussion of the points raised in it. The paper would then be published in SRIA's Transactions. On 11 January 1894, George's medical acquaintance, professional hypnotherapist Charles Tuckey, became a member in time to hear George read his paper on Mesmerism, a subject they had probably been discussing between themselves for quite a while. Charles was never a committed member of SRIA and resigned in 1897 but George remained an active member until after the first World War. He made his way up the ladder of official posts in the Metropolitan College to serve as its Celebrant (the equivalent of WM) from January 1904 to January 1905. His interest in hypnotism continued and he had a paper on the subject prepared for the meeting of 10 April 1919. There was not enough time to read it that evening, but he gave a short resume of it at the following meeting, 10 July 1919.

By the early 1920s, George was one of the SRIA's longest-serving members. As an ex-Celebrant at its Metropolitan College, and the reader of a paper, he had the rank of Hon Magi 9° and a place on the SRIA's governing Council. However, accounts of the SRIA's Metropolitan College in the 1920s show that he did not attend any of its meetings during that decade, even those in the April of each year that were meant to be obligatory. In 1931 he finally sent in his resignation. It was accepted with regret - all resignations were accepted with regret - at the meeting of 8 October 1931. The Metropolitan College's Transactions usually acknowledged the death of members but not necessarily of ex-members; there was no mention of George's death in the 1943 issue.

SOCIETY FOR PSYCHICAL RESEARCH

George and Charles Tuckey were important members of the Society for Psychical Research and George at least will have known some of its founding members well - the Society's founders had included a group of Cambridge University academics.

George joined the Society in October 1885, just after he had started at Cambridge University, and four years before Charles did. Meetings got easier to attend in 1893, when he went to work as a junior doctor at a London hospital. By 1895, George was a member of the Society's governing council and he remained a member for many years, even after returning (in 1900) to join the academic staff of his old Cambridge college.

THEOSOPHY

Unlike Charles Tuckey, who had no interest in eastern philosophy, George was interested in theosophy. His Theosophical Society membership application appears in the TS's Register for 1889 to 1891 but without a date. However, a news item in the TS's magazine Lucifer shows that he was a member by February 1889 - as with freemasonry, he'd got involved while still an undergraduate.

The TS organised itself locally by way of lodges, run rather like freemasons' lodges. While he was still at university, George was a member of Cambridge Lodge. So was Catherine Passingham; she was the Lodge's president in 1888-89 and her daughter Amy Gillig was its honorary secretary. Mrs Passingham was also a member of the Society for Psychical Research, so it's likely George knew her and her family quite well around 1888-89. He may have met them even before that: in 1892 Amy Gillig married Edward Armitage, Cambridge University graduate and member of Isaac Newton University Lodge 859 since before George joined it. The Passinghams left Cambridge early in 1889. To fill the gap Catherine Passingham and her daughter would leave, a Mr Naidu (clearly born in India) was made lodge president and George became vice-president. Catherine Passingham - but not her daughter - was initiated into the GD in October 1889.

George was still a member of the TS when he moved to London in 1893. While living in London he was a member of Blavatsky Lodge, which met at the TS's headquarters in Regent's Park; though Helena Petrovna Blavatsky had died by then so George wouldn't have heard her speak. George remained a member through the mid-1890s - though not a member of any particular lodge - when the majority of members lapsed or resigned, as a struggle for power and future direction tore the TS worldwide apart in the years after Blavatsky's death; carefully keeping the TS records up to date through moves to three different London addresses between 1893 and 1900. However, he stopped paying his annual subscription around 1899, and there's a note on his membership entry deeming his membership to have lapsed as of November 1902. Cambridge Lodge may have been closed by then anyway - more than half the lodges in England shut down during the power struggle.

If George kept up his interest in theosophy after 1902, it will have been in a private way only.

SPIRITUALISM

Catherine Passingham was a spiritualist as well as a theosophist. In the mid-1890s at least, she attended meetings and social events at the London Spiritualist Alliance. I haven't found any evidence of Mrs Passingham persuading George Rogers to give the LSA a try, though. The spiritualist magazine Light covered LSA events, and usually included a guest-list; but I didn't spot George's name at any event in the 1890s. It is hard to tell, however, whether people were spiritualists. Spiritualism in general was a very locally, even family-based pursuit and the London Spiritualist Alliance was just an umbrella-group for some spiritualist events in London.

Sources:

FREEMASONRY

Database of the collections at the Freemasons' Library, accessible online at www.freemasonry.london.museum/catalogue.php. You can search the catalogue via the website. And if you follow the option 'resources' you can reach a searchable digitised database of freemasonry magazines. It only goes as far as 1900 though.

The Freemason November 1888 p10.

The Freemason March 1889 p5.

The Freemason November 1890 p11.

The Freemason February 1891 p11.

The Freemason November 1891 p3 and p8.

The Freemason February 1892 p3.

The Freemason November 1892 p1.

The Freemason June 1893 p3.

The Freemason March 1895 p6 and Freemason's Chronicle March 1895 p4.

The Freemason November 1897 p6.

The Freemason December 1900 p2.

The Freemason October 1901 p2.

I also searched The Freemason's 1905 volume but couldn't see any references to the lodges George Rogers was involved with.

A Hundred Years of the Isaac Newton University Lodge number 859 1861-1961. No indication of the author. This was just a brochure, keener to celebrate the close links the lodge had with the United Grand Lodge of England, and to mention the distinguished careers of its members; than to write a lengthy account of the lodge's history. However it did have a list of the lodge's worshipful masters to date; also lists of its secretaries and treasurers - George never served in either of those roles. Held at the Freemasons' Library.

Edward Armitage:

Alumni Cantabrigiensis Abbas-Cutts part 2 p70 citing Times 15 March 1929.

Ars Quatuor Coronati volume LXII part 1 p137-38: In Memoriam Edward Armitage. As a member of Quatuor Coronati Lodge 2076, Armitage will have known GD founder William Wynn Westcott.

London Hospital Lodge number 2845. Not really a lodge history, just a four-page leaflet giving some details of its founding. No author's name or publication details. And no date of publication. The latest date I found in the text was 1945. Held at the Freemasons' Library.

THE ROSICRUCIANS

Transactions of Societas Rosicruciana Metropolitan College beginning with the issue of 1893-94 and continuing until that of 1943 though with a break after the 1931 issue. Held at the Freemasons' Library.

History of the Societas Rosicruciana in Anglia by the MW Supreme Magus Dr William Wynn Westcott. Privately printed London 1900 and there are no subsequent updates to it: pp31-32.

SOCIETY FOR PSYCHICAL RESEARCH

Journal of the Society for Psychical Research published by the Society from its offices at 19 Buckingham Street Adelphi, London; and for members only. Even corresponding and associate members have to be elected. Volume 2 1885-86 p57, October 1885 - joining date of George Frederick Rogers.

Journal of the Society for Psychical Research volume 4 1889-90: p49 April 1889 - joining date of Charles L Tuckey.

Proceedings of the Society for Psychical Research volume 9 1893 and 1894. Published London by Kegan Paul Trench Trübner and Co for the Society: p371 list of Council members doesn't yet include George; p388 Proceedings of the Society for Psychical Research volume 11 1895 p602 George is now a member of the Council; p620.

Proceedings of the Society for Psychical Research volume 15 1900-01 p443 George was probably too busy to do many book reviews but this issue has him reviewing Alice Feilding's Faith Healing and Christian Science. Also p485 Charles Tuckey is also a Council member now; p503.

THEOSOPHY

Theosophical Society Membership Register January 1889 to September 1891 p129. Four different addresses are listed on George's entry: his parents' house in Plymouth and three in London. There's no record of his address after 1900, when he returned to Cambridge; so he had let his membership lapse by then.

Lucifer: A Theosophical Magazine March-August 1889 with Blavatsky as editor. Published by the Theosophical Society Publishing Co at 7 Duke St Adelphi. Volume 4 issue of 15 March 1889 p83 news item on TS's Cambridge Lodge.

ANY OBITUARIES/BIOGRAPHIES?

I haven't found any.

BIRTH/YOUTH/FAMILY BACKGROUND

George Frederick Rogers' parents were George Porter Rogers and his wife Sarah, née Wills. George had been born in London and Sarah in Cheshire, but they married in Plymouth. George's mother was from Dartmouth and perhaps that's why he chose to settle in Devon.

George Porter Rogers was a businessman, but from 1875 he also had income from a patent for improvements to sewing machines. He patent was held jointly with Charles Walter Vosper. Vosper was an engineer and probably did the design; while George contributed the money to develop Vosper's ideas.

George Porter Rogers' main source of income was from wholesale warehouses in Old Town Street and Treville Street, and later in Commercial Street, in Plymouth. In 1878 he was a partner in Rundle Brown and Co. At the end of that year Henry Brown retired; the remaining partners carried on as Rundle Rogers and Brook. George Porter Rogers was also active in the local Liberal Party, becoming the president of its Plymouth and Western Counties branch in 1891. By that time he may have been the only partner remaining from the original business: he only was involved in the purchase from Plymouth Council of warehouses and other premises in Commercial Road Plymouth, in August 1890.

George and Sarah married in 1866 and had eight children. George Frederick Rogers was their eldest child, born in April 1867. On census day 1871 George Porter Rogers and Sarah were living at 1 Moor View Terrace Plymouth with George Frederick and his two next siblings, Ida and Amy. Even at this relatively early stage in George Porter Rogers' business life, they were able to afford two servants. By census day 1881, four more children had been born, but George Porter Rogers' mother Mary had come to live with them, bringing her income from investments; and the warehouse business was doing well. The family had moved to the street they lived in for the next two decades - Seaton Terrace Compton Gifford - and they were able to employ a cook as well as a housemaid and a nurse. On census day 1881 they were living at number 10. Their neighbour at number 9 was Anne Lemon, widow of Lt-Col Thomas Lemon of the Royal Marines. Mrs Lemon's son, Rev Thomas William Lemon, was a freemason and future GD member.

By 1891 Anne Lemon had died; and the Rogers family had either moved a few houses down the street, or had their original house renumbered. On census day 1891 George Porter Rogers, his wife, mother, daughters and youngest son Edgar were living at number 16 Seaton Terrace. With several of the children no longer living at home, George Porter Rogers and Sarah had scaled back their household staff to a cook and a housemaid only; but they were going to the expense of employing a live-in governess.

George Porter Rogers died in May 1911, leaving as much as £25000 in personal estate alone. George Frederick Rogers was one of the executors of his father's Will; with his mother Sarah, his brother Victor and Edward Barclay Smith MD who I suppose was the family doctor.

Evidence from later in their lives suggests that George Porter Rogers' sons Victor and Edgar went into their father's warehouse business, with Edgar branching out into clothes manufacture. George Frederick Rogers was the family's academic star, however: he got into Cambridge University. He never worked in the family business.

Sources:

GEORGE PORTER ROGERS

Census 1871-1891; Probate Registry 1911.

Commissioners' of Patents Journal issue of 9 July 1875 p1839.

London Gazette 7 January 1879 p72 list of partnerships dissolved.

Libl and Radical Year Book 1887 p71 with George Porter Rogers as one of the two vice-presidents of the Plymouth and Western Counties Liberal Club.

Seen at discovery.nationalarchives.gov.uk, details of documents at the Plymouth and West Devon Record Office items 1302-124.:

Times Wednesday 30 December 1891 p4: amongst those congratulating W E Gladstone on his birthday: George Porter Rogers as chairman of the Plymouth and Western Counties Liberal Club.

London Gazette 11 August 1899 p5039 a long list and I couldn't find the top of it to find out what it was! It's all men, by county, so I think it's probably a list of new JP's. George Porter Rogers, now of 2 Warleigh Villas Ford Park Plymouth, is on the list for Devon.

GEORGE FREDERICK ROGERS: EDUCATION

The GD member - I'll call him George from now on - went to Plymouth High School, and passed the exams to go to Cambridge University in 1885. He was an undergraduate at Gonville and Caius College, and graduated BA in 1887.

Source:

Alumni Cantabrigiensis Part 2 No 5 p344.

Times 16 December 1887 p9 University Intelligence.

WORK/PROFESSION

Although his family as comfortably off, George was going to need a profession, and he chose medicine. It was while he was working for his degrees in medicine that he spent his year as WM of Isaac Newton University Lodge number 859. He graduated in medicine and surgery in 1893 and as MD in 1896.

He moved to London in 1893 to work at the London Hospital. He began there as a new graduate would, as receiving room officer, before being promoted to house physician and house surgeon. In his first two years at the hospital he was living out, probably in lodgings: at 123 Gloucester Terrace, then at 66 Mornington Road Gloucester Gate and lastly at 3 Vernon Chambers Southampton Row. Probably in 1895, though, he was appointed to work on the hospital's maternity ward, for which he needed to live on-site.

It's surprising how few certain details I've been able to find about George's working life, and I'm not absolutely sure even when he left the London Hospital. I think he remained there until 1899. Then he might have had some time between jobs, before returning to his old Cambridge college, Gonville and Caius, in 1900 as junior demonstrator in the Anatomy Department. The appointment was for five years, at £100 per year; but it was renewed twice. By 1912 it had expanded, as well, to include examining undergraduate students.

George moved back to Cambridge in 1900 but not into college. On the day of the 1901 census he was the only lodger at 4 King's Parade Cambridge, where the householder was Louisa Greef, a widow of 72. By 1911 Mrs Greef had either died or moved away, and George had taken over as the householder. On census day 1911, he was employing a housekeeper and a housemaid to keep house for himself and his one lodger Anne Lane, an elderly spinster who worked in a music shop. Two servants for a small household in which both residents were out all of most days seems excessive; so perhaps George was not out all of most days, but working in general practice at that address when not doing his job at the Anatomy Department.. His entries in the General Medical Council registers and the medical directories don't make it clear whether or not he was working as a GP.

George's third five-year appointment as junior demonstrator expired in December 1914 but I think he had probably not been doing the work for nearly two years: in 1913, he was appointed an Inspector of Vivisection for the Home Office. When the war broke out, he joined the Royal Army Medical Corps and served until 1919; though I don't know where he worked and such evidence as I've found suggests he continued to do his Home Office job. In 1916 he was living in London again, at 46 Norfolk Square Hyde Park but this seems to have been a temporary phase because he moved back to Cambridge, to 9 King's Parade in 1917.

George continued to work for the Home Office until 1943 but after 1928 I don't know where he was living. He must, I suppose, have left King's Parade Cambridge; but the usual sources for this kind of information give 'c/o' addresses only.

Sources:

Times 19 June 1893 p7 University Intelligence.

General Medical Council registers 1895 to 1931; there are no entries for him after 1931.

A note about the Medical Directory: like Who's Who, it's dependent on the people listed sending in details of their current employment and whereabouts.

Medical Directory 1895 volume 1 London p309.

Medical Directory 1897 volume 1 London p327.

Medical Directory 1900 Provincial section p1080.

Times 30 January 1904 p12 University Intelligence.

Medical Directory 1905 Provincial section p903. Then there's no change in the entry for George Rogers until:

Medical Directory 1912 Provincial section p973.

The first World War is where George's entries start departing from what was really going on:

Medical Directory 1916 Provincial section p971 but with the Norfolk Square address and the new job at the Home Office listed as well as the junior demonstrator job at Cambridge University, as if he was doing both when University sources say he'd left his university job.

Medical Directory 1917 Provincial section p975 with George's jobs as per 1916 but his address as 9 King's Parade Cambridge.

The 1917 entry continues unchanged until:

Medical Directory 1928 Provincial p1006 with George's employment details exactly as 1917 but no address other than c/o Barclays Bank Cambridge. That entry then continues without alteration until:

Medical Directory 1944 when there is no entry for him at all.

The fact that George's job as junior demonstrator ended in 1914 is from:

Cambridge University Calendar 1919 issue, seen via archive.org: p85 Anatomy Department staff: George Frederick Rogers as junior demonstrator, the most senior of three of them; dates 1900-1914. Further down the page are his terms and conditions, and salary. On p10 George is on the list of those eligible to vote for the MP for Cambridge University.

However:

Also seen online: Cambridge University Calendar issue of 1921-22 p13 and p90 with exactly the same entries as in the 1919 issue. It's as if time has stopped!

Alumni Cantabrigiensis Part 2 No 5 p344 which gives the dates of his employment by the Home Office as 1913 to 1943. It's also the source of his nickname of Long Rogers.

ANY PUBLICATIONS?

Apart from the two talks that were published by the SRIA, I don't know of any.

DEATH

George Rogers died in November 1943. He had probably been retired for a few months, as his death took place in Yelverton, Devon. George's youngest brother Edgar Stanley Rogers was living in Yelverton on census day 1911, with his wife Lilian and two children; and may still have been living there in 1943. George had appointed Edgar to be one of his executors, with an accountant, William John Ching. George left a comfortable amount of money to his heirs, whoever they were - £24700-and-odd in personal estate alone. George had never married and so had no known descendants.

Sources:

Probate Registry 1944.

BASIC SOURCES I USED for all Golden Dawn members.

Membership of the Golden Dawn: The Golden Dawn Companion by R A Gilbert. Northampton: The Aquarian Press 1986. Between pages 125 and 175, Gilbert lists the names, initiation dates and addresses of all those people who became members of the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn or its many daughter Orders between 1888 and 1914. The list is based on the Golden Dawn's administrative records and its Members' Roll - the large piece of parchment on which all new members signed their name at their initiation. All this information had been inherited by Gilbert but it's now in the Freemasons' Library at the United Grand Lodge of England building on Great Queen Street Covent Garden. Please note, though, that the records of the Amen-Ra Temple in Edinburgh were destroyed in 1900/01. I have recently (July 2014) discovered that some records of the Horus Temple at Bradford have survived, though most have not; however those that have survived are not yet accessible to the public.

For the history of the GD during the 1890s I usually use Ellic Howe's The Magicians of the Golden Dawn: A Documentary History of a Magical Order 1887-1923. Published Routledge and Kegan Paul 1972. Foreword by Gerald Yorke. Howe is a historian of printing rather than of magic; he also makes no claims to be a magician himself, or even an occultist. He has no axe to grind.

Family history: freebmd; ancestry.co.uk (census and probate); findmypast.co.uk; familysearch; Burke's Peerage and Baronetage; Burke's Landed Gentry; Armorial Families; thepeerage.com; and a wide variety of family trees on the web.

Famous-people sources: mostly about men, of course, but very useful even for the female members of GD. Oxford Dictionary of National Biography. Who Was Who. Times Digital Archive.

Useful source for business and legal information: London Gazette and its Scottish counterpart Edinburgh Gazette. Now easy to find (with the right search information) on the web.

Catalogues: British Library; Freemasons' Library.

Wikipedia; Google; Google Books - my three best resources. I also used other web pages, but with some caution, as - from the historian's point of view - they vary in quality a great deal.

Find the web pages of Roger Wright and Sally Davis, including my list of people initiated into the Order of the Golden Dawn between 1888 and 1901, at:

www.wrightanddavis.co.uk

***

Kate Eleanor Broomhead was initiated into the Order of the Golden Dawn in June 1890 at its Horus temple in Bradford, as Bradford's second woman member. She chose the Latin motto 'Persevera'. Later she moved to London and became a member of the GD's Isis-Urania temple. Although it took her a decade to do the study, she was finally initiated into the GD's 2nd, inner order in 1900. By this time she was married to the artist Cosmo Rowe. When the GD split into two daughter orders in 1903, Kate Rowe went into the Independent and Rectified Order or Rite.

Sissie Rowe (properly, Sarah Ann Rowe) was initiated into the Order of the Golden Dawn on 7 November 1896 at its Isis-Urania temple in London. Initiated as part of the same ritual were Robert Palmer Thomas; Henry Edward Colville and his French wife Zélie; and Marion Cunningham; though I imagine Sissie didn't know any of them before that day. Sissie chose the Latin motto 'Veritas sin timore'. Early on in her membership she was excused paying the annual member's subscription on grounds of poverty (William Wynn Westcott was very understanding towards GD members who couldn't afford to pay); and she never made it into the inner, 2nd Order. But she does seem to have continued as a GD member until 1903 before joining one of its daughter orders. I'm certain that Sissie Rowe was recommended to the GD's senior members (William Wynn Westcott and Samuel Mathers) by Kate Broomhead: Cosmo Rowe was Sissie's brother.

THE BROOMHEAD FAMILY

Both Kate's parents had the surname 'broomhead'. A surname database on the web traces the name back to 13th century West Yorkshire, though by the mid-19th century people called 'broomhead' had spread into Lancashire and Derbyshire as well. How closely related Kate's parents were to each other I haven't been able to discover. I think that probably they were not closely related.

THE HENRY BROOMHEADS OF SHEFFIELD

Kate's mother Martha was the daughter of a Henry Broomhead who was a member of a family whose men were solicitors, with offices in Sheffield and possibly Rotherham as well.

Unfortunately, several of the solicitors in the family were called Henry, and I've found it difficult to figure out which one was which and how - if it all - they were related to each other.

I shall start somewhere in the middle of Martha's story with the day of the 1851 census. On that day, Martha was living with her father Henry and her mother or possibly step-mother Harriott at an address I couldn't read very well but which I think was 32 Paradise Square Sheffield. Certainly there was a solicitor's practice at that address around that time, I found other evidence of that. Harriott had been married before and Martha had a much older step-sister, Harriet Knowles. Martha was 22 (born around 1829). Her father was 61 (born about 1790). I have found Henry, Harriott (this time spelled Harriett) and Harriet on the 1841 census, this time at North Church Street Sheffield; but I couldn't find Martha.

Martha's father was dead by 1861; he died either in 1852 or 1857 with 1857 looking the more likely to me. Census evidence from later on in the century suggests that Martha inherited some money from her father, which was invested in an annuity to give her an income.

THE BROOMHEADS OF WORKSOP

Kate's father, John Broomhead, was probably the wealthier of her parents and he too inherited money tied up in an annuity. On the day of the 1851 census John's father, William Broomhead, described himself to the census official as a farmer; but he was also the owner of a brickworks. At this time of rapid expansion of cities in industrial Yorkshire and Derbyshire, the brick-making business was far more important as a source of income than the farm, employing 58 men to the farm's eight. John Broomhead had been born in 1822 when his parents were still living in Worksop. William Broomhead and his wife Hannah had moved away from Worksop by 1851; but despite the income the brickworks must have been bringing in, they were living modestly, next to the brickyard in Styrrup, Nottinghamshire; and they were only employing one servant to work in the house. William and Hannah had two sons. John's brother George had left home by this time but he lived nearby, at Harworth.

Kate's parents John Broomhead and Martha Broomhead married each other in 1858. The marriage was registered in Worksop but may have taken place in York. John and Martha had two children: Kate Eleanor, born 1859, and Henry Broomhead (full name Henry Broomhead Broomhead) born 1862. John and Martha set up home close to John's relatives and the brickworks, and on the day of the 1861 census were living just south of Styrrup, in Blyth, Nottinghamshire at 9 Main Street. At some point in the next decade William Broomhead retired from active participation in the brick-making business and moved away from the brick-yard. His decision to retire may have been influenced by the death of Kate's grandmother Hannah; I'm not sure of the date of her death but it was between 1861 and 1871. It's not clear to me who took charge of the family business, but I think it's more likely to have been George than John, I think George is the older brother. On the day of the 1871 census William Broomhead was living alone in Blyth, looked after by a housekeeper. John, Martha, Kate and Henry were still living in Blyth, at 20 Main Street.

William Broomhead died in 1874. It's likely to have been after his death and as a result of it, that John and Martha moved to Bridlington in Yorkshire. They lived there in a house called Zetland Villa, which doesn't seem to exist any more, on a street called Humber Road which also doesn't show on modern streetmaps. Kate was in her mid-teens when this big change probably took place. One of the benefits of it might have been a rather better education for her. Unlike with most of the GD's women members, I do have some clue as to what subjects Kate was taught: later in her life, she thought of herself as a professional musician. The basis of a middle-class girl's musical education at that time (if she had one) was piano and singing. However, Kate showed more aptitude and enthusiasm than most girls, and learned the violin.

John, Martha and Kate's brother Henry Broomhead were all at home at Zetland Villa Bridlington on the day of the 1881 census. Kate was away visiting an Eliza Whitfield, at 17 Fountain Street, North Myton near Hull. I haven't been able to discover what the relationship between Kate and Eliza Whitfield was. Mrs Whitfield seems to be rather too old and not of the right social class to have been a schoolfriend of Kate's. Her husband had been a ship's chandler, so perhaps Eliza had married him after working for John and Martha Broomhead as a servant. She was a widow by 1881, with young children.

Kate's mother Martha died in 1882. Henry had started work by this time and had probably moved away from Bridlington. He trained as a solicitor and worked in Beverley. In 1888 he married Mary Robinson Oakes of Bridlington.

On her mother's death and because she was still unmarried herself, Kate will have been required to take over the duties of keeping house and caring for her father, who was now in his late 60s. On the day of the 1891 census, though Martha's income from her annuity had died with her, John Broomhead was still able to employ a cook and a housemaid, so Kate will have been free of some household chores. During the 1880s she may have been attempting to build a career for herself as a musician: she was described on the 1891 census form as "violinist music", which must be based on what she or her father told the census official. John and Kate had two visitors staying with them on census day, whom I think were Kate's friends rather than her father's. Both the visitors told the census official that they were working. Hannah Helen Whitworth was a teacher of music and piano, Eliza Wilton was an artist. They were both a little younger than Kate - Hannah was 26 and Eliza 28 to Kate's 31 or 32 - and both had been born in Yorkshire; perhaps they were ex-schoolfriends.

By census day 1891 Kate was already a member of the GD. As Kate had never lived in or near Bradford, how Kate got to be a member of the GD there has puzzled me. Hannah Whitworth may be the connection - she had been born in Bradford and though she was not a GD member herself, she may have introduced Kate to people who were.

In July 1890 - a month after joining the GD - Kate also joined the Theosophical Society. Most applicants for membership of the TS had to be sponsored by two people who were already members but in Kate's case, one sponsor was enough because of the regard in which he was held. Kate's sole sponsor was Walter Old, known as W R Old and as W Gorm Old, but also by a motto he used when publishing anonymously - Sepharial. It's a mystery, how Kate and Walter Old got acquainted but I suppose they must have met in London, where Walter Old was one of the select group of people who were personal friends of Helena Petrovna Blavatsky. At this time he was a very active theosophist and TS member. He edited the TS's members' magazine, The Vahan. He was a founder member of the TS's esoteric group; GD founders William Wynn Westcott and Samuel Liddell Mathers were also members. And he published books on theosophy, astrology and the Kabbalah.

Despite Kate knowing one of the TS's inner circle, she was rather an outsider in the TS during her time as a member. There was a very active TS group in Bradford and Kate certainly knew some members of it - in the early 1890s nearly every member of the GD in Bradford was also in the TS. It would have been very easy for her to join the Bradford lodge; she would have been very welcome, especially by its women members who organised all its meetings, usually holding them in one of their houses. But she didn't join it; in fact, she didn't join any of the lodges of which the TS was comprised. Not so odd is her decision to let her membership of the TS lapse in 1895. A dispute about who should lead the TS after Blavatsky's death was tearing the TS apart at that time; many of its most active and previously-loyal members left - including (I think) Walter Old. Kate may not have been one of the TS's active members, but she did decide to quit. From 1895 on, she stuck with the GD; even through several similar disputes.

Although Kate was initiated into the GD in Bradford, she may have had the same 'arms-length' relationship with the Horus temple there, as she had with Bradford's TS. She had GD contacts in London, at least from 1892 when she borrowed some manuscripts on geomancy from William Wynn Westcott's extensive library. Westcott was very willing to lend books and papers from his collection to GD initiates, but they did have to go to London to collect them and sign for them, and to return them. When she called in at the GD offices to borrow the manuscripts, Kate have have been staying in London with friends she had made through the GD. If she was serious about working as a musician, London was definitely the best place to pursue this ambition; but there was no possibility of her taking up permanent residence there while her father was alive. However, John Broomhead died in April 1893. Kate inherited an income from him - perhaps not a great deal but enough to inspire her to follow her hopes. She moved to London soon afterwards.

Kate's first address in London was South Kensington but she soon migrated slightly westwards to the cheaper and newer district of Hammersmith, where many artistic and musical people lived, including several members of the GD. The focus for much of Hammersmith's social life was William Morris and his family. It wouldn't have been difficult for Kate to get involved with the more public side of the Morris family's social life - there were regular talks and debates and musical entertainments at their house, Kelmscott House. But she could also have been introduced to the Morrises through mutual acquaintances like the GD's Florence Farr, who was a friend of William Morris' daughter May. Florence was living in Dalling Road Hammersmith in 1890; a few years later she moved number 67 The Grove Hammersmith at a time when Kate was living at number 112.

Florence probably also got to know another social group in Hammersmith with GD connections. This group was built around the composer and music teacher Ferdinand Praeger who lived with his family in Brackenbury Road Hammersmith, a few streets away from The Grove. Ferdinand's son Wilfred became a GD member and later married another GD member, organist and composer Lilian Blyth, who joined the GD in Bradford in 1893 and moved to London a few years later. Lilian and Kate didn't coincide as members of the GD in Bradford but there was another way in which they might have got to know each other: Lilian had cousins living in Beverley Yorkshire where Kate's brother Henry was working by the 1890s.

Lilian Blyth and Kate Broomhead had difficulties in common if they were trying to be professional musicians. In the 1890s there were more women musicians than there had been for centuries and some of the old prejudices against women playing certain instruments were dying away. The violin, which Kate played, had been seen earlier in the century as too technically demanding for a woman to master, but by the 1890s it was - with voice, and piano - their favourite choice of musical study. Women also now had two places where they could study music to college level: the Guildhall School of Music and the Royal College of Music. So those women who wanted to, were good enough and could find the money for the fees could at least reach professional standards of musicianship. (I'm not sure that Kate's family finances would have run to paying for her to study music at college.) However, even those women who had graduated from one of music colleges had the odds stacked against them as professional musicians, and the very fact that the music colleges took women students meant that there were more and more well-trained women chasing not very many good, professional, regular jobs. The big urban orchestras were male preserves, and women were often forced to earn their money as teachers or by playing in restaurants and department stores - not what they had hoped for at all, I would imagine. Women were fighting back, however: there were a lot of all-women orchestras in 1890s London organising their own concerts.

I wish I could say that I had found evidence that Kate was in regular employment in London as a violinist. I haven't found any evidence along those lines. That's not to say she wasn't a professional musician at all; though the lack of evidence means that she was never a soloist with a national reputation, she would have shown up in the Times or on the web if she had been. She could have had several years in the violin section of one of the women's orchestras - the Orchestra of Young Ladies, the English Ladies' Orchestral Society and the Aeolian Ladies' Orchestra were the best known. As I couldn't find a list of any of those orchestras' members (I realise it was rather a big ask) I simply don't know whether Kate played in them. She could have settled for something much less, just to keep playing, to earn money and be able to call herself a professional; and been a member of an ensemble which played in a West End restaurant. In the 1890s women musicians had some difficult choices to make and some of the options were pretty humiliating.

COSMO ROWE

Four years or so after moving to London, Kate married the painter and illustrator Cosmo Rowe. Her husband has turned out to be a most elusive man: even the name 'cosmo' is not the one he was given by his parents, nor the one he used when exhibiting paintings in the 1880s and 1890s; though it is the name that is used now by art sale websites. He was known as 'cosmo' during his lifetime, but just to his friends and his wife.

The art sale websites and even the National Portrait Gallery website give these dates for the man they know as Cosmo Rowe: 1877 to 1952. They can't be right. The information some websites give, that he was American, may not be correct either; but he may have grown up in America as he doesn't seem to have spent much of his childhood in the UK.

Legal documents I've found all agree that Kate Broomhead's husband, the man also known by the name of Cosmo Rowe, was William John Monkhouse Rowe; and my own research has found that his dates were 1860 to 1947.

I shall call William J M Rowe born 1860 by the name 'cosmo' in order to prevent myself from confusing him with his father, who was also called William. It has been hard to find out much about either of Cosmo's parents. The only information I'm certain of is that they were William Rowe and Elizabeth Monkhouse who married each other at Chorlton-upon-Medlock in January 1855. Chorlton-upon-Medlock is just south of Manchester city centre; it was then a middle-class suburb. William Rowe was 28 when he was married; I haven't been able to find out where he was born. Elizabeth Monkhouse was 34 or 35 and had been born in Wakefield. William and Elizabeth had remarkably few children for a mid-Victorian couple, presumably because of Elizabeth's age at the time she was married - 35 was a lot older then, in terms of fertility, even than it is now. William and Elizabeth's daughter Sarah Ann Rowe was born in Manchester in 1856; she was known as Sissie - she even appears on the census as Sissie rather than Sarah. William and Elizabeth's son William John Monkhouse Rowe was born, also in Manchester, in 1860. He wasn't baptised until 1871, perhaps because his parents left England fairly shortly after his birth - they were not in the UK on census day 1861. I wish I knew where they went, but I don't - the USA is as likely a destination as any.

William Rowe and his family had returned to Manchester by 1867 and were living at 173 Tamworth Street in Hulme when William Rowe died there in July 1867, at the age of 39.

On the probate registry record for William Rowe who died in 1867, his occupation is given as "Artist". Finding out anything about his career has been tough: I couldn't find any paintings that were by him, exhibited or otherwise; there were no references to him in the artists' dictionaries that I looked at. He could have begun to train his children in drawing and painting, but he won't have been able to teach them a great deal, because they were both so young when he died: Sissie was 11, Cosmo only seven. Later, however, both Sissie and Cosmo earned money from art. Cosmo got some professional-standard training in the end; but I haven't found any evidence that Sissie did and the evidence I did find shows that her education in art and other subjects was inadequate to the task she later had of contributing very necessary income to the family budget.

Elizabeth Rowe and her children were not in the UK on the day of the 1871 census and they may have spent many years living abroad; though again I don't know where. They were back in England by 1881, but were no longer in Manchester. They were living at 8 Store Street, St Giles in the Fields, in the Finsbury district just north of the City of London. On census day 1881 Elizabeth told the census official that she was living off an annuity. Sissie was not living with Elizabeth and Cosmo on census day 1881 and I haven't found a likely candidate for her anywhere else in the UK - though I may just have missed her, living with other relatives, perhaps.

This is where there gets to be a bit more information about what Cosmo Rowe was doing with his life in his early twenties: in the mid-1880s he became a friend of H G Wells; and according to books on Wells, the two of them met at the Normal School of Science in South Kensington. During H G Wells' years as a student at the Normal School, he met the woman who became his second wife and made several male friends who remained friends for life. Cosmo Rowe was one of those friends, and I think that it was at this time that Cosmo acquired the name: it began as the name his college friends called him.

While they had all been at the Normal School, H G Wells, Cosmo Rowe and their friends got out and about visiting museums and galleries; to talk a great deal about the future and their future; to take part in debates at the Talking Club; and to found a college magazine, the Science Schools' Journal. H G Wells was the journal's first editor. The books on Wells don't mention who else worked on preparation of the journal or what they did; but I think it's a reasonable guess that Cosmo Rowe worked on it, perhaps doing layout and illustrations. H G Wells didn't know London well; he wanted to get involved in left-wing politics but didn't know where to go looking for them. It seems to have been Cosmo Rowe who did know and took H G Wells about: to Kelmscott House in Hammersmith, to hear William Morris and George Bernard Shaw; and to meetings of the Fabian Society.

HAMMERSMITH SOCIALISTS

In the late 1880s when H G Wells' friends had left the Normal School, he and they were still meeting regularly. Cosmo was living on Euston Road at that time and they all used to go round to his rooms every Sunday evening. By this time, Cosmo Rowe was one of the socialist group that gravitated around William Morris in west London in the late 1880s and early 1890s. Morris' Hammersmith Socialist Society was founded in November 1890, and Cosmo was a very hard-working member of it. He was its literature secretary, in charge of producing the Society's political pamphlets. He painted the Society's sign, which hung outside the room where it met. And he did speak at some meetings himself, sharing the job with William Morris' son-in-law Henry Halliday Sparling (May Morris's husband), who was secretary of the Socialist League; as a result of which, Cosmo became one of the Morris family's supper-party circle.

Many socialists - including H G Wells - got impatient with the Hammersmith Socialist Society's lack of drive and its focus on debate rather than on-the-street activism, but through the Society Cosmo will have met some very well-known names in the world of contemporary English intellectual socialism. I've already mentioned George Bernard Shaw but there was also Prince Kropotkin - more an anarchist than a socialist; Sidney and Beatrice Webb - more two social democrats than two socialists; Annie Besant - who would leave politics for theosophy; Thomas J Cobden-Sanderson, the bookbinder and founder of the Doves Press; and socialists-to-the-end like Ramsay MacDonald; J S Middleton who in the 1930s was the Secretary of the Labour Party; and Keir Hardie - Cosmo's drawing of Keir Hardie is now in the National Portrait Gallery. If these people were acquaintances of Kate Broomhead and Cosmo's sister Sissie, they must have spent some interesting evenings. Some evidence from the mid-1930s suggests that Cosmo Rowe was another of the group's socialists-to-the-end, although he never became an out-and-out politician; and perhaps some of the people in the list above were still his friends in 1930s. If Kate Broomhead was a socialist-to-the-end, she will have had no chance to do much about it in the 1890s of course; the idea that women might vote in general elections wasn't on the agenda even of socialists at that time, as far as I know. However, I would suppose - I may be wrong - that even in such a situation, it would be difficult for a woman to marry a man whose politics she didn't share; so I'm cautiously assuming that Kate did have socialist sympathies.

Or maybe not. The Hammersmith Socialist Society wasn't all heavy political argument. A woman might want to get involved in the group's musical evenings, even if politics were something she didn't bother with. At one concert Cosmo Rowe sang duets with Emily Isobel Harrison who was a soprano in the Hammersmith Socialist Choir. In 1901 she married Gustav Holst, who was the choir's conductor. Perhaps Kate and Sissie sang in the choir and there will have been chances for Kate to play her violin. Cosmo also had musical friends outside the Hammersmith Socialist Society. A drawing by Cosmo of the piano teacher James Kwast still exists. Kwast lived in Frankfurt where perhaps Cosmo went to visit him; in 1895 Percy Grainger was one of Kwast's pupils so there's a possibility that Cosmo, Kate and Sissie knew Grainger.

I've gone on a bit about Cosmo Rowe's social/political life because it's the only handle I've got for the kind of friends Sissie Rowe and Kate Broomhead must have had in the early-to-mid 1890s. As usual, the available information is on the men not on the women; and even with the men it tends to focus on those who got more famous later, so that teasing out the part Cosmo Rowe played in it all has been quite hard work. There's no mention of Sissie Rowe playing any part in William Morris' circle. That doesn't mean she never went to any of these social events, it just means that she was not a well-known person either at the time or later, so historians haven't noted her name. Exactly the same is true of Kate Broomhead; but the Hammersmith Socialist Society was a very likely venue for a first meeting between the two women. They had got to know each other by late 1896; by which time Kate probably knew Cosmo as well. Just in time, in a way, because late in 1896 William Morris died, and the group of which he was the centre began to drift apart.

As well as his banner for the Hammersmith Socialist Society, Cosmo Rowe did art work and illustrations for other socialist organisations, including the Land Nationalisation Movement. He also did a drawing of William Morris which he later made up into a full-scale portrait in oils. But all that work was certainly unpaid, so how was he earning his daily bread?

The books on H G Wells say that Cosmo Rowe trained as an artist at the National Art Training School, which was renamed the Royal College of Art in 1896. They don't give dates for when he was a student there. That he was a student there around 1880 seems likely, given the dates of three out of his four exhibited works; on the other hand, a reference to him in connection with a students' magazine from the late 1890s might mean he'd left it as late as his mid-30s to complete his art training. I suppose he must have gone to the Normal School as a kind of insurance policy in case he couldn't earn enough from his art; a training in zoology would also have enhanced his employability as an artist and illustrator. I couldn't find any evidence that he ever worked as a teacher and I think he never intended to unless things were desperate.

I believe Cosmo Rowe was already working as an artist when he started at the Normal School of Science. I think he is the William Rowe who in 1883 began working as a painter of porcelain for Doulton (now Royal Doulton), using the identification mark 'WR'. This person continued to work for Doulton until 1939 - giving Cosmo, if my identification is correct, a regular (though possibly not very great) income from work that he could do at home and combine firstly with his teacher-training and later with his unpaid work for the Hammersmith socialists. Working for Doulton, with consignments of pottery to be painted and possibly deadlines to meet, might explain why Cosmo exhibited so few large-scale oil paintings: two, possibly three, in the mid-1880s; one in 1891; and one in 1900. I've found mention on the web of two more paintings that he painted but never exhibited (at least I don't think he did); but that seems to be it, for large-scale works. No portraits of Kate or Sissie, alas!

One of the artists' dictionaries I consulted while on the trace of Cosmo Rowe described him as an printer and etcher, but I couldn't find any information about that side of his work and I only found evidence for two sets of illustrations. Professor Conwy Lloyd Morgan's Animal Sketches, published in 1891, contained 60 pictures by Cosmo in which he made good use of his Normal School lessons in zoology (which was taught until 1885 by T H Huxley). And in 1897 Cosmo's drawings illustrated H G Wells' War of the Worlds when it was first published, in episodes, in Pearson's Magazine in the UK and Cosmopolitan in the USA. H G Wells was quite a cartoonist himself though he never did professional work as an illustrator; perhaps Cosmo had helped him improve his technique and confidence. Many years later, when Wells was very famous, Cosmo started to bring together a collection of his friend's drawings, some of which have since been published.

In the 1880s and 1890s Sissie Rowe was also doing work that could be described as artistic but her working life illustrates harshly the difference in outcome between two 19th-century siblings possibly with equal talent, one of which was male and the other female. Sissie was working at home, which by this time was rooms at 9 Amor Road (off The Grove Hammersmith) where the householder was Edwin James Neville. Sissie was employed as a retoucher of photographs - adding colour and fine detail with paint, and covering up blemishes, particularly on portraits (no colour photography yet, of course). Valeria Coulter, the grandmother of my husband Roger Wright, did the same job as Sissie did at about the same time, though she worked in her employer's studio, not at home.

MARRIAGE

Kate Broomhead and Cosmo Rowe married in the summer of 1897, during the period Cosmo Rowe's illustrations to The War of the Worlds were appearing in Pearson's Magazine. She was 38, he was 37; so perhaps it was not surprising that they didn't have any children. On the other hand, perhaps it was their choice: in the advanced social circles in which they moved, it wouldn't have been difficult to find out how to have sex without babies. On the day of the 1901 census they were living in rooms at 18 Beauclerc Road Hammersmith. They didn't stay in them much longer, however, before moving out of west London to Wealdstone, possibly to 71 Masons Avenue near Harrow and Wealdstone station, where Cosmo was still living almost 50 years later. Perhaps, now that William Morris was dead, they felt they had nothing in Hammersmith to stay for.

On the day of the 1901 census, Sissie Rowe and her mother were living at 14 Weltje Road south of Ravenscourt Park tube station. Mr Neville had given up his tenancy of 9 Amor Road but the move to Weltje Road also suggests that - without Cosmo Rowe's contribution to the budget - finances were getting uncomfortably tight for Elizabeth and Sissie. They were renting rooms from William Stevens, a retired engine fitter who - after a life working for a railway company - was probably a lot more comfortably off than they were. Elizabeth was now 81. Sissie (now 41 herself) had taken on more paid work - work of the sort that a relatively poorly trained and educated middle-class woman could do at home while looking after an increasingly frail relation. As well as her photograph retouching she was now sewing ribbons. She was self-employed and might have had to spend precious time doing the rounds of the local drapers to sell her ribbons, as well as sewing them up. To me, her life seems grim - and it's at this depressing point that Sissie Rowe passes out of the family history records that I am able to access at the moment. I believe that by the day of the 1911 census, Elizabeth Rowe was dead; though I can't find a death registration for her up to that date so perhaps she lived on beyond 91. On her death, whenever it was, Elizabeth's income from the annuity would no longer be available to Sissie. Sissie isn't on the 1911 census. The 1921 census might tell me more and perhaps confirm my guess that she was living and keeping house for Cosmo later in her life. I haven't found any information about her death - when or where - as it's been hard to identify her.

AFTER THE GOLDEN DAWN

Cosmo Rowe never joined the GD or its daughter orders; but Kate continued to be a member after her marriage, studying for her 2nd Order initiation. By the time she became a member of the 2nd Order, in July 1900, she was one of the GD's longest serving members; though she chose not to play an active part in its gradual disintegration until the very end of that process, in the spring of 1903. Neither did Sissie Rowe - a much less senior member - presume to take any sides in the disputes of the years 1900 to 1903. However, after the annual meeting of the GD's 2nd Order members in the spring of 1903 it was clear that the Order was not going to continue. Sissie wasn't in the 2nd Order and won't have been allowed to attend the meeting; but I'm sure Kate would have told her what happened - there wasn't much point in keeping quiet about 2nd Order business to non-2nd Order members any longer. The two women probably mulled it over together, trying to decide what if anything to do.

Kate found it easier to make up her mind. She was one of a group of 14 2nd Order members (led by A E Waite) who signed a declaration on 24 July 1903 announcing their independence from the original GD. This was the first statement of intent of what became the Independent and Rectified Order or Rite. Eight more erstwhile GD members joined this group before the IRRO/R was constituted on 7 November 1903. Sissie Rowe took longer to move on from the GD. She didn't sign the declaration in July and she wasn't at the ritual of November. However, she was one of seven other ex-GD members who joined the new order after its official founding-date, though the exact dates on which any of them did so are not known. The records of the IRRO/R aren't in the public domain if they exist at all, so I don't know how active a member of it Sissie Rowe was; or whether she dropped out of it or continued her membership of the order until A E Waite wound it up in 1914.

Kate clearly intended to continue her involvement in magic by becoming a member of the IRRO/R. Having signed the declaration of intent, she then went off to Paris with her husband to combine a holiday with getting up-to-date with modern art trends. And there, on 2 August 1903, Kate died, aged 43. It was sudden and unexpected, and Cosmo Rowe was devastated: a sad little death notice appeared in the London Daily Mail. So devastated was he that he didn't cope well with the legal and financial aftermath. Kate had made a Will - probably on the occasion of her marriage - and had appointed her brother Henry as her executor. However, chancery court proceedings about the Will and its provisions were still going on in 1917 and it looks as though, in mourning his "dear wife", Cosmo Rowe had forgotten to pay some of her creditors.

Cosmo Rowe - if I've identified him correctly - continued to work for Doulton for many years but I couldn't find any mention of any large-scale art works by him after Kate's death; or any illustration work. That absence of information may just be a feature of the sources I've looked at; but I do get an impression of a man whose life stuck at the point of his wife's death. I've said I don't know when Sissie died, nor where she was living or how she was supporting herself after 1901; but it looks as though she might have died before her younger brother. Cosmo died in November 1947 and a few weeks later, a firm of solicitors in Sheffield put a notice in the Times asking if anyone knew whether he had made a will. The notice was probably inserted at the request of Henry Roland Broomhead, son of Kate's brother Henry. It took two years to sort out Cosmo's estate; if Sissie had still been alive perhaps it wouldn't have taken so long. A Will did turn up eventually: Henry Roland was its executor and perhaps its main beneficiary.

--

BASIC SOURCES I USED for all Golden Dawn members.

Membership of the Golden Dawn: The Golden Dawn Companion by R A Gilbert. Northampton: The Aquarian Press 1986. Between pages 125 and 175, Gilbert lists the names, initiation dates and addresses of all those people who became members of the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn or its many daughter Orders between 1888 and 1914.

The list is based on the Golden Dawn's administrative records and its Members' Roll - the large piece of parchment on which all new members signed their name at their initiation. All this information had been inherited by Gilbert but it's now in the Freemasons' Library at the United Grand Lodge of England building on Great Queen Street Covent Garden. Please note, though, that the records of the Amen-Ra Temple in Edinburgh were destroyed in 1900/01. As far as I know, the records of the Horus Temple at Bradford have not survived either.

Family history: freebmd; ancestry.co.uk (census and probate); findmypast.co.uk; familysearch; Burke's Peerage and Baronetage; Burke's Landed Gentry; Armorial Families; thepeerage.com; and a wide variety of family trees on the web.

Famous-people sources: mostly about men, of course, but very useful even for the female members of GD. Oxford Dictionary of National Biography. Who Was Who. Times Digital Archive.

Useful source for business and legal information: London Gazette and its Scottish counterpart Edinburgh Gazette. Now easy to find (with the right search information) on the web.

Catalogues: British Library; Freemasons' Library.

Wikipedia; Google; Google Books - my three best resources. I also used other web pages, but with some caution, as - from the historian's point of view - they vary in quality a great deal.

SOURCES FOR KATE ELEANOR BROOMHEAD ROWE

THE BROOMHEAD CLAN

See www.surnamedb.com for information on the Broomheads from medieval to modern.

At ancestry.co.uk a map of surname distribution 1891 census.

THE HENRY BROOMHEADS solicitors in Sheffield and it's clear even contemporary sources have a hard time telling one Henry from another.

Via google to Sheffield Directory and Guide issue of 1828 p14.

The Legal Observer or Journal of Jurisprudence volume 17 1839: list of those who had passed their solicitors' exams in 1838.

HENDERSON V BROOMHEAD AND WINTER V BROOMHEAD

I'm fairly sure (though not absolutely convinced) that the Henry Broomhead whose behaviour caused these two court cases can't be closely related to Kate: the dates are wrong. But I found the cases so hilarious I thought I'd include details of the website which has the longest coverage of the gory details. Law Times volume 33-303 issue of 23 July 1859.

MARTHA BROOMHEAD, Kate's mother:

I couldn't find any information on Martha's birth: not the date and not her mother's name.

This might be the marriage of Henry and Harriet though if it is, Harriet is Martha's step-mother not her birth mother. Sheffield Independent 2 August 1839 recent marriages.

JOHN BROOMHEAD Kate's father

Familysearch England-ODM GS film numbers 504068, 504070, 504543.

MARRIAGE OF JOHN BROOMHEAD AND MARTHA BROOMHEAD

For it's having taken place in York before being registered in Worksop: familysearch England-EASy GS film number 1655794.

Via google to www.genuki.org.uk, to a transcription of Bulmer's Directory for Bridlington issue of 1892: Mr John Broomhead is in the alphabetical list of prominent residents, at Zetland Villa. No further information on the address was given so perhaps none was needed in what was a small town. And there was no information on John Broomhead's occupation (he didn't have one) or his sources of income.

THE THEOSOPHICAL SOCIETY AND THE GOLDEN DAWN

Theosophical Society Membership Register January 1889-September 1891 p172.

THE GOLDEN DAWN AND HAMMERSMITH

For Florence Farr's friendship with May Morris:

Women of the Golden Dawn by Mary K Greer. Rochester Vermont: Park Street Press 1995 p81.

Sources for Lilian Blyth and Wilfred Praeger: see their combined biography on my web pages.

AFTER THE GOLDEN DAWN

Sources are lacking for what exactly happened in the GD between 1901 and 1903. Ellic Howe in his history of the GD uses A E Waite's account of the events, but says that it definitely isn't a full or accurate account. The Magicians of the Golden Dawn: A Documentary History of a Magical Order 1887-1923 by Ellic Howe. London: Routledge and Kegan Paul 1972: P251-52. The full list of those GD members who joined A E Waite's Independent and Rectified Order or Rite is in R A Gilbert's Golden Dawn Companion pp169-170 and in A E Waite: A Magician of Many Parts by R A Gilbert. Wellingborough Northants 1987 p178.

WOMEN MUSICIANS

I drew my information on the general picture from Musical Women in England 1870-1914: Encroaching on all Man's Privileges. Paula Gillett. Macmillan 2000.

There was no entry for Kate, as Broomhead or as Rowe in the New Groves Dictionary of Music and Musicians 2nd edition. I didn't really expect one as this is a very new edition, but I rather think Kate wasn't in the original edition either.

SARAH ANN ROWE, known as SISSIE; and COSMO ROWE

Marriage of William Rowe and Elizabeth Monkhouse: Familysearch England-EASy GS film number 2112985.

Baptism of Sarah Ann Rowe: familysearch England-ODM GS film numbers 438179 and 438178.

Birth and baptism of Cosmo Rowe: familysearch England-EASy GS film number = 438182 though badly transcribed as William John "Menbhens" Rowe. Both the 1860 birth date and the 1871 baptism date are given.

HAMMERSMITH IN THE 1890s

PO Directory 1894 Northern Suburbs Hammersmith street directory p204 Amor Road.

PO Directory 1896 Northern Suburbs Hammersmith street directory p178 Amor Road.

PO Directory 1898 Northern Suburbs Hammersmith street directory p192 Amor Road.

WAS SISSIE ROWE AN ARTIST LIKE HER BROTHER?

If you mean: did she paint large or even medium-sized works and exhibit them in public in an art gallery? I think the answer is no. I haven't been able to find a shred of evidence for any such works by her. So it's likely that she didn't paint such works on private commission either.

WHEN DID SISSIE ROWE DIE?

Again, I haven't found a likely death registration for her; and there doesn't seem to be an entry for her in the Probate Registry. At Cosmo's death, the call for people to come forward who could say whether he ever wrote a Will suggests that Sissie was either dead by then; but she may just have been mentally incapacitated or very ill and not able to give the information.

COSMO'S EDUCATION

The most informative source was:

The Picshuas of H G Wells: A Burlesque Diary Gene K Rinkel and Margaret E Rinkel. Urbana and Chicago: Univeristy of Illinois Press 2006 pp50-51. On p51, Figure 2.9 is a cartoon invitation card sent by Wells to Cosmo Rowe and kept by Cosmo so that it's still extant. There's no date, but evidence on p49 establishes it as sent during 1896.

Good on Wells' life in general during his period at the Normal Schools:

H G Wells: Desperately Mortal by David C Smith. New Haven and London: Yale University Press 1986. Particularly pp11-21.

Other information on the Normal School of Science:

Imperial College's website at www.imperial.ac.uk

At www.british-history.ac.uk, British History Online, funded by English Heritage. Information reproduced from Survey of London volume 38: South Kensington Museums Area. Editor F H W Sheppard published 1975 pp233-47

A brief mention in an official History of Imperial College 1907-2007 by Hannah Gay. London: Imperial College Press 2007.

COSMO AS AN ARTIST

If Cosmo did any paintings of his wife Kate, they have not survived.

His education. The mid-1890s date for him as a student comes from his name coming up when I was searching google scholar. The reference was to a magazine The Beam published by students at the National Art Training School South Kensington. It ran for numbers 1-3 only, in 1896. I haven't been able to find a copy of it to check out the reference to Cosmo.

Victorian Tiles by Hans van Lemmen. Princes Risborough: Shire 2000 p23.

International Dictionary of Miniature Painters, Porcelain Painters and Silhouettists editor Harry Blättel. Munich: Arts and Antiques 1992 p782 there is an entry for one William Rowe and no Cosmo Rowe. The source for his entry is J P Cushion Handbook of Pottery and Porcelain Marks London: 1980.

The Dictionary of British Artists 1880-1940 compiled J Johnson, A Greutzner. Antique Collectors' Club 1976. P439 which has an entry for "William J Monkhouse" Rowe, exhibiting 1883-91 and described as "Printer and etcher", London. There's no entry for Cosmo Rowe and no entry for any man called William Rowe who might have been Cosmo Rowe's father.

Dictionary of British Art volume IV: Victorian Painters volume 1: The Text by Christopher Wood. Antique Collectors' Club 1995. On p453 there's no entry for Cosmo Rowe. There are entries for a William J Monkhouse Rowe; and a William Rowe "Junior". On the Occam's Razor principle and given the dates of the works exhibited, I am assuming that the two entries are the same artist. The second entry acknowledges the existence at some time of a William Rowe senior who is also an artist; but there's no separate entry for such a person.

The Royal Academy of Arts: A Complete Dictionary of Contributors...1769-1904 volumes 5 and 6 compiled by Algernon Graves. S R Publishers 1970 p383 and again I'm using Occam's Razor to assume two entries are in fact the same artist. A William Rowe exhibiting 1883 and 1886; and a William M Rowe exhibiting 1891. The William M Rowe at least is definitely Cosmo: the address is the one he, Elizabeth and Sissie were living at on the day of the 1891 census; in Frithville Gardens off Uxbridge Road. There's no entry for a William Rowe who might have been Cosmo and Sissie's father.

Dictionary of British Artists Working 1900-1950 by Grant M Waters. Eastbourne Fine Art 1975 p287 has no entry for Cosmo Rowe, under any name.

THE VERY FEW REFERENCES I'VE FOUND TO ART WORKS BY W J M/COSMO ROWE

Animal Sketches by Professor Conwy Lloyd Morgan of Bristol University. London: E Arnold 1891 with 60 illustrations by "W Monkhouse Rowe".

At www.1st-art-gallery.com a portrait of William Morris in oils by Cosmo Rowe, possibly 1895. This is one of the websites that says that Cosmo Rowe is American and gives dates of 1877-1952. This portrait - the only one in oils that I've found - might be the one also covered by website bbc.co.uk/arts/yourpaintings, as now owned by National Trust and housed at Wightwick Manor.

Self-Portrait of Percy Grainger editors Malcolm Gillies, David Pear and Mark Carroll. New York, Oxford: Oxford University Press 2006: illustration pxiii and dates that Grainger was Kwast's pupil pxv.

War of the Worlds:

Information from wikipedia: War of the Worlds was first published in serial form during 1897, in different magazines in the UK and the USA: Cosmopolitan magazine in USA; and Pearson's Magazine from April to December 1897 in the UK. It was published in book form in 1898 by William Heinemann and has never been out of print. I came across Cosmopolitan volume 23 1897 on the web. On p478 Cosmo Rowe is credited with some of the illustrations to War of the Worlds, but not all of them.

Arnold Bennett and H G Wells: A Record of a Personal and Literary Friendship by Arnold Bennett, H G Wells; edited and with introduction by Harris Wilson. London: Rupert Hart-Davis 1960: p42 footnote 2.

Fire in the Stone: Prehistoric Fiction from Charles Darwin to Jean M Auel by Nicholas Ruddick. Middletown Connecticut: Wesleyan University Press 2010. Figure 1.6, p216 footnote 26.

Two drawings of James Keir Hardie by Cosmo Rowe are now in National Portrait Gallery, because of their famous sitter, not because of Cosmo's fame as an artist because he had none. Perhaps that's the reason why even the NPG identifies him as American, 1877-1952. The NPG website www.npg.org.uk says both are drawings done a photograph taken by G C Beresford, not from life. Catalogued as NPG 2542 and NPG D42979 and dated 1905 making them the only works (other than the works for Doulton) known to exist by Cosmo Rowe which were likely to be done after Kate's death.

At www.findartinfo.com were details of 2 works by Cosmo Rowe in their recently sold list.

1 = another portrait of Keir Hardie; pencil; sold 2012.

2 = one of the illustrations Cosmo Rowe did for Wells' War of the Worlds; gouache; sold 2009.

An oil painting apparently signed by "Cosmo Rowe" was sold on ebay in April 2014: Gypsy Dancers, 18½" x 27". Oil on board; signed; undated.

COSMO ROWE AND H G WELLS

H G Wells: Desperately Mortal by David C Smith. See above in the Cosmo's Education section.

The War of the Worlds: A Critical Text of the 1898 London First Edition H G Wells and Leon E Stover. Jefferson North Carolina: McFarland and Co Inc Publishers 2001 in the Annotated H G Wells Series; number 4. Introduction p9; p28.

COSMO ROWE AND WILLIAM MORRIS/HAMMERSMITH SOCIALISTS

William Morris, Prophet of England's New Order by Lloyd Eric Grey. London: Cassell and Co Ltd 1949: p307-13; p332-335; p344-345. In the 1930s L E Grey had written to Cosmo Rowe while researching the book: his account of the Hammersmith socialists in the early and mid-1890s is based on Cosmo's replies.

William Morris the Marxist Dreamer by Paul Meier, translated from the original French by Frank Gubb. 2 volumes, Sussex: The Harvester Press; New Jersey: Humanities Press 1978. Volume 1 p210; also quoting a letter written by Cosmo Rowe in the 1930s.

KATE'S DEATH

Via newspaperarchive.com to London Daily Mail of 7 August 1903 p1 death notices.

The Law Times, the Journal and Record of the Law and Lawyers volumes 143, 144 1917 p32 list under the heading "Creditors under estates in Chancery".

London Gazette 23 October 1917 a legal notice following on a decision in the Chancery Court in the matter of the estate of Kate Eleanor Rowe deceased.

COSMO ROWE'S DEATH

Times 17 December 1947 p1 legal notices, repeated Times 24 December 1947 p1.

19 June 2014

Amandragora@attglobal.net

Find the web pages of Roger Wright and Sally Davis, including my list of people initiated into the Order of the Golden Dawn between 1888 and 1901, at:

http:pws.prserv.net/Roger\_Wright/

***

George Rowell was initiated into the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn at its Isis-Urania temple in London on 28 February 1894; he chose the Latin motto 'Obsta principiis'. It was a busy evening at the GD: Mary Eliza Haweis and James Madison Durand and his wife Theodosia were also initiated that day; though I'm not sure that George would have known Mrs Haweis and the Durands before the ritual began - they moved in very different circles.

George Rowell did begin the programme of study that new initiates were expected to undertake if they wanted to be able to do practical magic. However, a note was written in the Isis-Urania administrative papers that his membership had lapsed. This usually happened when a particular member hadn't paid their yearly subscription for three successive years. There's no date on the note, but it was probably written before March 1897 (see 'in the GD' below for why). George didn't join either of the GD's daughter orders, Stella Matutina or the Independent and Rectified Rite.

This is one of my short biographies. George Rowell had a hard-working, busy life. I've found a bit of information on his career as an anaesthetist, but he didn't leave any papers behind him that have found their way into the public domain.

Sally Davis

July 2016

My basic sources for any GD member are in a section at the end of the file. Supplementary sources for this particular member are listed at the end of each section.

This is what I have found on GEORGE ROWELL.

IN THE GD

In December 1894 at the Isis-Urania temple, George's friend Victor Toller was initiated into the GD. Perhaps it was George who had put Victor's name forward as a suitable candidate. Victor changed his mind only a few weeks after his initiation, and sent in a letter of resignation. The friendship continued, however, and when Victor died in 1915, George Rowell was one of his executors.

Why March 1897? In March 1897 William Wynn Westcott resigned as the GD's chief administrator. Afterwards, record-keeping in the Isis-Urania temple was not so thorough and meticulous; and in any case a lot of it was kept by the various officials in their homes, and has been lost.

Sources:

R A Gilbert The Golden Dawn Companion and Ellic Howe pp166 et seq. For full publication details see the main Sources section at the end of this biography.

ANY OTHER ESOTERIC INTERESTS?

George Rowell's particular professional speciality may have made him curious about altered states of consciousness. But I haven't found evidence that he had any other occult interests.

The majority of GD members arrived in the Order from freemasonry or from the Theosophical Society. George Rowell was not in the TS and I also haven't found anything to show he was a freemason. It's more difficult to discover whether GD members had any interest in spiritualism, as so much of it was based in the home and left no records behind. Those national or local organisations that did exist haven't left membership records that are available to the public, as far as I'm aware.

Negative sources:

Theosophical Society Membership Registers 1889-1901.

Freemasons' Library database of records at the United Grand Lodge of England, which you can access online at NAME. There's no sign of George Rowell in the FML's records. This doesn't necessarily mean he wasn't a freemason. What it does mean is that - if he was one at all it was at a very local level (lodges keep their own membership records) and he never rose to national prominence.

BIRTH/YOUTH/FAMILY BACKGROUND

George Rowell was born in Banbury, Oxfordshire, the eldest son of Robert and Ann Lydia Rowell. Both George's parents were recent arrivals in the town, but whereas his father had not moved all that far - he'd been born in Rugby - his mother had been born in west Africa, in The Gambia. Her sister Clara was born in Hackney in 1844 so the Grants did return to England from time to time. However, Ann Lydia is not on the 1851 census and might have been back in The Gambia then.

Robert and Ann Lydia met in Banbury. Robert Rowell was working in a businessman's office; and on the day of the 1861 census, Ann Lydia Finden Grant and her widowed mother were running a small boarding school, with Ann Lydia as the schoolmistress.

Robert Rowell and Ann Lydia Finden Grant married in 1862. George Rowell was the eldest of their large family, born late in 1863. On the day of the 1871 census, the Robert and Ann Lydia were living at 15 Oxford Road Banbury, with George and his brothers Charles (aged 6), John (4) and William Norman (1). William Norman Rowell was the brother George was closest to later in life. As well as the basic young woman general servant, the Rowells were employing a nursemaid, suggesting that they were quite well-to-do even then.

By 1881, Robert Rowell had moved the family to Chipping Norton and started his own business as an ironmonger, employing 10 men and four boys. Census day 1881 fell during the university vacation so George was at home; as were his youngest brother Robert (9) and his sisters Lydia (7), Rose (4) and Alice (2). Ann Lydia's sister Clara was living with them; she was usually employed as a nurse but perhaps was between appointments on census day. For this large household the Rowells employed two servants, and a governess for their daughters.

After George went to university he never lived permanently in Chipping Norton again. Robert Rowell senior died in 1894. Ann Lydia and her daughters moved to Oxford; and George's brother William Norman Rowell took over the ironmongery business. Under William Norman the original ironmonger's shop was expanded into an engineering business, specialising in road building and maintenance. William Norman and his family seem to have done very well out of it - by 1911 they had moved to Ivydene, in the village of Ascott-under-Wychwood. Ivydene was a substantial residence - it 15 habitable rooms; though William Norman's wife Florence was still housekeeping with only the one basic live-in servant.

Sources: freebmd; census data 1851-1911; probate registry 1895.

People called Grant in The Gambia:

Historical Dictionary of The Gambia by Arnold Hughes and David Perfect. 4th ed. African Historical Dictionaries number 109 Scarecrow Press Inc 2008. 1st ed was A Hughes and H A Gailey 1999. On p90 there is mention of a Sir Alexander Grant who was sent in 1816 to occupy what became James Fort in The Gambia. He was acting governor of Sierra Leone in 1820-21 and, with the rank of Major, commander of the British garrison in The Gambia 1822-26.

The Missionary Register volume 4 1816 p326 in its Foreign Intelligence section announced the formation in Sierra Leone of a local branch of the British and Foreign Bible Society had been set by a group of British including John Grant Esq. The connection is that the British toehold in The Gambia was, at this stage, being run from Sierra Leone.

History of The Gambia by J M Gray. Cambridge University Press: 1940. On p336 a Major Grant (I assume Alexander Grant is meant) is mentioned as negotiating a lease on land then used to build Fort George on MacCarthy Island in The Gambia. On p336 footnote 2 quotes a letter from Lieutenant-Governor Rendall to a John Grant, 1 January 1833, seen in Report of the Select Committee on West Africa published 1844 p239.

Report of the Select Committee on West Africa published 1844 p241 Appendix 13 dated April 1842 is or contains a petition by British people in The Gambia asking the British government to provide better legal documents of land ownership to British subjects claiming land on MacCarthy Island. One of the petitioners was John Grant.

Given how small the British population of West Africa was in the early 19th century, perhaps Ann Lydia Finden Grant was a relation of one of both of the men called Grant who are mentioned above. Ann Lydia was born in 1836 or 1837.

There's an Ivydene Cottage at 35 West Street Chipping Norton, but given the size of William Norman Rowell's house it's more likely to be the Ivydene which is still at 2 Church Close, Ascott-under-Wychwood.

Report of Proceedings of the 3rd International Road Congress, London 1913 published Oberthür 1913 p235 W N Rowell of Ivydene Chipping Norton is in a list.

Municipal Yearbook and Public Utilities Directory 1933 p300 W N Rowell still in business at same address.

EDUCATION

George Rowell probably attended local schools in Banbury and Chipping Norton. Then he went to Guy's Hospital to study medicine. An outstanding student, he qualified LRCP and MRCS in 1886 at the relatively young age of 23; and was made a Fellow of the RCS as early as 1888. Perhaps he had gone through his medical education at a bit too high a speed, though: it took him a few years to decide what career path he wanted to pursue, what medical specialisms (if any) he wanted to focus on.

Sources:

General Medical Council Registers.

Times 12 August 1884 p12 University Intelligence.

Lancet July-December 1886 p277 issue of 7 August 1886.

Times 18 December 1888 p9 Royal College of Surgeons England: list of newly-admitted fellows.

WORK/PROFESSION

George spent 1889 as resident surgeon at Guy's Hospital. But then he went to work for P&O as a doctor aboard its royal mail ships. He was still working for the company early in 1891 and so is not on that year's census in the UK. The period on board ship gave him some basic GP experience, but also decided him against settling down as a GP back in England. Instead he decided to specialise in anaesthetics. Resigning from P&O later in 1891, he began to work as an anaesthetist at the Royal Dental Hospital. That was an unpaid post but George was soon offered paid work at Guy's Hospital, which was his main place of work for the rest of his professional life though he also acted as anaesthetist in several other hospitals. Here is a list of all the jobs he had, starting with those at Guy's; though without many dates as I haven't been able to confirm more than one or two.

Anaesthetist, Guy's Hospital. 1893. This was a salaried post.

Demonstrator in anaesthetics, Guy's Hospital. 1896.

Lecturer, Guy's Hospital Medical School. No definite date but probably by late 1897.

At death: senior anaesthetist, Guy's Hospital.

Assistant Anaesthetist, Royal Dental Hospital Leicester Square. Appointed 1891. This was an honorary appointment, and was definitely not full-time - more like one or two sessions a week -but there was still promotion available.

Anaesthetist, Royal Dental Hospital. 1898-1905 when he resigned. There had been trouble about the honorary appointments in 1903.

Two more jobs. George's obituary in the BMJ seems to be suggesting that he worked at these two hospitals in between spells at Guy's, returning to Guy's to take up the appointment as senior anaesthetist. However, the obituary in The Lancet doesn't give that impression.

Anaesthetist, West End Hospital for Nervous Diseases.

Anaesthetist, National Orthopaedic Hospital.

During World War 1. These jobs were both honorary and additions to his other work:

Anaesthetist, King George Hospital

Anaesthetist, Royal Flying Corps Hospital.

Working at so many different places made for a busy life but soon won George a reputation in his chosen field. He was asked to do research work on behalf of the medical profession, particularly in the 1890s and early 1900s when a number of different substances including chloroform, ether and cocaine were being investigated as possible anaesthetics.

Member, BMA Anaesthetic Commission; and served as its assistant secretary. Beginning in 1891.

Member, BMA Chloroform Commission. Beginning 1901.

He was a member of many professional societies:

BMA Metropolitan Counties branch.

Royal Society of Medicine, where at his death he was president of the anaesthetics section.

Medical Society of London

Royal Medical and Chirurgical Society.

Sources:

The most important were his two obituaries:

The Lancet 1918 volume 1 issue of 27 April 1918 p621 obituary and some personal reminiscences.

At www.ncbi.nlm.nih.gov: British Medical Journal of 27 April 1918 p495.

Lancet January-June p119 issue of 9 January 1892. Times 13 August 1892 p3.

Lancet July-December 1891: p383-84 coverage of that year's BMA meeting. George spoke at its Therapeutics/Anaesthetics section, on what to do if your patient appeared to be dying of chloroform poisoning.

Lancet July-December 1892 p269 coverage of BMA meeting, which that year was held at Nottingham. P272 on behalf of the BMA's Committee on Anaesthetics, Professor Victor Horsley gave reported on what it had done so far. George was too junior to give the report but he will have worked on some of the clinical trials that had been done in the past year, and helped prepare the report for the BMA.

Lancet January-June 1897 p1275 issue of 8 May 1897. George read his paper on how to anaesthetise children at a meeting of the Harveian Society of London, held 29 April [1897].

Times 6 August 1898 p16 George as a staff anaesthetist at the Dental Hospital of London Medical School.

Lancet January-June 1901 p280 issue of 26 January 1901: an item on a report issued by the Anaesthetics Committee of the BMA. On p709 issue of 9 March 1901; the report had been discussed at a meeting of the Society of Anaesthetists held on 1 February 1901. I haven't found any direct evidence of George as being in the Society of Anaesthetists; but surely he must have been.

Lancet 1903 January-June p453 issue of 14 February 1903; p601 issue of 28 February 1903; and p1679 issue of 13 June 1903; giving updates on a dispute at the Royal Dental Hospital. In a very 21st-century manner, the Hospital Management Committee had appointed a man to supervise the work of its honorary anaesthetists and investigate exactly what they did. The man had recommended that they be asked to join the Management Committee but be replaced on the wards by two paid employees: a move which the Lancet and the men involved construed as a sacking. This was in February. Over the next few months, the in-post honorary anaesthetists and their retired predecessors fought an action which resulted in the complete capitulation of the Management Committee; the Lancet didn't report what happened to the supervisor and investigator but I expect he kept his job like these management consultants do. As one of the threatened honorary anaesthetists, George must have taken a part in the furore and he obviously began to think that work at the Hospital was stress in his life that he could well do without - he resigned from his honorary post two years later.

Oxford University Calendar 1904 p43 the first of a series of page-sized adverts from all the major teaching hospitals in London. Most listed their current staff. On p43 Guy's Hospital Medical School University of London: G Rowell heads the list of its anaesthetists.

Lancet July-December 1904 pp538-39 issue of 20 August 1904 in the journal's coverage of this year's BMA meeting. George had taken part in a session on chloroform as an anaesthetic; the discussion focused particularly on the number of deaths from overdoses.

On p1716-18 issue of 17 December 1904 the Lancet reported on the Royal Medical and Chirurgical Society's Adjourned Discussion on chloroform anaesthesia, which had taken place on 13 December 1904. George spoke at that meeting, giving his assessment of two different pieces of equipment currently in use to administer chloroform. He spoke out against the idea that there should be a list of recommended dosages, saying that dosage couldn't be treated as a "mere matter of weights and measures".

The Lancet had a particularly large amount of coverage of the various rival anaesthetics during 1904 as the debate about their suitability continued; however, after 1904 its coverage declined.

British Medical Journal 1904 but I couldn't see the exact date on the google snippet: George as one of two honorary secretaries of the Metropolitan Counties Branch of BMA.

Lancet January-June 1909 p957 issue of 27 March 1909 the Lancet mentioned that a private members' bill was before Parliament to regulate the administration of anaesthetics. The Lancet quoted a lot of reactions in medical world to the tenets of this bill - the General

Anaesthetics Bill - though George wasn't one of the doctors quoted.

Lancet July-December 1910 p551, 555-56: report on that year's BMA meeting, held in London. The Anaesthetics section of the BMA held a discussion on the "open system of ether administration". Rowell described his experience with it, saying that it was simple to use, and free from complications. He also made the opening remarks at a session on how to treat a patient that had gone into shock on inhaling an anaesthetic.

Lancet January-June 1913 pp31-34 issue of 4 January 1913 item on the December [1912] meeting of the Medical Society of London. The main discussion was on intestinal stasis and George spoke about its anaesthetic aspects. On pp1163-67 item on the April 1913 meeting of fellows of the Royal Society of Medicine; on alimentary toxæmia. George had spoken at that meeting too, on the work of Mr Lane, which he had been able to observe personally.

ANY PUBLICATIONS?

Not as many as you would suppose. George did contribute a chapter on the use of gas and air in anaesthetics to a publication the Lancet calls Underwood's Anaesthetics.

Notes on Anaesthetics with an Appendix.... by Arthur Swayne Underwood was published in London by C Ash and Sons in 1885, which is much too early for George to have anything useful to say on the matter. His piece is in its second edition:

Notes on Anaesthetics in Dental Surgery by A S Underwood and C C Braine. London: C Ash and Sons 1893.

And noting here a book that George didn't write, despite being very well qualified to do so: the student textbook Dental Anaesthetics, whose second edition was published in 1913.

Source:

Lancet July-December 1913 p153 issue of 19 July 1913 a note welcoming a second edition of Dental Anaesthetics by Wilfred E Alderson MD, lecturer at Newcastle-upon-Tyne Hospital and Dental School. Published Bristol: John Wright and Sons Ltd.

FAMILY

It was not until 1906 that George married.

George's bride was Frances Emily Holmes, about whom I've been able to find out virtually nothing. The only census on which I can identify her is that of 1911, on which she was described as having been born around 1880 in Sudbury Suffolk. An Emily Frances Holmes' birth was registered elsewhere in Suffolk in 1880 and this registration might be the woman George married.

I know nothing about her parents, not even their names. Though I could see when searching with google, evidence of people named Holmes living in the Suffolk area in the late 19th century, no one called Frances Emily or Emily Frances came up.

George had been living in the Cavendish Square district of London W1 since the mid-1890s and on their marriage, he and Frances Emily set up house at 6 Cavendish Place. They had one child, George William Rowell, born in 1908. On the day of the 1911 census, George, Frances Emily, and George William were all at home; with their cook, parlourmaid, housemaid and nurse - a very well-to-do household. George's nephew Robert Norman Rowell, son of William Norman Rowell, was living with them while he studied engineering.

George's mother Ann Lydia was still alive in 1911, though well into her 70s; but she and George's sisters were abroad on census day. Ann Lydia Rowell died late in 1917, in Oxford, aged 81. George only survived her by a few months.

DEATH

The first World War put a strain on everyone, of course. George didn't volunteer to work in the front-line hospitals in Flanders. Instead, he and others still working in London did their best to cover for the absence of those that had volunteered, as well as dealing with all the casualties that were sent to England for further, often complex treatment, in temporary hospitals set up all over the country.

Obituaries try hard not to speak ill of the dead. In George's case there was no ill to speak of, but his obituaries do suggest that his determination to take on so much extra wartime work had led to a decline in his health. He caught an infection and died, at home, on 18 April 1918. The Spanish Flu did a dress-rehearsal in spring 1918, making ready for the main event of that autumn, and I do wonder whether that was what killed him. He was 54.

His sudden death shocked his colleagues and there was an immediate sense of how very much he would be missed. In addition to the basic obituary, the Lancet published two appreciations of George as a doctor and as a co-worker. The second was from someone just identifying themselves as "EP". The first was from William Arbuthnot Lane, senior surgeon at Guy's Hospital who - amongst many other specialities - did ear nose and throat operations and developed a successful technique for treating cleft palates. Both spoke of George as a man extremely good at his job, both as a teacher and as an administrator of anaesthetics. As a senior anaesthetist, many of the most difficult cases fell to his lot; but in his working life he had had very few failures; that is to say that very few patients had died as a result of the anaesthetics he had administered.

Sources:

The two obituaries quoted as sources for the 'work/profession' section above.

There's a wiki on Sir William Arbuthnot Lane. During World War 1 he fought for the funding for the famous face-rebuilding plastic surgery unit at Queen Mary Hospital Sidcup.

FRIENDS

Sir William Lane - who lived in Cavendish Square, round the corner from George - and "EP" both spoke of George's popularity, with his students and with his contemporaries. He was a good, loyal friend - Lane described him, interestingly, as having more friends than most men have.

People's friends are not always easy to spot when they leave so little historical evidence behind them. I do know of one of George's friends, though; possibly two.

I've already mentioned GD initiate Victor Toller as a long-time friend of George Rowell. Victor died in October 1915. His Will named George as the second of three executors. The third was perhaps a friend to both George and Victor - Robert Hope Case, who prepared a number of poetry anthologies and an edition of the works of Christopher Marlowe. The first executor was Victor's widow, Mary Elizabeth Toller, and this may have presented George with a situation requiring all his social skills: the evidence I've found suggests that the Tollers were living apart when Victor died.

There are several works by Robert Hope Case in the British Library catalogue; all are as editor rather than author. Victor Toller's Will describes Hope Case as a professor of literature. The poetry anthologies were published during George and Victor's lifetimes:

English Epithalamies London: John Lane 1898.

The Bodley Head Anthologies London: John Lane 1896-1902.

The edition of Christopher Marlowe was not published until after World War 1 though both Victor and George may have been able to hear of the work in progress.

DESCENDANTS? AND WHAT (IF ANYTHING) HAPPENED NEXT.

There seem to be several George William Rowells on the web and in Ancestry's probate registry listings. I haven't been able to identify George Rowell's son for certain.

Frances Emily Rowell was only in her late 30s when George died. In September 1919 she married again. Her second husband was Archibald Dunbar Brander of the Imperial Forest Service in India; and I suppose she went out to India with him. At his retirement they went to live in Scotland, where Frances Emily Brander died in 1954.

George's stress in World War 1 was no doubt increased when Robert Norman Rowell joined the army in April 1916. However, he survived the war and died in Oxfordshire in 1960; probably having inherited his father's business. William Norman Rowell had died in 1936.

Sources:

Pioneer Mail and Indian Weekly News volume 46 1919 p45 announcement of the engagement and imminent marriage of Frances Emily Rowell and A A Dunbar Brander OBE.

At archiver.rootsweb.ancestry.com posted January 2001: some information on the Dunbar Brander family of Pitgaveny; including the date of Frances Emily's second marriage. Her second husband died in 1953.

The Dunbar Brander family is in www.thepeerage.com which uses Burke's Peerage as the basis for its family history information. Burke's doesn't seem to know of any children from Frances Emily's second marriage; so I guess there weren't any.

Spotted via google so I couldn't see the date of the issue; but it must be late April 1916: London Gazette p5617 Robert Norman Rowell as 2nd Lt with effect from 19 April 1916.

Probate Registry 1936 and 1960.

BASIC SOURCES I USED for all Golden Dawn members.

Membership of the Golden Dawn: The Golden Dawn Companion by R A Gilbert. Northampton: The Aquarian Press 1986. Between pages 125 and 175, Gilbert lists the names, initiation dates and addresses of all those people who became members of the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn or its many daughter Orders between 1888 and 1914. The list is based on the Golden Dawn's administrative records and its Members' Roll - the large piece of parchment on which all new members signed their name at their initiation. All this information had been inherited by Gilbert but it's now in the Freemasons' Library at the United Grand Lodge of England building on Great Queen Street Covent Garden. Please note, though, that the records of the Amen-Ra Temple in Edinburgh were destroyed in 1900/01. I have recently (July 2014) discovered that some records of the Horus Temple at Bradford have survived, though most have not; however those that have survived are not yet accessible to the public.

For the history of the GD during the 1890s I usually use Ellic Howe's The Magicians of the Golden Dawn: A Documentary History of a Magical Order 1887-1923. Published Routledge and Kegan Paul 1972. Foreword by Gerald Yorke. Howe is a historian of printing rather than of magic; he also makes no claims to be a magician himself, or even an occultist. He has no axe to grind.

Family history: freebmd; ancestry.co.uk (census and probate); findmypast.co.uk; familysearch; Burke's Peerage and Baronetage; Burke's Landed Gentry; Armorial Families; thepeerage.com; and a wide variety of family trees on the web.

Famous-people sources: mostly about men, of course, but very useful even for the female members of GD. Oxford Dictionary of National Biography. Who Was Who. Times Digital Archive.

Useful source for business and legal information: London Gazette and its Scottish counterpart Edinburgh Gazette. Now easy to find (with the right search information) on the web.

Catalogues: British Library; Freemasons' Library.

Wikipedia; Google; Google Books - my three best resources. I also used other web pages, but with some caution, as - from the historian's point of view - they vary in quality a great deal.

24 July 2016mailto:Amandragora@attglobal.net

Email me at AMandragora@attglobal.net

Find the web pages of Roger Wright and Sally Davis, including my list of people initiated into the Order of the Golden Dawn between 1888 and 1901, at:

www.wrightanddavis.co.uk

***

Robert Roy was one of the first people to be initiated into the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn. His initiation took place at the GD's Isis Urania temple in London, in June 1888. He gave the GD his address and chose a Latin motto, 'Nil desperandum', but was never an active member.

This biography is short, for two reasons. Firstly, there's a note in a GD address book that describes Robert's membership as "nominal". Secondly, I haven't been able to find out much about him, on the web or elsewhere, except for his involvement in freemasonry; for reasons which might become clear if you read the biography through.

Sally Davis

November 2016

My basic sources for any GD member are in a section at the end of the file. Supplementary sources for this particular member are listed at the end of each section.

This is what I have found on ROBERT ROY.

IN THE GD

As well as calling Robert's membership of the GD "nominal", there are also notes on its membership roll saying "no papers left" and "portal only". I think he was initiated in order to bind him to silence about the GD's existence. He may have offered the GD's founders some advice on ritual or legal matters; but that was as far as his membership ever went.

ANY OTHER ESOTERIC INTERESTS?

FREEMASONRY

GD founders William Wynn Westcott and Samuel Liddell Mathers knew Robert as a fellow freemason, more particularly as a member of Societas Rosicruciana in Anglia (SRIA). For more on SRIA see the end of this 'freemasonry' section. SRIA was an exception in Robert's life as a freemason: the freemasons' lodges he joined had connections either with his university, or with his profession.

CRAFT LODGE ISAAC NEWTON UNIVERSITY 859

Robert's first initiation, in 1874, was into Isaac Newton University Lodge 859, the first lodge to be founded at Cambridge University.

In 1876, he joined two more lodges, most of whose members were Oxbridge students or graduates:

CRAFT LODGE OXFORD AND CAMBRIDGE 1118 and its ROYAL ARCH CHAPTER

Initiation into a craft lodge was the basic way into freemasonry. Robert joined the Oxford and Cambridge Lodge 1118, which had a rule that at any time, two-thirds of the members had to be graduates of Oxford or Cambridge. The lodge was founded in 1866 and met, not in Oxford or in Cambridge, but at the Freemasons' Tavern in Covent Garden. The lodge always had a problem with members leaving London or even England and letting their membership lapse - all its founding members had moved on by 1880. So Robert served a year as its Worshipful Master (WM) almost as soon as he became a member, in 1876. There was a thread running through the membership of the lodge, of members whose wives joining the GD. Robert may have known Rev Hugh Reginald Haweis (WM in 1867) whose wife Mary Eliza was a GD member; Henry William Wynn ffoulkes (WM in 1882) whose wife Florence became a member; and Hugh Elliot (WM in 1891) who joined the GD himself and then arranged for his wife Blanche to do so.

If you were interested in the ritual and esoteric side of freemasonry, a Royal Arch initiation was your next step. Oxford and Cambridge Lodge 1118 set up a Royal Arch chapter in 1874 and Robert became a member of that too.

CRAFT LODGE ALMA MATER NUMBER 1492

Issac Newton University Lodge 859 had become a victim of its own popularity by the 1870s and had more members than it could easily cope with. Alma Mater Lodge 1492 which was founded in 1874 to help cope with the overflow. Robert joined 1492 in May 1876. Although membership was restricted to Cambridge University graduates, 1492's founders had always intended that the lodge would meet somewhere convenient for members living in London. Lodge meetings during Robert's lifetime were held at the Railway Hotel Bletchley. Again, Robert was not a particularly active member of the lodge and didn't serve as its WM.

CRAFT LODGE QUATUOR CORONATI 2076

Quatuor Coronati 2076 was founded in 1886 as a forum for the study of the history and symbolism of freemasonry. Meetings were based around a paper or papers read by members and then published in the lodge's magazine Ars Quatuor Coronati. The lodge had relatively few full members but a very large number of corresponding members living all over the world. Robert became one of these in November 1888, a few months after his GD initiation and was probably urged to do so by William Wynn Westcott, who was a full member. Corresponding members could attend lodge meetings although they couldn't vote or hold office. Robert went to three meetings, in June 1889, October and November 1889 but thereafter hardly ever went to any although he did keep up his corresponding membership.

CRAFT LODGE MIDLAND AND OXFORD BAR 2716

You didn't have to be a barrister to be a member of this lodge; but it was set up for barristers who worked on the Midland and Oxford court circuits, or who had done so in the past. It met not in the Midlands or in Oxford, but at the Café Royal on Regent Street in central London. It was set up in 1898 and Robert was one of the founders. Founder-members usually served as a new lodge's officers in its first year, but that didn't happen in Robert's case and he never did a year as the lodge's WM. All members of bar lodges were eligible to join the Royal Arch chapter which held its meetings at the Inns of Court. I haven't found any records of this chapter so I don't know whether Robert did take up the option to join it.

CRAFT LODGE and ROYAL ARCH CHAPTER ALDWYCH 3096

In 1905, Robert helped to found a new craft lodge with a particular purpose: Aldwych Lodge 3096 was founded as a temperance lodge. Although it later relaxed its rules, during Robert's lifetime only freemasons who never drank alcohol under any circumstances could join it. As with the Midland and Oxford bar lodge, Robert never served the lodge as an officer. He might have joined its chapter, though - founded in 1907 - and might have helped members of Aldwych 3096 set up the Federation of Temperance Masonic Lodges, founded in 1912. Named after the road called The Aldwych, which came into being in 1905, and most of its members in its early years were business and professional men with offices in the streets around it. The lodge met nearby, at the Mark Masons' Hall on Great Queen Street.

CRAFT PROVINCE OF CAMBRIDGESHIRE

I've found one reference to Robert's being a Past Principal Grand PT WHAT'S THAT? In the province of Cambridgeshire; an office he must have held while he was still at Cambridge University.

MARK MASONRY

Mark Masonry was set up in England in the mid- to late-19th century: its first Grand Master was not appointed until 1856. It is separate from craft masonry, with its own Grand Lodge and offices in St James, but all prospective members must already be a member of a craft lodge.

Mark Masonry's Metropolitan Council was formed so early in mark masonry's history that it was deemed not to need a number or a warrant. Robert joined this Council, probably in the early 1880s, and served as its WM in 1885-86.

Mark Masonry lodge KING SOLOMON 385 was founded in October 1887 and I think it's quite likely that Robert was a founding member of it. In a Mark Masonry yearbook from 1887 he's listed as due to take office as the lodge's WM at its next installation meeting.

The two yearbooks I looked at for information on Mark Masonry show how much it expanded in the 1870s and 1880s. Not only were a large number of new lodges founded; but its national organisation grew rapidly so that by 1898 a full list of national offices and office-holders could be published. However, the list showed that Robert had kept his involvement in it to lodge level only.

ANCIENT AND ACCEPTED RITE (AAR)

The AAR is an independent form of craft freemasonry. It has its own hierarchy; its own freemasonry degrees from 4 to 33; and its own masonic hall at 33 Golden Square. There's evidence of some form of its Rite being worked in England in the mid-18th century but a Supreme Council to govern those using it was not set up in England until 1845. Membership of the AAR is by invitation and only those who have been craft masons for a year are considered. The modern AAR also expects prospective members to believe in the Christian trinity; such belief was probably taken as read in Robert's time. The AAR's equivalent to a craft lodge is called a rose croix chapter.

Once again, Robert chose a university-based group to become a member of: he was in Oxford and Cambridge Chapter 45, which had been founded in 1873 and held its meetings at the AAR headquarters. Hugh Elliot, who later joined the GD; Henry Wynn ffoulkes, whose wife joined the GD; and the Earl of Euston whose sister joined the GD; were also members of this chapter. By 1880 Robert had reached the AAR's 30° level of initiation, the highest level you could achieve easily - you had to have served as a chapter's Most Worshipful Sovereign (MWS, its equivalent to a craft lodge's WM) to get there. However, in 1891 Robert achieved something which required more patience: he made it to the 31° level. Only 81 members were allowed at this level at any time, so there was a certain amount of waiting for dead men's shoes to be done. The initiation fees for it were high, as well, and only one other GD member achieved it, Rev Thomas William Lemon. Robert was still in the AAR in 1900, the last year whose records I looked at.

RED CROSS OF CONSTANTINE (RCC) whose full name is much longer.

There's some evidence of a degree called RCC being worked in early 19th century England but the Order that Robert joined was not set up until the 1860s; after which it went worldwide with great speed. Candidates for initiation have to be Royal Arch masons already. I haven't found out which Royal Arch chapter Robert belonged to but I presume it must have been Oxford and Cambridge Lodge 1118's and that he could have been considered for RCC membership from the mid-1870s.

Robert was a member of the RCC's University Conclave 128. It had been founded in 1875 and Robert might have been a founding member. However, the earliest details I could find of it were from 1895; it might have been dormant by then as there was no information on it in the list of current conclaves. It was meant to hold its meetings in Cambridge.

Robert is in a list of RCC members from 1899 but his involvement in RCC was at a very low level: there's no mention of him in lists of the RCC's national officers.

ROYAL AND SELECT MASTERS (RSM)

The RSM arrived in England from the USA during the 1860s or early 1870s and a Grand Council to rule it in England was set up in July 1873. Those wishing to join it had to be Royal Arch masons and Mark Master masons already. The RSM's equivalent to a craft lodge was called a council and the equivalent to a craft WM was called a Thrice Illustrious Master (TIM).

