

HERMETIC ORDER OF THE GOLDEN DAWN: BIOGRAPHIES OF MEMBERS

by Sally Davis.

Licence terms:

Attribution-NonCommercial-NoDerivatives 4.0 International (CC BY-NC-ND 4.0)

You are free to:

- Share — copy and redistribute the material in any medium or format
- The licensor cannot revoke these freedoms as long as you follow the license terms.

---

Under the following terms:

- Attribution — You must give appropriate credit, provide a link to the license, and indicate if changes were made. You may do so in any reasonable manner, but not in any way that suggests the licensor endorses you or your use.
- NonCommercial — You may not use the material for commercial purposes.
- NoDerivatives — If you remix, transform, or build upon the material, you may not distribute the modified material.
- No additional restrictions — You may not apply legal terms or technological measures that legally restrict others from doing anything the license permits.

INTRODUCTION December 2017

Below is a list of all the people who were initiated into the Order of the Golden Dawn at its temples in London, Bradford and Edinburgh between 1888 (the year it began) and 1901. There were also temples in Paris and Weston-super-Mare, but I've decided to leave their initiates out.

The list of names is based on the data R A Gilbert put in his book The Golden Dawn Companion, published by The Aquarian Press in 1986. Gilbert had inherited the Golden Dawn's Membership Roll and he transcribed all the signatures written on it, for his book. I used the book and the original Members' Roll, to make my list; correcting some wrong spellings and adding in one person who was on the Members' Roll but not in the book - I guess Gilbert must just have overlooked her, amongst so many names.

For the last few years I've been working on biographies of the Golden Dawn members in the list below, using the web and libraries in London. For most members, I haven't found out anything much. For the rest, I'm gradually compiling little (and some not so little) biographies of them and they'll go up on this website in due course.

Two important points about what I've been doing:

1) Those of you who want to find out about the Golden Dawn's magic: these biographies are not for you. I'm no magician and I've concentrated on the members' other lives - their day job, if you like - birth, family/relationships, work/income, death.

2) Some of the people on the list have had biographies done already. There are books on:

Allan Bennett                Sir William Crookes

Aleister Crowley; a lot of books on him, of course

Florence Farr with coverage of her sister Henrietta Paget and her brother-in-law Henry Marriott Paget

Maud Gonne, including some coverage of her sister Kathleen Pilcher and her cousin Mary Kimble Gonne

Mary Eliza Haweis

Annie Horniman though these tend to concentrate on her later career as a theatrical impresario

Samuel Liddell Mathers including coverage of his wife Mina (later Moina) née Bergson

Constance Wilde

W B Yeats including some coverage of his uncle George Pollexfen.

And there's also a book in preparation on William George Lemon.

The books aren't always easy to find but it still seemed superfluous for me to do any more work on those people.

As at January 2017 there are also wikipedia pages on some of the people I've already mentioned, and:

Henry Edward Colvile though there's not much on his second wife Zelig née de Préville

Robert William Felkin though without much on his wife Mary née Mander or his sister-in-law Jemima Mander and William Wynn Westcott.

Henry Pullen-Burry though without much on his wife Rose née Anwyl. I have done a life-by-dates of Henry and Rose.

If you're in a desperate hurry to find out more about anyone on the list, but without a biography as yet, you can email me and I'll try to help:

email: Amandragora@attglobal.net

R A Gilbert's papers, including the Members' Roll, are now in the archives at the Museum of Freemasonry. A big thank you from me to the archivist and volunteers there, for the help they are still giving me. Here is a message from them, because they would love more people to visit the Museum to work on the Golden Dawn archives:

For anyone wishing to explore the membership or development of the Golden Dawn, archives relating to the Order and its successor bodies are available at the Library and Museum of Freemasonry - all resources have been catalogued with full descriptions for each document [reference: GBR 1991 GD] - see details for these records on the on-line catalogue at: <http://www.freemasonry.london.museum/catalogue.php>

The list below with dates of birth, marriages and dates of death where I've been able to find them out. The births, marriages and deaths were determined by correlating the relevant UK Government Census returns with the usual family history sources - FreeBMD, FamilySearch etc. Clerical appointments are taken from Crockford's Clerical Directory.

TS = member of the Theosophical Society

SRIA = member of Societas Rosicruciana in Anglia; membership available to freemasons only

SOCPR = member of the Society for Psychical Research

AITKEN, Andrew Peebles. C 1854-1904. Analytical chemist, academic.

AITKEN, Georgiana Burnett. Previous surname Brown. C 1856-?? Married GD member Andrew Peebles Aitken 1881.

ATHERTON, Jeremiah Leach. 1838-1908. Worked in the wool industry, Bradford. Freemason. SRIA.

AYTON, Anne. Previous surname Hempson. C 1823-1898. Married GD member William Alexander Ayton 1862.

AYTON, William Alexander. 1816-1909. Married GD member Anne Hempson 1862. Cleric, Church of England.

Family History

Occult Activities

BABINGTON, Anna Mary. 1846-1934. Owner of the Babington Tea Rooms in Rome.

BAKER, Julian Levett. 1873-1958. Friend then brother-in-law of George Cecil Jones. Chemist.

Biography

Partial list of publications.

BARCLAY, Oswald. 1872-??

BARRACLOUGH, James. ?1845-1902.

BATES, Emily Katherine or Katharine. 1846-1922. Traveller, novelist. Spiritualist.

BEASLEY, Thomas Henry. C 1838-1889. Ex-policeman; worked in a coroner's office.

BEAUFORT, Edith Mary. Previous surname Griffith. 1856-1942. Married Leicester Paul Beaufort 1883; 3 daughters. Lived Borneo, South Africa.

BENNETT, Charles Henry Allan. Later known as Bhikku Ananda Metteya. 1872-1923. Analytical chemist. Taught Crowley.

BENNETT, Ida. Previous surname Turner. 1849-1910. Married Adrian Bennett 1869.

BERGSON, Mina. see MATHERS

BERRIDGE, Edward William. 1844-1920. Doctor; homoeopath; writer, editor, compiler of a Materia Medica. Follower of Thomas Lake Harris; writer, editor.

BLACKDEN, Ada Mary. 1872-1965. Sister of GD member Marcus Worsley Blackden.

BLACKDEN, Marcus Worsley. 1864-1934. Brother of GD member Ada Mary Blackden. Artist; Egyptologist.

Family and Youth

Egypt and the Golden Dawn

After the Golden Dawn

Book of the Dead – Chapter 62; Hymn to Osiris

BLACKWELL, Anna. 1816-1900. Journalist. Feminist. Spiritualist. Translator of Kardec.

BLACKWOOD, Algernon. 1869-1951.