When Robert joined the RSM, it didn't have its own headquarters building. Its meetings were held in the masonic hall in Red Lion Square until the early 1890s, when they moved to the Mark Masons' new hall in Great Queen Street. Robert was initiated into the RSM's Grand Masters Council 1 in 1879, the same year that future GD member Rev Thomas William Lemon joined it. Grand Masters Council 1 was - as its number implies - one of the first RSM councils to be founded in England. Despite its title, it had relatively few members, so that the same man (not Robert) served as its TIM from 1871 to 1882. In 1886 future GD member Nelson Prover joined Grand Masters Council 1. In 1896 Otto Heinemann joined it; he wasn't in the GD but one of the senior employees at his publishing firm was - Hugh Elliot.

The RSM was the one freemasons' organisation in which Robert did serve as a national officer. In 1880, very shortly after he joined it, he spent a year as the RSM's Steward; though he never got any further up its hierarchy.

In 1896, Robert, Rev Lemon and Nelson Prower were all still members of Grand Masters Council 1. Rev Lemon was still a member of it in 1899 but by that time, both Robert and Prower had left it; though they were still members of the RSM as a whole.

SOCIETAS ROSICRUCIANA IN ANGLIA (SRIA)

Members of Quatuor Coronati 2076 were initiated into the GD in its early years; and so were members of the Theosophical Society (see below for more on that). However, the most likely route for Robert to take to the GD - however nominally - was via SRIA. Only freemasons could join the SRIA though it maintained its independence from the UGLE. Organised in colleges (usually one per town or city) it was a forum for the study of the history of freemasonry and the meaning of its symbolism. The two main founders of the GD - William Wynn Westcott and Samuel Liddell Mathers - were both very active members of SRIA's Metropolitan College, and they recruited other members of it to their new Order.

My source for Robert's time in the SRIA is the Transactions of its Metropolitan College. Robert was already a member of the Metropolitan College by the time the first set of Transactions were issued, in 1885; and was still a member though rather less active, in 1913, its last issue before a gap covering World War 1. In that period he attended virtually all the College's April meetings, at which the officers for the coming 12 months took up their posts. Despite working out of town he managed to get to most of its other meetings, and to serve on some of its sub-committees. In 1885 he was already one of the two auditors of the College's accounts and from 1892 until at least 1905 he was its Treasurer. For some years from 1892 he was also the College's honorary secretary. From 1891 to 1905 he was one of the College's two representatives on the SRIA's governing body, its High Council. He probably stood down in order to have the time to be a member of a committee set up to revise the College's rules. By 1910 he was less involved in the running of the College but had joined its study group, which met twice a month between October and July and went on outings to places of historical interest in the summer.

One reason why Westcott and Mathers might have been keen to have Robert in their GD is indicated by a remark Westcott made in 1889 about Robert's ritual work. He called it "facile and accurate". Of course Westcott was not using the word 'facile' in its modern, derogatory sense but in its original sense of being easy and perhaps flowing, looking effortless. This was probably a reference to Robert's work during his twelve months as the Metropolitan College's Magister Templi, in 1887-88. The College's equivalent to a craft lodge WM was its Celebrant. Robert never served in that capacity, though he was its President (a more administrative role) in 1887. As President, he was chosen with Westcott and SRIA's Supreme Magus Dr William Woodman (but no one else) to be given a rank in the SRIA's equivalent in the USA, in October 1887.

As with Quatuor Coronati 2076, SRIA meetings were organised around a talk given by one of the members, with discussion afterwards. Most talks at the Metropolitan College were then published in its Transactions. Robert was obviously more of an administrator than a researcher and lecturer; and he was also a busy professional man: during his long association with the College he only gave two talks. The first was in January 1889, on The Numbers and Mystic Knowledge. The second is rather mysterious: he gave it in July 1899 but the title was not printed in that year's Transactions and its text was not printed in any of the volumes, either.

THEOSOPHY

My research into the GD members has shown that very few were both freemasons and theosophists. Robert Roy is one of the few; so were GD founders William Wynn Westcott and Samuel Liddell Mathers. It's difficult to say from the Theosophical Society records how active he was, but he joined it in November 1889. The TS was organised very like freemasonry, into locally-based groups which were called lodges and held their own meetings, with speakers either from amongst the members or from amongst the TS hierarchy. Robert was a member of Blavatsky Lodge, which met at TS headquarters, a house in Regent's Park which was owned by TS member Countess Wachtmeister. Helena Petrovna Blavatsky lived in the house from May 1887 to her death in May 1891, so if Robert went to lodge meetings regularly, he will have been well acquainted with her. He remained a member of the TS through the divisions and bitterness of the 1890s when theosophy struggled to focus itself after Blavatsky's death. 1904 was the last time he paid his annual subscription and he was judged no longer to be a member, in 1907.

SPIRITUALISM

I haven't found any, although it is hard to tell whether people were spiritualists as spiritualism was a very locally, even family-based pursuit and there was no over-arching organisation with a membership list that can be consulted now.

Sources:

FREEMASONRY

Database of the collections at the Freemasons' Library: go to

//freemasonry.london.museum

and take the option 'Explore'. You don't have to have a reader's ticket to search the catalogue; or to use the other online resources which include online copies, digitised as far as 1900, of the main freemasons' magazines, a very useful resource for some - but not all - freemasons' organisations.

Oxford and Cambridge Lodge 1118 and R A Chapter: Notes from the Minute Books compiled by Horace Nelson. No publication details; nor a date but [p6] the Preface is dated December 1925: passim.

The History of Oxford and Cambridge University Lodge number 1118 1866-1966 by E W R Peterson MA. Especially pp31-39 - full list of members and the date they joined; pp40-49 list of officers.

A Hundred Years of the Isaac Newton University Lodge 859 1861-1961. No indication of the author and it's really only a small brochure. Passim for a lodge history very much focused on the great and good who'd been its members; pp16-17 list of WM's so far which doesn't include Robert Roy.

Isaac Newton University Lodge of Ancient, Free and Accepted Masons 859 Cambridge 1861-2011. Foreword by J M Whitehead especially p54 WM's so far; and p55 secretaries and treasurers.

Some Personal Impressions of the First Hundred Years of Alma Mater Lodge 1118. Author is G Walker of Emmanuel College. No publication details but the Foreword by Jeremy Pemberton is dated August 1983. Passim but especially Appendix E: list of WM's. Robert Roy is in this list, but as a student at Peterhouse College, which contradicts the evidence from later legal sources.

Ars Quatuor Coronati 2076 Volume I 1886-89. Unnumbered pages at the end of the volume list current officers and members. On [p16] of this list, Robert Roy as corresponding member number 372; of 83 Kensington Gardens Square, with joining date November 1888.

Ars Quatuor Coronati 2076 Volume II 1889 p109; p140; p144. It might be pure coincidence but at the second of these meetings GD member Sydney Turner Klein was proposed as a full member of the lodge; and at the third, he was admitted. Perhaps Robert and Sydney were acquaintances though I'm not quite sure how they might have met.

Ars Quatuor Coronati 2076 volumes from 1890 to volume XIII 1900 p53 when he was still a corresponding member.

MIDLAND AND OXFORD BAR LODGE 2716 from 1972 known as Midland, Oxford and South Eastern Bar Lodge.

Freemasons' Library Lodge File for 2716: invitation to the consecration of the lodge: p7 for the list of founders.

Bye-Laws and List of Members of the Midland and Oxford Bar Lodge 2716 published London 1920: p2, p4.

The Midland, Oxford and South Eastern Bar Lodge 1898-1998 by its current WM, Leslie Wise. It's a small pamphlet, with no publication details on it: p2 with Robert Roy sixth on its list of named founder members. There's a typesetting error: he's listed as a member of 559; they mean 859 - the Isaac Newton lodge. Pp3-4 for list of officers serving in its first year; p5; p8.

ALDWYCH LODGE 3096

Aldwych Lodge 1905-80. The first 20 pages is a reissue of an earlier booklet: Aldwych Lodge 3096: An Outline of Events During the First Fifty Years by Victor T Farrant. London: CPS 1955. P3 for the process of founding it; p6 for officers serving in its first year - not including Robert Roy. On p7 a list of founders includes a "Robt Ray" which must be the GD member; p8; p19 - list of officers so far; p24.

For aspects of freemasonry other than craft I have been thankful to be able to consult these two books, recommended to me by my friends at the Freemasons' Library:

Beyond the Craft by Keith B Jackson. Original edition 1980. I used the 6th edition, 2012, to which Jackson has added details of several orders left out of the 1st edition. Hersham Surrey: Lewis Masonic, an imprint of Ian Allan Publishing Ltd. See www.lewismasonic.co.uk

A Reference Book for Freemasons. Compiled by Frederick Smyth. Published London: Quatuor Coronati Correspondence Circle Ltd 1998.

MARK MASONRY

Masonic Calendar for 1888 which was only the third time one had been published: p15 for its current Grand Lodge and Grand Masters since 1856, when the first was appointed; p52 for its lodges, the first only having been set up in 1881; p75 for King Solomon Lodge 385; p70 for the Metropolitan Council.

Masonic Calendar for 1898, mostly full of lists of officials at national and provincial levels. There was no section on the current MM lodges.

ANCIENT AND ACCEPTED RITE

Rules and Regulations for the Government of the Degrees from the 4° to 32° Inclusive under the Supreme Council 33° of the Ancient and Accepted Rite [in the British Empire etc etc]; plus a List of Members. I looked at:

Issue correct to June 1880: pp35-41; membership list pp43-46; list of current chapters p77.

Issue correct to June 1888, the one published around the time the GD was being set up. Passim for its rules, and current hierarchy.

And lastly Issue correct to July 1900: p55 for members at level 31°; p74; p264.

RED CROSS OF CONSTANTINE properly the Imperial, Ecclesiastical and Military Order of Knights of the Red Cross of Rome and Constantine.

Statement of Accounts, Annual Report and List of Officers and Conclaves published in London by George Kenning, who was a member of it. I looked at a volume covering 1868 to 1899. However, if any reports were issued between 1874 and 1887 they are missing from the volume. Robert's name doesn't appear in any issue before that of 1895, which had the first list of members to be published so far: p21, p42, p51.

The last in the volume is Issue of 1899: p46.

ROYAL AND SELECT MASTERS which is also known as the Cryptic Rite, a reference to the layout of one of its basic rituals.

Annual Report of Proceedings of the Grand Council of RSM of England and Wales etc.

Issue of 1887 printed in London 1888 by freemason and publisher George Kenning. Just noting here that on p4 the annual report described the last year as one of "slow but steady extension" of the RSM in England; with 51 new recruits. 15 councils were named, though 5 were currently dormant; 4 out of the 15 were based in London.

Issue of 1888 printed 1889 pp10-11: following the death of the RSM's founder in England, Canon Portal, the Earl of Euston was elected the RSM's new Grand Master.

Issue of 1889 printed 1890; and Issue of 1890 printed 1891: no mention of any GD members.

Issue of 1891 p3. Beginning p20 the earliest list of current members that I could find: pp22-23.

Issue of 1896 pp23-24; p28; p29.

Issue of 1899 was the last one in the volume: p24 TWL still in Grand Masters Council 1; p26.

SOCIETAS ROSICRUCIANA IN ANGLIA

Transactions of Societas Rosicruciana Metropolitan College make it clear he's a regular attendee at meetings from the first issue as far as the last before his death: 1885 to 1913.

Particularly issues of:

1885 inside front cover - list of senior members of the College.

1886 pp2-3.

1887 p3, p8.

1888/89 p7.

1891/92 inside front cover.

1892/93 p3.

1895/96 p6.

1899/1900 p1, p4.

1905 p3, p7, p15.

1910 p69.

1911 was the year in which - after a quarter of a century of pretty regular attendance at Metropolitan College meetings - Robert began to send in apologies for absence.

1912 p43 the meeting of October 1912 was the last I know he attended though I daresay he continued to go to some at least, until his death. No volumes of Transactions were printed during the years 1913 to 1917.

History of the Societas Rosicruciana in Anglia by the MW Supreme Magus Dr William Wynn Westcott. Privately printed London 1900: p14.

THEOSOPHY

Theosophical Society Membership Register January 1889-September 1891 p130.

For Blavatsky in London: blavatskyarchives.com

ANY OBITUARIES/BIOGRAPHIES?

I haven't found any. Quite the reverse in fact: he continued to be listed in the Law Lists until the late 1930s, over 20 years after his death.

BIRTH/YOUTH/FAMILY BACKGROUND

Piecing together information from different sources, I think that the GD member's father and his grandfather were both called Robert Roy; and that they compounded the confusion that was likely to cause, by both - in their day - running the school known in its last years as Burlington House Academy in Fulham. The process began with GD member's grandfather Robert Roy founding or taking over a school situated in Old Burlington Street behind Piccadilly. Around 1807 he moved that school out of town, to the village of Fulham. As part of this move, he took over Fulham Academy, a well-known school that was already in the village. He moved Fulham Academy and his own school into a new building, Burlington House, and renamed the school Burlington House Academy. Burlington House still exists, as flats, in the road now named Burlington Road but originally called Back Lane.

Robert Roy the GD member's father was his father's second son, born in 1791. He was sent to Cambridge University to prepare him to take over the running of Burlington House Academy in due course. Robert Roy the GD member's father graduated in 1815. He was ordained in the Church of England but doesn't seem to have ever worked as a parish priest, so the ordination was probably to enhance Burlington House Academy in the eyes of devout parents looking for a suitable school for their sons.

Rev Robert Roy - the GD member's father - was still running Burlington House Academy in 1835. He was probably still at the school when he married in 1845. But by 1853 Burlington House Academy had shut down.

In August 1845, Rev Robert Roy married Caroline, daughter of Thomas and Ann (or Anne) Bignold. Caroline had been born in Clapham in 1818. Although I don't have definitive proof, I believe Caroline's father was a son of businessman Thomas Bignold of Norwich and London, founder (in 1808) of Norwich Union Fire Insurance Company and Norwich Union Life Assurance Society. Robert Roy the GD member was the son of Rev Robert and Caroline. He was born in 1847 and was an only child in a mid-Victorian England full of huge families.

On the day of the 1851 census, the three-year-old Robert Roy was with his parents, visiting Roy relations in Skirbeck Lincolnshire. The head of the household was away from home that day, but other sources indicate that he was Rev William Roy, formerly head chaplain at Madras, but now Rector of Skirbeck. From the information I've found, I haven't been able to work out whether the Rev William was an uncle or the elder brother of Rev Robert. At home at Skirbeck Rectory on census day 1851 were three of Rev William's daughters, two in their teens and one in her twenties, keeping house with a cook/housekeeper, a housemaid, a kitchen maid and a laundress.

Perhaps Rev Robert Roy had gone to Skirbeck to do parish duties for his relation while he was away. Rev Robert's occupation was written down by the 1851 census official as 'clergyman' (not as a teacher or headmaster) so he had already left Burlington House Academy, or closed it down.

In 1861, Rev Robert Roy, Caroline and GD member Robert (now aged 13) were living at 9 Drayton Terrace in Kensington. Caroline's nephew Alfred Bignold, aged 10, was staying with them and Caroline was managing the small household without a cook, with the help of one housemaid.

Sources: censuses 1841, 1851, 1861, probate registry 1863.

Burlington House Academy: at www.lbhf.gov.uk, a document whose first page I cldn't see but which is connected with a process under Section 69 of the Planning (Listed Buildings and Conserv Areas) Act 1990, probably helping to lay the groundwork for Fulham Conservation Area: p5 section 4.6: Burlington Road.

Supplement to Captain Sir John Ross's Narrative... by John Braithwaite. Published 1835: pxciv lists the Rev Robert Roy of Burlington House Fulham as one of the book's subscribers.

At www.british-history.ac.uk Burlington House in Fulham, with information reproduced from Old and New London volume 6 Chapter 37. No author gvn but published Cassell Petter and Galpin London 1878.

Familysearch England-ODM GS film number 585471-72: baptism 1 July 1791 at St Luke Chelsea of Robert Roy son of Robert Roy and Mary.

Familysearch England-ODM GS film number 307716 et seq: baptisms at Holy Trinity Clapham. On 18 May 1818, Caroline daughter of Thomas Bignold and wife Ann née Puxley. Familysearch also had baptism details for two brothers: Alfred and Alexander.

At heritage.aviva.com a hist of the Norwich Union Fire Insurance Company and the Norwich Union Life Assurance Society, both of which were founded 1808 by Norwich businessman Thomas Bignold. In the list of company secretaries:

1808-1815 Thomas Bignold the founder; who therefore can't be Caroline Roy's father.

1815-75 Samuel Bignold, the last Bignold to hold that office.

There's a wiki on Samuel Bignold: 1791-1875, third son of Thomas Bignold and his wife Sarah.

On Familysearch I noticed a burial of a Thomas Bignold in 1835 in Norfolk; perhaps this was Caroline Roy's father.

Familysearch England-ODM GS film number 598186 et seq: marriages at the old church of St Pancras: 29 August 1845, Robert Roy to Caroline Bignold.

Gentleman's Magazine volume 24 1845 marriages in November: p522 29 [November] at St Pancras New Church: Rev Robert Roy of Camden Town to Caroline, daughter of the late Thomas Bignold of Norwich and Philipines in Kent.

Rev William Roy:

Seen via google: announcement of a birth of a daughter in Gentleman's Magazine 1837 is already describing him as a former chaplain at Madras. Also on google I noticed later mentions of a son of his, another Robert.

Via archive.spectator.co.uk to The Spectator 16 October 1862 p19 death announcement for Rev William Roy DD, Rector of Skirbeck Lincolnshire.

EDUCATION

Rev Robert Roy died in January 1863. Until his father's death I think Robert Roy the GD member had been educated at home. His name hasn't come up on any of the pupils' lists that are on the web, and the entries for him in Alumni Cantabrigiensis and the Middle Temple pupils' list don't list any school for him. Robert the GD member followed his father to Cambridge University; but not until 1873 so ten years need to be accounted for that might have been occupied by Robert going to school; or by him having a tutor. Information from the census isn't helpful.

The sources I've found don't agree about which Cambridge college Robert went to. The legal sources give Downing College but a freemasonry source says it was Peterhouse. He left the university - probably in 1876 - before taking his degree.

In January 1876 he began to study for the Bar exams, at the Middle Temple. He was called to the Bar in June 1881.

Sources:

Alumni Cantabrigiensis Part 2 No 5 p375.

WORK/PROFESSION

The Law Lists show that, once he was qualified to practice, Robert Roy became a barrister on the Oxford circuit, working at the Gloucester sessions. For nearly twenty years, he didn't have chambers in London, but in 1900 he moved into the Temple, into rooms at 2 Garden Court. In 1911 he moved to 2 Brick Court but this was temporary and at his death in 1916 his professional address was back in Garden Court again.

Sources:

Website archive.middletemple.org, men admitted to the Middle Temple: p599 in the admissions' list for 1876.

Alumni Cantabrigiensis Part 2 No 5 p375.

Men at the Bar 2nd edition published 1885: p275, p405.

Law lists: 1893 p196; 1900 p222; 1911 p258. And 1925 p242; 1835 p237; 1940 p238 all apparently unaware that he had died; perhaps his chambers carried on without him. He's not listed in the issue of 1941 p292.

ANY PUBLICATIONS?

Not that I am aware of.

ANY PUBLIC LIFE/EVIDENCE FOR LEISURE TIME? Bearing in mind, of course, that most leisure activities leave no trace behind them.

Freemasonry and theosophy are the only ones I've come across, though he was a member of the New University Club, whose premises were in St James's Street.

Source:

Men at the Bar 2nd edition published 1885: p275 p405.

FAMILY

Census evidence indicates that Robert continued to live with his widowed mother until her death; though after he started work on the Oxford courts circuit in 1881, he will have spent a lot of time out of town. They probably moved back to Fulham soon after Rev Robert's death and were certainly there on census day 1871, at 4 Munster Road very near where Burlington House Academy had been. Caroline was living off an annuity. Robert told the census official he was a landowner. Perhaps he had inherited some land from his father; however, he never mentioned having income from property in any subsequent census, so the income from it can't have been large. He and his mother were certainly living modestly enough, with just the one general servant. Census day 1881 came about three months before Robert's final Bar exams. Caroline Roy still had just the one servant but they had moved to what sounds like a nicer part of Fulham: 1 Fulham Park Gardens.

By 1888, Robert had been in practice as a barrister for several years and they could afford to pay more rent and employ more servants. They had moved to 83 Kensington Gardens Square, where they were on census day 1891 with a cook and a housemaid.

Caroline Roy died early in 1894 and Robert, as a bachelor, gave up the house in Kensington Gardens Square. I couldn't find Robert on the censuses of 1901 and 1911 - census day always fell during the law courts' Easter vacation and Robert was probably abroad on holiday both times. Other evidence shows that by 1900 he had taken business premises at 2 Garden Court, in the Temple precinct, and was living, when in London, in a flat - 6m Hyde Park Mansions, just off Marylebone Road near Edgware Road station. I don't know when he first became a tenant there but the huge block doesn't appear in the PO Directory until 1885. GD member Dora de Blaquièrè lived at 1 Hyde Park Mansions from 1884 until 1899.

At some point, Robert retired, or at least reduced the amount of legal work he did, and moved to the south coast. At his death, he was living at 29 St Saviour's Road, St Leonard's-on-Sea. He died in June 1916. He had never married.

Sources: censuses 1871-1911; freebmd; probate registry 1916; Law Lists which confused me by having entries for him up to 1941.

Date at GD Initiation - see Basic Sources section immediately below.

Hyde Park Mansions: PO Directory of London 1883 has no entry for Hyde Park Mansions.

PO Directory of London street directory 1885 p486 Hyde Park Mansions, Marylebone Road.

Ars Quatuor Coronati 2076 Volume XIII 1900 p53.

London Gazette 3 November 1916 p10683.

BASIC SOURCES I USED for all Golden Dawn members.

Membership of the Golden Dawn: The Golden Dawn Companion by R A Gilbert. Northampton: The Aquarian Press 1986. Between pages 125 and 175, Gilbert lists the names, initiation dates and addresses of all those people who became members of the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn or its many daughter Orders between 1888 and 1914. The list is based on the Golden Dawn's administrative records and its Members' Roll - the large piece of parchment on which all new members signed their name at their initiation. All this information had been inherited by Gilbert but it's now in the Freemasons' Library at the United Grand Lodge of England building on Great Queen Street Covent Garden. Please note, though, that the records of the Amen-Ra Temple in Edinburgh were destroyed in 1900/01. I have recently (July 2014) discovered that some records of the Horus Temple at Bradford have survived, though most have not; however those that have survived are not yet accessible to the public.

For the history of the GD during the 1890s I usually use Ellic Howe's The Magicians of the Golden Dawn: A Documentary History of a Magical Order 1887-1923. Published Routledge and Kegan Paul 1972. Foreword by Gerald Yorke. Howe is a historian of printing rather than of magic; he also makes no claims to be a magician himself, or even an occultist. He has no axe to grind.

Family history: freebmd; ancestry.co.uk (census and probate); findmypast.co.uk; familysearch; Burke's Peerage and Baronetage; Burke's Landed Gentry; Armorial Families; thepeerage.com; and a wide variety of family trees on the web.

Famous-people sources: mostly about men, of course, but very useful even for the female members of GD. Oxford Dictionary of National Biography. Who Was Who. Times Digital Archive.

Useful source for business and legal information: London Gazette and its Scottish counterpart Edinburgh Gazette. Now easy to find (with the right search information) on the web.

For the freemasons who were in the GD;

Generally for initiations into craft lodges: United Grand Lodge of England membership registers to 1921. See them at Ancestry by taking the 'schools directories and church histories' options.

See also the various resources at the Freemasons' Library: see the website at //freemasonry.london.museum. Its catalogue has very detailed entries and the website has all sorts of other resources. You can get from it to a database of freemasons' newspapers and magazines, digitised to 1900. You can also reach that directly at www.masonicperiodicals.org.

Wikipedia; Google; Google Books - my three best resources. I also used other web pages, but with some caution, as - from the historian's point of view - they vary in quality a great deal.

3 November 2016 <mailto:Amandragora@attglobal.net>

Email me at:

Find the web pages of Roger Wright and Sally Davis, including my list of people initiated into the Order of the Golden Dawn between 1888 and 1901, at:

www.wrightanddavis.co.uk

***

Alfred Ernest Scanlan was initiated into the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn at its Horus Temple in Bradford Yorkshire, between March 1893 and the end of that year. He chose the simple and relevant Latin motto 'Medicus'. Although he had many other calls on his time, and despite not actually living in Bradford, he was able to do the study necessary to progress further in the Order; and was initiated into its inner, 2nd Order in April 1896. As the records of the Horus Temple have been lost, it's not possible to say how long Alfred remained an active member of it.

Alfred was one of a small group of GD members who lived in Middlesbrough. He was the link between two of the others, William Charles Hopgood and Arthur Wilson, who were initiated at the Horus Temple during 1894.

This is one of my short biographies. They mostly cover GD members who lived in Bradford, Liverpool and Edinburgh. I've done what I can with those people, using the web and sources in London. I'm sure there's far more information on them out there, but it will be in record offices, the local papers...I'd need to be on the spot to look at them, and I've had to admit that life's too short!

Sally Davis

February 2016

This is what I have found on ALFRED ERNEST SCANLAN.

IN THE GD

There's nothing by or about him in the GD collections at the Freemasons' Library and the Warburg Institute; and as I've said above, no records remain of the GD in Bradford. However, there is one letter to him, and his reply, in the Collected Letters of W B Yeats; and a copy of his natal chart is in the Yeats archive in the National Library of Ireland.

The letter is a copy of one by Yeats to Scanlan, undated but thought to be from around January 1901. It was, perhaps, a difficult letter for Yeats to write, which is why a copy exists: it might have taken several attempts to get the wording right. Yeats wanted to ask Alfred if someone confessing to a Roman Catholic or high Anglican priest was obliged to mention that they were a GD member; or that people they knew were. Quite why Yeats should be asking Alfred this question is something the editors of Yeats' letters don't have an answer to; and I certainly don't have one. But the editors do suggest why Yeats was asking it now: the woman he loved, Maud Gonne - who had been in the GD for a brief period - was preparing to convert to Roman Catholicism in order to marry a Catholic. A long confession of past sins was a part of the process and Yeats was obviously worried about how much information she would have to give away. Alfred replied that he thought not, on both counts; which Yeats was probably very glad to hear.

The exchange suggests that Alfred was familiar with the ins and outs of confession: that he was a Catholic or a very high Anglican himself. Quite a few GD members had a background at the 'high' end of the Church of England spectrum; though very few were Catholics when they were initiated. I haven't found any confirmation of Alfred's particular beliefs myself; but it's a difficult thing to research.

As to Yeats' having Alfred's natal chart, it is with a group that have the date 1908 attached to them: quite a while after the GD had fallen apart into its two daughter orders.

There are no other letters from Alfred amongst Yeats' papers, but perhaps Alfred and W B Yeats knew each other better, and for longer, than you would think.

Sources:

Collected Letters of W B Yeats Volume III 1901-94 p18.

At www.nli.ie, the National Library of Ireland. Its Collection List 60: Occult Papers of W B Yeats, Mss 34,270 and 36,273-36,285. Ms 36, 274/11. Other charts in the group are those of the spiritualist William Stainton Moses; and GD member Edmund Hunter and both his sons - Edmund had married Yeats' friend, GD member Dorothea Butler.

ANY OTHER ESOTERIC INTERESTS?

Yes indeed. Like so many GD members, particularly at the Horus Temple, he had come to the Order through membership of the Theosophical Society.

Alfred had applied to join the TS in November 1891. At that time, all applicants had to have two sponsors who were already members. Alfred's sponsors were impeccable, making his acceptability a foregone conclusion. They were Walter Richard Old (later known as Walter Gorn Old) and G R S Mead, two members of the very select inner circle that Helena Petrovna Blavatsky formed around herself when she took up residence in London in 1887. Old became general secretary to the TS's British Section when it was founded in October 1889, so he probably processed Alfred's application himself. G R S Mead was co-editor (with Annie Besant) of the theosophical magazine Lucifer for much of the 1890s, and published a series of books on aspects of the occult.

The TS underwent a big and rapid expansion in the early 1890s, with lodges being set up to act as local meeting places in most English cities. As both Old and Mead lived in London and went to TS meetings there, though, I'm not sure how Alfred - who never lived in London to my knowledge - got to know them. Perhaps he was able to go to enough meetings in London to make their acquaintance; but he was never a member of any of London's theosophical lodges. I think it's just as likely that he knew Walter Old through medicine. W R Old was a qualified doctor, though he doesn't seem ever to have practised. I've tried to find out where Old trained. I haven't had any luck so far; but it's possible that he and Alfred were at Edinburgh University together. They were about the same age. Astrology links Alfred with W B Yeats and also with W R Old: Old was an acknowledged expert on the subject, working and publishing as Sepharial.

Alfred didn't act as sponsor to new TS members himself very often, but in September 1893 he did do so for Thomas J Charlton of Middlesbrough, a friend of his I would suppose. Where he was active as a TS member was in helping to found Middlesbrough TS Lodge, in June 1893. GD member Arthur Wilson was also a member of this; though GD member William Charles Hopgood was not in the TS at all - Alfred knew him as a fellow GP in the city. A typical meeting of a TS lodge would have a speaker, either one of the members or a visitor from another lodge. In November 1893, Oliver Firth came from Bradford TS lodge to give a talk to Middlesbrough TS on Karma, Free Will and Fate. As well as being in the TS in Bradford, Firth was a member of the GD there; it's most likely through him that the three men from Middlesbrough found out about the GD's existence. Members of the TS in Middlesbrough also worked with Firth and others from Bradford Lodge to set up the magazine The Northern Theosophist, which ran for two years and showed just how active theosophists in the north of England were - until a major dispute within the TS worldwide brought the phase of expansion to a halt, in 1894-95. The dispute was, essentially, over who should lead the TS and in what direction, now that Blavatsky was dead. It became very vitriolic, and eventually very public. Many members resigned in disgust or despair at how the dispute was handled, or just stopped paying their yearly sub, and it seems Alfred Scanlan was one of those. By December 1897, his membership was judged to have lapsed. Any theosophy that he read or discussed or believed after that was purely a private affair and he had his membership of the GD as a western-esotericism based alternative; another esoteric group rent from time to time by noisy dispute, but at least it was all kept relatively secret!

Sources:

Theosophical Society Membership Register September 1891-January 1893 p21 entry for Alfred Ernest Scanlan, with details of addresses during his period of membership; which lodges he was a member of; and when he ceased to be a member (usually this was by not paying the yearly subscription for three successive years). "Lapsed 12 97".

Walter Old and G R S Mead both have pages on wikipedia.

Website theosophy.ph/encyclo: Old's appointment as general secretary of the TS in Britain.

Alfred as sponsor: Theosophical Society Membership Register June 1893 to March 1895 p35.

Lucifer: A Theosophical Magazine Volume XII covers March-August 1893. Edited by Annie Besant, published by the Theosophical Publishing Society of 7 Duke Street Adelphi. Volume XII number 70 issued 15 June 1893 p341 in the news section: formation of Middlesbrough TS Lodge.

Lucifer: A Theosophical Magazine Volume XIII covers September 1893 to February 1894. Editor Annie Besant, published by the Theosophical Publishing Society of 7 Duke Street Adelphi. Volume XIII number 75 issued 15 November 1893 news item p254: Oliver Firth's talk at Middlesbrough TS Lodge. And Volume XIII number 76 issued 15 December 1893 p265 involvement of members of Middlesbrough Lodge in setting up the magazine The Northern Theosophist.

ANY OBITUARIES/BIOGRAPHIES?

No.

BIRTH/YOUTH/FAMILY BACKGROUND

This is a tricky one, because I haven't been able to discover the name of Alfred's father. I couldn't find Alfred and his father in the same household in any census; and all I know about his father was that he was a watch-maker - the census official in 1871 asked Alfred's mother what her absent husband did for a living.. I did find a reference to a James Scanlan, a watch-maker in Rhyl in Wales around 1848; but that's not much to go on.

Alfred was born in 1857, probably in the city of Chester. I couldn't find him or his family on the 1861 census. On the day of the 1871 census, his father was away, but the rest of the family were at home at 11 Llanfair Street Ruthin: Alfred's mother Margaret; an older brother who may have been from a previous marriage Margaret had made; Alfred's sister Selina aged 16, who was working in her father's business; and Alfred, aged 13 and still at school. This was a modest household which employed no live-in servants.

Alfred began to train for a career in medicine in 1875 and never lived with both his parents again. I think his father was dead by 1891. In 1880, Selina married Rev William Davies. They were living near Oswestry on the day of the 1881 census.

Sources:

Watchmakers and Clockmakers of the World volume 1 p689.

Census information: 1871, 1881.

EDUCATION

Not known in any detail apart from his medical training.

WORK/PROFESSION

He was licensed to practice LRCP and LRCS in Edinburgh in March 1881. After a short time working at Snaith in Yorkshire (he was living there on the day of the 1881 census) he moved to the Linthorpe district of Middlesbrough. He spent the rest of his life as a GP and surgeon there. William Charles Hopgood also lived and practised in Linthorpe and the two men must have known each as fellow professionals at least.

Sources:

Via archive.org to the Minutes of the General Council of Medical Education (the GMC) volume XIV issued 1877: Alfred Ernest Scanlan and a couple of other doctors had asked that the start of their medical training be backdated to October 1875; the GMC granted their request.

The Students' Journal and Hospital Gazette 1880 p200 Alfred Ernest Scanlan of Chester is in a list, presumably of those who have just passed their final exams.

GMC registers (which first appear in 1887). If you were only in private practice you didn't have to register and Alfred didn't register until 1899; from then until 1927, however, he's in all the issues. In 1899 his address was Brynhenlog, Princes Road Middlesbrough but by 1903 he'd moved to Westbrook, elsewhere in Linthorpe, and that's where the practice remained until the death of Alfred's son, who took it over when Alfred retired.

ANY PUBLICATIONS?

I haven't found any.

ANY PUBLIC LIFE/EVIDENCE FOR LEISURE TIME? Bearing in mind, of course, that most leisure activities leave no trace behind them.

Apart from theosophy and the GD, no - but life as a GP doesn't leave much time for them.

ADDRESSES

1891 80 St Paul's Terrace Middlesbrough: his home, not the address of the GP surgery

1893 The Surgery, Feltham Place Middlesbrough; not his home

FAMILY

In 1885, Alfred married Jemima Sayce, at Stockon-on-Tees. Jemima was the youngest daughter of Evan Sayce, who in 1871 was working as the foreman in an iron foundry in Middlesbrough. They hadn't been living in Middlesbrough for long though: all the family, including Jemima (then aged 15) had been born in Wales. In 1881, Evan Sayce was unemployed and Jemima had gone to live with William Walters and his wife Ann, in Marsh Road Linthorpe. The census entry for that address is a bit confusing: I can't tell from it whether Jemima is working or not; and she's described as the step-daughter of William Walters but I can't see how that can be right.

On the day of the 1891 census, Alfred and Jemima were living at 80 Newport Road Middlesbrough with their children Lena Nesta (born 1887) and James Ernest (born 1890). Alfred's mother Margaret, now a widow, was living with them, and so was James Cormac, described as a "surgical assistant" who was (I guess) working for Alfred. In addition, to Mr Cormac, the Scanlans also employed a nurse/housemaid, and one general servant. Margaret Scanlan died the following year, aged 74.

I can't find Alfred, Jemima and their children on the census in 1901: census day 1901 was very near Easter so perhaps they were on holiday. On census day 1911 Alfred, Jemima and Nesta were at home at Westbrook, Cambridge Road Middlesbrough; though James was not in the UK as far as I could see. Perhaps James was abroad with school friends - in 1905 he had started as a pupil at Epsom College, founded as a school for the sons of physicians. Though their household was smaller now, the Scanlans were still employing two servants - they were now very comfortably off. Nesta had left school but wasn't working.

As Alfred's last entry in the GMC Registers was in the list of 1927. Perhaps he retired shortly after that. He and James had been working in partnership for several years by this time.

Sources:

Census 1891, 1901, 1911.

At www.mocavo.com the Epsom College Register 1855-1905 p267.

DEATH

Alfred Ernest Scanlan died on 9 January 1930. Jemima died in December 1941. As far as I can see, their daughter Lena Nesta Scanlan didn't marry.

Sources:

Probate registry entries 1930; 1942.

DESCENDANTS? AND WHAT (IF ANYTHING) HAPPENED NEXT.

I couldn't see a probate registry entry for Nesta; which means either that her estate fell below the level at which a registry entry was necessary; or that she died after 1966 when Ancestry's list of entries comes to an end.

JAMES ERNEST SCANLAN

Alfred and Jemima's son James joined the navy as soon as he was medically qualified, being made a temporary surgeon lieutenant in November 1916. He survived the war, and returned to Middlesbrough to become the junior partner in his father's GP practice, taking it over entirely when Alfred retired. In 1924 he married Lucy Emmett Pearson. They had two daughters, Patricia and Moira. James survived his mother by only a few months, dying in July 1942.

Sources:

Navy List of January 1919 p476 with a list of temporary surgeon-lieutenants appointed 1916.

London Gazette 9 November 1926 p7288 James acting as executor; current address

Brynhenlog, Princes Road Middlesbrough.

Probate Registry entry 1942.

BASIC SOURCES I USED for all Golden Dawn members.

Membership of the Golden Dawn: The Golden Dawn Companion by R A Gilbert. Northampton: The Aquarian Press 1986. Between pages 125 and 175, Gilbert lists the names, initiation dates and addresses of all those people who became members of the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn or its many daughter Orders between 1888 and 1914. The list is based on the Golden Dawn's administrative records and its Members' Roll - the large piece of parchment on which all new members signed their name at their initiation. All this information had been inherited by Gilbert but it's now in the Freemasons' Library at the United Grand Lodge of England building on Great Queen Street Covent Garden. Please note, though, that the records of the Amen-Ra Temple in Edinburgh were destroyed in 1900/01. I have recently (July 2014) discovered that some records of the Horus Temple at Bradford have survived, though most have not; however those that have survived are not yet accessible to the public.

For the history of the GD during the 1890s I usually use Ellic Howe's The Magicians of the Golden Dawn: A Documentary History of a Magical Order 1887-1923. Published Routledge and Kegan Paul 1972. Foreword by Gerald Yorke. Howe is a historian of printing rather than of magic; he also makes no claims to be a magician himself, or even an occultist. He has no axe to grind.

Family history: freebmd; ancestry.co.uk (census and probate); findmypast.co.uk; familysearch; Burke's Peerage and Baronetage; Burke's Landed Gentry; Armorial Families; thepeerage.com; and a wide variety of family trees on the web.

Famous-people sources: mostly about men, of course, but very useful even for the female members of GD. Oxford Dictionary of National Biography. Who Was Who. Times Digital Archive.

Useful source for business and legal information: London Gazette and its Scottish counterpart Edinburgh Gazette. Now easy to find (with the right search information) on the web.

Catalogues: British Library; Freemasons' Library.

Wikipedia; Google; Google Books - my three best resources. I also used other web pages, but with some caution, as - from the historian's point of view - they vary in quality a great deal.

Find the web pages of Roger Wright and Sally Davis, including my list of people initiated into the Order of the Golden Dawn between 1888 and 1901, at:

www.wrightanddavis.co.uk

***

Evelyn Diana Sheffield was initiated into the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn at its Isis-Urania temple in London on 14 June 1901; she's one of the latest initiates on my list. She chose the Latin motto 'Vires animat veritas'. By 1901 the GD's record-keeping was at a low ebb so it's not possible to tell whether Evelyn made it to the inner, 2nd Order. When the GD turned into its two daughter orders in 1903, she didn't join either of those orders.

Introduction by Sally Davis, 9 April 2015.

I was really struggling to find anything out about Evelyn's family background and what she'd been doing until she came across the GD. Now I know why! Evelyn Diana Sheffield - claiming to be a member of the aristocratic Turnour family - was not at all what she seemed! In December 2014 I was contacted by her distant relation Tony Martin, who sent me two articles he'd written about Eliza Dinah Fairchild. I've decided that I can't do better than to reproduce them below, with Tony's permission. At the end of the two articles I've just added some very basic family history details; which I certainly wouldn't have found if Tony hadn't contacted me and told me who Evelyn Diana Sheffield really was.

ELIZA DINAH FAIRCHILD, BETTER KNOWN AS EVELYN DIANA SHEFFIELD:

Tony Martin's articles, sent to me by email in December 2014:

ARTICLE ONE: My Fair Lady

My grandfather had a cousin Eliza Dinah Fairchild born in 1856 in Southampton. Her father was a ship's steward and at some stage Eliza moved to London as a barmaid. My distant cousin and fellow ancestry researcher, Kate Parker, discovered that in July 1877 Eliza married Henry Digby Sheffield, younger brother of Robert 5th Baronet Sheffield, which makes her the great, great aunt of Samantha Cameron. By this marriage she also became the sister-in-law of the Dowager Countess of Ilchester. Yet there was no hint of this remarkable event in my father's comprehensive record "Your Family and Mine" which he produced in the 1970's. She had been completely airbrushed out by the previous generations.

Shaw's Pygmalion story is well known and Eliza's story mimics but predates it. Henry Higgins manages to change Eliza Doolittle into a convincing Lady. Eliza Dinah Fairchild was a 20 year old London barmaid when she married Henry Digby Sheffield the 44 year old brother of Robert 5th Baronet Sheffield. He then successfully re-invented her as Evelyn Diana Turnour, daughter of the Vicomtesse D'Lardio, born in Spain. This information appeared in his alumni record for Trinity College, Oxford and in Burke's Peerage.

Both Kate and myself were intrigued by this story and were desperate to find out what happened to Henry and Evelyn. The answers came from an unexpected source – The Black Sheep index which I checked online and found that Evelyn Diana Sheffield was listed. From the Index I received a copy of The News of The World for 26th February 1905 which related the breach of promise case which Evelyn brought against the Marquess Townshend.

The article was a goldmine of information. After their marriage in 1877 the couple had left the country. They travelled in the U.S.A and Canada "shooting big game and fishing for big fish". Henry Digby died in October 1888 in Jacksonville Florida. Evelyn was in England at the time of his death. Her name was subsequently linked with several men and in 1889 was the companion of a Mr Garden in Ireland "she being such a good rider to hounds". Mr Garden died in 1892 leaving property to Mrs Sheffield valued at £7000.

In 1900 Evelyn took a house in Bassett Road, North Kensington. In 1903 she was introduced to the Marquess of Townshend. "They took a liking to each other and frequently met. But wherever they went Evelyn did all the paying. "She was regarded as a wealthy woman; she lived in a good house, well furnished, and had good pictures around her". On September 16th the Marquess proposed marriage. He was 38 and she was 48 but purported to be much younger.

In reality both were deluded about the other. Townshend needed a rich wife to restore the family fortunes and Evelyn wanted wealth and a title to confirm her place in society. Both were soon disabused. Townshend discovered that that Evelyn was not as rich as she appeared and it was clear to Evelyn that she was not rich enough to meet Townshend's needs. The offer of marriage was withdrawn on the grounds "that the plaintiff was an adventuress and a clairvoyant and otherwise unfit to become Marchioness". Evelyn was undeterred and sued for breach of promise and to defend her reputation. It was a reckless decision given her origins and history.

The court case ran through the details of her exotic pedigree and her many liaisons much to the amusement of the crowded court. Evelyn must have been mortified judging by the portrait produced by the newspaper artist for the subsequent newspaper report. Evelyn's counsel had established the breach of promise but was suddenly interrupted by her solicitor who instructed him to stop the case. Townshend's counsel then started to make a statement –"that her connections, her marriage, her birth and her property are a tissue of lies. We have certificates, which show that she was the daughter of a respectable servant in a respectable family. Her father and mother kept a small public house in Southampton, and she was a barmaid in London..." The Judge then stopped further revelations and judgement was entered for the defendant Townshend.

For Evelyn the loss of the case must have been a disaster as apart from the legal costs her reputation and place in society had been totally lost. The case had been madness but perhaps her assumed identity had become real to her and she was living proof that who dares wins until finally losing when it really mattered. Her story raises many intriguing questions. Why for instance did the 44 year old Henry Sheffield marry a 20 year old barmaid when to do so was social suicide. Judging by the marriage and subsequent success with men of substance she was a desirable companion, a sporting lady who played the part to perfection. Some pass through life with little fuss or incident but for a barmaid from Southampton her improbable marriage and life of travel and good living was amazing. Eliza Dinah denied her humble origins and lived a life and background entirely of her own making. Eliza Doolittle could hardly have done better.

After the marriage she would have been an embarrassment to her husband's family and thereafter she sought to distance herself from her own family. After 1905 there was no going back as respectability was so important in those times and once cut off it was for good, never to be mentioned again. Skeletons were kept firmly in the closet. I found her in the 1911 census in Bromley with the occupation "medical" which I believe referred to nursing. She appeared at the same address in the 1916 Kellys after which nothing. Finally, in March 2011, I located and obtained her Death certificate. She died in Lewisham in 1942 aged 86. The certificate was made out in the name "Eliza" Sheffield which would have annoyed her greatly.

Tony Martin

Quotations are from the News of The World article dated 26/2/1905

ARTICLE TWO: The Improbable Life & Times of Eliza Fairchild originally published 2011 in LostCousins which you can see online at lostcousins.com

Eliza Dinah Fairchild was born in Southampton in 1856. In 1877 she married Henry Digby Sheffield brother of the 5th Baronet Sheffield. She later sued the Marquess Townshend for breach of promise in 1905. The story won the Federation of Family History Society's 2011 competition and was published in Your Family History magazine. The transformation of barmaid Eliza into society lady Evelyn mimics but pre-dates Shaw's Pygmalion / My Fair Lady so a strong case can be made that Eliza Fairchild could have been the original inspiration for Eliza Doolittle and Shaw's play.

With family history the research must always continue because there is always more to be discovered. In the case of Eliza, or "Evelyn" the persona she so successfully adopted, the research reveals an even more bizarre and improbable story. After the article was published I connected with Evelyn's great great nephew, Ian Fairchild, through Lost Cousins and together with distant cousin Kate Parker, who originally found Eliza's story, we continued to trawl all sources.

The most productive source for Evelyn's life after the death of her husband in 1888 was the News of The World report on the 1905 law suit against the Marquess. In the article it mentioned Sir John Sebright someone she looked on as her guardian. Later in the piece it mentions- "she was regarded as a wealthy woman: she lived in a good house, well furnished, and had good pictures around her". The source of her pictures is probably explained by the will of Sir John who died in 1890. He went bankrupt in 1887 with debts of more than £140,000, a colossal sum for the time. In his will which covered nominal assets Evelyn was left £500 and his photographs, pictures and albums. Sir John's widow was not left destitute, however, because it was reported that his life was insured for £140,000. Sir John's grandfather the 7th baronet bred the highly decorative "Sebright Bantam".

Another gentleman mentioned in the News of The World was a Mr Tallerman who Evelyn was "very friendly with". I found nothing on Mr Tallerman until I chanced upon a patent application, dated 1894, in the name Tallerman and Sheffield in Victoria, Australia, for some medical equipment. Given Evelyn's society background I thought this bizarre and unlikely but once again truth was stranger than fiction.

Lewis Abraham Tellerman was born in London in 1845. He was in business with his older brother Daniel trading as S D & LA Tallerman Colonial & Export Merchants. Daniel was in Australia between 1853 & 68 and developed a method for preserving and transporting meat in cold storage. He returned to London introduced cheap restaurants and penny dinners to popularise Australian meat. His brother Lewis also spent part of the 1870s in Australia. On his return about 1880 he developed and patented the Tallerman-Sheffield Hot Air Treatment of Disease for treating rheumatic-gout type conditions with super-heated air. The Tallerman-Sheffield Dry Air bath was tested successfully in 1894 at St Barts hospital and then taken up by that and other London hospitals spreading to Paris, Berlin, Baden Baden and Philadelphia. He also ensured that the treatment was available for free for the treatment of the sick and disabled poor. Evelyn's patent contribution is unknown.

Lewis Tallerman died in 1903 at the Langham Hotel. He seems to have been quite a character. He was a Director of the Gaeity Theatre in London and died suddenly at the conclusion of a dinner party he had hosted for his friends at the Langham. In 1911 Evelyn was living in Bromley and her occupation is listed as medical. It would be nice to think that she was a private practitioner of the Tallerman-Sheffield Hot Air treatment but sadly there is no confirmation available at present.

Evelyn's main benefactor mentioned in the News of The World was John Lewis Garden, 1833-1891, a Suffolk landowner. Given the improbable connections discovered concerning Evelyn's other benefactors I decided to check him out in detail. I was not disappointed. Research showed that Mr Garden was the estranged husband of Princess Caroline Murat the great granddaughter of Joachim Murat, King of Naples, the husband of Napoleon's sister, Caroline. The Garden marriage was not a happy one and the couple lived apart. According to the court report when he died in 1892 Mr Garden left property to Mrs Sheffield valued at £7000. At a time when many people were living on £1 a week that was a huge sum.

The 1861 census shows John Garden staying at Fentons hotel in St James's St London. According to The News of the World report which is a blend of reliable facts and Evelyn's invented origins she met her husband, Henry Digby Sheffield, when he lived in St James's. All the main men in her life appear to have known each other and shared a similar life style. It is entirely plausible that Eliza was employed in an establishment such as Fentons Hotel which has several barmaids listed in the census returns. It will be interesting to see what further research reveals. I am sure she will not disappoint us.

By Tony Martin.

THE BASIC FAMILY HISTORY INFORMATION:

Eliza Dinah Fairchild: birth registered Southampton in the quarter October-December 1856.

Census information 1861 and 1871 indicates she was the daughter of George Frampton Fairchild and his wife Eliza Dinah née Johnson.

Sources for Eliza Dinah Fairchild's husband, Henry Digby Sheffield:

Web pages johnmadjackfuller.homestead.com have a detailed genealogy of the Digby/Sheffield family. Henry Digby Sheffield is the younger son of Sir Robert Sheffield, 4th baronet, of Normanby, Burton Stather Lincolnshire and his wife Julia Brigida née Newbolt. Baptised 27 February 1833.

Website www.thepeerage.com uses Burke's as its main source: it describes Henry Digby Sheffield as marrying Evelyn Diana Turner (sic) Fairchild on 7 July 1877 and gives Henry Digby Sheffield's date of death as 22 October 1888.

Website www.craycroftspeerage.co.uk confirms that Henry Digby Sheffield and wife Evelyn Diana had no children. By marrying Henry Digby Sheffield, Eliza found herself with in-laws who were in the peerage: her husband's younger sister Sophia Penelope had married William Fox-Strangways 4th Earl of Ilchester.

SHEFFIELD v TOWNSHEND

The trial was a sensation, reported by every major newspaper including many in other countries. The account in the Times of Friday 24 February 1905 p3 and Saturday 25 February 1905 p15 is an easy one to find.

For the financial troubles of the Marquis Townshend, search online using 'townshend' and 'sheffield' to find: //query.nytimes.com

Evelyn Diana and her husband had gone to some trouble to concoct a background for her that sounded plausibly aristocratic while being almost impossible to verify. Putting Evelyn Diana's case at the beginning of Sheffield v Townshend, her barrister said that she had been born in Cádiz, Spain, the daughter of Commander Edward G Turnour RN and his Spanish wife; and that she had been orphaned in childhood. THE TURNOUR FAMILY really did exist, and 'edward' was a common name in the family.

Lodge's Peerage and Baronetage 1857 edition, p601 the Turnour family are earls of Winterton.

Plantagenet Roll of the Blood Royal: Isabel of Essex Volume p146 also has an entry for them.

A BIT MORE ABOUT LOUIS TALLERMAN'S INVENTION:

The Tallerman-Sheffield Patent Localized Hot-Air Bath. London: Baillière, Tindall and Cox 1895.

And try looking on the web for the patents.

AND MY 'basic sources' SECTION THOUGH IT'S NOT SO RELEVANT IN THIS CASE AS I DIDN'T DO ANY OF THE WORK!

BASIC SOURCES I USED for all Golden Dawn members.

Membership of the Golden Dawn: The Golden Dawn Companion by R A Gilbert.

Northampton: The Aquarian Press 1986. Between pages 125 and 175, Gilbert lists the names, initiation dates and addresses of all those people who became members of the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn or its many daughter Orders between 1888 and 1914. The list is based on the Golden Dawn's administrative records and its Members' Roll - the large piece of parchment on which all new members signed their name at their initiation. All this information had been inherited by Gilbert but it's now in the Freemasons' Library at the United Grand Lodge of England building on Great Queen Street Covent Garden. Please note, though, that the records of the Amen-Ra Temple in Edinburgh were destroyed in 1900/01. I have recently (July 2014) discovered that some records of the Horus Temple at Bradford have survived, though most have not; however those that have survived are not yet accessible to the public.

For the history of the GD during the 1890s I usually use Ellic Howe's The Magicians of the Golden Dawn: A Documentary History of a Magical Order 1887-1923. Published Routledge and Kegan Paul 1972. Foreword by Gerald Yorke. Howe is a historian of printing rather than of magic; he also makes no claims to be a magician himself, or even an occultist. He has no axe to grind.

Family history: freebmd; ancestry.co.uk (census and probate); findmypast.co.uk; familysearch; Burke's Peerage and Baronetage; Burke's Landed Gentry; Armorial Families; thepeerage.com; and a wide variety of family trees on the web.

Famous-people sources: mostly about men, of course, but very useful even for the female members of GD. Oxford Dictionary of National Biography. Who Was Who. Times Digital Archive.

Useful source for business and legal information: London Gazette and its Scottish counterpart Edinburgh Gazette. Now easy to find (with the right search information) on the web.

Catalogues: British Library; Freemasons' Library.

Wikipedia; Google; Google Books - my three best resources. I also used other web pages, but with some caution, as - from the historian's point of view - they vary in quality a great deal.

Copyright TONY MARTIN and SALLY DAVIS

9 April 2015

Sally Davis's email is at:

Amandragora@attglobal.net

I can forward messages to Tony Martin.

Find the web pages of Roger Wright and Sally Davis, including my list of people initiated into the Order of the Golden Dawn between 1888 and 1901, at:

http:pws.prserv.net/Roger\_Wright/

***

Alpheus Butts Simmons was initiated into the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn at its Isis-Urania temple in July 1894. No motto was noted down for him in the GD's records, and his address was given only as "United States"; so it was pretty clear that he was not expected to be an active member.

UPDATE, MARCH 2015

My original biography of Alpheus Butts Simmons was two sentences long, I think! The GD archives gave his address as "United States" - and that was all I could find out! However, things have moved on a very little since then, especially on google. I've been prodded to try again with Butts Simmons by Adam P Forrest of Portland Oregon, who recently sent me two short obituaries of Alpheus Butts Simmons that he'd found on the web. So here is what we know now.

THE BUTTS SIMMONS FAMILIES OF GEORGIA USA

There's a very detailed family history website (for the full name see the Sources section) from which I think I can safely say that Alpheus Butts Simmons was descended from two prominent families long resident in the state of Georgia. The Butts family could trace its ancestors back to a Josiah Butts who had been born in Kent, England, in 1692; and the forename 'alpheus' was traditional in the family. The Butts and Simmons families had inter-married several times in the early 19th-century. Though I couldn't find on the website either mention of the GD's Alpheus Butts Simmons or any two people who might have been his parents, I think the GD's Alpheus must be on the family trees somewhere.

ALPHEUS BUTTS SIMMONS' LIFE

According to his obituaries (all of which were infuriatingly brief) Alpheus Butts Simmons was born on 19 October 1864 in Irwinton, Wilkinson County, Georgia. He studied medicine at the University of Georgia at Atlanta and graduated in 1884. He will then have spent several years gaining experience in general practice; but he probably also spent them learning about and practising electro-therapeutics. Electrotherapeutics is the use of electricity to treat illness. It has a longer history than you would think: a very quick search of the web showed reference books for doctors being published as early as 1874. An English translation of lectures given by a professor in Leipzig, presumably to medical students, was published in New York in 1883 and might have been a work that Alpheus read and used. Although electrotherapy is used for other purposes as well, it's most notorious as electro-convulsive therapy.

Alpheus set up in private practice in Savannah Georgia in 1889, presumably mainly as a GP but also as a practitioner using electro-therapeutics to treat patients diagnosed as having psychosis or neurosis. He joined the American Electro-Therapeutics Association in 1891, the year it was founded. He retired from his medical practice several years before his death. He died at Little Forest, Chatham County, on 11 February 1915 of a cerebral haemorrhage. There's no mention in the obituaries of a marriage and my instinct tells me he never married.

THE FREEMASONS IN GEORGIA

It's clear from the Butts-Simmons family history website that the men in both families had a tradition of becoming prominent freemasons in Georgia: a list of members of the Georgia Grand Lodge, from 1854, has many Butts and Simmons in it. It would have been a natural thing for another member of both families to get involved in freemasonry, and Alpheus was initiated into Zerubbabel Lodge number 15, based in Savannah, in 1890; and into the Alpha Lodge of Perfection in 1891, when he was still only in his twenties. He served as Zerubbabel Lodge number 15's Worshipful Master twice. Although many freemasons didn't take their involvement in freemasonry any further than being members of their local lodge or lodges, Alpheus became very committed, perhaps to the extent that his duties as a freemason became more important than his work as a doctor. He was a royal arch mason. But his main commitment seems to have been to the Georgia Knights Templar.

Alpheus was knighted into the Palestine Commandery of the Knights Templar in November 1892 and served as its commander in 1897. The fact that he became a Knight Templar tells you something about Alpheus' religious beliefs. Whereas the GD (for example) required only a belief in a supreme Being, to be a Knight Templar you had to profess to be a Christian; so that it's very likely that Alpheus was a regular church-goer. He was elected Georgia's grand sword bearer in 1902 and thereby became a member of the Georgia Grand Commandery's governing body. The Grand Commandery held its 49th conclave in Savannah in 1910, the year that Alpheus was serving as its Grand Commander. His photograph appears on the front cover of the conclave's Proceedings - a slight, rather dapper man, without the engulfing beard that was fashionable at the time, looking very young - as indeed he was, especially to serve as one of freemasonry's higher officials.

ALPHEUS, RICHARD JOSEPH NUNN AND THE GOLDEN DAWN

How did a doctor who spent virtually all his life in the USA get initiated into the GD? I can't actually prove that Alpheus ever even came to England, and yet he was initiated. The answer is: Alpheus knew GD member Richard Joseph Nunn. On the face of it, they might not look like men who knew each other well: they were born one generation apart (Nunn was born in 1831) and whereas Alpheus was a member of families who had been living in Georgia for at least a century, Nunn had only arrived there from Ireland in 1851. However, these obstacles to any acquaintanceship were outweighed by the things the two men had in common. They were both physicians in general practice in Savannah; and as doctors they both took an interest in new methods of treatment - they were both members of the American Electro-therapeutic Association. The main interest that connected them, however, was freemasonry and its offshoots. Although I cannot prove it beyond all doubt, I believe that, like Alpheus, Nunn was a member of the Zerubbabel Lodge number 15. And Nunn was definitely a member of the Georgia Knights Templar, possibly one of its founders; so in becoming a senior member of the order himself, Alpheus was following a path first trodden by Nunn.

Richard Nunn was one of the earliest GD members, being initiated in November 1889 during a visit to London. I believe that when Alpheus was preparing for a trip to England (the one I suggest he must have made in 1894) Nunn gave him letters of introduction to senior freemasons that he had met there, one of whom was GD founder William Wynn Westcott. Both men will have brought with them to England an experience of a type of freemasonry not well understood by English freemasons - the Scottish rite.

Alpheus was a member of Georgia's Alpha Lodge of Perfection; Richard Nunn was almost certainly a member as well but I don't have actual evidence in his case. The lodge was founded in 1888, the first in Georgia to use the Scottish Rite. And the Scottish Rite had what seems to me (as a non-freemason and non-occultist) a peculiar fascination for British freemasons. There's a detailed wikipedia page on its history which I'll paraphrase here. Influential books in the 18th and 19th centuries had claimed that Charles II, James II and James II's son the Old Pretender had all been initiated into the Rite in their exiles. There's no historical evidence for the claims, but they gave the Rite a romantic and dramatic aura; having lost, in the intervening centuries, any suggestion of treasonable political leanings. The historical evidence shows the Rite starting out in mid-18th century France before travelling via the West Indies and New Orleans to the southern states of America. It was codified at a conference held in May 1801 in Charleston, South Carolina, when the 33 degrees of which it currently consists were established, and a hierarchy set up to rule the lodges who used it. The Rite thus constituted then travelled back across the Atlantic and into Europe. Though the Rite has never been recognised by English freemasonry's governing body, the United Grand Lodge of England, individual members of English lodges are allowed to get involved with lodges that use the Rite, if they choose.

Their membership of the Knights Templar was another factor which linked Richard Nunn, Alpheus and William Wynn Westcott. A E Waite's book The Secret Tradition in Freemasonry wasn't published until 1937 but he had been studying the 18th-century manuscripts on which it was based for decades; and it probably represents ideas that were widely understood to be true by late 19th century freemasons. Waite was a knight templar himself. The earliest evidence he could find for the existence of the "Rites of Strict Observance" (on which knightly orders including the templars were based) was contained in papers written by members of a group called the Martinists, who were active in late 18th-century Lyons. However, he and other members of the templars wanted to believe that the Martinists had merely been the first to write down rites that had been formulated by the medieval templars before the order was banned; and had been passed down verbally, in secret, ever since. Waite saw the order as combining Christianity and a modern version of medieval chivalry. Perhaps this high-minded and serious approach to the obligations of freemasonry was what appealed to Alpheus Butts Simmons about the templars.

Westcott may not have had quite that level of religious fervour that many Knights Templar had; he was just interested in all of freemasonry's sub-divisions and got himself initiated wherever he could. However, he was happy to meet another senior Knight, and to offer him the same compliment he had paid Richard Nunn - initiation into the GD. The fact that Alpheus never even got as far as choosing himself a motto or giving a full address does indicate that he was not going to follow up his GD initiation in any way: the GD's administrators were not expecting to need to write to him at all.

Alpheus also followed Richard Nunn in becoming a corresponding member of the English freemasons' lodge Quatuor Coronati 2076 at about the same time as his GD initiation; but by 1900 he had allowed that to lapse as well. Clearly he preferred to focus on his work with freemasonry in his home state.

The other group of GD members who might have known of Alpheus Butts Simmons are the GD's medical practitioners, who all seem to have known each other through their interest in the use of alternative treatments to tackle conditions not susceptible to conventional medical approaches. However, I do think that via Westcott's contacts in freemasonry was the more likely route.

BASIC SOURCES I USED for all Golden Dawn members.

Membership of the Golden Dawn: The Golden Dawn Companion by R A Gilbert. Northampton: The Aquarian Press 1986. Between pages 125 and 175, Gilbert lists the names, initiation dates and addresses of all those people who became members of the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn or its many daughter Orders between 1888 and 1914. The list is based on the Golden Dawn's administrative records and its Members' Roll - the large piece of parchment on which all new members signed their name at their initiation. All this information had been inherited by Gilbert but it's now in the Freemasons' Library at the United Grand Lodge of England building on Great Queen Street Covent Garden. Please note, though, that the records of the Amen-Ra Temple in Edinburgh were destroyed in 1900/01. I have recently (July 2014) discovered that some records of the Horus Temple at Bradford have survived, though most have not; however those that have survived are not yet accessible to the public.

For the history of the GD during the 1890s I usually use Ellic Howe's The Magicians of the Golden Dawn: A Documentary History of a Magical Order 1887-1923. Published Routledge and Kegan Paul 1972. Foreword by Gerald Yorke. Howe is a historian of printing rather than of magic; he also makes no claims to be a magician himself, or even an occultist. He has no axe to grind.

Family history: freebmd; ancestry.co.uk (census and probate); findmypast.co.uk; familysearch; Burke's Peerage and Baronetage; Burke's Landed Gentry; Armorial Families; thepeerage.com; and a wide variety of family trees on the web.

Famous-people sources: mostly about men, of course, but very useful even for the female members of GD. Oxford Dictionary of National Biography. Who Was Who. Times Digital Archive.

Useful source for business and legal information: London Gazette and its Scottish counterpart Edinburgh Gazette. Now easy to find (with the right search information) on the web.

Catalogues: British Library; Freemasons' Library.

Wikipedia; Google; Google Books - my three best resources. I also used other web pages, but with some caution, as - from the historian's point of view - they vary in quality a great deal.

BUTTS AND SIMMONS

The family history website is at rolodafile.com/daniell-ditmore/f46.htm

There are transcriptions of contemporary documents in it including the 1854 list of Grand Lodge members.

Spotted on the web: there are Butts and Simmons family cemeteries in Hancock County Georgia; but I note that Alpheus Butts Simmons was not buried in either of them.

Also spotted on the web: people with the surnames Butts Simmons, living in Georgia now.

At www.findagrave.com an entry for Alpheus Butts Simmons who is in Bonaventure Cemetery, Savannah. A photo of headstone confirms the year of birth and year of death. However, the website says he died in Montgomery Alabama, which contradicts all the obituaries, such as they are.

AS A DOCTOR

Transactions of the American Electro-therapeutic Association issued 1891. Alpheus Butts Simmons is on its list of members.

Early publications on electrotherapeutics:

Electro-Therapeutics by David Francis Lincoln. H C Lea 1874.

Via archive.org to Hand-book of Electro-Therapeutics translation into English by I Putzel MD of lectures given in German by Dr Wilhelm Erb of Leipzig. New York: William Wood and Co 1883.

Practical Electro Therapeutics by William Francis Hutchinson 1888.

The Journal of Electro-Therapeutics was in its 18th volume by 1900.

FREEMASONRY IN GEORGIA

Transactions.. Of the Supreme Council of the 33rd and Last Degree of the Southern Jurisdiction (of the Scottish Rite) of the USA. Issued 1897 by the House of the Temple: p134.

Tableau of Members issued by the Southern Jurisdiction of the House of the Temple 1910. On p10 in a list of current members Alpheus Butts Simmons of Savannah is 2nd, after Joseph C Greenfield of Atlanta.

QUATUOR CORONATI 2076 which was founded to provide a forum and publishing medium for research on the history of freemasonry.

Butts Simmons is not on the list of corresponding members given in Ars Quatuor Coronatorum volume VII 1894, so he must have joined after that time.

Ars Quatuor Coronatorum volume XIII 1900. Endpapers: Alpheus Butts Simmons was now missing from the list of corresponding members.

THE KNIGHTS TEMPLAR

Proceedings of the Grand Commandery of Knights Templar for the State of Georgia at the 49th Annual Grand Conclave held in the City of Savannah, Georgia May 11, 12, and 13, A.D. 1910, A.O. 792: p3 - a short biography of Alpheus as the current Grand Commander. Found by Adam Forrest and sent to me February 2015 by email.

The Secret Tradition in Freemasonry by A E Waite. London: Rider and Co 1937: pp305-310; p311; p321.

A E Waite: Selected Masonic Papers edited and with an introduction by Edward Dunning. Wellingborough: Thorson Publishing Group's Aquarian Press 1988: p73, p97.

AND SEE MY BIOGRAPHY OF RICHARD JOSEPH NUNN

THE OBITUARIES WHICH PROBABLY ALL HAVE THE SAME SOURCE

Journal of the American Medical Association volume 64 part 2 1915 p1778. Also found and sent to me by Adam Forrest February 2015.

Proceedings... of the Grand Commandery Knights Templar of Michigan, issued 1915: p120

8 September 2015

Email me at

Find the web pages of Roger Wright and Sally Davis, including my list of people initiated into the Order of the Golden Dawn between 1888 and 1901, at:

<http://www.wrightanddavis.co.uk>

***

Alice Isabel Simpson was initiated into the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn at its Isis-Urania temple in London on 12 July 1895. Francis Freeman, George Cecil Jones, William Forsell Kirby and John Herbert Slater were also initiated on that day though I don't think Alice Isabel knew any of them. Alice Isabel chose the Latin motto 'Perseverantia et cura quies'; as this was cumbersome it was usually shortened to Perseverantia. She was initiated into the GD's 2nd, inner order on 27 May 1899.

Alice Isabel seems to be called Amy by her family and close friends; but I think I'll stick with Alice Isabel.

Alice Isabel's daughters Elaine Mary and Alice Beatrice (known as Beatrice) were also initiated into the GD, Elaine in 1897 and Beatrice in 1899. Aleister Crowley met Alice Isabel and Elaine Mary after he was initiated in 1898, and they became acquainted - I won't say 'friendly'. After the incidents known to GD-studiers as the battle of Blythe Road, Alice Isabel and Elaine were cast out of the GD in April 1900 by its newly-formed governing committee. Beatrice Simpson was not cast out but her position as a member must have looked pretty untenable after the expulsions. The evidence may have been lost, but I haven't found any indication that Alice Isabel challenged the ruling; she had other things on her mind at the time.

Many years later, in his Confessions, Aleister Crowley described Alice Isabel thus: "a sixth-rate singer, a first-rate snob, with dewlaps and a paunch; a match-maker, mischief-maker, maudlin and muddle-headed." He did actually stop short of identifying her by name, but all the same - what spiteful things to say! Fortunately, the evidence suggests that he didn't say them either to her or about her at the time.

Update September 2014: thanks are due to Clint Warren for this chance to add to Alice Isabel's biography. Clint has access to Crowley's original diaries and as a result I'm able to make some corrections to my account of Alice Isabel in 1900 and 1902. As a result of the information Clint has been sending me, I've also peered more closely at GD documents at the Freemasons' Library concerning the events of April 1900.

A LIFE ON THE MOVE - THE HACKSHAW, THE SUTHERLANDS AND THE HALLS

When John Hall married young widow Lucy Sutherland in the church at Rondebosch, Cape Town in 1848, two people were united who - though British - had spent hardly any of their lives in Britain.

Lucy Campbell Hackshaw had been born in 1817, at sea - which set the tone for a life spent almost continually moving on. She was the eldest child of Harry Hackshaw and his wife Harriet Marion (née Mackay), and I presume the couple were in transit between their house in London and the Hackshaw plantations on the island of St Vincent, West Indies when the birth occurred. In 1836 Lucy married another St Vincent plantation owner, her first cousin Duncan Forbes Sutherland (born 1801). The marriage seems to have been childless, and didn't last very long either: Duncan died in 1844. I don't know how Lucy spent the next four years - perhaps she continued to live in the West Indies - but I think it's likely that she had known John Hall for quite some time when they married. In the course of his working life John had been stationed in the West Indies in the 1820s and again from 1841 to 1844; so he could have known her as a child, and/or when she was married for the first time. I think Lucy Sutherland travelled to the Cape Colony in South Africa to marry him; though she could have moved there before he did.

John Hall was born on the hills of Westmorland in 1795, the son of a farmer (also called John) and his wife Isabella née Fothergill. The younger John studied medicine at Guy's Hospital and St Thomas's Hospital in London. However there was not enough money in the family to fund his undertaking a degree-course in medicine, so John Hall joined the army medical corps, in time to be involved in patching up the wounded of Waterloo in 1815. Thereafter he had a fairly typical army career of being continually moved about: after his first spell in the West Indies, he was stationed in Ireland from 1832-35; and at Gibraltar 1836-37; before returning for his second spell in the West Indies where and when he might have met Duncan and Lucy Sutherland. He then took a year, finally to put some letters after his name, graduating MD from St Andrew's University in 1845. He was sent to the Cape Colony in 1846, where he went on campaign with the governor Sir Harry Smith, who became a loyal friend and was one of the witnesses when John Hall married Lucy. She was 30 on the day of their marriage; he was 52 and hadn't been married before. John and Lucy remained in Cape Town until 1851 and - I think - their daughter Lucia Georgina was born there. Then man, wife and child moved on again, to Bombay where John had been appointed Principal Medical Officer. Alice Isabel was born in December 1852, probably in Bombay. She was christened several months later at Mahabaleshwar, a hill station which was the official residence of the governor of Bombay and his staff during the hot season.

1854 coloured Alice Isabel's life by turning out to be the defining year in John Hall's career: at the outbreak of the Crimean War he was ordered to Turkey as Chief Inspector of Hospitals. The story of the hospitals in the Crimea, the involvement of Florence Nightingale and the reports in the Times are well-known so I won't repeat them. I'll just say that as the most senior British medical officer in the Crimea, John Hall came to stand in the eyes of the British public as a symbol of all that was wrong with medical care there. As is so often the case, it was not any one person's fault that so many men died in such squalor without actually seeing any fighting. As the introduction to a memoir of John Hall's career wrote, serving a government that went to war unprepared was a theme that ran through John Hall's working life. However, the public wanted one person to blame for what happened in the Crimea and that person was John Hall. John Hall did remain in post until 1856 but didn't work for the army medical corps after that, as far as I can see. He was given a knighthood on his retirement, but that was pretty poor compensation for being hung out to dry like he had been.

I don't know where Lucy and her two daughters lived during the years of the Crimean War - I can't believe that they spent them in Turkey - and immediately after the war there are three years completely unaccounted for. I pick up the trail again in 1859 when the family were together again, living in England for what turned out to be the only time, with John Hall on leave or possibly suspended from work. The Halls had hired a house in Dawlish, on England's south coast. However, while they were there, John Hall had a stroke which was probably brought on by the trauma of the past few years. He was due to retire shortly in any case and had been intending to return to India and spend his retirement writing a memoir-cum-apologia, putting his case against the one made so public by Florence Nightingale and her supporters. However, the stroke partly paralysed him. He didn't return to India; and he never wrote his memoir. He wouldn't remain in England though: as much (I imagine) for financial reasons as because of his bitterness about the way he'd been hounded. Instead, he and his family set out on their travels again, through Europe.

As he was a retired officer, John Hall was obliged to live by the War Office rule that he should not stay in any one country longer than two years. His biography doesn't give dates but I've pieced together the following itinerary from it. From Dawlish and when John Hall was able to travel, the Halls went to Paris. Later in her life, Alice Isabel was known for her fluency in foreign languages and Paris is probably where she learned her French. In 1862 the Halls went to Stuttgart where Alice Isabel at least (I'm not so sure about her sister) learned German and music (especially singing). When the two years were up (1864?), they moved to somewhere by Lake Geneva and at this time they may also have spent a few months in the Tyrol. The next move came within the two year allotment, however, and was probably dictated by Lucia Georgina's health. She had always been a delicate child, apparently, but by 1865 (she was about 15) was definitely ill not just delicate. In search of a warm, dry climate for her, the Halls went south to Sicily in 1865, renting a villa on Mt Etna. An outbreak of cholera on the island caused them to retreat to Bellagio on Lake Como, where in the early autumn John Hall suffered a series of heart attacks. They moved once more, to Pisa, in October 1865, perhaps in search of better medical treatment. John Hall died in Pisa on 17 January 1866 and Lucia Georgina died only three months later.

WILLIAM SIMPSON

I don't know where mother and daughter spent the next few years, except to say that they don't appear on the 1861 census in the UK. I imagine they continued to live abroad, because it was in Munich that Alice Isabel Hall married Rev William Simpson in 1873.

Just as Lucy Hackshaw had married two men a generation older than herself, so did Alice Isabel marry a man over 20 years her senior. William Simpson was born in Dublin, probably in 1829, the son of solicitor Robert Simpson. He attended Trinity College Dublin, graduating in 1851, and then went to Durham University to study theology in preparation for a career in the Church of England. He was ordained as a priest by the bishop of Norwich, Samuel Hinds, who was probably a friend of the Simpson family - he'd been in Ireland from 1831 to 1833 as chaplain to the archbishop of Dublin, and had returned in 1843 as prebendary of St Patrick's cathedral, a post he'd held until appointed to the bishopric in 1849. It's just possible that bishop Hinds knew the Hackshaws and the Sutherlands as well as the Simpsons: he had grown up in Barbados where his family owned plantations (and the slaves that went with them, of course - all the families who owned plantations owned slaves until the law freed them). Bishop Hinds was in the anglo-catholic wing of the Church of England and it's clear from his later career that Rev William Simpson shared his high-church preferences.

Bishop Hinds found William Simpson two jobs as a curate in Norfolk immediately after he became a priest: at Wymondham 1851-54 and at Quiddenham from 1854. No more permanent posting as a vicar or rector was forthcoming, however, and in 1857 William Simpson applied to work as a chaplain in India. I think his first Indian appointment was delayed by the Mutiny/First War of Independence, but in 1858 he began work at St George's church in the British cantonments in Agra at the very good salary of £500 per year. While living in Agra, he must surely have known the family of John Clement Lacy, a convert to Christianity from Hinduism who worked as a pharmacist and doctor in the town; John Clement's son John Valentine was a member of the Golden Dawn. No one stayed anywhere for long in India, however, and William Simpson was soon transferred to Kasauli, a hill station near Simla. After a period of leave at the end of the 1860s he was promoted, and transferred again to Mathura (between Delhi and Agra) where Hindu celebrations of the life of Krishna no doubt offended the British residents - the god was alleged to have been born in the town. William Simpson worked in Mathura from 1868 to 1871 and then had another period of leave. It was during this second spell of two years out of India that he and Alice Isabel were married.

However she had spent the last few years, on Alice Isabel's marriage she began another six years of being moved on. When she and William Simpson returned to India after William's leave was over, he was sent to work in Bihar at Bankipore, now a suburb of Patna but in the 19th-century the more important settlement of the two, a centre of British administration and also of an indigo-growing district. They were only stationed there for a few months, however, before William Simpson was moved to Dagshai, a hill station between Simla and Kalka, founded by the East India Company in 1847 as a TB sanatorium. Their two daughters were both born during this posting and baptised at Kasauli, Elaine Mary in April 1875 (although she had been born in February) and Alice Beatrice (known as Beatrice) in August 1877. Both Alice Isabel's daughters have names with romantic/poetic connections: Elaine (a very unusual name for the 19th century) must be named for the young woman who dies of unrequited love in Tennyson's Lancelot and Elaine; and Beatrice for the woman (a real woman, who also died very young) who inspired the poem and appeared to Dante in his Inferno.

Around the time of Beatrice's birth William Simpson was moved back down onto the north Indian plains, to Roorkee on the Ganges canal, where the Bengal engineers' corps had its headquarters and two artillery units were also stationed. This was William Simpson's last real posting in India; in 1877 he was not 50 yet but was possibly in poor health - as many were after service in India. In 1879 he spent a few months working in Allahabad, capital of the United Provinces, but this was clearly a temporary job, as that year he retired, on a full pension. He, Alice Isabel and their daughters left India but I'm not sure where they went immediately afterwards. They are not on the 1881 census. Perhaps they were in Ireland, where William Simpson had relations that Alice Isabel had probably never met; or perhaps they were living somewhere in Europe, where Alice Isabel had spent so much of her life so far. I can only tie them down to the UK in August 1886, when Alice Isabel's son William Arthur John Simpson (known as Arthur) was born in Scotland, where Lucy Hall had lots of relations.

In 1888 William Simpson came out of retirement to take the job of vicar of St John the Evangelist Baillieston, in the east end of Glasgow, a parish with a high-church tradition. On the day of the 1891 census the Simpsons were living at a house transcribed for Ancestry as 'mansion house' but more likely to be 'the manse house' - the Scottish equivalent of the English vicarage or rectory. Alice Isabel was running her household with a cook, a nurse for 4-year-old Arthur, and a housemaid.

It's very likely that Alice Isabel and her husband had decided he should take another Church of England appointment in order to fund their children's education. As the Simpsons didn't have a moneyed background, Arthur in particular was going to have to make his own way in life. Many middle-class families lavished what money they had on the education of their sons but skimmed on the daughters, comforting themselves with the thought that they would marry. Alice Isabel and her husband would have none of that unrealistic attitude; and when it came to Beatrice, that turned out to be a very wise stand to have taken, because Beatrice - the more independent of the daughters - also chose to make her own way in life. Perhaps Alice Isabel would have liked a wider, more systematic education than she had received. For whatever reason, she and Rev William bought some of the best education that was then available for young women. In one of her books, Beatrice says that she had attended "Cheltenham College", by which she must mean Cheltenham Ladies' College. It would be ridiculous and un-motherly for Alice Isabel to favour Beatrice over Elaine in the matter of schooling; so although I have only got evidence for Beatrice, I'm assuming that Elaine was also sent to the College. Cheltenham Ladies' College was founded in 1853 but rose to national if not international prominence after the appointment of Dorothea Beale, the feminist and skilful campaigner for women's education, as its Principal, in 1858.

On the day of the 1891 census it's likely that Elaine and Beatrice were still at school, but they were home for the holidays. Lucy Hall was by this time living in Glasgow too, presumably to be near her daughter and grand-children; she was a boarder in the household of George and Margaret Dick in Kelvinside. A professional lady's companion, Mary Buck, was also boarding there and may have been employed by Lucy Hall to keep her company, though the census data isn't clear on that point.

On the evidence of Crockford's I believe that William Simpson died in 1894 or 1895. I can't find a death registration for him; and the census official in 1901 complicated matters by listing Alice Isabel as a married woman rather than a widowed one. But the circumstantial evidence of the years after 1894 suggests William Simpson died around then: because Lucy Hall and Alice Isabel went on the move again, to London. The choice of London might have been because they would be near Lucy's closest surviving relative, her brother Robert Hackshaw who lived in Croydon with his family. But the main reason was more likely to have been the need to meet the right people and get Alice Isabel's daughters suitably married. Lucy and Alice Isabel were both living on the income from investments held in trust funds and by 1895 they had pooled these resources to set up home together in the house where Aleister Crowley visited them, at 15 Randolph Road in the area to the west of Edgware Road. Several other GD members lived in the district because although it was very convenient for central London, rents there were reasonable.

Alice Isabel was initiated into the GD only a few months after the family moved to London. I don't know who it was that recommended her as a likely candidate, but I think it's safe to say that between them, Lucy Hall and Alice Isabel could muster a wide circle of acquaintances. The habit in both India and South Africa of keeping open house for British travellers; Lucy's large number of Scottish relations; Alice Isabel's musical contacts; her husband's Irish relations and his friends amongst Church of England clergy; friends that Lucy and Alice Isabel had made when living in Europe - the point of GD contact could have come from any of them. On the day of the 1901 census, for example, Lucy and Alice Isabel had both Arthur and Beatrice still living at home; and between them they were entertaining three visitors: Emma Bonsom, who had been born in Ireland and was perhaps a relation of William Simpson; Emma's daughter Daphne Bonsom who had been born in the Cape Colony; and a woman called Margaret whose surname I'm not certain of - it might be Wheat or White - the only person in the household other than the servants who had been born in England. Alice Isabel was running the household with the help of a cook, and a general servant so it's not surprising that she took from July 1895 to May 1899 to do the study necessary to gain initiation into the GD's inner, 2nd Order - where you could (finally) start to do some practical magic rather than just read about it. Despite her busy life she was still keen enough to find time to do the study though; and despite what Crowley said of her, she also had the application and gained enough understanding of subjects like the Kabbalah, tarot and astrology to pass the tests in them set by senior members of the GD. The kind of reading and study matter she brought home with her from GD meetings and rituals obviously inspired Elaine to want to join as well. Elaine was initiated in January 1897 and - not having her mother's household duties to do - made it into the 2nd Order before her, being initiated in March 1899. Even Beatrice got hooked and was initiated into the GD in September 1899; though circumstances meant that she never got the chance to follow up her initiation - circumstances involving Aleister Crowley as I'm sure most readers of this biography will be aware.

One reference to Alice Isabel in the GD archives, and the writings of Aleister Crowley, are the only sources for Crowley's relationship with Alice Isabel Simpson; and Crowley's writings have to be treated with care. The best known of those is the Confessions, part of which (events to 1904) was originally published as The Spirit of Solitude in 1929. The Confessions are meant to be eye-catching and in them Crowley says a great deal that doesn't reflect what he wrote at the time in his diaries: extracts from the diaries in emails sent me by Clint Warren make that very clear. Some of the diaries can be seen at the website www.lashtal.com/wiki/Aleister\_Crowley\_Timeline. Lashtal looks to be based on his notes and magical/appointment diaries and so has information written at the time that Crowley was a GD member; but it's a magick/Crowley website and a lot of what Crowley wrote about his period in the GD has been edited out.

Crowley does not explain when and how he became acquainted with Alice Isabel and her daughters. My guess is that they didn't know him at all before he was initiated into the GD in November 1898; and Clint Warren - with better knowledge than I have of Crowley's contemporary acquaintances - is inclined to agree. It's clear from the writings I've mentioned above, that Crowley did not think any of the Simpsons could help him get what he wanted from the GD: initiation as quickly as possible into its 2nd Order. With that purpose in mind, he focused his time and effort on George Cecil Jones and Allan Bennett to the exclusion of all other GD members. However, he did call on the Simpsons, something he couldn't have done without an invitation, though the invitation may have come from Elaine rather than Alice Isabel. He may have become sufficiently friendly to be invited to musical evenings in the house - though when he calls Alice Isabel a sixth-rate singer he may just be making it up, he may never have heard her sing.

In The Confessions, Crowley excuses his nasty summing-up of Alice Isabel by saying that she had “put it all round London and New York that I had entered her daughter’s room at night in my Body of Light”. In The Spirit of Solitude the fact that there were rumours is mentioned twice - once when Crowley mentions them running through the GD in London in the early part of 1900; and once when dealing with later events. Only the second mention accuses Alice Isabel of starting them. If he accused her of starting them in 1900, he doesn’t say so; and Crowley’s and Alice Isabel’s actions in 1902 suggest that he didn’t.

If there were rumours along those lines, they would only have had an real impact in magical circles: Crowley accuses Alice Isabel of suggesting that he was going into Elaine’s room as an astral traveller; not that he was going into Elaine’s room in person. Crowley says he was offended by the rumours - which is rich, coming from him. In The Spirit of Solitude, however, he seems to be offended more on Elaine Simpson’s account than his own. He makes a good point, too: “Even had the tale been true” he says, “the woman (that’s Alice Isabel) must have been as witless as she was worthless to splash her own daughter with such ditch-water”. I must say, I find it increasingly difficult to imagine Alice Isabel rumour-mongering on the subject of her daughter’s relationship with a young man; it would have been so counter-productive. If the relationship between her daughter and Crowley had gone beyond what was acceptable to contemporary mores, surely she would have wanted the fact kept very very quiet? It seems she did ask Crowley and Elaine whether the rumours were true: more the action of someone who had heard rumours, than someone who had started them. Both Crowley and Elaine denied the rumours, of course, leaving Alice Isabel in a difficult position with regard to any continuing relationship between them.

It’s more difficult to sort out the business of the rumours because they are tangled up in Crowley’s mind (and consequently in his writings) with the struggle to take possession of the GD’s 2nd Order rooms at 36 Blythe Road; with Crowley acting for Samuel Liddell Mathers, against senior GD members in London who were trying to act independently of Mathers. There are also some slight inconsistencies between Crowley’s two accounts of Alice Isabel’s part in what happened, but both agree that it wasn’t an active one, she didn’t go beyond offering Crowley an initial moral support, which she later withdrew. On Sunday 8 April 1900 Crowley visited her and Elaine before leaving for Paris, where he intended to be initiated into the 2nd Order by Mathers, having been refused initiation by senior members in London. Both Alice Isabel and Elaine pledged their support for the plan he outlined to them that day, in which he to would take possession of the 2nd Order rooms as Mathers’ agent and make all the 2nd Order members swear personal allegiance to Mathers.

Having obtained the initiation and Mathers’ approval for what he was going to do, Crowley returned to London on Friday 13 April. On Monday 16 April he called at the Simpsons’ house to put them in the picture. This, I think, was a difficult and important meeting for Alice Isabel. She began to have seriously cold feet about the plan as described to her this time, perhaps because it had expanded since she’d last heard it. It now included some changes to the rituals, that hadn’t been mooted before. And it also demanded that all GD members in London be required to meet Crowley in person and swear their allegiance to Mathers; the original plan was to have involved only the 2nd Order members. Whether Crowley told Alice Isabel that these allegiance-swearing interviews were going to take place in her house, isn’t clear. Elaine certainly knew they were; but may not have made it plain to her mother. One way or another, though, Alice Isabel got alarmed, and either at this meeting or one shortly afterwards, Crowley reacted by treating her as hostile. When Crowley wrote his account of 1900 many years later, he implied that he put Alice Isabel through all the questions and demands for loyalty (though not the revised rituals) that he was intending to make all the GD members submit to; though this seems to have been an exaggeration. In any case, Crowley seems to have been satisfied enough with any replies that Alice Isabel may have made, so she must have convinced him of her continuing loyalty to Mathers as the GD's only leader.

According to The Confessions, it was Alice Isabel who told Crowley the reason why the London 2nd Order members had voted to refuse to initiate him; which was, that the 2nd Order suspected him of using the sex act to gain magical power - a well-known magical technique but a deeply controversial subject within the GD. Can this be true? - in 1900, a young man and an older woman who are not related - not even all that well-acquainted - discussing the use of sex as an aid to magical ritual? I suppose it can, though I have my doubts; though if this was what was being said about Crowley within the GD, it would certainly give Alice Isabel good cause for being very anxious about how friendly Elaine and Crowley were becoming. However, it may not have been true: in the (much earlier) The Spirit of Solitude Crowley gives a completely different reason for the refusal, a much more mundane one: jealousy of Crowley's quick progress from initiate to the GD, to initiate of the 2nd Order. He doesn't say whether it was Alice Isabel or someone else entirely who told him this reason.

Perhaps originally Crowley had been thinking that Alice Isabel would go with him to take possession of the 2nd Order rooms. Once she had started to doubt what he was going to do, he changed his mind; she may also have refused to take any further part in the proceedings. One way or the other, Alice Isabel did not go with Crowley and Elaine on Tuesday 17 April or on Thursday 19 April, when the struggle for 36 Blythe Road took place. If Alice Isabel tried to prevent Elaine from going, she did not succeed, and Crowley probably never knew about the attempt.

Alice Isabel's original pledge of support, and the intended use of her home to bring the GD members to heel; was enough to condemn her in the eyes of the ruling committee set up by those in the GD who were trying to break free of Mathers. On 19 April, its members voted to eject her from the GD along with Elaine, and Crowley, and Edward Berridge who had agreed to lend Elaine his keys to the 2nd Order rooms. There's no evidence that Alice Isabel made any attempt to challenge the decision. It seems, too, that she didn't blame Crowley for her expulsion - at least, not enough to cut off all acquaintance with him. When visiting Paris in 1902, she and Crowley met one afternoon at the rooms he was renting. Crowley had only recently returned to Europe after two years abroad, so there must have been at least one exchange of letters between them during that time. Their acquaintance did gradually decline, however. In The Spirit of Solitude and The Confessions there's an coda to it that Alice Isabel can hardly have intended: Crowley thanks Alice Isabel (rather grudgingly) for putting the idea of having an astral relationship with her daughter into his head.

Alice Isabel let the GD go in April 1900 - she had other things she needed to focus on. If she was worried about the relationship between her daughter and Aleister Crowley, she would soon be able to pass responsibility for curtailing it to someone else. She had found an eligible husband for Elaine and as a result, she had a wedding to organise.

AFTER THE GOLDEN DAWN

The eligible husband was Paul Harry Witkowski, German-born but based in Hong Kong where he worked for Arnhold Karberg. Arnhold Karberg was a business with a large property portfolio which also acted as agent in the Far East for a number of European and American shipping and insurance companies. It had branches in China, London and New York as well as Hong Kong, and in Hong Kong had a guaranteed seat on the board of directors of the Hongkong and Shanghai Banking Corporation. Witkowski was sufficiently senior in the partnership to occupy that seat on HSBC's board from 1899 to 1901 while an even more senior employee was on leave in Europe. He had every prospect of becoming a partner in the firm himself: eligible indeed.

Seeing Witkowski was working in Hong Kong not the firm's London office, it's a puzzle how he and Elaine met. Perhaps the Simpsons had known his family for many years, since John and Lucy Hall had lived in Germany in the 1860s.