BLYTH, Lilian Grace Mary see PRAEGER

BORTHWICK, Gabrielle. 1866-1952. Owner of the Borthwick School of Motoring and Engineering.

BOXER, Edward. 1856-1935. Naval family. Worked in a bank.

BRETTELL, John. C 1830-1901. Founder of T and J Brettell of Smethwick, iron workers and engineers.

BRIGGS, Mary. 1869-1909. Married Howard Swan 1900. IU.

BRODIE-INNES, Frances Annesley. Previous surname Voysey. 1853-1942. Married GD member John William Brodie-Innes 1879. TS.

BRODIE-INNES, John William. 1848-1923. Barrister and advocate. Married GD member Frances Annesley Brodie-Innes 1879. TS.

BROOKES, William Thomas Percy. 1874-??

BROOMHEAD see ROWE.

BROWN, Mrs Mary Catherine.

BROWN, Robert SMITH see SMITH BROWN

BUBNA, Count Franz Otto. ?1847 or ?1841-?? Stockbroker. Born ?Austria.

BUCKMAN, Katherine Julia. 1863-1928. Daughter of naturalist James Buckman. Married William George Hutchison 1898.

BULLOCK, Percy William. 1868-1940. Solicitor's clerk; then qualified as a solicitor and ran his own business. Married GD member Pamela CARDEN 1894.

BURNETT, Emily. 1839-1915. Sister-in-law of William Wynn Westcott. Copyist.

BURRY, Henry Pullen. see PULLEN-BURRY.

BURRY, Rose Pullen. see PULLEN-BURRY.

BUTLER, Harriet.

BUTLER later HUNTER, Harriette Dorothea see HUNTER

CALDECOTT, Marion. Previous surname Brind. 1850-1932. Married illustrator Randolph Caldecott 1880.

CALLIE, James William Stewart. 1857-1940. Worked for the Financial Reform Association; writer on free trade.

CAMPBELL, John MacNaught. C 1850-after 1915. Naturalist. Curator, Kelvingrove Museum Glasgow. Freemason.

CARDEN, Alexander James. 1839-1897. Married GD member Anne Rule Carden 1863. Man of independent financial means.

CARDEN, Ann Rule. Previous surname Clements. 1841-1924. Married GD member Alexander James Carden 1863.

Joint Entry

CARDEN, Pamela. 1871-1929. Married GD member Percy William Bullock 1894.

See entry for BULLOCK, Percy William

CATHCART, Mrs Agnes. Nee Baxter. First cousin of GD members Cecilia Macrae and Florence Kennedy, through the Laing family. 1835-1913. Married Robert Cathcart 1857; three sons. . See also the LAINGFAMILY file, at MACRAE, CECILIA CATTANACH, Andrew Petri. 1856-1939. Worked for Cowan and Co of Edinburgh. TS. Bahai. Freemason.

CHAMBERS Violet see TWEEDALE

CLARK, Emmeline Alice.

CLARK, Frederick Stewart.

CLAYTON, Fanny Isabel. 1863-1934. Daughter of GD member Joseph Clayton. Teacher.

See entry for CLAYTON, Joseph..

CLAYTON, Joseph. 1837-1912. Father of GD member Fanny Isabel Clayton. Teacher; then ran the family cookware shop.

COFFIN, Thomas Walker. 1840-1904. GP in Cornwall, then London.

COHEN, Chris. Tentative identification as Mary Ann Louisa BUTLER sister of Harriette Dorothea Butler later HUNTER. 1869-?? Married Max Cohen 1888.

COLLETT, Edith Grace. 1869-1927. Doctor.

COLLINSON, John. C 1835-1906. Worked for the Great Northern Railway. Freemason. SRIA.

COLVILE, Henry Edward. 1852-1907. Married GD member Zélie de Préville 1886. Career army officer.

COLVILE, Zélie. Previous surname de Préville. 1861-1930. Born France. Married GD member Henry Edward Colvile 1886; 1 son.

COOMBS, William Godwin. C 1833-1919. Doctor, specialising mental health.

COOPER, Augustus Montague. 1863-??

COPE, George Cope. Previous surname Pinniger. 1855-1931. Barrister.

CORYN, Herbert Alfred William. Surname spelled CorIn until 1870s. 1863-1927. Brother of GD member Sidney Coryn; brother-in-law of GD member Jessie Louisa Horne. GP. TS. Emigrated 1898 to Point Loma theosophical community, San Diego.

CORYN, Sidney Glasson Pierce. Surname spelled CorIn until 1870s. 1865-1921. Brother of GD member Herbert Coryn; brother-in-law of GD member Jessie Louisa Horne. TS. Worked for Canadian Railway Co. Emigrated to USA 1902; editor of the San Francisco Argonaut.

CRACKNELL, Maud. 1858-1950.

CRAVEN, ELIZA[BETH]. 1867-??

See entry for CLAYTON, Joseph.

CRESWELL, Keppel Archibald Cameron known as Archibald. 1879-1974. Architectural historian specialising in Fatimid Egypt; academic. Lived in Cairo after World War 1.

CROOKE, Herbert. 1860-1931. Worked for insurance companies. TS.

CROOKES, William B. 1832-1919. Chemist, physicist, editor, inventor eg the Crookes tube. Spiritualist. SOCPR.

CROWE, Frederick Joseph William. 1862-1931. Organist, conductor. Freemason; writer on and collector of masonic regalia.

CROWLEY, Aleister. 1875-1947.

CUNNINGHAM, Marion. Previous surname Ellis. 1860-?1930. Married ?Canada c 1890.

DAVIDSON, Alexander Gordon. 1860-1924. GP; after c 1903 worked in Ghana as medical officer, Tarquah gold mines. Freemason.

DAVIES, Jane Anna. Previous surname Greenaway. 1835-1908. Married Charles Maurice Davies 1856.

DE BLAQUIÈRE, [Caroline] Dora. Previous surname Bettridge, sometimes spelled BettEridge. 1838-1901. Born and died Canada. Married Charles de Blaquièrre 1856. Journalist.

DE BRÉMONT, Anna. Previous surname Dunphy. 1852-1922. Born USA. Married Émile Léon, Comte de Brémont 1877. Singer; then journalist, poet, novelist.

1852-1888

1888-1922

DE PALLANDT, Agnes Alicia Margaret. Original surname MacLean. Surname Wade between 1879 and 1881. 1849-1925.

DE STEIGER, Isabel (correctly Isabelle). Previous surname Lace. 1836-1927. Married Rudolph Adelf de Steiger 1861.