Did Alice Isabel breathe a big sigh of relief on 12 June 1900 when Elaine Simpson and Paul Witkowski were married at St Saviour's Paddington? They left for Hong Kong shortly afterwards and the following year Alice Isabel visited them there. I don't know the date of the visit for certain but I'd put my money on June 1901. At the end of that month, Elaine gave birth to her first child - Alice Isabel's first grandchild - and it would be a heartless or penniless mother who would not be with her daughter at such a time, taking charge of the household and giving the new mother every support. I suppose Alice Isabel never knew that Elaine and Crowley had got back in touch only a few months after Elaine had got married; and that they spent a traumatic few days together in Shanghai in 1906, during which they came very close to committing adultery. If she had known, I'm sure she would have been very worried indeed, but it was no longer her problem to solve: her son-in-law would have to deal with it.

Crowley doesn't mention either Beatrice Simpson or Arthur in his account of his short-lived acquaintance with Alice Isabel. Arthur must have been at school at the time and perhaps their paths never crossed; and Beatrice doesn't seem to have made any impression on him. Thinking of Elaine as safely married, however, Alice Isabel could turn her attention to the futures of these two younger children.

I'm inclined to think that Alice Isabel might have wished Beatrice well when she decided she wanted to be an actress: the sources I've found (which admittedly are rather limited) show Beatrice as the only one of Alice Isabel's children to inherit her artistic and creative skills; though none of her children seem to have had her musical talents. I'm sure Alice Isabel went to see Beatrice make her professional acting debut, at the Princess's Theatre in June 1899 in a play called One of the Best, playing the kind of ingenue role that was usually given to young actresses just starting out. Over the next few years Beatrice had similar small parts in other London productions; and then she got a break which must have caused Alice Isabel as much anxiety as pride - she was offered work in New York. One website I came across said that during the run of There's Many A Slip, at the Garrick Theatre New York in the autumn of 1902, Beatrice got engaged to one of her fellow actors, James Erskine. Such an engagement was the sort a young woman might well enter into when her mother was an ocean's distance away: James Erskine was an earl, the first member of the British aristocracy to become a professional actor; but his other attributes were the sort to give a careful mother nightmares - he'd been declared bankrupt and was divorced with two children. However, nothing came of the engagement, if it ever existed, and Alice Isabel could breathe again. Beatrice never did marry.

Of course, Beatrice had to take the opportunity offered her, to work in America. She left England in the summer of 1902. Although she often came back to Britain on visits - in 1912 for example and again in 1925 - she never really lived in the UK again. Also in 1902, Alice Isabel and Lucy Hall left Randolph Road and it was probably at this point that they moved into the flat at 14 Cadogan Court, a typical late-19th century block on Draycott Avenue in the maze of streets between Fulham Road and King's Road. Lucy finally died there, on 21 April 1907. Arthur had joined the Royal Artillery as a lieutenant in 1906, so with Lucy's death Alice Isabel felt able to go travelling again - she went to the USA in July 1907, probably to visit Beatrice but perhaps to see other friends as well. While she was away, her son-in-law, Paul Witkowski, died in Germany. In the early months of 1908, Elaine was in England dealing with her husband's estate; but by 1911 she had got married again, to another German, a Herr Wölker, and was living in Hamburg. Whether Elaine made Alice Isabel a grandparent again, with either of her husbands, I don't know; her only grandchild (I don't know its gender) may have been Elaine's child born in 1901.

Arthur was still in England on the day of the 1911 census. He and a fellow officer were staying in a lodging house at 93 Jermyn Street, perhaps taking some leave as Arthur's current posting was with the Royal Artillery at Leeds. Alice Isabel was back in England, but had moved out of London. She was living at 41 Egerton Road, Bexhill, in Sussex, putting the finishing touches to the project originally conceived by her father in the 1850s: the biography The Life and Letters of Sir John Hall. Not feeling up to researching, editing and writing it herself, she had consulted Sir George Birdwood of the India Office, a historian himself, member of an old East India Company family and briefly a colleague of Sir John Hall in the Bombay Medical Service. Birdwood had recommended the young and relatively unknown Indian author Sid Mahan Mitra for the task; and Mitra was staying with Alice Isabel on census day, still working on the papers that Alice Isabel had inherited from her parents. It was on the strength of this book that both Alice Isabel and Elaine as well were elected members of the Royal Asiatic Society in 1911; Alice Isabel remained a member until 1925.

The evidence of the Royal Asiatic Society membership lists is that Alice Isabel didn't live in England between 1912 and the early 1930s. At the very least, she spent most of each year abroad perhaps returning, like many did, for the 'social season' in the spring. I'm sure she was in England in May 1912 when Beatrice gave what can probably be described as an early performance-poetry recital at the Crosby Hall in Chelsea. But I haven't found any information as to where she was spending most of her time.

Early in 1914, Arthur had made the decision to apply for an army secondment, probably in order to speed up his progress towards promotion. He'd been sent to West Africa, arriving there in May 1914, so that none of Alice Isabel's children were in England when the first World War broke out. The years of the first World War must have been very difficult for all the Simpsons, with Elaine married to a German (he was a government official too) and living with him in a country that had suddenly become an enemy; and Arthur fighting for the British. Visiting Elaine would have been out of the question, I imagine; and even exchanging letters might have been difficult. Arthur got his promotion to captain in October, and remained on the Gold Coast until April 1915. Then he came back to fight in Europe and for Alice Isabel a period began of dreading the man with the telegram. Arthur fought in Belgium and France from August 1915 to sometime during 1917; but from May 1917 he was a working as gunnery instructor and was probably not on the front-line. In November 1917 he was sent to Italy. While he was there he was promoted to acting lieutenant-colonel and was wounded twice, but not severely - he was able to continue his army career. Elaine also survived the war and Alice Isabel could relax, at least on that point.

I think Alice Isabel continued to live mostly abroad in the 1920s; perhaps there was a catching-up of lost time with Elaine. She joined the Ladies' Army and Navy Club in 1924; members could stay at the club's premises in Burlington Gardens W1 when they were in London. I don't know exactly when she decided to move back to England again, but at least in the early 1930s she had one child living here: by 1930 Arthur had been posted to the School of Artillery on Salisbury Plain. Beatrice had moved further away than ever, though, from New York to California.

By 1935 Alice Isabel was living in Kensington, at 22 Courtfield Gardens off Cromwell Road. She died on 16 January 1935 at one of two hospitals which both had the address 28 Marloes Road: St Mary Abbot's hospital for the acutely ill; and the Kensington Institution for the chronically ill. Just as she had chosen to join a women's club, Alice Isabel appointed a woman solicitor to be the executor of her Will: Irene Stoney, who probably worked for Chatterton and Co of 231 the Strand.

ALICE ISABEL'S CHILDREN AFTER HER DEATH

Elaine was still alive at the end of the 1920s when she got back in touch with Aleister Crowley after many years. I haven't been able to find out when or where she died. Beatrice died in California in 1956. If I have identified the right person, Arthur retired from the army and went to South Africa, dying in Durban in 1960; the very little evidence I came across suggested that, like Beatrice, he never married. If Alice Isabel has any descendants, they are most likely to be German.

BASIC SOURCES I USED for all Golden Dawn members.

Membership of the Golden Dawn: The Golden Dawn Companion by R A Gilbert. Northampton: The Aquarian Press 1986. Between pages 125 and 175, Gilbert lists the names, initiation dates and addresses of all those people who became members of the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn or its many daughter Orders between 1888 and 1914. The list is based on the Golden Dawn's administrative records and its Members' Roll - the large piece of parchment on which all new members signed their name at their initiation. All this information had been inherited by Gilbert but it's now in the Freemasons' Library at the United Grand Lodge of England building on Great Queen Street Covent Garden. Please note, though, that the records of the Amen-Ra Temple in Edinburgh were destroyed in 1900/01. As far as I know, the records of the Horus Temple at Bradford have not survived either.

Family history: freebmd; ancestry.co.uk (census and probate); findmypast.co.uk; familysearch; Burke's Peerage and Baronetage; Burke's Landed Gentry; Armorial Families; thepeerage.com; and a wide variety of family trees on the web.

Famous-people sources: mostly about men, of course, but very useful even for the female members of GD. Oxford Dictionary of National Biography. Who Was Who. Times Digital Archive.

Useful source for business and legal information: London Gazette and its Scottish counterpart Edinburgh Gazette. Now easy to find (with the right search information) on the web.

Catalogues: British Library; Freemasons' Library.

Wikipedia; Google; Google Books - my three best resources. I also used other web pages, but with some caution, as - from the historian's point of view - they vary in quality a great deal.

SOURCES FOR ALICE ISABEL SIMPSON née HALL

LUCY HACKSHAW

I couldn't find any information on the death of Lucy's father Harry Hackshaw. I think he must have died in the West Indies. After Lucy's mother Harriet Marion Hackshaw died in 1877 (in England) her nearest living relation was her brother Robert James Hackshaw. He had been living in England at least since the 1870s and in 1872 had married Elizabeth Rowe, a member of another family that had owned land on St Vincent. In 1881 they and their children were living in Camberwell. Robert was employed as a bailiff at the county court in Shoreditch. Elizabeth Hackshaw died in 1890 and 1892, Robert had married Louisa Campbell Poplewell. He and Louisa were living in Croydon in 1901.

LUCY'S FIRST HUSBAND: DUNCAN FORBES SUTHERLAND

Timesonline: Times 10 October 1836 p4 marriage notice for Duncan Forbes Sutherland and Lucy Campbell Hackshaw. The wedding took place in London.

At website //svgancestry.com/index.php/sutherland-of-st-vincent there is an account of the Sutherlands of St Vincent posted 2006 by Joan Leggett who is a descendant of the family. It also covers their relations, the MacKay family. Joan Leggett gives the year of Duncan Forbes Sutherland's death. There's a list of subscribers to a book by Charles Shephard An Historical Account of the Island of St Vincent, published 1831. In the list are H Hackshaw of Gloucester Place Portman Square and several Sutherlands including Duncan Forbes of St Vincent. Finally, Joan Leggett posts a list of officers who served in the St Vincent Militia between 1787 and 1828: both Harry Hackshaw and Duncan Forbes Sutherland are on the list as serving during the 1820s.

The Sutherland family estates in St Vincent had to be sold in the 1860s to pay debts: see Times 30 November 1863 p4d. So it's likely that Lucy Sutherland was a rather impoverished widow.

More information on the Sutherland family can be found at Www.kittybrewster.com/ancestry/sutherland.htm including the fact that Duncan Forbes Sutherland and Lucy had no children.

SECOND HUSBAND: SIR JOHN HALL

He's in ODNB and on wikipedia but I got most of my information from Life and Letters of Sir John Hall MD KCB FRCS whose author is S M Mitra but it was Alice Isabel Simpson who commissioned him and provided the letters and other documents he used. London, New York, Bombay, Calcutta: Longmans Green and Company 1911. Introduction by Rear-Admiral Sir R Massie Blomfield KCMG. Amongst the sources used were John Hall's books of copies of the letters he sent as part of his medical-military duties, which he had kept to use for his memoir-cum-apologia. The book covering 1843 to 1866 was sold at Bonhams on 26 June 2007. See www.bonhams.com/auctions/15231/lot/26,. Unfortunately the website doesn't give details of who bought the book. The earlier book, covering 1827-43, is now in the Wellcome Library.

For Rondesbosch, where John Hall and Lucy were married, see wikipedia. It's most likely they were married at St Paul's church, which seems to have been the first English church built in the district: see www.stpaulsrondebosch.co.za building began 1832.

The Life and Letters of Sir John Hall was also my source for Alice Isabel's youth and education and the different places she lived until her marriage. And for Lucy Hall's death; the announcement in the Daily Telegraph 24 April 1907 is reproduced in the book. At the end of the book there are a couple of pages on Alice Isabel and her child; and some photographs - facing p543 one of "Lieutenant W A Simpson"; facing p298 of Alice and her grandchild, taken in Hong Kong in 1901. On p544 is all the information I've been able to find about Elaine's second marriage; and mention of Beatrice's volume of poems Songs of the Elements.

Baptism of John Hall: familysearch England-ODM GS film number 0924749 IT 4.

Not even familysearch had any record of the marriage of John Hall to Lucy Campbell Sutherland. I also couldn't find any record of the birth of their daughter Lucia Georgina, which I deduce took place in South Africa.

ALICE ISABEL HALL

Birth and baptism of Alice Isabel Hall: www.familysearch.org, parish records of the Presidency of Bombay.

Via www.familysearch.org Great Britain-EASy and VR, GS film number 1929839: marriage of Alice Hall to William Simpson.

REV WILLIAM SIMPSON:

Alumni Dublinensis 1593-1860 editors George D Burtchaeli and Thomas U Sadleir 1935, p753. Thacker's Bengal Directory 1864 p82.

Thacker's Bengal Directory 1867 p173.

Thacker's Bengal Directory 1875 p1544.

Crockford's Clerical Directory 1891 p1190.

ST JOHN'S BAILLIESTON

See www.findachurch.co.uk

Scottish Episcopal Clergy 1689-2000 by David M Bertie published Edinburgh: T and T Clark 2000. P598.

Irish Identities in Victorian Britain editors Roger Swift and Sheridan Gilley published London: Routledge 2011: p144.

Crockford's Clerical Directory 1900 Volume 2 p1241 still has an entry for Rev William Simpson, which I found a bit strange: as incumbent of St John's Baillieston from 1888-95.

Births of Elaine Mary Simpson and Alice Beatrice Simpson: see familysearch.

The Gates of Light by Beatrice Irwin (Alice Beatrice Simpson). London: Rider and Co. Undated but British Library catalogue gives the publication date as 1930. P154 but it's just a very brief biographical paragraph and it doesn't mention Elaine.

RANDOLPH ROAD wrongly said by Crowley to be Randolph Place:

Kelly's London Directory 1894 p608 street directory does not list anyone called Hall or Simpson in Randolph Road.

Kelly's London Directory 1899 p680 street directory has Lady Hall - that is, Lucy - as householder at 15 Randolph Road.

THE SIMPSONS AND ALEISTER CROWLEY

The proposed use of Lady Hall's house by Crowley as Mathers' envoy in 1900: Freemason's Library GD collection GD 2/4/3/30.

Part of The Confessions (covering events as far as 1904) was published in two volumes as The Spirit of Solitude: an Autohagiography subsequently re-Antichristened The Confessions of Aleister Crowley. London: Mandrake Press Museum St 1929. It contains more about his travels and his climbing expeditions than appears in the later editions. The coverage of Crowley's time in the GD, and the people that he met there, is in more or less the same words as the better-known edition edited by Symonds and Grant; although what went on at Blythe Road is not mentioned at all. However, there are one or two differences as regards Alice Isabel; and some information on Elaine which was cut from later versions. Symonds and Grant also cut passages in which Crowley spells out in so many words his contempt for all women. He sees all women as having no morals and no intellectual ability of any kind, and being bound up in their reproductive capacity to the exclusion of all else.

The later, better known version does include information on Crowley's life after 1904:

The Confessions of Aleister Crowley: An Autohagiography edited by John Symonds and Kenneth Grant London: Cape 1969. A version of this edition is also on the web at Www.hermetic.com/crowley/confessions. I think people need to remember that when he was writing The Confessions Crowley had long ago run through the money he inherited and was now living on his reputation.

Website www.lashtal.com/wiki/Aleister\_Crowley\_Timeline is run by the Aleister Crowley Society. The section of this website which covers 1898-1900 is based on Crowley's own Abra-Melin Notebook.

For more scholarly and detached accounts of Crowley and the Simpson family, I recommend Howe or Kaczynski:

The Magicians of the Golden Dawn: A Documentary History of a Magical Order 1887-1923 by Ellic Howe. Routledge and Kegan Paul Ltd 1972. There's a good chapter on the battle of 36 Blythe Road and what followed, based on Crowley's Abra-Melin Notebook and an account of the battle written for the GD's ruling committee by GD member Edmund Hunter; with long quotes from both.

Perdurabo: the Life of Aleister Crowley by Richard Kaczynski. 2nd edition Berkeley California: North Atlantic Books 2010: pp77-79, p92. On p65 however, Kaczynski wrongly identifies Alice Isabel's father as Sir John Hall 1824-1907, prime minister of New Zealand 1879-82. There are a lot of men called John Hall at any one time!

AFTER THE GOLDEN DAWN

Birth of Elaine's first child in late June 1901: Crowley's diaries for June 1901; details sent to me 28 August 2014 by Crowley researcher Clint Warren.

Alice Isabel calling on Crowley in Paris January 1902: letter from Crowley to Gerald Kelly, undated but written around 15 January 1902 and seen by Clint Warren. Details sent to me 8 September 2014 by Clint Warren.

Kelly's London Directory 1902 p697 street directory Lady Hall is still at 15 Randolph Road but by Kelly's London Directory 1903 p698 15 Randolph Road's resident is Miss Rebecca Pepper, dressmaker.

Deaths of Lucy Campbell Hall and Paul Harry Witkowski: probate registry records.

At familysearch passenger arrival lists Ellis Island: Alice Isabel Simpson arrived 21 July 1907 on the Cedric from Liverpool.

ALICE ISABEL AND ELAINE IN THE ROYAL ASIATIC SOCIETY

Journal of the Royal Asiatic Society of Great Britain and Ireland published by the Society which was then at 22 Albemarle Street London. Issues from January 1911 to 1927.

ALICE ISABEL SIMPSON'S DEATH

Probate registry records.

28 MARLOES ROAD

See English Heritage's buildings' website www.british-history.ac.uk, an article there taken from the Survey of London volume 42 published 1896 chapter XXII. And Lost Hospitals of London, at website ezitis.myzen.co.uk/stmaryabbots.html.

London Gazette 21 February 1936 p1201 notices issued under the Trustee Act 1925 S27.

FOR ALICE ISABEL'S DAUGHTERS see their biographies. Arthur Simpson never joined the GD or its daughter orders.

BEATRICE'S POETRY PERFORMANCE IN LONDON

The New Science of Color originally published 1915; this information from a modern reprint by Nabu Public Domain Reprints 2014: p124-128.

And BEATRICE IN LONDON 1925

The Gates of Light by Beatrice Irwin. London: Rider and Co 1930 p155.

ALICE'S SON WILLIAM ARTHUR JOHN SIMPSON

BEWARE a man with exactly the same name 1877-1964, police chief in Suffolk MBE 1920, died 1964. I think I have got the correct man, in the Probate Registry records for 1960.

Monthly Army List January 1914 column 533 and column 611.

Monthly Army List Oct 1914 column 533 and p2516.

Debretts 1920 p1799 as MC and DSO, 1918.

The VC and DSO: A Complete List volume 3 p68. Published 1924, compilers O Moore Creagh and Edith M Humphris.

Monthly Army List October 1930 column 250c.

Army List 1930: half-yearly list ending December 1930 p322 a good listing of his career so far.

At www.shelaghspencer.com is a list of British Settlers in Natal 1824-1957 compiled by Shelagh O'Byrne Spencer; I couldn't see from the website what her sources were but in any case, William Arthur John Simpson was not in her list.

15 September 2014

Amandragora@attglobal.net

Find the web pages of Roger Wright and Sally Davis, including my list of people initiated into the Order of the Golden Dawn between 1888 and 1901, at:

http://pws.prserv.net/Roger\_Wright/

***

Elaine Mary Simpson was initiated into the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn at its Isis-Urania temple in London on 1 January 1897. She chose a Latin motto, 'Donorum dei dispensatio fidelis'. Elaine's mother, Alice Isabel Simpson had been a member since 1895 and both women were keen to do the work necessary to get to the stage of being offered initiated into the GD's inner, 2nd Order, where you could start doing some practical magic. Elaine beat her mother to it by a few months, though, being initiated into the 2nd Order in March 1899. Later that year, Elaine's younger sister Beatrice was also initiated into the GD.

Elaine and her mother were both ejected from the GD in April 1900 for taking the wrong side in the incident known as the battle of Blythe Road. In Elaine's case her expulsion probably didn't matter all that much as she was going to have to stop taking any active part in the GD's meetings and rituals quite soon. She did (after a pause) carry on with her magic, though, until 1906.

UPDATE SEPTEMBER 2014: thanks are due for this update to Clint Warren, who contacted me in August. He has access to Crowley's original diaries and as a result I'm able to make some corrections to my account of Elaine in 1901. He also inspired me to peer more closely at GD documents at the Freemasons' Library concerning the events of April 1900.

SECOND UPDATE APRIL 2017: further thanks are now due to Claire StEdward Crowley from Australia, who has been researching the Witkowski family. She has sent me copies of several documents and transcriptions of several more; giving me more detail about Elaine's two husbands than I'd been able to get on my own.

THE PROBLEM OF SOURCES

Most people leave very few traces for historians to follow up. It's very difficult to compile a biography of them, and it's as true - alas! - about most members of the GD as about anyone else who wasn't royal/aristocratic, famous/infamous, and/or a professional writer. In Elaine's case I have more evidence about her life - even her life in magic - than for the majority of GD members. But that's not saying much and anyway, the evidence I've found focuses on other people, the GD member gets to play a bit-part in it. The person who wrote most about Elaine is Aleister Crowley and that has been a problem for me. Part of the trouble is the Crowley sources and how they have been edited. The rest of the trouble is Crowley's own character. Misogyny is typical of men in any generation, but Crowley states his in so many words. He also seems incapable of seeing anyone he meets (man or woman) as an individual in their own right. He can only see them as bit-part players in the Drama of Aleister Crowley's Life. I think myself that he always had that tendency; but by the time even of the earlier version of The Confessions, it's very pronounced.

Having got that off my chest I shall start.

THE SIMPSONS

I'm not going to belabour Elaine's early life in this biography as it's covered from her mother's point of view in the biography of Alice Isabel Simpson. Here I shall say that Elaine Mary Simpson was born in India, the eldest child of Rev William Simpson and his wife Alice Isabel, daughter of Sir John Hall. She was born on 2 February 1875, probably at Dagshai in the foothills of the Himalayas, possibly at nearby Kasauli where she was baptised a couple of months later. Rev William was chaplain at Dagshai at the time of Elaine's birth. Elaine's sister Alice Beatrice (known as Beatrice) was born in 1877, also at Dagshai or Kasauli, but shortly afterwards their father was moved on, to Roorkee on the north Indian plains. The British cantonments at Roorkee, at which the Bengal Engineers' Corps and two units of artillery were stationed, may have been Elaine's earliest memories. However, she may have had no clear recollection of India at all, because when she was four, Rev William retired and though I don't have any certain evidence of this, I think the family left India to return to Europe. Where they spent the next few years is also a mystery (they are not on the 1881 census, for example) but they were living in Scotland by August 1886 when Elaine's brother William Arthur John (known as Arthur), the last of William and Alice Isabel's children, was born.

In 1888 Rev William came out of retirement to become the vicar of St John the Evangelist, Baillieston and for the next five or six years, the Simpsons lived in the parish's manse house, on the eastern edge of Glasgow. On the day of the 1891 census Elaine's grandmother Lucy Hall was staying or perhaps living near them (though not with them). Elaine and Beatrice were at home on census day. They may have finished their education but it was more likely they were home for the Easter holidays. The only definite information that I have about the education Elaine and her sister had comes from Beatrice: she says that she went to "Cheltenham College" - by which she must mean Cheltenham Ladies' College, founded in 1853 but put on the educational map by its great Principal, Dorothea Beale (appointed in 1858) who did so much to raise the standards of education for middle-class girls. It was a boarding school, and a fee-paying school; perhaps Rev William's decision to come out of retirement was taken with fees in mind. Beatrice doesn't mention how long she was at the College, or when she was there. She doesn't actually mention that Elaine went there too but it would be perverse of the Simpsons to send one daughter there but not the other. Even if Elaine had only spent a couple of years at the College, what she learned there will have put her amongst the best-educated of all the GD's women members. However, she probably could already speak German and probably French very well by the time she went there, and perhaps some Italian, too. Alice Isabel knew at least the first two languages well, having spent her youth moving from country to country with her parents, living in Paris, Germany, Switzerland and Italy during the 1850s and 1860s. She could also have taught Elaine and her sister the basics of music and singing, which she had learned in Germany. She and Rev William will have shared with their daughters their love of Dante and Tennyson. I wonder what Elaine made of the poem Lancelot and Elaine? Finally, as the daughter of a Church of England vicar, Elaine will have received a very thorough religious education before she went away to school. As Rev William's personal preferences were at the high-church end of the Church of England scale of religious observance, they will have watched Church of England services being carried out in such a way as to encourage strong emotional responses, through a focus on the drama and symbolism of the Christian rituals.

I have explained in my biography of Alice Isabel Simpson that though I haven't found any direct proof, I believe Rev William Simpson died around 1895. Following his death, Elaine's grandmother and mother moved to London. Sharing the expenses, they rented a house at 15 Randolph Road in the district to the west of Edgware Road. Elaine was 20 when this happened. I think I can safely say that she was not working, nor expected to work. The ideology of the time was that middle-class women would marry, and so it was not necessary that they should work, even before marriage. My impression of Elaine is that she did not have the strength of mind required to challenge that - the level of determination needed was very great. She was probably happy enough following the ideological path; at least until her mother joined the Golden Dawn in 1895. Alice Isabel began bringing home the study-material required of GD initiates who wanted to progress to practical magic by being initiated into its inner, second order - texts on the Kabbalah, astrology and tarot for example - and the attention of Elaine and (to a lesser extent) her sister was caught. Elaine had probably read a great deal of the study-programme before she was initiated into the GD herself. She was approaching her second initiation in the autumn of 1898 when Aleister Crowley underwent his first GD initiation.

ELAINE AND ALEISTER CROWLEY

Neither the lashtal website nor the two versions of The Confessions mention any of the Simpson family before the events of April 1900. I'm never quite sure how well individual GD members could get to know each other at the GD rituals. I'm also not sure how often Crowley went to the GD rituals after the first few he attended. During 1899 had was working very hard magically and otherwise, preparing himself for initiation into the GD's 2nd Order and for carrying out the Abra-Melin rituals. In both versions of The Confessions Crowley writes that he didn't consider most of the GD members as having the magical knowledge he would need, especially for the Abra-Melin rituals. This judgement would have been particularly true of Elaine and her mother, as Crowley regarded women as intellectually negligible. As it happens, Crowley was quite right that the Simpsons couldn't help him. He was after people who knew about alchemy. Relatively few GD members did so and Crowley focused his learning efforts on those people. Despite this, the accounts of the events of 1900 make it clear that by then, Crowley had come to know the Simpsons reasonably well. It's not clear which of the women he knew first. Not Beatrice, I think - she wasn't initiated until 1899. It's more likely that it was Elaine, as the younger of the two who were members when Crowley joined. One of the Simpsons invited him to call on them all at home. By doing so, Crowley was agreeing to move out of the world of mottoes and magic, and into the world of real names. However, in most of his published writings on this period, Crowley refers to Elaine as 'Fidelis', the shortened form of her long motto; an important indication of his attitude, in my view.

Now I get to a bit that's got to be very speculative: because of a lack of the necessary information; but also because the few sources that do exist show only one side of it. Even using the different versions of The Confessions (which I regard as an unreliable source) I do get the impression that Elaine Simpson and Aleister Crowley were attracted to each other; and that the attraction continued for several years, and almost reached a sexual relationship. Evidence for friendship and attraction on Elaine's part is that Elaine sided with Crowley in one of the GD's internal disputes, to her cost. A couple of times in her life she also picked up the thread of the relationship, after either Crowley or circumstances had caused it to be dropped. And at least once she responded positively to an attempt by Crowley to restart a relationship that had looked dead and gone. On Crowley's part, he did consider the relationship dead and gone at one stage; only to start it up again when badly in need of advice from someone with knowledge of how magic works. I'm not going to discount the possibility that Elaine would have married Crowley if she had been asked. But she wasn't asked and anyway, by the spring of 1900 she had agreed to marry someone else. The very fact of her being engaged may have made it easier for Elaine and Crowley to be acquaintances; and it may have made Elaine a little more careless than she might otherwise have been, about the consequences of considering herself Crowley's friend. For his part, Crowley writes of Elaine in terms I haven't find him using about any other woman, not even his wife, although he uses words that consider her to be scarcely adult. Looking back at 1900 from the late 1920s, he wrote of Elaine at that time as "a young girl of perfect purity" (she was 25, a few months older than he was) and at the end of the relationship, still described his feeling for her as somehow above or outside sex. She seems to be unique in his life, in that respect!

Who was the man whom Elaine was due to marry, in the spring of 1900? I've suggested in my biography of Elaine's mother Alice Isabel that the credentials of Paul Witkowski as a husband were of a kind to satisfy any woman anxious to marry her daughters well. He was 11 years older than Elaine and had already got a long way up the office hierarchy in the Hong Kong based firm Arnhold Karberg. There was a BIG problem with him: he was Jewish. But in order to marry Elaine, he converted to Christianity and I'll just say here that Elaine must have been a very charismatic woman, to have Paul Witkowski and Aleister Crowley, in their different ways, do so much for her.

Jacob Arnhold and Peter Karberg had registered the company in Germany in 1866, but they had founded it in Canton. In 1900 it had offices in London and New York but its main sphere of operations was still China, where it had offices in Hong Kong, Shanghai and 37 other towns. It owned property in Hong Kong and Shanghai and also acted as agent in the Far East for a large number of insurance and shipping companies. Karberg had retired from active participation quite early on in the firm's history although his name was kept; but the Arnholds were still very much in charge, members of the family chairing its board of directors from 1897 to 1910. From 1888 to 1914, Arnhold Karberg was so important a player in the economy of Hong Kong that it had a permanent seat on the board of directors of the Hongkong and Shanghai Banking Corporation. From November 1899 to December 1901 Paul Witkowski sat in that seat, acting up while an even more senior employee of Arnhold Karberg was on leave.

Paul Witkowski had gone to work in Arnhold Karberg's Hong Kong office in the early 1890s when the Simpsons were still living in Scotland. Although his surname sounds Polish, he had been born in Berlin and was German-speaking. The puzzle therefore is, how did he and Elaine meet? They could certainly have met in Glasgow, with Witkowski on a business trip to the city. However, I've speculated that Alice Isabel may have known his family since the 1860s when she and her parents were living in Germany. In the spring of 1900, preparations for a summer wedding will have been in hand, the Victorian middle-class wedding taking quite as long to organise as its modern successor. Elaine's mind doesn't seem to have been as much on the marriage job as it could have been, however; she may have been feeling swept along by the tide of her mother's enthusiasm, as many brides-to-be do. Both she and her mother got involved in the power struggles within the GD; some of Alice Isabel's support may have been unwitting and she also had doubts about what was going forward; but Elaine played an active role on Crowley and Mathers' behalf and - at least according to Crowley's accounts - didn't have any second thoughts about her involvement.

Crowley had become involved in those power struggles when the GD's 2nd Order members had voted to refuse him initiation into the 2nd Order. He had decided to go to Paris and get Samuel Liddell Mathers to initiate him instead; and to return to London to assert Mathers' authority over the 2nd Order, forcing its members to accept him as one of them. Before he even set out for Paris he laid before both Elaine and her mother, a plan for taking over the 2nd Order's rooms at 36 Blythe Road. They both agreed to help him. Between London and Paris, however, the plan seems to have got more all-encompassing: it involved all the GD members - not just the 2nd Order - answering a series of questions on their loyalties, and swearing an oath of obedience to Mathers and to Crowley as Mathers' representative. According to Crowley's various accounts, Elaine's mother started to get cold feet, and Crowley subjected her to all the loyalty questions, and demands, that he was intending to be made of all the GD members in due course. Elaine, however, was still keen to help: Crowley writes that she was one of the group of members that held the view that GD members should obey Mathers as the head of the order, as student magicians always did their masters.

In still being willing to commit herself on Mathers' and Crowley's behalf, Elaine was stepping into a dispute that was bigger than she or Crowley could have known. In The Spirit of Solitude Crowley writes of the letters in German from the supposed Fraulein Sprengel as if they were genuine; perhaps even in the 1920s he wasn't aware that the GD's foundation documents had been faked. And in 1900 neither he nor Elaine had been in the GD long enough, or knew Mathers well enough, to have experienced the full range of his increasingly difficult behaviour. As Crowley's friend, Elaine probably felt he'd been denied initiation into the 2nd Order unfairly, having done all the necessary study-work and more. The GD archives don't contain any indication of what the reasons were for the refusal, but in the earlier and later versions of The Confessions, Crowley gives two different ones. In the later The Confessions Crowley says that Elaine's mother had told him the reason: that he was suspected of using sex to raise magical energy; a well-known ritual, but one deeply controversial in the GD. However, in the earlier The Spirit of Solitude he says that the decision had gone against him because of jealousy of his very rapid progress from first initiation to readiness for the second; and he doesn't say who told him what the reason was. Which one is correct? Goodness knows.

The first part of Crowley's plan of action in London as Mathers' representative was to take possession of the 2nd Order's rooms at 36 Blythe Road. As a bona fide member of the 2nd Order, Elaine could not be kept out of them, and she agreed to go to them with Crowley and insist on being let in; letting him in with her. However, as a relatively new initiate into the 2nd Order she did not have any keys to the rooms herself. Crowley arranged to borrow a set from Edward Berridge, another supporter of Mathers, and once Elaine was in, Crowley was intending get the locks changed so that no one else could get in without their permission. Once in possession, he would begin the process of getting the GD members to swear a new, rather different, pledge of loyalty to it and to Mathers as its head, by sending a summons to each member, requiring them to attend an interview. These interviews would take place at the Simpson's house; and Elaine was the person to whom responses to the summons would be addressed.

As a result of her cooperation with Crowley, Elaine would be given the post of Third Adept in the GD after the coup, with Crowley as First Adept and Berridge as Second; Mathers being by now conspicuously absent from Crowley's thinking. In suggesting that Elaine be the Third Adept, Crowley was offering her a great step up in status: she had only been doing magic in theory for three years, and magic in practice for one year. He may have been thinking, too, of giving her an important role when all the GD members were having to reaffirm their vows and loyalty: as Mathers' chosen envoy he would be taking charge of that process himself, of course, asking the questions; but a scribe would also be in the room, taking notes, and perhaps Elaine was going to be the scribe. Both would be masked (this is beginning to sound like 1984). I imagine Elaine found the idea of achieving such high rank in the order very attractive; it made her feel an important part of Crowley's plans for the Order's future, even though she would not be able to participate in person in them, for very long.

Elaine and Crowley met briefly on Monday 16 April 1900 to finalise the seizing of 36 Blythe Road. On Tuesday 17 April the plans seem to have gone without a hitch and in what is apparently the last entry in his Abra-Melin Notebook, Crowley was able to describe the day as "Fight, police, victory". Without a hitch, that is, but not according to what Elaine may have understood beforehand: she may have had Berridge's keys with her when she and Crowley arrived, but none of the accounts of what happened say that she used them. Instead, the locks on the door were forced; and so were the locks on the cupboards inside. My feeling is that merely opening the door with a key didn't appeal to Crowley's sense of theatre. Smashing them open - much more exciting; but as a result Elaine may have been guilty of breaking and entering.

Once in and with the locks changed on 17 April, Crowley took possession of a list of 2nd Order members and started to send telegrams to them, summoning them to attend his test of loyalty. However, the GD's senior members in London were not that easily cowed and a return bout at 36 Blythe Road was played on Thursday 19 April in which Crowley was ordered to leave by W B Yeats and Edmund Hunter and went, threatening legal action. Edmund Hunter's account of 19 April mentions that Elaine was in the 2nd Order rooms with Crowley again; and that a parcel was delivered for her during the day from a wigmaker, which she took with her when she left. Perhaps she had intended to dress up for the occasion, following the example of Crowley who was wearing a kilt, a black mask and a dagger. That same evening, the committee of London-based members who were opposed to Mathers expelled Elaine, her mother, Crowley and Berridge from the GD.

Neither Elaine nor Alice Isabel contested their expulsion as far as I know - certainly nothing in the GD archives at the Freemasons' Library indicates that they did. The ramifications of Blythe Road did rumble on for a month or so, though. Crowley had added his name to the list of 2nd Order members he found at Blythe Road; on behalf of the members in London, Percy Bullock struck it out again. Legal action began about items now missing from the 2nd Order rooms: Crowley saying he wanted compensation for them, apparently on Mathers' behalf; the GD in London arguing that as they had all put money in to buy them, they were not Mathers' property but the GD's as a whole. A letter from the GD's solicitor to Crowley's solicitor contained words which Crowley decided had "threatened the reputation of Miss Simpson". Julian Baker tried to act as mediator on that issue but it was only decided when Elaine - wisely, I think - chose not to take undue offence at what might have been written. There's no evidence in the GD files that any of these legal exchanges got as far as court, or even as far as an out-of-court settlement, and Elaine - as the possibly libelled person - was the only one who could have started a libel case, or stopped it.

Elaine was moving on. On 12 June 1900, she and Paul Ignatz Witkowski (known during his marriage as Paul Harry) were married at St Saviour's Paddington. Aleister Crowley left England that month to go climbing in Mexico. Elaine and her husband went to Hong Kong, where at least for a time, she put aside these childish things. This was force majeure as much as choice: she had to adapt to a new country and cope with the climate of the tropics, which made so many Westerners wilt; make new friends; learn her new double-role of wife and mistress of the household - which is likely to have contained several servants to supervise; and she was soon pregnant, having her first child - Georgiana - during 1901. She would have played hostess to visits from both her and her husband's relatives: Alice Isabel certainly went to Hong Kong to see her grandchild during 1901. Having made the long journey from Europe, visitors would stay for at least several weeks. And taking part in Hong Kong's social life would have been important for Elaine personally, to help her settle, but also for her husband and his business career. They had two communities to be socially involved with - the British community and the large and important German contingent in Hong Kong.

If her mother is to be believed, Elaine would have managed all these changes well: Alice Isabel says of Elaine that she had inherited her grandfather John Hall's "wonderful adaptability to new environments". However, I think Crowley's writings suggest a somewhat different interpretation. She might have been bored, starved of the kind of challenge her GD study had given her. So when Crowley acted on the suggestion inadvertently made by Alice Isabel, contacting Elaine to suggest that they should visit one another astrally, she agreed. He made the suggestion late in 1900, only a few months after they had - apparently - gone their separate ways.

In the two versions of The Confessions Crowley's partner in astral travelling is only identified as a "Sister of the Order (that GD, that is) who lived in Hong Kong". However, he identifies the Hong Kong-based Sister as "Fidelis" later, so it definitely was Elaine. They exchanged letters and agreed a way to both be prepared to travel astrally at the same time; taking it in turns to be the one who astrally travelled and the one who stayed put. This was not as easy as they had reckoned: they had to calculate the correct time allowing for the fact that they were not in the same place and Crowley was travelling a great deal - through Mexico, to the USA, across the Pacific. When their first attempt actually worked, Crowley was rather surprised, and they did get their calculations wrong quite often, but on other occasions their astral beings conversed - not just about magic, Elaine seems to have described her house in Hong Kong. Being in touch with her again encouraged Crowley. He had been trying to do magic while in Mexico but hadn't had much success. Needing to cross the Pacific in any case to visit Allan Bennett in Ceylon, he decided to stop off at Hong Kong and tell Elaine his magical troubles.

In the first version (but not the second) of The Confessions Crowley gives a description of the woman he was expecting to meet again, describing “her purity, her fearlessness, her loyalty, her scorn of all dishonourable device and deed, her single-heartedness, her eager and ecstatic aspiration”. It was a very generous piece of praise; and somehow I think he only wrote it so that it could be followed by a big BUT; because when he got to Hong Kong he found Elaine, “playing at Magick, as another might play at bridge. But her true life was dresses, dinners and dances; and her thoughts were taken up by her husband and her lover.” Then he gives a quite ridiculous reason why all European women take lovers in hot countries, and to illustrate just how low she had fallen, continues, “she had won the first prize at a fancy dress ball by appearing in her adept’s robes and regalia!”

What Crowley said in the first version of The Confessions about Elaine’s activities in Hong Kong is fanciful, a rather spiteful account invented long after the actual visit. Elaine might well have spent her first few months in Hong Kong in a whirl of social engagements while she tried to find her feet in her new surroundings, but she certainly wasn’t spending her time that way by mid-1901: Crowley’s own diary for 1901 tells a different story. Having let Elaine know he was on his way Crowley left Hawaii almost at once. He arrived at Yokohama on 16 June 1901 to find a note or letter from her, saying that he couldn’t visit her right now, and asking him to wait a few months, until October. Right now, Elaine told him, she was giving birth to her first child.

Careful study of Crowley’s diaries for 1901 leads Clint Warren to suggest that Crowley and Elaine may not have met face-to-face that June. I agree that it would have been very difficult for them to do so. Elaine and Paul’s house was probably full of staff hired for the birth and the few weeks after, and of excited grandparents-to-be. I’m sure Alice Isabel’s trip to Hong Kong that year was timed (unless the baby arrived prematurely) for her to be there for the birth of her first grandchild and to give her daughter support and reassurance at a critical time in her life. Childbirth was a dangerous business. Even if the birth went easily and she recovered well, a new middle-class mother would probably not be up and about for a few weeks; and even if she was not the lying-in-bed kind (it sounds as though Elaine wasn’t) she wouldn’t be expected to entertain guests.

Had Elaine even told Crowley that she was pregnant? Probably not - after all, he wasn’t family; and these were women’s matters, even within a family, men were not supposed to be too concerned with the nuts-and-bolts of them. Elaine’s imminent motherhood came as a surprise to Crowley and he decided there was no point in waiting around for three months for her to recover. He left Hong Kong after only a few days, continuing on his way to meet ex-GD member Allan Bennett in Ceylon. But he sulked. Focused as ever on his own needs and not anyone else’s, he took it badly that Elaine couldn’t see him when he wanted to talk to her and claimed that there had been no way back from what he had found out while in Hong Kong: “No hope here, then!...Well and good, so be it!...The umbilical cord was cut; I was an independent being”.

But the only umbilical cord being cut in 1901 was that of Elaine’s daughter Georgiana. At another point of crisis in his life, it was Elaine that Crowley was still looking to for help. Two years after having the basic text of The Book of the Law dictated to him by the spirit Aiwass (8-10 April 1904) Crowley was still uncertain whether the communication was genuine, and he decided that Elaine was the one person with whom he could discuss his doubts.

A lot had changed for both of them, between 1901 and early 1906. Probably in 1902, in a reorganisation following Philipp Arnhold's move from the Shanghai office to the London one, Arnhold Karberg sent Paul Witkowski to Shanghai. It was an important move for him. Arnhold Karberg had been chosen to represent German financial interests when the Chinese imperial government wanted a foreign loan; perhaps Paul Witkowski was going to play a role in this kind of politically-charged negotiation. The Witkowskis had to adapt to living in a new country again. Could Elaine speak Chinese by then? That will have helped her, although Shanghai had a large and powerful foreign community. I expect she could at least give her servants orders and possibly more: both she and her mother seemed to have had a facility for learning foreign languages. In 1904 in Shanghai, Elaine had a second child, her son Richard Paul.

The changes for Crowley had been even greater: in August 1903 he had married Rose, sister of GD member Gerald Kelly; they also had had a child, in 1904. Did Elaine know of this? Hmm. Did they keep in touch? - from that supposed parting shot of Crowley's in 1901, you wouldn't have thought so. However, a reference in the later version of The Confessions indicates that by the autumn of 1905, Crowley and Elaine were meeting astrally again: Crowley mentions one such meeting that October, in which he saw her "accompanied by a golden hawk in whom I later recognised one of the Secret Chiefs of the A...A". During that particular astral encounter, he and Elaine discussed the Great Work, which they both agreed would result in "the creating of a new universe".

In early 1906 Crowley, Rose and toddler Lilith were travelling in the Far East. That April, Crowley decided to leave Rose and the baby to go back to England on their own and go to visit Elaine. It's not clear to me whether Rose knew of his intentions or even where he was going; nor whether Elaine knew she was expecting him. However, Elaine did make him welcome, at least at first.

Before I try to make sense of April 1906 in Shanghai I want to say two things. Firstly, the account of those days on the lashtal website differs from the only other extant account, that of the later version of The Confessions. They are both based on Crowley's papers. Elaine never wrote up her side of what went on. Secondly, Israel Regardie was probably the first Crowley follower to admit in public that Aiwass was an aspect of Crowley's own personality. I was glad to read that (February 2014) in a wiki page on The Book of the Law, because it confirmed what I'd thought was pretty obvious even from the accounts of April 1906 that do exist. Had Crowley sufficient self-awareness to know it? - an interesting question.

Right. Crowley arrived in Shanghai on 6 April 1906 and went to call on Elaine at once, explaining to her in that initial meeting his anxieties about Aiwass and the communication Aiwass had made. Both accounts agree on that. The lashtal timeline then records that Elaine was ill the following day, and they couldn't begin on Crowley's plan, which was to carry out the Abra-Melin rituals with Elaine in attendance, writing down whatever conversations Crowley had with any spirits that manifested themselves. Crowley gave it a couple of days before calling on her again, but she was still ill; he wasn't able to see her until 13 April and she wasn't really better - that is, physically able to help him - until 20 April. On 12 April - perhaps realising he was going to have to stay in town longer than he'd intended - Crowley wrote to Rose; but he didn't tell her why he was in Shanghai. On 18 April, with Elaine still not well enough to act, Crowley was starting to change his plans. He decided to ask Elaine to take the major role in communicating with Aiwass, rather than do it himself. Aiwass was finally invoked (Crowley seems to have been sure they'd got the right entity), in the room

Elaine had as her magical temple, by Elaine, on 20 April 1906 and again on 21 April; on that second day, urged on by Aiwass, Crowley and Elaine started to do the Great Work - that is, have sex for magical purposes - but stopped; and on that same day, Crowley left Shanghai for Nagasaki on his way to Britain via the USA. During the boat-trip Crowley had his turn to be ill. Once he reached Kobe, on 24 April 1906, he wrote to Rose again, but again didn't mention anything about Elaine. So that's one account.

Shanghai was a very unhealthy city to live in, but I think that Elaine's illness was as much psychological as medical. Crowley had arrived with very little warning and was asking a lot of her. It's no wonder she took to her bed. However, several days later, she did agree to do what he wanted.

The later account, in The Confessions, doesn't mention Elaine's illness; or the letters to Rose. While the lashtal account doesn't say where Crowley was staying but gives the impression that for at least the first few days, he was in a hotel, the later account says that on 9 April, Crowley moved into Elaine's house, and that for the next 12 days they were "constantly working (at magic, that is) together". As part of this, Elaine invoked Aiwass on 18 April.

Well, they can't both be right. I believe that the lashtal website's account is more likely to be right, because it's based on contemporary information not a memoir composed many years later.

In The Confessions Crowley and his editors give more detail of what actually happened in the magical sense, during the times that he and Elaine were together - or what he thought happened. It's clear that at least in some respects, Crowley didn't get what he wanted. Well, no, not that exactly - that what Crowley thought he wanted, and what he actually wanted were different things, and opposed. Also - although he doesn't say this - I don't think he appreciated it when Elaine began to show some independence of judgement. Also, she was willing to play what she saw was her part in the creation of the new universe: that is, to do the Great Work - have sex with him for the purpose of raising the necessary magical energy; which threw Crowley into a quandary.

When answering the question Crowley had come to Shanghai to ask, Elaine seemed to be very certain. She told him that she thought that Aiwass was a real spirit - which made him unhappy. On that assumption, she wanted them to study Aiwass' communication together, by reading The Book of the Law. Crowley's initial reaction was that he didn't want them to do that, at least, not together.

When Elaine invoked Aiwass, the first communication she received from him (I'd call Aiwass an 'it' but Crowley always knew it was male - a clue in itself) was that he wanted the two of them to do the Great Work. But then Aiwass added that Elaine would refuse to agree to it; that if she refused, she would be "useless" to Crowley; and that Crowley had been wrong to confide in Elaine because it gave her power over him. So he had his get-out clause - the case against Elaine. But then Aiwass began to argue the case 'for' Elaine, describing Crowley as Elaine's "true helper" and as someone she had a right to demand help from. Aiwass also helped Crowley's dilemma along by telling them both that it was inevitable that they would do the Great Work together and once they had done so, they would be bound together "irrevocably". The final element in the debate was Elaine telling Crowley that she felt he was "absolutely necessary for her"; apparently this wasn't a channeling of Aiwass' opinions, this was Elaine speaking as her real self. By 'necessary' did she mean in magic? Or in all her life? I think she may actually have meant 'all her life'; at least, she thought she did. I suggest this was what had made her ill: a desire to have sex with Crowley and commit herself to him.

In the end, they did begin the Great Work. Why didn't they continue, and found the new universe? Crowley attributes it to "my will" and to Elaine's "feeling that we have done enough for honour". Again, hmmm. It sounds lofty and purposeful if only negatively, and Crowley rationalised his part in the stoppage still further by declaring that his "love for Fidelis" (not Elaine and I think that's an important distinction) "excluded the material almost entirely". Maybe, maybe. But I think they both panicked, at the implications of having sex - being bound 'irrevocably' is a pretty alarming idea and what about their lives in the non-magical world? Of course, but more mundanely still, they could have just been interrupted. Elaine's temple was only a room in her house, a house full of servants and children and perhaps her husband, home from work. And Crowley had a boat to catch - both the accounts give an impression of a man in a hurry. Dull, unmagical reasons.

Crowley must have gone to Shanghai to do the Great Work with Elaine as his sexual partner if circumstances were right. But if you take it that Aiwass was a manifestation of parts of Crowley's own subconscious, you can see Aiwass' communications as a struggle within Crowley about Elaine's role in his future. Was she to be his 'other' in magic? And if so what kind of 'other'? - an equal partner? An acolyte? And what about the wider aspects? A lot depends on why you think Crowley had left his wife and child to seek out a woman he'd despaired of five years before. Had he intended never to go back to Rose? Was he thinking he could have one woman for magic and one for his daily life? Was he thinking clearly at all?

And what about Elaine? She seems almost to have made up her mind for Crowley and magic and against her husband and their life together. I don't think she would even have debated this choice if she had been entirely happy with her husband; but in the end, she decided in favour of her marriage and her children.

And Crowley for his wife. I noticed that in all Crowley's writing about his relationship with Elaine, he only mentions her marriage twice: once when she was still only engaged; and once, in a half-sentence, to note that her husband had died. In the versions of The Confessions Elaine's nearly always referred as Fidelis - the short-form of her GD motto; once she's referred to by her real-world name - but as Elaine Simpson, even though Crowley was writing about the time of her marriage when he did so. Crowley decided in Shanghai that his feelings for Elaine were a non-sexual love, but I do wonder so it's even possible that her willingness to be his sexual partner in magic shocked him. I don't think he ever thought of her as married; she remained a young girl in his mind's eye.

During the years of their close relationship Crowley was writing poetry regularly. He gathered together a lot of his poems in 1910 and published them in a book he called The Winged Beetle. None of the poems in the book have a date on them but from the evidence of those dedicated to GD members, they were written over a long period. Elaine's one of the few people to have more than one poem dedicated to her. The Opium-Smoker is dedicated to "Elaine Simpson". I think it was written around 1899 when Crowley was just getting into drugs as hallucinogens, apparently guided into their use by Allan Bennett. Most of the poem is a reverie of things usually unseen appearing to the poet in his opium-induced trances. The poet seems to be on his own apart from a "boy" who brings him the drug; so Elaine's not smoking and en-visioning with him. She might be the "compassionate maid" that the poet calls on to bring him light, at the end of the poem as he attempts to write down his visions.

The second poem is Ad Fidelem Infidelem and is dedicated to "Elaine W-----", the only time in all his writings that Crowley acknowledges Elaine's surname as a married woman and - by inference - the existence of a man who was her husband. I hope I'm not infringing copyright law in printing the poem in its entirety. If anyone thinks I am doing so, please let me know and I'll withdraw the poem while I find out whose permission to get:

Ad Fidelem Infidelem

Ah, my sweet sister, Was it idle toil,
When in the flowerless Eden of Shanghai
We made immortal mischief, you and I,
"Casting our flame-flowers on the dull brown soil?"
Did we not light a lamp withouten oil
Nursed by unfruitful kisses, stealthily
Strewn in the caldron (sic) where our Destiny
Bides brooding - Mother, bid its brew to boil!
Ah, Sweetheart, we were barren as Sahara,
But on Sahara burns our subtle star.
Soon an oasis, now too lone and far,
Shall bloom with all the blossoms of Bokhara:
See! o'er the brim the mystic fountain flows!
Cull from the caldron (sic) the ensanguine Rose!

Did Crowley send Elaine a copy of this poem, or of the book? If Elaine did have a copy I wonder what she made of Crowley's reference to his wife Rose, which suggests to me that he was regretting opting for her rather than Elaine when he thought he had the choice. But on the other hand, perhaps the poem is just a fantasy of what they might have had but too late now.

AFTER CROWLEY - THE REST OF ELAINE'S LIFE

Where was Paul Harry Witkowski while all this magic and nearly some adultery was going on his house?! He must at least have not objected to Elaine's keeping one room for her magic; but was his attitude one of indulgence, or a real understanding that it was important to her? He was never in the GD himself and probably understood virtually nothing of what went on in it, but surely he hadn't bargained for a magician who was an old flame of his wife's to turn up and do magic with her over at least two intense days. Perhaps Crowley's timing was better than he knew, and he reached Shanghai while Paul was away. But the almost-cuckolded husband's part in all this is intriguing. He was never put to the ultimate test, however, and - in whatever manner - the marriage of Paul Witkowski and Elaine continued until it was ended by Paul's death. Though perhaps it did not satisfy either party to it.

Hmmm. Maybe it's not so odd that Crowley and Elaine never met again as far as I can tell. They had come very close to going too far, not so much on the sexual level but in their emotional involvement; and had both drawn back. Their parting wasn't one of bitterness and estrangement.

Crowley knew about the death of Paul Witkowski, so Elaine must have written to him about it. There are other letters from Elaine in Crowle's papers. Their last contact was in 1928 - Elaine wrote to Crowley inviting him to visit her in Frankfurt. He did reply to her letter, but it looks like he didn't visit (I haven't seen his letter myself - it's just referred to in Kaczynski's biography).

I know very little about Elaine's life after April 1906. Whether she continued to do magic on her own, in the room in the house in Shanghai and other places she lived in later - who knows.

Paul Witkowski died on 6 September 1907 aged 42. He was back in Germany, staying with Alfred Schwenger, in Bad Nauheim. However he and Elaine had not moved back to Europe permanently, Paul's normal address was still Shanghai. It's not clear from the death registration whether Elaine was in Germany with her husband. She was certainly back in Europe in 1908 when she was winding up the English part of his estate. Thanks to Claire Claire StEdward Crowley I can (April 2017) say that in 1909 Elaine married again. Her second husband was Karl Julius Emil Wölker (born 1870) who worked for the German postal service. They lived in Hamburg. Elaine may have had a second family with him; I don't know. Claire Claire StEdward Crowley has looked for a second family and not found one. She has found official notification that Elaine and Wölker were divorced in 1924.

Elaine contributed enough to the preparation of The Life and Letters... to be elected with her mother as a member of the Royal Asiatic Society before it was even published, in November 1910. She kept up her membership of the Royal Asiatic Society only until 1912.

The last I know of Elaine is an exchange of letters with Crowley in 1928. More details on the rest of her life will be published by the Ordo Templi Orientis in their definitive edition of Crowley's Confessions.

BASIC SOURCES I USED for all Golden Dawn members.

Membership of the Golden Dawn: The Golden Dawn Companion by R A Gilbert. Northampton: The Aquarian Press 1986. Between pages 125 and 175, Gilbert lists the names, initiation dates and addresses of all those people who became members of the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn or its many daughter Orders between 1888 and 1914. The list is based on the Golden Dawn's administrative records and its Members' Roll - the large piece of parchment on which all new members signed their name at their initiation. All this information had been inherited by Gilbert but it's now in the Freemasons' Library at the United Grand Lodge of England building on Great Queen Street Covent Garden. Please note, though, that the records of the Amen-Ra Temple in Edinburgh were destroyed in 1900/01. As far as I know, the records of the Horus Temple at Bradford have not survived either.

Family history: freebmd; ancestry.co.uk (census and probate); findmypast.co.uk; familysearch; Burke's Peerage and Baronetage; Burke's Landed Gentry; Armorial Families; thepeerage.com; and a wide variety of family trees on the web.

Famous-people sources: mostly about men, of course, but very useful even for the female members of GD. Oxford Dictionary of National Biography. Who Was Who. Times Digital Archive.

Useful source for business and legal information: London Gazette and its Scottish counterpart Edinburgh Gazette. Now easy to find (with the right search information) on the web.

Catalogues: British Library; Freemasons' Library.

Wikipedia; Google; Google Books - my three best resources. I also used other web pages, but with some caution, as - from the historian's point of view - they vary in quality a great deal.

SOURCES FOR ELAINE SIMPSON WITKOWSKI WOLKER

HER MOTHER AND FATHER

Birth and baptism information via familysearch.

Life and Letters of Sir John Hall MD KCB FRCS by S M Mitra though commissioned by and using original documents provided by Alice Isabel Simpson. Published London, New York, Bombay, Calcutta: Longmans Green and Co 1911 p298, p544.

Crockford's Clerical Directory 1891 p1190.

Website www.findachurch.co.uk

Scottish Episcopal Clergy 1689-2000 by David M Bertie published Edinburgh: T and T Clark 2000, p598.

That St John the Evangelist Baillieston was a high church establishment, see Irish Identities in Victorian Britain editors Roger Swift and Sheridan Gilley published London: Routledge 2011: p144.

For Rev Simpson's presumed death:

Crockford's Clerical Directory 1900 Volume 2 p1241

HER EDUCATION

The Gates of Light by Beatrice Irwin (Alice Beatrice Simpson). London: Rider and Co. Undated but British Library catalogue gives the publication date as 1930. P154 but it's just a very brief biographical paragraph and it doesn't mention Elaine.

The website of Cheltenham Ladies' College is at www.cheltladiescollege.org but it's very focused on the present and future. Wikipedia has a page on the history of the College. Between those pages and the College's old girls' society at www.clcguild.org I found several lists of ex-pupils but neither Elaine nor Beatrice were named in them; though GD member Florence Farr was.

ELAINE'S FIRST HUSBAND PAUL IGNATZ (known as HARRY) WITKOWSKI

His parents' names, and his being born in Berlin: details on his death registration - see below.
His life in the Far East.

The Directory and Chronicle for China, Japan, Corea (sic), Indo-China, Straits Settlements etc published by the Hong Kong Daily Press. For Arnhold Karberg, issue of 1889 p294. For Paul Witkowski's arrival in Hong Kong: issues of 1892 (in which he wasn't listed) and 1894 p215. For a possible date for the move to Shanghai, issue of 1902 p362.

The Bankers', Insurance Managers' and Agents' Magazine volume LXXIII January-June 1902. London: Waterlow and Sons Ltd 1902 p606

ARNHOLD KARBERG

See wikipedia for an introduction to the firm, which still exists.

History of the Hongkong and Shanghai Banking Corporation in 4 volumes. Volume 1 is The Hongkong Bank in Late Imperial China 1864-1902: on an Even Keel. Frank H H King, with Catherine E King and David J S King. Cambridge etc: Cambridge University Press 1987: pp336-37, pp461-66, p701. Volume 2 is: The Hongkong Bank in the Period of Imperialism and War 1895-1918: Wayfoong, the Focus of Wealth. Frank H H King with David J S King and Catherine E King. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press 1988 pp22-24 and p719.

Article on the web in its entirety: The German-Speaking Community in Hong Kong 1846-1918, by Carl T Smith, based on a talk he gave, presumably at the Royal Asiatic Society because it was published in the Journal of the Royal Asiatic Society Hong Kong Branch volume 34 1994. Very interesting on the important part in Far East commerce played by Arnhold Karberg and other German firms before World War One.

Elaine and Paul Witkowski's child: info sent March and April 2017 by Claire StEdward Crowley by email but she hasn't been able to find original documents for any of it. Child b 1901 was Georgiana. Claire also saw information on a son, born 1904 in Shanghai: Richard Paul Witkowski. She saw at least one arrival in US from 1920s but the last known address for him was Naples.

Death registration details for Paul Witkowski, translated from the German; including the names of his parents and where he was born. The registration had a note on it that he was Paul Ignatz Witkowski, not Paul Harry. Sent by email April 2017 by Claire StEdward Crowley

Probate Registry 1908 re death of Paul Harry Witkowski.

ELAINE SIMPSON AND ALEISTER CROWLEY

For 1901: Crowley's own diary, accessed by researcher Clint Warren.

The account of the trouble at Blythe Road that I usually use is: The Magicians of the Golden Dawn: A Documentary History of a Magical Order 1887-1923 by Ellic Howe. Routledge and Kegan Paul Ltd 1972. The chapter is based on Crowley's Abra-Melin Notebook (though the last entry in that notebook is Saturday 21 April) and an account of the battle written for the GD's ruling committee by GD member Edmund Hunter; with long quotes from both.

The early and later versions of The Confessions:

The Spirit of Solitude: an Autohagiography subsequently re-Antichristened The Confessions of Aleister Crowley. London: Mandrake Press Museum St 1929. It ends in April 1904, just before Aiwass dictated The Book of the Law.

The authorised version! - the one most people know: The Confessions of Aleister Crowley: An Autohagiography. The edition I used: edited by John Symonds and Kenneth Grant, published London, Boston, Henley: Routledge and Kegan Paul 1979.

There's also a version of The Confessions on the web at Www.hermetic.com/crowley/confessions:

The website I refer to as 'lashtal', which is run by the Aleister Crowley Society:

www.lashtal.com/wiki/Aleister\_Crowley\_Timeline.

The Winged Beetle poems by Aleister Crowley. 350 copies, privately printed 1910. Only three members of GD have a poem dedicated to them: George Cecil Jones; Allan Bennett; and Elaine. On pp163-67 The Opium-Smoker and p145 Ad Fidelem Infidelem.

The Golden Dawn sources, held at the Freemasons' Library. Call number GD 2/4/3/37 is the expulsion order, read by Florence Farr at a meeting held at the Isis-Urania temple on 5 May 1900. All GD members were entitled to attend this meeting so Florence didn't go into details about the reasons for the expulsions.

GD 2/4/3/38 is a series of letters and a bill for fees to Annie Horniman from solicitor Charles Russell of 31 Norfolk Street. Wealthy and generous Annie Horniman was paying the GD's costs in the legal actions arising from the incidents at Blythe Road.

GD 2/4/3/40 is a very short note, anonymous but written on Annie Horniman's printed notepaper at Flat H1 Montague Mansions Portman Sq; so probably by her. It's where the quote about Elaine's threatened reputation comes from.

GD 2/4/3/41 is notes needed for the legal cases.

The biography of Crowley that I use is Perdurabo: The Life of Aleister Crowley by Richard Kaczynski. Berkeley California: NAH Books originally 2000 this revised edition 2010. Most of his information on Elaine's early life he got from The Life and Letters. There's an error on p65 - he identifies her grandfather wrongly. There are so many men called John Hall!

ELAINE'S LATER LIFE

Elaine's second marriage: marriage registration, in German, sent me by Claire StEdward Crowley April 2017. Attached is a brief note of the divorce: in the Frankfurt courts, 27 February 1924.

The Life and Letters of Sir John Hall

1928:

Kaczynski op cit p155. It's not clear from this reference whether the letters exchanged in 1928 were the latest in a correspondence lasting many years; or whether Elaine had contacted Crowley after a long period of quiet. The reference to their having been an exchange of letters is made in a letter from Crowley to Gerald Yorke 1 January 1929, now in the Yorke Collection, Warburg Institute University of London. I couldn't tell from the reference whether Elaine's letter is still in Crowley's papers.

Journal of the Royal Asiatic Society of Great Britain and Ireland published by the Society at 22 Albemarle Street London. Issues of January 1911 to 1930.

26 May 2017

Find the web pages of Roger Wright and Sally Davis, including my list of people initiated into the Order of the Golden Dawn between 1888 and 1901, at:

<http://www.wrightanddavis.co.uk>

***

Thérèse Charlotte Simpson was initiated into the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn at its Amon-Ra temple in Edinburgh, on 23 March 1896. She chose the Latin motto 'Aliis nutrior'. Two other people were initiated on the same evening - Emily Robertson and William McNair Wallace - and even if none of the three of them had met before the ritual, Mrs Robertson and Mr McNair will have known Thérèse by repute.

This is one of my short biographies. I didn't know anything more about Thérèse Simpson than anyone could come across using Ancestry, until I found www.kosmoid.net, web pages about Henry and Marjory Simpson, Thérèse's parents. It's based on original documents: drawings and photographs, extracts from letters, reminiscences from 19th century family members. A big big thank you to its compilers, for pointing out to me that Thérèse Simpson and her family were very well-known in 19th century Edinburgh. That being so, there must be a whole lot more information on them. In Edinburgh. I'd need to be on the spot to look at them, and I've had to admit that life's too short!

Sally Davis

March 2016

Here's what I have found on THÉRÈSE CHARLOTTE SIMPSON without having spent several months in Edinburgh reading the newspapers and going through local archives.

A word before we start: even Thérèse's childhood appearances in the census have the two French accents on her forename - her parents were very insistent on them!

IN THE GD

The records of the Amon-Ra temple have been lost, so it's not possible for me to say how keen a member of the GD Thérèse was, or how far she progressed as a magician. I think I can say with a fair amount of certainty that Thérèse wasn't initiated into the GD's inner, 2nd Order. She may even have given the GD up as a bad job quite soon after she was initiated, and not because she found that the western esoteric tradition didn't interest her as much as theosophy. All the GD's temples had their share of internal disputes, but letters sent by GD member William Sutherland Hunter suggest that Amon-Ra was particularly bedevilled that way. Hunter's friend Edward Macbean resigned from Amon-Ra early in 1898, probably for that very reason; and Hunter himself seems to have stopped going to the rituals later that year. Perhaps Thérèse felt the same.

Between 1900 and 1903 the GD in London split into two factions. After 1903 each faction set up its own daughter order - Stella Matutina and the Independent and Rectified Rite. Although Thérèse was living near London by then, there's no evidence that she joined either of them.

Sources:

For the strife in Amon-Ra:

Gerald Yorke Collection held at the Warburg Institute: letters to and from Frederick Leigh Gardner, reference number NS73. Letters to Gardner from W S Hunter: 1 June 1897 and 17 January 1898. Hunter tried his best to keep out of all the arguments, but told Gardner that the in-fighting had left him feeling that none of the temple's members could be trusted.

Lists of members of the two daughter orders do exist and are published in R A Gilbert: see the main Sources section below.

ANY OTHER ESOTERIC INTERESTS?

Yes. Like so many people who were initiated into the GD, Thérèse was a member of the Theosophical Society. Thérèse had joined the TS in 1889, when it was only really active in London. Her becoming a member so early suggests that she was going to some at least of its London meetings. If she was doing so, she will have met not only Helena Petrovna Blavatsky, but also several people who joined the GD later; as well as William Wynn Westcott and Samuel Liddell Mathers, who founded it. In the early 1890s, there were enough people in Edinburgh with an interest in theosophy to set up two TS lodges there, and a library. Andrew Petrie Cattanach, ran the library. In 1893 he helped to found the TS's Scottish Lodge, which Thérèse was a member of until she went to live in England. Cattanach worked for Cowan and Co - see below for Thérèse's family connection with the firm. He was initiated into the GD in 1893.

Andrew Cattanach might have been the one who recommended Thérèse as a suitable candidate for initiation into the GD. However, in Bradford, Liverpool and Edinburgh nearly everybody who was in the TS was initiated into the GD as well; so sooner or later, someone Thérèse knew in the TS would have put her name forward.

Thérèse continued to be a TS member through a series of upheavals that nearly destroyed it in the 1890s and 1900s; and through her move to England, some time after 1901. However, in 1907 Annie Besant was elected the TS's president for life. She brought back Charles Webster Leadbeater, whose relationships with some of the TS's adolescent members had forced his resignation from the TS several years before. Thérèse was amongst many hundreds of TS members who resigned over Leadbeater's re-instatement, sending in her resignation letter in November 1907. After that, if she maintained her interest in theosophy, it was in private.

Sources:

Theosophical Society Membership Register January 1889-September 1891 p130 Thérèse Simpson. Application 27 September 1889. "Resigned 14.11.1907". While I was going through the registers I couldn't help noticing how many members resigned in 1907, or never paid their annual subscription after that year.

Lucifer: A Theosophical Magazine Volume VII September 1890 to February 1891. London: Theosophical Publishing Society, 7 Duke Street Adelphi. Volume VII issue 15 December 1890 p344 announcing the TS's library in Edinburgh, run by A P Cattanaach at 67 Brunswick Street. Lucifer: A Theosophical Magazine Volume XI September 1892- February 1893. Published London: Theosophical Publishing Society of 7 Duke Street Adelphi. Volume XI number 64 issued 15 December 1892 p342-43 a report on the Scottish Lodge giving Mr Cattanaach of 67 Brunswick Street Edinburgh as its contact.

ANY OBITUARIES/BIOGRAPHIES?

There ought to be obituaries of Thérèse in the Edinburgh newspapers, even though she died in England. I hope the Scots had not forgotten her.

BIRTH/YOUTH/FAMILY BACKGROUND

Again, many thanks to the compilers of the kosmoid web pages, which show very clearly that Thérèse's family were at the forefront of Edinburgh's musical life for a large part of the 19th century. Her parents, Henry and Marjory, were both talented musicians - both of them played the piano and at the kosmoid website there's a picture of Marjory playing her guitar. I'm not quite sure I've got the right person but I think it's Marjory's sister Lucy, who married Thomas Constable, that is mentioned as a talented pianist in one of the sources below this section. Thérèse's sister Elizabeth married James Montgomerie Bell, who was later a founder of the Edinburgh Bach Choir.

Not to diminish any of that, but the Simpsons and their relations by marriage were accomplished and keen amateurs, not professionals. Thérèse and her brothers James and Frederick James did all earn money by teaching music. However, only Thérèse and Frederick James ventured any further into the world of the professional musician. Thérèse sang in public; though I would doubt very much whether she took payment for her appearances. And Frederick James, the best educated (musically speaking) of all Henry and Marjory's children, published some songs.

There are other reasons for being fascinated by Thérèse's family background.

HER FATHER HENRY SIMPSON

The kosmoid website says that Henry Simpson was a son of Dr Robert Simpson who worked and lived in Russia. I am a little worried about this information as Henry's marriage registration says his father's name was Alexander Simpson. However, Henry was born in Russia, so he probably is related to the Dr Robert Simpson who arrived in Russia in 1774 to take up a position as medical officer to the Russian Imperial Navy. Dr Robert rose through the medical ranks and was appointed chief surgeon of the naval hospital at the navy's main base in Cronstadt (or Kronstadt) in 1792. He later left the imperial navy and went into private practice in St Petersburg. Henry Simpson was born in St Petersburg in 1805.

Henry Simpson made what in 19th century terms would have been described as a very good marriage, with the daughter of a wealthy Scottish industrialist.

MARJORY COWAN

Marjory Cowan was a member of the paper-making family of Edinburgh and Valleyfield Mill at Penicuik. Her grandfather, Charles Cowan, was the first family member to hold the lease of the Valleyfield Mill. Her father, Alexander Cowan, and her brothers, made the firm one of the world's biggest paper-makers and distributors; as Alexander Cowan and Sons, and later as Cowan and Co. Alexander Cowan was married twice. Marjory was one of his 11 children, though only 8 survived to adulthood. He moved his family to Edinburgh in 1811 and into Moray House Canongate around 1830. The family was prominent in those circles in Edinburgh where society, business and politics met. Marjory's brothers Charles and James were both MP's for Edinburgh at different times; James also served as Lord Provost of Edinburgh; John was made a baronet. Marjory's sister Lucia Ann married Thomas Constable, son of the Edinburgh publisher Archibald Constable.

Henry Simpson married Marjory Cowan in May 1833. I couldn't find any information about whether Henry Simpson was working for Alexander Cowan and Co before his marriage; but he did work for it after he married Marjory.

Sources:

Russian connections of Henry Simpson's family:

At www.electricscotland.com there's what seems to be a whole book on the importance of the Scots in Russian history. I couldn't see the title, author or page numbers. Information on Robert Simpson - though without any mention of an Alexander Simpson - is in its Chapter 9: Scottish Families Living in Russia. It's surprising how many there were, especially in the navy.

The Cowan family of Penicuik and Edinburgh:

See wikipedia for several of its members.

Website scottishprintarchive.org, the web pages of the Scottish Printing Archival Trust.

At www.scotlandswar.ed.ac.uk, information on the Cowan connection with Penicuik.

Henry and Marjory:

The website on them and their family is at www.kosmoid.net

Date and place of their marriage from Familysearch Scotland-ODM GS film number 1067747.

HENRY AND MARJORY and THEIR FAMILY

Henry's work for Alexander Cowan and Co had sent him to Liverpool by 1838. Thérèse Charlotte Simpson, known to her family as Rézie, was born in the parish of St George Everton at the beginning of that year. On census day 1841, the Simpsons were living at Green Bank in Birkenhead, where their son Alexander had been born a few days before. With them on that day were Elizabeth (aged 5), Thérèse, Frances (aged 2); and the four family servants. By 1845, when Thérèse's next sister, Harriet, was born, Henry and Marjory were back in Edinburgh. Sister Marjorie was born in Scotland as well, in 1847, but the Simpsons then spent several years in Cronstadt, where Joseph and William were born (1850 and 1853). I'm sure Henry and Marjory made full use of the opportunity it gave them to visit imperial St Petersburg.

When Henry and Marjory returned to Scotland they set up home in Portobello, on the North Sea coast. Frederick James, their last child, was born in Portobello in 1857. By the day of the 1861 census they had moved into Selville House, where the family lived until the mid-1880s. Census day 1861 was the last census day all the children were at home - Elizabeth, Thérèse, Frances, Harriet, Marjorie, Joseph, William and Frederick. The Simpsons were employing a cook-cum-housekeeper, a housemaid and a nursery maid - quite a modest staff for so big and (presumably) so wealthy a household. Thérèse was 23, and was perhaps already singing solos.

EDUCATION

I haven't come across any details of what ordinary education Thérèse might have had. On the census days of 1841 and 1861 there was no governess living in Henry and Marjory Simpson's household. Census days are just snapshots of people's lives, but perhaps the Simpson daughters - like the Simpson sons - never had a governess but attended a school in Edinburgh. Living for several years in Russia might have been quite an education in itself.

Thanks to the kosmoid website, I have found out about Thérèse's musical education. Her parents thought her sufficiently talented, and sufficiently willing to do the necessary work, to pay for her to have some specialist teaching.

WORK/PROFESSION

Thérèse was a soprano. I've already suggested that she probably did not take money for her singing; it would not have been seemly for a woman of her social class even if she had needed the money. However, she did sing solos at public concerts; and probably also at soirées in Edinburgh and elsewhere, though evidence for this kind of private musical evening is harder to find.

The kosmoid website lists three named teachers and one unnamed one who taught Thérèse at different times.

"Miss Yaniewicz" (as she's spelled on the kosmoid website), more usually spelled Janiewicz.

This was Felicia Janiewicz, daughter of Feliks Janiewicz (1762-1848) the violinist and musical impresario. Feliks began his career in the orchestra of the king of Poland; he spent time in Vienna, Italy and Paris before the wars in Europe drove him to settle in the UK. After some years in Liverpool he and his family moved to Edinburgh in 1815. Felicia was the eldest of his three children, a pianist, singer and teacher of singing in Edinburgh. Her scrapbooks still survive and it would be good to know if Thérèse Simpson appears in them at all.

Thérèse's second teacher, A W Smith, was more difficult to find out about. Such evidence as I did come across suggested that eventually he went to the USA. However, he was living in Edinburgh in 1861 when he helped to found the Edinburgh Glee Union; and was still a professor of singing in 1885, giving lessons at 4 West Castle Road Merchiston - though by that time Thérèse was giving lessons herself.

When exactly Thérèse had lessons with Miss Janiewicz and Mr Smith I haven't been able to discover. However, the 1850s and 1860s seem likely, when Thérèse was in her twenties and thirties. The Kosmoid website doesn't give a name to the teacher Thérèse went to Paris to have lessons with in 1875. And perhaps that's a good thing from the point of view of the teacher's reputation, because the lessons Thérèse had with whoever it was, put her singing career in jeopardy. Fortunately, her voice recovered after she had had some sessions with the teacher and composer Franz Bosen.

I haven't found much evidence for Thérèse Simpson's concert appearances. I'm sure I'd uncover a lot more if I could spend some time looking at the Edinburgh newspapers. I also discovered that there was at least one other 'Miss Simpson' singing in public in the UK in the second half of the 19th century - a woman from Lancaster. So I'm not sure if it was Thérèse who was the "Miss Simpson" who took part in a singing competition at the Crystal Palace in 1872; or if it was Thérèse who was the "Miss Simpson" whose libretto was mentioned in a magazine in 1894. The Miss Simpson of 1872 did not win the competition; on the other hand, the reporter in The Musical Standard thought the judges had made a serious mistake, in choosing Anna Williams instead - the limitations of Miss Williams's voice were exposed only a day or two later, in the gala concert at the end of the competition!

I feel more confident about it being Thérèse who sang the solo soprano part in a performance of Mendelssohn's setting of the 42nd Psalm, at the Music Hall in Edinburgh in May 1875. I also think it was Thérèse who sang the solo O Peaceful Night at a concert at the same venue in 1891 in which the Western Choral Society sang Cowen's cantata St John's Eve. And I sincerely hope it was Thérèse who was both solo vocalist and conductor when an amateur women's choir gave a concert at the Queen Street Hall in Edinburgh in May 1883 to raise money for the Edinburgh Suffrage Society. If Thérèse was a believer in votes for women, she was one of the few GD members who showed any obvious interest in the social and political issues of their day. Good for her and I'd like to think that some of the other women GD members in Edinburgh were in the choir that evening.

By 1881 if not earlier, Thérèse was giving singing lessons; and I presume she was being paid for this, because she described it as her source of income to the census official that year. She was being interviewed for the census at Selville House, where she and her brother James - also a music teacher - were at home, with just two servants as their parents were away. On census day 1891 Thérèse told that year's census official that she was a school teacher and I take that to mean that she was not just teaching music. In the past ten years there had been many changes to her family and financial situation. Her father had died, the house at Portobello had been given up, and Thérèse's career as a singer was probably in decline, as she was now over 50. She was living in Haddington, apparently on her own, but in some comfort as she was employing two servants. On census day she had a visitor, Elizabeth Martin from Glasgow, who perhaps was a singing pupil.

Sources for Thérèse's singing teachers:

Oxford Dictionary of Music online p431 entry for Feliks Janiewicz though it doesn't mention his children.

At pwm.com.pl/en, a dictionary of Polish musicians, there's an entry in English for Feliks Janiewicz which you can access directly if you search with that spelling of his name. I think the information at this website is what was used by the Oxford Dictionary; though it has more details including brief entries on Feliks' children.

The British Library catalogue lists a few works by Feliks Janiewicz: songs, chamber works; and some orchestral pieces including a couple arranged more recently by Panufnik. The catalogue doesn't have contain works by any of his children.

Felicia Janiewicz's scrapbook is mentioned at tub.archiveshub.ac.uk: GB 73 AAD/2003/14/8 covering the 1820s to 1862. It's in the V&A archives, in the papers of her nephew, the architect Charles Harrison Townsend. Townsend designed the Horniman Museum in south London, for the father of GD member Annie Horniman.

The British Library had only one work written by A W Smith; it was published in 1905 in the USA.

The Musical World 1861 p108 issue of 16 February 1861: report on the first concert of the Edinburgh Glee Union.

Dr Carter Moffat's Ammoniaphone published 1885 p37 as a Professor of Singing, based in Edinburgh; in a set of small ads.

I saw several references via google to an A W Smithm musician and composer, in the USA; it must be the same man.

The British Library has songs written by Franz Bosen, often to poems translated from German; also opera arias arranged for violin and piano. The earliest of these was published in 1842; most were from the 1850s and 1860s.

At www.concertina.com, an issue of the Royal Musical Association Research Chronicle 39 published 2006. Article by Allan W Atlas: Ladies in the Wheatstone Ledgers: the Gendered Concertina in Victorian Engl 1835-70: p6 . The concertina had been invented 30 years previously in 1860 and already had a wide repertoire. Bosen as mentioned as one of those composers who had written works for it.

Thérèse's own career as a singer and teacher of singing: census 1891, 1901.

The British Library catalogue has no works by her.

The Musical Standard issue of 6 July 1872 report on the singing competitions held recently at the Crystal Palace National Meetings.

The Monthly Musical Record 1875 p107 issue of 1 July 1875 concert by the Sacred Harmonic Society at the Music Hall Edinburgh on 29 May [1875].

Musical Times and Singing Class Circular volumes 18-20 1877 p331 concert at the Corn Exchange by the Vocal Union. "Miss Simpson (Edinburgh)" sang the soprano solo role. This was a google snippet; I couldn't see the date of the concert, or which town it had taken place in.

Everywoman's Review of Social and Industrial Questions volume 13 1883 p268 issue of 19 June 1883: concert in Queen Street Hall Edinburgh 26 May [1883].

Musical News volume 1 1891 p202 concert by the Western Choral Society in the Music Hall Edinburgh in which the main work was Cowen's (sic) cantata St John's Eve.

A libretto that was possibly by Thérèse: The Musical Herald and Tonic Sol-fa Reporter issues 550-51 1894 p366 issue of 1 December 1894.

ANY PUBLICATIONS?

Not that I've found, either of musical scores or of a book; but I've only searched the British Library catalogue. If Thérèse wrote any songs, they are more likely to have been published in Scotland.

FAMILY

Thérèse never married. Her closest relationships were with her musical siblings and their families; particularly the youngest and best musically-educated of them, Frederick James.

The death of Henry Simpson, in December 1885 must have been a terrible blow to such a close-knit family; though I think it was not unexpected. Thérèse's mother Marjory went to live with Thérèse's eldest sister Elizabeth, and her husband John Montgomerie Bell. John Bell was a writer to the Signet (a legal position) in Edinburgh. On the day of the 1891 census they were all living at 55a Grange Road in Edinburgh but Marjory Simpson died a few months later.

FREDERICK JAMES SIMPSON

When I say that Thérèse's youngest brother Frederick was the best educated of her family, musically speaking, I mean that unlike his older siblings, he studied music at Oxford University, at the National Training College which became the Royal College of Music; and in Germany. He was 19 years younger than Thérèse and a man - opportunities were available to him that had not been to her or even to his older brothers. However, educational opportunities aren't everything. Frederick doesn't seem to have worked as a musician; at least, I think I would have found evidence if he'd been a soloist though not necessarily if he'd played in an orchestra. The British Library has only 12 works composed by him, mostly songs. It doesn't have a score of a symphony he wrote - the Robert the Bruce Symphony - which incorporated the tune of Scots Wha Hae. The symphony was given its first performance in England in 1889; but has never been played regularly since.

In 1901 and again in 1911 Frederick is described in the census as a music teacher. He must have been taking private pupils - like Thérèse was - because as far as I can see, he was never employed by any of the music colleges. Shortly after he left Oxford University the job of professor of music at Edinburgh University became vacant. Frederick applied for it, but didn't get it. I get the sense of a man who promised much but delivered rather less.

In 1901 Thérèse and Frederick were both teaching music. Thérèse had moved from Haddington back into Edinburgh and was living at 1a Hill Place. She was on her own there - no servants and no live-in pupils. Frederick had settled in England and was living at Little Baddow, now a suburb of Chelmsford. He was employing a housekeeper to look after four young lodgers. Later that year, he married Georgina Chapman Hopwood. By 1907, Thérèse - now nearly 70 - had gone to live with Frederick, Georgina and their two children, at a house called Holville, at Hayes End in Middlesex. She wasn't at home on the day of the 1911 census; perhaps she was visiting relations in Scotland.

Thérèse continued to live with Frederick, Georgina, Henry and Lucy - it made sense to pool their financial resources. At some point - perhaps when World War 1 broke out - they all moved to the village of Wheatacre near Lowestoft in Norfolk. Thérèse died in 1923 and her death was registered in the Loddon registration district, which contains Wheatacre. Frederick died at The Old Rectory Wheatacre in 1942.

Sources: census 1901, 1911.

Theosophical Society Membership Register January 1889-September 1891 p130 entry for Thérèse Simpson: Holville, Hayes End, Middlesex was the last address she gave to the TS administrators. It's also the address Frederick James Simpson was living at on the day of the 1911 census.

There's no probate registry entry for Thérèse Simpson.

For Frederick James Simpson:

British Library catalogue. The 12 works are mostly songs with one or two pieces for orchestra. The earliest is 1888; after 1906 there's a gap until a last item dated 1918; there's nothing by him after that.

A Short Historical Account of the Degrees in Music at Oxford and Cambridge compiled by Charles Francis Abdy Williams. Novello Ewer and Co 1893. On p116 Frederick James Simpson as a graduate of New College; I couldn't see the date of his graduation but the man at the top of the page graduated in 1891.

Edinburgh University Calendar 1892 p568 reporting the names of the applicants for the chair of Music.

Icons of the Middle Ages: Rulers, Writers, Rebels and Saints editor Lister M Matheson. Greenwood Press 2011. Snippet seen via google so no page numbers. Some details of Frederick's career; and a reference to his Robert the Bruce symphony.

Probate Registry 1942.

BASIC SOURCES I USED for all Golden Dawn members.

Membership of the Golden Dawn: The Golden Dawn Companion by R A Gilbert. Northampton: The Aquarian Press 1986. Between pages 125 and 175, Gilbert lists the names, initiation dates and addresses of all those people who became members of the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn or its many daughter Orders between 1888 and 1914. The list is based on the Golden Dawn's administrative records and its Members' Roll - the large piece of parchment on which all new members signed their name at their initiation. All this information had been inherited by Gilbert but it's now in the Freemasons' Library at the United Grand Lodge of England building on Great Queen Street Covent Garden. Please note, though, that the records of the Amen-Ra Temple in Edinburgh were destroyed in 1900/01. I have recently (July 2014) discovered that some records of the Horus Temple at Bradford have survived, though most have not; however those that have survived are not yet accessible to the public.

For the history of the GD during the 1890s I usually use Ellic Howe's The Magicians of the Golden Dawn: A Documentary History of a Magical Order 1887-1923. Published Routledge and Kegan Paul 1972. Foreword by Gerald Yorke. Howe is a historian of printing rather than of magic; he also makes no claims to be a magician himself, or even an occultist. He has no axe to grind.

Family history: freebmd; ancestry.co.uk (census and probate); findmypast.co.uk; familysearch; Burke's Peerage and Baronetage; Burke's Landed Gentry; Armorial Families; thepeerage.com; and a wide variety of family trees on the web.

Famous-people sources: mostly about men, of course, but very useful even for the female members of GD. Oxford Dictionary of National Biography. Who Was Who. Times Digital Archive.

Useful source for business and legal information: London Gazette and its Scottish counterpart Edinburgh Gazette. Now easy to find (with the right search information) on the web.

Catalogues: British Library; Freemasons' Library.

Wikipedia; Google; Google Books - my three best resources. I also used other web pages, but with some caution, as - from the historian's point of view - they vary in quality a great deal.

28 March 2016

Email me at

Find the web pages of Roger Wright and Sally Davis, including my list of people initiated into the Order of the Golden Dawn between 1888 and 1901, at:

www.wrightanddavis.co.uk

***

The Spink sisters were initiated into the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn at its Horus Temple in Bradford; but none of them remained in the Order for very long. The first sister to join was Florence Margaret Firth (née Spink), initiated in September 1890 and using the Latin motto 'Volantia'. Her husband Oliver Firth was a member already. They had married the month before her initiation. Catherine Elizabeth Spink (always called Kate) was initiated on 2 May 1892 and chose the Latin motto, 'Viator'. On that evening, Emily Douglas and possibly Robert Elliott Steel and Charles Herbert Grason were also initiated in Bradford. All the sisters had probably known Robert Steel for several years - he was a friend of Oliver Firth. Gertrude Jane Spink was initiated in November 1892 and chose another Latin motto 'Persevero'. However, by the time of Gertrude's initiation, Oliver Firth was in trouble with the GD hierarchy for his rather negative attitude towards the Order's rituals, seen by other members as disrespectful - see more about that in my biography of Oliver and Florence after her marriage. Oliver resigned from the GD, rather than be brought to heel, making the continuation of his wife and sisters-in-law in the Order rather difficult. Florence and Gertrude resigned as well; and Kate didn't bother to pay her year's subscription in 1893. None of the sisters had any chance to progress very far with the study of western esotericism that was expected of new GD initiates; in any case they were more interested in eastern philosophy.

THREE SISTERS CALLED SPINK and THE HORTON CONNECTION

Kate, Florence and Gertrude were daughters of John Spink and his wife Elizabeth. John Spink had been born in 1837 in York but had moved to Bradford by 1861, drawn by the continuing rapid expansion of the city, with its opportunities for work not only in the cloth industry but in all the enterprises that supplied the needs of the city's inhabitants.

Not being based in Bradford, I haven't been able to find much information on John Spink's wine and spirit importing and selling business. On the day of the 1861 census, it was already doing well enough for him to be able to employ one young man to assist him. They were both living above their offices and store-rooms at the King's Arms Inn in Great Horton, a coaching inn increasingly redundant in the railway age, which John Spink was renting from the Rudd family. Also living at the Inn were John's uncle Thomas Banks and Thomas' wife Martha who was probably housekeeping for everyone. Thomas and Martha had also moved to Bradford from York. Thomas was working as a plane-maker and may have known Joseph Clayton, who was later a senior member of the GD. Clayton was a plane-maker during the late 1840s and 1850s but was working as a teacher by 1861.

John Spink's business continued to prosper - it would have been easier to find details of it if it had got into financial trouble! - and by 1901 he had turned it into a limited company, possibly with family members drawing income from it as shareholders. His early connection with Horton had ended - he had given up renting the King's Arms Inn and must have taken larger premises somewhere in Bradford, although I haven't been able to find out where; and from the earliest years of his marriage he and his wife chose to live, not in Horton but in other Bradford suburbs.

In 1866 John Spink married Elizabeth Bottomley, a member of an old-established West Riding family. I've found several references to men called Bottomley living in Horton in the early 19th century; I imagine they are all related to Elizabeth even if only distantly. In 1815 a John Bottomley, who worked as an accountant, was one of a group of men buying land to extend the local dissenters' chapel. In 1847 a Samuel Bottomley was one of Bradford City Council's first intake of councillors, being elected to represent Little Horton with five other men including a John Clayton. Elizabeth's father Eli Bottomley owned a worsted stuff mill in Horton which in 1861 was big enough to employ 113 women, 24 men and three boys. Also in Horton was the Shear Bridge worsted mill run until the early 1870s by Oliver Firth's father, Thomas Firth, and from then until the 1890s (probably), by his sons Alfred and Oliver. The Bottomley and Firth families both lived near their mills in Horton at this time and must have known each other from the 1850s if not earlier.

JOHN AND ELIZABETH SPINK'S FAMILY

Kate, Florence and Gertrude were the eldest of John and Elizabeth Spink's children, born in 1867, 1868 and 1869 respectively. By the day of the 1871 census, the Spinks were living in Manningham, at 3 Walmer Place. Elizabeth's unmarried sister Jane Bottomley was living with them and the household employed two live-in servants (probably a nurse and a maid-of-all-work but the census isn't specific on this point). During the 1870s more children were born to John and Elizabeth: a son, Bernard Joseph Spink, in 1872; a fourth daughter, Maud Joan Harrower Spink in 1875 while the family was on holiday at Poulton-le-Sands in Lancashire; and Harold, probably in 1879. By 1881 John Spink's business was doing well enough for him to move his family into 108 Whetley Hill, Manningham, a large building which had previously been the Rev Henry Heppinstall's school. On census day 1881 another of Elizabeth's sisters was living with them - Margaret Bottomley - and the Spinks had increased the number of their servants to employ a cook, as well as a nurse and a housemaid: they were getting to be very well-to-do. On that day Kate, Florence, Gertrude and Bernard were all described as "scholar" by the census official; it's a 'catch-all' term of course. Another source I found showed that Jack was later sent to Giggleswick School, but I know nothing about where, or how, or how much education any of his siblings had. In an important sense, a significant part of the sisters' education didn't take place until the late 1880s and early 1890s, when they were in their twenties.

When searching freebmd for the Spink family, I couldn't find a birth registration for Harold Spink; nor could I identify him at all after the 1881 census - at least, not for certain - so I assume that he died as a child and the death wasn't registered, an oversight which often happened when parents were grieving for the death of an infant. Maud, the youngest Spink sister, definitely died young, in 1883; her death was registered. Two more sons were born to John and Elizabeth: John Harrower Gilmour Spink in 1884 and Geoffrey Gordon Spink in 1887; but the deaths of Harold and Maud meant that there was a gap in the middle of the family: there were 13 years between Bernard and John (known as Jack) and that large gap was reflected in what happened to the siblings later in life.