1836-1872

1873 to May 1878

June 1878 to December 1882

1883 and 1884

January 1885 to February 1888

March 1888 to 1900, the period she was active in the GD

1900-1927

Some Files on her work as a painter and commentator on art:

Isabel's art works: by date

Isabel's art works: alphabetical by title

Isabel's career as an artist

Isabel on art

Details of works exhibited

DENT, Vyvyan Edward John. 1862-1929. Lived Shanghai. Official in the China Inland Customs service.

DICKSON, Dr George. C 1838-?? Father of Carnegie Dickson. GP.

DODD, Frank. 1871-1955. Worked for the British Bank of South America. Moved to Rio de Janeiro mid-1890s.

DOUGLAS, Emily. B. Previous surname West. 1851-?? Married GD member John Andrew Douglas 1883.

DOUGLAS, John Andrew. C 1849-?1917. Married GD member Emily Douglas 1883.

DRUMMOND, Edith. C 1874-?? Daughter of GD member Emily Ann Drummond.

DRUMMOND, Emily Ann. Previous surname Mason. 1854-1910. Married James Drummond 1872. Mother of GD member Edith Drummond.

Joint Entry

DRUMMOND, Mary.

DUNCAN, Isabella see C W PEARCE

DUNCAN, Thomas Appleton. 1850-1922. Cleric, Church of England. TS.

DUNCKLEY, Joseph, known as Joe. C 1832-1912. Labourer. TS.

DUNN, Edward John. 1867-1926. Surveyor. Lived York, then Middlesbrough. TS.

DUNN, William Arthur. 1866-1921. Musician, conductor. TS. Emigrated 1902 to the Point Loma theosophical community, San Diego.

DURAND, James Madison. Husband of GD member Theodosia Durand. Identification uncertain.

DURAND, Theodosia. Original surname Moore. 1863-1949. Born and died California. Artist. Married GD member James Madison Durand before 1894.

Joint Entry

EDWARDS, Bogdan Edward. Original surname Jastrzebski. C 1860-1923. Brother of GD member Louis/Lewis Stanley Jastrzebski, later Jast. Husband of GD member Henrietta Edwards. Surgeon Halifax; then GP Brighouse. Freemason. SRIA.

EDWARDS, Henrietta. Previous surname Palmer. 1861-1927. Wife of GD member Bogdan Edwards. Worked as a hosier before her marriage.

Joint Entry

ELLIOT, Eleanor Blanche. Previous surname Bruce; mother's original name Corbet. 1864-1947. Married GD member Hugh Elliot 1896.

ELLIOT, John Hugh Armstrong known as Hugh. 1861-1948. Married GD member Eleanor Blanche Bruce 1896. Barrister; editor at Heinemanns; part-owner Rebmans.

Joint Entry

ELLIS, Frank Tate. 1861-1928. Teacher/missionary Bishop Gobat school Jerusalem.

ELPHICK, William Henry.

EMERY, Florence see under FARR

EUSUF, Mohammed. Surname usually spelled YUSUF. C 1872-1928. Born Patna. ICS; judge in Burma, Calcutta. Change of name by deed poll 1926 to Maurice Dean.

FARQUHAR, William Muir. C 1863-1939. Born Amritsar. Cleric, Church of England.

FARR, Florence. 1860-1917. Farr is her original surname. Married 1884 Edward Anderson Emery; divorced 1895 and reverted to original surname.

FELKIN, Mary Jane. Previous surname Mander. 1855-1903. Married GD member Robert William Felkin 1882; sister of GD member Jemima Tertia Mander.

FELKIN, Robert William. 1853-1926. Married 1) GD member Mary Jane Felkin 1882; 2) GD/Stella Matutina member Harriet Miller Davidson 1908. Brother-in-law of GD member Jemima Tertia Mander; father of Stella Matutina member Ethelwyn Felkin.

FFOULKES, Louise Florence Wynne. Original surname Jeffreys. C 1853-1936. Married Rev Henry Wynne ffoulkles 1881; he was first cousin of GD member Marian Charlotte Vibart. Poet.

Life

As a Poet

FIRTH, Oliver and Florence. Both Bradford; both TS. Oliver: 1860-1939. Florence: nee SPINK so see also SPINK SISTERS; 1868-1939, married Oliver Firth 1890, 3 children. Firth owned a TB sanatorium.

FIRTH, Walter. 1859/60-1915.

FORSYTH, Alice Jane. Uncertain identification but probably c 1849-??

FORTESCUE, Ethel Peverel Freda, nee Davis. 1862-1938. Married Frederick Ernest Fryer Fortescue 1886; one child. Friend of Pamela Colman Smith.

FRANKS, Charles.

FREEMAN, Francis. 1848-1920. Worked in a bank.

FRIEND, Elizabeth Mary

FULHAM HUGHES, Helen Priscilla, known as Reena. Born New Zealand ?1851. Died 1916. Married (1) ?1872 Archibald Little RN, 2 children; (2) 1896 Alfred Joseph Fulham Hughes. Had reverted to the use of surname 'Little' by 1911.

GARDNER, Frederick Leigh. 1857-1929. Stockbroker. Book collector. TS.

GARDNER, Joseph Knight. 1864-c 1926. Married GD member Rachel Taylor 1895. Accounts clerk. Emigrated to Canada 1908. TS

GARDNER, Rachel. Original surname Taylor. 1867-1929. Married GD member Joseph Knight Gardner 1895. Emigrated to Canada 1908. TS.

Joint Entry .

GASKELL, Ellen Sophie. Original surname Atkins; 1855-1940; married George Arthur Gaskell 1895. Occultist; writer on diet, occult. Spiritualist medium.

GASKELL, George Arthur. 1843-1933; Not a member. (List of literary and artistic works)

GIBSON, John

GILLISON, Jean Brash. See NISBET.

GLYNES, Webster. 1836-1919. Solicitor. Married 1898 US writer/actress Ella Dietz (1847-1920). Freemason.

GOBERT, Frederic Charles. 1873-1947. Carpenter and joiner.

GOLDIE, Thomas Myles.

GONNE, Mary Kimble. 1863-1929. First cousin of GD members Maud Gonne and Kathleen Pilcher. Married 1902 Neville Sneyd Clay or Bertie-Clay.

GONNE, [Edith] Maud. 1866-1953. Political activist. 3 children. Married 1903 John MacBride.

GONNE, Kathleen see PILCHER

GOOLD, William Albert. 1847-??

GORDON, Alice. Original surname Heath or Heath-Tomlinson. C 1843-?? Married 1863 William Gordon. Spiritualist. . Friend of Helena Petrovna Blavatsky.

GRAHAM, William Marten. 1848-1911. First cousin of GD member John A S Hastie. Civil servant.

GRANT, Mrs Margaret Jane Dalziel.

GRASON, Charles Herbert. 1867-1916. ?relation of GD member W H Grason. Ran a watch-making and jewellery business.

GRASON, William Hall. ?relation of GD member C H Grason.

GREENHOUGH, William Henry. 1856-1930. Librarian.

HAILEY, Alfred J. Civil servant.

HAMILTON, Lina Rowan. More usually ROWAN HAMILTON so see under ROWAN HAMILTON

HANDYSIDE, James. 1845-1905. Married GD member Lucy Handyside by 1891. Worked for a coal merchant, Edinburgh, TS.

HANDYSIDE, Lucy. Original surname Hurt. 1848-1931 Married to GD member James Handyside by 1891. Edinburgh, TS.

Joint Entry

HARBORD, Lady Eleanor. Daughter of the Duke of Grafton; original surname Fitzroy. 1853-1905. Married 1) 1872 Herbert Fitzroy Eaton; 2) Walter Harbord; div 1900; 3) 1904 Herbert Magniac. TS.

HARRISON, Francis Drake. Co-mason.

HASTIE, John A S. 1862-?? First cousin of William Marten Graham.

Haweis, Mary Eliza. Original surname Joy. 1848-1898. Married Rev Hugh Haweis 1867. Artist, designer; writer of books on good taste.

HENDERSON, George Jacob. 1851-1916.

HERBERT, Albertina. Original surname Denison. 1854-1929. Married Ivor John Caradoc Herbert 1873.

HILL, Amy Jane. Original surname Earp. 1860-1939. Married 1894 as second wife GD member John Hill. TS.

HILL, John. C 1868-1915. Married as second wife GD member Amy Earp 1894. TS.

HILL, Luther. 1864-1909. Cloth-dealer. Died in Canada. TS.

HOPGOOD, William Charles. 1854-1937. GP in Middlesbrough.

HORNE, Jessie Louisa. 1862-1948. Sister-in-law of Herbert Coryn and Sidney Coryn. Teacher; headmistress. TS.

HORNIMAN, Annie Elizabeth Frederica. 1860-1937.

HORTON, William Thomas. 1864-1919. Illustrator. Friend of W B Yeats.

HUMPHRYS, William Evans Hugh. 1876-1950. Motor car enthusiast, journalist, magazine owner, businessman, inventor. Married (1911) Jessie Holliday; 1 son.

1876-1906 including the GD

1907-end 1909

1910-1950

HUNTER, Edmund Arthur. 1866-1937. Brother of GD member Amy Turner; probably first cousin of GD member Fanny Beatrice Hunter. Married 1896 GD member Harriette Dorothea Butler. Designer; owned a company making cloth for churches.

HUNTER, Fanny Beatrice. 1863-1938. Probably first cousin of GD members Edmund Arthur Hunter and Amy Turner. Professional nurse.

HUNTER, Harriette Dorothea. Original surname Butler. C 1868-1958. Married 1896 GD member Edmund Arthur Hunter; 2 sons. Friend of W B Yeats.

HUNTER, William Sutherland. 1850-?? Worked for the family flour importing firm, Glasgow. Freemason. Book collector.

JACOB, George. 1862/63-1939. Solicitor's clerk.

JAMIESON, James.

JASTRZEBSKI, Lewis/Louis Stanley, known as Stan. 1895 changed surname to Jast (pronounced with a 'J'). 1868-1944. Brother of GD member Bogdan Edwards; brother-in-law of GD member Henrietta Edwards. Librarian; poet; dramatist.

A life by dates

Belief, magic and love

Poems and Epigrams

JEFFERSON, George Drinkall. 1843-??

JOHNSON, Frederick Jabez.

JONES, George Cecil. 1873-1960. 1905 became brother-in-law of GD member Julian Baker. Chemical engineer. Occultist. Friend of Aleister Crowley to 1911.

JUBB, Frank. 1864-1932. GP Peckham.

KELLY, Vera(?) Foster(?).

KENNEDY, Florence E S. Original surname Laing. 1853/54-1952. Sister of GD member Cecilia Macrae; sister-in-law of GD member Louisa Ida Macrae; cousin of GD member Agnes Cathcart. Married 1) 1879 Edward Sherard Kennedy; 2) 1902 Ioannes Gennadius. Artist. For her family, see also LAINGFAMILY file, at MACRAE, CECILIA

Florence Kennedy to 1902-ish

Florence and Edward Sherard Kennedy as Artists

KERR, George.

KIRBY, William Forsell. 1844-1912. Entomologist, specialist in butterflies. Worked for the Natural History Museum. Translator. TS.

KLEIN, Sidney Turner. 1854-1934. Worked for the family flour importing firm. Freemason. Writer.

KNEVITT, Herbert Dr. 1867-1943. GP in Ealing.

LACY, John Valentine. 1867-1947. Born Agra, son of a Brahmin convert to Christianity. Worked for Biltor Ltd. Friend of the Vibart family - see Marion Vibart.

LAMBERT, William Henry.

LAMMIN, Harriett Emily. Original surname Skelton. 1853-1938. Married 1888 as second wife Archer Davison Lammin. Lived in Bilbao.

LANCASTER, Harold N. 1872-??

LANGRIDGE, Minnie Constance. 1861-1924.

LAW, forename(s) unreadable so unknown by R A Gilbert.

LEMON, Rev Dr Thomas William. 1846-1919. Cleric, Church of England. Freemason. SRIA.

LEMON, William George. ?1831-1897. Teacher; then barrister. Freemason. SRIA.

LEVETT, Harold John. 1845-1927. Worked for the London Joint Stock Bank. TS.

LITTLE, Helen see FULHAM HUGHES

LLOYD, Irene Augusta Ada. 1861-1959 Married 1898 Alfred Holtzer. Cape Colony 1898 to 1914. TS in South Africa. Divorced 1923. Died England.

LOVE, Laura Gertrude. Original surname unknown.

LOVELL, Arthur; which is a professional name. 1862/63-1930. Original name David Williams or David Coethyr Williams. Therapist. Writer. Freemason.

MACBEAN, Edward. 1846-1919. Owner of Macbean and Co which made waterproofs. Freemason. SRIA.

MACHEN, Arthur. Original surname Jones. 1863-1947.

MCFARLANE (later MACFARLANE), William Evan. 1866-1919. Missionary family. Trained as a doctor. Astronomer. Lived Loyalty Islands, Mongolia, South Africa, Australia.

MACKENZIE, Alexandrina. Original surname Aydin. C 1848-1908. Married 1) 1872 Kenneth MacKenzie the freemason and occultist. Married 2) 1893 George Alfred Parratt.

MACKAY, Edward. C 1848-1925. Pharmacist. TS.