I wouldn't expect the daughters of a middle-class 19th-century family to work in the family business; and none of John and Elizabeth's daughters were ever described as employees. However, neither did any of their sons join the firm, although it was continuing to do well, diversifying into brewing, and into importing cigars as well as wines and spirits. By the day of the 1891 census, the Spinks had moved again, to Baildon Lodge in the village of Baildon. Florence had married the year before but Kate, Gertrude, Bernard, Jack and Geoffrey were all still living at home. Bernard was apprenticed to an iron founder - possibly to George Hodgson, machine maker and iron founder, who lived next door - and Jack and Geoffrey were still at school. Kate and Gertrude had, of course, left school and were living the life of unmarried women from the middle-classes while they waited (or so the ideology went) for some man to marry them. Except that neither Kate nor Gertrude ever married; and that during the 1890s and 1900s their time was occupied by something probably outside the range of the majority of young women they knew: theosophy. It was through theosophy that all the Spink sisters met men and women who were in the GD. Oliver Firth was one, but there were plenty of others because in Bradford the theosophists and GD initiates were all members of the same, relatively small, close-knit group.

I've suggested in my biography of Oliver Firth that unofficial groups of people interested in theosophy were probably getting together in Bradford, as elsewhere, in the late 1880s when the arrival of Helena Petrovna Blavatsky to live in England (in 1887) and even more the publication of her The Secret Doctrine (in 1888) led to a surge of interest in eastern philosophy as Blavatsky interpreted it. All three Spink sisters eventually felt committed enough to theosophy to join the Theosophical Society which Blavatsky and Colonel Olcott headed; none of their brothers did so. When they joined, all applicants for TS membership had to be sponsored by two members. All the sisters had the same two sponsors - Oliver

Firth; and Thomas Henry Pattinson. Pattinson ran his own jewellery and watch-making business in Bradford and it's likely that both the Spink and Firth families were amongst his customers. However, he was also a leading light of the TS in Bradford; a long-time acquaintance of William Wynn Westcott, sharing Westcott's interest in alchemical texts; a prominent local freemason; and a founder - with his friend Bogdan Edwards - of the GD's Horus Temple. Florence Spink was the first sister officially to join the TS, in February 1890; she and Oliver Firth were probably engaged by this time. Kate Spink joined the TS later that year; and Gertrude became a member in 1892.

The evidence shows that all three sisters were much more committed to the TS than to the GD and probably didn't regret giving up their GD membership so soon after having gained it. Kate and Gertrude in particular were very active members of the TS; Florence rather less so as she had a husband and (by 1895) three children to occupy her. But all three stuck with the TS through some very difficult times in the mid-1890s and continued to be members until 1909. And through some very difficult - not to say obtuse - texts on theosophy, particularly The Secret Doctrine, whose content was the subject of many study groups set up to debate its trickier points, including one in Bradford.

In the early 1890s Oliver Firth was one of the most prominent members of the TS in Bradford, sponsoring a large number of new members; helping set up the Bradford Lodge and serving on its committee; and being a very active organiser and speaker at national and european level as well. The contribution of the Spink sisters is not so easy to spot from the records of the TS. For example, they were not great recruiters to the TS. In the 1890s Kate didn't sponsor any new applicants at all, and Florence and Gertrude sponsored only a handful between them, all women who were probably friends of theirs.

Despite the prominent role played in it by Blavatsky, theosophy was largely a man's world. The committees that ran the lodges into which the TS was organised on a local basis were dominated by men. Perhaps encouraged by her husband, Florence did serve on the committee of the newly-founded Bradford Lodge in 1892-93; but in the 1890s neither of her sisters was involved on the admin side. The majority of even the letter-writers to the main theosophical magazines were also men, and this too was something the Spink sisters didn't attempt to challenge, perhaps suffering from a lack of confidence about their ability to put their thoughts into words, or to argue a case in the manner of men with a classical education. Kate and Gertrude didn't write anything that was published in any of the major theosophical magazines. Florence wrote one article, on a subject that didn't challenge the contemporary ideologies of male and female roles. Nevertheless, it was - I think - an important article, one of very few I've come across to look at what the choice of theosophy as a spiritual path might mean in daily life. Florence debated what theosophist parents should do in the way of giving their children a religious training. Should they explain theosophy to them at an early age and encourage them to follow its principles? Or should they leave the subject alone while the children were young, hoping that they would find their own way to it as adults? She concluded that the first option was preferable; and I suppose she was applying that belief to the religious upbringing of her own three children.

What the three Spink sisters did for theosophy in Bradford was organise and host lodge meetings: in the early 1890s Bradford Lodge was holding several of these each week, and to keep costs down, most were held in the houses of its members. During 1893 and 1894, for example, Florence, with the help of Sarah Midgley, organised the Lodge's Sunday evening meetings. They were held in Baildon, probably in Florence's house.

In the mid-1890s the TS was shaken, and eventually divided into two, by a struggle for power between William Quan Judge and Annie Besant in the wake of Blavatsky's death. The dispute was resolved in 1895 by the assumption of power by Besant as Olcott's chosen candidate; and the resignation of all American lodges from the TS worldwide to form a separate organisation. I've covered this dispute in more detail in my biography of Oliver Firth as he played an active part in it. Here I'll just say that Kate, Florence and Gertrude played no part in the debate, but did stay loyal to the TS worldwide when many despaired and left, disturbed and embarrassed by the bitterness with which each faction fought its corner. The sisters remained members through the take-over by Besant; and through the rise to prominence of an American successor to Judge, Katherine Tingley, who toured Europe in 1896 looking for new recruits. However, all the sisters will have had to agree that theosophy in Bradford had suffered very badly, with splits between factions and a falling-off of Bradford Lodge's membership and number of meetings.

Perhaps it was to occupy the time left vacant by the collapse of theosophy-based social life in Bradford that Kate and Gertrude spent more time in the mid-1890s on photography and developing prints from negatives. In 1895 and 1897 (but not in any other years between 1870 and 1915) an exhibitor named "K G Spink" showed several prints at the annual Royal Photographic Society exhibition; though this person was not, apparently, a member of the Society. K G Spink may be a genuine person having nothing to do with my three Spink sisters; but I think she might also be someone at the Society's confused reading of the fact that Kate and Gertrude were joint exhibitors, having both helped in the photography and in the printing. The prints were made using the popular gelatine + silver chloride method; probably on pre-prepared paper - it was widely available - though possibly by going back to basics and starting with sheets of gelatine and the chemicals. In 1895 the prints exhibited were 'On the Cliff'; 'Ironing - Study' (so photographer not really likely to be a man, I think!); 'Daughters of the Soil'; and 'Weary go the feet when the heart is old'. In 1897 K G Spink showed just one exhibit - 'Oh! If I'd as much money as I could tell'. Although some prints in both exhibitions were for sale, none of K G Spink's prints were. The catalogues I found on the web did give pictures of some of the exhibits, but none of K G Spink's prints were illustrated. The titles of the prints, though, reminded me of some of the paintings exhibited by the GD's artist members: the sort of painting that gets described as a 'genre' work, often depicting domestic scenes or the picturesque poor.

It took the rise to prominence of the charismatic and energetic Katherine Tingley to rouse the TS in Britain from its post-split exhaustion. Mrs Tingley's clarion call of 'universal brotherhood' was seen as a real threat and senior officials of the TS in London decided they must take action. In the autumn of 1897 Annie Besant went on a theosophical lecture tour of the north of England, her first for several years. Theosophists in Bradford made a big effort to overcome the issues that now divided them, and organised a visit by Annie Besant to Bradford. Time and a venue were booked for her to give a public lecture; a meeting of Bradford Lodge was arranged so that Annie Besant could meet those who were still its members; and the following afternoon a conversazione was held with her as its main guest. At the conversazione Annie Besant persuaded Kate, Florence and Gertrude to organise a study class, again the first that had been held in Bradford for several years. Although the sisters must have wondered how many people would attend it, they must also have hoped for some kind of return to the busy agenda of meetings they'd had in the early 1890s. And it was probably as a result of Annie Besant's visit to Bradford that Florence began planning her one and only article on theosophy. Over the winter of 1897-98, two more "drawing-room" meetings were held, one in central Bradford and one in Baildon; perhaps the Spink sisters organised those too and it's very likely that the one in Baildon took place at John Spink's house. Things were not the same, though, and in 1900 the two factions of Bradford theosophy - Bradford Lodge and Athene Lodge - met together to admit that neither group was large and active enough to continue as they had been. Athene Lodge was wound up, though its excellent library was kept intact; and in 1902, Bradford Lodge was reconstituted. Florence was the revitalised Bradford Lodge's new secretary and librarian; but by that time Gertrude at least, if not Kate as well, had moved on to greater things.

The late 1890s were a time of change in the Spink family. At some point during the 1890s Elizabeth Spink died; I am not certain of the exact date but the most likely death registration I found for her was from the end of the decade. In 1896, Bernard married Minnie Lease. And around 1900, Jack and Geoffrey emigrated to Canada. Even though Jack had not yet gone abroad, Geoffrey was not in England on census day 1901. Aged 64, John Spink was still working in his wine and spirit business. But only Kate, Gertrude and Jack were still living at home, at the house called Hawkswood in Baildon. Kate and Gertrude were running the household which included a cook and two housemaids; and Jack was training at an accountancy firm. John Spink, Kate and possibly Gertrude as well were still living at Hawkswood in 1904 though at some point between then and 1909 the family made one last move, to Bolton Grange in Yealdon, near the Harrogate Road. John Spink died there in August 1909; by which year Jack had probably gone to Canada and Kate and Gertrude were living in London at least part of the time.

KATE AND GERTRUDE IN LONDON

John Spink was a generous and a very un-Victorian father, allowing both his unmarried daughters to leave home. In the early 1900s they were both in their thirties - above the age when they were likely to marry - but that didn't weigh much with contemporary society, which expected unmarried daughters to remain with ageing parents until the parents' deaths. Not only did John Spink allow his daughters to follow their own star, he seems to have given them an income on which to do it; or perhaps they had inherited a little money from their mother.

The choice of London as the venue for the 1905 congress of the TS's European Section was decisive for Kate and Gertrude. Although I can't find direct proof, I think both sisters attended the 14th annual convention of the TS in Britain in July 1904, where the decision about where to hold the congress was made. Both sisters volunteered to help with the year-long process of organising the congress and as a result, very soon made London their home. If they were at the annual convention, they might have met Rudolf Steiner, who was attending it though not strictly a member of the TS in Britain.

KATE

Kate's contribution to the European Section congress was to act as honorary secretary of its British Sub-committee. At least during 1904 she was able to do this while still living with her father, but the following year - presumably because of her good work on the congress sub-committee - she was offered a job with the TS that had to be done in London. Bernard Keightley resigned his post as General Secretary of the TS's British Section in 1905, probably at the European Congress, and Kate was appointed to succeed him. The job - which was unpaid - was based in the TS's offices at 28 Albemarle Street. It will have used a range of office and organisational skills that makes me wonder whether Kate had actually done more administration and record keeping than I've found any evidence of; perhaps for the Bradford TS Lodge in the 1890s, or possibly even for her father's business. A large part of the work was preparing for publication two 'transactions' volumes, the detailed accounts of the first two congresses of the TS's Federated European Sections. As well as editing both volumes Kate also oversaw the printing process and raised the funds to pay the printers. Finding the funding was wearisome, and she more or less ran out of money in the middle of June 1907. Theosophical Review had to issue a plea from her, suggesting that each TS lodge buy one copy of the transactions for its library; otherwise, printing of any copies would have to stop. She did get her money - the volume was published later that year.

The skills Kate honed in her post at the TS British Section stood her in good stead later on, and got her at least one subsequent job which was almost certainly paid, rather than honorary.

Kate started out her life in London living in Bayswater at 46 Moscow Court, a big block of flats on Moscow Road off Queensway. Gertrude was living with her there in 1908. However, by 1911 their rental agreement must have ended and Kate had moved to 188 Marylebone Road, above the treatment and training rooms of the National Institution for Massage by the Blind. I don't know whether Gertrude lived with her there at any time, but the sisters were not living together on the day of the 1911 census. Filling in the census form as the head of her own household (a household of one) Kate said that she was working as a "publisher manager". I wish I knew more about this! But all I can say is that her employer was not likely to have been the TS British Section, for reasons I give below. Perhaps it was a publishing company and if it was, I suppose she was earning a salary. Kate was still at the same address in November 1914 when her brother Geoffrey named her as his next of kin, when he signed up in Calgary to fight in the 31st Battalion, Canadian Infantry.

Kate Spink drops out of my sight in November 1917 at a point of dread in all the sisters' lives: during that month Geoffrey Spink was wounded at Passchendaele, still giving Kate as his next-of-kin, at the Marylebone Road address. I can't find any other information about her from then until the day of her death in May 1953, at 10 Marlborough Road Kingston-upon-Hull. Though the eldest, Kate was the last of the Spink sisters.

GERTRUDE

Gertrude's voluntary work for the TS worldwide took her in a very different direction from the one Kate followed; but they did both end up doing work involving at least some managerial and organisational skills. Gertrude first made a name for herself with the TS hierarchy in London by doing a job of art work which would greatly enhance a book on theosophical interpretations of things seen in visions. Perhaps her experience making prints from photographic negatives had encouraged her to think that she could do the job well.

C W Leadbeater's book Man Visible and Invisible was published by the Theosophical Publishing Society in 1902. The book had 22 coloured illustrations, painted by Count Maurice Prozor from Leadbeater's descriptions of his visions. Each of Prozor's paintings had then been copied by Gertrude with an air-brush, before being sent to be reproduced using the photochromogravure method - a new putting-together of the photogravure and chromolithography processes which resulted in very beautiful colour prints. In a short author's note, Leadbeater thanked Gertrude for the "many days" she had spent doing this exacting but trying task. I'm sure she wasn't paid for her work, but it had two useful results: she gained more knowledge of how printing was done; and she got her name better known, at least in theosophical circles. There's no suggestion Gertrude contributed anything at all to the text of Leadbeater's book.

Her work for Leadbeater led to Gertrude being thought of in the TS as someone with knowledge of and contacts in the art world. At the TS's 14th annual convention in July 1904, she accepted the role of chief organiser of the art section of the 1905 TS's European Section congress, her name having been put forward for the job by Bernard Keightley. Organising a congress in London was work that couldn't be done properly by someone living all the time in Bradford, so I imagine Gertrude started to spend a lot of time in London in 1904. At meetings of the congress's arts and crafts sub-committee, she will have been working with Annie Besant representing India (where she now largely lived), Beatrice Webb, and representatives of countries like Germany and Italy where theosophy was still popular and well-organised.

Another likely result of Gertrude's work on Leadbeater's book was her increasing involvement with the Artificers' Guild. The Guild was a product of the arts and crafts movement. It was founded in 1901 by the designer and metalworker Nelson Dawson, but had to be rescued from financial chaos in 1903. Its rescuer was Montague Edward Fordham, owner of the gallery Montague Fordham Ltd whose display rooms at 9 Maddox Street showed works by jewellers, metalworkers and furniture-makers. Gertrude's first contact with the Guild was probably through meeting Fordham and the other directors to arrange for exhibits by Guild members to be shown at the congress.

The changes made by Fordham to the way the Artificers' Guild was run ensured that it was able to exist and prosper until World War 2. Investment in the Guild was desperately needed in 1903 and I presume Fordham organised a modest share issue; it's clear from what happened in 1906 that Gertrude owned shares in the Guild, and 1904-05 is a likely time for her to have bought them, impressed by the Guild's standard of work. Another important move by Fordham as he attempted to put the Guild on a secure footing was his appointment of Edward Napier Hitchcock Spencer as its senior designer. Spencer stayed in post until the 1930s. Under his guidance, and using the gallery at Maddox Street to display its products, the Guild built a reputation for high-quality stained glass panels; jewellery; and items made of steel, wrought iron and silver. One of the Guild's most widely-publicised pieces was the Ariadne necklace of 1906; and a particular high point came in 1911, coronation year, when the Guild supplied jewelled gold and silver cigar boxes for the cars of George V and Queen Mary. The income from these successes meant that the Guild was able to expand its training programme for young metalworkers and employ more people: at the height of its popularity (which was probably the years before World War 1) 40 people worked for it, as administrators, designers and craftsmen and women.

Although Montague Fordham was a good businessman, what he was really interested in was rural crafts. By 1906 he was wanting to spend more time on them and on the social and economic problems of rural counties - he was already known as a writer and lecturer on these issues. This meant standing down from active involvement in the Artificers' Guild and as part of a careful process of withdrawal, Fordham resigned as a director of the company in 1906. Henry Waring also stood down and Gertrude was elected to replace Waring. You can't serve as the director of any limited company without owning shares in it. The earliest record of the Guild employing a secretary is from 1906 as well: Ernest Woolverdige was appointed to the post. Who did the secretarial work before Woolverdige isn't clear from the accounts of the Guild that I've seen; but perhaps Gertrude was helping out with office tasks and that is why her name came up as a suitable successor to Waring.

Gertrude was still a director of the Guild after 1911 when Fordham's involvement with it finally ceased and two new directors joined the board. She did a lot of letter-writing on behalf of the Guild, taking charge of the Guild's communications with firms that displayed items in its gallery. A small group of such letters that have survived are from Gertrude to the architect and designer Sydney K Greenslade who was doing work for the Martin Brothers' salt-glaze pottery business in Southall. I think Gertrude's input and - by then - her experience in the Guild must have been vital during the war years. From 1916 comes the only other piece of art-work by Gertrude that I have found any evidence for; probably the only other one she ever did. That year the Guild produced a lacquered wood candle-holder suitable for a nursery; designed by Edward Spencer and painted by Gertrude. I get the impression that Gertrude never kidded herself that she had more than limited artistic skill: I don't think she would have been helping with Spencer's candle-holder if so many Guild employees hadn't been away at the Front. But help she did, doing something she knew she could manage; at a time when the Guild needed all the help it could get in order to keep going as an organisation.

Though possibly not a director by this time, Gertrude still wielded influence with the Guild in 1928 when her niece Margaret Firth (Florence's younger daughter) was appointed secretary. I imagine she continued to be a shareholder until the Guild was wound up, in 1942.

KATE, GERTRUDE AND 1909

In 1905, Kate and Gertrude were probably looking forward to many years of involvement in theosophy. Things didn't turn out that way: beginning in 1906, the TS was shaken to its core again, this time by a scandal that reached into the heart of contemporary attitudes to sexuality. In 1906, C W Leadbeater was accused of encouraging young boys to masturbate to relieve their sexual tensions. This was a dreadful thing to be saying about him: the Victorian attitudes to masturbation that still prevailed viewed it as a religious sin and a danger to health. However, before long some far more serious suggestions were being made. As part of his voluntary work for the TS, Leadbeater had a lot of contact with the adolescent sons of TS members - I'm less clear whether he had any with their daughters. Rumours began to circulate that Leadbeater's relationships with some of the boys he knew, were sexual; or that at the very least Leadbeater had homosexual feelings towards the boys entrusted by TS members to him for walking holidays and such. The accusations were the worse for going against a general principle of theosophy that the path to enlightenment was best served by celibacy. Leadbeater wasn't married and many theosophists had assumed that he was celibate on theosophical principle: now that was being called into question in the most alarming way. An investigation into what was being said about Leadbeater never found any absolute proof, but he resigned from the TS in 1906 anyway.

I imagine all the Spink sisters, and Oliver Firth, knew what was being said about Leadbeater: after all, Kate Spink was working in a TS office and both she and Gertrude had many friends amongst the TS's hierarchy in London. Gertrude, Oliver and Kate must all have come across Leadbeater at meetings and conferences - he was one of the TS's most active members. Gertrude probably knew Leadbeater best, though the question does arise: how well did she know him? The work she had done for his 1902 book could have been done without the two ever meeting; although I would suppose that they were in regular contact. But relationships between the sexes even with people supposedly beyond the age of marriage were still very restricted in scope; I don't think Gertrude and Leadbeater could ever have known each other well.

Who was the most shocked of Kate, Gertrude, Florence and Oliver? - two middle-aged spinsters or a couple with an adolescent son?

Leadbeater's resignation looked as though it had solved the TS's problem; but it hadn't. Annie Besant, a close colleague of Leadbeater, had always believed he was innocent of the accusations that had been made. For three years she couldn't do anything about it, but when Colonel Olcott died and she was elected his successor as the TS's president-for-life, one of her first acts was to get Leadbeater reinstated as a TS member. This happened in February 1909 and resulted in another mass resignation from the TS. Members of the TS who had stuck it out through the Besant v Judge struggle and its aftermath decided that enough was enough; including Kate, Gertrude, Oliver and Florence, who had all resigned from the TS by the end of March 1909. Despite nothing being proved against Leadbeater, they had all agreed that they could not remain in the TS, now he had been allowed back. No smoke without fire? Or did they know that some of the gossip was true?

In practical terms Kate was the most badly and immediately affected: she could hardly have remained in her post at the TS, even if she had wanted to, and presumably lost her job. All four of them, though, must have felt very deeply the sour and shocking end to over 20 years of involvement with the TS. In their different ways all four of them had worked hard in theosophy's cause. If they continued to follow the spiritual path laid out by theosophy, none of them regretted their resignation from the TS to the extent of deciding to be members again.

Whether or not this was for temporary, practical reasons, Kate and Gertrude were living apart on the day of the 1911 census; I think myself that there may not have been enough room for two to live in Kate's room or rooms at 188 Marylebone Road. On census day 1911, Gertrude was living with the Artificers' Guild's chief designer Edward Spencer, at 12 Hammersmith Terrace. Spencer was married (to Maud) and had three small children so having Gertrude as a boarder helped with the family income; though this was still a modest household as regards servants - the basic maid-of-all-work was the only servant who lived in. When Edward Spencer filled in his census form as head of this household he generously made Gertrude out to be two or three years younger than she actually was (39 not 41 or 42). Probably having asked Gertrude how she would describe her current income, he wrote that she was a "director of metalwork business". Whatever income Gertrude may or may not have had in the past, and whatever its sources, this was the first time anyone had declared any occupation and income for her on a census form.

I have found only a handful of references to Gertrude after the 1911 census: the piece of art work from 1916 and the appointment of her niece as Artificers' Guild secretary hint at what was happening in her life but there are large gaps that I could fill if I had money and time to travel the country in search of more evidence.

At some point between 1911 and 1947 (36 years with virtually nothing known about her!) Gertrude moved out of London to the house her sister Florence Firth was probably already living in - Beenhams Cottage, Railway Lane Littlemore, on the outskirts of Oxford. It's not clear who the householder was - if any one sister was - but Gertrude was still living at that address for several years after Florence died in 1939. However, ill health overcame her in the end and she became a permanent patient at Restholme, 230 Woodstock Road Oxford. This was a specialist, private hospital - fees were £500 per year in 1950 when C S Lewis had to make the decision to move his companion Jane Moore to be cared for there. Gertrude died at Restholme in April 1947.

BASIC SOURCES I USED for all Golden Dawn members.

Membership of the Golden Dawn: The Golden Dawn Companion by R A Gilbert. Northampton: The Aquarian Press 1986. Between pages 125 and 175, Gilbert lists the names, initiation dates and addresses of all those people who became members of the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn or its many daughter Orders between 1888 and 1914. The list is based on the Golden Dawn's administrative records and its Members' Roll - the large piece of parchment on which all new members signed their name at their initiation. All this information had been inherited by Gilbert but it's now in the Freemasons' Library at the United Grand Lodge of England building on Great Queen Street Covent Garden. Please note, though, that the records of the Amen-Ra Temple in Edinburgh were destroyed in 1900/01. I have recently (July 2014) discovered that some records of the Horus Temple at Bradford have survived, though most have not; however those that have survived are not yet accessible to the public.

Family history: freebmd; ancestry.co.uk (census and probate); findmypast.co.uk; familysearch; Burke's Peerage and Baronetage; Burke's Landed Gentry; Armorial Families; thepeerage.com; and a wide variety of family trees on the web.

Famous-people sources: mostly about men, of course, but very useful even for the female members of GD. Oxford Dictionary of National Biography. Who Was Who. Times Digital Archive.

Useful source for business and legal information: London Gazette and its Scottish counterpart Edinburgh Gazette. Now easy to find (with the right search information) on the web.

Catalogues: British Library; Freemasons' Library.

Wikipedia; Google; Google Books - my three best resources. I also used other web pages, but with some caution, as - from the historian's point of view - they vary in quality a great deal.

SOURCES FOR THE SPINK SISTERS

JOHN SPINK'S FIRM

The King's Arms:

See www.clanbarker.com for information about it and its builder, Gilbert Brooksbank the fifth.

Rambles Round Horton by William Cudworth. Published by subscription 1886; printed in Bradford by Thomas Brear and Co Ltd: p168, p180

At archiver.rootsweb.ancestry.com a posting from 2002 by Caroline Brand who was married to a descendent of John Spink. And Roy Stockdill's reply.

Manningham, Heaton and Allerton (Townships of Bradford) again by William Cudworth. Published by subscription 1896; printed in Bradford: couldn't see the page number as the book wouldn't download to archive.org, but there was a reference to Rev Heppinstall's school now lived in by John Spink.

JOHN SPINK AND FAMILY

A likely baptism record at familysearch England-ODM GS film number 990872: John Spink baptised 9 April 1837 at St Denis York; son of Joseph and Elizabeth.

BOTTOMLEY FAMILY OF HORTON AND ELSEWHERE IN YORKSHIRE

Malcolm Bull's Calderdale Companion pages at freepages.history.rootsweb.ancestry.com lists a large number of people called Bottomley; though no one called Eli. Some at least in the list are Methodists. Of course, all living in Calderdale not in Bradford.

Rambles Round Horton by William Cudworth, see just below for publication details; p22, p49, p228.

FIRTH MILL IN HORTON

Rambles Around Horton by William Cudworth. Published 1886 by subscription; printed in Bradford by Thomas Brear and Co Ltd 1886: p37, p149.

JOHN AND ELIZABETH SPINK

That Maud Spink was born in Poulton-le-Sands:

www.lan-opc.org.uk the online Lancashire births, marriages and deaths database: LDS film 1526062 Baptism Register 1861-95 p110 entry 879.

BAILDON LODGE

Baildon and the Baildons: A History of a Yorkshire Manor and Family Volume 1 by W Paley Baildon FSA. Privately printed at St Catherine Press: p56 a quote from Parson's Yorkshire Directory of 1823; p432 about the purchase of the Baildon estate by Titus Salt.

The Gentleman's Magazine and Historical Chronical volume 222 1867 p235 birth of a child of Titus Salt and his wife; they are living at Baildon Lodge which is rather curiously described as "near Leeds".

National Art Collections Fund Review of 1997 p81 mentions that the Salt family left Baildon Lodge in 1872.

At saltairedailyphoto.blogspot.co.uk information that Titus Salt moved into the house called Milner Field in 1873.

HAWKSWOOD

Its approximate location: from entries in the 1901 census. Zoopla for its current address: Hollins Hill Baildon. Streetmap shows the road above Baildon village on the edge of Ilkley Moor.

A subsequent resident mentioned in The Economist volume 105 1927 p486 Sir Henry Whitehead knight, chairman of Saltaire Ltd; he also has a house in Surrey.

BOLTON GRANGE

The house probably doesn't exist any more though zoopla shows the short, dead-end road Bolton Road still does.

A previous resident mentioned in The Annual Register of World Events editor Edmund Burke issue of 1853 p129: report on a break-in at the house, then the resident of Charles Clough, solicitor and clerk to the Bradford County Court.

Another previous resident mentioned at website www.bayanne.info the family history of the Shetland family. Ancestor John Horsfall Bankart 1823-92 and his family lived at Bolton Grange 1860s to his death. He was a "stuff merchant". This website is using censuses and probate registrations as its sources.

Borough of Bradford: Bye-Laws issued by Bradford City Council 1867 p13.

JOHN (JACK) AND GEOFFREY SPINK GO TO CANADA

Giggleswick School Register 1499-1913 p190 J H G Spink left the school 1898.

See canadiangreatwarproject.com for the war records of both Jack and Geoffrey; though it's not clear from the information on it whether Jack survived the fighting.

At www.abgensoc.ca are the Alberta Homesteads Records 1870-1930; there are files f John H G Spink and Geoffrey G Spink but I couldn't tell what era they cover.

Using search.ancestry.com.au you can see Canada Voters' Lists 1935-80. Geoffrey G Spink was registered to vote in British Columbia in 1935. I couldn't find an entry for a John H Spink but there was one for a John Spink (who may not be the right person) also dated 1935, living in Wetaskiwin Alberta.

THE SISTERS IN THE GD

See my file on Oliver and Florence Firth for Florence's book published 1904.

KATE AND GERTRUDE

At erps.dmu.ac.uk the website of de Montfort University: reproductions of and indexes to the Exhibitions of the Royal Photographic Society from 1870 to 1915. You can read the original exhibition catalogues:

The Photographic Journal issue of 28 September 1895 p7, p12 and full list of K G Spink's exhibits on p28.

The Photographic Journal 1898 though the exhibition was held in 1897: p24.

More on the printing methods:

Gelatino-Chloride see website www.merriam-webster.com/dictionary, run by Encyclopaedia Britannica for a neat description.

See Encyclopaedia of 19th-century Photography by John Hannavy. New York and London: Routledge 2008: p573 for information on the development of the technique.

THEOSOPHICAL SOCIETY

On Kate: Theosophical Society Membership Register volume January 1889-September 1891 p192. She resigned 2 March 1909.

On Florence: Theosophical Society Membership Register volume January 1889-September

1891 p150. She resigned 1 March 1909. Florence's sponsorship of new members:

Theosophical Society Membership Register June 1893 to March 1895 p193 October 1894 applications of Hannah Halliday of Shipley and Clara Moseley of Shipley. In both cases the other sponsor was John Midgley Theosophical Society Membership Register June 1898-February 1901 p215 July 1900 application of Mrs Florence M Butterfield of Manningham. The other sponsor is Gertrude Spink.

A mention in Lucifer:

Lucifer: A Theosophical Magazine volume X number 55 issue of 15 March 1892 p80 committee members at Bradford Lodge for 1892-93.

On Gertrude: Theosophical Society Membership Register September 1891-January 1893 p118. She resigned on 23 March 1909. Although a member from 1892 Gertrude didn't sponsor anyone until 1899 Theosophical Society Membership Register June 1898-February 1901: p139 Ernest T Dexter, with co-sponsor Countess Wachtmeister; and p215 Florence Butterfield.

1901 census information indicates that Ernest T Dexter, aged 23 and as yet unmarried, worked in the offices of a railway company; he had been born in Bradford.

All the sisters mentioned in Lucifer:

Lucifer: A Theosophical Magazine volume XXI September 1897 to February 1898 p378; pp 466-469: Florence's article Theosophy and Education; p572.

KATE AND GERTRUDE

MOSCOW COURT

Moscow Court

At www.englishheritagearchives.org.uk there's a picture of the elevation of this block of flats on the Moscow Court Place side of building. The postal address of the block is Moscow Road.

Royal Blue Book: Fashionable Directory and Parliamentary Guide issue of 1908 p1371 has an entry for "Spink, the Misses" both at 46 Moscow Court. With "Miss Kate" Spink listed as also at 28 Albemarle Street.

KATE SPINK AFTER 1900

Theosophical Review volume 33 1904 p486.

28 Albemarle Street is a TS address:

Who's Who Year Book published by A and C Black Ltd, issues of 1905 and 1908 have Kate Spink at 28 Albemarle Street.

For Bertram Keightley see wikipedia.

The Theosophist volume 27 1906 pxxxvi Kate's job title given as General Secretary of the British Section of the Federation of European Sections.

Theosl Rvw vol XL no 238 issue of June 1907 p292 in the editl, a ref to "Miss Kate Spink" working "untiringly" to prep f pubn the first 2 vols of the Trans papers of the first 2 congresses of the Federated Eur Sections of the TS. Kate had written to TR asking for funds to complete the work, otherwise publication of them would have to cease. Specifically she was suggesting that each TS lodge be given a copy of them for its library. Some copies of them at least were printed:

Trans of the Federn of Eurn Sections of the TS 1907 p4 gives Kate at 28 Albemarle St as "Hon Sec" of the Bh Section of the Federn.

That the job was not paid:

Transactions of the Federation of European Sections of the TS 1907 p4.

At www.forgottenbooks.com a copy of Lilian Edger's Elements of Theosophy published London: Theosophical Publishing Society 1907 pp202-03.

188 MARYLEBONE ROAD is on the north side near Marylebone station:

Journal of Commercial Education volume 9 1894 p12 refers to an S Hunter at the address though it's not clear from the entry whether it's a home or an office address.

The Yearbook of the Scientific and Learned Societies of GB and Ireland issue of 1901 p329 188 Marylebone Road is the current address of the Association of Registered Medical Women.

Some people do seem to live at the address: Notes and Queries 1909 p138 refs to a Perceval Lucas with address 188 Marylebone Road.

At rcnarchive.rcn.org.uk, The British Journal of Nursing issue of 5 September 1914 p192.

GERTRUDE

Man Visible and Invisible subtitled Examples of Different Types of Men as Seen by Means of Trained Clairvoyance. Charles W Leadbeater. London: Theosophical Publishing Society 1902. There's a frontispiece, 3 diagrams and 22 coloured illustrations. On an unnumbered page, a very short author's note. Illustrations opposite p66 and opposite p138 both have at bottom right: "Photochromogravure, Lyons and London". On p144 the book was printed by Neill and Co Ltd of Edinburgh.

See wikipedia for more information on the technique but most of it is in French or Japanese.

The Penrose Annual: Review of the Graphic Arts volume 17 1912 p16.

At www.forgottenbooks.com detailed information on how it works from Harmsworth's Universal Encyclopaedia though I couldn't see the date of publication: p81 photogravure and photo-lithography.

At www.Martin2001.com is the webpage of Martin2001 Antique Prints for further information see its comprehensive 'methods' section.

For more on Leadbeater see theosophical publications now in the library at Sheffield University.

TS European Congress:

Rudolf Steiner in Britain: A Documentation of his Ten Visits by Crispian Villeneuve. Forest Row: Temple Lodge 2004: in Chap 4 on his 4th Visit in 1904 p?84

Transactions of the Annual Congress of the Federation of European Sections of the TS. Published 1907 by the Federation. I couldn't see the page number but there was a list of those who served on the Congress's arts and crafts sub-committee.

ARTIFICERS' GUILD

Theosophical Review volume 37 1906 p149 Gertrude Spink is mentioned as the Secretary of the Artificers' Guild, with address 9 Maddox Street London W. However, no other sources that I've found say she was the Guild's secretary.

The Directory of Gold and Silversmiths Volume 1 The Biographies (which include companies as well as individuals). By John Culme using information from the London Assay Office Registers. Woodbridge Suffolk: Antique Collectors' Club 1987: pxiv, p16. Other sources used by Culme for the article were pxiv of Charlotte Gere's European and American Jewellery 1830-1914 London 1975 and contemporary issues of The Studio, volumes 32, 44, and 46. P16 note 8.

The Ariadne necklace, designed by Edward Spencer and John Bonner, was featured in The Art Journal 1906 pp55-56; last sold 1981.

The design archive, but not the office records, of the Artificers' Guild Ltd is now held by the Goldsmiths' Company: see it at www.thegoldsmiths.co.uk/library/archives:

At www.925-1000.com is the online Encyclopaedia of Silver Marks, Hallmarks and Makers' Marks. Information on the Artificers' Guild's personnel, on the website's contributors' notes forum, posted by 'dognose' 2014.

Gertrude's painted nursery candle of 1916:

The Studio Yearbook of Decorative Art issue of 1916 p76; and the same information in Decorative Art in Modern Interiors volume 11 1916 p76.

FORDHAM AND SPENCER

Montague Edward Fordham see wikipedia and Who Was Who volume IV 1941-50 p399.

Not much seems to be known about Edward Spencer but there's a little information about him at www.styles-silver.co.uk the website of Styles Silver of

MARTIN BROTHERS and GREENSLADE

Via apps.nationalarchives.gov.uk to GB 1158 55: papers held at Ealing Local History Centre at Southall. The papers of Sydney K Greenslade are held as part of the archive of Martin Brothers and the Martinware Salt-Glaze Pottery. On the catalogue's p3 as part of its 'C, Letters from Greenslade's Friends and Principal Correspondents: a few letters from Gertrude Spink to Greenslade, written 1908-15, catalogue item numbers 1858-1863.

Ceramics - Mastering the Craft by Richard Zakin. A and C Black 1990. P209 for the four Martin brothers.

Prob the exchange of letters is n personal but part of Gertrude's job at Artificers' Guild.

On Sydney K Greenslade - very little information; here's what I did find:

Website www.parksandgardens.org for dates 1867-1955.

Going Modern and Being British: Art, Architecture and Design in Devon c 1910-1960 editor Sam Smiles. Exeter: Intellect 1998 p27 Greenslade designed Exeter Public Library 1925. And the National Library of Wales, a "severe, neo-Classical" building.

No entry in Who Was Who and no obituary in the Times.

230 WOODSTOCK ROAD

Zoopla shows it in Summertown, now divided into at least 10 flats.

Jane Moore and 230 Woodstock Road:

C S Lewis - A Life: Eccentric Genius, Reluctant Prophet by Alister McGrath. Hodder and Stoughton 2013 p247.

For speculation on the exact nature of Lewis' relationship with Jane Moore see wikipedia and biographies.

MORE POSSIBLE COVERAGE OF GERTRUDE AS A PRINT-DEVELOPER

It's possible that the GD's Gertrude Spink is mentioned in the American magazine The Photographic Times volume 27 1895 p105 and p115. HOWEVER, while searching the web I've come across several references to an American Gertrude Spink who was a temperance campaigner around 1920; so I assume that the article refers to the American woman.

8 April 2015

Amandragora@attglobal.net

Find the web pages of Roger Wright and Sally Davis, including my list of people initiated into the Order of the Golden Dawn between 1888 and 1901, at:

http://pws.prserv.net/Roger\_Wright/

***

Robert Elliott Steel was initiated into the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn at its Horus Temple in Bradford, in May 1892, taking the Latin motto 'Tuum cuique'. It's likely that Catherine Elizabeth Spink, Emily Douglas and Charles Herbert Grason were initiated during the same ritual and that he knew at least Miss Spink before that evening. However, Robert Steel never really followed up his initiation and when he moved away from Bradford - if not before - he lost contact with the GD entirely.

The vexed question of spellings: R A Gilbert in the Golden Dawn companion has Robert's surname spelled Steele but all the sources I've come across spell it Steel without the last 'e'. In my searches for Robert I've seen his middle name spelled Elliot and Elliott; but having researched his mother's family, I think Elliott is correct.

THE STEELs and the ELLIOTTs, A NORTHUMBERLAND CONNECTION

Both Robert Steel the GD member's parents told various census officials that were born in Northumberland. They were born in villages quite near each other and probably knew each other - or their families knew each other - from very young. The GD member's father was also called Robert Steel. He was born in Cowpen, a mining district on the outskirts of the port of Blyth. And Anna Eliza Elliott was born in Hartburn, a small village in the hills behind Blyth. It hasn't been easy to identify either of them from the earliest censuses, but I think Robert Steel may have been the son of a ship-owner, Thomas Steel, who was living with his wife Jane in Blagdon Street Cowpen on the day of the 1841 census. Three of their children were still living at home and not yet married. The eldest son, John, had qualified as a master mariner though he was not at sea on that day. Robert was the second son; he had served an apprenticeship and had gone into business as a linen and woollen draper, employing his younger brother Tindle and an apprentice, John Tulley or possibly Tunney. With so many men in the family in work, Jane Steel was able to employ one servant.

Anna Eliza Elliott was born around 1830, from what she told census officials. I haven't been able to identify her for certain on any census before she was married. However, researching other people called Elliott who told census officials that they were born in Hartburn, I believe that she had at least two brothers or cousins, John and Henry, who both moved south to act as managers of large estates, one in Bedfordshire and one in Hertfordshire.

THE STEEL FAMILY IN MANCHESTER

I reach safe ground for the first time with these two families in December 1851, when Robert Steel married Anna Eliza Elliott at Stannington, another village near Blyth Northumberland. Whether Robert had already left Northumberland for Lancashire I don't know. The birth of their son (the GD member) Robert Elliott Steel happened early in 1853 in Tynemouth, the registration district which included Blyth, Horton and Cowpen - but a woman about to give birth to her first child might well choose to return to her family even if she usually lived elsewhere. Robert's only sibling, Elizabeth Eleanor Steel, was born in Preston, in 1856. I suppose her parents were living in Preston at the time, but within a few years the family had moved to Manchester

On the day of the 1861 census, Robert and Anna Eliza were living with Robert the younger (now 8) and Elizabeth (4) in semi-rural Levenshulme, at 5 Poplar Cottages on Stockport Road, the turnpike road from Stockport to Manchester. Robert Steel told the census official he worked in a warehouse; but if he is the person from the 1841 census, he wasn't an employee moving stock around, he was the owner of the business. If he was not at the school already in 1861, Robert the GD member was about to delight his parents by winning a place at Manchester Grammar School. So far (July 2014) Robert is the only GD member I've come across who had been at one of the old grammar schools; it meant that - possibly even including members whose parents had paid for them to go to public school - he was one of the most thoroughly educated members the GD ever had. There was no chance of Robert's sister getting a grammar school education, of course, even if she had been as clever as her brother; but if I have identified her correctly, her parents had sent Elizabeth to a good school too: on the day of the 1871 census, an Elizabeth Steel aged 15 was one of the pupils at the school in Gateshead run by George and Frances Higginbotham.

By 1871 the Steels had moved to Cheetham, another suburb of Manchester, at this stage still largely a middle-class village. On the day of the 1871 census they were living at 179 Elizabeth Street but by 1872 I think they had moved to 1 Mizpah Terrace Waterloo Road. Robert the GD member's brilliant career in education was continuing: he had passed the entrance exams to London University and was an undergraduate there in 1871. However (and again, if I've found the right man) Robert Steel the elder's wholesale and retail draper's business (at 11 Whittle Street Manchester) was in financial trouble. In the autumn of 1872 one of his creditors could wait no longer and Robert Steel had to agree to liquidation proceedings. I couldn't find any evidence that he actually went bankrupt; so it sounds like he was able to pay his creditors, at least in part, and may have been able to continue in business. However, by 1881 he was dead - probably: I can't pin down a death registration for him, but Anna Eliza told the 1881 census official that she was a widow.

ROBERT STEEL AT UNIVERSITY

It's hard to know, of course, whether Robert the GD member would have joined the family business if it and/or his father had survived. I think myself that his parents hoped that he would educate himself out of the stigma (as mid-Victorians saw it) of earning a livelihood from trade. In this respect, perhaps it was a good thing that Robert and Anna Eliza had only two children instead of the large brood that was typical of families at that time. Although they did not have to pay fees for their son, other expenses were inevitable with a son at such a school, and many families, even middle-class ones, could not have managed financially without their sons starting work at the earliest opportunity rather than going to university. For Elizabeth's education, Robert and Anna Eliza will have had to pay. Their children's education would have been one reason why Robert and Anna Eliza had gone without things that their acquaintances would have considered a necessity - for example, they didn't have a live-in servant in 1861 or in 1871. Even so, Robert the elder's financial troubles meant that Robert the GD member could not continue his course at London University, for which his parents will have had to find both tuition fees and living expenses. Instead, in 1872 he tried for a demyship (a particular kind of scholarship) at Magdalen College Oxford - and got it. He graduated with a first in natural sciences in 1876, and chose teaching as his career.

ROBERT IN BRADFORD

Robert's first job was at a school similar to the one he had been a pupil in: a grammar school for boys, founded in the 16th century. He was appointed science master at Bradford Grammar School, probably in 1876, and remained in that job until 1894. On the day of the 1881 census he was living at 28 Blenheim Road Manningham and his mother Anna Eliza was keeping house for him, with the help of one servant. Elizabeth Eleanor was working as a teacher too. She was one of two resident teachers employed at Susanna Armytage's boarding school for girls at a house called Ivy Grove in Middleham, Yorkshire.

As Robert gained experience as a teacher he was able to earn a little extra money in the rapidly-expanding world of exam guides and text-books. In 1889 he compiled a set of reference exam papers in inorganic chemistry for the publisher Bell. In 1890 and 1891 he wrote three books for Methuen and Co: a book on practical chemistry to help pupils preparing to sit the Science and Art Department's exams; The World of Science; and A Class-Book on Light. In his spare time Robert went walking in the hills of Yorkshire. He joined the Yorkshire Geological and Polytechnic Society and it's quite likely that Robert found his way to the GD through his interest in the wonders of Yorkshire's scenery. I haven't found that Robert was a member of the Yorkshire Naturalists' Union, but it's very likely that he knew people who were; and one who was definitely a member of it was Oliver Firth.

If Robert knew Oliver Firth, a route for him into the GD is clear. In the early 1890s and possibly for a couple of years before that, Firth was one of the lynch-pins of that part of Bradford's social scene which took an interest in the occult. When the Bradford lodge of the Theosophical Society was set up in the early 1890s Firth was one of its founding members; and for the next three or four years he recruited energetically amongst his acquaintances. In due course, a lot of those Firth had sponsored into the TS went on to be initiated into the GD in Bradford, probably because he recommended them. Amongst the many people he sponsored into the TS were the three Spink sisters - Catherine, Florence and Gertrude - daughters of a local wine merchant. All three Spink sisters were initiated into the GD in due course, Florence in 1891 just before she and Firth were married, and her sisters in 1892, the same year as Robert Steel.

I think it's likely that Robert Steel and Oliver Firth got to know each other in the late 1880s if not sooner, through their interest in geology. So keen was Firth to draw people into the TS and GD that I can't suppose he missed the opportunity to try to recruit Robert to them. However, Robert never joined the TS and although his curiosity was aroused by the GD for a time, it turned out that he didn't share Firth's interest in magic either. Perhaps Robert was too practical and too rational a man; or thought himself to be too modern a man to study magic. It probably didn't help advance the GD's cause with him that although there were several professional chemists and an alchemist amongst its members, they were all based in London: William Crookes was a chemist whose researches had led him to investigate spiritualism and chemistry's borders with physics; the Rev William Alexander Ayton was not a chemist by training but he had decades of experience as an alchemist; Julian Levett Baker and George Cecil Jones worked as chemists, but they also had an interest in the alchemical origins of their profession. Robert might have found conversations with those four men very interesting. However, it seems very unlikely that he ever met any of them. From the mid-1890s Julian Baker and Robert Steel were both members of the Chemical Society (Robert was elected a member in 1885) and the Society of Chemical Industry; so it's likely that they had at least seen each other's names on members' lists; but I'm sure neither would have known that the other was in the GD as well.

The Steels had left Manningham by 1885 and had moved to Spring Cliffe House, Heaton Road. This move from a house to rooms in a block possibly happened because Elizabeth Steel was no longer working; I can't believe that it had been any part of Robert the elder and Anna Eliza's plan for their children, that their daughter should have to work. Perhaps by the mid-1880s with ten years' teaching behind him, Robert's salary was enough for Elizabeth to give up her job and be the stay-at-home middle-class sister and daughter her parents had meant her to be until she married. By census day 1891 Robert, Elizabeth and Anna Eliza had moved again and were living in an apartment in Hawthorn House at 1 Ladderbanks Lane Baildon. (A few months later the newly-married Oliver and Florence Firth would also rent rooms there.) Robert's wages were enough to cover the wages of one live-in servant.

ROBERT IN NORTHAMPTON

Robert was known at Bradford Grammar School for his flair as a teacher, and in 1891 had 15 years' experience. However, it took another four years for a job to come up that was the right kind of next step in his professional career. In 1894 he was appointed headmaster of the Northampton and County School. It was on the strength of this promotion that he was able to marry Annie Caroline Elliott in 1895. I believe that Annie Caroline and Robert were cousins, possibly even first-cousins.

Annie Caroline Elliott was born in 1856, third child of Henry Elliott and his wife Caroline. She had two older brothers, Robert and William; and a younger sister Emily who died in 1873 aged 14. Annie Caroline was born at Haynes (also called Hawnes) Park near Ampthill in Bedfordshire, but her father told a succession of census officials that he had been born in Hartburn, Northumberland - the same village that Robert Elliott Steel's mother Anna Eliza had been born in. I haven't found conclusive proof to back up my belief, but I do think Henry Elliott and Anna Eliza were related; the relatively rare surname and their place of birth just seem too much of a coincidence.

Henry Elliott had moved south to take a job as an estate manager and he may have been employed by the Haynes Park estate. Its owner, the Rev Lord John Thynne, lived there only when he was able to spare the time from his job as canon and sub-dean of Westminster Abbey. Lord John had inherited Haynes Park from an uncle in 1849; and perhaps Henry Elliott had been appointed to run the estate in that year. Lord John died a few weeks before the day of the 1881 census, but Henry Elliott seems to have continued in his job during the 1880s and early 1890s when Haynes Park was owned by Lord John's eldest son. After her mother died in 1875, Annie Caroline kept house for her father, firstly at The Dairy, Haynes, and later at Park Farm Ampthill.

Robert Elliott Steel and Annie Caroline Elliott may have been engaged to be married for several years before Robert got his job in Northampton, and even then they waited another year for the Steels to get settled in the house that came with his job, before getting married. Preparations for the wedding were probably well in-hand in June 1895 when Annie Caroline's father Henry died, presenting everyone with a dilemma. Bereavement usually caused the weddings of the dead person's closest relatives to be put off for about a year while the Victorian mourning rituals were observed. However, as Henry Elliott's house had also gone with his job, his death had left Annie Caroline with no income (she had never worked for wages) and nowhere to live. So the wedding went ahead, perhaps with less celebration than in happier circumstances, on 14 August 1895.

On their wedding day, Robert was 42 and Annie Caroline 39; so it's perhaps not surprising that they only had one child, Caroline Eliza Steel, born in 1896. Annie Caroline however, gained a kind-of extended family at Northampton and County School: on the day of the 1901 census, her household at 37-38 East Parade consisted of Robert and herself and Caroline; plus one of the other teachers at the school, George Charlesworth; a staff of cook, parlourmaid, nurse, laundry maid and housemaid; and 13 boy boarders between the ages of 14 and 18. At Northampton and again at the last job Robert Steel held, Annie Caroline was a surrogate mother to several generations of boys away from home. The arrival of Annie Caroline had freed Anna Eliza from household management and she was not in the UK on census day 1901. Perhaps she was travelling with her daughter and son-in-law: in 1898 Elizabeth Steel had married either John Stuart Woodhall or William Handley (for why I am not sure which, see the Sources section!)

THE MOVE TO SHERBORNE

I haven't been able to find out much about Northampton and County School, though I do get the impression that it had been founded relatively recently - since the 1870 Education Act - and specialised in science. In some ways it was an ideal job for Robert Steel but after a few years in the post, he began to get frustrated, both with the control of the curriculum being exercised by the authorities, and the results of that control. The trend that was being dictated by the education authorities was towards ever more specialisation in a narrower range of subjects. Science specialist he may have been, but Robert was a firm believer in the importance of science pupils learning the classics - as he had done at his grammar school. He began to look about him for a job where both disciplines were still taught to all pupils. Eventually a vacancy came up that was in some ways a demotion, but in others a really plum appointment. In 1907, he moved to Sherborne School as science master and curator of the school museum. He almost certainly knew the museum by repute already; it had an excellent geological collection which included specimens found by an ex-pupil, the ammonite expert Sydney Savory Buckman; Sydney's sister Katherine Julia Buckman was a member of the GD in London.

THE SHERBORNE BONE

In 1911 Robert became involved in a curious incident, a kind-of dress rehearsal for the more famous Piltdown Man discovery of 1912. Sherborne School is near what is now known as the Jurassic Coast and one of Robert's duties and pleasures as curator of the school museum was going out into the countryside looking for geological specimens and fossils. A favourite site for investigation was Major Wingfield Digby's quarry on the outskirts of town, where Robert had found a layer of deposits from the Pleistocene period. He encouraged pupils who seemed keen, to go specimen-hunting on their own and after one such expedition to the quarry, pupils Cortesi and Groves showed Robert a piece of bone which looked like it had a drawing cut into it. How Robert reacted at the time to this possible evidence of ancient art isn't certain any longer: the memory of everyone involved in the incident was coloured by what happened later. However, it is clear that Robert was sufficiently hopeful that the bone and the drawing were genuinely ancient to send the evidence to be examined by Arthur Smith Woodward at the Geological Society of London. Woodward was rather busy at the time assembling the pieces of Piltdown Man's skull: he and Charles Dawson presented the find at the Geological Society's meeting of December 1912. It wasn't until 1914 that Woodward published an article on the Sherborne Bone, saying that it was a genuine piece of Palaeolithic art. His conclusion generated a lot of discussion in the geological community - not everyone was convinced - but the war then intervened, and it was not until the 1920s that any further investigation of the find was possible. In 1923, Robert and Arthur Smith Woodward revisited the site where the two pupils said they had come across the bone. They didn't find anything of interest, from the Pleistocene or any other period; but whatever doubts Robert had about the bone, he kept to himself for several more years. In 1926, however, articles were published in Nature stating that the bone was a fake, embarrassing Robert, Woodward, Cortesi (Groves had been killed in the war) and even Charles Bayzard, who in 1911 had been working for Robert at Sherborne School museum. But if it was a fake, who created it? - and who was it intended to make a fool of?

A flurry of letters followed from those involved, sent to each other and to the press. Cortesi wrote to Sherborne School's headmaster, asserting that the bone and the art were genuine. Cortesi's school-friend E A Ross Jefferson, wrote to back up Cortesi - it had been he who in 1911 had suggested Cortesi show the find to Robert. Bayzard wrote to Nature saying that he'd suspected a hoax at the time the bone was found, and that the joke had been on Robert. Robert then wrote to Nature saying that if the bone was a hoax, it was intended to deceive Bayzard; and that if it was so obviously a fake, why had no one at the Geological Society said so years before?

Piltdown Man was revealed as a hoax in 1953. Not having got quite that level of publicity, and being rather more difficult to date with any certainty, the Sherborne Bone was not definitively proved to be modern until 1995, but dating techniques not available during Robert's lifetime have confirmed that it was not a piece of Palaeolithic art, it was a hoax. Groves, Cortesi, Ross Jefferson and their fellow pupils have to be the most likely hoaxers; attempting to pull the legs of the staff. When they also fooled several more eminent geologists they must have been delighted.

By 1926 Robert no longer had to face being quizzed about the Sherborne Bone every day in school. He had retired in 1923 and of course that involved leaving Cameron House, The Avenue, Sherborne where he had lived while he had been working. His mother Anna Eliza had died in 1915, at the remarkable age of 89, so it was just Robert, Annie Caroline and daughter Caroline Eliza who moved a few miles out of Sherborne to The Thatch, a house on Gold Street in the village of Stalbridge. Though she was slightly the younger, Annie Caroline died first, in December 1931. Robert Elliott Steel died in October 1933; he had been ill for some time. Caroline Eliza never married. After the death of her parents she moved to Charminster, where she died in 1942.

BASIC SOURCES I USED for all Golden Dawn members.

Membership of the Golden Dawn: The Golden Dawn Companion by R A Gilbert.

Northampton: The Aquarian Press 1986. Between pages 125 and 175, Gilbert lists the names, initiation dates and addresses of all those people who became members of the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn or its many daughter Orders between 1888 and 1914. The list is based on the Golden Dawn's administrative records and its Members' Roll - the large piece of parchment on which all new members signed their name at their initiation. All this information had been inherited by Gilbert but it's now in the Freemasons' Library at the United Grand Lodge of England building on Great Queen Street Covent Garden. Please note, though, that the records of the Amen-Ra Temple in Edinburgh were destroyed in 1900/01. As far as I know, the records of the Horus Temple at Bradford have not survived either.

Family history: freebmd; ancestry.co.uk (census and probate); findmypast.co.uk; familysearch; Burke's Peerage and Baronetage; Burke's Landed Gentry; Armorial Families; thepeerage.com; and a wide variety of family trees on the web.

Famous-people sources: mostly about men, of course, but very useful even for the female members of GD. Oxford Dictionary of National Biography. Who Was Who. Times Digital Archive.

Useful source for business and legal information: London Gazette and its Scottish counterpart Edinburgh Gazette. Now easy to find (with the right search information) on the web.

Catalogues: British Library; Freemasons' Library.

Wikipedia; Google; Google Books - my three best resources. I also used other web pages, but with some caution, as - from the historian's point of view - they vary in quality a great deal.

SOURCES FOR ROBERT ELLIOTT STEEL

ROBERT STEEL father of the GD member:

At www.visionofbritain.org.uk a short account of Horton and villages close by, using as its source John Marius Wilson's Imperial Gazetteer of England and Wales, published 1870-72.

I found very little good evidence about the Steel family of Horton, but I did find a query posted April 2010 at boards.ancestry.co.uk posted April 2010 on John Tunney and John Steel who were 1st cousins whose parents had been born in Horton. Mary Steel had married John Tunney.

That Robert Steel the father may have been in business as a draper in Manchester: London Gazette 30 August 1872 p3874 proceedings under the Bankruptcy Act of 1869.

THE ELLIOTT FAMILY of Harburn Northumberland:

At www.curiousfox.com, an enquiry mentioning a John Elliott born Hartburn 1818, who was living at Bell Bar Hertfordshire by 1851. There was no mention by the enquirer of an Anna Eliza Elliott, just a possible brother Robert.

Website www.brookmans.com on Brookman's Park, serialisation of Peter Kingsford's A Modern History of Brookman's Park. Chapter 2 covers 1816-80.

1851 census which shows a John Elliott born in Hartburn living at Bell Bar in a house right next to the gates to the Brookman's Park entrance. He has a visitor, Robert Elliott aged 23. John desc's himself as "bailiff"; it's a good guess that he's working at the Brookman's Park estate.

Familysearch England-ODM GS film numbers 252497 and 252498: marriage of Robert Steel and Anna Eliza Elliott.

ROBERT ELLIOTT STEEL

EDUCATION

Journal of the Chemical Society 1934 part 1 p565 obituary written by E. Hope.

MANCHESTER GRAMMAR SCHOOL see wikipedia.

LONDON UNIVERSITY

At www.ulrls.lon.ac.uk/resources/CopyofExaminationRegisters.pdf Robert Elliott (sic) Steel is on a list of examinees June 1870.

MAGDALEN COLLEGE AND ITS DEMYSHIPS: see wikipedia for an explanation.

At www.magd.ox.ac.uk, a catalogue of the library at Magdalen College Oxford, their ref MC: P233/3C1 is a scrapbook of letters to (and some from) Edward Chapman, sent/received between 1866 and 1901. The list of correspondents includes Robert Elliot Steel described in the catalogue as holding one of the demyships from 1872 to 1876.

SOCIETY OF CHEMICAL INDUSTRY

Chemical News and the Journal of Industrial Science volume 51 1885. It's a weekly journal, published on Fridays, and its founder and current editor is GD member William Crookes. Issue of 27 February 1885 p101 report of the meeting of the Chemical Society held Thursday 19 February 1885: Robert Elliott Steel was amongst those elected a member at that meeting.

Journal of the Society of Chemical Industry volume 11 1892 pxxii members' list.

British Library catalogue for the textbooks:

1889 Natural Science Exam Papers; as compiler. In the School Examination Series, editor A M M Stedman. Published Bell. On the web I saw a few references to this book as a Part 1 - Inorganic. But I couldn't find any references at all, at the British Library or via google, to a Part 2 which ought to have been Organic.

1890 Practical Chemistry for the Elementary Stage of the Science and Art Department's Examinations. London: Methuen and Co.

1891 The World of Science. London: Methuen and Co.

1891 A Class-Book on Light. London: Methuen and Co.

ELIZABETH ELEANOR STEEL'S MARRIAGE

The marriage of Elizabeth Eleanor Steel was registered at Durham in the autumn of 1898. That much is clear from freebmd. However, it wasn't possible from freebmd to work out who she married. I needed information from elsewhere to see whether her husband was John Stuart M Woodhall or William Handley. When this happens - it's quite common with my GD research - my first port of call is Ancestry.co.uk. But with Elizabeth Steel I couldn't find her, or either of the men she might have married, on 1901 or 1911. So I tried google, but nothing came up either for her with either surname, or for either of her supposed husbands. So I have no information about her at all, from the date of the marriage. Stumped!

BRADFORD

For the grammar school see www.bradfordgrammar.com and wikipedia.

At pygs.lyellcollection.org Proceedings of the Yorkshire Geological and Polytechnic Society volume 11 1890 members' list pp498-504.

Transactions of the Yorkshire Naturalists' Union parts 17-22 published by the Union 1892.

SHERBORNE

Wikipedia: good account of the school's history.

THE BONE HOAX

FOR PILTDOWN MAN see wikipedia and a lot of other websites.

Definitive proof that the bone was modern not Palaeolithic - see SOS-veleia1.wdfiles.com/local-files/start/Sherborn.pdf which reproduces Journal of Archaeological Science volume 25 1998: 777-787: AMS Dating and Microscopic Analysis of the Sherborne Bone by F D'Errico of France's Institut de Quaternaire; C T Williams Department of Mineralogy Natural History Museum; and C B Stringer Department of Palaeontology Natural History Museum. On p787 is a reference to an earlier article on the subject, Stringer et al in Nature volume 378 1995 p452.

See some of the letters written in 1926 at www.clarku.edu/~piltown/map\_report\_finds/horse\_head.html, website of Clark's University. Bayzard's letters appeared in Nature 16 January 1926 and Nature 13 February 1926 p233. Robert Elliott Steel's reply was in Nature 18 February 1926.

HENRY ELLIOTT and ANNIE CAROLINE ELLIOTT

For Haynes or Hawnes Park see www.british-history.ac.uk which uses information from the Victoria County History's A History of the County of Bedfordshire volume 2 pp338-344 published 1908.

For the ownership of Haynes Park by the Thynne family: a wiki at wikipedia.

For Lord John Thynne:

Information on him at www.westminster-abbey.org, and www.thepeerage.com which uses Burke's Peerage.

While searching with google I saw some references to a W B Greenfield who farmed the Haynes Park estate in the 1900s; but he seems to have been dead by 1912.

At www.waymaking.com some details about the house and its history after Greenfield's death.

See www.haynesparkprogramme.org, the house is now owned by the Radha Soami Satsang Beas which runs it as a Science of the Soul study centre. The RSSB's headquarters is in India.

Later owner of Haynes Park W B Greenfield: using google I saw several references to him, particularly as a blood-stock breeder; but nothing involving Haynes Park before the 1900s and he seems to be dead by 1912.

THE THATCH STALBRIDGE

It's listed, see www.britishlistedbuildings.co.uk,

29 July 2014

Amandragora@attglobal.net

Find the web pages of Roger Wright and Sally Davis, including my list of people initiated into the Order of the Golden Dawn between 1888 and 1901, at:

http://pws.prserv.net/Roger\_Wright/

***

Rose Mary Howard Swain was initiated into the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn on 2 December 1891 at its Isis-Urania temple in London. She chose the Latin motto 'Non in tenebris'. Two other people were initiated at the same ceremony: Ada Alice, wife of A E Waite; and James Webber or Webber Smith; though I'm not sure Rose Mary knew either of them before that evening.

INTRODUCTION

This is one of my short biographies. As I have found with so many GD members, especially the women, there isn't much information specifically on Rose Mary's life. However, there is quite a bit on her complex family background - more, in fact, than I originally turned up. This is a rewrite of my original biography of February 2016; made necessary, and easy to do, by Roger Mace, a descendant of the Whitmore family from Rose Mary's father's side. In August 2016, Roger read my original work on Rose Mary and contacted me to make several comments on it. Since then he has sent explanations, speculations, copies of documents and a family tree. The section on the Swain family, is now a joint effort between Roger Mace and me.

Sally Davis

November 2016

This is what Roger Mace and I have found on ROSE MARY HOWARD SWAIN, married surname Robinson.

IN THE GD

Based on information I found at the Theosophical Society - see the next section for more details - I'd say Rose Mary Swain was invited to join the GD by one or other of its founders. This is pure speculation but I wonder whether Rose Mary's father and William Wynn Westcott had been acquainted as fellow doctors.

Rose Mary did start to work her way through the texts new initiates were encouraged to study as part of their progress towards the GD's inner, 2nd Order. When she married in 1893, she did let the GD know her new surname so I think she was still a fairly active member then. However, she and her husband went to live in the London suburbs, and over the next few years had quite a large family. She let her GD membership lapse.

ANY OTHER ESOTERIC INTERESTS?

Yes. About a year before her initiation as a GD member, Rose Mary had applied to join the Theosophical Society. At that time, all applicants had to be sponsored by two people who were already members. Rose Mary's sponsors were William Wynn Westcott and his fellow GD founder Samuel Liddell Mathers and I'm sure it must have been one or both of them who told Rose Mary about the GD's existence and asked if she'd like to be a member.

There was a period in the early 1890s when Rose Mary was involved with both the TS and the GD. In January 1892 she acted as a sponsor herself, when her teacher friend Edith Lanchester applied to join the TS. However, she resigned from the TS in March 1895. This might have been because she had a child and a home to run by then; though she might - like many others - have felt disgusted and despairing as factions in the TS fought over who should lead it, and in what direction, now that Helena Petrovna Blavatsky was dead.

Sources for TS membership:

Theosophical Society Membership Register January 1889-September 1891 p158 application of Rose M H Swain.

Theosophical Society Membership Register September 1891-January 1893 p45 January 1892 application of Edith Lanchester.

For more on the socialist and feminist Edith Lanchester, see ODNB, wikipedia and www.workersliberty.org. In 1895 the Lanchester family arranged for Edith to be detained under the 1890 Lunacy Act when she announced her intention of setting up home, unmarried, with an Irish labourer, James Sullivan. The case caused a national outcry; I hope Rose Mary did what she could to get her friend released. Edith was let go after a week, when doctors not selected by the Lanchesters declared her sane. She did set up home with Sullivan and they stayed together until his death in 1945. In 1897 Edith became secretary to Eleanor Marx.

Roger Mace in his emails of August 2016 told me a bit more about the Lanchester family: first, that they owned the Lanchester car-making firm; and secondly that the Bride of Frankenstein, Elsa Lanchester, was a member of the family.

ANY OBITUARIES/BIOGRAPHIES?

No.

BIRTH/YOUTH/FAMILY BACKGROUND

Both Rose Mary's parents' families - the Swains and the Rays - have their bewildering aspects. Both families had a trend towards men and women dying young; and to non-nuclear-family households with much coming and going of personnel. Both families contained people called by exactly or more or less exactly the same name. There are several men called 'Isaac Swain', and the name-set 'Isaac Howard Swain' occurs many times in the extended family of Rose Mary's father. And on the other side, Rose Mary's grandmother and mother were both called 'Rose' and she herself then named one of her own daughters 'Rosemary'.

THE SWAIN CONNECTION

The Swains were one of a group of staunch Non-Conformist families living in and around Stockport in Cheshire, in the late 18th century. Roger Mace has found that the Swain, Willis, Wilson, Whitmore and Spensley families were connected by marriages and by joint business ventures; and also by bankruptcy and legal proceedings in the Chancery Courts, when things went wrong!

The direct line of descent of Rose Mary's father from Swain family members living in Stockport begins with the man Roger and Sally will call Isaac Swain 1. Isaac Swain 1 was born in 1716 and married Sarah Willis. A son of theirs, Isaac Swain 2 (born 1755) made a fortune as a pawnbroker and cotton waste spinner, and from property and other investments in Stockport. He married a woman called Jane Howard, usually known as Jenny, and her surname was taken up by their descendants as a forename. Isaac Swain 2 and Jane had eight children, five of whom survived infancy. They included a son, born in 1803, who was the first to be named Isaac Howard Swain. We'll call him 3/1 - third 'isaac swain', first 'isaac howard swain'. The four surviving daughters were: Sarah Willis, who married a Whitmore; Jenny, who married a Spensley; Hannah; and Mary Ann, who married a Wilson. The sons-in-law were involved in a variety of businesses: pawnbroking; auctioneering; silk manufacture; silk trading and newspaper ownership. The businesses were not always successful and Whitmore went bankrupt in 1843 when the Illustrated Weekly Times failed. Through these marriages, the name-set 'isaac howard swain' passed into the Whitmore family and the forename-set 'isaac howard' passed into the Spensley family. And Isaac Howard Swain 3/1 (Rose Mary's grandfather) passed the forename-set on through his family.

Isaac Swain 2 died in February 1837, and his widow in 1839. His Will was disputed, and legal cases concerning it were still continuing in 1852; a lot of the money and property that Isaac Swain 2 had amassed, was lost in the process.

Isaac Howard Swain 3/1 married Mary Ann Blake at St Mary Stockport, in September 1837. They are Rose Mary's grandparents on her father's side. They had two sons. The first, Isaac Howard Swain 4/2, was born in 1838/9. No official record of the death of Rose Mary's grandfather Isaac Howard Swain 3/1 has been traced. However, Roger Mace has found a manuscript note written by his Whitmore brother-in-law (Sarah Willis Swain's husband) in a book of memoranda relating to the death of Jenny Swain. According to that note, Isaac Howard Swain 3/1 died in Dieppe, France, on 8 February 1841. A court case was in progress against him at that time, by a judgement creditor. The 1841 census shows his widow, Mary Swain aged 20, living in Macclesfield with her son "Isaac Swain" - that is, Isaac Howard Swain 4/2, Rose Mary's father - aged 2. On census day, Mary Ann was pregnant for a second time. Her son John Wilson Swain was christened in Stockport on 15 November 1841, but died the following year.

The widowed Mary Ann Swain may have spent the next few years living with her relations-by-marriage, the Wilson family. In 1848 she married again, in Kendal Westmoreland. Her son Isaac Howard Swain 4/2 went with her and her new husband, to London.

Mary Ann Swain's second husband was Rev Alfred Povah, born in 1824 and thus six years her junior. Legal documents from the 1840s suggest that he had been a friend of the family for many years. At the time of the marriage he was curate of St James Westminster. In the 1850s he ran a school in Southwark. By the early 1860s he'd been appointed vicar of St Olave Hart Street in the City of London. He remained in post there for many years and later wrote a book about the parish. Rose Mary's father, Isaac Howard Swain 4/2, grew up living with the Povah family and had at least two half-brothers, Alfred and John Povah.

Isaac Howard Swain 4/2 studied medicine at St Andrew's University and Guy's Hospital in London. On the day of the 1861 census the Povahs were abroad so Isaac, doing a spell on the wards at Guy's, was staying at 280 Tudor Road Battersea, with his aunt Mary Ann (daughter of Isaac Swain 2) and her husband John Hewetson Wilson. Wilson, who had been born in Knutsford in Cheshire, didn't need to work but lived off the income from property in Sussex, Westmorland and Stockport, and from shares in the Kendal and Windermere Railway. He wasn't an extravagant man - he and Mary Ann had were employing only two women servants, a cook and a general servant. However, a coachman was also living in on that census day. At the back of the Wilsons' house must have been some stables, with the groom or grooms sleeping above the horses. Keeping a carriage was an expensive business - this was a wealthy household.

Isaac Howard Swain 4/2 gained his license to practice surgery, medicine and midwifery in 1862. John Hewetson Wilson died in August of that year. Amongst many other bequests, he left £1000 to Mary Ann Povah; and £1000 to Isaac Howard Swain 4/2 which - unlike the bequests left to the other beneficiaries - was in cash with no strings attached. Isaac Howard Swain 4/2 used the inheritance to move to Shaftesbury, Dorset and start up a practice as a GP. In 1866 he was appointed deputy coroner there, to cover the usual coroner's illnesses and absence. The appointment might have led to Isaac Howard Swain 4/2 becoming the coroner for Shaftesbury himself in due course. However, he chose instead to move to Cheshire, nearer to where his extended family - many of them still comfortably off despite the trouble over Isaac Swain 2's Will - could bring him more patients. By the mid-1870s he was in practice in the village of Brindley Ford, a few miles south of Congleton. And then, like his father, he died young - in February 1875 aged only 36 - and his widow moved to London.

THE RAY FAMILY, ROSE MARY'S MOTHER

Rose Mary's mother was also from a medical family. Rose Stammers Ray (born 1841) was the eldest child of Edward Ray and his wife Rose, née Mann, who had married in 1840.

Edward Ray was a surgeon and GP with a practice in Dulwich; as was his eldest son Edward Reynolds Ray who probably inherited his father's patients.

Rose Ray grew up in a wealthier household than that of Isaac Howard Swain 4/2's step-father, Rev Povah: on the day of the 1851 census, her parents were employing a cook, a housemaid, two nurses, a groom; and possibly a governess although the census entry is a bit vague on that point. The two nurses had the care of Rose Stammers Ray and her six siblings - Edward Reynolds, Alice, Charles, Herbert, Julia and Katherine. Rose Stammers Ray's father Edward died in 1868, when his wife was in her late 40s.

ROSE MARY'S PARENTS

Isaac Howard Swain 4/2 and Rose Stammers Ray were married in 1863. Rose Mary Howard Swain was the eldest of their three children, born on 1 December 1864 in Shaftesbury. She had a sister, Florence Emily Howard Swain, born 1866 (also in Shaftesbury); and a brother, Isaac Howard Swain the 5th and 3rd (and I think the last, in this line of descent), born in 1867 in Stockport, after the family had moved to Cheshire.

By 1871, Rose Mary's parents were at their last address together, 45 Brindley Ford. With Isaac Howard Swain 4/2 still in the process of building up his practice, their household on census day 1871 was a very modest one, with no live-in servants, not even one (a groom or an apprentice) helping Isaac with his work as a GP. The household was also lacking one of its family members on census day: Florence Swain, the younger daughter, was already living with her uncle Edward Reynolds Ray and his wife Alice, in Dulwich.

THE HOUSEHOLD OF WIDOWS

After the death of Rose Mary's father Isaac Howard Swain 4/2 - probably very soon after - Rose Stammers Swain returned to London, to live with her mother, Rose Ray. The two widows, mother and daughter, stayed living together until the mid-1890s. Rose Mary the GD member lived with them until her marriage. The other two permanent members of the household for that long period were also women: Rose Ray's daughter Julia, who never married; and Rose Ray's grand-daughter Alice Ray Simon, the only surviving child of her daughter Alice, who had died two days after the birth. Other family members came and went: George John Simon, the widower father of Alice Ray Simon, had lived with his mother-in-law in the 1870s; Rose Mary's brother Isaac Howard Swain 5/3 lived with the two widows during the school holidays and until he went to work in the East; on census day 1881 the household had a lodger, Blanche Eagle, a 14-year-old schoolgirl; and by 1891 Rose Ray's youngest daughter Katherine Hazeldine had come to live with them after she too had been widowed. One person who didn't ever live in the household as far as I can see was Rose Mary's sister Florence: she continued to live with her uncle and aunt and their daughter Eliza Ray, until she married.

In the 1870s Rose Ray had been living in Brixton but by 1881 she and her daughter had moved to 9 The Grange, Shepherd's Bush. I haven't been able to identify this street and by 1891 the Post Office might have given it a new name - 45 Shepherd's Bush Green. Whether or not it was the same house as in 1881, 45 Shepherd's Bush Green was where Rose Mary Swain and her relations were living on the day of the 1891 census. Alice Ray Simon was away that day, perhaps staying with her father in Essex. I'm not sure what income Julia Ray had - possibly none at all until her mother died - but the widow's portions of Rose Ray, Rose Stammers Swain and Katherine Hazeldine enabled them to employ the same number of servants that Rose Ray had been able to afford in the early 1870s: a cook, housemaid and parlourmaid. None of the older women ever did any paid work and would probably have thought it beneath them; but Rose Mary was working in the early 1890s.

Between 1891 and 1893, the household moved out of Shepherd's Bush to a house nearer to Hammersmith, in Girdlers Road; and it was from there that Rose Mary was married.

Sources for this family section:

Information and copies of original documents sent me by Roger Mace, a descendant of the Whitmore family; from - inter alia - documents he has inherited relating to the Whitmores, Swains and other families living in 18th-century Stockport. They included a neat summary of the Will of Isaac Swain of Stockport - Rose Mary's great-grandfather - whose death in February 1837 unleashed so many legal cases. In the Will Rose Mary's grandfather (Isaac Howard Swain 3/2) was left his father's silk mill and the property surrounding it.

Familysearch England-VR GS film number 1751723 had a baptism record for Rose Mary's father Isaac Howard Swain II though he was not baptised with the name 'howard'. 1839 at Stockport Cheshire. Father Isaac Howard Swain ((3/2)). Mother Mary Ann.

Death of Isaac Howard Swain ((3/2)): handwritten memorandum written by his brother-in-law Whitmore in a book of items relating to the death of Jane Howard Swain. Copy sent by Roger Mace, by email September 2016.

Problems caused by the early death of Isaac Howard Swain 3/2: The Jurist volume 5 1842 p886 mentions a case being brought against the infant Isaac Howard Swain (that's 4/3, Rose Mary's father) by his father's creditors.

Second marriage of Mary Ann Swain: Gentleman's Magazine 1848 p423.

Rev Alfred Povah:

Calendar of King's College London issue of 1850 p215 Povah is in a list of graduates in classics; 1847.

Census 1851, 1861

The Annals of the Parishes of St Olave Hart Street and Allhallows Staining in the City of London published London: Blades East and Blades 1894. Seen at archive.org.

Probate Registry 1901.

Announcement of Isaac Howard Swain 4/3's licence to practice medicine: Lancet 1862 part 1 January to June p559 issue of 24 May 1862 I H Swain. His address is given as St Olive's Rectory Hart Street, in the Mark Lane district of the City of London.

For Isaac Howard Swain 4/3's inheritance from his uncle: Will and probate grant of John Hewetson Wilson who died 9 August 1862; obtained from the Public Record Office by Roger Mace September 2016.

GMC Registers for 1862 to 1875.

His appointment as a deputy coroner: Dorset Quarter Sessions Order Book. Confirmation of Isaac Howard Swain's appointment, to cover when necessary for the coroner's illness and absence. Issued by the coroner, William Henry Rennie Bennett 25 August 1866. Copy of this item sent by Roger Mace; email August 2016.

Death announcement: Lancet 1875 part 1 January-June p357 issue of 6 March 1875. There was no obituary.

Birth of Rose Mary Howard Swain (though she isn't named): via genesreunited Dorset County Chronicle issue of 7 December 1864.

Rose Mary's baptism (by her step-grandfather Rev Alfred Povah) at St Olave in London on 18 January 1865: Familysearch England-ODM GS film number 55703.

Florence Emily Howard Swain: Familysearch England-ODM GS film number 55703. Florence was also baptised at St Olave, on 11 May 1866; she was born 6 January 1866.

Rose Ray's households of widows and orphans: census 1871, 1881, 1891.

Isaac Howard Swain 5/4, Rose Mary's brother:

Epsom College Register from October 1855 to July 1905. Published London: Richard Clay and Sons 1905: pxi, pxii, p108, p121. He played football and cricket for the school; and left it in 1883.

His employment with the Bombay and Burmah Trading Corporation: probate registry entry 1896 for Rose Stammers Swain. See wikipedia for the Corporation; and also other websites as the company still exists, as a member of the Wadia Group. BBTC was founded in 1863 to manage the tea plantations of William Wallace; but moved into Burma and Thailand in the 1870s in search of teak. That's where Isaac Howard Swain III comes in: in the probate register 1896 he's described as a "forester".

His being in British Columbia in 1910. Familysearch British Columbia Marriage Registrations GS film number 1983703: marriage of Isaac Howard Swain to Winnifred Mary Gunson in Vancouver BC on 30 November 1910.

Isaac Howard Swain's wife had also been born in England and they came back to live in London eventually. Isaac Howard Swain died in March 1949 in Hampstead.

Death of Isaac Howard Swain 5/4: probate registry 1949.

Alice Ray Simon:

Freebmd and see www.geni.com pages on the Ingham family, managed by Ronald Goose and with a photo (in old age) of Alice Ray's daughter. Alice Ray Simon married Charles Patrick Ingham in 1896. Her daughter Rose Mary Julia Ingham was born in 1900.

Back to Rose Mary Howard Swain:

EDUCATION

A complete unknown. No governess was ever listed on census day in any household Rose Mary lived in while she was growing up; though one might have been employed who came each day to give lessons. Another possibility was that there was money enough in the Ray and Swain families to pay for Rose Mary to go to a private day school: that wouldn't show up on the census and it seems to be in the nature of such schools that their records are not on the web. It's just possible that she went to a National school; but these were looked down on by the middle-classes who preferred to pay for their children's education if they could afford it (or let the girls do more or less without if they couldn't).

WORK/PROFESSION

Rose Mary did have a job in the early 1890s - the 1891 census official was told that she was working as a day-governess: that is, she was employed to give lessons in other households while still living at home. She was not working in a school; which probably meant that she had no teaching qualifications. Rose Mary's employers will all have had to be wealthy enough to afford to pay her to teach their daughters. There will have been plenty of those in the Shepherd's Bush and Hammersmith area.

ANY PUBLICATIONS?

No.

ANY PUBLIC LIFE/EVIDENCE FOR LEISURE TIME? Bearing in mind, of course, that most leisure activities leave no trace behind them.

Apart from the TS, no.

ADDRESSES

Born: Shaftesbury Dorset

?1871-75: 45 Brindley Ford, Wedgewood

1881: 9 The Grange Hammersmith; which might be the same house as

1890, 1891: 45 Shepherd's Bush Green

1893: 13 Girdlers Road Kensington which is just round the corner from Blythe Road where the GD's 2nd Order had its offices and ritual room in the late 1890s.

Immediately after her marriage, to at least early 1895: Greenway Bank, 32 London Road, Chalk Hill Bushey

By 1901 and still in 1913: Aysgarth, Upton Road Watford.

At death 1937: Darbys, Church Road Cookham Berkshire.

ROSE MARY'S HUSBAND

Rose Mary married a solicitor, Alfred Robinson. Alfred was born around 1860 in Croydon. He qualified as a solicitor in 1880 and may always have worked for Jesse Hind. He was taken into partnership by Jesse Hind in 1897, and they continued in business as Hind and Robinson, with offices at 8 Stone Buildings Lincoln's Inn, 6 Bishopsgate in the City of London, and in Nottingham, until Hind's retirement around 1905. It was probably at this point that the offices in Bishopsgate and Nottingham were let go and there were a couple of years in which Alfred Robinson was the only partner. By 1908 Alfred had taken Henry George Barrett into partnership, and that partnership continued, at 8 Stone Buildings only, until Alfred's own death in 1913.

I couldn't find any direct evidence that Alfred Robinson had been at London University but he did have a law degree and in 1891 he was one of the boarders at University Hall Gordon Square, a lodging house where young professional men could have board and lodging in return for giving lessons to working people in the evenings. The Hall had been founded by dissenters and was closely associated with University College.

Sources for Alfred Robinson as a solicitor:

Law Lists: 1897 p538; 1904 p548; 1905 p522; 1906 p560; 1908 p393 and p570; 1913 p605; 1914 p625 though with Barrett as the only partner; and 1918 p463 when the partnership doesn't appear at all.

At mss-cat.nottingham.ac.uk items catalogued as Pl E12/6/8/8/13-83 all dated 1898-99 show Hind and Robinson involved in a conveyance of land at Clipstone Nottinghamshire. Jesse Hind died in Nottingham in 1906 and had probably come from there originally.

University Hall: 1891 census and www.ucl.ac.uk/bloomsbury-project page on University Hall and the Passmore Edwards Settlement.

ROSE MARY ROBINSON

Rose Mary Howard Swain married Alfred Robinson at St James Norlands in Kensington on 12 August 1893. They moved out of town almost at once, to Bushey in Hertfordshire, and had a large family. All the children were given the name 'howard' amongst their others and I do wonder about the Swain family's continual insistence on it. Were they claiming a relationship - either by blood or even by clientage - to the great Howard families, earls of Carlisle and dukes of Norfolk? Rose Mary's children were: Beatrice Howard Robinson born 1894; Rosemary Howard Robinson born 1896; Jessica Howard Robinson born 1897; Dorothea Howard Robinson born 1899; and the obviously longed-for son Edward Howard Robinson born late in 1900, after which there were no more children.

The household that Rose Mary had grown up in was wiped out by the deaths of its three senior members around the time of the birth of Rose Mary's second daughter. Rose Ray died in December 1895; Rose Stammers Swain died in January 1896; and Julia Ray died in June 1896, just before Alice Ray Simon was due to get married. Rose Mary's grandmother Mary Ann Povah also died, about four days after Rose Ray. A hard time for both Rose Mary and Alice. Alice's marriage did go ahead, though.

On census day 1901 the Robinsons were living at the house called Aysgarth, on Upton Road in Watford; with a nurse and two other servants (probably a cook and a housemaid) to help run a household with so many small children. The family were all still there on the day of the 1911 census. The children were all at school so the nurse had been dispensed with; though the Robinsons could still afford the cook and housemaid. They had visitors on census day - Rose Mary's sister Florence Winser (she had married Frederick Winser in 1899) and her daughter Florence Frederika, aged 10.

It seems to have been the fate of women in Rose Mary's family to be left widowed at a relatively young age. Alfred Robinson died in March 1913, perhaps rather suddenly (he died in central London rather than nearer home); Rose Mary was 49.

Sources: freebmd for births of Rose Mary's children; marriage of Alice Ray Simon; marriage of Florence Emily Howard Swain and birth of Florence Frederika Winser. Probate Registry entries 1896 for Rose Ray, Rose Stammers Swain and Julia Maria Ray; 1913 for Alfred Robinson.

Miscellanea Genealogica et Heraldica published Hamilton Adams and Co 1917; p193 for the death of Mary Ann Povah.

DEATH

Rose Mary Howard Robinson died early in 1937 in a nursing home in Marlow, though her normal address was Darbys, a five-bedroom detached house on Church Road Cookham. Of course I can't tell whether she was living at Darbys on her own or with one of her children.

Sources: probate registry entries 1937; and zoopla February 2016.

DESCENDANTS? AND WHAT (IF ANYTHING) HAPPENED NEXT.

Rose Mary's son Edward Howard Robinson became an electrical engineer. After working for Radio Communications Company Ltd he started his own company, Edward Howard Ltd, in the late 1930s. He owned several patents. I haven't looked to see whether he married and had descendants. I think he died after 1966 - there's no entry for him in the probate registries on Ancestry.

Dorothea Howard Robinson qualified as a secretary and was personal assistant to the deans of St Thomas's Hospital from 1941 to her retirement in 1961. She then went to live with her sisters Beatrice and Rosemary.

Beatrice Howard Robinson and Rosemary Howard Robinson were living together at 13a Osmond Gardens Hove in the mid-1960s; Dorothea had joined them there in 1961. In a partial repeat of what had happened to their great-grandmother and grandmother, they all died within 18 months of each other: Beatrice in April 1965, Dorothea in March 1966; and Rosemary in the autumn of 1966. None of them had married.

Rose Mary's youngest daughter Jessica was the odd one out. She went to university, studying chemistry at Bedford College London. She graduated in 1920 and married 2nd Lieutenant Leslie Grayburn Barry of the Army Service Corps. I think Jessica may have had a daughter, Cynthia Grayburn Field. Jessica Barry bucked the general trend of her family by living until she was nearly 100: she died in 1994. She was always known as Poppy.

Sources:

Patent website www.patentmaps.com and via google to Official Gazette of the US Patent Office volume 627 1949 p401 patent number 2,484,120.

St Thomas's Hospital Gazette volume 64 1966 p80.

Probate registry entries 1965, 1966.

University of London Calendar issue of 1920 p498.

At <https://library.leeds.ac.uk>, item catalogued as LIDDLEWW1/009 which has Jessica Howard Robinson's name on it and some information on her life; though the contents seem mostly to be records of her husband's family, the Barrys.

BASIC SOURCES I USED for all Golden Dawn members.

Membership of the Golden Dawn: The Golden Dawn Companion by R A Gilbert. Northampton: The Aquarian Press 1986. Between pages 125 and 175, Gilbert lists the names, initiation dates and addresses of all those people who became members of the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn or its many daughter Orders between 1888 and 1914. The list is based on the Golden Dawn's administrative records and its Members' Roll - the large piece of parchment on which all new members signed their name at their initiation. All this information had been inherited by Gilbert but it's now in the Freemasons' Library at the United Grand Lodge of England building on Great Queen Street Covent Garden. Please note, though, that the records of the Amen-Ra Temple in Edinburgh were destroyed in 1900/01. I have recently (July 2014) discovered that some records of the Horus Temple at Bradford have survived, though most have not; however those that have survived are not yet accessible to the public.

For the history of the GD during the 1890s I usually use Ellic Howe's The Magicians of the Golden Dawn: A Documentary History of a Magical Order 1887-1923. Published Routledge and Kegan Paul 1972. Foreword by Gerald Yorke. Howe is a historian of printing rather than of magic; he also makes no claims to be a magician himself, or even an occultist. He has no axe to grind.

Family history: freebmd; ancestry.co.uk (census and probate); findmypast.co.uk; familysearch; Burke's Peerage and Baronetage; Burke's Landed Gentry; Armorial Families; thepeerage.com; and a wide variety of family trees on the web.

Famous-people sources: mostly about men, of course, but very useful even for the female members of GD. Oxford Dictionary of National Biography. Who Was Who. Times Digital Archive.

Useful source for business and legal information: London Gazette and its Scottish counterpart Edinburgh Gazette. Now easy to find (with the right search information) on the web.

Catalogues: British Library; Freemasons' Library.

Wikipedia; Google; Google Books - my three best resources. I also used other web pages, but with some caution, as - from the historian's point of view - they vary in quality a great deal.

Find the web pages of Roger Wright and Sally Davis, including my list of people initiated into the Order of the Golden Dawn between 1888 and 1901, at:

www.wrightanddavis.co.uk

***

Eugène Henri Thiellay became a member of the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn in August 1888, a few months after the Order was founded. He was initiated at its Isis-Urania temple in London and chose the Latin motto 'Amicus usque ad aras'. The sources that have survived suggest that he was never an active member of the Order. Eventually he resigned from it, though the date he did so wasn't noted in his membership record.

This is a short biography. There's a lack of historical evidence for his life, for reasons which will become clear if you read through it. My basic sources for any GD member are in a section at the end of the file. Supplementary sources for this particular member are listed at the end of each section.

SALLY DAVIS

November 2016

This is what I have found on EUGENE HENRI THIELLAY, who might have been called Henri or Henry rather than Eugène.

IN THE GOLDEN DAWN

No evidence that he was ever an active member and he may have resigned early in 1890, at the same time as he resigned from the Rosicrucian Society; for reasons he declined to explain.

ANY OTHER ESOTERIC INTERESTS?

THEOSOPHY

The most common way into the GD in the first 13 years of its existence was via membership of the Theosophical Society. However, this was not the route that Eugène Henri took - he was never in the TS. His way in was through freemasonry.

FREEMASONRY

At www.masonicperiodicals.org. it was all-too-easy to find Eugène Henri Thiellay - I got 401 responses to a search using his surname; and glancing through them it was obvious that he was very active, going to a great many lodge and other meetings, from the early 1870s to the late 1890s. I worked my way through the responses until the magazine reports started to get repetitive and there were no more new initiations - about the mid-1880s.

Eugène Henri may have been a freemason in France before he came to live and work in England. I don't know where to look for information about that. His earliest initiation into an English lodge came in April 1868.

CRAFT FREEMASONRY

Membership of a craft lodge has been the basis of freemasonry since the 18th century: all routes further into the subject start from there.

LODGE OF PRUDENT BRETHREN 145

Eugène Henri's April 1868 initiation was as a member of the Lodge of Prudent Brethren 145. As its low number indicates, it is one of the oldest craft lodges in England, founded in 1775 (though with a different name and number) and a member of the group known as Antient Lodges whose details appear in the Duke of Atholl's Roll. Since 1867 it had been meeting at the Freemasons' Hall in Covent Garden, near where Eugène Henri set up in business. Once he was a member, Eugène Henri began to move up the lodge's hierarchy of officers. In fact he went a bit further than most keen members, representing the lodge as its steward in 1874 at the annual fund-raising festival in aid of the Royal Masonic Institution for Boys - essentially, acting as the lodge's chief fund-raiser that year. He reached the top of the lodge's hierarchy in January 1876, spending his 12 months as its Worshipful Master (WM) in the lodge's centenary year. At the lodge meeting of January 1876, when he became WM, the lodge members got their first look at the centenary jewel the UGLE had agreed they could have to commemorate the lodge's first 100 years. The meeting was a big occasion, attended by 60 lodge members and 70 guests. Two months later the lodge held a celebratory banquet in the Pillar Hall of Anderton's Hotel in Fleet Street; with a very large number of guests. As WM, Eugène Henri was the evening's chief host.