MACLAREN, Mrs Emily.

MACMILLAN, Albert Duncan. C 1863-1945. Civil servant, Inland Revenue. Writer.

THE TWO MACRAES

LAING FAMILY re Agnes Cathcart, Florence Kennedy and Cecilia Macrae.

MACRAE, Cecilia Mary Bruce. Original surname Laing. 1848-1942. Sister of GD member Florence Kennedy; sister-in-law of GD member Louisa Ida Macrae; cousin of GD member Agnes Cathcart. Married 1877 Charles Colin Macrae.

MACRAE, Louisa Ida. 1857-1943 Sister-in-law of GD member Cecilia Macrae and GD member Florence Kennedy.

MAITINSKY sometimes MAITINSKI, Florence Lily. Original surname unknown. ??-?? Married George J Maitinsky, manager of grocer's shop in Bedford Park, 1890s. TS.

MAJOR, Alice Elizabeth 1849-1906 She does not appear in Gilbert's book but she is on the GD Members' Roll now at the Freemasons' Library.

MALDEN, Charles Herbert. 1857-1932. Cleric, Church of England; in India, then England. Freemason.

MANDER, Jemima Tertia. 1857-1935. Sister of GD member Mary Jane Felkin; sister-in-law of GD member Robert William Felkin.

MAPLES, Caroline. ?1854-1922. Original surname Williams. Married Charles Maples 1877; 2 sons.

MARTIN, George.

MARTYN, Elizabeth Anne. C 1850-1897.

MATHERS, Mina; later Moina. 1865-1928. Married Samuel Liddell Mathers 1890.

MATHERS, Samuel Liddell; later MacGregor Mathers. 1854-1918. Married Mina Bergson 1890.

MIDGLEY, John. 1859-??

MILLS, Elizabeth Watkin, see WATKIN MILLS.

MINSON, George Samuel. 1845-1902 Father of GD member Mabel Hathaway Minson. Worked in a bank.

MINSON, Mabel Kathleen. 1876-?? Daughter of GD member George Samuel Minson. Married 1898 GD member Herbert Crossley Morris.

MOFFAT, Kate R. C 1860-?? (after 1922). Younger sister of Sophia Moffat. Member, Independent and Rectified Rite.

MOFFAT, Sophia. C 1856-?? Elder sister of Kate R Moffat. Member, Independent and Rectified Rite.

MOLESWORTH, Arthur Hilton. 1862-1928. Barrister. Astronomer, inventor of astronomical instruments.

MOLLOY, Joseph H Fitzgerald, called Fitzgerald. 1858-1908. Writer.

MONCK or poss MONK, Alfred.

MORRIS, Ronald Arthur Vennor. 1877-1943. First cousin of Herbert Crossley Morris. Married 1898 Eliza Augusta Jevons.

MORRIS, Eliza Augusta Vennor. Original surname Jevons. 1858-?? Married 1898 GD member Ronald Vennor Morris.

Joint Entry

MORRIS, Herbert Crossley. 1870-1899. First cousin of GD member Ronald Vennor

Morris. Married 1898 GD member Mabel Hathaway Minson.

MORRIS, Lizzie. Doesn't seem to be a relation of Ronald A V and Herbert C Morris; so nothing known.

MOSALLI, Selim. 1857-1912.

MURRAY, Grace Amelia. Original surname Abercromby. 1864-1932. Writer, translator.

MURRAY, Joshua Davidson

MURRAY, Oswald. 1850-?? (probably between 1924 and 1940). Writing name Quaestor Vitae or possibly Quaestor Lucis. Journalist for the Times; owner of a paint company.

NELSON, Andrew sometimes NEILSON. ?1841-after 1898. Worked for Union Bank of Scotland.

NISBET, Agnes Elizabeth. Uncertain identification. Probably: original surname Williams. 1865-?? Married 1886 GD member Robert B B Nisbet.

NISBET, Jean Brash; usually known as Jeannie. sister of GD member Robert B B Nisbet, sister-in-law of GD member Agnes Nisbet. C 1858-1920. Married 1) Robert Gillison 1871; 2) 1905 Alexander Armour.

NISBET, Robert Baird Brash. 1857-?? Brother of GD member Jean Brash Gillison. Married 1886 Agnes Elizabeth Williams.

Joint Entry .

NUNN, Richard Joseph. 1819-1910. Born Ireland, emigrated to USA. GP, Savannah Georgia. Freemason.

O'CONNELL, Theresa Jane. 1845-after 1911. Copyist. Friend of Mina Bergson until early 1890s.

OLIVER, Charles Mackay. C 1867-??

O'REILLY, Joseph. ??-1894.

PAGE, Frank Johnston. Uncertain identification; probably 1859-1937.

PAGET, Henry Marriott 1857-1936. Married 1879 GD member Henrietta Farr; brother-in-law of GD member Florence Farr. Artist, illustrator.

PAGET, Henrietta, known as Etta. Original surname Farr; sister of GD member Florence Farr. 1852-1947. Married 1879 GD member Henry Marriott Paget. Artist.

PALLANDT is in as DE PALLANDT.

PARR, Charles Chace. 1848-97. Solicitor.

PASSINGHAM, Catherine Amy. Original surname Staple. 1840-1918. Married 1863 George Augustus Passingham. TS. SOCPR.

PATTINSON, Eliza. Uncertain identification: probably original surname Clerk. 1852-?? Married 1874 GD member Thomas Henry Pattinson.

PATTINSON, Thomas Henry. C 1850-1939. Married 1874 GD member Eliza ?Clerk. Ran his own jewellery and watch-making business. Freemason. TS.

PEARCE, Alfred John. Professional astrologer, writer and editor; as Zadkiel. 1840-1923.

PEARCE, Charles William. 1841-?? Married secondly, date unknown but after 1891, GD member Isabella Duncan. 1890s ran a wine and spirits business. Later ran a publishing firm. Follower of Thomas Lake Harris.

DUNCAN, Isabella. Journalist as Lily Bell. Political activist. C 1861-?? Married as his second wife, date unknown but after 1891, GD member Charles William Pearce. Follower of Thomas Lake Harris.

Joint Entry

PEART, Alfred Henry. 1859-1942. Teacher. TS.

PECK, William. C 1865-1925. Brother of GD member Harriet Peck. Married 1889 GD member Christina Thomson. Astronomer, inventor of astronomical instruments.

PECK, Christina. C 1865-1922. Sister of GD member George Lorimer Thomson and Margaret Kells Thomson. Married 1889 GD member William Peck; sister-in-law of GD member Harriet Peck.

PECK, Harriet. C 1870-?? (after 1901). Sister of GD member William Peck; sister-in-law of GD member Christina Peck.

Joint Entry

PETERSON, Andrew Frater. C 1872-??

PETERSON Jnr, John. E.

PILCHER, Kathleen. Born Ireland 1868. Died Switzerland 1919. Sister of GD member Maud Gonne; first cousin of GD member Mary Kimball Gonne. Married 1889 Thomas David Pilcher; divorced 1912.

POLLEXFEN, George Thomas. 1839-1910. Uncle of GD member W B Yeats.

POULTER, Herbert. 1873-1923.

PRAEGER, Wilfred George Frederick. 1869-1955. Married 1898 GD member Lilian Mary Blyth.

PRAEGER, Lilian Mary. Original surname Blyth. 1864-1942. Married 1898 GD member Wilfred Praeger.

Joint Entry

PREWETT later MARTIN, Minnie. 1863-1909. Married 1897 John William Martin.

PROCTER, Annie Louise. Original surname Horner. 1849-1936. Married 1873 James Procter. Had lived on Madagascar.

PROWER, Nelson. 1856-1943. Teacher; writer. Freemason. SRIA. Went to Canada.

PULLEN-BURRY, Henry. Born 1855 Sussex, registered as Pullen. Family changed its name to Pullen-Burry c 1870. Died 1927 Portland Oregon. Medical practitioner, occultist. Freemason. Married 1882 GD member Rose Anwyl.

PULLEN-BURRY, Rose. Original surname Anwyl. 1859-1922. Married 1882 Henry Burry Pullen-Burry.

The Pullens, the Burrys and the Anwyls

Henry, Rose and the GD

Henry in North America

PURKIS, E Heywood.

RAEBURN, Jessie Ramsay. C 1855-??

RAND, Helen Mary. Original surname Rand. 1864-1953. Married 1888 John Rand who may be a relation. Member Independent and Rectified Rite.

RAND, John. 1864-?. Married 1888 Helen Rand. Surveyor.

Joint Entry

RANKING, H Devey Fearon. 1848-1931. Teacher; folklorist; antiquarian; linguist. Freemason.

RANSTEAD, William. 1860-1944. Manager/part owner, Gandy Belt Manufacturing Co. Political activist. Emigrated to New Zealand 1900.

REX, John. E. C 1860-after 1901. Owned a timber firm.

REYNOLDS, Mary Palethorp(e), known as Sister Mary. 1852-1917. Professional nurse.

RICHARDSON, Charles Lovell. 1868-after 1932. Dentist.

RICHIE, William.

RITCHIE, Frederick Clarence. 1866-1931.

ROBERTSON, Emily.

ROBERTSON, John Charles George. ??-1897. Doctor, specialising mental health. Worked Middlesex County Asylum Hanwell. Freemason.

ROBERTSON, W. W.

ROGERS, George Frederick. 1867-1943. Physician. Academic Cambridge University 1900-14. Home Office 1914-43. Freemason. TS. SRIA. SOCPR.

ROSHER, Charles Henry. 1858-1936. Engineer/architect. Writer.

ROSHER, Caroline Lily. Original surname Porter. 1856-?? Living with Charles Henry Rosher as his wife by 1891.

ROWAN HAMILTON, Lina. Original surname Beaumont. 1857-1934. Married 1876 Gawen Rowan Hamilton of the Irish landed gentry. Lived Northern Ireland.

ROWE, Kate. Original surname Broomhead. 1859-1903. Married 1897 William J M Rowe known as Cosmo Rowe. Musician.

ROWE, Sarah Ann, known as Sissie. IU, then IRRO/R. Born 1856 Manchester. Photograph retoucher. DOD unknown. Sister-in-law of Kate Broomhead Rowe.

Joint Entry

ROWELL, George. 1863-1918. Anaesthetist, academic at the London Dental Hospital.

ROY, Robert. 1847-1916. Barrister. TS. Freemason. SRIA.

RUSSELL, Alexander David. 1864-1934.

SALMON, Frederick George Burton. 1865-??

SANDHAM, Robert. Identification uncertain: probably b 1841.

SCANLAN, Alfred Ernest. 1857-1930. GP Middlesbrough. TS. Acquaintance of W B Yeats.

SCOTT, Maria Jane Burnley. Original surname Hume. 1854-1927. Married 1881 Ross Scott.

SHEFFIELD, Evelyn Diana. Born Eliza Dinah Fairchild 1856. Married Henry Digby Sheffield 1877. Died 1942. THIS BIOGRAPHY IS NOT BY ME, IT'S BY DINAH'S DISTANT RELATIVE TONY MARTIN with some extras by me.

SHERLOCK, Thomas Travers. C 1853-1915.

SHIELD, Elizabeth Key. C 1841-?? (after 1901). Sister of GD member Jane Hunter Shield.

SHIELD, Jane Hunter. C 1849-?? (after 1901). Sister of GD member Elizabeth Key Shield.

SIMMONS, Alpheus Butts. 1865-1915. Medical Doctor, Electro-therapist Georgia USA. Freemason, member of Knights Templar.

SIMONSEN, J Hermann. ??-between 1895 and 1900. Cleric, Lutheran church. Freemason.

SIMPSON, Alice Beatrice. Professional name Beatrice Irwin. 1877-??. Daughter of GD member Alice Isabel Simpson; sister of GD member Elaine Mary Simpson Witkowski. Actress, poet. Ran own lighting firm; writer.

SIMPSON, Alice Isabel. Original surname Hall. 1853-?? (after 1911). Married 1875 William Simpson. Mother of GD members Alice Beatrice Simpson and Elaine Mary Simpson Witkowski.

SIMPSON, Elaine Mary. 1875-?? (after 1929). Daughter of GD member Alice Isabel Simpson; sister of GD member Alice Beatrice Simpson. Married 1) 1900 Paul Harry Witkowski. Married 2) ?(by 1910) Wölker.

SIMPSON, George Lumsden. C 1859-?? (after 1901). ?son of GD member Mary A Simpson.

SIMPSON, Mary. Original surname unknown. C 1828-??. Mother of GD member George Lumsden Simpson.

SIMPSON, Thérèse Charlotte. 1838-1923. Singer, teacher of singing.

SLATER, John Herbert, probably called Herbert. 1853-1921. Barrister; writer on collecting, especially book collecting.

SMITH, James Webber. Is in as WEBBER SMITH

SMITH, Pamela Colman. She's in as COLMAN-SMITH.

SMITH, Thomas. C 1867-??

SMITH BROWN, Robert. C 1837-after 1901. Pharmacist; then worked for the freemasons in Scotland. Freemason.

SNEYD, Ralph de Tunstall. 1862-1947. Poet.