In 1881 the lodge set up a benevolent fund to oversee the distribution to charity of 5% of its revenues. Lodge 145's had plenty of money to spend on charitable works, as its fees were high: in the 1880s it was charging 10 guineas for an initiation, a considerable sum at that time.

Eugène Henri was also a member of Prudent Brethren 145's Royal Arch chapter: see below, in the section on Royal Arch for more information on that.

In 1872, Eugène Henri became a member of two more craft lodges, one an offshoot of the other, and both holding their meetings in Surrey: Lebanon Lodge 1326 and its daughter lodge Era 1423.

LEBANON LODGE 1326 was the older of the two lodges. Eugène Henri joined it in March 1872.

ERA LODGE 1423

In December 1872 Eugène Henri was one of those members of Lebanon Lodge 1326 who signed the petition to the UGLE, asking permission to found an offshoot lodge as Lebanon 1326 had more members than it could easily accommodate. The new lodge was called Era Lodge 1423. It was consecrated in February 1873. Eugène Henri was appointed one of the lodge's officers for its first year, Senior Deacon (SD), and served as its WM from April 1877 to April 1878. He was also lodge secretary in 1881-82. Perhaps there was not such a need for a second lodge in the Hampton district as the members of Era Lodge 1423 had claimed: it had a problem keeping members. Originally holding its meetings at the King's Arms in Hampton Court, it changed its regular venue twice in its first few years in attempts to make it easier for members to get together; firstly to the Island Hotel in Hampton Court, and then to the Albany Hotel in Twickenham, further into London. Despite these efforts, the 1880s saw membership decline. In 1884 the initiation fee was reduced from a high 10 guineas to a more reasonable 7 guineas, which kept membership of the lodge at around 18-20 until World War 1; but attendance at meetings was poor. It seems the lodge didn't have much luck, either: in April 1886 Sir Francis Burdett, a man very prominent in freemasonry at the time, accepted an invitation to attend a lodge meeting; but on the day of the meeting he was ill, and Eugène Henri had to stand in for him in all the special ceremonies that had been arranged. That it was Eugène Henri who took Burdett's place suggests he was the highest ranking craft freemason to attend the meeting: by this time he was a Past Grand Sword Bearer in the Province of Middlesex.

Eugène Henri was a founder member of two more craft lodges: New Cross 1559 near where he lived; and La France Lodge 2060.

NEW CROSS LODGE 1559

In 1875 Eugène Henri's name headed the list of those that petitioned the UGLE to allow the formation of New Cross Lodge 1559; and it was he who wrote the petition's accompanying letter. Also on the list of petitioners were one member of Era Lodge 1423 and two from Lebanon Lodge 1326; all acquaintances of his. The new lodge was consecrated at the New Cross Public Hall on Upper Lewisham Road, in February 1876. Eugène Henri should have been its first WM, but he was already in post as WM at Prudent Brethren Lodge 145, so he was installed as 1559's Senior Warden (SW) instead, serving his year as its WM in 1880. During and after Eugène Henri's lifetime membership of the lodge was cosmopolitan: two Italians were WM's in the early years, and in the year of the lodge's diamond jubilee a second Frenchman was an important member of it - Jean-Baptiste Rouard, who joined the lodge in 1884. In the late 19th century the lodge had plenty of members; but as with Era Lodge 1423, there were problems getting them to attend lodge meetings. Lodge 1559 met four times a year, on Saturday afternoons when offices and shops were closed. However, it changed its meetings' venue four times in its first few years in the search for a meeting place all members would be willing to go to. Not attending lodge meetings became a sore point - in 1891, the man due to be installed as that year's WM was outvoted by supporters of another candidate, on the grounds that the successful candidate went to more meetings. After trying the New Cross Public Hall and two different hotels in Greenwich, in 1897 1559's members agreed to pay an increased annual subscription in order to hire meeting-rooms at the Hotel Cecil on the Strand - near to where its members worked (including Eugène Henri) rather than where they lived.

LA FRANCE LODGE 2060

This lodge was founded in 1884 by a group of French businessmen living in London. Though it acknowledged the authority of the UGLE, it did its ritual work in French; its earliest lodge history is in French; and at least until the 1930s, most members had French surnames even if they had not been born in France. Eugène Henri's name was on the petition requesting permission to found the lodge. I think he must have been the most distinguished petitioner - he'd served as WM at three different lodges by this time - so it fell to him to be the new lodge's first WM. At the celebration banquet after the lodge's consecration, he proposed a toast to La France - though I'm not quite sure whether he did so in French or in English.

Although he never rose very high in the UGLE's national hierarchy, Eugène Henri did serve in the Province of Middlesex - in fact he seems to have been selected as a Grand ADC of Middlesex Province in 1875, before he was a lodge's Worshipful Master. The Provincial officials of Middlesex held their meetings at the Greyhound Hotel Hampton Court; Eugène Henri attended at least two during his 12 months in post. In August 1880 he also attended one meeting of a Lodge of Benevolence; this kind of lodge met to distribute money raised by freemasons for charitable use.

ROYAL ARCH MASONRY

Family history information suggests that Eugène Henri was interested in the mystical side of Euclidean geometry, and wanted to get to know more about it. If you want to take your freemasonry further and explore its symbolism and rituals, the next initiation you need to undergo is one into a Royal Arch chapter. Royal Arch chapters are attached to craft lodges and have usually been founded by the lodge's members. Although not all lodges have a chapter, two at least of the lodges Eugène Henri was a member of, did have one.

PRUDENT BRETHREN CHAPTER 145

Prudent Brethren Lodge 145 had had a royal arch chapter in the early years of the 19th century. The Royal Arch Grand Chapter (royal arch's governing body in England) removed the chapter from lodge 145's control in 1866, so in 1869 the lodge members formed another one. Eugène Henri wasn't one of its founding members, but he had joined by 1876 and was making his way up the chapter's hierarchy of officers. He was the chapter's Most Excellent Zerubbabel (MEZ) in 1878 and as with his years as WM in some craft lodges, reports of meetings during his year in office show it to have been a busy one, socially. In February 1878, Prudent Brethren Chapter 145 held a public night at the Freemasons' Hall. Amongst the very long list of guests at this unusual freemasonry occasion was a William Kirby, who might have been the future GD member William Forsell Kirby. However, the chapter suffered from money problems, perhaps because of its very low subscription of 2 guineas a year (definitely not enough to hold a good public night on). There was also a lot of infighting amongst chapter members, leading to several instances of disputed elections to official posts.

A short note on disputed elections. My reading suggests that even having more than one candidate for any particular office, is very rare in freemasonry, these things usually being decided well in advance, at lodge or chapter meetings; and yet Eugène Henri was the member of one lodge and one chapter where they occurred at least once.

LEBANON CHAPTER 1326

Lebanon Chapter 1326 was a more peaceful place than Prudent Brethren Chapter 145, and a more prosperous one. It met at the Red Lion Hotel in Hampton. Eugène Henri joined it in August 1875. His name was put forward almost at once for an official post at the Provincial Grand Chapter, and he served as Provincial Grand Director of Ceremonies.

ERA CHAPTER 1423

A curious feature of this chapter was that its meetings got far more coverage in the freemasonry press than the meetings of its lodge did. Sir Francis Burdett took charge at its consecration in December 1876, at the King's Arms Hotel in Hampton Court. Eugène Henri was made its Second Principal in the list of officers for the chapter's first year; so that he will have served as First Principal (the equivalent to a craft lodge's WM) in 1877-78. He was then the chapter's MEZ until July 1879, when he was given a commemorative jewel by its other members.

MARK MASONRY

After Royal Arch masonry, the next step into the esoteric side of freemasonry is via an initiation into a Mark Masonry lodge. Although it has antecedents in 16th century Scotland, English Mark Masonry developed in the mid-19th century - its first Grand Master was only appointed in 1856 and its earliest lodges date from 1857. It was and is separate from craft masonry with its own offices and national officers. In its early years it met in various freemasons' halls until the early 1890s when it was able to afford its own hall, an ex-hotel on Great Queen Street Covent Garden.

Although I haven't been able to discover the exact date, Eugène Henri must have been initiated into Mark Masonry - the correct term is 'advanced' - by 1871, when he was listed as a member of an MM lodge that had only just been founded: Northumberland MM Lodge 118. At the installation meeting in July 1871 he was made Junior Deacon for the coming 12 months. He should have served as WM in a year or two though I don't know whether he actually did.

By November 1873 Eugène Henri had become a member of one of Mark Masonry's most senior lodges, St Mark's Lodge 1, founded in 1867. He served as its WM in 1877-78 and later as its lodge secretary. As a past WM of a Mark Masonry lodge he was eligible to join the MM Grand Stewards' Lodge (which doesn't have a number); during the 1880s he was working his way up the hierarchy there too.

From Royal Arch and Mark masonry there are a number of other routes a keen freemason can follow, depending on his particular interests and the opportunities that arise. However, these routes rely on personal introduction; and the orders often have quite demanding entrance requirements.

ROYAL ARK MARINERS

There's evidence that this particular degree of freemasonry existed in some form in the 1790s but its governing body in England, the Grand Master's Royal Ark Council, was not set up until 1871, a couple of years after Eugène Henri first got involved in freemasonry. The first Royal Ark lodge was founded in 1872. All candidates for initiation (correctly, 'elevation') into a Royal Ark lodge must be Mark Masons already.

In a list of senior officers in Royal Ark masonry, issued in 1871, Eugène Henri is the third-ranking of four men serving as Grand Stewards in the Royal Ark Council. He had been appointed in June 1871 when he attended the inaugural meeting of the Council. He was probably at the meeting on behalf of one of the groups that soon became the earliest Royal Ark lodges - Royal Clarence Royal Ark Lodge 1. That proto-lodge had held its third meeting in April 1871 in the Freemasons' Hall in Basinghall Street, though as a fully-authorized lodge it moved to the Freemasons' Tavern in Covent Garden (nearer where Eugène Henri worked - perhaps he had a say in the change of venue). He was also a member of another of these proto-lodges, the one that became Prince of Wales Royal Ark Lodge 2. I haven't found much information on either of these lodges after their first few months in existence, so I don't know how long he was a member of either of them; or whether he ever served as an officer.

ANCIENT AND ACCEPTED RITE (AAR) also known as the Scottish Rite

The AAR is a form of craft freemasonry, with origins in the mid-18th century. It came to England and Wales from the USA in the early 19th-century and its governing body, the Supreme Council, was founded in 1845. It is separate from the UGLE with its own hierarchy, offices and initiations covering 18 to 33 degrees. Its equivalent to a craft lodge is known as a Rose Croix chapter. In becoming a member, Eugène Henri was joining an exclusive group: AAR initiation was by invitation only. All candidates had to have been freemasons for at least one year. To join the modern AAR candidates also have to profess belief in the Christian trinity of Father, Son and Holy Spirit; in the 19th century, having to make such a statement wasn't thought necessary.

Eugène Henri was initiated into the AAR's rose croix chapter Palestine 29, which met at the AAR headquarters in 33 Golden Square. It had been founded in 1870 and he may have been a founder member (I haven't found a list of the founders). Sir Francis Burdett who has been mentioned above, and William Robert Woodman who will be mentioned below, were also members of this chapter. To my surprise, so was the well-known spiritualist Rev William Stainton Moses - I hadn't expected him to be a freemason. Though never a member himself, Rev Moses was acquainted with several people who were initiated into the GD. Eugène Henri was still a member of Palestine Chapter 29 in 1900 - he attended the installation meeting in December of that year - and had at some stage served as its WM-equivalent, its Most Wise Sovereign (MWS).

By 1876 Eugène Henri had undergone several more of the AAR's initiations, to reach its 30° level. This was the highest level members could get to, without waiting upon dead men's shoes: the 31° level had 81 members at any time and the 32° level only 45. Several other GD members had reached level 30° by 1888, when the GD was founded: Thomas Walker Coffin, Robert Roy and GD founder William Wynn Westcott. No one who joined the GD ever made it to the 32° level and only the Rev Thomas William Lemon got to level 31°; he had reached it by 1888.

RED CROSS OF CONSTANTINE (RCC)

This order's full title, during Eugène Henri's time in it, was the Imperial, Ecclesiastical and Military Order of Knights of the Red Cross of Rome and Constantine; which gives a flavour of what it was about. There's evidence that the RCC's basic rituals were in use in the early 19th century; but the groups using them were informal and self-governing, having no overarching organisation or hierarchy until Robert Wentworth Little and others set up an RCC Grand Council in 1865. In the decades after that, the RCC expanded very rapidly both in England and abroad. The RCC's equivalent to a craft lodge is called a 'conclave'. All those wanting to be members of the RCC had to have been initiated into a Royal Arch chapter already.

The RCC has several smaller Orders contained in it, which only RCC members can join. I couldn't find evidence of exactly when Eugène Henri joined the RCC but he was 'admitted' into one of those smaller orders, the Knights of the Holy Sepulchre (KHS) at a meeting in May 1871. In August 1873 he was 'received' into another of these smaller orders, the Constantine Council of the Cryptic Rite; and at the same time he joined the Rosicrucian Society of which more below.

The first conclave that Eugène Henri joined in the RCC was its Plantagenet Conclave 2, which met at the Regent Street masonic hall. He was a member of that by April 1871 when he represented it at a meeting of the KHS Mount of Olives Sanctuary. He remained a member of Plantagenet Conclave 2 until the early 1880s at least and may have done his year as its Most Puissant Sovereign (MPS, its WM equivalent) though if he did do this, I couldn't find out when. I have more information, however, on Eugène Henri as a member of the RCC's Premier Conclave 1, which he joined in 1873. As their numbers suggest, both these conclaves were amongst the earliest to be founded. Premier Conclave 1 held its meetings at the Mark Masons' Hall. GD member Nelson Prower joined it in 1886 and was its Most Puissant Sovereign (MPS, its WM equivalent) in 1891.

As with some of the other freemasonry organisations he was a member of, Eugène Henri was willing to do what many other freemasons were not - spend time, effort and sometimes money climbing the ladder of national office. He put more of this kind of effort into the RCC than any other of the freemasons' orders he joined. He served a year as Grand Vice-Chamberlain in 1874. He did three separate sets of 12 months as a Grand Standard Bearer, in 1875, 1877 and 1879; most men just did one year in the post. As a senior member of the order it was probably part of Eugène Henri's duties to help organise the annual balls that the RCC held during the 1870s. He definitely attended the one that took place in April 1876 at Willis's Rooms in King Street, St James's: 180 RCC members and their guests, including their women guests, were there, and the dancing went on until 4 in the morning. The guest list published in The Freemason only included the men who were there, not the women they had brought with them. For reasons that will be made clear if you read on, I would dearly love to know whether Eugène Henri brought a woman-guest with him; though I think he probably didn't.

Eugène Henri was the RCC's Grand Inspector of Regalia in 1880 - a job to which I think he must have been particularly well-suited. And in 1883 he was elected one of the 12 members of the RCC's Grand Senate as its Grand Prefect; going on to do a year as its Grand Examiner in 1885. In 1886 he was Grand Historiographer and in 1887 he was Grand Orator; two more jobs I imagine he did well. He was the RCC's Grand High Almoner - in charge of its charitable donations - in 1888. And in 1889 he made it onto the RCC's most senior governing committee, its Grand Council, serving as its Grand Junior General for a year. This was as high up the RCC's ladder as he got, but it was pretty high for someone not a member of the English aristocracy. In March 1890, at the end of his 12 months in that post, he attended the RCC's annual meeting - its Grand Imperial Conclave - for the last time. He was still a member of the RCC's Premier Conclave 1 in March 1899 though perhaps no longer very active in it.

THE KNIGHTS TEMPLAR, more fully the United Religious, Military and Masonic Orders of the Temple and of St John of Jerusalem, Palestine, Rhodes and Malta.

This group of affiliated orders looks back to the military orders set up during the Crusades; though there is no historical evidence of any connection through the intervening centuries with those medieval organisations. The modern Grand Conclave which governs the orders was formed in 1791. Those hopeful to join the orders must be Christians; they must also be

Royal Arch masons. The Order's equivalent to a craft lodge is called a preceptory and its equivalent to a craft lodge's WM is a preceptor. GD members Thomas Walker Coffin, William George Lemon, Thomas William Lemon and Nelson Prower were also members of the Knights Templar. The two men called Lemon, and Nelson Prower, were also in the Order of St John of...Malta.

Eugène Henri had been initiated - the correct term is 'installed' - into the Orders' Holy Palestine Preceptory 129 by November 1874. He was its preceptor in 1888, the year he joined the GD. Holy Palestine 129 met at the AAR's headquarters in 33 Golden Square. Eugène Henri also joined the Shadwell Clerke Preceptory on the day of its consecration, in January 1885; William George Lemon was also a member of this preceptory. However, Eugène Henri's involvement with those two preceptories was the limit of his commitment to the Order: he was never an officer at national level; he didn't join the Order of Malta as far as I can see; he didn't go to any of the Order's annual meetings; and was no longer in the Order at all by 1898.

ROYAL AND SELECT MASTERS (RSM) also known as the Cryptic Rite, a reference to the basic layout of one of its rituals.

This form of freemasonry arrived in England from the USA in the early 1870s, just after Eugène Henri first became a freemason. It grew slowly and by its annual meeting of 1888 had only 15 councils (its equivalent of a craft lodge) five of which were dormant. It was governed by a Grand Council and had its own offices, in the masonic hall in Red Lion Square. It was very London focused, with four of the councils meeting in the city. To be considered for initiation (the correct term is 'received and acknowledged') into the RSM, candidates need to be Royal Arch masons. Two GD members other than Eugène Henri were in the RSM - Nelson Prower and Rev Thomas William Lemon. They had both joined it by the annual meeting of its Grand Council in February 1888, which I think was only the first or second the RSM had ever held. Eugène Henri joined the RSM in March 1891, also at an annual meeting. He was still a member of RSM in 1899 but had never become a member of any of its 15 councils.

ROYAL ORDER OF SCOTLAND (ROM)

There is evidence that lodges belonging to the ROM existed in London as early as the 1740s and a grand lodge was created (in Edinburgh) in 1767; so this is one of the oldest forms of organised freemasonry. It struggled during the early 19th century but has been active since the 1840s. To join the ROM you have to have been a freemason for five years. Membership is then by invitation only, and is much sought after as the ROM works some ancient degrees. I found one piece of evidence for Eugène Henri as a member of the ROM in 1885: that July, he attended the annual meeting of its London lodges, in the AAR headquarters at 33 Golden Square. The meeting was followed by a trip down river to Greenwich and a banquet at the Trafalgar Hotel. I don't think he was ever an important figure in the ROM, however: I would have found more evidence of his activities, if he had been.

Not all foreign imports were welcome to English freemasons:

ANCIENT AND PRIMITIVE RITE OF MISRAIM (or possibly Mysraim)

Just after the start of his involvement in freemasonry, Eugène Henri became involved in an attempt to import into England the Ordre Maçonique Oriental de Misraïm ou d'Égypte, thought to have been formed either in Italy or in France in the early years of the 19th century. The main mover in the attempt to establish it in England was Eugène Henri's RCC-founding acquaintance Robert Wentworth Little, who was planning to draw the new Ordre in, as a sub-order of the RCC. With authorisation from the Grand Council of Rites for France, Little organised a meeting in December 1870 at the Freemasons' Tavern to set up the Ordre in England. A hierarchy for the new Ordre was set up, with the Earl of Bective as its sovereign grand master in England, and Sir Francis Burdett as his deputy. And the Ordre's first English lodge-equivalent, the Bective Sanctuary of Levites, was inaugurated. 80 freemasons attended the meeting; including Eugène Henri.

The new Ordre soon ran into trouble, however. The official policy of the UGLE seems to have been to ignore its existence, but individual freemasons in England were upset by the Ordre's claim to work the same degrees as craft freemasonry does. They felt that Robert Wentworth Little - who was a UGLE employee - should not have involved himself with it. The Bective Sanctuary of Levites did hold a couple more meetings, but then the Ordre dropped out of the contemporary media and probably ceased to function in England; though it was still operative in France in the 1950s. During its brief English life, 37 freemasons were initiated into the Ordre; unfortunately I haven't found a list of who they were so I don't know if Eugène Henri was one of them. I think he might have been, though - especially as the Ordre was governed from Paris. He certainly attended the Ordre's second English meeting, at the Caledonian Hotel Adelphi Terrace (just round the corner from where he worked), in January 1871. He also joined a committee that was raising money to give to Robert Wentworth Little; and contributed 1 guinea (which he could probably ill spare) to its fund. It's not clear to me what the money was going to be for. As Little hadn't been sacked from the UGLE, it wasn't needed to support him through a period of unemployment. It might have been to help him bring an action for libel: the Freemason's Magazine and Masonic Mirror had been making unpleasant comments about articles in other magazines on the more unusual types of freemasonry, published anonymously but known quite widely to be by Little. If that was the reason for the fund-raising, I don't think the case got as far as going to Court. In February 1872 a dinner was held, at which the £300 raised by the committee was presented to Mr Little. Perhaps Eugène Henri and Robert Wentworth Little were friends. Even if they were not, Little's death aged only 39 must have been a shock: he died in 1878.

SOCIETAS ROSICRUCIANA IN ANGLIA (SRIA)

When William Wynn Westcott and Samuel Liddell Mathers founded the GD, it was as members of Societas Rosicruciana in Anglia; specifically, members of its group in London, the Metropolitan College. Eugène Henri joined SRIA when it was still calling itself the Rosicrucian Society, in August 1873, being one of five men who did so at the same meeting at which he was 'received' into the Knights of the Holy Sepulchre. In the early 1870s (though possibly not later) the Earl of Bective and Sir Francis Burdett were members of SRIA though unlike Eugène Henri they didn't go to its London meetings very often. William Robert Woodman, Eugène Henri's acquaintance from the AAR, was an active member of it. At that August 1873 meeting, Kenneth Mackenzie - who certainly would have been a member of the GD if he had lived that long - read a paper on Philosophical and Cabbalistic Magic. Perhaps what he heard that evening set Eugène Henri off on the path that led to his accepting an offer to become a member of the GD.

The Metropolitan College started to publish yearly Transactions in 1886, by which time

Eugène Henri had been going to its meetings regularly for several years. He did not make his way up its hierarchy to serve as its equivalent to WM, however; instead he served as its president from April 1889 to April 1890. Perhaps his 12-months' in charge had been difficult, however: he didn't go to the meeting of April 1890, the one in which he should have handed the job to his successor. Instead he sent a letter, resigning from the College and from SRIA. No one at SRIA expected this decision, and in his letter, Eugène Henri asked not to have to explain it. He was elected an honorary member of SRIA but never renewed his ties with it. When he died, SRIA wasn't told.

Evidence from the freemasonry magazines shows Eugène Henri continuing to go to the meetings of various freemasonry groups throughout the 1890s - excepting SRIA - though he didn't serve in any official capacity in any of them during those years. Possibly the last freemasons' meeting he attended was the December 1900 installation meeting of the AAR's Palestine 29 rose croix chapter. He died a couple of months later.

Not all freemasons had obituaries in the freemasonry press, but The Freemason and The Freemason and Masonic Illustrated both thought Eugène Henri was sufficiently well-known, at least around London, to be given one. Both mourned him as a keen freemason, and as a childless widower.

It casts a fascinating light on how men were chosen to be freemasons, and how socialising amongst them was kept strictly to freemasons' meetings, that Eugène Henri was able to get away with what the family history evidence suggests he got away with. Though I don't understand how the members of New Cross Lodge 1559 didn't realise - they lived in the same small district of London as him. Or did they wilfully ignore what was under their noses?

Evidence from the census, birth registrations, the probate registry and family history websites indicates that Eugène Henri had abandoned his wife several years before she died, to go and live with another woman and have four children with her. The other woman may or may not have been married already; as far as I can tell, Eugène Henri never married her. And through thirty years of involvement with freemasons, he kept that side of his life completely hidden from their view.

SOURCES ESOTERIC INTERESTS

THEOSOPHY

Theosophical Society Membership Registers 1889-1901.

FREEMASONRY

Database of the collections at the Freemasons' Library: go to

//freemasonry.london.museum

and take the option 'Explore'. You don't have to have a reader's ticket to search the catalogue; or the other online resources which include online copies, digitised as far as 1900, of the main freemasons' magazines, a very useful resource for some - but not all - freemasons' organisations.

Membership records of the United Grand Lodge of England; see them on Ancestry in the 'schools and directories' section.

LODGE OF PRUDENT BRETHERN 145

Lodge of Prudent Brethren 145 By-Laws p15 signed off by Shadwell H Clerke. 1882 printed by (active freemason) G Kenning of 16 Great Queen St: p3, p7, p11, p17.

Lodge of Prudent Brethren 145: Historic Records 1775-1932 no publication details of the original but on p4 the Introduction was written March 1908. This was the 3rd edition, published 1932. Author of the original edition: Henry Guy, a PM of the lodge and PZ of its chapter, using original sources. He used the few existing original sources. Especially pp48-53; pp59-60; p92; pp101-108 for the history of its chapter.

The Freemason Mar 1876 p1.

ERA LODGE 1423

Province of Middlesex: Era Lodge 1423: First 100 Years 1873-1973. No publication details or date; no author though booklet is signed off by F O Raynaud. History is based on lodge Minute Books. Pp1-6; p13; p15 for a history of Era Chapter; p19.

The Freemason February 1873 p12.

The Freemason June 1881 p5.

The Freemason April 1886 p5.

NEW CROSS LODGE 1559

New Cross Lodge 1559: Diamond Jubilee 1876-1936. A Short History of the Lodge by Henry Knill, the lodge's secretary, who had been a member since Eugène Henri's time. No publication details. Passim.

The New Cross Lodge 1876-1976. A very small pamphlet; no publication details or author's name though the Foreword is by Bonnie Martyn. No page numbers. On [pp3-4] which includes the list of the original petitioners, with the lodges they were already members of.

The Freemason February 1876 p7.

The Freemason August 1878 p1.

The Freemason December 1880 p4.

The Freemason May 1881 p6.

MIDDLESEX PROVINCIAL GRAND LODGE

The Freemason July 1875 p11.

The Freemason August 1876.

LODGE OF BENEVOLENCE

The Freemason August 1880 p1.

ROYAL ARCH

PRUDENT BRETHERN CHAPTER 145

Prudent Brethren and "Philanthic" Chapter 145 Centen 1869-1969: A Glimpse into the Past. Noo publication details or any indication of its author. Pp1-5.

The Freemason December 1876 p4.

The Freemason February 1878 p10.

The Freemason December 1878 p4.

LEBANON CHAPTER 1326

The Freemason August 1875 p2.

ERA CHAPTER 1423

The Freemason December 1876 p11.

The Freemason July 1879 p4.

MARK MASONRY

Masonic Calendar for 1888, its 3rd year of issue. P15; p52; p54.

Masonic Calendar for 1898 which shows how enormously Mark masonry had expanded in the intervening 10 years. Unfortunately there was no coverage at all of individual lodges in this issue.

GRAND STEWARDS' LODGE which doesn't need a number.

The Freemason December 1886 p12.

ST MARK'S LODGE 1

The Freemason November 1873 p5.

The Freemason September 1874 p6.

The Freemason December 1877 p11 as current WM of St Mark's Lodge 1, Eugène was a guest at the consecration of Hammersmith Mark Masonry Lodge 211.

NORTHUMBERLAND LODGE 118

The Freemason July 1871 p12.

ROYAL ARK MARINERS

Seen online: Statutes and Regulations for the Government of Royal Ark Masons which includes a history of the Order and lists of officials. Issued by the Grand Lodge of Royal Ark Mariners London: 1871. P7; p35; p45 and just noting here that all national officers had to pay a fee on taking up their appointment; p47; p54.

The Freemason July 1871 p3.

The Freemason April 1871 p5 on Royal Clarence Royal Ark Lodge 1; and Prince of Wales Royal Ark Lodge 2.

The Freemason July 1871 p5.

ANCIENT AND ACCEPTED RITE

Rules and Regulations for the Government of the Degrees from the 4° to 32° Inclusive under the Supreme Council 33° of the Ancient and Accepted Rite [in the British Empire etc etc]; plus a List of Members. The earliest issue of this was published in 1864. I looked at the issues for 1880 to 1900. Particular references:

Issue of 1880 pp43-46; pp66-67.

Issue of 1888. I looked at this issue first as it was the nearest in date to the founding of the GD. So my understanding of how the AAR worked and what its rules are is based on pp5-13; pp37-47; p57.

Issue of 1900 p71.

The Freemason October 1876 p7.

The Freemason December 1900 p5.

RED CROSS OF CONSTANTINE whose full title was altered in 1889 to include two extra orders: the Knights of the Holy Sepulchre and the Order of St John the Evangelist.

Statement of Accounts, Annual Report and List of Officers and Conclaves published London by George Kenning, who was a member of it. I looked at a Freemasons' Library volume of these, supposedly covering 1868 to 1899 but actually lacking the reports for 1874 to 1887, if any were published during that time. Particular references:

Issue of 1874 p7; p14.

Issue of 1887 pp3-4.

Issue of 1888 p5.

Issue of 1889 pp5-7.

Issue of 1893 had the earliest list of past grand officers, going back to 1860s: pp18-24.

Issue of 1895 had the first published list of RCC members; and the first published details of its conclaves: p45; p49

Issue of 1899 p48.

The Freemason April 1871 p5.

The Freemason May 1871 p7.

The Freemason August 1873 p4.

The Freemason April 1876 p7.

The Freemason September 1880 p4.

The Freemason December 1882 p11.

The Freemason January 1885 p10.

The Freemason's Chronicle March 1890 p10.

ORDER OF THE TEMPLE better known as the Knights Templar.

The Freemasons' Library has issues of the Calendar of the Great Priory published yearly for the Order. There was a name change, in 1896, to Liber Ordinis Templi. I looked through the issues of 1878 to 1900. Particular references:

Issue of 1888 p10.

Issue of 1898 pp252-269: list of current members.

Ordo Templi Alphabetical List of Great Officers 1846-1915.

HOLY PALESTINE PRECEPTORY 129

The Freemason November 1874 p5.

The Freemason April 1880 p6.

SHADWELL CLERKE PRECEPTORY

The Freemason January 1885 p2.

The Freemason December 1886 p10.

ROYAL AND SELECT MASTERS

Annual Report of Proceedings of the Grand Council of RSM of England and Wales etc.

Issue of 1887 pp3-4; pp8-9. Issues of 1888 to 1890 looking for names of GD members.

Issue of 1891 p3, p24.

Issue of 1899 p27.

ROYAL ORDER OF SCOTLAND

The Freemason July 1885 p5.

ANCIENT AND PRIMITIVE RITE OF MISRAIM (or Mysraim)

The Freemasons' Library has a small folder of material on the order. It includes photocopies of 2 reports published in Rosicrucian and Masonic Record

- volume XI p136 annotated in pen "Jan 1871"
- volume XII p148 annotated in pen "April 1871".

There are a few letters, some issued by the Order and some by employees of the Freemasons' Library, written between 1890 and 2015. There's also a copy of part of a typed letter dated 18 April 1980 from the GD researcher and biographer Ellic Howe to an unnamed correspondent, in which he mentions the failed attempt to found the Ordre in London.

The Freemason January 1871 p3; p8.

The Freemason February 1871 p9.

The Freemason March 1871 p12.

The Freemason May 1871 p10.

The Freemason February 1872 p2.

ROSICRUCIANS/SOCIETAS ROSICRUCIANA IN ANGLIA

The Freemason August 1873 p4.

At www.iapsop.com, an edition of The Rosicrucian and Red Cross: A Quarterly Record of the Societies' Transactions. No date on the cover but the volume covers meetings held during 1873. Printed London by Thomas Hearn: p25.

The Freemason August 1873 p4.

Transactions of Societas Rosicruciana Metropolitan College

Issue of 1889-90 pp1-3.

Issue of 1890-91 pp1-2.

And subsequent issues, which list Eugène as an honorary member long after his death.

History of the Societas Rosicruciana in Anglia by the MW Supreme Magus Dr William Wynn Westcott. Privately printed London 1900: p15.

The obituaries:

The Freemason March 1901 p5

The Freemason and Masonic Illustrated volume 40 1902 p117.

BIRTH/YOUTH/FAMILY BACKGROUND

Virtually unknown I'm afraid: Eugène Henri Thiellay was born in France; I wasn't able to find out exactly where. His age as given to various census officials varies a little, but he was probably born between 1834 and 1836.

The earliest record I could find which showed Eugène Henri living in England was the census of 1861. He was one of the two lodgers in the household of printer Charles Cole and his wife; in a house where there were at least six separate households. I couldn't read the name of the street the house was in, but it was somewhere in the Tottenham Court Road area of central London.

Sources: census 1851 - he's not on it; census 1861

For him possibly being known as Henry/Henri: seen online at Ancestry: list of pupils at Stanley Street school 1881; from records held at the London Metropolitan Archive.

WORK/PROFESSION

In 1861 Eugène Henri was working as a perfumer. The 1861 census wasn't one of those which asked whether people were self-employed or working for someone else; but at this stage I think he was an employee rather than a self-employed businessman. However, though he was living in England, he was also working with a colleague in France, a chemist called Léon Hugot. Jean Harlow, Marilyn Monroe, even Neymar (briefly during the autumn of 2016) have cause to be grateful to Eugène Henri Thiellay and his chemist partner! At the 1867 International Exhibition in Paris, the partners displayed their Eau de Fontaine de Jouvence Dorée - a 3% solution of hydrogen peroxide which dyed hair blonde. The product won a gold medal which well and truly launched it on the fashion scene. It was for use at home, though it needed four applications to work noticeably and cost (in France in the 1870s) as much as 20 francs a bottle. It was probably on the basis of its success that Eugène Henri set up his own business in the years soon after the Exhibition. He was one of the first professional hairdressers to hire a private room within a railway station. Eugène Henri's business was in the Charing Cross Hotel - very convenient for commuters, day-visitors to London; and for going to meetings of freemasons, so many of which were held only short walks away, in Covent Garden and Soho. As well as doing people's hair, Eugène Henri's business also sold the hair dye, perfumes and other toiletries, which were kept in a warehouse in New Cross. The business dealt in wholesale as well as retail and was still going at Eugène

Henri's death in 1901; though it was wound up by his executors.

My experience of hairdressers is limited but surely if you want to be a successful one you must please a wide range of different customers. Around 1890, GD founder William Wynn Westcott described Eugène as having "genial manners", and also as a "universal favourite"; proving that the same qualities are liked in freemasonry. You must also be able to keep a secret.

Sources:

Chemical News and Journal of Industrial Society volume 32 1875 p286 issue of 7 January 1876. The continuation of a longer article by a Dr A W Hofmann: Development of the Chemical Arts During the Last 10 Years. Hoffmann says that the Eau de Fontaine de Jouvence was manufactured in England at least by Hopkin and Williams of London.

Hofmann's article is the basis for a reference to Eugène in Hydrogen Peroxide by Walter C Schumb, Charles N Satterfield and Ralph L Wentworth of MIT. American Chemistry Society Monograph Series. Reinhold Publishing Corporation 1955: p18 in a section on the Technical Development of hair dye based on hydrogen peroxide. The authors give 1867-69 for the earliest dates at which the Eau de Fontaine de Jouvence might have been available.

Just noting here that Chemical News was founded in 1859, and edited for several decades after that, by William Crookes, who subsequently joined the GD.

Gender and Material Culture in Britain since 1600 editors Hannah Greig and Jane Hamlett. Published 2015. Seen online via google: p144 in an article Grooming Men: the Material World of the 19th Century Barbershop.

The Science of Hair Care editors Claude Bouillon and John Wilkinson. 2nd edition Taylor and Francis 2005: pp229-230 where they describe Hugot as the hairdresser and Eugène as the chemist though of course they may have both done both things; and pp232-237 on how hydrogen peroxide works.

Introduction to Cosmetic Formulation and Technology by Gabriella Baki and Kenneth S Alexander. Wiley 2015. In Chapter 5: Hair Care pp525-26 they give a quick resume of the extremely long history of dying your hair! Going right back to Mesopotamia.

Occupational Exposures of Hairdressers... International Agency for Research on Cancer WHO 1993 p43.

I couldn't tie down the date that Eugène Henri started his business but I did find it advertising in several professional magazines over a long period. For example:

The Year Book of Pharmacy issued by the British Pharmaceutical Conference: issues of 1874, 1876, 1877, 1883; ie issue of 1875 p705 an advert for E H Thiellay's Golden Hair Wash and his Eau Fontaine de Jouvence. He's described as "Parfumeur, chimiste" from premises in the Charing Cross Hotel and an export facility at New Cross.

Pharmaceutical Journal volume 36 1877 p968.

Year-Book of Pharmacy 1881-82 p593.

Kelly's Directory of Chemists and Druggists 1885.

I couldn't get this to download properly but at www.forgottenbooks.com there was a later edition of the Year-book of Pharmacy; perhaps from 1894-ish, with an advert for the Eau Fontaine de Jouvence in it.

London Gazette 8 October 1901 p6598 creditors' notice, part of the winding-up of Eugène Henri's estate including his business.

FAMILIES

In 1864 Eugène Henri married an Englishwoman of Scottish descent, Louisa McLacklan. They set up home at 103 Hemingford Road Barnsbury. There's no evidence they had any children. Louisa was still living at the Hemingford Road house when she died, in December 1872. Eugène Henri, as her husband, was her executor. However, by 1869 at the latest, he and Louisa had separated and he had moved south of the Thames to set up another household with someone else. He and the other woman appear in the same household on three censuses, 1871, 1881 and 1891 - they were together a long time. They set up home near Eugène Henri's warehouse, at 5 Amersham Road New Cross, and were still living there on the day of the 1881 census; by 1891 they had moved house, but only within the New Cross district.

Between 1869 and 1874, four children were registered in the Greenwich registration district (which includes parts of New Cross) with the two surnames 'Thiellay Byngham'. They were all boys: Edward Henry, born autumn 1869; Euclide Horatio born early 1871; Archambaud Vivian born 1872; and Godfrey Rodolphus born 1874. It's just possible that Edward Henry Thiellay Byngham was the son of Harriet and a man called Edward Byngham who died in the Greenwich registration district early in 1870, aged 45. However, all Harriet's other children were born after he was dead. It seems pretty clear that all four boys were the sons of Eugène Henri Thiellay and the woman who called herself Harriet Byngham.

Two of the sons died, never having appeared on a census: Edward Henry died in 1870; and Archambaud Vivian in 1877. However, Euclide (usually written without the last 'e') and Godfrey survived and were living with their parents in 1881.

THE MYSTERIOUS HARRIET BYNGHAM

She's very elusive! Despite being - with her two surviving sons - the only three people called Byngham with a 'y' in late 19th-century England. She's obviously the same person on each of the censuses but each one spells her forename differently: in 1871 she's Harriett; in 1881 she's Harietta; and in 1891 she's Harriet. Her surname is the same each time: Byngham, with a 'y'. Eugène Henri and Harriet (I'm going to stick with the most common spelling). However, I'm pretty sure that 'Byngham' was a surname she had given herself.

Harriet's surname was spelled with a 'y' by all three census officials, so she must have told them about its odd spelling. She also gave the three of them the same information on her age and place of birth: born in 1847/48 in Charlwood in Surrey. Charlwood is a village on the border with Sussex, near to what's now Gatwick Airport. Her marital status, however, was not so clear: in 1871 and 1891 she said she was married, but in 1881 - despite admitting that the two children in the household were hers - she said she was not.

I went looking on freebmd for a female, surname Byngham with a 'y', born circa 1847. I didn't find one so I looked for any likely candidates called Bingham with an 'I'. I did find a Harriet Bingham whose birth was registered in 1846; she might have been the right person, but the birth was registered in Holborn not Surrey, and there's the different spelling to overcome as well. Trying the census, I found on 1861 a Harriete Bingham (with an 'i') born Surrey circa 1848, in the household of Lydia Chapman at 168 Euston Road; working as a domestic servant. She might also have been the woman I was looking for and at least she was in the right place in 1861 - central London.

Just in case Harriet was married, to a man called Byngham - Edward Byngham who died in 1870, for example - I searched freebmd and Familysearch for any marriage of a man called Byngham between 1860 and 1869. There weren't any in England and Wales, so if Harriet was legally married, it was not to someone called Byngham. She could have lived with this Edward Byngham without being married, of course; taking his surname - but when she lived with Eugène Henri she didn't take his surname.

Too many ifs and buts.

The only other thing that I've been able to discover about Harriet Byngham comes from the 1881 census. She told that year's census official that she was working, as a perfume maker (in 1871 and 1891, she said she was the housekeeper). In 1881 she must have been working for Eugène Henri. Perhaps she had even done so before her first child had been born; and they had met when she applied for the job. It seems that in 1881 the money she was earning was making a difference to the household finances. In 1881 there was a live-in, general servant; in 1871 and 1891 Harriet was keeping house with no live-in help.

What about the children? In 1871 there was a new-born infant in Eugène Henri's household; and in 1881 there were two boys of school age, Euclid and Godfrey. Eugène Henri told the census officials of 1871 and 1881 that he was a widower. He could have explained that the children were his sons by his dead wife. But he didn't, and he also told the officials that the boys' surnames were Byngham. So the census officials of 1871 and 1881 filled in their forms as if the boys were Harriet's children but not Eugène Henri's. In 1881, with Harriet having said she was not married, the column where Harriet's 'relationship to head of household' should have been indicated was left blank. I think that year's census official had a very good idea what was going on.

A list of pupils at Stanley Street school in 1881 also muddies the waters: Godfrey Byngham of 5 Amersham Road was listed. His next-of-kin was called Henry. But the list doesn't give the fathers' surnames - thinking them to be obvious, of course.

On the day of the 1891 census there were no children in Eugène Henri and Harriet's household to be explained away: both Euclid and Godfrey were both living elsewhere. Harriet told the official that she was married; and what she said about her source of income caused him to write "housekeeper" as both her occupation and her relationship to the head of the household. Eugène Henri said yet again that he was a widower. The 1891 official probably understood the relationship between the two members of the household to be one of employer/employee.

In December 1872, Eugène Henri was freed by his legal wife's death to marry someone else, if he chose. However, I couldn't find a record of his marrying anyone at any time between then and his death; at least, not in England. Perhaps Harriet was legally married all that time; though not to somebody called Byngham. Or Eugène Henri and Harriet could have married some time after 1872, in France. Somehow I don't think they did. They probably looked and acted married in the eyes of their neighbours, and that seems to have been enough for them; though it might have been very awkward for their children.

It's not so much the breakdown of Eugène Henri's legal marriage that makes me seeth. These things happened then as they happen now, and several GD members were divorced or lived apart from their legal spouse. It's not even that he didn't marry his Harriet when he was free to do so - as I've said above, perhaps she wasn't free. It's his secrecy about this second relationship: he conned his freemasonry acquaintances and allowed census officials to assume that Harriet - who stayed with him for over 20 years - was sexually licentious.

THE 1890s

Neither of his sons went to work for Eugène Henri in the hairdressing and perfume business. By 1891 they had both left home. Godfrey Byngham was a grocer's assistant and was living in Leyton with his employer, Henry Pegg Hurd, and his family. Euclid Thiellay Byngham was sharing a room in Lamb's Conduit Passage while working as a cashier in a butcher's shop. Eugène Henri and Harriet had also moved, to 3 Park Road New Cross.

The 1901 census came a few weeks after Eugène Henri's death. Harriet Byngham's appearance on the 1891 census is the last information I have on her. I couldn't find a Harriet/Harietta/ Harriete Byngham or Thiellay in the UK in 1901 or in 1911. I checked to see if she had died in the 1890s or 1900s but I couldn't find a likely death registration as Byngham or as Thiellay. I have no idea what happened to her.

Sources: censuses 1851-1911; freebmd; much detective work and sideways thinking!

A Directory of Kent issued in 1874 has Eugène Henri Thiellay at 5 Amersham Road.

Seen at Ancestry: list of pupils at Stanley Street school 1881; from records held at the London Metropolitan Archive.

DEATH and WHAT HAPPENED TO HIS CHILDREN

Eugène Henri Thiellay died on 21 February 1901. As I haven't seen the Will I don't know who his beneficiaries were but it would be nice to think they were his common-law wife and children. His executor was a solicitor, Robert George Hovenden of Gardner and Hovenden, 16 Finsbury Circus, whose main task was to wind-up the hairdressing and toiletries business. Eugène Henri was buried at Brockley Cemetery. A lot of his freemason acquaintances went to the funeral and there were wreaths from Era Chapter 1423 and Red Cross of Constantine Premier Conclave 1. The chief mourner was a niece of Eugène Henri, come over from France: a Madame A Dilpick (sic). If Harriet and her sons were at the funeral, no one realised who they were; or did they realise and decide to keep it quiet? - "Deceased being a widower without issue" said The Freemason.

By 1911 Euclid Byngham was working as a commercial traveller for a drysalting company. He had married Esther Frost in 1894 and they had one child, Henry John Byngham, born 1896. They were all living at 33 Harcourt Road Brockley on census day 1911, with Esther's mother, another Harriet. Euclid died in 1925.

Godfrey Byngham joined the 4th Hussars in 1892 and was always known by them as Bingham with an 'I'. He was later a Chelsea Pensioner, and died in Montreal in 1920. Information at myheritage.com says that he married Hilda Moulton in 1901. There's no record of such a marriage in England and Wales so perhaps it took place in Canada. Perhaps the elusive Harriet Byngham went with Godfrey to Canada or joined him there after Eugène Henri had died. Godfrey and Hilda had three children. Their descendants are quite sure they are descended from Eugène Henri Thiellay.

Sources: probate registry 1901, 1925, 1950s. I couldn't find Mme Dilpick on the 1901 census, nor anyone with a surname which might be written down wrongly as 'dilpick'. I suppose she had returned to France.

London Gazette 8 October 1901 p6598.

The Freemason March 1901 p5.

Seen at www.myheritage.com, entries for Godfrey R Thiellay (sic) Byngham, born 1874 to Eugène Henri Thiellay and Harriet Thiellay née Byngham; brother of Euclid Horatio Thiellay Byngham.

Seen at Ancestry: a Chelsea Pensioner Soldier Service Record 1760-1920 for Godfrey Rodolphus Thiellay Bingham, regimental number 3292.

Via Familysearch to www.findagrave.com - Godfrey Bingham died 24 July 1920, buried in the Mount Royal Cemetery, Montreal.

BASIC SOURCES I USED for all Golden Dawn members.

Membership of the Golden Dawn: The Golden Dawn Companion by R A Gilbert. Northampton: The Aquarian Press 1986. Between pages 125 and 175, Gilbert lists the names, initiation dates and addresses of all those people who became members of the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn or its many daughter Orders between 1888 and 1914. The list is based on the Golden Dawn's administrative records and its Members' Roll - the large piece of parchment on which all new members signed their name at their initiation. All this information had been inherited by Gilbert but it's now in the Freemasons' Library at the United Grand Lodge of England building on Great Queen Street Covent Garden. Please note, though, that the records of the Amen-Ra Temple in Edinburgh were destroyed in 1900/01. I have recently (July 2014) discovered that some records of the Horus Temple at Bradford have survived, though most have not; however those that have survived are not yet accessible to the public.

For the history of the GD during the 1890s I usually use Ellic Howe's The Magicians of the Golden Dawn: A Documentary History of a Magical Order 1887-1923. Published Routledge and Kegan Paul 1972. Foreword by Gerald Yorke. Howe is a historian of printing rather than of magic; he also makes no claims to be a magician himself, or even an occultist. He has no axe to grind.

Family history: freebmd; ancestry.co.uk (census and probate); findmypast.co.uk; familysearch; Burke's Peerage and Baronetage; Burke's Landed Gentry; Armorial Families; thepeerage.com; and a wide variety of family trees on the web.

Famous-people sources: mostly about men, of course, but very useful even for the female members of GD. Oxford Dictionary of National Biography. Who Was Who. Times Digital Archive.

Useful source for business and legal information: London Gazette and its Scottish counterpart Edinburgh Gazette. Now easy to find (with the right search information) on the web.

For the GD and also for the freemasons in it, the various resources at the Freemasons' Library: see the website at //freemasonry.london.museum. Its catalogue has very detailed entries and the website has all sorts of other resources. You can get from it to a database of freemasons' newspapers and magazines, digitised to 1900. You can also reach that directly at www.masonicperiodicals.org.

Wikipedia; Google; Google Books - my three best resources. I also used other web pages, but with some caution, as - from the historian's point of view - they vary in quality a great deal.

28 November 2016 <mailto:Amandragora@attglobal.net>

Email me at:

Find the web pages of Roger Wright and Sally Davis, including my list of people initiated into the Order of the Golden Dawn between 1888 and 1901, at:

www.wrightanddavis.co.uk

***

Ethel THOMPSON who was initiated into the Golden Dawn in September 1900, taking the Latin motto 'Omnia expertum facto'. By this stage, GD record-keepers were not noting down the addresses of the members.

The census nearest to the date of the initiation was a favourite starting point for me, when attempting to identify the GD members. There were 846 women called Ethel Thompson on the 1901 census in England alone. And of course, the particular Ethel Thompson I was after might not have been any of those; quite likely not, in fact - the day of the 1901 census fell during the Easter school and college vacation, so even GD members who lived in England and whom I'd identified very easily on other censuses were not on the 1901 one, because they were away from home.

BASIC SOURCES I USED for all Golden Dawn members.

Membership of the Golden Dawn: The Golden Dawn Companion by R A Gilbert. Northampton: The Aquarian Press 1986. Between pages 125 and 175, Gilbert lists the names, initiation dates and addresses of all those people who became members of the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn or its many daughter Orders between 1888 and 1914. The list is based on the Golden Dawn's administrative records and its Members' Roll - the large piece of parchment on which all new members signed their name at their initiation. All this information had been inherited by Gilbert but it's now in the Freemasons' Library at the United Grand Lodge of England building on Great Queen Street Covent Garden.

Family history: freebmd; ancestry.co.uk (census and probate); findmypast.co.uk; familysearch; Burke's Peerage and Baronetage; Burke's Landed Gentry; Armorial Families; thepeerage.com; and a variety of one-family genealogy websites.

Famous-people sources: mostly about men, of course, but very useful even for the female members of GD. Oxford Dictionary of National Biography. Who Was Who. Times Digital Archive.

Catalogues: British Library; Freemasons' Library.

Wikipedia; Google; Google Books - my three best resources. I also used other web pages, but with some caution, as - from the historian's point of view - they vary in quality a great deal.

24 April 2012

AMandragora@attglobal.net

William Rowland Thurnam (who was always called Rowland) was initiated into the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn at its Isis-Urania temple in London on 20 March 1895. Louisa Florence Wynne ffoulkes was initiated in the same ritual but I don't think the two new recruits had met before that evening. Rowland Thurnam did go as far as selecting the Latin motto 'Chairmerinos oneiros' but never followed up his initiation in any other way. He was later described in the GD's administrative papers as 'demitted' - meaning that he had not paid his subscription for three successive years.

Though it's quite long, this is still one of my short biographies: more a list than an assessment of Rowland Thurnam's life. I found a lot of information, not on Rowland himself so much as on his work, some of his leisure pursuits, and two famous people he was acquainted with. However, he was one of the GD's doctors. I'm not qualified to do justice to their working lives.

Sally Davis

May 2016

My basic sources for any GD member are in a section at the end of the file. Supplementary sources for this particular member are listed at the end of each section.

This is what I have found on ROWLAND THURNAM.

IN THE GD

Not much to report.

Rowland did know GD member Pamela Colman-Smith. However, she was not initiated until November 1901, so I think they must have met some other way. The evidence that exists about their friendship suggests that they may only have met just before the first World War.

ANY OTHER ESOTERIC INTERESTS?

I haven't found any. Rowland was never in the Theosophical Society and I haven't found any evidence that he was a freemason. The TS, and freemasonry, were good recruiting grounds for the GD. Although he doesn't actually strike me as that sort of person, it's possible that Rowland was interested in spiritualism. Spiritualism is harder to research than theosophy and freemasonry. Unlike them, it did not have one over-arching, bureaucratic central organisation to which all those interested belonged. It was a very locally-, even family-, based pursuit.

Sources:

Theosophical Society Membership Registers 1889-1901.

Database of the collections at the Freemasons' Library, accessible online at www.freemasonry.london.museum/catalogue.php

ANY OBITUARIES/BIOGRAPHIES?

There's one in the Lancet. It's rather short, though.

Source:

Lancet 1941 volume 2 p460 issue of 18 October 1941.

BIRTH/YOUTH/FAMILY BACKGROUND

The surname 'Thurnam' is a rare one and I suppose that all the people I saw on the 19th-century censuses were related to each other, however remotely. However, proving exactly how they were related is a different matter. It would have been good to find that Rowland

Thurnam was a close relation of the mental health pioneer, antiquarian and phrenologist Dr John Thurnam (1810-73), as they were both physicians, but I didn't find any information to prove it.

Rowland Thurnam was a grandson of Charles Thurnam, bookseller and publisher. In 1816 he founded the firm of Charles Thurnam and Sons of Carlisle. Its publications focused on the local and natural history of Cumbria. It was still in business a hundred years after its birth, but with no member of the family involved with it any longer.

Sources:

John Thurnam: see ODNB volume 54 p722.

Charles Thurnam and Sons:

The British Library catalogue has plenty of books published by them.

The Publishers' Circular and Booksellers' Record volume 105 1916 p653 celebrated the 100th anniversary of the firm's foundation; with information originally published in the Carlisle Patriot of 15 January 1916.

The Bookseller volume 65 1917 p604 issue of November 1917 also celebrated the firm's 100th birthday. It mentioned the library built up by the Thurnam family, describing it as "one of the most extensive and valuable [outside] London and Edinburgh".

ROWLAND THURNAM'S CHILDHOOD

Rowland Thurnam's father, James Graham Thurnam, was a son of Charles Thurnam the publisher, and worked in the family business. In July 1866 he married Elizabeth Irving, at Croglin in Cumberland. Rowland was their only child, born in May 1868. On the day of the 1871 census, Rowland and his parents were living at 41 Lowther Street Carlisle, with three servants. James Thurnam died in April 1872, in his early thirties.

Elizabeth Thurnam, and James' sister Margaret Dorothy Thurnam, were named executors of James Graham Thurnam's Will, so Elizabeth was probably still alive then; but she disappears from the usual records after that date. I couldn't find her on any census after 1871. Censuses are just a snapshot of course: if you always chose to take your holiday outside the UK around Easter, you would not appear on the census even though you normally lived in the UK. However, I couldn't find a death registration or a probate registry record for Elizabeth Thurnam; and she doesn't seem to have remarried, at least not between 1872 and 1885. Records local to Carlisle and Cumbria might find her and Rowland continuing to live in the town in which they had both been born; but without searching them, the whereabouts of mother and son are a mystery to me.

Sources: freebmd; census 1871-1911.

Familysearch England-ODM GS film number 252834: marriage of Rowland's parents; with confirmation that his father's father was Charles Thurnam of Carlisle.

Familysearch England-ODM GS film number unknown: baptism of William Rowland Thurnam 25 June 1868 at St Mary Carlisle; date of birth 27 May 1868.

Probate Registry: 1872; 1879 for the death of Rowland's aunt Margaret Dorothy Thurnam.

EDUCATION

Like his mother, Rowland Thurnam was not in the UK on the census days of 1881, 1891 and 1901. Some of the pupils' lists of the larger 19th century boys' boarding schools are on the web now; but Rowland's name was not in any of them. He may, of course, have been attending a good school in Carlisle; or his mother may have employed a tutor for him so that he didn't go to school at all. There are indications from later in his life that he had some education in the classics. He also spoke French, well enough not to be daunted by a congress in Italy where the sessions were in French, German and Italian but not English. He may even have read a paper at that congress, in French. Later he translated plays and poetry from the French. Where he acquired this knowledge I can't say; but one possibility is that he and his mother lived in France while he was growing up.

Evidence of a classical education:

Notes and Queries New Series volume 7 January-June 1907. On p88 in the issue of 16 February 1907 there was a query from a Mr Le Wett of Teddington about some paintings at the local library, all labelled with the name 'Silvia' plus a place in the ancient world. On p136 in the following issue, there was a paragraph from Rowland Thurnam as one of two readers who had written in to say that the word 'Silvia' must be a mistake. The correct description of each painting was 'Sibylla' plus the place-name, making the subject of the set of pictures some well-known ancient prophetesses.

For Rowland's proficiency in French and probably Italian: see the 'Nordrach' and 'publications' sections below.

TRAINING

In 1886 Rowland went to St Thomas's Hospital medical school to train as a doctor. At the end of his first year, he was awarded one of the school's lesser prizes for first-year students. The winner of the top prize was Seymour Graves Toller, younger brother of Victor Toller who joined the GD in 1894. Victor's next brother, Neville, also started at St Thomas's, a year or two after Rowland, and it's likely that Rowland knew both brothers at least as student-acquaintances. Both the Toller brothers completed their medical training at St Thomas's but Rowland finished his at Durham University, graduating MB and BS in 1891. He returned to Durham to take another set of exams in 1898.

There's a gap in the records covering Rowland's work as a doctor: I haven't found out what he was doing between 1892 to 1895.

Sources:

Lancet 1887 volume 2 July-December p690 issue of 1 October 1887

Times Tuesday 20 September 1887 p10c Medical Colleges and Schools.

Lancet 1891 volume 2 July-December p793 issue of 3 October 1891.

St Thomas's Reports New Series volume 26. This was a Google snippet and I couldn't see the year of publication; but the Report states that Rowland was now on the staff at Bristol Asylum, so it must have been issued around 1898: p115 in a list of old students

The Durham University Journal volume 12 numbers 7-15 1896 p251-52 issue of 30 January 1897 The Medical Directory 1892. There's no entry for Rowland in this year's issue; so he did not go straight from his exams into work.

The Medical Directory 1900 p1164: Rowland graduated MD at Durham University in 1898.

WORK/PROFESSION

Not having found any information on the years 1892-94, I'm going to begin this section with evidence of where Rowland was working from the mid- to late-1890s. However, it's clear from other sources that he was not in England from late 1895 to early 1896; and also from late 1896 for over a year.

In 1894 Rowland was appointed Assistant Medical Officer at Bethnal House Asylum, on Cambridge Road at Bethnal Green in east London. It was a big hospital - it had 410 beds in 1892 - and although it had started out as a private business, by the 1890s it was taking patients who were paid for by their local Poor Law Union. The mid-1890s were a time of great change at Bethnal House: its original house was pulled down and a large new block was built. Rowland worked at the asylum throughout the building work, and had been promoted to Senior Medical Officer by 1895.

Rowland was no longer employed by Bethnal House in 1896; he doesn't appear in the Medical Directory at all in 1896 and 1897. He is listed in the 1898 issue, as 2nd Medical Officer at the Bristol City and County Lunatic Asylum at Fishponds, next door to the workhouse. By this time, however, he was working towards a complete change in medical direction.

Sources:

Bethnal House.

See the wikipedia entry on Bethnal Green.

At www.british-history.ac.uk some history, using A History of the County of Middlesex volume 11: Stepney and Bethnal Green. Published London: Victoria County History 1998.

At www.historytoday.com/sarah-wise/profits-madness volume 62 number 12 issue of December 2012: a picture of Bethnal House.

At booth.lse.ac.uk the Charles Booth online archive: Notebook B154 records a visit he made to Bethnal House.

The Medical Directory 1894 p1053.

The Medical Directory 1895 p351.

The Medical Directory 1896.

Bristol County Lunatic Asylum.

Wikipedia on what was Bristol Lunatic Asylum, now the Glenside campus of the University of the West of England.

At www.workhouses.org.uk/Bristol there's a map and plan of the site dated 1901; and a photo from c 1916 when it had been co-opted as a hospital for war wounded.

At www.bristolpost.co.uk article posted 21 September 2010: the Asylum finally closed as a mental hospital in 1994.

The Medical Directory 1898 p375

The Medical Directory 1899 Rowland is listed as per 1898.

1895 to 1897

In 1895 Rowland began to show symptoms (the notorious coughing-up of blood) of what was known at the time as ‘phthisis’. We know it now as pulmonary tuberculosis; as much feared in the 19th century and early 20th as Alzheimer’s Disease is now, and for similar reasons. Rowland was soon so ill his doctors thought he would die very soon. Professor Koch of Berlin had identified the bacterium that causes TB as early as 1882; but the steps from that discovery to treatment by antibiotics were not made until well into the 20th century; so in the mid-1890s to contract TB was usually to receive a death sentence.

Presumably thinking he had nothing to lose, Rowland decided to try a new cure: in September 1895 he went to Dr Walther’s sanatorium at Nordrach in the Black Forest, founded in 1888. Dr Walther’s way of treating TB sufferers used no drugs at all; instead his patients were fed large amounts of food, which they had to eat; they had carefully regulated periods of rest and exercise; and lived and slept in unheated rooms where the windows were open to the fresh air even at night in the winter. After spending six months following this regime, Rowland was pronounced cured in March 1896; he may even have been well enough to return to England and go back to work. However, he caught typhoid in the autumn of 1896, and the cough it left him with caused him to return to Dr Walther for a second period of treatment. Again, he made a recovery; he lived for another 40 years. This time, however, he didn’t return to England at once; and he resigned from his job at Bethnal House. The traumatic time he had been through, of having to look an early death in the face, had resulted in completely altered career priorities. He and Neville Gwynn, a fellow medical student at Durham University and then a fellow-patient at Nordrach in Germany, decided to open a TB sanatorium in England which would use Dr Walther’s methods. Rowland stayed on at Nordrach in Germany for a year, first as Dr Walther’s assistant and then as his locum while Dr Walther was on holiday. Then he returned to England and took the job at Bristol County Asylum. But he also returned to Durham University to get some more qualifications; and he and Gwynn looked for a suitable site for the Nordrach-style sanatorium; and the financial backing to set it up.

Sources:

A modern history of TB and introduction to the situation in the 1890s and 1900s:

Linda Bryder’s Below the Magic Mountain: A Social History of Tuberculosis in 20th Century Britain. Oxford Clarendon Press 1988 p297

Wikipedia on Phthisis pulmonalis and on Professor Koch and his contribution to the understanding of it.

Rowland’s history as a TB patient; and his training as a TB-specialist doctor:

Consumption and Chronic Diseases, subtitled A Popular Exposition of the Open-Air Treatment. Emmet Densmore MD. London: Swan Sonnenschein and Co. No publication date but the copyright is dated 1899. Chapter IV is based on a visit Dr Densmore made to Nordrach-upon-Mendip. He interviewed Rowland as part of that visit, and later corresponded with him.

NORDRACH-UPON-MENDIP

In 1898 Rowland, his medical partner Dr Neville Gwynn and their financial partner Henry John Trenchard, found a suitable site on the Mendips near Blagdon in Somerset. They bought Willoughby's Farm in the ex-lead mining village of Charterhouse; using the farmhouse as offices and rooms for resident workers; and having wooden buildings constructed in the grounds for a maximum of 100 paying patients. The first patients took up residence at the Nordrach-upon-Mendip sanatorium in January 1899 and though medical partners came and went, Rowland worked there until he retired in 1931 or 1932; and he continued to be in partnership with Henry Trenchard as the sanatorium's joint owners at least until Trenchard died in 1938.

Sources:

A history of Charterhouse village, mentioning Nordrach-upon-Mendip and using the reminiscences of people who worked there: seen at mikek.org.uk/friendsrlm/03\_charterhouse.pdf an article on the history of Charterhouse, by Jean Birks; also using books on local history; and articles in Mendip Times and Mendip Society Newsletter. There are photographs of the chalet-like wooden patients' wards, none of which exist now.

At www.ncbi.nlm.nih.gov British Medical Journal issue of 4 February 1899: a letter from doctors Rowland Thurnam and Neville Gwynn, essentially announcing that Nordrach-upon-Mendip was open for business.

The Medical Directory 1900 p1164.

Nordrach-upon-Mendip continued in operation during World War 1:

Medical Directory issues of 1915 and 1917: Rowland is still listed as only working at Nordrach-upon-Mendip; he has no army rank.

Via genesreunited to Gloucestershire Chronicle 22 August 1914: Rowland was in a list of donors to the Red Cross Society; but there was no suggestion that he had become a member - that he was willing and able to do war work.

The Medical Directory 1930 volume 1 p1144 Rowland still has the job title of Medical Director at Nordrach-upon-Mendip.

The Medical Directory 1931.

NORDRACH-UPON-MENDIP AS A BUSINESS

By 1906, Neville Gwynn had left Nordrach-upon-Mendip. From this point on, Rowland was always the senior doctor at the sanatorium, with the job title of 'director' or 'superintendent'. A series of less experienced doctors spent time at Nordrach-upon-Mendip as Rowland's assistants, though I've found the names of only two: Charles Edwin Wheeler, who worked there from about 1904 to about 1907; and Daniel Leo Kennedy who was there in the early 1920s. During Kennedy's time at Nordrach-upon-Mendip, the sanatorium was included in a list of pharmacies. I couldn't find any evidence for it dispensing medicines except when Kennedy worked there. A listing for the sanatorium from 1922 suggests that by that time, Kennedy was the only medical officer who was resident on-site.

I haven't been able to discover how many nurses were employed at Nordrach-upon-Mendip at any time; and I've only found the name of one nurse who worked there - Elizabeth Victoria Wheeler, who worked at the sanatorium from 1901 to 1903.

Rowland's financial partner, Henry John Trenchard, was a west countryman, born in Taunton in 1866. In 1891 he was working in Bath, as a bank clerk, but by 1901 he had given up his job in the bank to live on the income from Nordrach-upon-Mendip. By the day of the 1911 census he had moved to Bristol and was living with his brother, with their niece to keep house for them in up-market Clifton.

Sources:

Like any private sanatorium, Nordrach-upon-Mendip was subject to Government scrutiny and inspection. It's mentioned in House of Common Debates volume 51 as part of a list covering pp541-44 which seems to be a full set of all TB hospitals currently operating in England and Scotland. The list was compiled as part of a written answer to an MP's enquiry. Dean Head Sanatorium, Horsforth, Yorks, whose proprietor was GD member Oliver Firth, was also in the list. I saw this information via a google snippet and couldn't see a date. Attempts to date volume 51 using the British Library catalogue proved baffling!

The Therapeutics of Mineral Springs and Climates. Isaac Burney Yeo 1904 p743: entry for Nordrach-upon-Mendip, at 862' above sea level, with 37 beds. Medical directors Dr Thurnam and Dr Gwynne (sic; I think Gwynn without the 'e' is the correct spelling). Nordrach-upon-Mendip also appears in subsequent editions of this reference manual.

Rowland's partners at Nordrach-upon-Mendip:

NEVILLE CLAUDE GWYNN

General Medical Council Registers: although Neville Claude Gwynn was working as a doctor from the mid-1890s, he's not listed in the Registers until 1915; he's last listed in 1943 and seems to have been in private practice throughout that time.

Medical Directory 1905: he wasn't listed at all in this issue. However, other sources show that he was still a partner in Nordrach-upon-Mendip at this time and was presumably taking an income from it:

London Gazette 23 April 1907 p2762: list of partnerships dissolved includes that of Neville Claude Gwynn, W Roland (sic) Thurnam and Henry John Trenchard, trading at Nordrach-upon-Mendip, Ubley Somerset as a "Sanatorium for the permanent reception of Consumptive patients". Dissolved by mutual consent with effect from 17 April 1907. Thurnam and Trenchard would continue the business.

Medical Directory 1910 issue volume 1 p677 Neville Claude Gwynn is listed at Tawcroft, Belstone, Okehampton in Devon. There's no indication of any official appointment; he's not listed as retired either; so he's a GP at that address.

Medical Directory 1920: p717 Neville Claude Gwynn has moved to Kingscote, 6 Berkeley Road Bournemouth. MB BS Durham 1895. MRCS LRCP 1893.

Probate Registry: Neville Claude Gwynn died in Eastbourne 2 March 1945.

CHARLES EDWIN WHEELER who had been born in Australia

A good resource website on homoeopathic practitioners has an entry for Charles Edwin Wheeler: sueyounghistories.com. Sue Young says that Wheeler started out practicing orthodox medicine before moving to homoeopathy later in his career.

General Medical Council Registers. Charles Edwin Wheeler is first listed in 1903; first registered to practice in July 1894.

Medical Directory 1904 Provincial list p1023 this is Charles Wheeler's first listing as working at Nordrach-upon-Mendip.

Medical Directory 1905 p1015; and Medical Directory 1906 volume 2 p1005. Wheeler was listed in both these issues at Nordrach-upon-Mendip.

Medical Directory 1908 issue p339 lists him in practice in London at 5 Devonshire Street Portland Place. B Sc London 1889 MD 1893. BS 1892 MB 1st class with gold medal 1892. MRCS LRCP London 1892. Training as a student at hospitals in Leipzig and at St Bartholomew's in London. There are details of one publication, as joint author with Harold Meakin in British Medical Journal 1905: The Opsonic Index of Patients Undergoing Sanatorium Treatment for Phthisis.

Medical Directory 1914 part 1 London p375 Charles Edwin Wheeler is now at 35 Queen Anne Street. He's also assistant physician at the London Homoeopathic Hospital. He is the current editor of Homoeopathic World.

At www.awm.gov.au/people/rolls a very brief mention of Wheeler in World War 1: service number 55466. Embarked as a Private from Sydney July 1918 bound for Europe as part of a group of reinforcements. As author of: An Introduction to the Principles and Practice of Homoeopathy published British Homoeopathic Association 1920.

Probate Registry 1947. True to his beliefs, he died at the London Homoeopathic Hospital.

DANIEL LEO KENNEDY, who was Canadian

Canadian Journal of Medicine and Surgery volume 39 number 3 1916 p108 has him listed as resident in Portsmouth Ontario.

Medical Directory 1920 p79: Daniel Kennedy MC listed as resident Medical Officer at Nordrach-upon-Mendip which is described as run by "Thurnam and Kennedy". Kennedy is LRCP LRCS Edinburgh LRFPS Glasgow 1907. Temporary Captain RAMC. Then officer specialising in TB, West Riding, Yorkshire County Council. Honorary Assistant, St Cross Hospital Rugby.

Kelly's Directory of Chemists and Druggists 1921 p704 lists W R Thurnam and Daniel Kennedy at Nordrach-upon-Mendip Blagdon.

The Medical Annual volume 40 1922 p556 in a list of sanatoria: Thurnam and Kennedy. In this list, Kennedy is the only one of the two who is described as resident at the sanatorium.

London Gazette 12 October 1926 p6376 another list of partnerships dissolved; this time including that of William Rowland Thurnam, Henry John Trenchard and Daniel Kennedy at the Nordrach-upon-Mendip sanatorium, Blagdon. Dissolved by mutual consent as of 30 September 1926. Kennedy would be leaving; the other two partners would carry on the business.

Kennedy returned to Canada:

Medical Register 1957 part 2: Kennedy is in Ontario. First registered 11 August 1920. MCP and MCS Ontario 1919. MB 1915 Ontario; MD 1920 QU Ontario.

HENRY JOHN TRENCHARD

Sources: freebmd; census information 1891, 1901 (when he was staying at the Langham Hotel in London); and 1911; probate registry 1938.

ELIZABETH VICTORIA WHEELER

At www.kingscollections.org, records of the Royal British Nurses' Association, held at the King's College London archives. Wheeler's record: first registered with the Association 4 December 1907.

September 1898 to September 1901 Central London Sick Asylum

September 1901 to February 1903 Nordrach-upon-Mendip

Miss Wheeler left Nordrach-upon-Mendip for the Northern Nursing Home Aberdeen. After one or two more short-term appointments she went into private nursing in 1907, based in Dulwich.

HOW THE CURE WORKED

The Nordrach Treatment of Consumptives in this Country by James Gibson. London: Sampson Low Marston and Co 1901. The book's subtitle is: How to cure and prevent consumption and other forms of tuberculosis. Gibson was a journalist, and another person cured of TB at Dr Walther's Nordrach sanatorium in the Black Forest. Gibson was a patient there from late 1895 to spring 1896 and so must have coincided with Rowland. The book brought together articles he'd written over the past two years, promoting the Nordrach TB cure. They had originally been published either in The Nineteenth Century or the Westminster Review. While preparing the book, he'd written to Rowland asking him to comment on allegations that the cure's frequent large meals, all of which had to be eaten up, left patients' digestive systems damaged. As you would expect, Rowland replied that he didn't know of anyone whose digestion had been permanently damaged at a Nordrach sanatorium.

Consumption and Chronic Diseases, subtitled A Popular Exposition of the Open-Air Treatment. Emmet Densmore MD. London: Swan Sonnenschein and Co. No publication date but the copyright is dated 1899: pp14-16, p19 in Chapter 3 describes a typical day at the Black Forest Nordrach sanatorium; apparently based on information supplied by James Gibson. The regime included: windows open day and night throughout the year, and no artificial heating in the patients' rooms; bed rest, often for months at a time; gaining weight; up to 10 hours sleep each night; and fixtures and fittings designed to create and trap as little dust as possible. Chapter 4 was based on a visit Densmore made to Nordrach-upon-Mendip and a series of conversations with Rowland and Neville Gwynn. On p20: the Nordrach diet with its emphasis on milk. Nordrach-upon-Mendip had its own herd of cows. And on p22 the repeated taking of the patient's temperature, through his or her rectum.

SOME ACCOUNTS OF LIFE AS A NORDRACH PATIENT

A personal experience of the Nordrach regime (though not at Nordrach-upon-Mendip) by someone who didn't even have TB:

Pause: A Sketch Book by Emily Carr. Toronto: Clarke Irwin and Co Ltd 1953. In this small book, the artist and writer Emily Carr recorded her time at the East Anglia Sanatorium, owned and managed by Dr Jane Walker. It followed the Nordrach regime while not using the name. She was a patient from January 1903 to March 1904; just missing GD member Edith Grace Collett, who had been the resident medical officer there until a few months before. Emily was discharged in the end, and went back to Canada.

Two members of the Clark shoe-making family of Street in Somerset were patients at Nordrach-upon-Mendip at different times:

Spitting Blood: The History of Tuberculosis by Helen Bynum. Oxford: Oxford University Press 2012: p141 mentions Alice Clark (1874-1934) who had originally had treatment in 1897 at the German Nordrach. She was thought to be cured but had a recurrence of the symptoms in 1900. This time she chose to go to Nordrach-upon-Mendip, which was very near her home. She didn't like it there, though - felt that there was too much pressure being put on patients, to be cured.

Another account of Alice Clark: Quaker Women: Personal Life, Memory and Radicalisation by Sandra Stanley Holton. London: Routledge 2007. On p210, Holton says that Rowland was a friend of the Clark family.

Quaker Inheritance 1871-1961: A Portrait of Roger Clark of Street. Percy Lovell. London: Bannisdale Press 1970: p77. Roger Clark was also a member of the shoe-firm owning family.

PUBLICISING THE OPEN AIR TB TREATMENT

In its first few years, Rowland went to quite a lot of trouble to publicise the Nordrach treatment system and Nordrach-upon-Mendip as an agent of it. He read papers to relevant societies, encouraged visitors to the sanatorium, gave interviews, replied to queries by letter, attended medical meetings, and wrote several articles, usually statistically-based.

In 1900 Rowland went to a big TB congress in Naples, where he was one of the few English-speaking doctors out of 1200 delegates. He read a paper - I'm not sure whether he did so in English or French - which was later published, in French, in the Congress's 'transactions' volume. He probably also networked a great deal at the congress, and took part in some of its social events, which included a trip to Capri, an at-home given by the city of Naples, lunch in the ruins of Pompeii, and several banquets.

The following year there was a TB congress in London, with sessions held at Queen's Hall Langham Place. Rowland went to this as well and as with all such events there was plenty of opportunity to meet and greet: a reception by the Lord Mayor of London; and garden parties at Kew Gardens and in the grounds of the Duke of Northumberland's London home at Sion House.

After the 1901 congress, Rowland seems to have cut back on his own efforts at publicity. Perhaps he and Dr Gwynn had as many patients as they had room for, by this time. Over the next few years, Rowland concentrated on publishing articles detailing the results of the Nordrach treatment. I couldn't find any articles on TB by Rowland after a short letter published in 1911, though this may just be a function of what you can access using Google.

Sources:

Lancet 1899 volume 1 January-June p31 issue of 7 January 1899 had a brief report on a meeting of the Newport Medical Society (of Monmouthshire). Rowland had read a paper on the open-air treatment of phthisis, which had caused a great deal of interest amongst the members present.

The Practitioner volume LXIII July-December 1899 pp50-56: Rowland's article First Results of Nordrach Treatment in England, published as an addendum to a much longer article by Dr Jane Walker on the East Anglia Sanatorium (the one Emily Carr went to - see above). Rowland's article included statistics and a photograph of the main building at Nordrach-upon-Mendip. The article emphasised the necessity of the patient putting him or herself entirely in the hands of the medical staff, who would dictate every aspect of their lives while they were at the sanatorium, down to the most trivial daily details.

Consumption and Chronic Diseases, subtitled A Popular Exposition of the Open-Air Treatment. Emmet Densmore MD. London: Swan Sonnenschein and Co. No publication date but the copyright is dated 1899. Chapter 3 gave Nordrach-upon-Mendip a whole chapter's worth of free publicity. Though Densmore was worried about the level of medical attention given to the patients in a Nordrach regime; thinking that such very close supervision might be counter-productive. And he noted, too, that Nordrach sanatoria were all privately-run: they were no use to TB sufferers without the means to pay for what might be up to a year of in-house treatment.

An article based on Densmore's book appeared in the The Medico-Legal Journal published by the Medico-Legal Society of New York; editor Clark Bell; offices 39 Broadway. The journal got Densmore's name wrong - calling him Helen! Volume 18 1900 pp282-291 article by Dr Helen Densmore of Brooklyn: The Cure of Consumption.

Other accounts of visits to Nordrach-upon-Mendip:

The Philadelphia Medical Journal volume 6 1900 p1040.

Australasian Medicalette volume 19 1900 p269, emphasising that Nordrach-upon-Mendip had been set up in a building that already existed. Perhaps there was a debate in Australia as to whether such sanatoria had to have their buildings purpose-built - which would, of course, increase the cost of setting them up.

Scottish Medical and Surgical Journal volume 12 1903.

The Congress in Naples April 1900:

Lancet 1900 volume 1 January-June p661 issue of 3 March 1900; p1329 issue of 5 May 1900; p1388 issue of 12 May 1900. All the reports were compiled by the Lancet's Rome correspondent. The correspondent was very sorry, perhaps even rather disgusted, to have to note how few English doctors had bothered to attend.

Atti del Congresso contro la Tubercolosi Napoli 25-28 Aprile 1900 published 1901 pxxxix on the list of those who attended: Dr Rowland Thurnam of Nordrach-upon-Mendip. On p580 text of Rowland's talk on L'éducation du phthisique.

The congress in London July 1901; which got a lot more coverage in the Lancet than the larger event in Naples the previous year.

Lancet 1901 volume 1 January-June p48 issue of 5 January 1901; p647 issue of 2 March 1901; p1703 issue of 15 June 1901; p1770, focusing on Professor Koch, who gave a keynote speech; p1845 issue of 29 June 1901.

Lancet 1901 volume 2 July-December: a lot of coverage of the congress, which included an entire section on the effects of climate on TB. The index named nearly everyone who read a paper or responded to one; but Rowland was not amongst those listed.

Transactions of the British Congress on Tuberculosis for the Prevention of Consumption. In 4 volumes. The congress ran from 22-26 July 1901. Volume 1 included the list of delegates: p144 re Gwynn; and p152, p224 re Rowland - both of them attended; and also p195 GD member Robert William Felkin. Volume 2: keynote speeches. Volumes 3 and 4: the work of the congress. There was a section on sanatoria but no one from Nordrach-upon-Mendip either read a paper at it, or took enough of a part in subsequent discussion to be mentioned in those volumes.

At www.jstor.org British Medical Journal issue of 14 March 1903, an article not by Rowland but focusing on the Nordrach treatment: Sanatorium Treatment of Pulmonary TB.

A set of two articles from 1905, by Rowland and his new assistant Charles Edwin Wheeler:

At www.bmj.com British Medical Journal 1905 volume 1 p65 issue of 14 January 1905. Article by Rowland and Charles E Wheeler MD: The Results of Four Years' Sanatorium Work in the Treatment of Pthisis. You can see this article at jstor as well.

And at www.bmj.gci.reprint British Medical Journal 1905 volume 1 pp65-67 issue of 14 January 1905, article by doctors Rowland and Wheeler: Treatment of Pthisis by Iodoform Infusion.

At www.ncbi.nlm.nih.gov British Medical Journal 1911 volume 2; I couldn't see the page number this time but it was the issue of 30 September 1911. Article by Rowland: Tuberculin in Pulmonary TB. Tuberculin was Professor Koch's attempt to use the MTB to treat TB (see wikipedia for more information).

<http://www.resmedjournal.com>The British Journal of Tuberculosis editor T N Kelynack MD. Published London: Baillière Tindall and Cox of 8 Henrietta Street Covent Garden. In volume 5 number 4, issue October 1911: p255 began a series of letters giving "representative opinions" on the future of TB treatment in sanatoria. Rowland's letter (p274) was the last of the opinions, and the shortest. He argued that there would be more cures at sanatoria if the GP's of people diagnosed with the illness would send them to a sanatorium while the disease was still in its early stages. Perhaps here is the place to say that the Wikipedia page for TB notes that 50% of people who went to a sanatorium for TB treatment had died within five years; that sanatoria were no worse than other attempts at treatment; but they were no better, either. On p1 of volume 5, 1911, the journal's editor described the problem of TB as "a national calamity". Of course, it was an international one.

Moving on to Rowland's life outside his working hours:

THREE OTHER PUBLICATIONS

The British Library catalogue has a piece of music by Rowland: Tricotrin, published c 1885 by Swann and Co. It was a polka. This is the only evidence I've found for Rowland as a musician; though there's other evidence for him as a drama enthusiast and opera-lover.

The only other item by Rowland in the British Library is his booklet Parsifal. The Story of Wagner's Opera published in 1914 by the Catholic Truth Society as their volume 99. See below, the section on 'religion' for more information on this and the circumstances of its publication.

One piece of poetry by Rowland has been published:

Master, across the sea there comes thy song,
A flame of singing fire, of love for man,
That has not diminished its flame since first it ran
To speak its glow the minds of men among.
We know that some have said that thou wert wrong
To sing so boldly when thou first began;
Opposing thus, they only did but fan
This flame more pure than fire, than death more strong.

And men and women who have grown half tired
Of love that runs not smooth, and of the pain
Of love that's unrequited or expired,
Tho' vowed eternal, like sick flowers in rain,
Raise up their drooping heads, and so inspired
By thy sweet song, take heart and love again.

Rowland Thurnam.

The 'Master' to whom the poem was addressed was Walt Whitman. At the eighth annual meeting of the Walt Whitman Fellowship, held in Philadelphia USA on 31 May 1895, the poem was read aloud; though not by Rowland himself who (I imagine) wasn't there. It was then published in a Whitman commemorative issue of The Conservator magazine.

Source:

The Conservator volumes 5-8 March 1894-February 1898, published Innes and Son of Philadelphia though with an editorial address in Camden New Jersey. The editor was Horace L Traubel, who also had poems in this issue; from evidence on p49 it's clear that Traubel was a leader in the world of Whitman fan-dom. Issue of June 1895 volume 6 number 4 was a special one, commemorating the anniversary of Whitman's birth. On p55 To Walt Whitman, a sonnet by Rowland Thurnam.

I'm not quite sure why, but Rowland's poem is mentioned in The Complete Writings of Walt Whitman: The Complete Prose Works published 1902 p231.

Just in case Rowland had more poems published, I checked out two useful reference works: Late Victorian Poetry 1880-99: An Annotated Biobibliography by Catherine W Reilly p473. And Oxford Companion to 20th Century Poetry in England editor Ian Hamilton. Oxford: Oxford University Press 1994 has p542. There was no entry for Rowland Thurnam in either of these works; which makes his sonnet to Walt Whitman even more special.

See wikipedia for Walt Whitman and his huge influence on other poets. No doubt Rowland was very familiar with Whitman's great collection, Leaves of Grass, self-published in 1855 but going through seven editions in his lifetime. Just noting that Whitman's sexuality was the subject of speculation even during his lifetime.

There were branches of the Walt Whitman Fellowship in several American cities; and in Bolton Lancashire. Some interesting stuff has been published on the Bolton branch; though I haven't found any mention of Thurnam's name so it's not possible to say whether he was a member.

Walt Whitman's Birthplace Bulletin 1957 p18 article by Verne Dyson on the Bolton branch. Social Capital, Trust and the Industrial Revolution 1780-1880 David Sutherland 2007. On p221 a reference to an article in Gender and History volume 13 number 2 2001 pp191-223: Calamus in Bolton. Spirituality and Homosexual Desire in Late Victorian England, by H Cocks. Cocks argues that the Walt Whitman Fellowship International group formed in Bolton c 1885 involved a group of men with an interest in the homoeroticism of Whitman's poetry. The members formed passionate friendships. Cocks' source for this is the Diaries of one of the members, a Dr Johnston; particularly an entry for July 1894.

Walt Whitman's Mystical Ethics of Comradeship by Juán A Herrero Brasas. Albany New York: SUNY Press 2010: p9 on the history of the Walt Whitman Fellowship International. It was founded in 1894 but folded after Traubel's death in 1919.

A more general book on Whitman worshippers: Worshipping Walt: the Whitman Disciples by Michael Robertson. Princeton New Jersey and Oxford: Princeton University Press 2008.

RELIGION

Some members of the wider Thurnam family were Quakers. Rowland was baptised in the local Anglican church and one of his first cousins was a Church of England vicar. Careful thought about religious belief does, therefore, seem to have been a feature of his family. Rowland seems to have thought particularly carefully. Perhaps you can think of his initiation into the GD as part of his spiritual quest. The quest ended when he became a convert to Roman Catholicism, in 1908. Either from before this time, or as a result of his conversion, he was a friend of James Britten, a Catholic convert and tireless worker for the cause of Catholicism in England. Britten founded The Catholic Truth Society as a Catholic riposte to the tracts published by Anglicans, particularly high church Anglicans.

It was the Catholic Truth Society that published Rowland's version of the Parsifal plot. I think it might have been a commission given to Rowland by James Britten. Parsifal's first performance had taken place at Bayreuth in July 1882 but the Wagner family had always refused to allow it to be played anywhere else. When they changed their minds, allowing performances elsewhere in 1914, there was great excitement throughout Europe. Britten was anxious to have a Catholic view of Parsifal available to go with the first performances in England, at the Royal Opera House Covent Garden in February 1914. Most tickets for this short run were sold out well in advance. I wonder if Rowland got one? There were still a few going at 1 guinea a throw, a few days before the run began. Or he could - if he could have spared the time - have queued on the night and got in for 4 shillings, though he might have had to stand.

In March 1914, Rowland went to the Bristol Museum theatre to give a talk on Parsifal to an audience including members of the Bristol Choral Society.

Rowland's booklet has been described since as a specifically Catholic reading of the opera, in contrast to some other works which take a more Anglican view.

Sources:

On James Britten:

At archive.thetablet.co.uk, The Tablet issue of 18 October 1924 p12: an appreciation of James Britten who had just died, aged 79. Like Rowland, he was a convert to Catholicism. Just noting here that Britten's day job was as a botanist at the Natural History Museum, where he will have been a colleague of GD member William Forsell Kirby. From 1880 Britten was editor of the Journal of Botany.

Wikipedia for the first ever performance of Parsifal.

Times 16 October 1913 p15: short report giving dates of the performances of Parsifal at the Royal Opera House; and listing the cast and production team.

Times Friday 2 January 1914 p6 reports from Berlin and Paris on performances of Parsifal due there; and a note of performances due within the next few weeks in several Italian cities.

Times Monday 26 January 1914 p6 announcement on ticket availability for the Covent Garden run of Parsifal.

Rowland as a prominent English Roman Catholic:

The Catholic Who's Who volumes 6-9, volume 11, volume 15, published together 1913: p494.

The Catholic Who's Who and Yearbook volume 34 1924 p489.

The Catholic Who's Who and Yearbook volume 32 1939 p493, this time with some brief biographical notes and the year of his conversion.

Rowland's talk in Bristol:

Via genesreunited.com to Western Daily Press of 19 March 1914.

The academic assessment of Rowland's Parsifal:

At www.researchgate.net the University of Toronto Quarterly volume 49 (2) issue of January 1979: 117-38 article by William Blissett: The Liturgy of Parsifal.

ANY OTHER EVIDENCE FOR ROWLAND'S LEISURE TIME?

Plenty, though most of it is from Rowland's later years, when perhaps he had more time to spend on his many non-medical interests.

POEMS BY OSCAR WILDE

Rowland was the owner of a copy of Oscar Wilde's Poems, copy number 197 of the fifth reprint of a limited edition of 220 printed for the author. Rowland had sold this copy on, by the early 1920s, and it's now in the collections of the William Andrews Clark Library in California. Perhaps when he decided to become a Roman Catholic, Rowland felt embarrassed by owning it. I'd like to know when he originally bought it: was it before Oscar Wilde's trials (mid-1895) or after?

Source:

The Library of William Andrews Clark Junior issued by the William Andrews Clark Memorial Library. Compiler/editor Robert Ernest Cowan. San Francisco: published by the Library and printed by John Henry Nash 1922. Library is part of the collections of the University of California. Volume 1: Poems, Plays and Wildeiana: p10-11.

BACK TO PAMELA COLMAN SMITH

I haven't found any information on when Rowland met Pamela Colman Smith; though I've said above that I'd suppose the meeting happened after the GD and happened quite apart from them both being GD members. The earliest evidence for them knowing each other is from long after the GD: a reference in 1916 to a forthcoming book on which they were cooperating. It was going to be called 'music drawings'; withdrawals by Pamela and "Notes by Rowland Thurnam" - possibly musical notes, seeing he'd had a piece of music published years before. I haven't been able to find a copy of the book and I wonder if it was never published.

Also in 1916, Pamela contributed a drawing of The Passion for a book in which Rowland was also involved - see immediately below for a bit more on that.

Sources:

The Dublin Review Part 1 1916 p63.

The Living Age volume 288 1916 p722.

TRANSLATIONS OF FRENCH DRAMA AND POETRY

As a new convert to Roman Catholicism with a good command of French, Rowland read a lot of work by French Catholic writers. He translated some of those works into English. The earliest that I know of is Echange, Rowland's translation of the three-act play Echange by Paul Claudel, about a struggle between two women who should know better, over the beautiful young man married to one of them; who chooses death rather than live with either. Rowland's English version was given one performance at the Little Theatre in London by the Pioneer Players, in May 1915. Claudel had undergone a 'conversion' experience as a young man after several years as an unbeliever - clearly Rowland identified with this.

After Echange, Rowland did a translation of Claudel's set of 14 poems on the stations of the cross. The Way of the Cross was prepared for publication as an artwork by calligrapher and designer Beatrice Waldram, with one black and white illustration by Pamela Colman Smith, of The Passion.

Wikipedia has some information on Paul Claudel (1868-1955).

I found mention of Claudel at www.theguardian.com, item posted 13 August 2004: describing him as a misogynist with anti-semitic and anti-muslim views. However, views like those were typical of his and Rowland's time.

Sources for Rowland's translations of Claudel:

The Academy and Literature published for the proprietor by William Dawson and Sons Ltd of Rolls House, Breems Bldgs EC; it's weekly, classed as a newspaper; price 3d. Volume 88 1915 number 2244 p300 issue of 8 May 1915.

Echange's one performance was listed in The London Stage 1900-09: A Calendar of Plays and Players. Volume 2 1917-19. J P Wearing. NJ and London: The Scarecrow Press Inc 1981: p545. The performance was reviewed in The Era 5 May 1915 p13; and The Stage 6 May 1915 p23.

Downside Review volumes 35-36 1916 p100: review of The Way of the Cross, translated by Rowland with calligraphy by Beatrice Waldram and a b&w illustration by Pamela Colman Smith. Published Westminster: Art and Book Co 1917 28pp. Looking for it on Worldcat I couldn't see any copies in England; though there is one in the Dublin National College of Art and Design.

I found mention on the web of another translation of Claudel's set of poems: Stations of the Cross translated by Rev John J Burke. CSP 1927.

For Beatrice Waldram:

English Mechanic and World of Science volume 63 1896 p540 Waldram is mentioned as a ex-student at Stamford Hill School of Art. Resident in Clapton, doing flower designs.

Via google books I found quite a few mentions of her in art and design magazines, eg Decorative Art in Modern Interiors volume 4 1909 p96, an advert for Beatrice Waldram as a designer of textiles and wallpaper; and as a calligrapher and illuminator. Now resident at 105 Great Russell Street.

Seen online, several copies of her biography of Greuze published Cassell and Co and in New York by Funk and Wagnalls 1923.

LILY OF KILLARNEY

Parsifal was not quite the only opera that Rowland had some involvement with. On 14 December 1923 he gave a talk on BBC Radio as part of a broadcast on Julius Benedict's opera Lily of Killarney.

Source:

At genome.ch.bbc.co.uk an extract from the Radio Times of 7 December 1923.

Western Daily Press 14 December 1923, specifically announcing Rowland's talk.

See wikipedia for Julius Benedict 1804-85; friend of Weber and Beethoven. Composer, conductor and author. First opera produced 1827. Arrived in England 1836 and remained in the UK until his death. Lily of Killarney was based on Dion Boucicault's play The Colleen Bawn; music by Benedict, libretto by John Oxenford. First production, Royal Opera House 1862.

ROWLAND AS AN ACTOR

In January 1926, for one night only as far as I can see, Rowland moved from translating drama to acting in it. He was one of several men acting the role of chorus in a production of Sophocles' Oedipus Tyrannos at the Scala Theatre.

Source:

Seen at //theatricalia.com, a page from the Radio Times mentioning the performance on 10 January 1926. As it was in the RT, perhaps it was broadcast on radio.

GINEVRA

In 1928 Rowland moved from French to Italian to work with the actress and theatre producer Nancy Price. They were adapting for its first English production, Giovacchino Forzano's 1926 play Ginevra degli Almieri. Described (I think in a publicity handout) as a "grotesque comedy with paradoxical situations”, it was set in the 14th century with a plot revolving around whether a woman pronounced legally dead - though still alive - could still be guilty of adultery. The opera was staged at the Everyman Theatre in September 1928 and was widely reviewed though without much mention of the translator. It was a comedy, but it didn't make the Times' reviewer laugh much; he (or she) thought its wit had worn itself out by Act 3.

Sources:

Wikipedia on Giovacchino Forzano 1884-1970: director at La Scala 1920-30. Playwright and opera librettist. Film maker. Supporter of Mussolini; which blighted his post-war career.

The London Stage 1920-29: A Calendar of Productions by J P Wearing. P617 in the list for 1928, item 28.322. Everyman Theatre 17 September to 29 September 1928, with reviews in Era 19 September; The Nation and The Athenaeum on 29 September; The Observer 23 September; and The Stage 20 September 1928.

Times Monday 10 September 1928 p10 in its Theatres column: forthcoming productions.

Times Tuesday 28 September 1928 p12 review: and that's where the 'grotesque comedy' quote comes from.

Wikipedia on Lilian Nancy Bache Price, stage name Nancy Price (1880-1970).

AND OTHER THINGS

The weather being an important feature of the Nordrach system, it's not surprising to find Rowland as a member of the Royal Meteorological Society in 1902; perhaps doing regular recording of temperature and rainfall and sending his results to Society headquarters.

Although he doesn't seem to have taken part himself, in 1910 Rowland allowed archaeologists and palaeontologists to search Nordrach-upon-Mendip's land. In 1910 he lent the diggers a tent as they continued their work in particularly bad weather. A flint scraper found in the grounds of Nordrach-upon-Mendip in 1921 by Ref F H Carr is now in the Pitt Rivers Museum.

Finally, Rowland was a great lover of Cornwall, especially Kynance Cove on the Lizard. He died in Cornwall.

Sources:

Quarterly Journal of the Royal Meteorological Society volume 28 1902 p234.

Proceedings of the Somersetshire Archaeological and Natural History Society 1910 p137.

At england.prm.ox.ac.uk, a catalogue of the English Collections at the Pitt Rivers Museum. The flint scraper found by Rev Carr is one of 127 such items from the Blagdon area.

Via genesreunited to Cornishman 16 October 1941.

ROWLAND AND AUBREY BEARDSLEY

In the mid-1890s, Rowland met Aubrey Beardsley. They had an acquaintance in common - Frederick Evans, who ran a bookshop on Cheapside in the City of London; and they probably met in his shop. Rowland and Beardsley don't seem to have known each other more than distantly, but Beardsley did enquire after him, in a letter to Evans written from Malvern in November 1894: “By the way, how is Thurnam? I suppose he’s in the same boat as I, only further out to sea”. The editors of Beardsley’s letters assumed that the enigmatic ‘same boat’ reference indicated that Rowland shared Beardsley’s enthusiasm for Wagner.

At some point, Rowland either bought, or was given, a couple of drawings by Beardsley, which he still owned in the 1920s: an illustration of Tannhauser; and ‘Withered Spring’.

Sources:

The Letters of Aubrey Beardsley by Aubrey Beardsley, Henry Maas, John Duncan and W G Good. London: Cassell 1970: p47 for who Frederick H Evans was; the earliest letter to Evans is from mid-1893. The mention of Rowland: p78 letter from Beardsley to F H Evans, sent from c/o Dr Grindrod of Wyche Side Malvern; undated but assigned to November 1894 by the editors. On p79 the editors’ footnote 2 describes Rowland as the author of Parsifal, the Story of Wagner’s Opera, which was not published for another 20 years. There’s no other information about Rowland; they probably didn’t look for any more. There are no letters from Beardsley to Rowland in the book. That could be because none have survived; but I think it’s more likely that none were ever written. The reference to Rowland in the letter of November 1894 is the only mention of him in the book. On p237 the editors note that Beardsley was baptised a Roman Catholic on 31 March 1897, a few years before Rowland. On P440 is a short letter from Mabel Beardsley, Aubrey’s sister, telling Robert Baldwin Ross of her brother’s death earlier that day. Written from Menton; undated apart from “Wednesday”; the editors date it to 16 March 1898. Unlike Rowland, Beardsley died of TB.

About the Beardsley works that Rowland owned:

Aubrey Beardsley by Robert Baldwin Ross. London and New York: John Lane; first edition published 1909 but I got my information from Ross’s revised edition of 1921. 112 pages including a list of his works. On p69 item “27. Tannhauser, first published in Later Work”. This is a pen and ink study dated 1891, described as “(Property of Dr Rowland Thurnam)”. And p69 item “28. Withered Spring” again a pen and ink study. Its central motif was used later by Beardsley as one of the illustrations to the Morte D’Arthur Book 1 chapter xii. Item 28 was also published in Later Work; however, it was first catalogued in Fifty Drawings, in which it was given the title Lament of the Dying Year. No date given for the drawing which was also “(Property of Dr Rowland Thurnam)”.

Some further identification of the works mentioned in Ross’ book, from the British Library catalogue:

Later Work is probably The Later Work of Aubrey Beardsley. London: John Lane The Bodley Head and New York: Dover. 1901.

The Fifty Drawings is probably A Book of Fifty Drawings...with an Iconography by Aymer Vallance. London: Leonard Smithers 1897.

ROWLAND AND SAMUEL BUTLER

In April 1902, on his way back from a trip to Sicily, Rowland met Samuel Butler, author of Erewhon, quite by chance in the dining room of the Victoria Hotel in Rome. Butler was travelling the other way, wanting to get as far as Sicily but so ill he doubted whether he was strong enough to do so. Having discovered that he had a fellow guest who was an experienced physician, Butler asked Rowland for an impromptu medical check-up. To his delight, Rowland said that he thought Butler was fit enough to make it to Sicily. Rowland told him that he had read Butler's book The Authoress of the Odyssey (published 1897) in which Butler argued that the Odyssey had been written by a woman poet residing in a Greek community in Sicily; in fact, that might have been the reason why Rowland had been in Sicily in the first place. Rowland and Butler stayed up chatting about the Odyssey until the small hours. Butler wrote of this meeting - though without naming the doctor - in a letter to his friend Henry Festing Jones. Within three months, he was dead - of TB.

In July 1912 Festing Jones and Rowland met in their turn, at the 5th annual Erewhon Dinner, at which Rowland made one of the after-dinner speeches, presumably on this 1902 meeting with the great man.

Sources:

Wikipedia for Samuel Butler (1835-1902) and for Henry Festing Jones, Butler's personal assistant, travelling companion and biographer. Erewhon, or Over the Range, Butler's utopian novel, was published anonymously in 1872; though its author's name was soon known. Rowland might also have read Butler's The Odyssey of Homer (1900) and The Iliad of Homer, Rendered into English Prose (1898).

Samuel Butler: A Memoir Part Two. By Henry Festing Jones. In two volumes; published in 1919. On p89, p428. The other speakers at the 5th Erewhon dinner were Edmund Gosse; Phipson Beale; Desmond MacCarthy; and Sir Charles Holroyd. There were 90 guests; all men, as women weren't allowed to attend until 1914.

Samuel Butler: A Biography by Peter Raby. London: Hogarth 1991 p288, identifying the hotel and stating that Rowland was on his way back from Sicily.

FAMILY

By 1916, Rowland and his aunt Anne Harriet Thurnam were the only two descendants of Charles Thurnam, founder of the publishing firm, who had his surname. Anne Harriet Thurnam died in Carlisle in 1917. Charles Thurnam did have other descendants, children of his daughter Catherine and her husband Henry Edmund Ford. Henry and Catherine Ford lived in Carlisle, where Henry was an organist and music teacher. Perhaps Rowland got his own interest in music from his uncle. Catherine and Henry's two youngest sons, Harold and Herbert, were around Rowland's age. Harold Dodsworth Ford (born 1864) became a Church of England clergyman with a parish in Carlisle. In 1895 he married Gertrude Emma Bennett. Rowland kept in touch with their only child, Edmund Brisco Ford (born 1901).

Edmund Brisco Ford spent all his adult life at Oxford University, as a student and then as an academic, an ecological geneticist. He became more widely known, at least to other specialists, when his Mendelism and Evolution was published in 1931 (its 8th edition was published in 1965). It was Rowland who suggested to Edmund Brisco Ford that he write a book explaining genetics to student doctors. Rowland died while Ford was still working on the text, robbing Ford of the chance to have him read and comment on each chapter. Rowland was quite right about the need for such a book: Genetics for Medical Students came out originally in 1942, went through two more editions in the 1940s despite the War being on, and was still an important reference work in 1973, when its 7th edition was published.

Source: probate registry 1917.

The Bookseller volume 65 1917 p604 November issue.

The Ford cousins:

Familysearch England-EASy GS film number 90585: marriage of Henry Edmund Ford to Catherine Thurnam, daughter of Charles Thurnam; 15 September 1846 at St Mary's Carlisle.

Familysearch England-EASy GS film number 252809: Harold Dodsworth Ford baptised 30 October 1864 at St Mary's Carlisle.

Edmund Brisco Ford:

Wikipedia has a very short entry on him; he seems to have been a very self-contained, private man.

There are quite a few works by him in the British Library catalogue. I list the two I've mentioned:

Genetics for Medical Students Edmund Brisco Ford. London: Methuen and Co 1942. 2nd revised edition 1946; 3rd 1948; 4th 1956; 5th 1961; 6th edition 1967; 7th edition Chapman and Hall 1973.. On pvii of the 6th edition in the foreword, Brisco Ford describes Thurnam as "my cousin...the well-known authority on tuberculosis".

Mendelism and Evolution London 1931; the catalogue entry didn't give the name of the publishing firm. Its 8th edition came out 1965.

RETIREMENT

From 1899 to the early 1930s, Rowland had been the senior physician at Nordrach-upon-Mendip. In 1931 or early 1932, however, he retired from daily work there; although he and Henry John Trenchard were still financial partners in the business, drawing an income from it. The sanatorium did continue, at least until January 1938 when Henry Trenchard died; I haven't been able to find out what happened to it at that point.

Rowland moved right away from Somerset, living in Henfield in Sussex for a few years before moving to Bournemouth, probably at the outset of World War 2.

Sources:

The Medical Directory 1932 volume 2 p1183.

The Medical Directory 1933 volume 1 p1211.

The Medical Directory 1936 volume 1 p1253.

The Catholic Who's Who and Yearbook volume 32 1939 p493.

DEATH

Though his permanent address was in Bournemouth, Rowland died in Cornwall, on 8 October 1941. Perhaps he was taken ill while on a holiday, because he had a major operation and died shortly afterwards.

Sources: probate registry 1942.

Times 13 October 1941 p1a death notice.

The Lancet 1941 volume 2 p473 issue of 18 October 1941, death announcement; and p460, issue of 18 October 1941, a paragraph of obituary, focusing on Nordrach-upon-Mendip.

DESCENDANTS? AND WHAT (IF ANYTHING) HAPPENED NEXT.

Rowland never married and so there are no acknowledged descendants.

The Bristol Children's Hospital was evacuated to Nordrach-upon-Mendip's buildings at the outset of World War 2 and remained there throughout the war. In the reorganisation that went with the formation of the NHS, the sanatorium's buildings were incorporated into Ham Green Hospital, taking women patients only. Nordrach-upon-Mendip is no longer a sanatorium. Its wooden buildings have fallen down, though the main building - which pre-dated Rowland's arrival - does still exist.

Source:

Jean Birk's article on the history of Charterhouse village; seen at mikek.org.uk/friendsrlm/03\_charterhouse.pdf

BASIC SOURCES I USED for all Golden Dawn members.

Membership of the Golden Dawn: The Golden Dawn Companion by R A Gilbert. Northampton: The Aquarian Press 1986. Between pages 125 and 175, Gilbert lists the names, initiation dates and addresses of all those people who became members of the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn or its many daughter Orders between 1888 and 1914. The list is based on the Golden Dawn's administrative records and its Members' Roll - the large piece of parchment on which all new members signed their name at their initiation. All this information had been inherited by Gilbert but it's now in the Freemasons' Library at the United Grand Lodge of England building on Great Queen Street Covent Garden. Please note, though, that the records of the Amen-Ra Temple in Edinburgh were destroyed in 1900/01. I have recently (July 2014) discovered that some records of the Horus Temple at Bradford have survived, though most have not; however those that have survived are not yet accessible to the public.

For the history of the GD during the 1890s I usually use Ellic Howe's The Magicians of the Golden Dawn: A Documentary History of a Magical Order 1887-1923. Published Routledge and Kegan Paul 1972. Foreword by Gerald Yorke. Howe is a historian of printing rather than of magic; he also makes no claims to be a magician himself, or even an occultist. He has no axe to grind.

Family history: freebmd; ancestry.co.uk (census and probate); findmypast.co.uk; familysearch; Burke's Peerage and Baronetage; Burke's Landed Gentry; Armorial Families; thepeerage.com; and a wide variety of family trees on the web.

Famous-people sources: mostly about men, of course, but very useful even for the female members of GD. Oxford Dictionary of National Biography. Who Was Who. Times Digital Archive.

Useful source for business and legal information: London Gazette and its Scottish counterpart Edinburgh Gazette. Now easy to find (with the right search information) on the web.

Catalogues: British Library; Freemasons' Library.

Wikipedia; Google; Google Books - my three best resources. I also used other web pages, but with some caution, as - from the historian's point of view - they vary in quality a great deal.

24 July 2016 <mailto:Amandragora@attglobal.net>

Email me at AMandragora@attglobal.net

Find the web pages of Roger Wright and Sally Davis, including my list of people initiated into the Order of the Golden Dawn between 1888 and 1901, at:

www.wrightanddavis.co.uk

***

Victor Conyers Ebenezer Toller - known as Victor - was initiated into the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn at its Isis-Urania temple in London on 18 December 1894. Two other men were initiated in the same ritual: George Samuel Minson, and Edward Boxer. Minson and Boxer may have known each other, but I don't think Victor knew either of them before that evening. Victor did get as far as choosing a motto, 'Eureka' but only a few weeks after he was initiated, he resigned from the Order.

This is one of my short biographies. There may be more information on Victor Toller out there, but it will be in local record offices for Liverpool, Cardiff and West London; and the archives of the old General Post Office...I've had to admit that life's too short!

Sally Davis

April 2016

My basic sources for any GD member are in a section at the end of the file. Supplementary sources for this particular member are listed at the end of each section.

This is what I have found on VICTOR TOLLER

IN THE GD

Although he was only a member for a few weeks, I'm able to suggest that he was offered initiation through Dr George Rowell, who had become a GD member in February 1894. The two men were friends. Dr Rowell stayed in the GD for a little longer than Victor but then let his membership lapse. The two men stayed in touch, though: when Victor died, George Rowell was one of his executors.

Source for the continuation of their friendship: probate registry 1915. There's nothing relevant to Victor Toller in the GD archives that still exist, apart from the details on the Membership Roll.

ANY OTHER ESOTERIC INTERESTS?

Not that I can see. It's possible, I suppose, that he was interested in spiritualism but I haven't seen his name in any of the sources for spiritualism that I've looked at.

Sources checked: Theosophical Society Membership Registers 1889-1901. Database and other records at the Freemasons' Library. Names of people who were interested in spiritualism are rather harder to come by: there were lots of spiritualist societies but they were very locally based and - for the most part - their records have been lost. There was no over-arching organisation for spiritualists whose membership lists I could look at.

BIRTH/YOUTH/FAMILY BACKGROUND

Victor Toller was the eldest child of Ebenezer Toller and Mary Elizabeth Brown, who married in Scarborough in 1863. Ebenezer Toller had qualified as a doctor and had married on the strength of being appointed medical superintendent of the Gloucester District County Lunatic Asylum, run by the local Poor Law unions. He remained in post at the Asylum in Wotton St Mary until he retired.

Victor Toller was born in 1864. He had four brothers: Seymour Graves Toller born 1866; Harold Dowling Toller born 1867; Neville Percy Toller born 1868; and Hubert Joseph Toller born 1871.

For the first few years of Victor's life, employees of the Asylum were part of his parents' household. On census day 1871, the household included two other doctors and the Asylum's matron. It's not clear from the census entry whether the nurse/governess, the cook and the two housemaids worked only for the Tollers or had duties in the Asylum as well. By 1881 a separate house had been built or rented for the Tollers, next door to the Asylum itself. On census day 1881 therefore, the household consisted of the Toller family, their cook and their general servant. On census day Victor, Harold and Hubert were at home but Seymour and Neville were still at school.

Ebenezer had retired by 1889.

Sources: freebmd; census 1871, 1881.

EDUCATION

The Toller boys went to different schools. Seymour went to Malvern College. Neville was sent to Epsom College, a school founded specifically to teach the sons of medical professionals, before being moved to Honiton Grammar School. Harold and Hubert seem to have been taught solely at home; a possible reason for this will become clear a bit further down this file. Victor was at Epsom College from 1878 to 1880, but was then sent to Oxford Military College for a while, before ending his schooling at King's School Gloucester. Perhaps Victor's parents were having trouble deciding on a career for him.

Seymour Graves Toller was the star amongst the Toller boys: from Malvern, he went to St Thomas's Hospital London in 1885 to train as a doctor. He won student prizes every year and very soon after he graduated was employed at the hospital as clinical assistant in its ear, nose and throat department. During the 1890s he rose smoothly through St Thomas's ranks as a doctor and teacher in its medical school. But in 1898 or 1899 what was shaping up to be a brilliant career in medicine in England was halted by illness.

Harold Toller died at Scarborough in 1890, aged 22; and Hubert had died at Hastings in 1891, aged 19. Seymour Toller's obituary implies that the illness he contracted in 1898 or 1899 looked to his doctors like TB; and that's possibly what his young brothers had died of. Seymour was advised to find work in a warmer climate and took the jobs of Physician of Clinical Medicine at Kasr-el-Aini Hospital in Cairo and professor at its medical school. However, the warmer climate of Egypt brings its own hazards, and Seymour Toller died in February 1902 after an illness lasting a couple of weeks. Neville followed his brother Seymour Toller to St Thomas's Medical School. Unlike Seymour he was better known as a good rugby player than as an outstanding student. He graduated in 1892 and continued at St Thomas's for a few years before going to work for P&O. He died in 1900, aged 31.

I've gone through the history of Victor's younger brothers here in order to make a couple of points about Victor: firstly, that he didn't enter his father's profession; and secondly, that by early 1902 he was the only brother of the five who was still alive.

Sources:

Epsom College Register from October 1855 to July 1905. Published 1905, London: Richard Clay and Sons. Pxi, p121, p126.

At archive.epsomcollege.org: Old Epsom Biographies Between 1855 and 1889: a short paragraph on Neville which also mentions Victor.

The Malvern Register 1865-1904 originally compiled by L S Milward and E C Bullock. 2nd edition from 1905, updated by R T C Cookson: p170-171 Seymour Graves Toller.

Times 20 September 1887 p10c exam results and prizes, "Summer Session 1886": both Seymour Toller and Rowland Thurnam appear. Toller was awarded the prize for the year's best student.

Seymour Toller and GD member Rowland Thurnam both started their training at St Thomas's in academic year 1885/86, though Thurnam was by no means as brilliant a student as Seymour Toller.

St Thomas's Reports New Series volume 26. It being a google snippet, I couldn't see a year but I think it's an issue from the early 1890s: p115 in a list of old students: Seymour Graves Toller.

At www.bmj.com 1902 volume 1 p564-65 issue of 1 March 1902 obituary of Seymour Graves Toller.

Medical Directory volume 1 1892 p326.

Medical Directory volume 1 1895 p342.

Medical Directory volume 1 1897 p371.

Medical Directory volume 1 1898 p376.

Medical Directory volume 1 1899 p380.

VICTOR'S WORK/PROFESSION

It looks from the various schools his parents tried, that Victor Toller was first scheduled to become a doctor like his father; and then sent to prepare himself for a military career; before finishing his schooling nearer home, perhaps with no clear end in view. He was working for the Post Office by 1885, and it would have been a typical working pattern for him to have remained an GPO employee until his death. In September 1885 he was in Liverpool, in the telegrams office. He was moved to Cardiff in 1886. In April 1890 he was moved again to become Junior Clerk in the Confidential Enquiry Department. This job was based at the GPO headquarters at St Martin-le-Grand in the City of London. From the records it seems that Victor continued to work in that department until he died, though it isn't clear whether or how often he might have been promoted. 'Confidential Enquiry' sounds like snooping to me: did Victor spend his working life after 1890 opening people's letters without their knowledge?

Sources for Victor's employer:

Seen at Ancestry, in the Postal Appointment Books 1737-1969; from microfilm at the British Postal Museum and Archive. Two entries (only) for Victor Toller: POST 58 (of 80) September 1885; POST 58 (of 80) December 1886.

Edinburgh Gazette 4 April 1890 p299 in a list of Civil Service appointments.

VICTOR'S MARRIAGE

Victor Toller married Martha Fauriel Dickson, in Wandsworth, in 1896. Martha Fauriel was born in 1878, a daughter of James Dickson and his wife Fanny Amelia. James Dickson was the Superintendent of Covent Garden fruit and vegetable market. He died in 1885, aged 43. In 1889 Martha acquired a step-father when Fanny Amelia Dickson married Hamilton Williams Price, who ran an import/export business specialising in goods from the Far East. There's a pattern in both the Tollers and the Dicksons, though, of men dying decades before their time and both Fanny Amelia's husbands followed it: Hamilton Price was 10 years younger than his wife but he died in 1904, aged 39.

On the day of the 1901 census, Victor and his wife - who is listed on the census as Fauriel, not as Martha - were living at 2 Hogarth Road, very near Earl's Court station. There were two households at that address: that of the Tollers, and that of Henrietta Lascelles. Mrs Lascelles is listed first so it's likely that Victor and Martha Fauriel were renting some rooms from her. They were employing one live-in general servant. They had no children.

On the day of the 1911 census, Victor and Martha Fauriel were at separate addresses. Victor was living in a residential hotel on the corner of Pembridge Square and Moscow Road in Notting Hill. Martha Fauriel was living with her mother Fanny Amelia Price on the other side of Hyde Park, at 2 Gloucester Mansions, Harrington Gardens South Kensington. This could have been a temporary arrangement - in between house rentals, say - but I think they had separated and there's a bit of evidence from 1915 to back up that view. I haven't found any evidence that they divorced.

Sources: census 1891-1911; probate registry 1907.

DEATH

Victor Toller died in October 1915. At that time he was living at 45 Clanricarde Gardens Bayswater and - as far as I know - was still working for the GPO. He had made a Will, with three executors - his mother, GD member Dr George Rowell, and editor and academic Robert Hope Case. By this time appointing your widow to be your executor was normal but Victor did not name Martha Fauriel as an executor of his Will; which adds fuel to my suspicion that the two of them were living apart. She may have been its beneficiary of course - I haven't seen the Will myself.

Sources: probate registry 1915.

For George Rowell, anaesthetist at Guy's Hospital and elsewhere, see my biography.

I wasn't able to find out very much about Robert Hope Case but the British Library has some works by him; always as editor rather than author:

English Epithalamies London: John Lane 1898

The Bodley Head Anthologies London: John Lane 1896-1902.

And an edition of the works of Christopher Marlowe from after both George and Victor were dead.

DESCENDANTS? AND WHAT (IF ANYTHING) HAPPENED NEXT.

When Ebenezer Toller retired, in the late 1880s, he, Mary Elizabeth, and their two youngest sons moved to Scarborough, where Mary Elizabeth had grown up. If they died of TB it's likely that both Harold and Hubert were ill by that time. Ebenezer and Mary Elizabeth continued to live at the house called Zephyrs, on Holbeck Hill in Scarborough, as two more of their sons died; until Ebenezer died too, at the end of 1906. Victor Toller and his mother were two of Ebenezer's executors. After her husband's death, Mary Elizabeth went to live in Brighton with a distant relative, Edith Crosse, and Edith's son Dennis.

Mary Elizabeth lived on for nearly 20 years after the death of her last surviving son. There were no grand-children. She died in St Leonard's-on-Sea in 1932. A tragic life.

Martha Fauriel Toller went to live in Eire and died in Dun Laoghaire in 1949.

Sources: probate registry 1932, 1949.

BASIC SOURCES I USED for all Golden Dawn members.

Membership of the Golden Dawn: The Golden Dawn Companion by R A Gilbert. Northampton: The Aquarian Press 1986. Between pages 125 and 175, Gilbert lists the names, initiation dates and addresses of all those people who became members of the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn or its many daughter Orders between 1888 and 1914. The list is based on the Golden Dawn's administrative records and its Members' Roll - the large piece of parchment on which all new members signed their name at their initiation. All this information had been inherited by Gilbert but it's now in the Freemasons' Library at the United Grand Lodge of England building on Great Queen Street Covent Garden. Please note, though, that the records of the Amen-Ra Temple in Edinburgh were destroyed in 1900/01. I have recently (July 2014) discovered that some records of the Horus Temple at Bradford have survived, though most have not; however those that have survived are not yet accessible to the public.

For the history of the GD during the 1890s I usually use Ellic Howe's The Magicians of the Golden Dawn: A Documentary History of a Magical Order 1887-1923. Published Routledge and Kegan Paul 1972. Foreword by Gerald Yorke. Howe is a historian of printing rather than of magic; he also makes no claims to be a magician himself, or even an occultist. He has no axe to grind.

Family history: freebmd; ancestry.co.uk (census and probate); findmypast.co.uk; familysearch; Burke's Peerage and Baronetage; Burke's Landed Gentry; Armorial Families; thepeerage.com; and a wide variety of family trees on the web.

Famous-people sources: mostly about men, of course, but very useful even for the female members of GD. Oxford Dictionary of National Biography. Who Was Who. Times Digital Archive.

Useful source for business and legal information: London Gazette and its Scottish counterpart Edinburgh Gazette. Now easy to find (with the right search information) on the web.

Catalogues: British Library; Freemasons' Library.

Wikipedia; Google; Google Books - my three best resources. I also used other web pages, but with some caution, as - from the historian's point of view - they vary in quality a great deal.

24 July 2016mailto:Amandragora@attglobal.net

Email me at AMandragora@attglobal.net

Find the web pages of Roger Wright and Sally Davis, including my list of people initiated into the Order of the Golden Dawn between 1888 and 1901, at:

www.wrightanddavis.co.uk

***

Charles William Lloyd Tuckey was initiated into the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn at its Isis-Urania temple in London on 21 July 1894, taking the Latin motto 'Stant robora vires'. Charles Franks and Ethel Weltch were initiated during the same ritual and may have been acquainted with him already. Charles doesn't seem to have taken his initiation any further, and he resigned from the Order in November 1895.

Although it's pretty long, this is still one of my short biographies. I could have written much more about Charles Lloyd Tuckey but I don't really feel qualified to discuss the careers of the GD's doctors. Perhaps someone reading this introduction to him will be inspired to do more.

Sally Davis

May 2017

SMALL UPDATE FEBRUARY 2017

Gordon Bates is doing a PhD on Victorian Medical Hypnotism. I'm glad to say that it will contain a section on Charles Lloyd Tuckey. Gordon contacted me to say that he was having trouble accessing the Tuckey family history, so in the Family Background section below I've described an easier way to find it.

EVEN SMALLER UPDATE MAY 2017

Charles Lloyd Tuckey would have been pleased to find that there is now scientific evidence that hypnosis is genuine. Research at the Sackler Centre for Consciousness Science, in Brighton, has confirmed that people in a hypnotised state really are carrying out tasks involuntarily - they are not just trying to please the hypnotist. I read this news in the New Scientist on 1 April 2017 and thought it might be an April Fool's joke. But the results been published in Psychological Science volume 28 number 5, 2017 beforehand: see an abstract at <http://doi.org/b4sh>

My basic sources for any GD member are in a section at the end of the file. Supplementary sources for this particular member are listed at the end of each section.

This is what I have found on CHARLES WILLIAM LLOYD TUCKEY.

IN THE GD

Charles Tuckey was acquainted with so many people who were members of the GD that it's surprising that his name wasn't put forward for initiation earlier. It seems that the GD accepted Charles for initiation with rather more enthusiasm than he showed about being a member. He was a qualified doctor who used hypnotherapy to treat his patients, and had written articles about its use for the non-medical press. In the late 1880s and early 1890s he was one of the many medical professionals who were trying to discover how hypnosis worked, and what exactly it was. As part of that exploration, he joined a variety of alternative societies and groups. In the end, though, he decided that scientific evidence for the claims being made by practitioners of magic and spiritualism was the most important thing to him as a medical professional: the Society for Psychical Research was the group he stayed a member of for longest.

Though George Frederick Rogers knew several other GD members including William Wynn Westcott, it might have been Charles who in put forward Rogers' name for initiation, in 1895.

ANY OTHER ESOTERIC INTERESTS?

During the early and mid-1890s, yes.

SOCIETY FOR PSYCHICAL RESEARCH

Charles joined this Society in 1889. You had to be elected to be a member, and it's likely that his name was suggested to the governing Council by George Frederick Rogers, a member since 1885. In persuading Charles to join the Society, Dr Rogers might have mentioned that Professor Dr A A Liébault of Nancy's name was on the list of the Society's corresponding members. The Professor was well-known for his use of hypnosis as a medical tool and Charles had spent several weeks in Nancy with him, observing how he used it with patients.

Charles became a very committed member of the Society, and kept up an interest in its activities even in his last few years, when his physical health was deteriorating. He was a member of its Hypnotic Committee in the early 1890s and its Library Committee until 1917; and regularly reviewed books for its Journal. In 1897 he was elected to the Society's Council - Dr Rogers was also a member - and served on it until 1922 when he could no longer get to London for its meetings.

FREEMASONRY

Charles was a freemason, though he kept his involvement to a modest level, being a member of two lodges only and not achieving rank within the United Grand Lodge of England. He may not have been very active after 1900, though that's more difficult to ascertain.

Though I haven't found any evidence that Charles' father was ever a freemason, his grandfather Davys Tuckey was one in Ireland in the mid to late 19th century; and various other members of the wider Tuckey clan were in England. An S D Tuckey was a member of Imperial Lodge number 1694 in the years after it was founded in 1877. I don't know how close a relation to Charles this man was, but it might have been through him that Charles was initiated into the lodge, in the late 1880s or early 1890s (I haven't been able to discover the exact date). When he joined Imperial Lodge 1694, its meetings were held in Chelsea, though in 1897 they were moved to the Holborn Restaurant in WC2 near the UGLE headquarters. Once initiated, Charles was willing to be elected onto the conveyor-belt of offices which made its way (one year in each office) upwards towards a year as the lodge's most senior official, its Worshipful Master. As a Senior Warden died during his year of office, Charles' time on the conveyor-belt was one year shorter than he would have expected when he put himself forward for its most junior office. He was installed as WM in November 1898 and served until the following November, 1899. He did not join the lodge's Chapter, consecrated 1894. As WM-elect he was present at the meeting (October 1898) which founded the lodge's lodge of instruction; though he doesn't seem to have been an active member of it. And the lodge history suggests that he may have let his lodge membership drop in the years after he served as WM: the lodge history names the men who served the lodge longest and with most dedication, and Charles wasn't one of them.

His membership of Imperial Lodge 1694 made Charles eligible to become a member of two other freemasonry groupings - a lodge, and a lodge-like order.

The lodge was Quatuor Coronati, number 2076, founded in the 1880s as a forum for research into the history, symbolism and rituals of freemasonry. Many freemasons who also became GD members were prominent members of this lodge in the 1890s, and three served as WM in that decade - William Wynn Westcott, Edward Macbean, and Sydney Turner Klein. The lodge's rules allowed for only 40 members at any time, but the plan had always been to have a very large corresponding membership, who received the lodge's journal Ars Quatuor Coronati and were welcome at meetings, though not allowed to stand for office. Charles became a corresponding member in May 1892, and around the time he was also in the GD he went to some meetings of Quatuor Coronati 2076. The lodge held six meetings a year and they all followed a similar pattern: lodge business; followed by a member reading a paper, which was discussed by those present (and later published in the magazine); and then socialising, often around a display of freemasonry items brought by a member. The lodge occasionally held social events, and Charles went to the conversazione at which it celebrated its tenth anniversary. It was held on 28 November 1895 at the King's Hall of the Holborn Restaurant; around the time Charles resigned from the GD. This was one of those rare freemasonry events to which women were invited, and Charles took his sister Deborah Tuckey. He was never a full member of Quatuor Coronati 2076 however, and by 1900 he was no longer a corresponding member.

The lodge-like grouping Charles joined was Societas Rosicruciana in Anglia (SRIA), which was not exactly a freemasons' lodge although only freemasons could join it. Like Quatuor Coronati lodge 2076, the SRIA focused on the esoteric side of freemasonry; and as its name suggests, it was particularly interested in the contributions rosicrucian legends had made and could make to freemasonry. The first GD rituals were rosicrucian ones and many early members of the GD joined the Order on that understanding; not only SRIA members though many SRIA members were initiated into the GD. William Wynn Westcott was an important member of SRIA as well as of Quatuor Coronati 2076; in 1892, he was appointed SRIA's Supreme Magus, an appointment which was for life.

Charles became a member of SRIA at the meeting of its Metropolitan College held on 11 January 1894; that is, six months before he was initiated into the GD. SRIA meetings were organised exactly like Quatuor Coronati 2076 ones, and Charles' first meeting was probably carefully chosen - his friend from the Society for Psychical Research, George Rogers, read a paper that evening on Mesmerism. Mesmerism was something which Charles was very interested in from a professional point of view, and he'd probably had many talks with Dr Rogers on the subject. After the paper had been read, Charles joined in the discussion of it at the SRIA meeting. Charles lasted longer as a member of SRIA than he did as a member of the GD but at SRIA's meeting in July 1897, his resignation was read out. George Frederick Rogers continued to be an active member of SRIA into the 1920s.

SPIRITUALISM

It's always difficult to find out whether GD members were spiritualists: it was a rather home- or district-based pursuit whose records have not usually survived if they existed in the first place. However, in the 1890s, the London Spiritualist Alliance was an umbrella organisation for spiritualists in and around London. It organised lectures and social events and, in 1890, took over the finances of the occult weekly magazine Light, which subsequently published accounts of LSA meetings and articles by some of its members. A sub-group of GD members had been offered initiation into the Order through contacts made in the LSA.

Looking at issues of Light published from 1889 to 1900, I spotted Charles' name at one LSA function - one only. On 22 January 1894, he went to one of the LSA's conversaciones to hear a talk on Identity of Spirit. After the talk and the discussion were over, there was a chance to socialise and he may have passed the time with some of the GD members who were there: Alice Gordon; Arthur Lovell; Catherine Passingham (an acquaintance of George Rogers); Constance Wilde; Henry, Margaret and Charlotte Wright; and - possibly - Sophia Moffat.

THEOSOPHY

Theosophy was one field of esoteric study which Charles never got involved with. Of course, he could have read some books on the subject, but even in the early 1890s, when interest in the subject was at its height in England, he never joined the Theosophical Society.

In 1893 W T Stead (the crusading journalist) started to publish a new occult magazine, Borderlands. In 1894 Stead wrote to a number of people hoping for their support, including Charles. Charles wrote back agreeing that the public discussion of paranormal phenomena was a good idea and hoping that the magazine would shed the light of science on them. He urged Stead to authenticate any evidence of such phenomena that was submitted to him, and to study it with care - meaning, that Stead should be careful not to publish claims that couldn't be verified. I'm sure Stead was hoping for more than that from Charles, but I think he didn't get it. Charles' name doesn't appear in a list of subscribers to Borderland published in 1895. Some people on the list chose to remain anonymous, but I don't see why Charles should have insisted his name not be disclosed, as his interest in hypnotism was already so well known.

An account of a meeting in June 1893 at the Society for Psychical Research seems to show that Charles was trying to find out what altered states of consciousness were, by taking drugs. At the meeting, Professor W Ramsay described what he had experienced when he had dosed himself with chloroform. The account of the discussion afterwards reads as if Charles was speaking with personal experience of taking chloroform, and ether as well - two drugs being used at that time as anaesthetics. He was also able to report that Professor Ramsay's sensations under the chloroform - of being very receptive to all ideas - sounded more like the effect of taking Indian hemp or hashish. Charles may have been taking the hemp and hashish as drugs prescribed for him (or self-prescribed) for his own poor health.

Charles carried out his own experiments into hypnotism and its effects. They were probably an on-going programme in his life, when he could spare the time. He also investigated other "higher phenomena"; probably through the Society for Psychical Research, but the chance of making more such investigations must have been part of the reason why he had joined the GD. His researches convinced him that thought transference at least was real, not a hoax. He concluded that thought transference explained a large proportion of the effects that spiritualists and other occultists believed to be evidence of clairvoyance. That did not mean, however, that he thought transference was something occult; on the contrary, he decided it could be explained by scientific means. Hypnotism, too, was not a supernatural phenomenon, Charles decided. Science and medicine could explain what it was and how it worked; there was no need for the involvement of communications from the dead or wisdom transmitted to certain humans by entities on other planes.

There's plenty of evidence that Charles kept up with European research into his subject; so he may also have been influenced in reaching his decision in favour of science, by the developing theories of Sigmund Freud. Freud's early publications were known (in German at least) to members of the Society for Psychical Research by 1893. In 1892, Freud had published A Case of Successful Treatment by Hypnotism.

Sources:

FREEMASONRY

Database of the collections at the Freemasons' Library, accessible online at www.freemasonry.london.museum/catalogue.php. Charles doesn't appear on the database, which inevitably tends to favour those men who were very active and very senior freemasons.

To use the FML's online, digitised database of freemasonry journals, go to www.freemasonry.london/museum

Take the option 'resources'; then 'Masonic periodicals online'. The FML has only digitised magazines to 1900 so far. If you want to search any later year, you'll need to go to the Library in WC2.

The Freemason May 1877 p8 published a long account of a meeting during a Royal visit to Ireland, in connection with the Masonic Orphan Schools in Dublin. Davys Tuckey is a long way down the list of freemasons who were present; and with no indication of which lodge he was representing. He didn't, at this time, hold national rank of any kind.

IMPERIAL LODGE

Some basic details of Imperial Lodge 1694 can be seen at www.hrionline.ac.uk the website of Lane's Masonic Records.

Imperial Lodge no. 1694. Centenary Booklet 1877-1977. No author's name is printed, but on p2 the acknowledgements are by "EWS" who, on p1, is identified as E W Savory, the current Lodge secretary. Neither Charles nor S D Tuckey appear in Savory's account of the lodge's history; suggesting that they were not ever important figures in it. Neither of them were named amongst the founders of the lodge's Chapter either. On pp36-37 Charles appears in the list of the lodge's WM's but isn't listed as having been its secretary or treasurer; nor is S D Tuckey so perhaps he only served for a short time. History of the lodge's chapter: pp43-44.

A note about freemasonry magazines as sources: run with very few staff, they were dependent on lodge officers sending in accounts of meetings. During the 1890s, for example, Imperial Lodge 1694 was holding its regular five meetings per year but reports of only a few were published, usually those of the meeting at which the new WM was installed.

Freemasons' Chronicle of March 1896 p7 an account of a meeting of Imperial Lodge 1694 in February 1896 states that S D Tuckey was the lodge secretary at this time.

The Freemason November 1891 p8 Charles was at Imperial Lodge 1694's installation meeting in October 1891 at a hotel at 24 Victoria Street London.

The Freemason December 1893 p9 by 1893 Imperial Lodge 1694's meetings had moved to Cloots' Restaurant. Charles was the last in the list of named members in the report. As usual, the meeting and installation process were followed by a dinner.

Freemasons' Chronicle October 1898 p11 Imperial Lodge 1694 had moved its meeting-place again, to the Pier Hotel Chelsea. This report is of a special meeting held to inaugurate the lodge's Lodge of Instruction. Charles was there but only as the lodge's WM-elect.

QUATUOR CORONATI 2076

The Freemason July 1892 p15 report on the lodge's annual St John festival meeting, on 24 June. This was the first lodge meeting that Charles attended.

The Freemason regularly reported on the meetings of Quatuor Coronati lodge 2076. Charles attended some meetings but not very many, and none after 1896. He appears in the list of those present in the following issues:

The Freemason 1894 January issue p6; March issue p5; May issue p9.

The Freemason 1895 July issue p15.

The Freemason March 1896 p3; November 1896 p4.

Ars Quatuor Coronati volume VII 1894 p36 - Charles attended the meeting of Friday 5 January 1894 at which GD member Frederick Crowe gave a talk on Continental Lodge Jewels and Medals. Crowe was a well-known collector of freemasonry regalia. At the end of the volume, on unnumbered pages: the list of Corresponding members includes Dr Lloyd Tuckey of 33 Green Street; joining date May 1892.

Ars Quatuor Coronati 2076 volume VIII 1895 p1 report on the 10th-anniversary Conversazione. Other GD and lodge members who were there included Robert Palmer-Thomas, William Wynn Westcott, Frank Tate Ellis and Frederick W Wright.

Ars Quatuor Coronati 2076 volume XIII 1900: Charles is no longer in the corresponding members list.

SOCIETAS ROSICRUCIANA IN ANGLIA

Transactions of Societas Rosicruciana Metropolitan College 1893-94 p5-6 and 1897-98 p3.

SOCIETY FOR PSYCHICAL RESEARCH

Journal of the Society for Psychical Research volume 2 1885-86. Published by the Society and distributed to members only - it wasn't for sale to the public. On p57 new members included George Frederick Rogers of Caius College Cambridge; p88 the Society already had some works by Liébault in its library.

Journal of the Society for Psychical Research volume 4 1889-90. Published by the Society at its offices at 19 Buckingham Street Adelphi. On p49 April 1889, the list of new members includes C Lloyd Tuckey MD of 14 Green Street Grosvenor Square. On p203 confirmation that all members had to be elected, even associate and corresponding ones.

Definitely the Journal of the Society for Psychical Research, report on the meeting of the Society held on 2 June 1893. However, I was sent this information in an email and haven't been able to discover which page the report was on. Professor W Ramsay's talk was: Experiments with Anaesthetics. Edward Maitland was also at the meeting and described experiments with chloroform undertaken by a woman doctor. The report of the meeting didn't name the doctor but gave enough information about her to make it very clear that Anna Bonus Kingsford was meant; Dr Kingsford combined practising medicine with being a mystic. She interpreted what she experienced while under chloroform as confirmation of her belief in the existence of four planes of being: spiritual; psychic; astral/magnetic' and physical/material. Not conclusions Charles agreed with.

Proceedings of the Society for Psychical Research volume 11 1895 p604, p623 Charles Tuckey as a full member, now at 33 Green Street.

Proceedings of the Society for Psychical Research volume 15 1900-01 p103 a review by Charles Tuckey of Dr J M Creed's My Experience of Hypnotic Suggestion as a Therapeutic Agent. On p485 a list of current Council members includes both Charles and George Frederick Rogers. On p507 a third new address for Charles although it may just be the result of street renumbering by the Post Office: 88 Park Street.

Journal of the Society for Psychical Research volumes 22-23 1925 p115 a short announcement of Charles Tuckey's death "on August 12th, 1925". On p22 of the Journal's October 1925 issue: an obituary, focusing on his varied work for the Society; and a note that Charles had left the Society £50 in his Will. There was also an appreciation by Dr Arthur Percy Allan (known as Percy) a fellow hypnotherapist and member of the Society, who had been a friend of Charles since his days as an undergraduate at Guy's Hospital in the late 1880s/early 1890s.

References to Charles' own poor health: the obituary above. Two more elliptical ones:

The Monthly Homoeopathic Review 1882 p326 Homoeopathy in Spain.

Psycho-therapeutics, or Treatment by Sleep and Suggestion by C Lloyd Tuckey MD. London: Baillière Tindall and Cox 1889: Chapter 1 p3 mentions a trip he made to Jamaica.

Spain and the West Indies are places that you might go if you were an enthusiastic traveller with a yen for rather out-of-the-way destinations; but you might also go to them in search of a warmer climate. A warm climate, especially warm winters, was a typical prescription for patients in poor health who could afford to pay for it.

SPIRITUALISM

Light: A Journal of Psychical Occult and Mystical Research volume 9 January-December 1889. Published London: Eclectic Publishing Co Ltd of 2 Duke St Adelphi. Just noting here that issue number 451 published Saturday 24 August 1889, mentioned an attempt to establish a London Hypnotic Society to encourage the use of hypnotherapy in healing. I couldn't see any other reference to such a Society but it does illustrate that the idea of hypnotism as an aid to medical treatment was around at the time.

Light: A Journal of Psychical, Occult and Mystical Research volume 14 number 681 Saturday 27 January 1894 p38. I'm not sure of the identification of the guest named only as "Miss Moffat". Two Miss Moffats were members of the GD: Sophia and her younger sister Kate.

Borderland: A Quarterly Review and Index volume 1 1894. Editor W T Stead; editorial address 18 Pall Mall East. Publishing office 125 Fleet Street: p20.

Borderland: A Quarterly Review and Index volume 2 1895. Volume 2 pp 88-92: list of member/subscribers. On pp25-32 an article by a writer identified only as 'X': The New Witchcraft: the Dangers and Uses of Hypnotism - nicely illustrating the kind of prejudice Charles was up against in his attempts to establish hypnosis as a medical tool.

Borderland: A Quarterly Rvw and Index. Editor W T Stead Volume 4 covers January 1897 to the last ever issue, October 1897. On p390 Stead said that the magazine's first issue had been published in July 1893; but the British Library only had issues from 1894.

THEOSOPHY

Theosophical Society Membership Registers 1889-1901.

Just noting here that Professor Liébault's work was known to members of the TS. Colonel Olcott visited him in 1891: see Old Diary Leaves: the True History of the Theosophical Society by Henry Steel Olcott. Madras: Theosophical Publishing House. Volume 4 published 1931 and covering 1887-92. Pp393, p399-404.

Charles' conclusions about hypnotism and the occult: see the PUBLICATIONS section but particularly Occult Review editor Ralph Shirley. Published London: William Rider and Son Ltd, 164 Aldersgate St EC; and Phillip Welby of Henrietta St WC. Volume 1 number 2, issue of February 1905 p51-56: Charles' article Some Phases of Hypnotism. In this article, Charles criticises the work of Dr Charcot and others at the Salpêtrière mental institution in Paris. Charles didn't think that "hysterical" women were suitable subjects for experiments in hypnotism; his own research had suggested that Oxford and Cambridge undergraduates were better!

FAMILY BACKGROUND

In the last years of the first World War Charles' younger brother, Rev James Grove White Tuckey, compiled a pedigree of the Tuckey family. Rev James was able to trace them as far back as a Thomas Tuckey of Worcestershire, whose son Timothy moved to Cork in 1657. In the following three centuries the Tuckeys were prominent businessmen, Church of England clerics, and doctors in Cork, Waterford and later Dublin. They married into other professional families and into the landed gentry, creating a web of relations-by-marriage that stretched all over the southern-most counties of Ireland. Charles Tuckey was related to GD member Irene Augusta Lloyd through this clan-like cousin-hood, probably several times over.

Sources:

Burke's Landed Gentry of Ireland 1863 and subsequently in 1871 issue p803: the Lloyd family of Lloydsborough and Cranagh/Cranagh co Tipperary; who claimed descent from the Welsh family Lloyd of Bodidris. I got completely lost in this! - trying to tie down exactly how Irene Lloyd and Charles Tuckey were related. I did manage to establish to my own satisfaction that they definitely had a common ancestor in the 18th-century John Lloyd of Lloydsborough and his wife Mary née Otway.

Rev James Tuckey's wide-ranging family pedigree can be read online at www.corkpastandpresent.ie IF you've got time to spare to find it! It's much easier to do what I was doing when I came across it: googling using Tuckey + pedigree. Then, it's more or less the first response in the queue. The Rev James' original article was published in the Journal of the Cork Historical and Archaeological Society, issue of 1919. For Colonel James Grove White of Kilbyrne, after whom the Rev James Tuckey seems to have been named, see p247. Some members of the Grove White family also appear in www.thepeerage.com.

CHARLES CAULFIELD TUCKEY of Doneraile, father of the GD's Charles, and family historian Rev James. His second name may be spelled 'caulfEild' - I've seen both spellings though the one I am using seems to occur more often.

The Tuckey family's first medical man was John Tuckey (1711-62) who worked in Dublin. His younger son, Davys Tuckey, married Isabella, daughter of Charles Caulfield of Killyman. The GD member's father, Charles Caulfield Tuckey, was Davys and Isabella's eldest son. Charles Caulfield Tuckey followed his grandfather into the medical profession, qualifying in Dublin. He began his working life in Ireland in the 1840s, at Castletown Roche Dispensary but soon moved to England.

By the time the first issues of the Medical Directory were published, in the mid-1850s, Charles Caulfield Tuckey was working as a GP in Canterbury, and that's where Charles the GD member grew up. There's never any mention in the Medical Directory entries, however, of his long association with homoeopathy, details of which I found on the sueyounghistories website which specialises in the careers of homoeopathic practitioners. The sueyoung's account of Charles Caulfield Tuckey doesn't give dates for when he was working at the Manchester Homoeopathic Hospital and the Homoeopathic Dispensary in Preston; but the early 1850s and possibly the late 1840s seem the most likely period. He was also in private practice as a homoeopath at Bow Lane, Fishergate Hill Preston, using homoeopathy.

Perhaps Charles Caulfield Tuckey continued to dispense homoeopathic cures when in practice in Canterbury. It's very likely that he did, because - once established in Kent - he was an important figure in the circle of people who set up the London Homoeopathic Hospital in 1858 and ran it thereafter; although he doesn't seem ever to have been a staff-member. He will have known Dr George Wyld, later a member of the Theosophical Society and friend to many GD members (though he was never in the GD himself); and the Rosher family, financial benefactors and administrators of the London Homoeopathic Hospital (Charles Rosher was a GD member).

The sueyounghistories website mentions one publication by Charles Caulfield Tuckey: A Dialogue on Homoeopathy. The British Library has a copy of it: published in London, 1856.

Sources:

Rev James Tuckey's family pedigree, seen online at www.corkpastandpresent.ie. It's a reproduction of the original article which was published in the Journal of the Cork Historical and Archaeological Society, issue of 1919.

Website sueyounghistories.com - entry for Charles Caulfield Tuckey and note the Tuckey heraldic shield. See also the entry for George Wyld.

There's an obituary of Charles Caulfield Tuckey in the British Homoeopathic Journal 1895. I haven't been able to run a copy of this to earth so far (June 2016) but I imagine the sueyoung's website got its details of his homoeopathic involvement from it.

The British Homoeopathic Review volume 3 1859 p17, p329.

The delightfully-entitled Some Local and General Excrescences of Homoeopathy 1858 by John Fitzgibbon Geary: p5 and just noting here that the Duke of Wellington was a supporter of homoeopathy.

Monthly Homoeopathic Review 1882 p298, p304, p370.

Annals of the British Homoeopathic Society and of the London Homoeopathic Hospital 1885. This was a google snippet so I couldn't see the page number.

Journal of the British Homoeopathic Society volume 3 1895 pxviii in a list, probably of members, with a date, probably their date of election: Dr Charles Caulfield Tuckey AB MB Dublin LRCSI; of Charleville Kew; with the date 1855.

North American Journal of Homoeopathy volume 43 1895 p376 a note of Charles Caulfield Tuckey's death.

The Royal Homoeopathic Hospital Great Ormond St London 1849-1949 printed for the hospital by Maxwell Love and Co of NI: p21: H Rosher was the hospital's treasurer 1859-80; and beginning p22 a list of senior staff members, which includes Charles Tuckey the GD member, but not his father.

The medical directories. Like Who's Who, they are dependant on information sent in by the doctors who are listed in them; so it must have been a choice of Charles Caulfield Tuckey not to tell the compilers that he used homoeopathy. The earliest ever issue of the Medical Directory was in 1846 and covered London only. By 1850 doctors practising in the English provinces (including Wales), or abroad with the forces, were listed but there was still no coverage of Scotland or Ireland.

Medical Directory 1855 was the first one in which there was an entry for Charles Caulfield Tuckey. In the 'Provinces' section p442 at Canterbury; though with no full address, suggesting he hadn't been in the town for very long. AB and MB Dublin 1841. LRCS Ireland 1840. Licensed to practice midwifery Dublin 1839.

Medical Directory 1860 p809 in Canterbury at 1 St Margaret's St.

In the issue Medical Directory 1866 p538 there was a change of address within Canterbury, to 4 St Dunstan's Court. Then all the details are the same until the mid-1870s when he isn't listed at all.

Pamphlets on Biology: Rofoid Collection volume 279 1876 p24 Charles Caulfield Tuckey was working with fever patients at Bantry Hospital.

Around 1880 he returned to England:

Medical Directory 1881 p742 lists Charles Caulfield Tuckey at the house called Charleville in Kew. No street name was given.

Medical Directory 1882 p753 he was listed with the Kew address; but as retired, and I presume he didn't ever practice medicine in Kew.

Medical Directory 1896 volume 2 p1820 in its list of practitioners who had died since the last issue.

CHARLES AND ELIZABETH TUCKEY

Charles Caulfield Tuckey was married twice. In 1843, in Doneraile county Cork, he married Elizabeth, daughter of William Lloyd of Limerick and his wife Jane. They had six children: a son Charles who was probably born in Ireland (as I haven't found any record of him) and who died in childhood; Janet, born in 1844 in Ireland and probably the eldest of them; Isabel, also born in Ireland in 1850; Deborah who was born in Preston in 1852; a second son named Charles - the GD member, Charles William Lloyd Tuckey, born in 1854 just after the family settled in Canterbury; and James the family history compiler, born 1864.

By census day 1861 the original son called Charles had died, and the birth of James the youngest child was three years ahead. The rest of the family were at 4 St Dunstan's Street in central Canterbury where they were probably living above Charles Caulfield Tuckey's consulting rooms. The family consisted of Charles Caulfield; his wife Elizabeth (Eliza on the census entry); Janet, mis-named 'jane' on the census entry; Isabel; Deborah, known as Dibby, perhaps the sister the GD member was closest to; and Charles the future GD member. Elizabeth Tuckey was keeping house with a cook and a housemaid; if Charles Caulfield Tuckey employed anyone in his medical practice, they were not living with the family.

1861 was the only time Charles Lloyd Tuckey the GD member was living with his parents, in England, on census day. In 1871 the Tuckeys were not in the UK at all; they were probably in Ireland, visiting relations. And by 1881 there had been many changes in the family. By far the biggest of those changes was the death of Elizabeth Tuckey, in Canterbury early in 1875. Charles Caulfield Tuckey gave up his practice in Canterbury very soon afterwards and went to work in Ireland for a while. He remarried quickly as well, just a year after he'd been widowed. His second wife was Susanna Love (or SusannaH - the sources are undecided on the correct spelling). Charles Caulfield retired around 1880, and he and Susanna set up home in Kew, in a house called Charleville. Charles Caulfield Tuckey continued to live there until his death in February 1895; and Susanna until her death in September 1899.

When Charles Caulfield Tuckey died, he left a tidy sum - more than £21000 in personal estate alone. Charles the GD member and his brother the Rev James were the elder Charles' executors. Relations between the elder Charles' children and their step-mother Susanna, seem to have been good and Charles the GD member was named as Susanna's executor, Rev James being in South Africa at the time of her death.

Sources:

Sources: census 1891; probate registrations 1895, 1899.

Rev James Tuckey's family pedigree, seen online at www.corkpastandpresent.ie, originally published in the Journal of the Cork Historical and Archaeological Society, issue of 1919.

Familysearch Ireland-ODM GS film number 0897422 IT 5: baptism of Elizabeth Lloyd 18 July 1821 at St Michael Limerick. Parents: William Lloyd and wife Jane. I tried looking for a baptism record for Charles Caulfield Tuckey at Familysearch, but couldn't find one. I also couldn't find any records of the baptisms in Ireland of Charles and Elizabeth's daughters Janet and Isabel.

Familysearch Ireland-ODM GS film number 962669: marr of Charles Caulfield (sic) Tuckey to Elizabeth Lloyd 9 November 1843 in Doneraile co Cork.

Familysearch also had a series of tax assessments for Charles Caulfield Tuckey, resident of Canterbury. The earliest in the series was for tax year 1862/63; the latest was for 1874/75.

Familysearch Ireland Calendar of Wills and Administrations 1858-1920 GS film number 100978 image number 00395 named Charles Caulfield Tuckey as a beneficiary of a Will where probate was granted in Guernsey on 17 May 1876. I couldn't see whose Will this was, but Elizabeth Tuckey was the most likely person.

CHARLES TUCKEY'S EDUCATION

Both Charles and his brother James went to King's School in Canterbury.

Source:

The Lancet 1925 volume 2 p411 issue of 22 August 1925: obituary of Charles Lloyd Tuckey. Who Was Who 1941-50 p1168 entry for Rev James Grove White Tuckey.

WORK/PROFESSION

Charles Tuckey the GD member followed his father and great-grandfather into the medical profession. He began his training at King's College London and then moved to Aberdeen University. His mother's death, early in 1875, came a few months before he took his MB CM exams. He qualified MD, also at Aberdeen University, in 1884.

Charles was like his father, in being prepared to use cures that were unorthodox and frowned on by the powers-that-be in the medical profession. The earliest job I've found for him was as a medical officer at the Royal Homoeopathic Hospital. He worked there from 1878 to 1884. It was an honorary appointment, but the hospital did have a hierarchy up which the doctors could progress. Charles began his working life there as assistant physician; by the time he left, he'd been promoted to physician. He also acted as the hospital's honorary secretary in 1883 and 1884, when it was raising money for a purpose-built hospital.

Charles only ever had one other job working in a hospital - from around 1890 to 1894 he was visiting physician at the Margaret Street Infirmary for Consumption. This too was an unpaid appointment. Charles earned his keep as most doctors did at the time, from treating private patients.

Charles first set up his private practice in 1878 at 21 Henrietta Street, off Cavendish Square and at that stage and for several years more he was in general practice. He always lived in rooms above his consulting rooms. He moved several times. From 1884 to 1899 - the years of his greatest interest in the occult - he was living and in practice at 14 Green Street. In 1899 he went to 88 Park Street. He was still at Park Street in 1910 but by 1915 had moved again, to 47 Upper Brook Street. This was his last address as a practitioner: he retired in 1917 and left London. The houses Charles chose were all in the Mayfair/Oxford Street area, wherein lived the kind of person who could afford the prices he would have been charging for his private therapy sessions. On the day of the 1901 census, Charles had his unmarried sister Janet keeping house for him at 88 Park Street. She was running the household with the help of a cook and a housemaid. It's possible that Charles' sister Deborah had been living with him for the past year or two; but on census day she was visiting friends, and later in 1901 she got married. For more on Janet and Deborah, see the FAMILY sections below.

Charles' interest in the occult suggested he saw the importance of the mind in the health and illness of the body. A need for some kind of evidence as to how the link worked became especially necessary to Charles when he decided to try using hypnosis on some of his patients. In 1888, he spent several weeks at Nancy and a couple more in Amsterdam, learning the technique used by Professor Liébault, who was well-known in Europe (though not so well-known in Britain) for his use of hypnosis as a treatment; and studying how it worked in general practice. In one of his published articles he mentions having also been to hospitals in Paris to see hypnosis used on mental patients; he doesn't say when he made this visit, but 1888 seems a likely date.

After this period learning the basics of hypnotherapy and being convinced that in the right circumstances, it could work, Charles gave up his own general practice and from that time until his own ill-health forced him to give up work, used hypnotherapy to treat the kind of health problems orthodox medicine still struggles with - addiction to drugs and alcohol, neurasthenia, depression, psychosis. Evidence he gave at an inquest in 1910 shows that he also used other alternative approaches to these difficult problems; and sometimes sent his patients to practitioners specialising in alternatives he wasn't an expert in.

Charles became widely known for his use of hypnotism as a treatment for chronic medical conditions. I only have statistics for his work with alcoholism, not for any other problem that his patients brought to him. Between 1897 and 1909 he treated 200 patients for chronic alcoholism. In one-third of those cases, treatment with hypnotherapy had led to a complete cure. That doesn't seem a particularly good success rate to me; but then alcoholism is particularly difficult to treat and perhaps other treatments available at that time did no better.

It mattered to Charles that hypnotherapy should be accepted by the medical profession as a useful technique, in the proper circumstances. He defended it with letters and articles published in the Lancet, whose editorial attitude reflected the hostility of many British doctors to the use of it, especially in the 1880s and 1890s. He gave talks to other doctors; sent articles to magazines for the general reader; and wrote what became (at least during his lifetime) the standard work on the subject, Psycho-therapeutics (for more on that, see the PUBLICATIONS section below).

I'm assuming Janet Tuckey, and possibly Deborah too, moved in with Charles when their step-mother died in 1899 and the house at Kew was given up. By the time Janet died (in 1908) she had left London - probably for health reasons - and on the day of the 1911 census Charles had no family members living with him. He was employing a cook/housekeeper, rather than a woman who just cooked; and a house/parlourmaid. The housekeeper will have carried out a lot of the household management being done by Janet in 1901.

Charles made one more house-move - to 47 Upper Brook Street - before the first World War. When he married Beatrice Wood Marsland, in 1915, she must have come to live with him there. In 1917, however, Charles retired from practice, and they moved to Beatrice's house in Eastbourne. I couldn't find any evidence that Charles had done medical work as part of the war effort. This was probably not to do with any lack of willingness on his part, but because of the illness that forced him to give up his work.

Charles' consultations were, of course, between him, the patient, and the third person Charles insisted should be present while the patient was undergoing hypnosis treatment. Although he wrote up some cases for publication, the patients were always anonymous. However, two of his patients' names are known: one sad case became public during Charles' lifetime; the other one's diary was published many years later.

ALICE JAMES

Alice James was the sister of William James the psychologist and Henry James the novelist. By late 1890, copies of Psycho-Therapeutics were available in the USA and one was read by William James. A year later, Alice was dying of breast cancer after a lifetime of ill-health. Describing Charles' book as "very creditable", William wrote to Alice (who was living in London) to suggest that she call Charles in, to see if hypnosis could help control the pain, and let her sleep. As Alice was so ill, Charles went to her lodgings rather than have her come to him. He called several times between December 1891 and March 1892, using his hypnotherapy technique on Alice and also teaching her nurse, Katharine Loring, how to use it. The sessions were unsuccessful - they didn't relieve the pain and Alice went back to using morphia - and a few days after the last of them, she died.

HENRY BROOKS BROADHURST

Mr Broadhurst had only been a patient of Charles for a week when he committed suicide in Charles' house in Park Street. He had experienced periods of mental illness before, and had tried a number of different cures; when Charles met him he had been ill for three years. A week before his death, Charles and Mr Broadhurst's previous doctor, Robert Dundas Helm, had got together and agreed a programme of treatment for him. The programme was to begin with two other forms of therapy: a treatment with electricity (I wonder how that worked) and sessions of massage. Charles offered to have Mr Broadhurst staying in his house, at least at the outset of the programme, and treatment began at once. Charles was clearly very worried about the man's mental state and I imagine he was thinking that the case illustrated a problem he came up against all too often with new patients: that they had come to him very late in the day. In several of his published works Charles emphasised that hypnotherapy, like any treatment, was most effective if used as soon as possible after the symptoms appeared.

Charles didn't do electro-therapy himself, so he and Dr Helm took Mr Broadhurst to a colleague, Dr Sayer, for that session. Charles himself, or someone who worked for him, did the only massage Mr Broadhurst was given before his death. After those two treatments, Charles then discussed with Mr Broadhurst the possibility of some hypnotherapy sessions. Mr Broadhurst resisted the idea so Charles left him to think it over, hoping he'd feel more positively towards it in a few days. As a result, Mr Broadhurst had not actually had any hypnotherapy when he locked himself in his room one afternoon and shot himself through the head. Charles told the inquest that though Mr Broadhurst was suffering from "aggravated neurasthenia", he hadn't seemed delusional or suicidal in the short time he had been his patient.

It's a pity that the two patients whose names we now know, have to be classed as amongst Charles' failures. Charles found it very difficult to live with the failure of hypnotherapy to help people who needed help so badly: for example, the 200 alcoholics, of whom Charles managed to cure only 60 or so. He once told a young colleague that he found it very "trying" to spend so much time with people who were mentally unstable. I imagine that on days like the day Mr Broadhurst killed himself, it was a lot more than 'trying'.

Sources:

Update February 2017: Gordon Bates has just alerted me to a book which sounds like a good introduction to the work of Tuckey and his fellow psycho-therapists. Philip Kuhn's Psychoanalysis in Britain 1893-1913: History and Historiography has just been published by Lexington Books.

The Lancet 1925 volume 2 p411 issue of 22 August 1925: obituary of Charles Lloyd Tuckey though with no mention of his work at the London Homoeopathic Hospital.

Homoeopathy:

The Royal Homoeopathic Hospital Great Ormond St London 1849-1949 printed for the hospital by Maxwell Love and Co of NI: p22 et seq for the list of the Hospital's honorary medical and surgical officers; including George Wyld of the Theosophical Society 1852-60 and Charles Lloyd Tuckey 1878-84. Charles' father is not in the list.

The Monthly Homoeopathic Review 1882 p532.

The Monthly Homoeopathic Review 1883 p373.

The Monthly Homoeopathic Review volume 28 1884 p364; p753 report on a fund-raising meeting at which Charles Tuckey was present as honorary secretary; and a Mr H Rosher - a relation of GD member Charles Rosher - as Treasurer.

Other medical references; although Charles' work in homoeopathy is not mentioned in them:

Medical Times and Gazette 1875 volume 2 issue of 14 August 1875 p200.News:

General Medical Council Registers 1883 to 1925.

Medical Times and Gazette 1884 volume 1 issue of 26 April 1884 p582.

Kelly's Post Office Directory 1884 trades directory p1806 under physicians: Charles Lloyd Tuckey is at 14 Green Street Grosvenor Square. While other doctors listed here did mention that they used homoeopathy, Charles chose not to do so.

Kelly's Post Office Directory 1891 street directory p379 at 14 Green Street Mayfair. I looked here to see if the house was divided into flats. It wasn't, so Charles was the sole householder.

Kelly's Post Office Directory 1895 street directory p402 for Green Street and p580 for Park Street. I wasn't able to work out exactly when he moved: no numbers on Green Street between 8 and 19 were listed; and 88 Park Street was divided into apartments with only one resident listed.

Kelly's Post Office Directory 1899 trades directory physicians p2262 Charles Lloyd Tuckey was at 88 Park Street by this time.

Medical Directory 1910 volume 1 London p340.

Medical Directory 1915 issue London list p359 Charles Lloyd Tuckey now at 47 Upper Brook Street.

Medical Directory 1917 Charles Lloyd Tuckey is still listed in the London section.

Medical Directory 1918 volume 1 p1062 as “retired”; current address Ingarsby, Silverdale Road Eastbourne.

His use of hypnotherapy: see the PUBLICATIONS section below.

For the number of alcoholism cases Charles treated:

Everybody’s Magazine volume 20 1909 p537: not an article, but a letter by Charles: The Power of Suggestion.

In the Lancet, often showing what Charles was up against:

Lancet 1888 volume 1 January-June p1110 issue of 2 June 1888: use of hypnotism as an anaesthetic at Vienna General Hospital. The Lancet’s view was that use of hypnotism too regularly on any one patient “produces in the majority of cases a marked psychological feebleness”.

Lancet 1888 volume 2 July-December p985 issue of 17 November 1888: its use in cases of “hysteria” had been discussed at a meeting of the Neurological Section of the New York Academy of Medicine.

Lancet 1889 volume 2 issue of 12 October 1889 letter from Charles, written London 8 October 1889. The formation of a Hypnotic Society was being suggested. Charles felt that an attempt to found such a society in England wouldn’t be successful. He noted that practitioners in Europe - where hypnotherapy was an accepted medical treatment - weren’t aware of the prejudice of many British doctors against it.

Lancet 1890 volume 1 January-June p771 issue of 5 April 1890: Dr Milne Bramwell of Goole had demonstrated hypnosis to a group of doctors, on patients at a dentist’s surgery in Leeds.

Lancet 1890 volume 2 July-December p379 issue of 16 August 1890, in the journal’s report on that year’s British Medical Association conference. The Lancet mentioned in passing that the use of hypnosis had been discussed at the conference; but did not give details of what had been said.

Lancet 1891 volume 2 July-December p1024 issue of 31 October 1891: letter from Charles written Grosvenor Square 27 October 1891 grumbling about a “hypnotic séance at the Aquarium” due to be given by the visiting American, Professor Germane. Charles was particularly annoyed at a publicity leaflet he’d been sent, in which named members of medical profession were listed as having lent the séance their support; so soon after the BMA had denounced just this use of hypnosis as entertainment. One of the doctors lending his support to the seance was named by Charles as “Dr Wynn Westcott” - head not only of the GD but also of Societas Rosicruciana in Anglia. It’s very clear from the letter that Charles despaired of ever getting British doctors to accept hypnotherapy, if this was the attitude they took to it.

Lancet 1892 volume 1 January-June p1304 issue of 11 June 1892: review of George C Kingsbury’s The Practice of Hypnotic Suggestion. The Lancet’s attitude was overtly hostile, although the prejudice of the (anonymous) reviewer against hypnotherapy seems to have been partly on the grounds that it was something widely used in Europe.

Lancet 1892 volume 2 July-December p803 issue of 25 September 1892 printed a letter from Charles, defending hypnotherapy against an attack by William Dale. Dale had been responding in his turn to an article by a Dr Robertson recently published in the Lancet under the title Charles had probably invented - Psycho-Therapeutics.

From 1893 there was less coverage of hypnotism in the Lancet - its editors obviously thought the subject had had its day in the sun. If Charles sent letters to the magazine or gave talks on the hypnotherapy to meetings of medical societies, the Lancet didn't publish them. He only reappears once more in 1910:

Lancet 1910 volume 2 July-December p1765 issue of 17 December 1910 coverage of the anaesthetics section at a big meeting of the Medical Society of London; in which Charles took part and several papers on the use of hypnotism as an anaesthetic were read. Just noting, here, that the inquest on Mr Broadhurst wasn't covered at all in the Lancet. Perhaps that is some indication of a change in their attitude towards hypnosis. It's more likely, though, that they didn't want to give the incident any more publicity than it was already getting; as bringing the medical profession into disrepute.

Alice James:

Alice's ill-health - which contemporary doctors were unable to identify, let alone cure - is well documented in letters and diaries etc within James family. It has also been the subject of several case studies since.

The Correspondence of William James volume 7 (of 8) 1890-94. Editors Ignas K Skrupskelis and Elizabeth M Berkeley with Wilma Bradbeer. Charlottesville and London: University Press of Virginia 1999 p114, p115 footnote 6; p586.

The Diary of Alice James originally published in the US as Alice James: Her Brothers and Her Journal; 1934 by Dodd Mead and Co. This edition: Penguin American Library 1982, editor Leon Edel's. Edel's copyright for his introduction is dated 1964 but even at this pre-feminism stage he was suggesting that Alice's ailments were a physical expression of her rage and frustration at the kind of limited and unchallenging life her family expected her to lead. In the 1982 Penguin edition: pvii; introduction p2-8; p14-16; and diary p221-222, p229-231.

Modern assessments of Alice's case and Charles' treatment:

Science and the Practice of Medicine in the 19th Century by William Frederick Bynum. Cambridge University Press 1994: p213-217.

The Invention of Telepathy 1870-1901 by Roger Luckhurst. I love the title! Oxford University Press 2002: p239.

At <http://dx.doi.org/10.1176/ajp.139.8.1079-a> an article on Alice's hypnotherapy treatment by Jerome M Schneck. Posted online 2006: American Journal of Psychiatry volume 139 number 8 pp1079.

Henry Brooks Broadhurst:

Times 4 October 1910 p3 County Magistrate's Suicide.

ANY PUBLICATIONS?

Yes, quite a few, with a concentration around the late 1880s/early 1890s when he was trying to explain and justify hypnotherapy both to doctors and to the public.

However, Charles' earliest publications were on homoeopathy:

The Monthly Homoeopathic Review 1882 p326 Homoeopathy in Spain. And p532 Case of Obscure Disease of the Stomach.

Homoeopathic World 1882: Sanguinaria in Neuralgia. I haven't seen a copy of this journal. I found the article mentioned in the Medical Times volumes 9-11 1882 p233 which said that Charles' arguments were based on out-patients he was treating at the London Homoeopathic Hospital.

Charles' earliest article on hypnotism was for the general public:

The Nineteenth Century volume XXIV July-December 1888. Editor James Knowles published Kegan Paul Trench and Co. Charles was amongst some very well-known names in publishing in this journal and the readers of his own article will have included many members of the intellectual elite. Other article-writers in 1888 were W E Gladstone (several times); Beatrice Potter (on social issues); Conan Doyle; Lyon Playfair; Francis T Palgrave of the poetry anthologies; Leslie Stephen, editor of the Dictionary of National Biography; Prince Kropotkin the social revolutionary; Algernon Swinburne; Ferdinand Rothschild; and C Villiers Stanford, looking like he doesn't care for the current worship of all things Wagner.

Charles' article: pp839-50 CLT: Faith Healing as a Medical Treatment. Pp839-840 are the source for Charles' training with Liébault at Nancy; and his trip to Amsterdam to see the work of Dr van Renterghem. It also mentions the latest publication by Professor Bernheim of the Faculty of Medicine at Nancy, another proponent of hypnotherapy: De La Suggestion et de ses Applications à la Thérapeutique originally 1880 2nd edition Paris 1887.

The article also shows in Charles a prejudice which he maintained in later works: against the working-classes as weak-minded and too easily influenced by suggestions made to them while they were under hypnosis. He had reservations about hypnotherapy's ability to treat the middle-classes, whom he saw as more mentally resistant to the technique.

PSYCHO-THERAPEUTICS

I almost put this in a section on its own, as it was such an important work, both for Charles himself, and in the development of psychology-based approaches to medical treatment. It was on its seventh edition when he died. The reviews of the various editions in the Lancet show how much the book had helped change the attitudes of some at least of the medical profession to the use of hypnotherapy, at least in the right circumstances. It contained one of the first uses, if not the first, of the word 'psychotherapeutics'. Its second edition was re-issued in 1998 in the Classics in Psychology Series: A Collection of Key Works. And it has frequently been cited as a reference in works on the history of health care.

It was published at exactly the right time, of course.

Charles' first, modest edition of Psycho-therapeutics was published in mid-1889:

Psycho-therapeutics, or Treatment by Sleep and Suggestion by C Lloyd Tuckey MD. London: Baillière Tindall and Cox 1889. Dedicated to Dr Liébault "in admiration of his genius".

The basic argument of the book is very simple: that certain illnesses and conditions can be treated by suggestions for how to get cured, made to the patient while they were under hypnosis. This first edition was small in many respects: it was only 80 pages long; it didn't have much in the way of case studies in it and none by Charles himself; and its print run was so small that the publishers didn't send a copy to the British Library - the BL's earliest copy is the 1890 2nd edition.

In the next 35 years, Psycho-therapeutics underwent many alterations, growing and developing with its subject. All editions were published by Baillière Tindall and Cox, who must have been very pleased at the results of the slight risk they took in accepting Charles' original manuscript.

The 2nd edition of 1890 still kept the original title. It was also no longer, but the print-run was bigger and it was this edition that made it both to the British Library and to the USA, where Alice James' brother William read it in New England. William was a psychologist.

A third edition was needed by 1892 and this was the first one with the change in title to Psycho-Therapeutics, or Treatment by Hypnotism and Suggestion, rather than 'sleep and suggestion'; researchers perhaps realising by now that people under hypnosis were not asleep. The book kept the change in title throughout its future editions. This edition was also much longer than the first edition and had more case studies in it including cases Charles had treated himself.

There was a fourth edition in 1900, again enlarged and revised; and a fifth in 1907. The 1907 edition obtained the longest review by the Lancet of any so far: the book was becoming impossible for the Lancet to dismiss. It was the first edition to have an introduction that Charles hadn't written himself: he had asked Sir Francis Richard Cruise to do it for him.

In 1913 Charles once again went to work on a new edition - the 6th, which was 431 pages long. Sir Francis Cruise's introduction was kept and a new chapter was added, by Dr Constance Ellen Long, on the relevance to hypnosis of Sigmund Freud's theories. Charles was making sure his book was keeping bang up-to-date. By now the Lancet was welcoming Psycho-Therapeutics and calling it an "excellent introduction" to the subject and praising both its "lucid and pleasant style" and its "scientific and careful character". Such a change from 1889! This edition can be read in full at archive.org.

By 1921, Charles' health was in serious decline, but he was able to produce a seventh edition, with the help of a long-time friend and colleague, Arthur Percy Allan, another physician who used hypnotherapy. Dr Long's chapter on Freud did not appear, on the grounds that the subject now needed a book of its own; but there was a chapter by Dr Allan on the use of hypnotherapy during World War 1. Charles couldn't write about that from personal experience and as always, he was careful not to set himself up as an expert on anything outside the range of what he knew. Though the Lancet still held by its original belief that the medical uses of hypnotherapy were limited - something Charles had never disputed - it still welcomed the new edition and even went as far as admitting that psychotherapy was an important technique in modern medicine.

The reviews:

Lancet 1889 volume 2 p75 issue of 13 July 1889: a review of first edition so short and dismissive that it provoked Charles to write in with an article. To give it credit, the Lancet did publish Charles' response:

Lancet 1889 volume 2 issue of 24 August 1889 pp365-367 Charles' Cases Treated by Hypnotism and Suggestion.

Much more favourably inclined towards Psycho-Therapeutics was Robert William Felkin, future GD member and founder of Stella Matutina. He was sent a copy of Psycho-Therapeutics' first edition to cover it for the Edinburgh Medical Journal where he was a regular reviewer. So excited was he by it and a second book on the same subject - Rudolf Heindenhain's Hypnotism or Animal Magnetism - that he launched into not so much a review as a long and detailed history and defence of the subject which went on through several subsequent issues. I don't think that Charles and Robert Felkin will have known each other personally at the time; though Charles will have heard of Dr Felkin as one of Britain's foremost experts on tropical medicine.

Edinburgh Medical Journal volume 35 July 1889 to June 1890 beginning p240 issue of September 1889; last episode in p1036 issue of May 1890.

There was a more orthodox review of the book's third edition in EMJ volume 37 July 1891-June 1892; issue of March 1892 pp853-854; this review was anonymous. This was also a positive review, noting how much such a book was needed, and welcoming Charles' additions to the theory of the subject. The reviewer also praised Charles' use of case studies - 33 taken from the work of European practitioners and 28 from his own practice - saying that they illustrated exactly which kinds of illness hypnotherapy could treat, and which it couldn't.

The Lancet maintained its dismissive attitude:

Lancet 1892 volume 2 July-December pp777-778 issue of 1 October 1892: three-line review of the 3rd edition.

Lancet 1907 volume 2 July-December issue of 10 August 1907: review of the 5th edition.

Lancet 1913 volume 2 July-December: p1551, a review showing somewhat of a change of heart and including the praise I've quoted above. The reviewer noted that Charles' main alterations were to chapter 7, which was now full of case studies of Charles' own patients; he no longer needed those of other practitioners.

Lancet 1921 volume 2 July-December p706 issue of 1 October 1921.

Psycho-Therapeutics: modern reissue of its second edition.

Classics in Psychology Series: A Collection of Key Works. 1998, edited and with an introduction by Robert H Wozniak.

I can't now find where it was that I read that Charles had sent a copy of the Psycho-Therapeutics first edition to the explorer and traveller Sir Richard Burton. See wikipedia for plenty of information on Burton, including evidence which suggests that the two men are most unlikely to have met.

That's the end of my section on Psycho-Therapeutics. In the next few years, Charles wrote a series of articles on hypnotherapy for a variety of magazines:

ON HYPNOTISM

Brain: A Journal of Neurology volume XIV published New York and London: Macmillan and Co 1891. It was the official magazine of the Neurological Society of London which - in another sign of the times - had been founded in 1888. On pp539-556 as part of the magazine's series 'Critical Digests': Charles, On Hypnotism. Charles was not a member of the Society. Despite this, the members thought of him as the best person to survey the recent glut of publications on the subject of hypnotism and its uses. He's not in the members' list. Some well-known names who were members: Herbert Spencer, and Francis Galton.

THE APPLICATIONS OF HYPNOTISM

The Contemporary Review volume LX July-December 1891; in the issue of November 1891 pp672-86. This article had similar aims to the one Charles had published in the Nineteenth Century. The differences between the two are down to the rather different readership of the two magazines; and to Charles assuming rather more knowledge of the subject amongst his 1891 readers than his 1888 readers are likely to have had. He spent more time, in this article, discussing the various theories about how hypnotism worked and what kind of state, the state of being hypnotised was. And trying to address public anxiety about such questions as the possible loss of free will; whether people could be hypnotised at a distance; and whether the medical profession should have sole control of the technique.

CHRONIC ALCOHOLISM

The Value of Hypnosis in Chronic Alcoholism. London: J and A Churchill 1892.

This article first saw the light of day when Charles read a précis of it at the British Medical Association annual conference in 1892, as part of its Psychology set of talks and discussions. The longer article from which the précis was distilled was published as a small pamphlet.

Mention of the talk:

Lancet 1892 volume 2 July-December p383 issue of 13 August 1892.

The reviews:

The Literary World volume 46 1892 p508: review.

Edinburgh Medical Journal volume 38 number 2 January-June 1893 p758-59 issue of June 1893.

The review was anonymous but might have been by Robert Felkin.

A German translation of the pamphlet was published between 1892 and 1901 in the journal Zeitschrift für Hypnotismus. It's mentioned in Hypnotism or Suggestion and Psychotherapy, by Dr Auguste Forel, formerly professor at the Provincial Lunatic Asylum in Zurich. Translated by H W Armit from 5th German edition and published in London and New York by Rebman Ltd 1906.

Rebman Limited had been founded in London; it had moved to New York only a short time before Armit's translation of Forel's book was published. It was a small firm, specialising in medical texts. At least two GD members were involved with it. Hugh Elliott was a shareholder. Robert Felkin's involvement is not so clear but I think he was probably a shareholder too.

Sources for Elliott and Felkin's involvement:

Collected Letters of W B Yeats Volume III 1901-04 p328 note 3.

Shadows of Life and Thought: A Retrospective Review in the Form of Memoirs by Arthur Edward Waite. London: Selwyn and Blount of Paternoster House EC 1938 p173-74.

ASSESSMENT OF THE GOLD CURE

Originally published in The Medical Pioneer July 1893 p149. Later reprinted (probably to reach a wider audience) in British Homoeopathic Review volume 38 issue of 1 January 1894 pp19-23: The Rationale of "the Gold Cure".

Leslie Enraught Keeley's 'gold' treatment for alcoholism was first used in the US in the 1880s but by 1893 there was a clinic in London, and much excitement about it as a cure. As a medical practitioner with experience of treating alcoholics, Charles was asked to assess Keeley's method. He visited the clinic and was made very welcome there, being allowed to watch, and to interview some of the patients. But when he wrote up his visit for The Medical Pioneer, the fact that he hadn't been allowed to know what was in the medicine the patients were taking worried him; particularly as the course of treatment was expensive. His own view, stated in the article, was that no one treatment would cure all alcoholics, as alcoholism had so many causes. He was also very frank about disliking the whole idea of Keeley's cure, because of the secrecy about what was in the medicine, but also because it was "purely...a commercial speculation". He didn't dismiss the cure out of hand. However, he suggested (though not in the terms I'm using) that it worked because of a set of essentially psychological factors: the money and time invested in the cure; that there was a medicine and that it was based on an expensive and rare substance; and timely suggestions made by staff and other patients.

See wikipedia for Leslie Enraught Keeley (1836-1900). Analysis from after Keeley's death found that the medicine used in the Keeley clinics had no gold in it. It did have strychnine in it.

THE PROVINCIAL MEDICAL JOURNAL

Edinburgh Medical Journal New Series volume 1 1897 p636 mentioned an article by Charles which had appeared in Provincial Medical Journal' December 1894 issue; its subject was how Charles had treated a boy with kleptomania. I haven't been able to find a copy of the original journal to check out the details.

After 1894, Charles wrote fewer articles and they were mostly shorter too: I expect he was too busy with his patients for much writing.

MISCHIEVOUS CHILD

Edinburgh Medical Journal New Series volume 1 1897 pp635-36 A Case of Mischievous Morbid Impulse in a Child, Treated by Hypnotism

SOME PHASES OF HYPNOTISM

This article has the distinction of being the only one Charles wrote for any esoteric journal. It appeared in the first ever volume of Occult Review, editor Ralph Shirley. Published London: William Rider and Son Ltd, 164 Aldersgate St EC; and Phillip Welby of Henrietta St WC. Volume 1 number 2 issue of February 1905 pp51-56. In this article, Charles set out most succinctly his argument for hypnotism as a phenomenon that could be explained by science - something he was well aware was likely to disappoint this particular group of readers.

NUMBER OF CASES OF ALCOHOLISM

Everybody's Magazine volume 20 1909 p537: not an article, but a letter by Charles: The Power of Suggestion.

PRACTITIONER

The Practitioner volume 86 1911 part 1 January-June: pp185-192: Treatment of Neurasthenia by Hypnotism and Suggestion. In this article, in a magazine specially for GP's, Charles emphasised the importance of them sending patients with neurasthenia for treatment as soon as they are diagnosed. Charles had found that one month of active treatment with hypnotherapy was necessary for every year that the patient had been suffering. Not sending a patient for early treatment increased its cost, as well as the likelihood of it failing.

Charles' article in The Practitioner was the last short work I know of, though in 1911 two more large and complex revisions of Psycho-Therapeutics were still ahead of him.

FAMILY

It's clear from the marriages of Charles' sisters, that even after Charles and Elizabeth Tuckey moved to England, they kept in touch with a wide range of relations - geographically and otherwise. So I include here some details of what happened to Charles' siblings.

JANET TUCKEY

I've speculated that Janet was the eldest of Charles' siblings. She was born in Ireland in 1844. She published some poetry and a book on Joan of Arc, and was one of several contributors to A Dictionary of Employments Open to Women, compiled for the Women's Institute in 1898. On the day of the 1891 census, she was proud to tell the census official that she had an occupation - though I don't suppose it brought in all that much of an income: the official wrote down on the census form that she was an "Authoress". On census day 1891 she and her sister Deborah were living with their father and step-mother at the house called Charleville, in New Garden Road Kew; and I suppose that both sisters continued to live with Susanna until her death in 1899. I've mentioned above that it's possible both of them then went to live with Charles, at least for a year or two. Janet died in July 1908 while staying at Ventnor on the Isle of Wight; but her permanent address by that time was in Caterham. She never married.

ISABEL TUCKEY

Both Isabel and Deborah Tuckey married men who were distantly related to them - both their husbands appear in Rev James Tuckey's family history. Isabel was born in Ireland about 1850. In 1881 she married James Grove White Crofts of the Crofts family of Churchtown. James Crofts had qualified as a surgeon in Ireland in 1878. He had joined the Royal Army Medical Corps and at the time of the marriage, was due to be sent out to India. While he was married to Isabel he was stationed at Faizabad in the North West Provinces of India. Isabel went to India with him and died at Ranikhet, in the foothills of the Himalayas, in April 1886. She had no children. James Crofts married again many years later and had a daughter. He died in 1901, aged 44.

DEBORAH TUCKEY

Deborah was born in 1852 when the Tuckeys were living in Preston. Like Janet, she was still living with her father and step-mother on census day 1891. I've speculated that after Susanna Tuckey's death she went with Janet to live with Charles, but I can't say for sure because on census day 1901 she was staying the night with Robert Wood Marsland and his wife Frances; friends of the Tuckey family. Robert and Frances' daughter Beatrice was about Deborah's age; perhaps they in particular were friends. Many years later, Charles married Beatrice.

Later in 1901, aged 48, Deborah married her distant kinsman Rev Freeman Wills Crofts Gason, a widower with grown-up children. Rev Freeman Gason was vicar of Maynooth, county Kildare. Deborah lived with him in Ireland until his death in 1917. She then returned to England and set up home in Sharnbrook Bedfordshire, where she died in 1924.

The Golden Age mystery writer Freeman Wills Crofts must be related to Deborah's husband; though I couldn't figure out quite how. He was creator of the detective Inspector French, and a series of crime stories involving railway-timetable alibis.

REV JAMES GROVE WHITE TUCKEY

Rev James Tuckey is the only one of Charles Tuckey's siblings who is in Who Was Who. He was the youngest of the five surviving children by a decade, born in 1864 in Canterbury. After school at King's College Canterbury he went to Trinity College Oxford and then studied at Heidelberg University. After several years teaching at Durham University and in Newcastle-upon-Tyne, he joined the army as a regimental chaplain in August 1895. In 1896 he married Emily, daughter of the late George Mason of Manchester; not someone who appears elsewhere on the Tuckey pedigree!

Rev James was with his regiment being besieged at Ladysmith from November 1899 to February 1900 - a very worrying time for his family. He also served at the front in World War I. He was mentioned in despatches several times and after the World War had finished was honoured by appointments as honorary chaplain to George V and to the bishop of Salisbury. He was still in South Africa on census day 1901 and was also abroad on census day 1911.

It was between 1916 and 1919, while he was working as assistant chaplain, general Southern Command, that Rev James compiled the history of the Tuckey family and its ramifications on which I've relied so heavily in this account of his brother's life. He left the army in 1923. He was appointed rural dean of Ripon in 1927 and remained in-post until his retirement in 1930. He died in 1947.

Like his brother Rev James, Charles did not marry someone who figured in Rev James' Tuckey family history. However, he did marry a woman that his family had known for many years; at least from the time his father went to live in Kew, if not from much earlier, when Charles Caulfield Tuckey and Elizabeth had been living in Lancashire.

Beatrice Wood Marsland was the daughter of Robert Marsland. Robert Marsland had been born in Halifax and had started his career as a solicitor in the family firm G and R W Marsland of John Dalton Street in Manchester. However, by the time of Beatrice's birth in 1867, he had moved to London and set up in business on his own account in St Swithin's Lane, City of London. By 1901 he had retired and was living with his wife Frances, Beatrice and his son Reginald at 266 Kew Road Richmond, where they kept house in good style with a cook, a parlourmaid and a housemaid. This was the census day on which Deborah Tuckey was visiting them.