SPINK SISTERS - Catherine Elizabeth (Kate) 1867-1953; Florence 1868-1939, see also FIRTH Oliver and Florence; and Gertrude Jane 1869-1947. All Bradford; all TS.

STEEL, Robert Elliott. 1853-1933. Science teacher, geologist. Taught in Bradford and Northampton and at Sherborne School. Married 1895 Annie Caroline Elliott; one daughter.

STEPHENS, Riccardo. 1860-after 1915. Doctor. Novelist.

STEWART WALKER, Alice; and Jessie. They're in as Stewart WALKER.

STRACEY, Alice Minnie, known as Alice Maud. Original surname Osborn. 1864-1946. Married 1870 William John Stracey.

STREET, Eugène Edward. 1847-1913. Man of independent financial means. Freemason. SRIA.

STRICKLAND, Francis. Uncertain identification: probably c 1849-?? (after 1901).

SWAIN, Rose Mary Howard. 1865-1937. Married 1893 Alfred Robinson.

TAYLOR, Rachel, see GARDNER.

TAYLOR, Thomas A. ??-1893. Businessman in Madras.

THEOBALD, Robert Masters. 1839-1914. Doctor; homoeopath.

THIELLAY, Eugène. Born France c 1840. Died London 1901. Chemist. Hairdresser; inventor of platinum blonde hair dye. Freemason. SRIA.

THOMAS, Robert Palmer; PALMER-THOMAS by 1911. 1851-?1918. Worked for a railway company. Freemason.

THOMAS, William Eliot. 1866-1929.

THOMPSON, Ethel.

THOMSON, John Lorimer. 1868-?? (after 1901). Brother of GD members Christina Thomson Peck and Margaret Kells Thomson.

THOMSON, Margaret Kells. C 1866-?? (after 1901). Sister of GD members John Lorimer Thomson and Christina Thomson Peck.

THORNTHWAITE, James Falon. 1855-1923. Barrister.

THURNAM, William Rowland, called Rowland. 1868-1941. Doctor; founder of Nordrach-upon-Mendip TB sanatorium. Poet; translator.

TODHUNTER, John. 1839-1916. Doctor but didn't practice in England. Dramatist.

TOLLER, Victor Conyers Ebenezer. 1864-1915. Worked for the General Post Office.

TUCKEY, Charles Lloyd. 1858-1925. Doctor; used hypnotism to treat addiction problems. Writer. TS. Founder SOCPR.

TURNER, Amy. Original surname Hunter. 1865-?? Sister of GD member Edmund Arthur Hunter; probably first cousin of GD member Fanny Beatrice Hunter. Married 1889 Alfred Turner.

TWEEDALE, Violet. Original surname Chambers. ?1862 ?1864-1936. Married 1891 Clarens Tweedale. Novelist. Spiritualist; wrote of her experience with ghosts.

VIBART Marian Charlotte. 1854-1932. First cousin by marriage of GD member Louisa Florence ffoulkes. Investor in Biltor Ltd; friend of Lacy family.

VÖGE, Anton Carl. C 1866-?? (after 1901).

VÖGE, Lily. Original name Bothwell. C 1866-?? (after 1901). Married date unknown GD member Anton Vöge.

VOGT, Carl. C 1856-??

VON WYSS, Clothilde Rosalie Regina. 1872-1938.

A life by dates

Family and teaching career

Personality, Marie Stopes and Ethelwyn Mackie

VOYSEY, Henrietta Annesley. 1855-1905. Sister of GD member Frances Annesley Voysey Brodie-Innes; sister-in-law of GD member John William Brodie-Innes. Professional nurse; at Krugersdorp Concentration camp during Boer War. TS.

WAITE, Ada Alice. Original surname Lakeman. 1866-1924. Married 1888 Arthur Edward Waite.

WAITE, Arthur Edward. 1857-1942. Married 1888 GD member Ada Alice Lakeman. Founder, Independent and Rectified Rite.

WALKER, Alice Stewart. I assume she is the daughter of GD member Jessie M Stewart Walker.

WALKER, Jessie M. I assume she is the mother of GD member Alice Stewart Walker.

WALLACE J William McNair. 1868-1947. Solicitor. Emigrated 1910 to Western Australia.

WALLEEN, Baron Carl Alphonse. 1863-?? Danish. TS. Friend of Strindberg. Lived Copenhagen.

WALTON, Elizabeth.

WARNER, Jemima Tertia. Surname wrongly transcribed by Gilbert. See MANDER

WATERS, Ada.

WATKIN MILLS, Elizabeth. Original surname Hore. 1849-1914. Married 1869 bass/baritone Robert Watkin Mills.

WATSON, Bernard Harry. 1859-1906. Man of independent financial means. Astronomer.

WEBBER SMITH, James. 1845-?1917. Army officer. Stella Matutina.

WEEKES, Charles. C 1868-1946.

WELTCH, Ethel Mary. Original surname Johnson. 1863-1944. Married 1889 GD member Henry Herbert Weltch.

WELTCH, Henry Herbert. Born 1865. Died between 1911 and 1944. Married 1889 GD member Ethel Mary Johnson. Teacher.

WESTCOTT, William Wynn. 1849-1925. Brother-in-law of GD member Emily Burnett. GP, then coroner. Writer. Occultist. TS. Freemason. SRIA.

WESTMAN, Louise. IU.

WILDE, Constance Mary. Original surname Lloyd 1858-1898. Married 1884 Oscar Wilde.
Changed surname to Holland 1895.

WILLIAMS, George Easthall.

WILLIAMS, Thomas. C 1854-??

WILLIAMS, William.

WILLMOTT, John. C 1853-1889. Worked Hong Kong for wine importing firm. Freemason.

WILSON, Arthur. Identification uncertain but probably 1868-after 1911. Music teacher, Middlesbrough. TS.

WILSON, Samuel

WILSON, Thomas Duddington.

WILSON, THOMAS W.

WILSON, William.

WOLF, Annie.

WOODMAN, William Robert. 1828-91. Doctor. Freemason. SRIA.

WRIGHT, Francis William. 1858-1938.

WRIGHT, Charlotte. 1867-?? (after 1901). Sister of GD members Margaret Elizabeth Wright and Henry Wright. Teacher.

WRIGHT, Henry. 1858-?? (after 1901). Brother of GD members Margaret Elizabeth Wright and Charlotte Wright. Rent collector for a local authority.

WRIGHT, Margaret Elizabeth. 1857-1914. Sister of GD members Henry Wright and Charlotte Wright.

Joint Entry

YEATS, William Butler. 1865-1939.

YUSUF. The more usual spelling; but see under EUSUF.