Robert Wood Marsland died later in 1901 and his widow and children moved out of London. On the day of the 1911 census Frances Wood Marsland was living at Ingarsby, Silverdale Road, Eastbourne; though she later moved again, to Bournemouth. Still living with their mother were Beatrice, now 43, and Reginald, now 37. The family was still able to employ a cook, parlourmaid and housemaid.

Charles Tuckey and Beatrice Wood Marsland married in Eastbourne in December 1915. She was 48; he was 61 and may already have had some symptoms of the illness he eventually died of. Charles' obituaries mention the illness but say very little about its symptoms; only that it involved a gradual loss of physical though not mental ability, and that in Charles' last years he needed an increasing amount of nursing care, which Beatrice undertook. Charles may have been planning to retire in any case, but the illness may have hurried this on: 1917 was the last year he appeared in the Medical Directory at the London address and still in practice. By 1918, he had retired, though he was still listed in the directory, at the house in Eastbourne where Beatrice and her mother were living in 1911. For a few years he was still able to attend meetings of the Society of Psychical Research; but between 1917 and 1922 he resigned from the committees he was on, and after 1922 was too ill to make the trip to London.

Sources:

JANET

British Library catalogue has these publications:

1874 Told Near Windsor (A Poem). Gypsy and Eng. 14pp. London: Trübner and Co.

1875 as "contributor" to English Gipsy (sic) Songs. In Romanny (sic) with Metrical Translations. The catalogue gives author as Charles Godfrey Leland (1824-1903) as the book's author; with Janet and an E H Palmer as contributors. London: no publishing firm so it was probably privately printed. I suggest that the contributions of Janet Tuckey and E H Palmer were to render into English metre some accurate but not poetic translations from the original Romany.

1880 Joan of Arc. "The Maid". The catalogue doesn't give a publishing firm so again it was privately printed.

1898 A Dictionary of Employments Open to Women by Mrs Leonora Philipps as main author; with assistants Miss Marian Edwardes, Miss Janet Tuckey and Miss Katharine Esther Dixon. London: Women's Institute.

Probate Registry 1908. Deborah and Rev James were her executors.

ISABEL

Burke's Landed Gentry of Ireland 1886 edition: The Crofts of Churchtown. Some members of the Crofts family are also online at thepeerage.com: James Grove White Crofts is the youngest son of Wills George Crofts and Elizabeth née Grove White (1824-92).

Bengal Directory 1884 p1104, p625. On p785 is the listing for the settlement of Ranikhet. There were very few permanent British residents but the village was the site of a military sanatorium.

Medical Directory 1885 p1339 and in issues of 1890 vol 2 p1528; 1895 vol 2 p1648; 1900 p1867. All issues gave the same information about where and when Dr Crofts had qualified; but no indication of where in India he was working.

Thacker's Indian Directory 1885 volume 1 p547, volume 2 p1082

Thacker's Indian Directory 1886 p1130.

Probate Registry 1887.

Thacker's Indian Directory 1887 p1196.

Lancet 1900 p547 James Grove White Crofts' promotion to Lieutenant-Colonel.

Probate Registry 1901

British Medical Journal 1901 p683 very short obituary.

DEBORAH

Beware! Deborah's husband was one of three men (maybe more) with exactly the same name!

Some details of Deborah's husband at www.thepeerage.com,

Probate Registry 1924.

REV JAMES GROVE WHITE TUCKEY

Oxford University Gazette volume 14 1884 p56.

The British Library has one item by him: The Amphioxus and its Development originally written in German by Berthold Hatschek. Rev James as translator. London: Sonnenschein and Co 1893.

Wikipedia for the Siege of Ladysmith: 2 November 1899 to 28 February 1900.

Hart's Annual Army List issue 1901 p396 Rev James is in it with a date of August 1895 which I'm assuming was the date of his first commission.

London Gazette 1918 but this was a google snippet so I couldn't see the full date: p6515 in King's Birthday honours.

The Durham University Journal 1966 p26

Probate Registry 1948.

Who Was Who 1941-50 p1168.

ROBERT WOOD MARSLAND

London Gazette 9 July 1861 p2853.

London Gazette 30 April 1869 p2580.

London Gazette 4 May 1880 p2896.

Probate Registry 1924; entry for the death of Frances Elizabeth Marsland indicates she was living at Walden, Cromer Road Bournemouth.

DEATH

Charles Tuckey died in August 1925, at Eastbourne. Beatrice remained in Eastbourne and died in 1950.

Sources:

Probate Registry 1925, 1951.

The Lancet 1925 volume 2 p411 issue of 22 August 1925: obituary of Charles Lloyd Tuckey, very complimentary about his Psycho-Therapeutics.

BASIC SOURCES I USED for all Golden Dawn members.

Membership of the Golden Dawn: The Golden Dawn Companion by R A Gilbert. Northampton: The Aquarian Press 1986. Between pages 125 and 175, Gilbert lists the names, initiation dates and addresses of all those people who became members of the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn or its many daughter Orders between 1888 and 1914. The list is based on the Golden Dawn's administrative records and its Members' Roll - the large piece of parchment on which all new members signed their name at their initiation. All this information had been inherited by Gilbert but it's now in the Freemasons' Library at the United Grand Lodge of England building on Great Queen Street Covent Garden. Please note, though, that the records of the Amen-Ra Temple in Edinburgh were destroyed in 1900/01. I have recently (July 2014) discovered that some records of the Horus Temple at Bradford have survived, though most have not; however those that have survived are not yet accessible to the public.

For the history of the GD during the 1890s I usually use Ellic Howe's The Magicians of the Golden Dawn: A Documentary History of a Magical Order 1887-1923. Published Routledge and Kegan Paul 1972. Foreword by Gerald Yorke. Howe is a historian of printing rather than of magic; he also makes no claims to be a magician himself, or even an occultist. He has no axe to grind.

Family history: freebmd; ancestry.co.uk (census and probate); findmypast.co.uk; familysearch; Burke's Peerage and Baronetage; Burke's Landed Gentry; Armorial Families; thepeerage.com; and a wide variety of family trees on the web.

Famous-people sources: mostly about men, of course, but very useful even for the female members of GD. Oxford Dictionary of National Biography. Who Was Who. Times Digital Archive.

Useful source for business and legal information: London Gazette and its Scottish counterpart Edinburgh Gazette. Now easy to find (with the right search information) on the web.

Catalogues: British Library; Freemasons' Library.

Wikipedia; Google; Google Books - my three best resources. I also used other web pages, but with some caution, as - from the historian's point of view - they vary in quality a great deal.

14 May 2017

Find the web pages of Roger Wright and Sally Davis, including my list of people initiated into the Order of the Golden Dawn between 1888 and 1901, at:

www.wrightanddavis.co.uk

***

Marian Charlotte Vibart was initiated into the Order of the Golden Dawn at its Isis-Urania temple in London on 22 March 1898. She chose the motto 'Neschamah', a Hebrew word that indicates she had been studying the Kabbalah (of which more below). At this stage in the history of the GD, record keeping wasn't as good as it had been in the early years, so I can't say for sure how long Marian Charlotte remained a member, or how active she was except that she was never initiated into the GD's inner, second Order.

John Valentine Lacy was initiated on the same evening as Marian Charlotte. He was a friend of the Vibart family.

THE VIBARTS

'Vibart' is a very rare surname. In the censuses between 1841 and 1911 there were never more than 22 people called Vibart living in the UK; though in the early part of the 19th-century there were quite a few living in India. Despite how few of them there were, I'm still not quite sure how they were all related.

I haven't been able to find anyone called Vibart earlier than a James Vibart who lived in Somerset. He's listed on an ancestry 'rootsweb' with birth/death years as 1703/1775. According to that rootsweb page, he married Mary, daughter of Sir John Meredith of Brecon. I think that all the Vibarts who appear on those censuses, and the Vibarts in India, are their descendants; certainly the forenames 'meredith' and 'james' crop up regularly in the 19th-century. Though if someone offered proof to me that they weren't, that wouldn't surprise me, because there's conflicting evidence at ancestry and elsewhere as to exactly how many children the son of James and Mary had, and what their names were.

The son of James and Mary Vibart was James Meredith Vibart (1753-1827) and the sources do agree that he married Juliana Williams (died 1822). James Meredith Vibart (1753-1827) was the first Vibart to work for the East India Company. However, by the 1820s he and Juliana were living at Pitminster, just south of Taunton in Somerset, probably in the same house that James Vibart had done.

The sources agree that James Meredith and Juliana had three sons: Henry; John; and Thomas Gowan. But my rummaging around on the web and in the British Library India Office suggests they had two more sons: another James Meredith, born 1788 and still living in 1861; and Edward; and a daughter Frances Jane (I saw her name spelled the male way, Francis, several times in my searches but she's definitely female). Henry, John and Thomas Gowan went to work for the East India Company's civil service; James Meredith (died 1861) and Edward for its army.

Thomas Gowan Vibart, the third son of James Meredith and Juliana, was born 1798. He is Marian Charlotte Vibart's grandfather. There's a little more information on his career than on those of his older brothers. He undertook the East India Company training at its College of Fort William, Madras, where William Hay MacNaghten was a fellow-student. Thomas Gowan didn't have MacNaghten's facility with foreign languages; which led MacNaghten to a brilliant career in India. Thomas Gowan passed the exam in Bengali very well, but studied only one other Indian language, Persian, scraping a pass in that. He left the College in 1814 and was sent to Bengal where he worked as a magistrate and tax collector. It's no wonder so many Vibarts were happy to brave the dangers of India to work for the East India Company: a list of current employees from the late 1830s gives Thomas Gowan Vibart's salary as 1000 rupees per year, which sounds like a very tidy sum and I imagine his household in India reflected that.

In 1821 Thomas Gowan Vibart married William Hay MacNaghten's sister, Jane Russell MacNaghten. This was a very good marriage from Thomas Gowan's point-of-view, as the MacNaghtens were grantees of the East India Company, had more money (though there were a lot of them for it to go round) and - I think - somewhat socially superior to the Vibarts. Jane and William Hay MacNaghten's father, Francis Workman-MacNaghten, ended a brilliant career in the service of the East India Company as a judge in the Calcutta supreme court; he retired in 1825 and was made a baronet in 1836. During the 1830s he was the chief of the clan McNaughton. Another of Jane's brothers, Elliot MacNaghten, served from 1842 to his death as a director of the East India Company.

Thomas Gowan and Jane had three sons, Meredith James; Francis Elliot; and Elliot Henry; and five daughters, Letitia; Julia; Jane Maria; Matilda; and Eliza Maria. However Thomas Gowan Vibart suffered the fate of very many of those who lived in India: by 1837 he was ill enough to be sent on a long leave to Europe, and he never returned, dying in Leamington Spa in September 1839; his youngest daughter had been born only a few weeks before.

Jane MacNaghten Vibart and her daughters do not appear on the censuses of 1851 or 1861 and they were living in France for at least some of that time, either all year round or in the winter, returning to London for its social season. By 1881, however, she was spending more time in England; though she was still choosing to employ a French lady's maid for herself, and a Swiss nurse for her grandchildren on 1881 census day. She died in 1886, having buried four of her children as well as her husband and even a son-in-law; but her surviving children were all well settled and especially in the case of her daughters, I think this was largely as a result of her own efforts and family contacts.

MEREDITH JAMES VIBART

Thomas Gowan and Jane's eldest child, Meredith James, was Marian Charlotte's father. He was born in 1822 or 1823 in India (I don't know exactly where as I haven't found birth or baptism details for him). He was sent to England (probably aged 8 or 9) in order to go to Harrow School, and left the school in 1838 after being accepted by the East India Company's military seminary at Addiscombe (just outside Croydon) to train for service in their artillery battalions. Getting into Addiscombe was quite an achievement. Entry was by examination and in 1838, 34 young men took the exams but only 14 were taken on. The course lasted two years and pupils' parents had to pay £65 per year in fees; but it was a good investment in the future career of their sons. Fellow pupils during Meredith James' two years included a member of the Prinsep family; and a George Elliot who might be a cousin of Hugh Elliot who became a Golden Dawn member - the Elliot family of west London also had a tradition of working for the East India Company.

Meredith James officially joined the East India Company as a 2nd Lieutenant in June 1840 and spent the next six years in India before going on a long leave, some of which he spent in South Africa at the Cape Colony with Augustus Fortunatus Bellasis (1822-72), East India Company civil servant, archaeologist and artist. The Vibart and Bellasis families were related through a couple of marriages; and the Bellasis family also knew the Forbes family of Bombay - Meredith James' uncle John had married Anna Forbes.

This long leave was a very long one. Meredith James eventually arrived in England after his stay in the Cape Colony in the summer of 1848 and was still there in July 1849 when, against strong opposition (the job was much sought-after), he was appointed one of the two orderly officers at Addiscombe school. The post had always been a two-year secondment, but Meredith James' tenure came to an end after only one, when the school's headmaster died and his successor abolished the job altogether. However, during his short time in-post at Addiscombe, Meredith James met Eliza Blackburn Lloyd.

THE LLOYD FAMILY

Eliza Blackburn Lloyd was one of the 17 children (11 daughters, 6 sons) of Edward Lloyd (died 1859) of Rhagatt in Merionethshire and his wife Frances, daughter of John Edward Madocks. The Lloyds were part of the web of blood-relations and business connections in north Wales and the north Midlands that also took in GD members like Blanche Elliot and Florence ffoulkes (who were cousins). However, they had London connections as well, the best of them to my mind being the 4th daughter Mary Charlotte Lloyd (born 1819), who lived in London with the campaigning journalist and feminist Frances Power Cobbe - though I have to say I haven't found any evidence at all that Eliza and Mary Charlotte were close. Eliza (born 1824) was closer to the 7th daughter, Jane Margaret (born 1822), who in due course married Rev Henry Powell ffoulkes, the uncle of Florence ffoulkes' husband.

Edward Lloyd and his father were both prominent barristers in Wales. Although one of Eliza's brothers, Charles Owen Lloyd, joined the East India Company (to be killed in 1848), the Lloyds had no strong connections with India. It must have been through Welsh or London connections that she and Meredith James met. They were married at Corwen in Merioneth on 1 August 1850.

Now I shall indulge in a bit of speculation and say that my own impression is that Meredith James Vibart did not enjoy being in the army; or did not enjoy being in it in India. He had to work - his family wasn't wealthy - but perhaps life in the army was not living up to expectations. Or perhaps there was something already wrong with his health - it got worse later - to cause him to be allowed to remain outside India for so long while still nominally an East India Company employee. Meredith James may also have worried about how Eliza would cope with India, coming from a family with no experience of living there. On the day of the census in 1851, he and Eliza were still in England. They were renting at house at Melcombe Regis, now part of Weymouth. Meredith James' sister-in-law Frances and her son Francis were staying with them. Frances was the widow of Francis Elliot Vibart who'd died in 1848; three-year-old Francis was their only child.

MEREDITH JAMES AND ELIZA IN INDIA

This section would be a lot better with one contemporary source that I decided not to use. During her short time in India, Eliza Blackburn Vibart wrote back to her sisters a series of letters describing her life there. They are now at the Centre for Maritime Historical Studies, Exeter University. I decided I couldn't justify the expense of going there to read them.

In 1851 Lt Meredith James Vibart may have been trying to find another posting in Britain, but if he was, he failed in the task. By 1853 he had returned to India, taking Eliza with him. He had been promoted to Captain and sent to one of the remotest frontiers India had to offer. In 1854 Marian Charlotte Vibart was born in the new, very English, hill station of Naini Tal (more usually run together as Nainital these days), the last staging post on the way to Almora, on the border with Nepal, where her sister Edith Frances was born in 1856, to complete Meredith James and Eliza's very small (by mid-Victorian standards) family.

Marian Charlotte Vibart's infancy was thus spent in the foothills of the Himalayas, an area beautiful but very remote - even in 1909 the Almora district had only one road paved to British standards. The area had come into East India Company hands in 1814/15 but in the 1850s there were still very few western residents, the Company relying on Gurkha regiments to keep the peace, with a sprinkling of British officers to command them. Missionaries were already present, running an English-language school and a leprosy asylum; but I couldn't find any references to the Church of England having a parish in the area so it's not clear to me how the British managed for Sunday church. As well as leprosy, smallpox was still rife - that must have alarmed the Vibarts. However, the district did have one western-trained doctor, a Dr Pearson, and he and the most senior Company official, Sir Henry Ramsay, began a programme of smallpox vaccination in 1854. As was usual in India, the British lived close together in a cantonment just west of Almora town so that is where Marian Charlotte spent - well, I'm not sure how long. Largely due to Sir Henry Ramsay's foresight and the respect in which he was held by local people, there was very little fighting in Kumaon during the Indian Mutiny/First War of Independence. However, there was some, and an account of it is given in my main source for what life might have been like for the Vibarts in this remote corner of India. All the British officers who were in command during the fighting are named in the account, but Meredith James Vibart isn't mentioned and I think this means that the Vibarts had left Almora, if not by the first outbreak of mutiny (at Meerut - where Meredith James' cousin Edward D H Vibart was stationed - in May 1857), at the very latest by November, when the winter snows rendered coming down from the mountains almost impossible.

The India Office registers for the 1850s don't give any clue as to where Meredith James Vibart was stationed in the 1850s. In the issues of 1854-56 he was on the list of officers of the 8th battalion, Bengal Artillery. The 8th battalion's headquarters were at Cawnpore (now spelled Kanpur or Khanpur) but it was not unusual for individual officers to be sent to serve elsewhere, for example on secondment to native regiments, where they would give expertise and training; except that Meredith James Vibart is not listed as seconded.

I've no idea where the Vibarts were during the Mutiny/First War of Independence except to say that if they had been at Cawnpore they would not have survived. Major Edward Vibart was stationed at Cawnpore when mutiny broke out there in June 1857. His wife Emily and their four youngest children were with him. All of them were murdered in one of the most savage episodes of the whole mutiny.

The India Office register of 1857 listed Meredith James as having been transferred to the 6th battalion, whose headquarters were in the Punjab, but I'm not sure he ever actually served there. I think the Vibarts may have been extremely lucky and been in Calcutta by late 1857, not as refugees from the fighting but in order to negotiate Meredith James' retirement from the East India Company. He was transferred to the Company's invalid list in March 1858 and the Company began to pay him a pension in that month. It seems rather soon - early 1858 - for him to have to be pensioned off as a result of injuries received. Of course, he could have received an injury that made it impossible for him to continue on active duty, but he was being pensioned off at a time when the East India Company needed every fit man it could get, and I do wonder about the very long leave of 1846-51. Was Meredith James Vibart ill by the mid-1840s? - was a long period in a mild, dry climate prescribed for him? In which case malaria is a likely candidate for the illness he was suffering from. He may have been sent to serve in Almora because the climate was thought to be kinder to those suffering from malaria's tendency to recur; only to find that that the disease was endemic in parts of Kumaon as well as on the Indian plains. Back in Britain, Meredith James Vibart didn't die for another 30 years; though he never lived in Norfolk or Hayling Island, also places notorious for recurring fevers.

THE VIBARTS IN BRITAIN

When Meredith James Vibart was put on the Company's invalid list, his pension will have reflected the fact that he had only served the Company for twenty years. Returning to Britain, he seems at first to have had a long period of rest. In the longer term, though, he had to find another job. On the day of the 1861 census, Eliza had taken Marian Charlotte and Edith Frances on a visit to her unmarried sister Harriet Frances Lloyd. By this time, only four daughters were still alive of the original 17 Lloyd siblings. Harriet Frances was living in some style (she had a butler and a lady's maid) on a small estate at Nannau Isafon in Merioneth. Meredith James had not gone with his wife and children on this visit. He was out of the UK, perhaps visiting his mother Jane (who wasn't in the UK on that day either) before taking up a new military appointment as an adjutant with the Cheshire Artillery Volunteers. After five years in Cheshire, in 1867 Meredith James moved his family to Edinburgh to take up what was probably a very similar posting with the 1st City of Edinburgh Artillery Volunteer Corps: a man with experience of artillery, to take charge of enthusiastic but unskilled volunteers. He and Eliza were in Edinburgh on the day of the 1871 census.

Although there were so few Vibarts living in the UK, a family of them had settled in Scotland by 1871: George Forbes Vibart, his wife Annie and their sons. Marian Charlotte and Edith Frances were abroad on the day of the 1871 census, however, though they were not visiting their grandmother Jane Vibart - by this time she was living at 29 Belgrave Road Westminster, with her youngest daughter Eliza Maria. Marian Charlotte and her sister had plenty of other relatives to visit, though I don't think they went as far as India to stay with them. Their most likely destination was Belgium, where Meredith James' sister Julia now lived: in 1855 she had married a Belgian aristocrat, Comte Maximilien de Lalaing.

Meredith James was given his final promotion, to Major, in 1873. He may have retired - finally - from the army in 1878. On the day of the 1881 census Meredith James Vibart was staying in lodgings in Glasgow. Eliza, Marian Charlotte and Edith Frances were at the rectory in Whittington, Shropshire, visiting another of Eliza's surviving sisters, Jane, and Jane's husband Rev Henry Powell ffoulkes, archdeacon of Llandaff.

Meredith James Vibart's business in Glasgow may have been connected with his and Eliza's move south. They were living in Hampstead, north London, by 1887 at the latest.

Marian Charlotte Vibart was in her early thirties when a period of change began greater than she had experienced since she had left India as a child. 1886 was a traumatic year for all the Vibarts. Grandmother Jane Russell Vibart and Eliza's brother-in-law Henry Powell ffoulkes both died. And first cousin Francis Meredith Edmund Vibart and his wife Evelyn got divorced. That the marriage had broken down had probably been understood in the family for several years. Evelyn had brought her daughter Violet back from India in 1879, in time to have her second child in Sidmouth where her parents lived. There was nothing particularly unusual in that, as India was seen as a dangerous place for children and infants. However, Evelyn was still in Sidmouth in 1881 and probably didn't return to her husband. Living discreetly apart was preferred by many couples to the public humiliations and social stigma of divorce, but even agreeing on a separation could rupture the husband's army career - Francis Meredith Edmund was on half-pay, all-but-retired, as early as 1884. However, by 1886 Evelyn wanted to marry someone else (someone a great deal richer than her first husband) and divorce proceedings began, I would imagine at her instigation. The divorce didn't create a public scandal: no co-respondent was named when the case came up in court, and I couldn't find any reports on the hearing on the web or in the Times so the evidence heard wasn't that salacious. However, evidence of marital misconduct would have to have been brought by the spouse who had initiated the proceedings, and it would have been heard in court. No wonder Evelyn's mother-in-law, Frances Louisa Vibart, had gone to live abroad.

In 1887 Edith Frances married Frank Grafton Wignall; their son John Dighton Wignall - Meredith James Vibart and Eliza's only grandchild - was born early in 1888. This period of upheaval ended when Meredith James Vibart died in the spring of 1890, bringing the inevitable diminution of Eliza's income along with the grief. The 1891 census found Eliza, Marian Charlotte and the three Wignalls all living together in a house called Meadow View, in Burton Lane Hampton. Pooling all its various members' incomes, the household could still afford to employ a lady's maid, a cook, a housemaid and a gardener.

At some time during the 1890s Marian Charlotte Vibart invested some money in a limited company, Biltor Limited, that had been founded to exploit a patented design of pipe or cigarette holder. I haven't been able to find out anything about the company's founder, Emil Alexander Wüterich, so I don't know how Marian Charlotte met him. I think it must have been through Valentine Lacy and her first-cousin George Forbes Vibart (eldest son of John Vibart and his wife Anna Holland Forbes) and his wife Annie. George and Annie had moved to Barnes by the 1890s but had been living in Edinburgh when Marian Charlotte was growing up there, so that she must have known them and their sons very well; and Valentine Lacy, their perpetual lodger, equally well. After their elder son (another George) had followed the well-trodden Vibart path to India, George and Annie had moved south to be near their younger son, the actor Henry Vibart, whose career on stage and later in films Marian Charlotte must have followed.

I don't know exactly when Biltor Ltd was set up but it was after February 1889 when the patent was granted to Emil Alexander Wüterich as the pipe's designer. I don't know, either, how much money Marian Charlotte invested, or where she had got the money from - perhaps she had inherited it from her grandmother or her father. I can say that no one else in her family invested in the firm, the only other shareholders I've found named anywhere were Emil Alexander and Anna Wüterich, perhaps the inventor's wife or sister. GD member Valentine Lacy went to work for Biltor Limited so there's more about the firm in his biography. In 1902, Biltor Limited and Marian Charlotte as an individual petitioned the patent office for an extension of the 1889 patent but they were refused, though the company continued at least until E A Wüterich's death in November 1927. Her investment gave Marian Charlotte an income or extra income, but perhaps not as much as she'd hoped for as the company was never very successful.

If you've got this far in Marian Charlotte Vibart's biography and are still wondering what sort of person she was, join the club: I realised yesterday (Sunday 12 January 2014) that despite all the work I'd done, I had no idea what she was like. Was she serious or light-hearted? Socially adept or gawky? A devout Christian or someone searching for something to believe in? A dutiful daughter or a restless one? Was she sorry - around 1890 - that she had never married, or glad? How did she spend her days?

Evidence to put a personality to the name is lacking: essentially it's one piece of music and two memberships, of the Theosophical Society and the Golden Dawn.

The one piece of music is a special case. The British Library has one song with music by Marian Charlotte Vibart, setting words from G J Whyte-Melville's long poem Sarchedon: A Legend of the Great Queen (by which he means Semiramis), which was published in three volumes in 1871. The song is for soprano with piano accompaniment and though the sheet music has no date on it, the British Library catalogue has assigned it to 1872. The extract Marian Charlotte set to music is not, in fact, about the ancient Middle Eastern goddess Ishtar, it's section in which a passer-by stops to watch and hear a palm tree bending towards another palm tree, murmuring its love. Perhaps Marian Charlotte chose to call her song 'Ishtar' as an echo of the exotic, Eastern setting of Sarchedon.

Ishtar is dedicated to "Mrs Henry ffoulkes" - that is, Marian Charlotte's aunt Jane Margaret ffoulkes (née Lloyd), the woman she and her mother and sister were staying with on the day of the 1881 census. In 1872, Jane Margaret and her husband Rev Henry ffoulkes had founded the Child's Convalescent Home at Rhyl in north Wales. The Rhyl History Club website that was my best source for the Home suggests that they did so as parents whose own daughter, Gertrude Mary, needed more than the usual level of nursing care: on the 1871 census, the ffoulkes' household included two nurses, which the website thought excessive for a family of three, including only one child. Gertrude Mary died aged only 12, in September 1876; although the Rhyl History Club website gives the cause of death on the death certificate as “inflammation of the bowels” which is a vague - death from such a cause might be the result of a short but catastrophic illness, or a long-term disability.

A note on the sheet music’s front page says that all proceeds from sales of Ishtar (at 3 shillings a copy) were going to be donated to the Child’s Convalescent Home. Marian Charlotte published no more music, as far as I can tell, so Ishtar was a one-off charitable effort, not the beginning of even a stuttering career as a composer. It was a thoughtful and practical gesture to perhaps a favourite aunt, who was trying to help all sick children, not just her own.

After the publication of that one piece of creativity, another 25 years pass before Marian Charlotte Vibart emerges from anonymity to join the Theosophical Society. She applied to become a member in October 1897, only a few months before she joined the GD. By this time she and her family had moved further into London, to 113 Lansdowne Road Kensington Park; perhaps it was now easier than it had been, to go to TS lodge meetings. One of Marian Charlotte’s two sponsors for TS membership was a Lilian Lloyd. Lilian was possibly a relation but she sponsored the applications of quite a few prospective TS members at this time so perhaps the surname is just a coincidence.

Given that Marian Charlotte chose a Hebrew word for her GD motto, it’s safe to say that she had come to the GD through an interest in the Kabbalah. Perhaps she had read Samuel Liddell Mathers’ Kabbala Denudata: The Kabbalah Unveiled, a translation into English of Christian Knorr von Rosenroth’s translation of the first books of the Hebrew Zohar into Latin. Mather’s volume was published in 1887. He had dedicated it to Anna Bonus Kingsford and Edward Maitland, both of whom were members of the TS. Marian Charlotte could also have come across Collectanea Hermetica volume IV, part of a series in which William Wynn Westcott and other members of the GD re-printed hermetic texts with new notes and commentaries. Volume IV reprinted the 1714 translation of Kabbala Denudata by ‘A Lover of Philalethes’ with explanations by Sapere Aude - that is, Westcott himself using one of his GD mottos. I think myself that Marian Charlotte would have needed to be acquainted with members of the GD to come across Westcott’s volume, but she (unknowingly, I should imagine) had several friends and relations who were or would become members - Florence ffoulkes whose husband was Rev Henry Powell ffoulkes’ nephew; Florence’s cousin Blanche Elliot and Blanche’s husband Hugh; and possibly Maud Cracknell, another woman sponsored into the TS by Lilian Lloyd. Any one of them could have recommended her and Valentine Lacy as suitable GD members.

If Marian Charlotte joined the TS because of an interest in the Kabbalah it was likely that she was disappointed by what was being discussed at its meetings. During the 1880s when Kingsford and Maitland had been members, western esotericism and Buddhism had been the two main strands in the TS’s teachings. However, by the late 1890s Annie Besant had taken charge of the TS in England and was leading it towards the teachings of Hinduism. I haven’t found any evidence that Marian Charlotte found Hinduism of interest, though she continued to pay her yearly subscription until 1900. She probably stopped paying when she and her mother, Edith Frances and Frank Grafton Wignall all went abroad - they are not on the 1901 census. Perhaps Eliza Vibart’s sister-in-law Frances Louisa went with them - she’s not on the 1901 census; but she wasn’t on 1891 either so perhaps she was living abroad and they had all gone to visit her.

The Vibarts and Wignalls returned to England in due course; possibly their time abroad was cut short by the sudden death of Meredith James's sister Letitia Campbell in October 1901. There had to be an inquest as Lady Campbell had died - in a very modern manner - from an overdose of a drug she had been taking to help her sleep; evidence from her son-in-law indicated that she had got addicted to it. Marian Charlotte had to be back in England by late 1901 so that she could play her part in the application for the extension of Wüterich's 1889 patent.

Marian Charlotte and her mother, and probably the Wignalls as well, moved into 20 The Avenue Richmond. Marian Charlotte didn't take any part in the upheavals within the GD that led to the formation of its two daughter orders in 1903; and there's no sign from the records available that she joined either Stella Matutina or the Independent and Rectified Rite. Perhaps her mind was taken up with her mother's failing health - Eliza Blackburn Vibart died in November 1905; she left no Will so Marian Charlotte applied for letters of administration to wind up her affairs. Eliza Vibart's personal effects amounted to only £110 and though. In 1911 both her daughters claimed to have private means (that is, income from stocks and shares or a trust fund) I'm not sure how comfortably-off either of them were; I've already indicated that Marian Charlotte's income from the shares in Biltor Ltd wasn't what she had probably been hoping for; and having done a bit of investigation into Edith Frances's husband Frank Grafton Wignall, I can say that even before he married Edith Frances, he had no obvious means of financial support. However, the Wignalls had been able to fund sending their son to Clifton College, after which he had gone on to Sandhurst and become another descendant of the Vibarts to serve with the army in India, arriving there in 1907.

On the day of the 1911 census, Marian Charlotte and Edith Frances were living together, at 10 Pagoda Avenue Richmond. Frank Grafton Wignall had died at the age of only 51, early in 1908, and it made sense for the sisters to pool their financial resources.

Marian Charlotte must still have been in touch with her aunt Frances Louisa Vibart. She may even have been acting on Frances Louisa's behalf with any business she needed to have done in England, because Frances Louisa is not on the 1911 census and must still have been living most of her time (if not all of it) abroad. The consequences of the divorce of Francis Meredith Edmund from Evelyn had rumbled on through the years; as Frances Louisa was in her 80s by 1911, perhaps Marian Charlotte had to deal with them from time to time, on her behalf. Her advancing years, and the first World War, forced Frances Louisa Vibart to return to England, to the Kemp Town district of Brighton, where she died in March 1915. Though her grandchildren (Violet and Frank) were still alive, it seems that Frances Louisa had become estranged from both of them. Perhaps she had not been able to bring herself to have anything to do with her ex-daughter-in-law; and her son Francis Meredith Edmund Vibart had died, in Manchester, in 1898. Frances Louisa named Marian Charlotte as her only executor.

The war wore on. Edith Frances Vibart may have hoped that, serving in India, her son would be spared active involvement; but he volunteered or was sent to the Middle East, and was killed (in Mesopotamia or Palestine - my source wasn't clear on this) in 1917. Her only child. He had spent one last long leave in Britain in 1912 and hadn't given as much of his time to his mother as perhaps he ought, spending much of it bird-watching instead. With his death, Edith Frances lost the will to live, I think - she died herself in October 1918 aged 62. Again Marian Charlotte was called upon to be an executor. This time she was acting with her distant cousin and friend Sophy Lloyd, with whom Edith Frances had something of war's tragedy in common - Sophy's only son, Ronald Vaughan Lloyd, had been killed in 1916.

By the time of Edith Frances's death the sisters had moved again: Edith Frances died at 2a Philbeach Gardens, Earl's Court. Philbeach Gardens is a crescent, off Warwick Road and only a couple of minutes' walk from Florence ffoulkes' house in Nevern Square; central, but cheap, and very convenient for Earl's Court exhibition centre, which may be significant. In 1903, Marian Charlotte's first cousin (aunt Julia's eldest son) the Comte de Lalaing, had arrived in London to take up what turned out to be the last appointment of his career as a diplomat: he had been appointed Belgium's Minister Plenipotentiary in Great Britain. The Comte was still in post in August 1914 when Germany invaded Belgium and precipitated the British descent into the first World War. He helped set up a committee to raise money to help the tide of refugees that began to arrive from Belgium over the next few months and I know from my research on Henry George Norris that a lot of them were housed in Earl's Court exhibition centre - probably temporarily on the grounds that the war would be over by Christmas but I think that in the end, they stayed there until after the Armistice. The worry and strain caused the Comte to retire on health grounds in 1915; but he couldn't return to his native land, he and his wife had become refugees as well. Marian Charlotte and Edith Frances were well-placed to do a spot of volunteering work amongst the Belgians stuck in the exhibition centre, if they had the mind. The Comte and Comtesse had returned to Belgium by 1919 but the war had had a profound affect on both of them: they both died during that year.

And that's all there is really. Marian Charlotte Vibart died in September 1932. She had moved again, at least once, though only a few streets west, and died at 35 Castletown Road West Kensington. She had named Henry Meredith Vibart's son Hugh Henry Rose Vibart - one of the few male Vibarts left - as one of her executors; and her solicitor Thomas Piercy Mills. She is buried next to her mother Eliza in Richmond cemetery.

--

BASIC SOURCES I USED for all Golden Dawn members.

Membership of the Golden Dawn: The Golden Dawn Companion by R A Gilbert. Northampton: The Aquarian Press 1986. Between pages 125 and 175, Gilbert lists the names, initiation dates and addresses of all those people who became members of the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn or its many daughter Orders between 1888 and 1914. The list is based on the Golden Dawn's administrative records and its Members' Roll - the large piece of parchment on which all new members signed their name at their initiation. All this information had been inherited by Gilbert but it's now in the Freemasons' Library at the United Grand Lodge of England building on Great Queen Street Covent Garden. Please note, though, that the records of the Amen-Ra Temple in Edinburgh were destroyed in 1900/01. As far as I know, the records of the Horus Temple at Bradford have not survived either.

Family history: freebmd; ancestry.co.uk (census and probate); findmypast.co.uk; familysearch; Burke's Peerage and Baronetage; Burke's Landed Gentry; Armorial Families; thepeerage.com; and a wide variety of family trees on the web.

Famous-people sources: mostly about men, of course, but very useful even for the female members of GD. Oxford Dictionary of National Biography. Who Was Who. Times Digital Archive.

Useful source for business and legal information: London Gazette and its Scottish counterpart Edinburgh Gazette. Now easy to find (with the right search information) on the web.

Catalogues: British Library; Freemasons' Library.

Wikipedia; Google; Google Books - my three best resources. I also used other web pages, but with some caution, as - from the historian's point of view - they vary in quality a great deal.

SOURCES FOR MARIAN CHARLOTTE VIBART

THE VIBART FAMILY

No one called Vibart has an entry in the Oxford Dictionary of National Biography.

For the common ancestor of all 19th-century Vibarts: //archives.rootsweb.ancestry.com, pages on the descendents of James Meredith Vibart 1753-1827, of Somerset.

For JAMES MEREDITH VIBART (died 1827) father of Thomas Gowan Vibart amongst others: Officers of the Bengal Army 1758-1834 volume IV S-Z. Published Phillimore and Co Ltd 1947: p355

Major Edward Vibart, his wife Emily and Cawnpore:

Officers of the Bengal Army 1758-1834 vol IV S-Z. Published Phillimore and Co Ltd 1947. P354.

At glosters.tripod.com/IM5.htm is a list of offices killed during the Mutiny.

Edward Daniel Hamilton Vibart, later a Colonel, is the eldest son of Major Edward and Emily. He was stationed at Meerut when the first mutiny began, in May 1857 and was later at the siege of Delhi. The Sepoy Mutiny as Seen by a Subaltern: From Delhi to Lucknow by Colonel Edward Vibart, late 15th Bengal Cavalry. London: Smith and Elder 1898

Marian Charlotte Vibart's grandfather THOMAS GOWAN VIBART

The Annals of the College of Fort William by Thomas Roebuck, the College secretary, from the college's official records. Published Calcutta 1819: p499, p503, p517, p525.

India Office and Burma Office List 1825 p10.

Asiatic Journal and Monthly Miscellany issue of 1837 Home Intelligence items p264 and p312.

Asiatic Journal and Monthly Miscellany issue of 1839 p169 Home Intelligence - a list of recent deaths includes that of Thomas Gowan Vibart of the Bengal Civil Service, at Leamington on 4 September.

For his salary at the end of his career: Bengal and Agra Annual Guide and Gazetteer issue of 1841 p236.

Marian Charlotte Vibart's grandmother JANE RUSSELL MACNAGHTEN VIBART and her family

Debrett's The Baronetage of Engl issue of 1839 p457 entry for Francis Workman-MacNaghten. Francis married in 1787; his wife was Letitia daughter of Sir William Dunkin who'd also been a supreme court judge in Calcutta. William Hay MacNaghten was their 2nd son; Jane Russell MacNaghten who married Thomas Gowan Vibart was their 12th child.

At clanmacnaughten.net an item on Francis Workman-MacNaghten says that he was chief of the clan from 1832 to 1843.

There's plenty on the web about William Hay MacNaghten 1793-1841 and he's also in Oxford Dictionary of National Biography etc.

THE CHILDREN OF THOMAS GOWAN VIBART AND JANE RUSSELL MACNAGHTEN VIBART

Marian Charlotte Vibart's father MEREDITH JAMES VIBART

Via archive.org to a copy of the Harrow School Register 1800-1911 now held at University of Toronto. Meredith James Vibart left Harrow in 1838.

ARMY CAREER

India Office archives/Bengal Milit archives eg at IOR/L/MIL/10/47/394 though I found it didn't contain any information I hadn't already found elsewhere.

At Addiscombe:

The Asiatic Journal and Monthly Miscellany issue of 1840 p213 rpt on the latest exams f entry into the East India Company's milit seminary.

Addiscombe, its Heroes and Men of Note 1894 London: Archibald Constable and Co of Parliament St W/m. By Meredith James Vibart's cousin Col Henry Meredith Vibart who is an ex-pupil and now "Royal (late Madras) Engineers" with an introduction by Lord Roberts of Kandahar.

Bengal and Agra Annual Guide and Gazetteer volume II ?1840 p147.

Augustus Fortunatus Bellasis:

British Drawings in the India Office Library: Amateur Artists. HMSO 1969. P105.

The British Library catalogue has a number of books of sketches by Augustus Fortunatus Bellasis 1822-72; though he worked for the East India Company, mostly in its Bombay presidency, he wasn't a professional artist.

For the Bellasis family see:

www.bellasis.net/belasisdescendants

British Drawings in the India Office Library: Amateur Artists. HMSO 1969. P105 covers Augustus Bellasis, who had leave 1846-47 which he spent in the Cape Colony. Capt M J Vibart was with him on that period of leave.

Back at Addiscombe:

Via newspapers.nl.sg to The Straits Times of 2 October 1849 p4.

Marriage to Eliza Blackburn Lloyd:

Gentleman's Magazine volume 189 1850 p427: marriage announcement.

Kumaon:

Administrative History of Uttarakhand (Kumaon and Garwhal) During the Rule of the East India Company by Dr Ajay Arora of Naini Tal University. Delhi: Eastern Book Linkers 1997.

The fact that Meredith James Vibart was in the Kumaon district is not mentioned in any of the issues of the India Register and Army List for the 1850s. I found out that's where he and Eliza were from the baptism records of Marian Charlotte and Edith Frances, seen at familysearch.

India Register and Army List issues of 1854-1856 p78 Meredith James Vibart is just listed as serving with the 8th battalion Bengal artillery; and that he had been promoted to Captain on 7 July 1853. The 8th battalion's headquarters was at Cawnpore though its 4th and 6th companies were in the Punjab.

India Register and Army List 1857 and 1858 both issues P78 Meredith James Vibart is now with the 6th battalion Bengal Artillery, whose official headquarters is at Subraon in the Punjab.

India Register and Army List 1859 p205.

More generally on Naini Tal, Almora and the Kumaon District

Wikipedia on the Chand kings of Uttarakhand.

At dsal.uchicago.edu is the Digital South Asia Library. Online there is a copy of the Imperial Gazetteer of India 1909 edition; vol 12 p169 Almora and surrounding district.

Back in Britain:

Edinburgh Gazette 11 October 1861 p1227.

Edinburgh Gazette 20 August 1867 p961.

London Gazette 13 August 1873 p4583.

London Gazette 24 February 1874 p831.

Marian Charlotte Vibart's mother's family, the LLOYDS OF RHAGATT MERIONETH

On the web at www01.us.archive.org, the text of Archaeologia Cambrensis issue of 1876; from a copy now at the University of Michigan. The edition included an article by J Y W Lloyd MA: The Lordships of Bromfield. On pp271-74, there's a section on Edward Lloyd and Frances née Madocks (sic), listing all their 17 children. Frances is the daughter of John Edward Madocks of Vron Iw. The article's author, J Y W Lloyd is Jacob Youde William Lloyd and the information in the article was later published in his larger work The History of the Princes, the Lords Marcher... published 1884; which also includes information on the ffoulkes family.

Frances Power Cobbe: Victorian Feminist, Journalist, Reformer. Sally Mitchell. Charlottesville and London: University of Virginia Press 2004.

MEREDITH JAMES' BROTHER FRANCIS ELLIOT VIBART

Birth of Francis Elliot Vibart and of his son Francis Meredith Edmund: familysearch.

India Office file: IOR/L/MIL/10/47/413 says only that he was in the 5th Cavalry. I saw an index for a burial record in the India Office family history section: Bengal 1848.

Francis Elliot's widow Frances went to live with her mother, Frances Abbott: they are on the census in 1861 and 1871 together, in Blandford Square Marylebone. Frances Abbott died in 1880.

Divorce proceedings between Francis Meredith Edmund Vibart and wife Evelyn Fanny:

Times Tues 25 May 1886 p4 Law Notices, cases being heard today include: Vibart v Vibart.

Evelyn Fanny Vibart married Swainson Howden Akroyd only a few weeks after the divorce had been granted. Francis Meredith Vibart's daughter Violet Vibart lived with her mother and her mother's second husband until her marriage. In 1904 she married Bernard Cunliffe Foster of Duncote Hall Towcester, who died very shortly after the day of the 1911 census.

Evelyn Fanny Akroyd died in 1921; there's a hint in her probate registry details that she had separated from her second husband by this time.

For the descent of Ronald Frank Vibart (1879-1934) through bigamy, alcoholism and pub brawls:

Silence of the Heart: Cricket Suicides by David Frith. Edinburgh: Mainstream 2001. I read a 2011 edition online.

Website cricketarchive.com gives Ronald Frank Vibart's DOB as 5 April 1879, at Sidmouth.

MEREDITH JAMES' sister LETITIA VIBART CAMPBELL

Burke's Peerage 101st edition published 1956 on Letitia Maria Vibart born 1828, married 1854

George Campbell of Edenwood, Ceres, Fifeshire; 3 sons 2 daughters.

Via archive.spectator.co.uk to Spectator 4 February 1854 p19 marriage announcements

The career of Sir George Campbell 1824-92, lieutenant-governor of Bengal 1871-74, is well covered in wikipedia and Oxford Dictionary of National Biography online.

For the children of George and Letitia Maria Campbell see www.johngrile.com/FTree/CHRISTIE\_FAMILY.htm.

Times Fri 25 October 1901 p8 short report on the inquest into the death of [Letitia] Campbell, on Tuesday 22 October 1901 from a suspected overdose of sulphonal. The verdict was 'misadventure' (rather than suicide).

At www.thefreedictionary.com/Sulphonal information originally in Webster's Revised and Unabridged Dictionary issue of 1913 on sulphonal. Roger found a photo on the web of a bottle of sulphonal, brand name 'Tabloid', manufactured by Burroughs-Wellcome, now in the museum at St Thomas's Hospital.

MEREDITH JAMES' sister JULIA VIBART DE LALAING

Because she lived in Belgium after her marriage, I've found very little on Julia's life; I don't know when or where she died.

For her birth (though she is not named), via google to forgottenbooks.org and Calcutta Magazine and Monthly Register issue of 1830 volume 1 p293 Domestic Occurrences for January [1830]: Thomas Gowan Vibart's wife had given birth to a daughter on 6 January 1830 at Bauleah.

At geneagrophie.com a page giving information that Julia Ann Mary Vibart was born in 1830 in Rampart Bengal.

Allen's Indian Mail 1855 p243 in a list of recent marriages: on 17 April [1855] at St Mary's Bryanston Square, Julia A M Vibart to Count de Lalaing.

The bridegroom's name via freebmd: marriage of Julia Anna Maria Vibart to Maximilien Jean Ghistain (sic) de Lalaing registered Marylebone April-June quarter 1855. I think the name

'ghistain' is a mistake: 'ghislaine' is more likely.

Julia's sons, the diplomat and an artist:

Via the web to Who's Who volume 58 1906 p976.

The Connoisseur 1917 p243 obituary Of Comte Jacques de Lalaing who had died on 10 October 1917.

The International Studio volume 63 1918 p165 Comte Jacques de Lalaing KCMB was a member of the Royal Academy of Belgium.

Who Was Who 1929 p600 obituary of the diplomat Count de Lalaing awarded GCVO 1915.

MEREDITH JAMES VIBART's brother ELLIOT HENRY VIBART

Familysearch recorded his birth in Calcutta in 1831 but I could find nothing more about him so I presume he died, in India, as an infant.

MEREDITH JAMES VIBART's sister JANE MARIA VIBART MACNAGHTEN

Times Tuesday 13 September 1859 p1 marriage announcements: on the 10th inst [September 1859] at Ovingdean Church Sussex, Elliot MacNaghten of the Bengal Civil Service, to Jane Maria daughter of the late Thomas Gowan Vibart. Meredith James' cousin John Vibart (ex-East India Company) and his family were living at Ovingdean at this time. He had married Anna Holland Foster in Bombay; the Fosters were friends of the Bellasis family.

A Genealogical and Heraldic History of the Commoners of Great Britain Burke 1835 p307 on the Workman-MacNaghten family of Beardville co Antrim. Jane Maria Vibart was marrying her first cousin: her bridegroom was the son of Jane Russell MacNaghten's brother Elliot MacNaghten and his wife Isabella (née Law).

India Register and Army List 1858 pxvi Elliot MacNaghten (the bridegroom's father) of 46 Eaton Square is a member of the court of directors of the East India Company; pxvii he's been a member since 1842.

At www.thepeerage.com, Elliot MacNaghten (Jane Maria's husband) lived 1837-March 1875. He and Jane Maria had three sons and two daughters but only one of them, Russell Elliot MacNaghten, married. The fact that Russell has second forename 'elliot' is interesting and suggests the family knew GD member Hugh Elliot's family, the Elliots of Elliot and Watney, brewers of Pimlico.

MEREDITH JAMES VIBART's sister MATILDA MARIA VIBART

Parbury's Oriental Herald and Colonial Intelligencer issue of 1838 p217 in the Home Intelligence section: the wife of Thomas Gowan Vibart had given birth to a daughter on 8 June [1838] at Boulogne-sur-Mer.

Familysearch affiliation publication number RG33 gives a baptism and a burial for her, both at Boulogne. She died in 1845.

The youngest in the family, MEREDITH JAMES VIBART's sister ELIZA MARIA VIBART

Birth from familysearch and death registration 1876 from freebmd. She never married.

GEORGE FORBES VIBART, HIS WIFE ANNIE AND THEIR ACTOR SON HENRY

See my biography of Valentine Lacy for more details of these relations. George Forbes Vibart (1825-1893) was Meredith James Vibart's first cousin - eldest child of John Vibart and his wife Anna Holland Forbes. His wife Annie (died 1910) was Scottish and the couple were living in Scotland by 1871. The actor Henry Vibart was their youngest son - his long career is covered by wikipedia and imdb although both those websites favour his later work in films over the several decades of theatre-work that came first. Henry married the actress and artists' model Taigi Keene.

EDITH FRANCES VIBART Marian's sister

Baptism in Almora from familysearch.

A few details on Edith Frances' husband Frank Grafton Wignall:

London Gazette 6 November 1883 p5264 list of partnerships to be dissolved includes that of Frederick Nock Rudgard and Frank Grafton Wignall wine and spirit merchants at 9 Exchange Arcade Manchester.

London Gazette 28 November 1884 p5556 another list of partnerships to be dissolved: this time it's Frank Grafton Wignall and Thomas Crosby Peers in business as Mobberley Bone Manure Co at Mobberley Cheshire.

Short obituary of John Dighton Wignall:

www.britishbirds.co.uk originally in British Birds volumes 1-12 1922 p38. At www.ancientfaces.com there's a section on the Dighton family which says John Dighton Wignall was killed on 26 January 1917.

Sophy Lloyd:

The County Families of the UK better known as Walford's County Families. Published annually; I looked at the 60th edition, from 1920: p841, when Sophy Lloyd was still alive.

Marian Charlotte's mother ELIZA BLACKBURN VIBART

Centre for Maritime Historical Studies, Exeter University.

Their reference Z/DR/3/22-48 is a set of letters written to her sisters by Eliza Blackburn Vibart, covering 1853-58.

MARIAN CHARLOTTE VIBART

Birth and baptism from familysearch.

BILTOR LIMITED

Earliest evidence I found of its existence:

Cosmopolis volume 8 1897 p923 has The Biltor Ltd at 93 Oxford St.

The patent and the application for its extension:

London Gazette 19 December 1902 p8773.

Reports of Patent, Design and Trade Mark Cases volume 20 [1902] issued by the Patent Office: p285: details of the hearing on the patent extension application.

The Electrical Review volume 52 1903 p646 reported on the outcome of the case.

London Gazette 10 April 1928 p2661 a notice winding up the affairs of the late Emil Alexander Wüterich, issued by solicitors acting for John Valentine Lacy.

TO ISHTAR

BL catalogue: To Ishtar: An Eastern Love Song bound in a volume of other songs from around 1872.

Seen via google a reference to G J Whyte-Melville's Sarchedon: A Legend of the Great Queen published in 3 volumes London: Chapman and Hall 1871.

Jane Margaret ffoulkes, Eliza Blackburn Vibart's sister:

For more 'family history' information on the ffoulkes family, see my biography of Louisa Florence ffoulkes.

Jane ffoulkes' daughter Gertrude Mary Frances ffoulkes: see www.rhylhistoryclub.wordpress.com. In 1876 money was raised for a ward at Child's Convalescent Home dedicated to Gertrude's memory. The Home eventually turned into the Royal Alexandra Hospital and the ward named for Gertrude still exists.

INTEREST IN THE KABBALA

Marian Charlotte's motto:

at www.sacred-texts.com/jud/zdm/zdm020.htm a translation of the Zohar: Genesis Chapter XI The Strange Visitor includes this: "Man is a three-fold product of life (nephesh), spirit (rauch) and soul (neschamah)"...

Kabbala Denudata: The Kabbalah Unveiled by S L MacGregor Mathers ((sic)) 1887. It translates into English the Latin version of Knorr von Rosenroth; it also collates that Latin version with original Chaldean and Hebrew texts. It's a translation of these books in the Zohar:

1 = book of concealed mystery

2 = the greater holy assembly

3 = the lesser holy assembly.

Collectanea Hermetica volume IV 1894.

THEOSOPHICAL SOCIETY

Theosophical Society Membership Register March 1895 to June 1898 p181.

16 January 2014

AMandragora@attglobal.net

***

Carl VOGT who was initiated into the Golden Dawn right at the end of my period, September 1900, and chose the German motto 'Durchdacht'.

It turned out, when I began to search for this GD member, that there was a noted Swiss politician and writer living in Switzerland: I got lots of references on the web for this man; but I was sure that he wasn't the man I was after. Bless Carl Vogt for having a name unusual in England, however - I found him on the 1901 census, living in the lodging house kept by Miss Lily J Moore at 24 Oakley Square London NW. Miss Moore's house was near Euston Station, very convenient for people working in the City of London, and half of her 8 lodgers described themselves as clerks and two more said they were accountants. Naturally, 7 of the 8 had been born elsewhere; the exception was Mabel Hancock, the only woman and the only Londoner. Two came from countries outside the Empire. One was Danish; the other was Carl Vogt.

How often have I wished that the census officials would give a bit more detail! When it came to what people did for a living, the officials' main focus was on getting the sources of people's income in as few words as possible so the information would fit on the form they had to use. When Carl Vogt described (possibly in rather thickly-accented English - I'm sure he could speak some English) how he earned his daily bread, the official just scribbled "merchant". So I know that Carl Vogt bought and sold for his living: but whether he dealt in silk or jute, or diamonds or coal, or shares or rivets, or all those things, I cannot say. And did he work for himself? Or for someone else? Or for a big firm, and if so was it an English one or a foreign one? The census official wasn't interested.

If I knew more about what Carl Vogt bought and sold, and who he did it for, it might hint at WHO HE KNEW IN THE GOLDEN DAWN; but as things stand, I don't know who it was he had met who was in the GD.

Another problem with information on the census was that, if you were not born in England, the official was not going to make much effort to be exact. So in 1901, no matter how specific Carl Vogt might have been about where he was born, all that was jotted down was "Germany". Is that Berlin or Leipzig? Essen or Frankfurt? Or none of those places? The official did note that Carl Vogt was 45 years old, and unmarried.

Even that much information on Carl Vogt was a lot more than I had expected, so I tried the 1891 and 1911 censuses to see if he was a long-term resident in England. He was not on either of them; and although he could have been on holiday, or even away on business on both occasions, I think it's more likely that in 1901 he was working in London temporarily.

BASIC SOURCES I USED for all Golden Dawn members.

Membership of the Golden Dawn: The Golden Dawn Companion by R A Gilbert. Northampton: The Aquarian Press 1986. Between pages 125 and 175, Gilbert lists the names, initiation dates and addresses of all those people who became members of the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn or its many daughter Orders between 1888 and 1914. The list is based on the Golden Dawn's administrative records and its Members' Roll - the large piece of parchment on which all new members signed their name at their initiation. All this information had been inherited by Gilbert but it's now in the Freemasons' Library at the United Grand Lodge of England building on Great Queen Street Covent Garden.

Family history: freebmd; ancestry.co.uk (census and probate); findmypast.co.uk; familysearch. Of course none of these cover Europe. Burke's Peerage and Baronetage; Burke's Landed Gentry; Armorial Families; thepeerage.com; and a variety of one-family genealogy websites.

Famous-people sources: mostly about men, of course, but very useful even for the female members of GD. Oxford Dictionary of National Biography. Who Was Who. Times Digital Archive.

Catalogues: British Library; Freemasons' Library.

Wikipedia; Google; Google Books - my three best resources. I also used other web pages, but with some caution, as - from the historian's point of view - they vary in quality a great deal.

24 April 2012

AMandragora@attglobal.net

Clotilde Rosalie Regina von Wyss was initiated into the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn on 8 February 1897, taking the German motto Mehr Licht. She was initiated at the GD's Amen-Ra temple in Edinburgh; she was living at 17 Cornwall Street Edinburgh at the time. Later she moved to 26 Gondar Gardens West Hampstead and was a member of the GD's Isis-Urania temple in London. However, she never seems to have done the work necessary to progress in the GD beyond the lowest grade and probably dropped out of the GD quite soon.

Before I start: how do you pronounce Clotilde's Swiss-German surname? You pronounce it: fon veess.

Clotilde von Wyss is one of the best-documented GD members. Not (I suppress a sigh here) that that's saying much. However, I do have good information on most of her life and I also find her one of the most interesting of the GD members I have studied: a dynamic personality, very attractive, but also (to one at least who knew her) alarming, even perverse and threatening. So this biography is quite a long one, divided into two parts:

- 1) a relatively straightforward Life, by date
- 2) aspects of her life in more detail - family, career in teaching
- 3) aspects of her life in more detail - Marie Stopes and other girls at North London Collegiate School; Ethelwyn Mackie

6 November 2013: thanks to Nigel Shepley of St George's School Edinburgh and Nicola Feggetter of North London Collegiate School for helping sort out where Clotilde went to school, and her brief life as a school-teacher.

Part 1: Clotilde's Life by Date

Sources referred to very briefly in the date list can be found at the end of Part 1 below the 'basic sources' section. What was happening in Clotilde's life is in italics; the sources for it are in my normal Times New Roman

13 Aug 1871 Clotilde was born, in Zürich

Sources for the year and the place: all the obituaries; Aldrich

Source for the day and the month: British Library Additional Manuscripts number

58538; Stopes Papers volume XCII ff 222. Letter Clotilde to Marie Stopes 22 Aug 1899 probably in Clotilde's childhood, possibly in her early childhood

Clotilde's parents separated

Source: British Library Additional Manuscripts number 58538; Stopes Papers volume XCII ff 222. Letter Clotilde to Marie Stopes 2 February 1900

childhood Clotilde spent her early years in Switzerland

Sources: obituary Linnean Society

?by 1884 Clotilde's mother (also Clotilde) moved to north London with her two daughters, the GD's Clotilde and Martha Sources: obituary Nature; British Library Additional Manuscripts number 58538; Stopes Papers volume XCII ff 222. Letter Clotilde to Marie Stopes

?August 1901 in which Clotilde says her mother has returned to live in Switzerland after 16 years away.

1884-91 Clotilde was at school, most likely at South Hampstead High School, run by the Girls' Public Day School Trust. The school's motto was Mehr Licht, reputedly the last words of Goethe, which Clotilde later chose for her Golden Dawn motto.

Sources: Aldrich, who had access to the archives of the Girls' Public Day School Trust at the Institute of Education.

?late 1880s ?1890s

Clotilde read a great deal of theosophy, though she doesn't seem to have joined the Theosophical Society.

Sources: British Library Additional Manuscripts number 58538; Stopes Papers volume XCII ff 222. Letter Clotilde to Marie Stopes 22 August 1899, in which she speaks of her reading as quite a long time in the past. And TS Membership Registers 1888 to 1900: I didn't see Clotilde's name in them (though I might just have missed it).

1891 Clotilde was living with Clotilde the elder and sister Martha at 12 Medley Road Kilburn; a small street backing onto the railway just west of West Hampstead station. The house was next door to the pub on the corner with Iverson Road

Source: census

?1891-94 Clotilde trained to be a teacher, at Maria Grey College in north London. She graduated with the Cambridge Teaching Certificate, with distinction

Sources: obituaries Nature; Journal of Education and School World volume 52 1920 p136

1895 Clotilde started her first job as a teacher

Source: entry for Clotilde von Wyss at the Teachers' Registration Council

1895-97 Clotilde was teaching at St George's High School Edinburgh

Source: St George's School archives; details sent to me September 2013 by the school's historian and archivist, Nigel Shepley.

Source for the school: www.st-georges.edin.sch.uk. Marie Stopes was a pupil at the school (see Stopes' wikipedia page) but not while Clotilde was there

While living in Edinburgh Clotilde got to know the biologist J Arthur Thomson, probably by taking one of Edinburgh University's extra-mural lecture courses, which he taught. His views on evolution and the natural world greatly influenced her own teaching philosophy. She also became friendly with GD member Edith Grace Collett who was studying medicine in Edinburgh.

Source for Thomson's influence: obituary Linnean Society

Source for Collett: British Library Additional Manuscripts number 58538; Stopes Papers volume XCII ff 222. Letter Clotilde to Marie Stopes ?August 1900

Feb 1897 Clotilde was initiated into the GD in Edinburgh

Source: GD Members' Roll transcribed in R A Gilbert's The Golden Dawn Companion p133.

Summer term 1897

Clotilde moved to London and began work as a science teacher at the North London Collegiate School in Camden. Marie Stopes was one of the school's star science pupils but NLCS already had quite a reputation for its science teaching

Sources: North London Collegiate School staff index; and the school's own website at www.nlcs.org.uk section on famous ex-pupils; Stopes' wikipedia page and the biographies listed in the Sources section.

Late 1890s to 1905 at least and possibly a lot longer

Clotilde gave talks on nature study, and taught it at evening classes

Sources: quite a few of them so I've put them in the Sources section below

22 July 1897 At its first meeting since Clotilde had joined the staff, the pupil members elected her vice-president of the NLCS Science Club. The Club president was Miss Aitken, the chemistry teacher but the committee responsible for the running of the Club was all pupils

Source: NLCS school magazine Our Magazine volume XXII number 67 November 1897: 112-13

7 October 1897

Clotilde read a paper at the NLCS Science Club: Nature's Preparation for Rest during the winter..., illustrated with specimens collected by her and the pupil Club members

Source: NLCS school magazine Our Magazine volume XXII number 68 April 1898: 159

December 1898

Miss Aitken and Clotilde led an expedition of NLCS Science Club members to Epping Forest and Chingford

Source: NLCS school magazine Our Magazine volume XXIII number 70

December 1898: 251

10 February 1899

Clotilde returned to Maria Grey Training College to give a lecture: On the Teaching of Object Lessons

Source: NLCS school magazine Our Magazine volume XXIV number 72 July 1899: 81

20 July 1899

Miss Aitken and Clotilde took the Science Club to Stamford Common to collect plant specimens

By autumn term 1899

Marie Stopes had been elected NLCS Science Club secretary.

Source for both: NLCS school magazine Our Magazine volume XXIV number

73

November 1899: 134

August 1899 Clotilde spent the summer vacation in Switzerland.

Source: British Library Additional Manuscripts number 58538; Stopes Papers volume XCII ff 222. Letter Clotilde to Marie Stopes 22 August 1899.

About 1899 to 1901

Clotilde had close relationships with senior pupils including Gertrude Colls, Olga Kapteyn, Christine Pugh and particularly Marie Stopes. Some kind of sisterhood was involved, apparently along GD lines in some respects

Sources: British Library Additional Manuscripts number 58538; Stopes Papers volume XCII ff 222. Letters Clotilde to Marie Stopes 1899-1909. Also: all the Stopes biographies listed in the Sources section below; although I interpret the relationship with Stopes very differently

By December 1900

Clotilde, her Mother and possibly her sister too were living at 26 Gondar Gardens, West Hampstead.

Source: British Library Additional Manuscripts number 58538; Stopes Papers volume XCII ff 222. Letter Clotilde to Marie Stopes 24 December 1899

End January/early February 1900

Clotilde's father died; she was not with him at his death.

Source: British Library Additional Manuscripts number 58538; Stopes Papers volume XCII ff 222. Letter Clotilde to Marie Stopes 2 February 1900. I think he died in Switzerland. Marie Stopes was very kind and understanding to Clotilde and her Mother in the first months after their bereavement.

August 1900 Clotilde spent the summer vacation with women friends in Norfolk. She moved to a new address, 12 Gayton Crescent off Hampstead High Street; but she only stayed there a few months

Source: British Library Additional Manuscripts number 58538; Stopes Papers volume XCII ff 222. Letters Clotilde to Marie Stopes ?August 1900 and 3

October 1900.

September 1900

Clotilde applied for a job as lecturer at the Cambridge Teacher Training College for Women.

Source: British Library Additional Manuscripts number 58538; Stopes Papers volume XCII ff 222. Letter Clotilde to Marie Stopes 3 October 1900.

January 1901 Clotilde began work at Cambridge Teacher Training College for Women as science lecturer, doing some private teaching as well. Margaret Punnett was the Principal and Punnett's successor, Charlotte Ainslie was also on the staff by 1901. Clotilde kept in touch with Marie Stopes and other ex-pupils as well.

At least until 1911, Clotilde kept in regular touch with NLCS and especially its headmistress Dr Bryant.

Source: British Library Additional Manuscripts number 58538; Stopes Papers volume XCII ff

222. Letter Clotilde to Marie Stopes ?April 1900 et seq

Also: obituaries; Aldrich; census.

For Punnett's appointment: via www.newspapers.com to Guardian of 29 March 1899 p14.

For Ainslie: ODNB

By 1901 Clotilde's mother and sister had left England. I haven't found any evidence that Clotilde had other relations living in Britain

Source: British Library Additional Manuscripts number 58538; Stopes Papers volume XCII ff

222. Letter Clotilde to Marie Stopes ?August 1901.

Also: censuses for 1901 and 1911

January-June 1901

Clotilde met Beatrice Ethelwyn Mackie; who was Clotilde's own age but a student (that is, not a lecturer) at Cambridge Teacher Training College for Women

Source: British Library Additional Manuscripts number 58538; Stopes Papers volume XCII ff

222. Letter Clotilde to Marie Stopes ?August 1901.

Also: that Ethelwyn Mackie was a student at the CTTC: census 1901. Census 1911; Clotilde's Will Summer 1901 Clotilde returned to Switzerland, spending time with her Mother and cousins; and also went on a mountain climbing holiday with Ethelwyn Mackie.

Source: British Library Additional Manuscripts number 58538; Stopes Papers volume XCII ff

222. Letters Clotilde to Marie Stopes ?August 1901.

November 1901

Marie Stopes told Clotilde that she had received a proposal of marriage from a fellow student at University College London. She had turned it down, but Clotilde realised that Marie was growing up and apart from her. Clotilde was still in touch with other ex-pupils.

Source: British Library Additional Manuscripts number 58538; Stopes Papers volume XCII ff

222. Letter Clotilde to Marie Stopes 10 November 1901.

From November 1901

Clotilde wrote to Marie Stopes less and less often.

Source: British Library Additional Manuscripts number 58538; Stopes Papers volume XCII ff

222. Letter Clotilde to Marie Stopes 10 November 1901 et seq.

1902 London Day Training College (LDTC) was founded by London County Council: teacher-training for those going to teach in elementary schools. John Adams was its first Principal; Margaret Punnett and D R Harris were appointed as its most senior staff members, although even they seem to have been part-time only at this stage

Sources: Aldrich; IOE website archives pages; and on the fact that the LCC's employee records no longer exist - London Metropolitan Archive's Information Leaflet 27: An Outline ## of Sources for the History of Education in London

Summer 1902 Clotilde sent in a letter of resignation to Cambridge Teacher Training College but was persuaded to stay for one more academic year.

Source: British Library Additional Manuscripts number 58538; Stopes Papers volume XCII ff 222. Letter Clotilde to Marie Stopes 8 December 1902.

?1902 ?1903 Clotilde joined the School Nature Study Union (1903-94). She remained a member until her death. Other founders included Claude Hinscliffe, curate of St George in the East CofE church, and botanist Kate Marion Hall

Sources: History of Education volume 25 (see Sources section for the rest of the details); SNSU Journal 1906-38; obituary SNSU Journal; website

www.stgite.org.uk/naturesstudy.html

Christmas 1902

Clotilde spent the holiday with Ethelwyn Mackie's family at their house in Scarborough.

Source: British Library Additional Manuscripts number 58538; Stopes Papers volume XCII ff 222. Letter Clotilde to Marie Stopes 26 December 1902.

January 1903 Clotilde began teaching at the LDTC on Monday and Tuesday afternoons; in addition to the work she was doing at CTTC. At LDTC she taught hygiene, nature study, arts and crafts.

Source for the date: British Library Additional Manuscripts number 58538; Stopes Papers volume XCII ff 222. Letter Clotilde to Marie Stopes 8 December 1902.

Sources including the subjects she taught: obituaries; Aldrich; Institute of Education (IOE) website archives pages; Studies and Impressions; Willis Dixon

4 March 1903 Clotilde returned to NLCS to give a talk: Some Aspects of Spring from a Naturalist's Point of View. She gave it "from behind a barrage of bottles, tubes and dishes" of pond-life specimens and flowers

Source: NLCS school magazine Our Magazine volume for July 1903.

Summer 1903 Clotilde gave up her job at the CTTC.

Autumn 1903 Clotilde started as a full-time employee of the LDTC and moved back to London.

Source: British Library Additional Manuscripts number 58538; Stopes Papers volume XCII ff 222. Letters Clotilde to Marie Stopes 8 December 1902.

By October 1903

Clotilde was living near the LDTC, sharing a flat at 18 Somerset Terrace, Duke's Road

London - a convenient but noisy street on the south side of Euston Road opposite Euston Station.

Source: British Library Additional Manuscripts number 58538; Stopes Papers volume XCII ff 222. Letter Clotilde to Marie Stopes 12 October 1903; I think she was sharing the flat with Ethelwyn Mackie although she doesn't say so.

1903-36 Clotilde remained a staff member at the LDTC until her retirement

1903-36 However, she continued to do work outside the LDTC - evening classes, and nature-study field trips

Source: Willis Dixon

Exact dates unknown but between 1903 and 1936

Clotilde was the first woman to be a volunteer teacher at Wormwood Scrubs

Source: Aldrich

January 1904 Clotilde and the NLCS's Dr Bryant gave talks at the Hampstead Science Society. Dr Bryant's was on bees; Clotilde talked about earthworms.

Source: NLCS school magazine Our Magazine volume for March 1904: 19

4 June 1904 Clotilde led a group of members of the Teachers' Guild on an expedition to Totteridge, during which she showed them all how to lead a nature study lesson for children

Source: NLCS school magazine Our Magazine volume for July 1904: 54

I'm not sure this means that Clotilde was a member of the Teachers' Guild. She may just have been asked to lead this session and the one in 1906 which you can see mentioned below.

Source for the Teachers' Guild but not for Clotilde's possible membership of it:

UCL Bloomsbury Project see

www.ucl.ac.uk/bloomsbury-project/institutions/teachers\_guild.htm

The Teachers' Guild records are now at Warwick University.

1905 As the LDTC began a period of rapid expansion (both in the number of students and in what was taught). In 1905 Percy Nunn and Margaret Punnett were appointed joint vice-principals and probably went full-time

1905 Clotilde's job description changed slightly - she was now LDTC's lecturer in nature study and drawing; I suppose she was still only part-time

Source: Art Workers' Quarterly volume 5 1906 p140

She was also continuing to give evening classes in nature study

Source: School World volume 7 1905 piv

1906 Clotilde was on the organising committee of the 3rd International Congress for the Development of Drawing and Art Teaching

Source: Journal of Education volume 28 1906 p859

The SNSU begins to publish a journal. Clotilde is its editor until ?1936

Source: SNSU Journal; obituary SNSU Journal vol 34 1939; obituary Linnean Society
7 December 1906

The NLCS hosted a meeting of the Teachers' Guild, during which Clotilde gave short demonstrations of how to study pictures, and how to use pictures while giving lessons on art and composition

Source: NLCS school magazine Our Magazine volume for February 1907: 22

1907 Clotilde did some plant identification work for an author

Source: Canon Pietro Casola's Pilgrimage to Jerusalem in the Year 1494, translated and with an introduction by Mary Margaret Newett: p378. Published 1907 by the University of Manchester in its Historical series.

By 1908

Clotilde and Ethelwyn had moved to 3 Cromwell Mansions, a block of flats on the corner of King Street Hammersmith and Cromwell Avenue; near to Ravenscourt Park and tube station

1908 Clotilde contributed a short paper to the First International...Moral Education Congress: On the observation of nature as a character-building process

Source: the Congress' Papers... pp160-61. The Congress was held at the University of London from 25 to 29 September 1908.

1909 LDTC became a school within the University of London; though it was still run by and its staff were still paid by the LCC. LDTC began to teach undergraduate courses

Sources: Aldrich; Studies and Impressions; IOE website archives pages

Clotilde's The Child's World in Pictures was published by Adam and Charles Black. With 62 illustrations.

Clotilde contributed an article Nature Study in the City School, to Child Life: A Magazine for Kindergarten Teachers published by the Froebel Society of Great Britain and Ireland.

Source: Child Life volume XI new series 1909 pp47-49

Seen July 2013 at Roehampton University archive:
studentzone.roehampton.ac.uk

Clotilde's article Ideal and Real was published in Broad Lines in Science Teaching

Source: Broad Lines in Science Teaching editor F Hodson. London: Christophers of Lancaster Place 1909: pp23-36

April 1909 As ex-pupil Olga Kapteyn was in England on a visit, Clotilde decided to hold a tea-party for “the old biology class”.

Source: British Library Additional Manuscripts number 58538; Stopes Papers volume XCII ff 222. Letter Clotilde to Marie Stopes 29 April 1909. Evidence from the 1911 census suggests Clotilde was sharing the flat with Ethelwyn Mackie.

29 April 1909 Clotilde wrote her last letter to Marie Stopes, inviting her to the tea-party.

Source: British Library Additional Manuscripts number 58538; Stopes Papers volume XCII ff 222. There are no more letters from Clotilde in the Stopes Papers after the note written on 29 April 1909. I guess either Marie Stopes didn't go to the tea-party; or she did and there was a quarrel of some kind.

Academic year 1909/10

Clotilde was doing 25 hours per week teaching at LDTC. This was the most of any of LDTC's senior staff but even the 2 vice-principals were doing 22 hours or so and Clotilde didn't have their admin duties.

Source: Aldrich.

1910 Clotilde's The World in Pictures published by Adam and Charles Black; with 57 illustrations, 32 in colour. Subsequent editions in 1910, 1912, 1917 and 1919

1910 Clotilde's Beasts and Birds. A Nature Book for Boys and Girls was published by A and C Black. Originally with 55 black-and-white illustrations, it was reissued in 1912 and again in 1919 with 31 of the 55 in colour

Academic year 1910/11

Clotilde's teaching hours per week increased to 30. Half way through the year, the first of a series of part-time tutors was appointed to help with Clotilde's drawing and nature study commitments.

Source: Aldrich.

March 1911 Clotilde gave the NLCS library a copy of her The Child's World in Pictures

Source: NLCS school magazine Our Magazine volume March 1911: 12

1911 Clotilde and Ethelwyn Mackie were sharing a flat in Hammersmith. Ethelwyn was a secondary-school teacher employed by Middlesex County Council.

Source: census

1912 Clotilde's Gardens in their Seasons. A Nature Book for Boys and Girls was published

Source: I saw this book via google. The British Library doesn't have any copies of it so I haven't been able to find out the full publication details

1914 Clotilde (with two other women) was elected a Fellow of the Linnean Society

Source: Proceedings of the Linnean Society 126th session November 1913-June 1914 p15, p70; Proceedings of the Linnean Society 127th session p1; obituary Linnean Society

World War 1 LDTC started teaching post-graduate courses. There was a huge drop in the number of male students and rise in the number of women staff - sustained through the 1920s as so few male students or staff return from the War

Source: IOE website archives pages

From 1915 LDTC began to teach an MA course

Sources: Aldrich; Studies and Impressions; IOE website archives pages

1919 Clotilde contributed drawings to Percy Nunn's The Teaching of Algebra

Source: The Teaching of Algebra (including Trigonometry) by T Percy Nunn. London: Longmans Green and Co 1919

1922 John Adams retired as Principal of the LDTC; Percy Nunn succeeded him and was also appointed Professor of Education, University of London

Sources: Aldrich; Studies and Impressions; IOE website archives pages

1926 Clotilde was now LDTC lecturer in the theory and practice of education. I'm not sure whether she's full-time by now; but this sounds like a full-time job to me

Source: University of London Calendar issue of 1926 p150

Clotilde was one of many education professionals who sent a written submission to the Hadow Report on higher education. Her boss Percy Nunn was one of those called to give evidence in person

Source: The Hadow Report 1926 seen July 2013 at www.educationengland.org.uk: The Hadow Report into The Education of the Adolescent. London: HMSO p261

Marie Stopes' Sex and the Young was published; it contained a section on the dangers of unrecognised lesbianism and homosexuality in schools; and especially the dangers to the pupil of teacher/pupil relationships. Stopes used examples from her own experience and observation, particularly of one woman teacher, anonymous then but now identified as Clotilde von Wyss.

Source: Sex and the Young by Marie Carmichael Stopes. London: Gill Publishing

Co Ltd 1926: especially Chapter 5 and even more especially pp53-54

1927 Clotilde's The Teaching of Nature Study was published by A and C Black. Further editions were published in 1928 and 1930

1927 Clotilde's Living Creatures: Studies of Animal and Plant Life was also published by A and C Black

1931 Clotilde was now the LDTC's lecturer in biology

Source: Journal of Education volume 63 1931 p395

Clotilde's The Elements of Biology was published by Christophers. There were subsequent editions in 1932 and 1935

1932 LCC handed control of LDTC to the University of London and it became the University's Institute of Education (IOE). Percy Nunn was appointed its first Director

Sources: Aldrich; Studies and Impressions; IOE website

1933 IOE's Margaret Punnett retired. Punnett had got through so much work that her job had to be split into two. Clotilde was offered the part of it that was called Warden of Women Students; but declined it, with many thanks.

Sources: Aldrich, Willis Dixon

1934 Clotilde's Biological Drawings. First Series, Animal Studies was published by the University of London Press

Summer 1936

Clotilde and her boss Percy Nunn both retired from the IOE.

Sources: obituaries; Aldrich; Willis Dixon; IOE website archives pages

Clotilde (?and Ethelwyn) moved out of London, to Mousehill Down near Godalming, where she was able to spend more time on her studies of wood ants

Source: obituary Linnean Society

Clotilde acted as advisor to the producers of a documentary film on Wood Ants. She was present when the film was shown at a Film School that summer. The film was described as, "the climax to careful observational work on the part of children".

Sources: British Film Institute (BFI) website at explore.bfi.org.uk/4ce2b69cbc974: Wood Ants, 1936 made by Gaumont-British Instructional. The film was about the communal life of ants, and had been supervised by "C. von Wyss"

Sight and Sound volumes 5-6, published by BFI 1936: p157

Visual Aid Year Book issued 1949 by the Daily Mail School Aid Department; p177 as being 1 reel long, with some sound. Obviously it was still being used in schools then

Source: Willis Dixon

7 November 1938

Clotilde died. Ethelwyn Mackie and Ethelwyn Mackie's nephew were executors of Clotilde's Will

Sources: all obituaries; Aldrich; Probate Registry records for the Will 1950 Clotilde's Biological Drawings. Second Series, Botanical Studies was published by the University of London Press. Her First Series, Animal Studies was reissued

Unknown date but possibly as late as 1955

Two booklets were published which Clotilde prepared as part of a SNSU series helping teachers to do nature study classes: Seeds and Seedlings; and The School Aquarium

1956 Ethelwyn Mackie died

Source: Probate Registry records

1968 Clotilde's booklet Simple Experiments with Seeds and Seedlings (possibly a reissue of the SNSU booklet Seeds and Seedlings) was published, edited by M J Wootton

I've done two more files for this biography of Clotilde von Wyss: one on her family and her teaching career; and one on her personal life including her relationships with Marie Stopes, Olga Kapteyn and Ethelwyn Mackie. If you'd like to read them, please go back to our main GD Members' page and click again.

**

BASIC SOURCES I USED for all Golden Dawn members.

Membership of the Golden Dawn: The Golden Dawn Companion by R A Gilbert. Northampton: The Aquarian Press 1986. Between pages 125 and 175, Gilbert lists the names, initiation dates and addresses of all those people who became members of the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn or its many daughter Orders between 1888 and 1914. The list is based on the Golden Dawn's administrative records and its Members' Roll - the large piece of parchment on which all new members signed their name at their initiation. All this information had been inherited by Gilbert but it's now in the Freemasons' Library at the United Grand Lodge of England building on Great Queen Street Covent Garden. Please note, though, that the records of the Amen-Ra Temple in Edinburgh were destroyed in 1900/01. As far as I know, the records of the Horus Temple at Bradford have not survived either.

Family history: freebmd; ancestry.co.uk (census and probate); findmypast.co.uk; familysearch; Burke's Peerage and Baronetage; Burke's Landed Gentry; Armorial Families; thepeerage.com; and a wide variety of family trees on the web.

Famous-people sources: mostly about men, of course, but very useful even for the female members of GD. Oxford Dictionary of National Biography. Who Was Who. Times Digital Archive.

Useful source for business and legal information: London Gazette and its Scottish counterpart Edinburgh Gazette. Now easy to find (with the right search information) on the web.

Catalogues: British Library; Freemasons' Library.

Wikipedia; Google; Google Books - my three best resources. I also used other web pages, but with some caution, as - from the historian's point of view - they vary in quality a great deal.

SOURCES FOR CLOTILDE VON WYSS

Aldrich:

The Institute of Education 1902-2002: A Centenary History by Richard Aldrich. London: IOE Univ of London 2002 pp20-21 and there's a photograph of her as well. This is an official history of the IOE and it's based on the IOE's own archives including employee records. It was lucky for me that Clotilde ended up an employee of IOE rather than the LCC; otherwise her record would have been destroyed by now

The obituaries:

Nature volume 142 issue of 26 November 1938 pp944-45; it was written by "R.F.S.", someone I haven't identified so far

Proceedings of the Linnean Society 151st session October 1938-May 1939: p265

School Nature Study Union Journal volume 34 1939; I haven't got the page numbers for this as I haven't seen the original publication

History of Education volume 25

History of Education volume 25 number 2 June 1996 pp181-98: The School Nature Study Union 1903-94, by E W Jenkins and B J Swinnerton of Leeds University where the SNSU archive now is.

Studies and Impressions:

Studies and Impressions 1902-1952. London: Evans Bros 1952 for the University of London Institute of Education

London Higher:

London Higher: the Establishment of Higher Education in London editors Roderick Floud and Sean Glynn. London: Athlone Press 1998: p240

Willis Dixon:

The Institute: A Personal Account of the History of the University of London Institute of Education 1932-1972 by C Willis Dixon. London: University of London IOE; p11. Willis Dixon knew Clotilde personally; but only as a junior member of staff when she was one of the most senior members.

For Clotilde's relationship with Marie Stopes:

The Stopes Letters referred to in the Life. And these biographies:

Marie Stopes: A Biography by Keith Bryant. London: The Hogarth Press 1962. He quotes from letters between the two, but doesn't name Clotilde or even say she was one of Marie's teachers.

Marie Stopes: A Biography by Ruth Hall. London: Virago 1978. Hall names Clotilde and identifies her as the young woman teacher castigated anonymously by Stopes in Sex and the Young.

Marie Stopes and the Sexual Revolution by June Rose. London and Boston Mass: Faber and Faber 1992.

Clotilde's evening work publicising nature studies:

Nature volume 61 1900 p283 a section on the Teaching of Botany covers a meeting held at the Imperial Institute on "Jan 10" [1900] at which Miss von Wyss of North London Collegiate School read a paper. Pp283-84 summarises the paper.

The Publishers' Circular and Booksellers' Record volume 72 1900 p44 had a reference to Miss von Wyss of the North London Collegiate School giving a paper on Object Lessons in Botany.

PNEU Notes volume 12 number 9 1901; edited by Miss Russel of 26 Victoria St p160 news items sent in by several of its branches including the one in St John's Wood. At the St John's Wood branch meeting of 14 December ?1900 at North Hall, Mortimer Road, Clotilde read a paper: Nature Studies in the Home. In it she made an argument that she came back to very often: that encouraging children to do nature study at home could form the basis of "much moral instruction" pointing out that humans "have life in common with all organisms". Seen 21 July 2013 at website www.amblesideonline.org which is the archive of the magazine The Parents' Review: A Monthly Magazine of Home Training and Culture edited by Charlotte Mason.

The School World volume 7 1905 published by Macmillan and Co: piv has an announcement for a forthcoming series of 6 lectures by Miss von Wyss at the Hampstead Library, Prince Arthur Road: the Biology of Spring. The course would run on one evening each week over February and March and would include practical work. Clotilde was described as lecturer at the London Day Training College.

I couldn't find any sources for Clotilde doing this kind of work after 1905. Perhaps she was obliged to do less of it as her time became more taken up with her LDTC and regular voluntary work.

20 August 2013

AMandragora@attglobal.net

***

The life of GD member Clotilde Rosalie Regina von Wyss in more detail: FAMILY, CAREER IN TEACHING

For those of you who've arrived here other than via my file 'Clotilde's life in dates', she was born in Switzerland in 1871, spent most of her life in England, and died in Surrey in 1938. She was a biologist; a teacher, then a lecturer; and a writer. She never married. She had a long-lasting relationship with another woman.

FAMILY

It's been difficult to find out a great deal about Clotilde's family. Apart from her letters to Marie Stopes and the biographies of Stopes, my sources for her cover her professional life only; and when they mention family details, they all mention the same, bald, few. However, the Stopes connection has been helpful.

Clotilde (born 1871) and her sister Martha (born 1873) were born in Zürich. Their mother - also called Clotilde - was Swiss. I can see from web searches that there are and were people with the surname 'von Wyss' and 'Wyss' living in the Zürich district; perhaps some of the 19th-century ones were relations of Clotilde. In her letters Clotilde mentions relations, including a cousin, living in Bern around 1900.

The only thing I know about Clotilde's father is that he died early in 1900; definitely not in England, probably in Switzerland. From a letter written by Clotilde the day after she'd heard about his death, it's clear that her parents had split up while she was a child (the letter doesn't say exactly when) and that she had never had much of a relationship with him.

Perhaps the split happened in 1884 - though the letter I've just mentioned gave me the impression it had happened long before that - because around that year, Clotilde's mother went to live in London, taking her two daughters with her. She gave the 1891 census official some information on her source of income that is rather puzzling: she told him that her main income came from a sewing-machine company of which she was the secretary. However, the census official listed her as an employer, not an employee, as if her income was share dividends, not a salary. Having learned that she was separated from her husband, I've been wondering if she actually received money from her husband or from his family, the sewing machine company being the original source of it, but it not coming to her directly but via family members or lawyers. I think exactly what Mrs von Wyss was trying to explain to the census official will remain a mystery. She didn't want him to know she was separated from her husband: she told him she was married. Though he might have wondered why, in that case, she described herself (not her husband) as the head of the household.

Clotilde does seem to have spent enough of her childhood in Switzerland to think of it as home; and grew up speaking Swiss German as her first language. Switzerland being the multi-lingual country it is, she could probably speak French well too.

From her earliest years, she had an interest - not just that, a joy and delight - in animals, plants, and the natural world, that comes over (if obliquely) in the more personal of her books. Throughout her life she loved to observe animals and plants, to identify them and to draw them - she illustrated her own books and other people's - and to study their lives. She kept beetles and salamanders at home in her room, where she hoped they would breed; wherever she worked, she set up an aquarium; and when she retired, she began a systematic study of ants' behaviour that might have resulted in some important publications if she had only lived longer.

As a separated woman living on a restricted income, Mrs von Wyss was careful what she spent her money on. In 1891 she was living in Medley Road, a tiny street backing onto the railway just outside West Hampstead station; in number 12, next to the pub on the corner with Iverson Road. The von Wyss's neighbours look to me as though they were on the boundaries between the artisan and the bottom of the middle-class, in the endless gradation of the Victorian class system: the pub owner (pubs weren't really respectable), a couple of clerks, a man who worked in a hairdressing salon, a widow living on an annuity...not quite middle-class, I think you'd say, particularly as none of them had servants that lived in. Rather than paying more rent and living in more respectable, indisputably middle-class surroundings, the elder Clotilde chose to invest her income on educating her daughters at a good school. Perhaps she was looking to a future when they would be able to support themselves and her; so that none of them had to rely on income from her estranged husband. If so, it was very advanced thinking on Mrs von Wyss' part; in the 1880s even middle-class women obliged to live on income from a husband who had left did not always think to educate their daughters for work.

CLOTILDE IN EDUCATION - AS A PUPIL

Clotilde's timing, in being born in the early 1870s, was very good. It meant that she was able to go to one of the schools founded as a result of the efforts of the first generation of reformers of women's education; rather than be haphazardly educated by governesses. Mrs von Wyss' choice of north London as a home was an advantage - because if you could pay, there was actually a choice of secondary schools for girls.

Nearly all the obituaries of Clotilde state that she attended the North London Collegiate School as a pupil. However, in October 2013 the School's Librarian, Nicola Feggetter, told me that Clotilde's staff index card makes no mention of the fact that she had been a pupil. Nor does there seem to be any other information in NLCS archives to suggest she was a pupil there; so I don't know how the idea that she had been one got about. In his book on the history of the Institute of Education, Richard Aldrich says that it was South Hampstead High School that Clotilde attended; and he has proved reliable on other matters. South Hampstead High School is one of the schools set up and run by the Girls' Public Day School Trust (now the Girls' Day School Trust). The GPDST had been founded in 1872 by Maria Grey and Emily Shirreff. Maria Grey had also founded Maria Grey Training College where Clotilde learned to teach.

South Hampstead High School opened in 1876. In 1886 the job of headmistress was given to Mary Sophia Benton, who had taught at the school during its early years. Miss Benton must have been appointed to the job either during Clotilde's time as a pupil or just before she started at the school. She was a new breed of teacher, a product of the first generation's reforms and initiatives. She had been a student at Newnham College and as such, was living proof of a woman's ability to grapple successfully with a university-level syllabus. While she was headmistress, the school focused on language teaching, especially French and German. I wonder if it was Miss Benton who chose the school's motto? - Mehr licht, reputedly the last words of Goethe. Mehr licht was the motto Clotilde chose when she was initiated into the Order of the Golden Dawn. The school's other focus was on sciences - though the emphasis was probably more on botany and perhaps some zoology, rather than physics and chemistry. Physics and chemistry and even zoology were seen as boy's subjects even by women and as a result there was a lack of suitable women teachers for them. Botany was seen as a more feminine subject - it could be taught in girls' schools all-too-conscious of having to justify their existence all the time and avoid being accused of encouraging girls to be unwomanly. As Clotilde was able to teach school-girls and college students a variety of subjects later in life - biology, chemistry, maths, art and nature study - she left school educated to a high level in all of them.

CLOTILDE IN EDUCATION - LEARNING TO TEACH

Later colleagues of Clotilde viewed her as a born teacher. But the choice of work available to even the best-educated young woman was limited in the 1890s, so a career in teaching may have been not so much a choice as an inevitability for Clotilde. There's a lot of indirect evidence in Clotilde's letters to suggest that if her family circumstances had been different Clotilde might have chosen to go to university; but they weren't different, and that option wasn't open to her. I think this is an important point to note, when it comes to considering Clotilde's relationship with her pupil Marie Stopes.

Mrs von Wyss' choice to come to live in north London was vindicated again when Clotilde left school. Without leaving home and thus keeping expenses to a minimum, she was able to get the best teacher-training that was available to women at the time, at Maria Grey College in Fitzroy Square Bloomsbury. The College had been founded in 1878, to train women to work in secondary schools, and successful students left it with a recognised qualification, the Cambridge Teaching Certificate. Clotilde graduated from the College, probably in 1894, with a Distinction in the Certificate exams.

CLOTILDE IN EDUCATION - TEACHING IN SCHOOLS

Clotilde's first job was at St George's High School, Edinburgh and she was on the staff there from 1895 to Easter 1897. The school was set up in 1888 by the Edinburgh Association for the University Education of Women, as part of its wider plan to get Scottish women into university. The Association's plan had been very successful - in 1892, all Scottish universities had been opened up to women, and this must have given classes at St George's an impetus and focus that was perhaps harder to keep up in England where the struggle for that particular equality was still having to be fought. However, the Association's philosophy was based on the work of Friedrich Froebel, that every child should be encouraged to develop their talents - intellectual or otherwise - to the best of their ability. Clotilde's work later in her career shows that this was something she always believed in, so as a first appointment, a spell at St George's School would have been ideal for her. I do not know for sure what subjects Clotilde taught at the school; but I imagine they were the same subjects that she taught later - botany, biology, nature study and art.

While Clotilde was a teacher at the school it was still in its original building in Melville Street in the centre of the city. In 1897, Clotilde was living (probably in lodgings) within a short walk of the school, at 17 Cornwall Street.

At some point during her time working in Edinburgh, Clotilde met the biologist J Arthur Thomson. From 1886 to 1889 he was a lecturer at Edinburgh University. However, from the start of his career he'd always wanted to explain science and its processes to a wider audience, so that in addition to his work in the university's medical school, he ran courses in the university's extra-mural programme. Although I have no direct evidence for when he and Clotilde met and became friends, there are two likely possibilities: that they met through mutual friends in Edinburgh's academic/scientific social circles - the same circles through which Clotilde was introduced to the person or people who recommended her to the GD's members; or that Clotilde took one of Thomson's extra-mural courses. One way or the other, they met as kindred spirits - as lovers of the natural world.

Clotilde's obituary in the Proceedings of the Linnean Society refers to the influence Thomson had on her later work, but didn't go into details (LS members not needing to be told them, I would imagine) so tentatively I put forward two suggestions, a sort-of microcosm and macrocosm, based on Clotilde's books. Firstly: Thomson's emphasis on morphology, on shape and structure, and their use in classification. Observation and drawing are so important in this. And secondly: Thomson's firm belief, which under-pinned everything he did, that the wonders of the natural world were evidence for the existence of a divine Creator. Thomson didn't deny evolution as theorised by Darwin, but he did suppose that evolution was part of the Creator's plan. Even in the 1890s Thomson's belief that a god was necessary for the creation of the world was seen at least by scientists as old-fashioned; but Thomson continued to hold to it, and to argue on its behalf in his books, until his death in the 1930s. Although her books are couched in academic, unemotional language, several of Clotilde's later colleagues remarked on the intensity of her reactions to the wonders of the world around her, one describing them as almost mystical in their depth of emotion. Such reactions argue a very spiritual nature, one not easily contained within orthodox late 19th-century Christianity, though in one of Clotilde's letters she does mention attempting to keep Lent.

Perhaps Thomson's most important influence on Clotilde's work as an educator was an indirect one. In 1927 in her most personal book, Living Creatures, Clotilde writes a few words about standing with Thomson at the side of a moorland pool watching a newt - dull stuff to most of us perhaps, but an exciting and life-enhancing moment for both of them. In her teaching of nature study to children, and later to the future teachers of children, Clotilde tried to instil in them that kind of wonder in the face of Nature's marvels.

During the Easter vacation in 1897, Clotilde moved back to London and joined the staff of the North London Collegiate School (NLCS). Here the links back to the first generation of fighters for women's education were direct and short, the school having been founded in 1850 by the great Frances Buss and having only had one headmistress since her - Miss Buss's own choice as her successor, Dr Sophie Willcock Bryant, who had taken over in 1895. In 1884 Dr Bryant had been the first woman in England to be awarded the D Sc so again, Clotilde was at a school with a strong focus on science. Sophie Willcock Bryant was another keen naturalist and she and Clotilde were close. Perhaps you could think of Dr Bryant as Clotilde's mentor and certainly they remained friends long after Clotilde moved on from NLCS, through Dr Bryant's involvement with Clotilde's later employers.

NLCS already had a Science Club when Clotilde arrived. Miss Aitken, the chemistry teacher, was its president and Clotilde was elected by its pupil members as the Club's vice-president during the 1897 summer term. The Club usually met in school, but when time and exams allowed, Miss Aitken and Clotilde would lead plant and animal collecting expeditions - to Epping Forest in December 1898; and to Stamford Common in July 1899. Clotilde also gave talks to the Club, surrounded by specimens that she and the pupil members had collected. Clotilde formed very close relationships with a group of her most promising pupils, including two who became well-known in different fields later in their lives: Olga Kapteyn; and Marie Stopes. I'll talk at length about this group of pupils below.

CLOTILDE IN EDUCATION - TEACHING TEACHERS

Early in 1901, Clotilde went to work as a lecturer at Cambridge Training College for Women Teachers, now part of Cambridge University as Hughes Hall (named after its founder and first principal, Elizabeth Phillips Hughes). As Clotilde had only five years of teaching experience in 1900, such a step up might seem a bit premature but I don't think so, for two reasons: one - the rapid expansion of education at this time, so that there was always a crying need for experienced teachers to teach others how to teach; two - Clotilde's gifts as a teacher, which were becoming well-known in education circles. She needed all her skills and experience in this very demanding job, teaching science and science illustration; and I get the impression from her letters that she may have had to develop the courses as well as teach them. She listed her current tasks in a letter written in April 1901: she was giving two science lectures and one illustration lecture per week; organising courses of lessons for the students' teaching-practice, sitting in on them and discussing them with the students afterwards - 18 lessons plus 18 'criticism' sessions per week; and correcting 18 sets of teaching-practice notes each week. In addition to this heavy workload she was also doing some private teaching - 9 hours per week of chemistry and maths.

At CTC she encountered two more of the formidable figures in the second generation of women educators. The second was Charlotte Edith Ainslie, who was on the staff by 1901; she became its principal in 1902. The first was Margaret Punnett, a former student at CTC, who was appointed its principal in 1899 but who moved on in 1902 and lured Clotilde away from CTC (not that that was difficult) to work for her back in London. From census day 1901 I have a snapshot of Clotilde, still living in college although it was the Easter holidays; with Charlotte Ainslie as head of household as Margaret Punnett was away; and being visited by Marie Stopes, now a student at London University.

The job at CTC seems to have got Clotilde down almost from the beginning; and running through the letters she wrote in the next year or two are the twin themes of disappointment and failure; and a fear, that she couldn't shake off, that she was not doing the job well enough. It definitely didn't help that by census day 1901 Mrs von Wyss and Martha had returned to live permanently in Switzerland. Clotilde was still in college on that day because she didn't have anywhere else to go. She felt dreadfully lonely.

The one bright spot of Clotilde's time working at CTC was that while she was there, she met Beatrice Ethelwyn Mackie. I want to talk about Clotilde and Ethelwyn more later.

Clotilde was looking for a change of job by 1902. She actually got as far as announcing her resignation from CTC but its governing Council persuaded her to give it one more academic year - hoping, I should imagine, that she'd change her mind about wanting to leave. It was inevitable, under the circumstances, that Clotilde would hear of the existence of the London Day Training College: not only had Margaret Punnett left CTC to work as an administrator and lecturer there but Sophie Willcock Bryant was one of LDTC's founders, and was on its governing body which (at least in the early years) held its meetings at her house in Hampstead.

In the autumn of 1902 Clotilde applied to the LDTC and was appointed lecturer in hygiene, nature study, arts and crafts. She had been mistaken - obviously - in thinking that she had not done well at the CTC. Initially the job at LDTC was two afternoons per week only, so for the last two terms of the 1902/03 academic year Clotilde worked at CTC and LDTC together.

But in the summer of 1903 the job at LDTC was given enough hours (and therefore enough pay) for Clotilde to be able to leave Cambridge and return to live in London at last.

Some reminiscences from men involved with the LDTC in its early years show how brilliant Clotilde was as a teacher, and how memorable she was. G B Jeffery, who was a student and then a lecturer at LDTC, reflected many years later that Clotilde had been given the short straw in being asked to show students how to teach art and nature study; because most of his student friends regarded those subjects as “beneath contempt”. He had watched her succeeding in making them care about them “by the sheer strength of her personality and her infectious love of nature and art”. She was also helped by the Government’s regulations, which made nature study a compulsory subject in elementary schools in 1905. D R Harris, who worked at LDTC from 1902 to 1905, remembered how Clotilde had on one occasion in 1903 saved the day by volunteering to fill in for a scheduled lecturer who hadn’t turned up. Stepping into a lecture-room full of students now noisy and restive at the delay, and with no notes and no preparation, Clotilde had them eating out of her hand within minutes and held their attention to the end of her hour. D R Harris admired the “courage and mettle” she had shown.

Clotilde stayed working at the LDTC until she retired in 1936. This was not a standing-still, however, this was a moving forward and upward while remaining employed at the same place. 1903-36 were years in which the need for teachers continued to expand; and the levels of education required of them continued to rise. In 1909 the LDTC was adopted as a school within London University and so was able to begin teaching under-graduate courses in education. Despite the difficulties presented to the LDTC by the first World War, in 1915 it began to teach an MA course. An important point in Clotilde’s career came in 1922 when the LDTC’s first Principal, John Adams, retired. Percy Nunn took over as Principal and Professor of Education in the University of London and I think it was at this point that Clotilde began to move away (essentially, upwards) from teaching the subjects for which she had been hired, towards teaching the theory and practice of education. Since 1910, Clotilde’s work-load had necessitated part-time help in teaching art. In 1923 Marion Richardson took that post - another teacher widely known as inspired, she was an expert in teaching children how to write. In 1924 Richardson was handling the basics of the art teaching course, and some supervision of students; while T G Derrick taught the relationship of art to the wider world (which included how art was used in commerce and industry); and Clotilde taught individual pupil development, and the relationship of art teaching to education in general.

By the 1930s, Government emphasis was moving away from seeing nature as something to be studied as a whole, towards a more anthropocentric and laboratory-orientated focus on biology as a science, on hygiene and on disease prevention. Although it must have cost her some pangs to see her beloved nature study being pushed to the sidelines, by 1931 Clotilde was the LDTC’s lecturer in biology, involved not only in teaching would-be teachers how to teach the subject according to the new guidelines, but in formulating syllabuses. Her book The Elements of Biology (published in 1931) laid out a course for 12-15-year-olds to follow in preparation for their School Certificate exams. She was still arguing that it was impossible to study any organism without observing it in its native environment; and that the process of close observation could be used as a ‘way in’ to the problems and wider issues of biology.

Throughout this time of expansion and change, the LDTC had continued to be run by the LCC and all those who worked there had been LCC employees. In 1932, however, the LCC handed control of LDTC over to London University and it was renamed the University of London Institute of Education (IOE) - which still exists, of course.

It was the actual practice of teaching that Clotilde loved and was so supremely gifted at: the hands-on interaction with pupils and pupil-teachers. While she was working at the LDTC, she did evening courses in nature study; she led field-trips during the college vacations; and she did voluntary teaching work at Wormwood Scrubs, where she had no problem being left on her own in a room full of up to 70 offenders. She turned down at least one promotion which would have lifted her beyond that daily classroom contact: when Margaret Punnett retired in 1933, Clotilde was offered the part of Punnett's job that was titled 'Warden for Women Students'; she was flattered, of course, but declined it.

CLOTILDE IN EDUCATION - THE IMPORTANCE OF KNOWING NATURE

Moving to London meant that Clotilde was able to get involved (in a way she wouldn't have been able to, living in Cambridge) in a voluntary organisation, the School Nature Study Union (SNSU). It's possible that Clotilde couldn't attend the meeting in October 1903 that set up the SNSU; the names that are mentioned in that connection are the Rev Claude Hinscliffe and Kate Marion Hall. In 1902, Rev Hinscliffe was curate of the inner-city church of St George in the East. And Kate Marion Hall was a botanist who in 1904 became curator of the Stepney Borough Museum, where she installed living fish and even monkeys amongst the stuffed birds inside, and kept bees in a wildflower garden outside. Both were concerned at how little chance East End children had to see, let alone study, the countryside.

Clotilde shared these concerns, and became one of the SNSU's most active members. I'm sure she influenced the focus it came to have, on helping teachers with the nuts and bolts of teaching nature study - she will have been more aware than most SNSU members of how little most teachers knew about the subject themselves, and how they struggled with a lack of equipment and inadequate facilities for experiments, as well as a lack of knowledge. She was a long-serving member of SNSU's executive committee. She contributed two leaflets to the series SNSU published, designed to help teachers with specific nature study projects. She used her position as an employee of the LCC to further the SNSU's aims: she helped set up a scheme whereby LCC-owned equipment and specimens could be loaned out to schools for use in class; and it was almost certainly through Clotilde that the SNSU was able to use the LDTC's building on Southampton Row for its annual conference. And she edited its journal for over 30 years from its first issue in 1906; the article I read on the SNSU named the journal as the SNSU's most useful and widely-known promotional tool. Though the main focus of the journal was botany and zoology, Clotilde was happy to include articles on nature in its widest sense, so geography, geology and astronomy also featured in it.

At conferences and exhibitions, in articles and books, Clotilde argued for importance of nature study, not only in teaching children (particularly urban children) about how the natural world worked; but also as a way of developing character, of instilling the right morals and encouraging the habit of careful observation. She was struggling against the indifference even of education professionals, but she continued to promote her sense of the subject's importance whenever she got the chance.

The emphasis on building moral character was important. It weighed with those who made decisions on how children were educated, what subjects they should study. But I think that Clotilde also wanted to see that as many children as possible were given the chance to go out into the natural world and perhaps feel some of the joy she experienced in watching, studying and drawing it. In the SNSU journal's very first issue, she wrote that the purpose of nature study was to create delight. From 1909 to 1912 Clotilde also worked on a series of books trying to inspire children with those feelings: The Child's World in Pictures for example; Beasts and Birds; and Gardens in their Seasons. Many years later, she returned to the subject in Living Creatures, published in 1927. She was also quick to see the potential of film in preaching nature study to an even wider audience: in 1936 she acted as advisor to an educational film made by Gaumont-British Instructional, showing ants as communal creatures. The film was based on children's nature study work, which Clotilde had overseen.

Clotilde's teachers' aids continued in use a long time after she died: new printings of her SNSU leaflets were issued in the 1950s and as late as 1968; the film was still being shown in the late 1940s. But according to the article I read as my main source for this section, the SNSU didn't make its case strongly enough for the importance of nature study as an integral part of the school curriculum, so the subject was gradually squeezed out of the science syllabus entirely; a failure for which Clotilde must take some share of the blame. She might be having the last laugh though - if you can call it that: perhaps if the beliefs of the SNSU - that understanding and appreciating nature was an important part of children's education - had been taken more seriously, we would not now be in the environmental and climatic mess that we are.

CLOTILDE AS A CLASSIFIER OF SPECIES

I'm sure Clotilde saw the identification of plants - especially unknown ones - as a basic activity in her studies of the natural world. However, with all her other commitments she probably didn't do as much of it as she would have liked - for example, she didn't have a 'identification/classification' article in any botanical or zoological journal (as far as I know). She did do at least one piece of identification work that got published: in 1906/07 she was contacted by Mary Margaret Newett, who was working on the translation into English of the journal kept in 1494 by an Italian priest on a pilgrimage to Jerusalem. Newett had been stumped by a plant which must have been drawn in the journal but mentioned only by its name in Milanese dialect. Clotilde was able to identify the plant, either from a copy of one of the journal's illustrations, or perhaps by visiting Newett and looking at the original manuscript. It was a type of heather; and a note about it appears in Newett's book. It was this kind of work that led to Clotilde being elected a Fellow of the Linnean Society in June 1914.

SOURCES FOR THIS LOOK AT CLOTILDE'S FAMILY AND CAREER see the end of the 'life' file.

5 November 2013

AMandragora@attglobal.net

***

The life of GD member Clotilde Rosalie Regina von Wyss in more detail: PERSONALITY, BELIEFS, RELATIONSHIPS WITH MARIE STOPES AND ETHELWYN MACKIE

For those of you who've arrived here other than via my file 'Clotilde's life in dates', she was born in Switzerland in 1871, spent most of her life in England, and died in Surrey in 1938. She was a biologist and naturalist; a teacher, then a lecturer; and a writer. She never married. She had a long-lasting relationship with another woman.

CLOTILDE'S PERSONALITY

One man who knew the staff of the London Day Training College (LDTC) in its early years first as a student, then as a younger colleague, said many years later that each of them had possessed a uniqueness that made them memorable. One of the things he seems to mean was that they were all at least a little eccentric - he obviously thought (but didn't like to say) that it was true in Clotilde's case. Perhaps her younger colleague had heard the tale of how Clotilde would cross London by tube to work with a wood ants' nest in her handbag.

Percy Nunn, who was Clotilde's colleague at LDTC for three years and her boss for nearly another 30, called her "a rare and very special person". Teachers, students and pupils agreed that her enthusiasm for what she was teaching (and for the process of teaching it) infected even people who had started out thinking the subject was boring and irrelevant. They say that she was witty and vivacious. They admired her courage. And they all agreed - even one who was later very bitter towards her - that Clotilde was popular with everyone, contemporaries and young people alike.

Clotilde's lack of embarrassment in stating her love of the natural world did embarrass some others. Percy Nunn was probably not embarrassed. He described her as having "an almost...mysterious intimacy" with nature. However, Dr Percival Gurrey (another colleague) remembered with some discomfort that a favourite phrase of hers was, "You could get down on your knees to that" - 'that' being a dandelion, or even a particularly good student essay. Some of her colleagues were obviously worried that that one day Clotilde might actually do that - get down on her knees to something that moved her - say, in the middle of the staff room. That sort of thing does make the English cringe though of course Clotilde wasn't English.

A FEMALE WORLD

It's struck me as I've been researching Clotilde's life, how much she lived in a world of women.

Of course, men were around and they were in control: they held the top jobs, they held the purse strings, they took the decisions and women had to cope. But Clotilde's experience of a world of women wasn't that unusual during her lifetime. For various reasons, there were more women living in Britain than men; and assumptions about the appropriate behaviour of men and women - the public life/private life divide - though being challenged, were still tending to cause the two sexes to inhabit different social spaces.

Clotilde doesn't seem to have had any brothers; her father had gone probably before she was a teenager; and any other male relations she might have had lived in another country. She went to a girls' school with women teachers; learned how to teach at a college with only women students; before teaching in two more girls' schools and then another women-only college. Most LDC students even in the early years were women - the generally-held view being that men didn't need to be taught how to teach - and the results of the first World War were that the preponderance of women students was compounded by the employment of more women staff-members in the 1920s. Under those circumstances, I don't find it surprising that Clotilde's closest relationships were with other women.

CLOTILDE, MARIE STOPES and all that jazz

Marie Stopes' papers (now in the British Library) contain a group of letters to her from Clotilde von Wyss (written between 1899 and 1909) which show a close relationship between the two of them. Naturally, Marie Stopes' biographers have all studied them closely, seeing them as important evidence from Stopes' formative years. I hope I've studied them equally closely, but I want to discuss the relationship in a very different way. Focusing not on Stopes but on Clotilde, I've come up with a rather different picture of what was going on than the Stopes biographers have tended to see. I want to make a number of points.

1) with two exceptions, what Marie Stopes wrote to Clotilde von Wyss during those years hasn't survived. Stopes' views on the relationship seem to have changed a lot - essentially getting more embittered - in later years, ending with her making an attack on a woman teacher she had known, on the grounds that she had been a lesbian who preyed on her pupils. Naturally (given what Stopes was saying about her) the teacher wasn't named in the book, but she's generally thought (on the basis of the letters) to be Clotilde.

2) as far as I know, no letters from Clotilde to anybody else have survived. We have nothing to compare Clotilde's to Marie with, to see if the relationship with Marie was unique in Clotilde's life.

3) about the language Clotilde uses. Marie Stopes' biographers have made a great deal of the passionate phrases contained in some of Clotilde's letters, but I would like to suggest that passionate phrases were part of Clotilde's character. I hope I've made clear in my section on Clotilde's working life, that they were part of the normal way in which she expressed herself about the natural world - even about students' essays. She was quite un-selfconscious when she was moved. For example: "I ran wildly at Mother", Clotilde wrote as she described what she did when she opened a welcome and thoughtful birthday present in August 1899. (Actually she ran at the wrong person - the present, an artist's easel, was from Marie). It's as if the words of everyday English isn't sufficient for Clotilde to express her feelings with, when she is strongly moved.

Marie Stopes also uses passionate phrases in one of the two items written by her and filed with the collection of Clotilde's letters: and on that occasion (July 1900) she was writing on behalf of herself and three other pupils as they sent Clotilde a gift at the end of the academic year. "The enclosed" Marie writes (apparently it was a brooch) is "fraught with meaning", representing as it does, not only, "a deep inner tie of friendship" but a "brotherhood" (sic - and interesting seeing they are all girls - 'sisterhood' doesn't convey quite the same meaning, I guess).

It's High Romantic stuff - almost like opera - an aria by Verdi, say. A little old-fashioned, perhaps - it made me think more of Byron and Shelley than the turn of the 20th century. It's a particular way of communicating feeling. No other letters written by Clotilde have survived as far as I know, so we don't know how she expressed herself in letters to other pupils, say - Olga Kapteyn, for example, who shared interests with Clotilde that Marie Stopes didn't, and who was still in touch with Clotilde as late as 1909.

4) "no man is an island" - still less a woman. Women always come as a package deal; and other people were involved in the relationship between Clotilde and Marie Stopes - on both sides. The letters show that Marie Stopes often visited Clotilde at home. However, Marie wasn't unique in this because the letters show Clotilde inviting other people to the house she shared with her Mother and sister - in April 1900 Clotilde bought buns for Gertie (probably her pupil Gertrude Colls) and someone called Dora (another pupil, I imagine), who were going to come to tea, and invited Marie round to share them.

Marie got to know Clotilde's mother and sister and she obviously developed a great fondness for Mrs von Wyss - she was very sweet to her in the few months after the death of Mr von Wyss. Of a bouquet of flowers Marie had sent to Mrs von Wyss in April 1900, Clotilde wrote, "You have made my Mother happy and what that means to me few can realize".

Conversely, Clotilde knew Mr and Mrs Stopes - probably only formally, but she did know them. Marie's father was a palaeontologist - amateur, but well-known. Clotilde had been pleased to meet a man with whom she had interests in common. Two years after Marie had sent condolences to Clotilde when her father died, it was Clotilde's turn to send sympathy on the death of a father; and in her condolences letter to Marie Stopes, Clotilde talked - with her usual 'High Romantic' language - of the "reverence and admiration" she felt for Mr Stopes. Marie's sister Winifred (Winnie) was a pupil at North London Collegiate School so of course Clotilde knew her too - well enough for Winnie, as well as Marie, to write to Clotilde during the holidays. It's clear, though - very clear - that Marie was Clotilde's favourite of the two. Winnie tended to get remembered as an afterthought in Clotilde's letters to Marie and there's not much mention of Winnie in the letters Clotilde wrote after she and Marie had both left North London Collegiate School.

5) June Rose in particular has criticised Clotilde - as the elder woman, the one with responsibilities - for allowing herself to have a close relationship with a pupil. In Clotilde's defence I just want to say that - because Clotilde had trained as a teacher at a young age for the times; and because Marie Stopes started going to school very late (her mother had taught her at home for several years) - there was an age-gap of only nine years between them.

6) the biographers focusing on Marie Stopes have not noticed, I think, that the years 1900 and 1901 were a difficult period for Clotilde, making her particularly vulnerable to and grateful for expressions of sympathy and kindness and declarations of love.

The two years began with news reaching the von Wyss's in London, of the death of Clotilde's father at the beginning of February 1900. The day the news came, Marie had noticed that Clotilde was distressed about something while not knowing the cause. She sent her some flowers, and got in response a 'thank you' note full of despair and anguish. "I have lost my Father then before ever I knew a Father's love and care", Clotilde wrote, and ended that sentence with a phrase she used several times more in her short letter: "the bitterness of it!" I suppose that Marie had asked after all the family, because Clotilde went on to tell Marie not just about her own reactions but also about the feelings of her Mother and Martha: "The event has roused in us all the memories of sorrow and trouble unspeakable long, long buried". She herself had lain awake all the previous night, regretting "this sad end of a sad life" and - though she didn't put this into words - the end of any hope that she would ever have any kind of relationship with her father. Still over-wrought and "worn out with the strain of keeping up appearances all day", she told Marie that she had "consecrated" Marie's lilies "to the memory of my Father, they shall be a symbol of forgiveness". There was a lot that Clotilde, her Mother and her sister, would have to try to forgive.

Perhaps such a letter shouldn't have been sent by a teacher to a pupil, but the shock of the death and the emotions it had aroused, had put Clotilde far beyond thinking of that, she was thinking of Marie as a friend, who'd made a kind gesture of support at a desperate moment.

One of the results of the death of Mr von Wyss - or at least, something that happened within a few months of his death - was that Mrs von Wyss decided to return to live in Switzerland. I think that Mrs von Wyss and Martha had left England by October 1900, probably by the summer. Clotilde opted to stay where work and thus income was guaranteed but without her Mother and sister she began to feel lonely and described herself to Marie as "unutterably homesick", even for a land she hadn't lived in for over a decade. This wasn't the right time for Clotilde to move away from London to a new job in Cambridge, but good jobs didn't come up very often and she probably felt that she couldn't pass on the opportunity of one that she heard of in the autumn of 1900. The application process was lengthy, and there was an unexpected fortnight's delay in telling Clotilde whether or not she was actually going to be offered the post. Clotilde caught a cold and felt very low.

Clotilde did get the job, and by April 1901 was esconced at the "Training College Cambridge". She had been allotted some rooms on the college premises but wrote to Marie that she was still finding it difficult to get to know anyone very well, as she was having to work so very hard. Wearing black for the death of Queen Victoria kept her spirits low and by this time Clotilde was sounding like a person suffering from depression. That and overwork began to tell on her - she wrote a letter to Marie which she found in her desk several weeks later - she'd forgotten to post it. She was worrying about something that she didn't elaborate on in her letter of apology. It may have been anxiety about her work not being up to her own standards or because the job as a whole was not turning out as she'd expected; because she exclaimed, "oh Marie I am so endlessly, endlessly disappointed". However, it may have been family matters that were worrying her, not the job at all, because in a letter written while visiting her family in Switzerland later in 1901, she mentioned that there was now "bitter feeling" between her Mother and Martha, Mrs von Wyss being "disappointed in my sister" for reasons Clotilde didn't elaborate (so presumably Marie Stopes knew what they were).

The summer vacation of 1901 offered Clotilde a few weeks of respite, but then it was back to Cambridge where she hoped she would be able to "produce another year's work, with better results". And it was in November 1901 that Clotilde received from Marie a letter telling her that Marie had received an offer of marriage from a fellow student at University College London. The letter had assured Clotilde that Marie had turned the offer down, but the whole business gave Clotilde confirmation of a fear she was already living with: "a vague dread that you are drifting beyond my reach". She knew that her relationships with her ex-pupils were changing from her side as well: she had cancelled plans to spend time in the summer holidays in London, in order to stay longer with her Mother; and once term had begun she had only had time to write to her Mother and the short letters necessary for business - she hadn't written to Marie Stopes, for example, since August.

The letter Clotilde wrote in reply was quoted or referred to at length in all the biographies of Marie Stopes that I read: it's the letter in which Clotilde wrote, "You have outgrown me, little one, and our life-streams make different windings". None of Stopes' biographers considered or at least they didn't quote the words Clotilde wrote on either side of that sentence: "Can I in any way stay a stream...or determine its course long ago marked out by natural conditions?" Clotilde wrote, using metaphors from the natural world as she often did. "Nor would I do it if I could." This is where the "life-streams" sentence belongs: "our life-streams make different windings. Would we wish it otherwise?"

Clotilde might not like it, but she was facing up to the fact that her ex-pupils were growing up; and would order their lives in ways she wouldn't have wanted (more about what she would have wanted below). She didn't act offended or hurt at Marie's grown-up relationships with men: she ended her letter by making arrangements to meet her and Gertie Colls soon in London; and by sending "Love to Winnie".

Times had changed though: Clotilde didn't write to Marie Stopes again for over a year, until she had finally pulled out of the long period of depression that she had started to slide into in 1900. The death of Marie's father late in 1902 prompted Clotilde to write again and tell Marie some news that would make it easier for them to meet in future - she would soon be working two afternoons each week in London. She had been offered the chance to leave the job in Cambridge the following summer and put behind her the "failures" which "threatened to choke all that is best in me and rob me of all vigour". Clotilde wrote that it had been, "high time my fortune's wheel should turn"; and evidence that it had done so was her current feeling that she was, "ready to move mountains". That being so, Clotilde thought it would be nice to see Marie, either as part of her working afternoons in London, or if Marie could spare the time, over a weekend in Cambridge.

The relationship was certainly winding down, though as late as 1902 Marie was still sending Clotilde a book for Christmas. The remaining three letters from Clotilde in the Marie Stopes collection are all short notes. The first of the three was sent in October 1903, after Clotilde had not been at home when Marie called on her as part of her farewells before leaving to study in Munich. The next after that was in July 1904, in reply to one from Marie, saying she couldn't meet her on the day Marie suggested as she'd already agreed to spend it with old friends of her Mother's before leaving for Switzerland on her yearly round of family visits. Clotilde was very busy supervising teaching practices but hoped to be able to see Marie again if Marie could call on her one evening after 7.

Then all-but-five years went by before Clotilde wrote the last note in the Marie Stopes collection: in April 1909 she asked if Marie would be able and willing to come to a tea-party she was holding for other girls in "the old biology class" to meet up with Olga Kapteyn.

And that was it: not with a bang, with a whimper. Quite how we get from that to the long quote just below is hard to fathom. Unless Marie went to the tea party and there was a 'bang' then.

This is how (in 1926) Marie Stopes described Clotilde's behaviour on p54-55 of her Sex and the Young: the teacher developed relationships with, "a dozen or so girls of adolescent age, each one of whom separately she made believe that she alone was her special favourite...She vowed to each one, and extracted a vow in exchange from each girl, that she would never marry but remain vowed and dedicated to herself. Each separately deluded girl felt herself pledged to remain all her life in a highfaluting (sic) fantastic kind of secret Order based on a muddled mixture of mysticism, pseudo-theosophical fantasies of ‘purity’ and crude physical expressions of personal love and sex feeling. The teacher accepted presents from the girls far beyond their means...Yet with it all so cleverly did she manage the veil of secret loyalty which she spun and which is naturally so congenial to a young mind, that all this continued for years undetected by either parents or head mistress”.

Naturally, Marie Stopes didn’t refer to Clotilde by name: if she had done, Clotilde would have had good grounds to sue her for libel.

I’m going to discuss the “kind of secret Order” below but here I’d just like to say that when she wrote the account of the popular but predatory and manipulative teacher, surely Stopes knew perfectly well that she was exaggerating. Perhaps she hadn’t looked at Clotilde’s letters in a long while; or only with eyes unable any longer to see them in their original light. Ruth Hall, in her Stopes biography, says that Marie Stopes had discovered the existence of masturbation and homosexuality at the age of 29 - that is, around 1909. Perhaps it’s not a coincidence that the relationship between Clotilde and Marie Stopes finally ceased at that time. It seems to me that after these discoveries, Marie started to see sexual perversion everywhere, including places and relationships where it had never been dreamt of.

The section in Sex and the Young may have been decrying perverted sexuality but what I see in the long quote is someone still raging against having discovered that in the competition to be the popular teacher’s Special One, she had not been the only winner. And yet, to feel such outrage at being duped, Marie Stopes would have had to forget that although Clotilde was particularly close to Marie, Marie was one of a small group of favoured pupils, “the old biology class”, all of whom were Marie’s friends. I’m sure that the three other girls who clubbed together with Marie to buy Clotilde the brooch were part of that group.

How Special was Marie Stopes to Clotilde? Pretty special, I think, particularly in the period 1899-1901. Was it love? Perhaps it was, on both sides, particularly during 1900, when Clotilde was struggling to cope with her father’s death; and both she and Marie were thinking of leaving North London Collegiate School soon. Clotilde’s letters make it clear that Marie thought she loved Clotilde and there’s one example in the Stopes Collection letters, a rough-copy of a letter that may never have been sent or at least not in that form, which Marie began, “Psyche my beloved”.

In a couple of her replies Clotilde writes of similarly deep feelings towards Marie. Both were written in 1900, in the months after the death of Clotilde’s father. The first was sent in response to birthday greetings and a gift from Marie, which had stirred up such a level of response that instead of writing her thanks immediately, Clotilde had gone out for a walk through a “ripe cornfield ablaze with dream-flowers”, giving herself up to “passionate thought”. And when she and Marie were both about to leave North London Collegiate School, she replied to gifts of a painting and some flowers from Marie, “My innermost being thanks you...and my soul gratefully loves you for it...What shall I do without you - oh that pain of parting it nearly wears me out. Good night my dear one”.

1900 was the most intense period of the relationship. At the end of the year, Marie started at University College London and Clotilde moved to Cambridge. Finding the new job much harder and less enjoyable than she'd probably expected, Clotilde had little time for deep feeling or even keeping in touch. She does seem to have had time to reflect on the relationship with her ex-pupil and - perhaps - come to some realistic conclusions about it: that it could scarcely continue as it had done; that now she had left school (at the late age of 20) Marie was likely to start growing up and leaving old relationships and feelings behind; and that - no longer seeing her every school day - there was precious little Clotilde could do about it. The letter from Marie telling her of the marriage proposal she had received did not come as a complete surprise.

I don't know, of course, exactly how what feelings Marie Stopes expressed for Clotilde in her letters after this relationship-changing one. After receiving it, Clotilde did not write to Marie so often. In her letter of condolence after Mr Stopes's death, she expressed "love" but also "sympathy" and after the first paragraph, the letter was a 'what's been happening to me' one. "My old love to you", actually used first by Clotilde in July 1900 now seemed appropriate as a letter-ending, and she used it once or twice more, the last time in 1904 when she hadn't even seen Marie for over a year.

Marie Stopes' biographers Ruth Hall and June Rose agree that it's very unlikely that Marie Stopes and Clotilde von Wyss ever had sex. Under different circumstances - if they had both been wilder characters, or from different social circles - maybe it would have ended that way. I do wonder about the "passionate thought" that Clotilde allowed herself while walking through the cornfield; but even if her thoughts were sexual, I think Clotilde's own temperament inclined her towards a sex-free life. 'Thought' was as far as she was going to allow any sexual feelings to go.

I think that (if Marie had told her about it) Clotilde would have agreed, overall, with Mr Stopes' order (I think that 'order' is probably the right word) that Marie should not even think of marriage - ie entering into a sexual relationship - until she was at least 25. In fact, Clotilde makes clear in many of the letters that she hoped Marie wouldn't marry at all - that part of Marie Stopes' indictment in Sex and the Young has some truth in it.

The Stopes biographers all consider Clotilde as Marie Stopes' teacher; but I look at the letters in a different way - Marie Stopes as Clotilde's pupil. The girls in "the old biology class" were amongst Clotilde's favourites but Marie Stopes stood out because academically she was the best of them and was likely to go the furthest. Even after the bombshell news that at least one of her fellow-students wanted to marry Marie - perhaps I should say especially after that letter - Clotilde was all ears for news of Marie as a student. Again and again she writes back delighted to hear of yet more exam success on Marie's part and when Marie was off to do postgraduate work in Munich she wished her well with, "come home covered with glory, when you have helped forward the cause of scientific study". Some of the glory would be wearing off on Clotilde, of course, as one of the teachers who had prepared Marie Stopes for a career as a research scientist. (Marie started out as a palaeobotanist, putting neatly together the influences of her father and Clotilde.) "My child" and "Dear child of mine" can be read as Clotilde viewing Marie as, in some part, her own intellectual creation. "I am proud of all the things you have done", she wrote in reply to the bombshell, and it's in this context that I understand a phrase she uses that was used in June Rose's biography to suggest an emotional possessiveness on Clotilde's part: "I still consider you my property". Intellectual property, that is. Clotilde feared not so much that Marie would marry; but that Marie would marry and have to give up her academic work. In her reply to the letter with Marie's bombshell in it, Clotilde said that she wished she had Marie with her. Again, I read it not a wish to keep Marie to herself, but a wish to keep Marie in Clotilde's familiar world of women, beyond the reach of any man who might bring an end to her brilliant career. It couldn't be done, of course; Clotilde accepted that Marie would make her own decisions.

CARA SOROR

In Sex and the Young Marie Stopes accused the anonymous predatory teacher of binding pupils to her via a “highfaluting (sic) fantastic kind of secret Order based on a muddled mixture of mysticism, pseudo-theosophical fantasies of ‘purity’ and crude physical expressions of personal love and sex feeling”. Marie Stopes seems to be suggesting that Clotilde initiated some of her pupils into something like the Golden Dawn. I say ‘something like’ because the GD was a very restrained magical order, with nothing like ‘physical expressions of personal love and sex’ going on in it; Aleister Crowley, when he joined, was very disappointed that there wasn't.

There's definitely some truth in Marie Stopes' accusation. “Soror” is the Latin word for ‘sister’; like ‘frater’ - brother - it was a term used by members of the GD; something Clotilde would have been well aware of by the first of her letters to Marie (August 1899). But she would also have known that the GD was a secret society, and that she shouldn't have mentioned anything about it to anyone not in it. What was she up to?

I think it goes back to “the old biology class” - the girls who gave her the brooch, and probably one or two others. In the letter that Marie composed to go with the brooch, she described the brooch as a gift to Clotilde in recognition that there was a state of “brotherhood” between her and the four girls who were presenting the brooch. The brooch was also a sign that all four of them would in the future work to, “illuminate...the dark unfathomable enigma of Life”. Marie, as spokeswoman for the four of them, hoped that whenever Clotilde wore the brooch she would remember them all as a group, although in the future they might all be separated by distance and circumstance. And Clotilde did remember: in August 1901 when - writing to “My dear little soror” - Clotilde said about the group “how I love to think of the set of you”. And if the “brotherhood” and the “old biology class” were the same people - I think they must be - she was still thinking of them, together, in 1909.

Clotilde does seem to have created a kind of ‘inner circle’ of pupils who considered themselves bound together with her as more than just teacher and pupils, by mutual devotion and a grand purpose that the pupils would attempt to achieve in the rest of their lives. Marie Stopes seems to be saying that vows of personal loyalty were exacted; and/or perpetual chastity. If they were, Clotilde doesn't seem to have been determined to hold the pupils to them once they had left school; her letter to Marie after the news of the marriage proposal does not insist that the vows were a binding contract. I don't actually think that it was a very good idea for Clotilde to create this “brotherhood” or sisterhood. Secret Orders of that kind are ideas not to be taken lightly, nor entered into too young. But it was probably fun for a while; and the exclusivity of the girls in the “brotherhood” was something they could feel pleased about when sitting with their classmates who were excluded without even knowing it.

If Marie Stopes' scathing 1926 summing-up of this “brotherhood” is correct (and heaven knows) the grand purpose was a theosophical one. The girls seemed to have had some discussion of theosophy with Clotilde by that time: in the first letter in the Marie Stopes Collection, Clotilde disclaims any chance of having found “the Key to Theosophy”. She had encouraged Marie at least, and probably the others, to read books on theosophy - she mentioned being glad to hear that Marie had been reading Edwin Arnold's The Light of the World. She urged Marie to keep an open mind when considering works of Eastern philosophy; while at the same time admitting that the search for the Key was doomed to failure: "we shall never in this life complete that glorious song of truth, insight and adoration for which our soul craves" (High Romantic language again). At some stage - though not in this letter - Clotilde explained to her "brotherhood" that the search for the Key was helped by living a pure life. In 1926 Marie Stopes was interpreting 'purity' solely in the sexual sense; and seeing any attempt to insist on it as perverted and against the principles of eugenics. Her emphasis was too narrow - I've said she was seeing sex everywhere, and she seems not to have been able to see anything else in this case. It was true that in theosophical circles, sexual abstinence was approved of as likely to be a great help in the search for enlightenment. It was not enforced, though, and to theosophists 'purity' also encompassed drinking no alcohol and being a vegetarian, amongst other things.

Even theosophy was not on a par in Clotilde's mind with the glories of the natural world as a basis for a rich spiritual life. Clotilde's own soul sang amidst the beauties of Nature and when reading authors with similar views - like Henry David Thoreau, a book of whose writings she gave to Marie as a Christmas present in 1900. Neither theosophy nor transcendent Nature convinced Marie Stopes, but one of the "brotherhood" did retain an interest in theosophy throughout her life. In the concentration on Marie Stopes, and the absence of other letters by Clotilde, the relationship between Clotilde and Olga Kapteyn has been overlooked. It hasn't helped that Olga left England as soon as she had finished school and lived the rest of her life in Europe; mostly in Switzerland.

Clotilde was a scientist with a deep appreciation of art. She could combine these two traits in her drawings of plants and animals, but they are an unusual pair and most people choose to follow one or the other of them. Marie Stopes - encouraged by her Father - went with the science. Olga followed the art.

I found a surprising amount about Olga Kapteyn via the web - but then I'd rather expected to find nothing at all, like I had done with Gertrude Colls and Christine Pugh who were also in Clotilde's "brotherhood". Most of the information I did find was under her married name of Froebe-Kapteyn (also spelled Fröbe-Kapteyn).

Although Olga was born in England (in 1881) both her parents were Dutch. Her father, Albertus Philippus was an engineer and her mother Geertruida a feminist and social campaigner. On leaving North London Collegiate School, Olga went to study art history at Zürich University. I haven't been able to find out what she was doing in the 1900s but in 1909 she married the orchestral conductor Iwan Fröbe (or Froebe). He had been born in what is now Croatia. Because I can't read German I probably haven't understood the information on him that I found on the web but he seems to have worked with the Munich Tonkünstler orchestra around 1910, as their principal conductor or a guest conductor; and later worked in Berlin because that's where he and Olga were living when World War 1 was declared. When the war broke out they moved to Zürich and Olga lived in Switzerland for the rest of her life. She and Iwan had twin daughters but Iwan was killed in a plane crash shortly before they were born in 1915.

In 1920 Olga moved to Ascona where she got to know Carl Jung, who spent his summer holidays there. The idea that became the Eranos Conferences (or seminars) originally came from Jung and the Rudolf Otto, author of The Idea of the Holy. But it was Olga who did all the work necessary to bring them into existence. They were a forum where experts in different disciplines could meet to discuss spirituality: in order to 'pay' for your attendance at one, you had to make a speech on that year's conference topic. The conferences were still going in the 1950s.

As late as the 1920s, Olga was still studying theosophy and Indian philosophy: the first Eranos conference was on yoga and meditation. Under Jung's influence, however, she began to research archetypes. In 1956 she founded the Archive for Research in Archetypal Symbolism (see its website at aras.org). She died in 1962.

Olga, like Marie Stopes, was a pupil after Clotilde's heart - but interested in and following up all the interests that Marie rejected. Although they probably didn't meet very often after Olga left England, they must have kept in touch at least until 1909 and probably much longer: when Olga paid a visit to England in April of that year, she went to have tea with Clotilde who invited other members of "the old biology class" to meet her.

If Marie had discovered at any time that Clotilde had a close and intense relationship with Olga Kapteyn, rather like the one she thought she had exclusively with Clotilde herself... It's pure speculation but if it was true, it might explain some of the hostility beyond the call of duty that Marie Stopes displayed towards Clotilde in 1926.

BEATRICE ETHELWYN MACKIE

As Marie Stopes continued to rage in Sex and the Young about the manipulative lesbian teacher she had known, the last accusation she made against the woman was that she was now in a relationship with another woman, one that showed every sign of being permanent; and that despite this, both partners were still employed as teachers.

It's likely that Clotilde saw meeting Beatrice Ethelweyn Mackie in a very different light: as the only good thing that happened to her in the miserable years 1900 and 1901.

Clotilde and Ethelwyn met at Cambridge Training College for Women Teachers. Clotilde was a lecturer, and Ethelwyn was a student, but this was no adolescent-snatching exercise: Clotilde was slightly the younger, though only by a few months. Although Ethelwyn never published more than a couple of leaflets on how to teach specific topics in nature study, she shared Clotilde's interest in the subject and must have taught it; she was also an active member of the Schools Nature Study Union. Ethelwyn was not Clotilde's brilliant pupil; but Clotilde had more in common with her than she had with Marie Stopes: a better basis for a long-term relationship.

Ethelwyn Mackie had grown up near Wakefield in Yorkshire, where her father, Edward Alexander Mackie, and her mother, Emma Gertrude (née Dunn), were both the children of corn merchants. Edward Alexander continued to run the family business. He and Emma Gertrude were very comfortably off - in 1881 they were living in the manor house at Warmfield-cum-Heath, where they employed six servants including a butler (butlers came expensive). Ethelwyn was one of the older daughters in their large Victorian family. She was much less well-educated than Clotilde: although she may have gone to school for a year or two, in 1881 at least, she and her sisters were being educated at home by a governess. Any scientific knowledge that Ethelwyn gained was likely to have been hard-won, and on her own initiative. She might even have been one of the private pupils that Clotilde taught maths and chemistry to, during her time in Cambridge.

Times were changing but I think there was some resistance in the family to Ethelwyn's wish to train as a teacher and earn her own living. Family resistance would explain why she didn't start at training college until she was nearly 30; perhaps by then her parents had finally accepted that she was not likely to marry, or didn't want to.

Clotilde and Ethelwyn were friendly enough to be writing to each other in the summer vacation of 1901. But their big chance to get to know each other very well came when Ethelwyn's holiday in Norway fell through. She had been ordered to spend time in a mountain climate by her doctor; so she wrote to Clotilde and suggested that they pair up to go climbing (she can't have been that ill!) in Switzerland - where Clotilde was already, visiting her family. There was no question (it seems) of keeping this holiday with another woman a secret from Marie Stopes. Clotilde was quite open about it, though she felt it necessary to give Marie two reasons for agreeing to go: "Of course I was delighted [to agree to Ethelwyn's plan] because I too was a lonely female, besides I am very fond of her". 'Very fond' - nothing to get het up about in that, surely - and Marie didn't get het up.

Clotilde and Ethelwyn chose St Antonien (near Bern) as their base and rented a room in the vicarage. The weather wasn't always good but Clotilde told Marie they had still been able to do "a big climb" every day. Clotilde wrote a typically lyrical description of the two of them sitting on a mountain-top where there was still snow in the gullies, "beholding the holiness of beauty" in the peaks and clouds around. On one day they splashed out some money hiring a guide so that they could attempt the highest local peak, one that hadn't been scaled by a woman before. They were spending nearly all their time out of doors, nature-trekking when the weather didn't allow climbing. Clotilde told Marie that she had caught two salamanders during their expeditions and was intending to bring them back to England in her luggage. They came back down to Bern by a circuitous route so that they could visit a local pilgrimage site.

Close though they might have been, there had never been any suggestion that Clotilde and Marie Stopes should go on holiday together on their own. Even if they had gone off together I don't think Clotilde would have enjoyed a holiday in the Swiss Alps with Marie in quite the same way. In Ethelwyn she had found someone who shared some of her joy in Nature - who didn't just see it as an arena for scientific research, but could understand why Clotilde should feel exalted just by looking at it.

Clotilde did not mention Ethelwyn Mackie again in her letters to Marie Stopes until the letter of December 1902 offering Marie love and sympathy on her father's death. However, Clotilde's friendship with Ethelwyn had gone on apace, because in the same letter she told Marie that she had been invited to spend Christmas with Ethelwyn's family in Scarborough. She wrote her thank-you letter for Marie's Christmas gift from the Mackie's house there "in the midst of the riots of this lively household".

Clotilde didn't mention Ethelwyn by name in her three remaining letters to Marie Stopes so this next bit is conjectural, but I think that Clotilde and Ethelwyn were sharing their first flat together by October 1903: "I wish you could have seen our little flat", Clotilde wrote, on learning that Marie had called on her when she was out - so she was certainly sharing with someone. Given the evidence from the 1911 census and elsewhere - including Marie Stopes' allegation of a lesbian relationship between them, still going on in the early 1920s - I think it's reasonable to suppose that "our" means Clotilde and Ethelwyn. The flat was in London where Clotilde was certainly working by 1903 and Ethelwyn probably was.

Somerset Terrace, facing Euston Road, was very convenient for Clotilde's work but not necessarily for Ethelwyn's. Flats near Euston Road were also noisy, dirty and you didn't get many rooms for your money. By 1908, possibly earlier, Clotilde and Ethelwyn had moved to Cromwell Mansions, on King Street Hammersmith near Ravenscourt Park. It was a large flat, with six rooms in addition to the scullery and bathroom. Although Ethelwyn filled in the census form, she described Clotilde and herself as joint heads of household, wanting to show the census officials that they shared the responsibility. It was just the two of them in the flat - they did not employ any servants who lived in. Their incomes might not have run to that expense, of course, and even if it had, they might have chosen to spend their money differently. They probably sent their heavy laundry out to professionals to be washed, and had a cleaner in by the day - one who could be relied upon not to panic at the sight of Clotilde's wildlife.

In 1911, Ethelwyn was working as a secondary-school teacher for Middlesex County Council; and I imagine that she had taken that job immediately on leaving the training college because that would have been typical of work-patterns at that time when there was much less moving from job to job than there is now. I also suppose that she remained as an MCC employee until she retired, which would have been at about the same time as Clotilde did (1936).

The evidence for a stable and long-term relationship between Clotilde and Ethelwyn is pretty clear in 1911. I can't prove that they continued to live together after that date, though I'm sure they did and if they didn't, they remained very close. There's the hostile evidence of Marie Stopes that they were a couple in the mid-1920s, and plenty of other indirect evidence from Clotilde's later books.

In the late twenties, Clotilde went back to writing after a gap of over a decade (mostly caused by the first World War, I imagine, with its financial uncertainties and its shortages of paper and compositors). She produced a series of books for an adult audience, some for people who were interested in nature study as a leisure pursuit, others for use by those who had to teach it. In Clotilde's prefaces to three of the books, she thanks Ethelwyn for help of the sort all authors need during the process of getting their ideas out of their heads, onto paper, and away to the publishers. Most authors thank their partner for help of this sort; and I think so did Clotilde. Ethelwyn gave "sympathetic interest" and "valuable criticism"; she undertook the "wearisome task of revising the typescript"; and carried out the "correction of proof sheets". Ethelwyn was involved in every stage of the preparation of the books. In addition, the most personal of them, Living Creatures (published 1927) is dedicated to her. So I don't think there's much doubt that the relationship between Clotilde and Ethelwyn was still fine, after nearly 30 years.

Some time in the 1930s - probably on her retirement in 1936 - Clotilde moved out of London to Mousehill Down, on Witley Common near Godalming. Although I haven't been able to find any direct evidence, I imagine that Ethelwyn moved there with her and it might even have been Ethelwyn that suggested Surrey as the kind of place they would enjoy, because relations of hers had lived at Ewell during her childhood so she probably knew the county well.

Did the relationship involve sex? I've indicated above why I think not.

I don't think it matters much. Surely what matters is the close emotional bond that's indicated by Clotilde and Ethelwyn being together for so long. They supported each other, they could rely on each other. Marie Stopes' greater knowledge of what a relationship between two women might involve meant that she could not see it in the light of a life-time's emotional support and common interests. The result was that she comes across as less broad-minded about it than Ethelwyn's family. When she made her Will, Clotilde named Ethelwyn as one of the executors. The other was Rupert Harold Whalley, son of Ethelwyn's sister Elsie. Elsie was living in south-east London, at least before the first World War, and the two sisters had obviously kept in touch.

Clotilde died in November 1938 after only two years of retirement. Ethelwyn lived on for another twenty years. She didn't stay in Surrey - perhaps she found it too difficult to go on living there without Clotilde. She died in Sidmouth in 1956.

**

SOURCES FOR THIS LOOK AT CLOTILDE'S RELATIONSHIPS

for most, see the 'life' file at the start of this sequence; but here I'll give again the details of the Letters and the Marie Stopes biographies I used, which include references to Ethelwyn Mackie:

The Letters I continually refer to are: British Library Additional Manuscripts number 58538; Stopes Papers volume XCII ff 222. There are 22 letters from Clotilde to Marie Stopes in the group; one piece by Marie, probably a first try at a letter later sent to Clotilde with a gift from Marie and three other pupils - Olga Kapteyn, Gertrude Colls and Christine Pugh; and one letter from Marie presumably another first-try. The earliest letter is from August 1899; the last is from April 1909; however, most were sent between 1899 and 1901.

Marie Stopes: A Biography by Keith Bryant. London: The Hogarth Press 1962. He quotes from letters between the two, but doesn't name Clotilde or even say she was one of Marie's teachers.

Marie Stopes: A Biography by Ruth Hall. London: Virago 1978. Hall names Clotilde and identifies her as the young woman teacher castigated anonymously by Stopes in Sex and the Young.

Marie Stopes and the Sexual Revolution by June Rose. London and Boston Mass: Faber and Faber 1992.

For Olga Kapteyn:

At www.genealogieonline.nl there's a 2-generation family tree for Olga and her parents.

There's no mention of any siblings in it. I don't read Dutch, so I don't know where the genealogical information has come from. The family don't appear on the censuses of 1881, 1891 or 1901 - visiting family in Holland, I suppose.

Information on wikipedia is under Olga Fröbe-Kapteyn.

Olga is mentioned, with some biographical material, in Edges of Experience: Memory and Emergence by Lyn Cowan 2006, which is a book about Jungian psychology: pp834-835. You can see the text at this website as well: dev.iaap.org which is the home of the International Association for Analytical Psychology, its page Walking in the Footsteps of Eranos is written by Robert Hinshaw who works for the IAAP in Switzerland.

5 November 2013

AMandragora@attglobal.net

Elizabeth WALTON who was initiated into the Golden Dawn in May 1899 taking the Latin motto 'Per crucem ad lucem'. There was no address for her in the GD records.

Despite having so little information to go on, other than her name, I did take a look at the 1901 census: there were 977 women called Elizabeth Walton living in England alone.

BASIC SOURCES I USED for all Golden Dawn members.

Membership of the Golden Dawn: The Golden Dawn Companion by R A Gilbert. Northampton: The Aquarian Press 1986. Between pages 125 and 175, Gilbert lists the names, initiation dates and addresses of all those people who became members of the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn or its many daughter Orders between 1888 and 1914. The list is based on the Golden Dawn's administrative records and its Members' Roll - the large piece of parchment on which all new members signed their name at their initiation. All this information had been inherited by Gilbert but it's now in the Freemasons' Library at the United Grand Lodge of England building on Great Queen Street Covent Garden.

Family history: freebmd; ancestry.co.uk (census and probate); findmypast.co.uk; familysearch; Burke's Peerage and Baronetage; Burke's Landed Gentry; Armorial Families; thepeerage.com; and a wide variety of family trees on the web.

Famous-people sources: mostly about men, of course, but very useful even for the female members of GD. Oxford Dictionary of National Biography. Who Was Who. Times Digital Archive.

Catalogues: British Library; Freemasons' Library.

Wikipedia; Google; Google Books - my three best resources. I also used other web pages, but with some caution, as - from the historian's point of view - they vary in quality a great deal.

27 April 2012

AMandragora@attglobal.net

The person who appears in The Golden Dawn Companion p161 as Jemima Tertia WARNER did not exist, she's a very understandable transcription error made by R A Gilbert when he was reading off names from the GD's Members' Roll. See Jemima Tertia MANDER.

BASIC SOURCES I USED for all Golden Dawn members.

Membership of the Golden Dawn: The Golden Dawn Companion by R A Gilbert. Northampton: The Aquarian Press 1986. Between pages 125 and 175, Gilbert lists the names, initiation dates and addresses of all those people who became members of the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn or its many daughter Orders between 1888 and 1914. The list is based on the Golden Dawn's administrative records and its Members' Roll - the large piece of parchment on which all new members signed their name at their initiation. All this information had been inherited by Gilbert but it's now in the Freemasons' Library at the United Grand Lodge of England building on Great Queen Street Covent Garden.

Family history: freebmd; ancestry.co.uk (census and probate); findmypast.co.uk; familysearch; Burke's Peerage and Baronetage; Burke's Landed Gentry; Armorial Families; thepeerage.com; and a variety of one-family genealogy websites.

Famous-people sources: mostly about men, of course, but very useful even for the female members of GD. Oxford Dictionary of National Biography. Who Was Who. Times Digital Archive.

Catalogues: British Library; Freemasons' Library.

Wikipedia; Google; Google Books - my three best resources. I also used other web pages, but with some caution, as - from the historian's point of view - they vary in quality a great deal.

24 April 2012

AMandragora@attglobal.net

Elizabeth Watkin Mills was initiated into the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn at its Isis-Urania temple in London, on 21 March 1896. She chose the Latin motto 'Semper procedo'.

William Thomas Horton was initiated on the same evening. Elizabeth Watkin Mills may have known Horton, but probably not. She didn't follow up her initiation at all as far as the records show, and in due course she was deemed to have resigned by default.

This is one of my short biographies. They mostly cover GD members who lived in Bradford, Liverpool and Edinburgh. I've done what I can with those people, using the web and sources in London. I'm sure there's far more information on them out there, but it will be in record offices, the local papers...I'd need to be on the spot to look at them, and I've had to admit that life's too short!

Sally Davis

March 2016

This is what I have found on ELIZABETH WATKIN MILLS. I found plenty of information on her husband, but only 'family history'-type information on her.

IN THE GD

Virtually nothing. Though I can suggest that she was offered the chance of initiation through a friend of both her and her husband, Frederick Crowe, who had been initiated in 1893 and knew a lot of the GD's freemason members. Elizabeth had known Fred Crowe since 1881 if not earlier.

I spotted some information on the web that suggested to me that Elizabeth was related to several other GD members by marriage, through the Hore family of Devon and Cornwall. GD members Thomas Coffin and the Coryn brothers, Herbert and Sidney - all born in Cornwall - had relations who were called Hore. Though how well Elizabeth knew the Coffin and Coryn (originally Corin) families I wouldn't know, and in any case I might be mistaken about the relationships.

ANY OTHER ESOTERIC INTERESTS?

Not that I know of. Unlike many GD members, she was never a member of the Theosophical Society.

ANY OBITUARIES/BIOGRAPHIES?

No. There are several for her husband but she's not mentioned in all of them.

BIRTH/YOUTH/FAMILY BACKGROUND

Elizabeth Watkin Mills was born in 1849, in Northam near Bideford in Devon. Her parents were Edward Hore and Elizabeth née Lashbrook Honey, who had married in 1847. Edward Hore worked in one of Northam's ship-yards; during the 1860s he was promoted to be the yard foreman. Edward and Elizabeth had five children. After GD member Elizabeth came Edward junior, born 1852; William born 1857; Thomas Hilton, born 1861; and Miriam born in 1864, who was registered as 'Minnie' Hore though all the census information indicates that 'minnie' was a mistake by the registrar.

I couldn't find Elizabeth's family on the 1851 census, but on the day of the 1861 census (a few weeks before Thomas Hore's birth), they were living in a house that remained in the family until 1900: 87 Cross Street, Northam. On census day 1861 they had some lodgers, the Hilton sisters who had all been born in the Far East. However, taking in boarders seems to have been a welcome but temporary addition to the budget - the Hores never had lodgers on any other census. Nor did Edward and Elizabeth senior ever have any live-in servants. In those respects they were a typical, artisan couple, though their children all moved into the middle-classes - ending up, or marrying, someone who didn't work with their hands.

By the day of the 1871 census I daresay a lot had changed in the Hore family but there wasn't yet much sign of it in their census information. Edward and Elizabeth Hore senior were still living at 87 Cross Street; all their children apart from Elizabeth were still at home; and only Edward junior was working - as a ship's carpenter, probably in the yard where his father worked. Elizabeth the GD member was not with them, though; she was with her husband and they were not in the UK.

Sources: freebmd, census 1851, 1861, 1871.

ELIZABETH'S HUSBAND

In the spring of 1869 Elizabeth Hore married a man whose name was - at this stage - Robert Mills. Plain Robert Mills had been born in Painswick, Gloucestershire, in 1849. I think you can call him a late developer - he was in his mid-30s before his career as a baritone soloist really began. For his work as a concert musician, he added another surname to the one he had already got, and became ROBERT WATKIN-MILLS.

A couple of years ago when I first started investigating Elizabeth Watkin-Mills, there was nothing much on the web about her husband. Now, though, there's plenty: he has a wiki page; he comes up in an online Canadian music encyclopaedia; there are photographs; and there are even some recordings of him singing - his career lasted into the gramophone era. So I won't dwell too much on Robert Watkin-Mills, I'll just pick out some aspects of his work that interested me; and speculate about how the change affected Elizabeth, whose parents wouldn't have been able to afford to give her any musical training, even if she had shown any talent.

I wonder whether Elizabeth and Robert were in Italy on the day of the 1871 census. Robert Watkin-Mills' early life is not well dated in the sources you can find now. They do all agree that he spent time in Milan, studying singing with Federico Blasco, but none of them say when. It's only speculation on my part that he was living in Milan in the early 1870s. It wasn't until the mid-1880s, that his career finally reached a point at which concerts he was singing in were advertised in the Times. As late as 1881, he and Elizabeth were living in Wells - just round the corner from GD member Frederick Crowe - and as well as doing some professional singing (probably in the cathedral choir) Robert was running a firm that did monumental masonry work (again, probably for the cathedral as well as cemetery headstones).

By the 1890s, Robert Watkin-Mills was a well-known music professional, specialising in oratorio. He also worked with chamber ensembles and sang some lieder but I can't find any evidence that he did opera. He sang regularly at the Royal Albert Hall at Proms and other concerts, and at the Three Choirs festival. He was particularly associated with The Messiah, Judas Maccabaeus and Elijah, but he was also willing to sing works that were not so well-beloved at that time. He did at least one performance of Beethoven's Mass in D, for example; and in June 1891 he also sang in what was only the tenth performance in Britain of Bach's B-Minor Mass, with Charles Villiers Stanford conducting. From the mid-1890s he did concert tours in the USA nearly every year; and in 1904-05 he also toured Australia.

He was a really busy man; and Elizabeth ended up living a far more comfortable life (from the financial point of view) than she may ever have expected. She didn't have any children, and though she might have been very sad about that, it meant she was free (if she wanted to) to go with Robert on his tours and see more of the world than most people.

Sources:

Who was Who Volume 3 1929-40 p 944.

From the web at www.thecanadianencyclopedia.com, the Encyclopedia of Music In Canada: Robert Watkin Mills. Born 4 March 1849 in Painswick Glos; d Toronto 10 Dec 1930. Studied music w Samuel Sebastian Wesley in Gloucester; w Edwin Holland in London; and Federico Blasco in Milan. Debut at Crystal Palace 1884 began his public career. Oratorio, partic kn f role in Judas Maccabaeus. From 1894 yearly concert tours of N Am; toured Australia 1904-05. He made a few records in 1903 and 1907-08. 1914 settled in Winnipeg w job of choirmaster at Broadway Methodist Church there. Marr 1919 Elsie Cantell, organist and singer. They moved to Toronto 1922 wh he was choirmaster and she organist at Knox Church; he also took priv pupils. His last public perf was at age 77 singing Messiah. In this there is no mention of a prior wife.

Issues of the Times 1890-1914; for concerts in which Robert Watkin-Mills sang.

See bbc.co.uk/proms/archive for details some concerts featuring Robert Watkin-Mills in 1895, singing Gounod and Mendelssohn and being conducted by Henry Wood.

MARRIED LIFE

By 1891, Elizabeth and Robert had moved to London and were living in a house called Glencoe, on Hyacinth Road in the suburb of Roehampton. A house that was named rather than numbered, and an address in Roehampton, argue a very comfortable income. Perhaps, though, the Watkin-Mills were not quite comfortable about splashing out on too many of the trappings of middle-class status, when Robert's income could be interrupted by (say) a bout of bronchitis: they were employing only the one basic general servant. Elizabeth's sister Miriam was visiting them on census day.

By census day 1901, Elizabeth and Robert had left Hyacinth Road. They probably had a house in London still, but on census day they were in Torquay - taking a break, perhaps, and giving Elizabeth time away from London after the death of her mother only three weeks before. On census day Robert had gone to stay with their friend Frederick Crowe, in Upton St Mary. Elizabeth had not gone with him. She'd stayed at the house they were renting - Broadlands, in Bromhill Road, Tormohan, Torquay. Now that Robert was working so regularly in the USA, she was willing to employ two servants, a cook and a housemaid. Her niece (who was probably also her god-daughter) Elizabeth Mills, was staying with her.

Census day 1911 found the Watkin-Mills out of London again. This time they were in Sussex; at Shoreham-by-Sea near Brighton, renting a house called The Warren. Robert was still working, but at over 60 his career as a singer was reaching its end. He and Elizabeth were back to being careful, employing just the one servant; and they didn't have any visitors this time.

Sources: census 1891, 1901, 1911.

Elizabeth's niece, Elizabeth Ann Mills, was born in Wells in 1884: that much I discovered from freebmd. I wasn't able to identify her for certain on any census except the one in 1901.

DEATH

I'm fairly sure that Elizabeth died, at Hastings, in the summer of 1914. However, if she did, her death was registered as 'Mills', not Watkin-Mills. I've taken as confirmation of this date of death, what happened to her husband that year: Robert Watkin-Mills moved to Canada in 1914, and my source for him in Canada knows about him, but not about Elizabeth.

DESCENDANTS? AND WHAT (IF ANYTHING) HAPPENED NEXT.

Elizabeth Watkin-Mills has no descendants.

Robert Watkin-Mills went to Canada to take up the post of choirmaster at a church in Winnipeg. He married the organist and singer Elsie Cantell, in 1919. They moved to Toronto in 1922 to work at the Knox Church, as choirmaster and organist. Robert's last public performance as a singer came at the age of 77; appropriately enough, it was in The Messiah. He died, in Toronto, in 1930.

Source for Robert Watkin-Mills in Canada: see the Encyclopaedia of Music in Canada at www.thecanadianencyclopedia.com.

ELIZABETH'S FAMILY AFTER HER MARRIAGE

ELIZABETH'S PARENTS

On the day of the 1881 census, Edward Hore was still working at the shipyard though he may have been promoted again by this time: the census official wrote down Edward's profession as "shipwright". He and Elizabeth were (I think) still living at 87 Cross Street. Their address was written as 2 Prospect Terrace, Cross Street but I think 'prospect terrace' may have been an older name for that part of the street. Only Miriam was still living at home on census day 1881. She had left school, but either she was not doing any paid work or she was not asked about it. I think it's more likely that she wasn't doing any paid work, just helping her mother at home - that would be consistent with the Hore family's rise into the middle classes.

Elizabeth's father died in March 1890. On the day of the 1891 census William was back living at home with his widowed mother; he was working as an insurance agent. Miriam was probably still living in Northam but on census day 1891 she was visiting the Watkin-Mills in Roehampton. I think the Hore family was still living at the same address as in 1881 but the house had been renumbered, to 86 Cross Street.

Elizabeth's mother, Elizabeth Lashbrook Hore, died in March 1901. She died in Northam, but an address in Herne Bay was given as her permanent address in her Probate Registry record. I think she may have gone to live with her widowed daughter-in-law Mary Ann Hore - see Edward Hore below.

ELIZABETH'S BROTHER EDWARD HORE

By 1881, Edward Hore junior had left Northam. He had moved to Gillingham in Kent and was working there, still in ship-building though by this time he may have been a draughtsman rather than a carpenter - he was described as a draughtsman on the Probate Registry record for the death of his father. He married a local girl, Mary Ann Partis, in 1884 and they had two children at least, Florence Mary (born 1886) and William Edward (born 1887). I couldn't spot Edward and Mary Ann on the 1891 census; perhaps they were abroad on holiday.

It was probably a nasty shock to all the family when Edward Hore died in December 1899 - he was only in his late 40s. At the time of his death, he and Mary Ann were living at 47 Gardiner Street in the New Brompton district of Gillingham.

ELIZABETH'S BROTHER WILLIAM HORE

I've found it difficult to identify him on the census except when he was living with other members of Elizabeth's family. He acted as his mother's executor in 1901 so he was still alive then; but I haven't been able to find a date of death for him and I don't know whether he ever married.

ELIZABETH'S YOUNGEST BROTHER THOMAS HILTON HORE

Thomas Hore isn't on the 1881 census so perhaps he had already gone to Australia. In 1913 he was working for Queensland Government Railways. In October 1913 he gave evidence to a Parliamentary enquiry into the Queensland fishing industry, answering questions about the Railway's involvement in transporting fish from the ports; as indoor assistant traffic manager. He died, at Kedron in Queensland, in 1930.

ELIZABETH'S SISTER MIRIAM HORE

Miriam Hore doesn't seem ever to have done any paid work; which was in keeping with the Hore family's view of their class status in the later 19th century. In 1898 she married Lewis Chapple. In 1911 her husband was 68 to her 46 - a generation her senior. Chapple was a Devon man, but by 1903 he had moved to London to work as a commercial traveller for a joinery manufacturing firm. Miriam and Lewis had two children: Marion Elizabeth - another god-child of Elizabeth Watkin-Mills, I daresay - who was born in 1899; and John Edward William Lewis, born 1903. On the day of the 1911 census the Chapples were living at 46 Ellerby Street Fulham.

Sources:

Censuses 1881-1911. Probate Registry entries. Freebmd.

And for Thomas Hore:

Parliamentary Papers of the Queensland Parliamentary Legislative Assembly; volume 3 issued 1914: p8; p31

Via google to //billiongraves.com for Thomas' date and place of death.

BASIC SOURCES I USED for all Golden Dawn members.

Membership of the Golden Dawn: The Golden Dawn Companion by R A Gilbert. Northampton: The Aquarian Press 1986. Between pages 125 and 175, Gilbert lists the names, initiation dates and addresses of all those people who became members of the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn or its many daughter Orders between 1888 and 1914. The list is based on the Golden Dawn's administrative records and its Members' Roll - the large piece of parchment on which all new members signed their name at their initiation. All this information had been inherited by Gilbert but it's now in the Freemasons' Library at the United Grand Lodge of England building on Great Queen Street Covent Garden. Please note, though, that the records of the Amen-Ra Temple in Edinburgh were destroyed in 1900/01. I have recently (July 2014) discovered that some records of the Horus Temple at Bradford have survived, though most have not; however those that have survived are not yet accessible to the public.

For the history of the GD during the 1890s I usually use Ellic Howe's The Magicians of the Golden Dawn: A Documentary History of a Magical Order 1887-1923. Published Routledge and Kegan Paul 1972. Foreword by Gerald Yorke. Howe is a historian of printing rather than of magic; he also makes no claims to be a magician himself, or even an occultist. He has no axe to grind.

Family history: freebmd; ancestry.co.uk (census and probate); findmypast.co.uk; familysearch; Burke's Peerage and Baronetage; Burke's Landed Gentry; Armorial Families; thepeerage.com; and a wide variety of family trees on the web.

Famous-people sources: mostly about men, of course, but very useful even for the female members of GD. Oxford Dictionary of National Biography. Who Was Who. Times Digital Archive.

Useful source for business and legal information: London Gazette and its Scottish counterpart Edinburgh Gazette. Now easy to find (with the right search information) on the web.

Catalogues: British Library; Freemasons' Library.

Wikipedia; Google; Google Books - my three best resources. I also used other web pages, but with some caution, as - from the historian's point of view - they vary in quality a great deal.

15 March 2016

Email me at

Find the web pages of Roger Wright and Sally Davis, including my list of people initiated into the Order of the Golden Dawn between 1888 and 1901, at:

www.wrightanddavis.co.uk

***

Mrs Constance Mary WILDE, unlucky wife of Oscar, was initiated into the Golden Dawn very early in its proceedings, in November 1888, and took the Latin motto 'Qui patitur vincit'. At that time she and Oscar were living at the address most associated with them as a couple, 16 Tite Street Chelsea. An undated note in the GD's administrative files said of her membership that it was "in abeyance"; almost certainly NOT because of Oscar's trial but because of the much earlier uproar caused by his novel The Portrait of Dorian Grey.

It's always difficult to separate the wife of a very famous man from her husband so that she can shine in her own light for once, but there are several biographies of Constance. The latest is Constance: the Tragic and Scandalous Life of Mrs Oscar Wilde by Franny Moyle. London: John Murray 2011 and now also in paperback. I shall only add some references which show that Constance knew various people who are THE PEOPLE SHE KNEW IN THE GOLDEN DAWN, though I think the GD member most likely to have put Constance up for membership was W B Yeats.

Collected Letters of W B Yeats Vol I 1865-95 show that W B knew both Constance and her husband. He probably visited them on a regular basis, because there are no letters from him to Constance in volumes I or II. Constance's biography shows her setting up on the 'at home' circuit once she and Oscar had moved into Tite Street and I expect W B was one of her guests at these functions which were more like a public performance than chatting with friends. Moving in the same social circles, the Wildes and W B tended all to be invited to the same kind of social function - for example W B, Constance and Oscar were amongst 300 guests at a 'home rule party' in May 1888 at which Mrs Gladstone made a speech.

Reforming Women's Fashion 1850-1920: Politics, Health and Art by Patricia A Cunningham. Published Kent State University Press 2003. This book has references to GD members Dora de Blaquière and Mary Eliza Haweis, both of whom were involved the rational dress movement in which Constance was also an important figure. On p116 Cunningham explains that a more common-sense approach to dress was very much a part of what the aesthetic movement believed in. The Wildes were leaders of the aesthetic movement. Other people involved were Frederick Leighton; G F Watts; William Morris and May Morris. Cunningham DOESN'T specifically say that Constance, Dora and Mary Eliza all knew each other before they became GD members.

It's possible that Constance also knew GD member Isabel de Steiger in the years before GD existed. In Isabel's memoirs she mentions attending Lady Wilde's Saturday afternoon 'at homes' in the 1870s and 1880s. Consequently Isabel knew Oscar Wilde and his brother Willie, and may have met Constance as well although she doesn't specifically say so.

Memorabilia: Reminiscences of a Woman Artist and Writer by Isabelle (sic) de Steiger. London: Rider and Co. No publication date but there's a British Library stamp dated "27 May 27". Page 81: Isabel going to "Lady Wilde's on Saturday afternoons". Knowing Oscar and Willie Wilde, p85; but Willie better because he (but not Oscar) was a member of the Theosophical Society.

DE BREMONT

I will also say - because I doubt if it figures in the biography I've recommended - that Constance was a member of the Society for Psychical Research, which she joined in October 1892, after she had stopped being an active member of GD. Evidence of her continuing membership: Journal of the Society for Psychical Research volume V 1891-92 number XCIII issued October 1892 p297 the list of new members since the last issue includes p298 Mrs Oscar Wilde of 16 Tite Street Chelsea. She is still listed as a member in Proceedings of the Society for Psychical Research volume XI 1895 p624 has her as a full member, still calling herself 'Wilde' (she later took another surname, for the protection of her sons) but living in exile now, at Hotel du Parc, Glion sur Montreux, Switzerland. Proceedings of the Society for Psychical Research volume XV 1900-01 no longer lists her in its members; she was dead by then.

BASIC SOURCES I USED for all Golden Dawn members.

Membership of the Golden Dawn: The Golden Dawn Companion by R A Gilbert. Northampton: The Aquarian Press 1986. Between pages 125 and 175, Gilbert lists the names, initiation dates and addresses of all those people who became members of the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn or its many daughter Orders between 1888 and 1914. The list is based on the Golden Dawn's administrative records and its Members' Roll - the large piece of parchment on which all new members signed their name at their initiation. All this information had been inherited by Gilbert but it's now in the Freemasons' Library at the United Grand Lodge of England building on Great Queen Street Covent Garden.

Family history: freebmd; ancestry.co.uk (census and probate); findmypast.co.uk; familysearch; Burke's Peerage and Baronetage; Burke's Landed Gentry; Armorial Families; thepeerage.com; and a wide variety of family trees on the web.

Famous-people sources: mostly about men, of course, but very useful even for the female members of GD. Oxford Dictionary of National Biography. Who Was Who. Times Digital Archive.

Catalogues: British Library; Freemasons' Library.

Wikipedia; Google; Google Books - my three best resources. I also used other web pages, but with some caution, as - from the historian's point of view - they vary in quality a great deal.

27 April 2012

AMandragora@attglobal.net

George Easthall WILLIAMS whose initiation date R A Gilbert was not quite certain of; he made a guess of December 1889. Williams chose the Latin motto 'Ad finem'. The address he gave for GD correspondence was the Primrose Club, at 4 Park Place St James's London SW1. A later note on his GD papers said that he had died by March 1892.

I couldn't spot this man for sure on the censuses of 1881 and 1891. Despite not having any idea how old George was, I did have a go at finding a birth registration for a child with all those names - that is to say, including 'Easthall' - but I couldn't find one. If he was born in England or Wales (I was using freebmd which doesn't cover anywhere else), he must have been among the many 'George Williams' whose registrations I came across.

I do know what George Williams did for a living. Via Google, I did find a reference to a man of that name (all that name) being appointed as the London correspondent for a number of American newspapers, in 1889. I haven't had any success following this reference up, though.

The other bit of information I can give is about George's politics. According to Wikipedia the Primrose Club was founded as a consciously Conservative gentleman's club: all prospective members had to pledge their support to the Conservative Party. Giving the Primrose Club as his address for post, doesn't imply George Williams lived there. Most gentleman's clubs had rooms which members could stay in from time to time, but I don't think you could actually take up permanent residence in them. It was more likely that George Williams actually rented rooms at a much less swish address, or moved from lodging house to lodging house on a regular basis. The Club would then be his one permanent address, and a place to eat and drink and meet people with whom he had a lot in common, while he lived out of his suitcase.

Of course, I looked for a death registration but couldn't find one for him, at least not in England or Wales. Which adds to my suspicion that he might have been an American, over in England as part of his job.

BASIC SOURCES I USED for all Golden Dawn members.

Membership of the Golden Dawn: The Golden Dawn Companion by R A Gilbert. Northampton: The Aquarian Press 1986. Between pages 125 and 175, Gilbert lists the names, initiation dates and addresses of all those people who became members of the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn or its many daughter Orders between 1888 and 1914. The list is based on the Golden Dawn's administrative records and its Members' Roll - the large piece of parchment on which all new members signed their name at their initiation. All this information had been inherited by Gilbert but it's now in the Freemasons' Library at the United Grand Lodge of England building on Great Queen Street Covent Garden.

Family history: freebmd; ancestry.co.uk (census and probate); findmypast.co.uk; familysearch; Burke's Peerage and Baronetage; Burke's Landed Gentry; Armorial Families; thepeerage.com; and a wide variety of family trees on the web.

Famous-people sources: mostly about men, of course, but very useful even for the female members of GD. Oxford Dictionary of National Biography. Who Was Who. Times Digital Archive.

Catalogues: British Library; Freemasons' Library.

Wikipedia; Google; Google Books - my three best resources. I also used other web pages, but with some caution, as - from the historian's point of view - they vary in quality a great deal.

The reference to Easthall Williams as a newspaper correspondent: Current Opinion volume 2 1889 but as so often with Google, the snippet of information I could see didn't include the page number.

25 April 2012

AMandragora@attglobal.net

Arthur Wilson was initiated into the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn at its Horus Temple in Bradford, in July 1894. He chose the Latin motto 'Vox stellarum'. He did do some of the study recommended for initiates who wanted to progress further in the Order, but never made it to the inner, 2nd Order. I think he had a rather busy life.

This is one of my short biographies. They mostly cover GD members who lived in Bradford, Liverpool and Edinburgh. I've done what I can with those people, using the web and sources in London. I'm sure there's far more information on them out there, but it will be in record offices, the local papers...I'd need to be on the spot to look at them, and I've had to admit that life's too short!

Sally Davis

February 2016

This is what I have found on ARTHUR WILSON. The difficulty of being sure I'd got the right person has meant I haven't looked for much more than is listed below.

IN THE GD

I'm fairly sure that Arthur Wilson found out about the existence of the GD through Alfred Ernest Scanlan, a doctor in Middlesbrough; who in turn had found out about it through Theosophical Society contacts in Bradford where virtually everyone who was in the TS was also in the GD. A third man from Middlesbrough also joined the GD in Bradford - GP William Charles Hopgood was initiated in September 1894.

ANY OTHER ESOTERIC INTERESTS?

Arthur Wilson applied to join the Theosophical Society in June 1892. At that stage, your application had to have a sponsor who was a TS member already. Arthur's was Baker Hudson. A Middlesbrough branch of the TS was being mooted at this time and Baker Hudson became the Middlesbrough Lodge's first secretary when it was officially founded in 1893. Alfred Ernest Scanlan was also a member of the TS's Middlesbrough Lodge. In November 1893, Oliver Firth came to Middlesbrough from Bradford TS Lodge to give a talk on Karma, Free Will and Fate. Firth was one of the TS's most active members in the north of England at this time; and he was also in the GD. Later, Firth and the members of Middlesbrough Lodge worked together to set up the magazine The Northern Theosophist.

The founding of lodges in Bradford and then in Middlesbrough was part of a big expansion of the TS in England in the early 1890s. This came to a halt in the mid-1890s when a dispute broke out within the TS worldwide over who should lead it, now that Helena Petrovna Blavatsky had died. The dispute became vitriolic, and eventually very public. Large numbers of individual members left the TS or just stopped paying their annual subscriptions and entire lodges closed down for lack of members. Both Arthur Wilson and Alfred Scanlan had notes on their TS membership notes saying that their membership was considered lapsed, in December 1897. This meant that they hadn't paid their subscriptions for three years in succession, so both men had ceased to be active members at the height of the dispute, in 1894. After its promising beginning, Middlesbrough TS Lodge only lasted a couple of years.

Sources:

Theosophical Society Membership Register September 1891-January 1893 p119 entry for Arthur Wilson of 14 Grange Road Middlesbrough.

Lucifer: A Theosophical Magazine Volume XII covers March-August 1893. Edited by Annie Besant, published by Theosophical Publishing Society of 7 Duke Street Adelphi. Volume XII number 70 issued 15 June 1893 p341 in news section: formation of a new TS lodge based in Middlesbrough. None of its members are named, but both Arthur Wilson and Alfred Scanlan had notes on their membership record that they were members of it.

Lucifer: A Theosophical Magazine Volume XIII covering September 1893 to February 1894. Annie Besant as editor, published by Theosophical Publishing Society of 7 Duke Street Adelphi. Volume XIII number 75 issued 15 November 1893 p254 in the news section: Oliver Firth's visit to the Middlesbrough Lodge. Volume XIII number 76 issued 15 December 1893 p265 mentioning how active members of Middlesbrough Lodge had been, in setting up the magazine The Northern Theosophist.

ANY OBITUARIES/BIOGRAPHIES?

There may well be, but only in the local papers. It would have helped Arthur in his profession if he had taken a part in the musical life of Middlesbrough (see below). If he had been well enough known, there would have been obituaries in the local papers.

BIRTH/YOUTH/FAMILY BACKGROUND

If I have identified the right man, the GD's Arthur Wilson was born in 1868, the eldest child of John Wilson and his wife Eleanor, née Woof. Arthur was born in Darlington, where his father owned a pharmacy. In 1871 John Wilson's business was at 40 Archer Street; by 1881 it had moved to 8 East Terrace. John and Eleanor's family was a large one: after Arthur came Lizzie, John Edward who may have died young, Frederick, James, Thomas, Kate, Annie and Nellie; all by 1881. The Wilsons could afford one general servant to live in. If John employed anyone to help in the shop, they were living elsewhere and perhaps Eleanor took that role, when she had time.

Sources: freebmd; census 1871, 1881.

EDUCATION

John Wilson's business was a small, local one. What spare money there was for Arthur's education was spent on one subject - see below. I imagine all the children went to the local National School; provided their parents were Church of England and I've no information about that.

WORK/PROFESSION

By 1891 Arthur had left home and moved the few miles to Middlesbrough. He was already working as a music teacher. My searches of the web haven't come up with any indication that he went to any of the major music colleges, so it's most likely he reached music-teacher standard through private lessons. Allowing Arthur to take those lessons must have been where the Wilson family's spare money had been spent. At least as far as 1911, Arthur worked as a self-employed music teacher, giving lessons in his own home; I suppose majoring on the piano, but he may also have taught singing. Those two aspects of music are likely to have been the ones most in demand amongst the newly comfortably-off of industrial Middlesbrough, whose children must have formed the majority of his pupils.

In 1891, Arthur was living at 118 Grange Road Middlesbrough, as one of Mary Carter's lodgers.

Source: census 1891.

ANY PUBLICATIONS?

Not that I can identify.

ANY PUBLIC LIFE/EVIDENCE FOR LEISURE TIME? Bearing in mind, of course, that most leisure activities leave no trace behind them.

See my comments in the 'obituaries?' section above. Arthur did the kind of work where it's difficult to tell where professional interests end and leisure time begins.

FAMILY

Early in 1892, Arthur married Annie Thackeray. Though I haven't been able to identify Annie for certain, despite her relatively rare surname, she did consistently tell census officials that she had been born in Darlington; so I guess she and Arthur had known each other since childhood. They set up house further along Grange Road, at 106, and were still there in 1901. By that time they had a large family: Elsie Wilson born 1893; Alfred Thackeray Wilson born 1895 and named, perhaps, for Alfred Scanlan; Arthur Woof Wilson born 1896; and John Ellick Wilson born 1900. In 1911 Arthur also wrote on the census form that they had had a child that had died; perhaps one born between Arthur and John. After the day of the 1901 census two more children were born: Muriel Kathleen Wilson in 1902; and Austin Wilson, whose birth registration I couldn't identify for certain but who was aged 6 in 1911.

This was a big household; and there also had to be somewhere in the house given over to Arthur's music lessons - as the family's source of income. By 1911, the Wilsons had moved to the west of Middlesbrough; to Hartington Road, Stockton-on-Tees. The house was big - it had nine habitable rooms - and Arthur was also earning enough money to employ one servant; in 1901 they hadn't had any servants living in.

Sources: freebmd; census 1901, 1911.

DEATH

I haven't attempted to look for death registrations for Arthur Wilson and Annie.

DESCENDANTS? AND WHAT (IF ANYTHING) HAPPENED NEXT.

I did take a look with google to see if I could find out anything about the children Arthur and Annie had given names that might be easy to find. I also had a look in the Probate Registry records; finding one of those, only - but the others might have lived beyond 1966, when Ancestry's set of probate records comes to an end. I couldn't see anything on Alfred Thackeray Wilson so I've no idea what happened to him

ARTHUR WOOF WILSON

Arthur Woof Wilson started as an apprentice merchant seaman in 1913, being indentured in West Hartlepool. In 1915 he was one of the junior members of the crew of the Agenoria, a cargo ship owned by the Byron Steamship Co Ltd. The voyages Agenoria was making were very dangerous and eventually, in November 1917, she was torpedoed, off Ireland, while on the way from Archangel to Nantes with a cargo of timber. The third engineer was killed but the rest of the crew survived, including Arthur, and were able to beach the damaged ship on Belfast Lough.

JOHN ELLICK WILSON went to live in Darlington. He died there aged 28, in 1928.

Sources:

At collections.rmg.co.uk - Royal Museums Greenwich - their record RSS/CL/1915 - Registrar General of Shipping and Seamen. At www.benjidog.co.uk, details of what's on the Tower Hill Memorial to seamen and fishermen lost in war.

Probate Registry 1928.

BASIC SOURCES I USED for all Golden Dawn members.

Membership of the Golden Dawn: The Golden Dawn Companion by R A Gilbert. Northampton: The Aquarian Press 1986. Between pages 125 and 175, Gilbert lists the names, initiation dates and addresses of all those people who became members of the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn or its many daughter Orders between 1888 and 1914. The list is based on the Golden Dawn's administrative records and its Members' Roll - the large piece of parchment on which all new members signed their name at their initiation. All this information had been inherited by Gilbert but it's now in the Freemasons' Library at the United Grand Lodge of England building on Great Queen Street Covent Garden. Please note, though, that the records of the Amen-Ra Temple in Edinburgh were destroyed in 1900/01. I have recently (July 2014) discovered that some records of the Horus Temple at Bradford have survived, though most have not; however those that have survived are not yet accessible to the public.

For the history of the GD during the 1890s I usually use Ellic Howe's The Magicians of the Golden Dawn: A Documentary History of a Magical Order 1887-1923. Published Routledge and Kegan Paul 1972. Foreword by Gerald Yorke. Howe is a historian of printing rather than of magic; he also makes no claims to be a magician himself, or even an occultist. He has no axe to grind.

Family history: freebmd; ancestry.co.uk (census and probate); findmypast.co.uk; familysearch; Burke's Peerage and Baronetage; Burke's Landed Gentry; Armorial Families; thepeerage.com; and a wide variety of family trees on the web.

Famous-people sources: mostly about men, of course, but very useful even for the female members of GD. Oxford Dictionary of National Biography. Who Was Who. Times Digital Archive.

Useful source for business and legal information: London Gazette and its Scottish counterpart Edinburgh Gazette. Now easy to find (with the right search information) on the web.

Catalogues: British Library; Freemasons' Library.

Wikipedia; Google; Google Books - my three best resources. I also used other web pages, but with some caution, as - from the historian's point of view - they vary in quality a great deal.

Find the web pages of Roger Wright and Sally Davis, including my list of people initiated into the Order of the Golden Dawn between 1888 and 1901, at:

www.wrightanddavis.co.uk

***

Samuel WILSON who was initiated into the Golden Dawn in December 1892 and took the Latin motto 'Finis coronat opus'. He didn't remain in the GD long, however, being considered to have resigned by August 1893. The only address he gave the GD for correspondence was the Atlas Club, of Newman Street London.

Several members of the GD gave a gentleman's club as their address for correspondence. It might have been that they didn't want post from such a source to arrive at their home address and be opened by (say) their nose-y landlord. But all those members are ones - usually men - I've had difficulty identifying on the usual family history websites, and I do think a club address suggests a bird of passage, not likely to remain in England for very long. That makes the question of WHO THEY KNEW IN THE GOLDEN DAWN even more difficult to answer, and I haven't answered it in this case. I don't know anything about this man.

BASIC SOURCES I USED for all Golden Dawn members.

Membership of the Golden Dawn: The Golden Dawn Companion by R A Gilbert. Northampton: The Aquarian Press 1986. Between pages 125 and 175, Gilbert lists the names, initiation dates and addresses of all those people who became members of the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn or its many daughter Orders between 1888 and 1914. The list is based on the Golden Dawn's administrative records and its Members' Roll - the large piece of parchment on which all new members signed their name at their initiation. All this information had been inherited by Gilbert but it's now in the Freemasons' Library at the United Grand Lodge of England building on Great Queen Street Covent Garden.

Family history: freebmd; ancestry.co.uk (census and probate); findmypast.co.uk; familysearch; Burke's Peerage and Baronetage; Burke's Landed Gentry; Armorial Families; thepeerage.com; and a wide variety of family trees on the web.

Famous-people sources: mostly about men, of course, but very useful even for the female members of GD. Oxford Dictionary of National Biography. Who Was Who. Times Digital Archive.

Catalogues: British Library; Freemasons' Library.

Wikipedia; Google; Google Books - my three best resources. I also used other web pages, but with some caution, as - from the historian's point of view - they vary in quality a great deal.

25 April 2012

AMandragora@attglobal.net

Mrs Annie WOLF was initiated into the Golden Dawn in June 1890 and took the Latin motto 'Suo morte'. A note on the GD administration files shows that by the end of that year her membership was considered to have lapsed.

Rather a short stay in the Order! - one of the shortest, in fact. She gave her address as c/o the Aldine Hotel, Chestnut Street in Philadelphia USA. I got the impression, therefore, that when she was initiated she was actually about to leave the country. An odd affair altogether and I haven't tried to find out anything about her.

BASIC SOURCES I USED for all Golden Dawn members.

Membership of the Golden Dawn: The Golden Dawn Companion by R A Gilbert. Northampton: The Aquarian Press 1986. Between pages 125 and 175, Gilbert lists the names, initiation dates and addresses of all those people who became members of the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn or its many daughter Orders between 1888 and 1914. The list is based on the Golden Dawn's administrative records and its Members' Roll - the large piece of parchment on which all new members signed their name at their initiation. All this information had been inherited by Gilbert but it's now in the Freemasons' Library at the United Grand Lodge of England building on Great Queen Street Covent Garden.

Family history: freebmd; ancestry.co.uk (census and probate); findmypast.co.uk; familysearch; Burke's Peerage and Baronetage; Burke's Landed Gentry; Armorial Families; thepeerage.com; and a wide variety of family trees on the web.

Famous-people sources: mostly about men, of course, but very useful even for the female members of GD. Oxford Dictionary of National Biography. Who Was Who. Times Digital Archive.

Catalogues: British Library; Freemasons' Library.

Wikipedia; Google; Google Books - my three best resources. I also used other web pages, but with some caution, as - from the historian's point of view - they vary in quality a great deal.

27 April 2012

AMandragora@attglobal.net