***

Jeremiah Leech Atherton was initiated into the Order of the Golden Dawn at its Horus Temple in Bradford. He was the Horus Temple's fifth member, going through the initiation ceremony in May 1888. He chose the Latin motto 'semper fidelis'. He was one of the Horus Temple's most senior members, taking an active role in seeking out new recruits, and serving as its Imperator from 1888 to 1892, and as its Cancellarius from 1892; though he was never initiated into the inner Second Order of the GD.

A WORD OF WARNING BEFORE I START: this is my biography of a member of the Golden Dawn who lived in Bradford. I could have done a much better job of it if I lived in the area myself and could look at local archives.

Jeremiah Leech Atherton's parents were both from Lancashire. Elizabeth Shuttleworth grew up in Prescott, between Liverpool and St Helens; and William Atherton was born in Middleton, a village south-west of Lancaster. They married, in Prescott, in January 1837 and only moved to Yorkshire in 1841 so that William Atherton could begin work as minister of the Congregationalist chapel at Bingley. The Rev Atherton had not had any recognised training for the ministry but despite this, he soon made an impact and a name for himself in the district, with his energy and his sermons. His dramatic preaching style began to attract large crowds - in 1845 the chapel was enlarged to accommodate them - and he also started to receive offers of work from other chapels. He accepted one of these, from the congregation at Idle Upper Chapel. Idle was just east of Bingley. It was another mill town, situated on the Liverpool/Leeds ship canal and the River Aire. Rev Atherton took up his new post in 1849. The offer by his new parishioners at Idle had included building a school, and rebuilding the chapel. Both these promises were carried out but William Atherton didn't live long enough to do more than begin his work in them: he died suddenly on 16 July 1850, aged only 34.

Jeremiah Leech Atherton was William and Elizabeth's eldest child. He was born in Ashton-under-Lyne, east of Manchester, in 1838. He had few siblings by Victorian standards: two brothers, Ebenezer and James; and one sister, Mary. What happened to Elizabeth Atherton and her children immediately after William Atherton died I don't know. The normal procedure was for a widowed women with a young family and a small income to seek a home with her relatives; but I couldn't find Elizabeth or any of her children on the 1851 census. By 1861 Elizabeth and her family had returned to live in the Bowling area of Bradford. On the 1851 census form, the box which should have detailed Elizabeth Atherton's source of income was not filled in; but from later census forms it's clear that she was living on an annuity, one paid for either by her family or by her husband's congregation. By 1861 all Elizabeth's children were working Ebenezer was studying medicine, James was working as an apprentice to an engineer, Mary as a milliner's apprentice; and Jeremiah was employed as a yarn manager in a woollen mill.

In 1860, Jeremiah had married Ann Maria Dobson. I'm not quite sure I have found the correct Dobson family on the 1841 census. If I've got it right, Ann Maria's father, Samuel Dobson, was a farm labourer, but the main bread-winners in the family were her older sisters, who were working in a woollen mill; Ann Maria was still at school. The family was living in Guiseley. If it is the right family, I would imagine Ann Maria would, in due course, have joined her sisters at the mill, and this might have been where she and Jeremiah had met; though meeting through attending the same church or chapel was a commonplace of the time as well; or they might have met at school.

Jeremiah and Ann Maria had at least eight, possibly eleven children, over the next decade, but - as was typical of their time - several of them died in their infancy. These children died: Thomas Cathcart Atherton (born 1861, the twin of William, there's no death registration for him); Ann Maria (1866-67); and Mary (1868-69); and there may have been as many as three more. Those who survived were William Cathcart Atherton, born 1861, the twin of Thomas; Samuel born 1864; Frances Elizabeth born 1869; and Ursula born 1871. Around 1869, Jeremiah and Ann Maria moved out of Bradford to Keighley, on the edge of the moors (it's just down the valley from Howarth where the Brontë family lived). After the deaths of three (at least) young children they may have gone in search of the better air that (not understanding exactly how germs were spread) the Victorians set such store by. Elizabeth Atherton was still living in the Bradford area at this time, but in Guisborough with her daughter Mary, who had married Robert McTaggart. Elizabeth Atherton died, in Bradford, in 1880.

I can't find Jeremiah and Ann Maria on the 1871 census. By 1881, they had moved again, back to Idle. Jeremiah's brother William Cathcart was still living at home; and Frances and Ursula were still at school. I can't find Jeremiah's son Samuel anywhere in the UK.

William Cathcart Atherton married Alice Jane Smith in 1884 and the following year Jeremiah and Ann Maria became grandparents when Ada was born, the first of nine children.

Ann Maria Atherton, died in the summer of 1887, aged 49. Two years later, Jeremiah got married again, to Alice Mitchell. I think Alice was the daughter of a Thomas Mitchell who was living in the Thornton area, to the south-west of Bradford, in 1881; if this is the right person, Alice was working as a worsted spinner at that time and probably up until her marriage. Jeremiah and Alice had one child, Anne Maria, born in 1890. On the day of the 1891 census Jeremiah, Alice and the infant Anne Maria were living at 21 Fairfield Road Manningham. Living with them were Samuel Atherton, who was working as a butcher; and Ursula, who was a seamstress. It's interesting, and I'm not sure how to interpret it, that neither of the older children was working in the woollens industry which dominated their home town.

A quick resume of what happened to Jeremiah's older daughters: Frances married Herbert Walton Taylor in 1889. And Ursula made what the Victorians would have considered a very good match in 1896, when she married Barnard Hartley, who was clerk to the Bingley School Board.

Now I want to look at Jeremiah Leech Atherton's working life, because he's one of the few GD members even in Bradford who worked in one of Britain's great 19th-century industries. Firstly I'll give as complete a list as I can of what he told the census officials he was doing, in the years between 1861 and 1901; and where he was living at the time as I'm going to use that in a theory.

In 1861 he was living at Bowling, in the south Bradford; and was working as a yarn manager.

He isn't on the 1871 census.

In 1881 he was living in Idle, which is to the north of Bradford, and working as a yarn buyer and it's possible his son William Cathcart was working for him or with him.

In 1891 he was living in Manningham, on the north side of Bradford but nearer into town, and working as the manager of a mohair spinning works. His son was working as a "plush finisher" - that is, velvet plush.

In 1901 Jeremiah had moved to Bingley but had the same job as in 1891.

I do think, based on the census information, that Jeremiah Atherton worked for more than one firm in the course of his working life, rather an unusual career pattern for his time; and that he may have run his own business for a time, as well.

I'm not going to speculate about where Jeremiah Atherton worked in the early part of his life as I imagine all mills needed a manager for their yarn processes. He must have been employed - that is, not in business for himself. There were mills all over Bradford and in every surrounding district. If he was living in Bowling, he might have been working at one of the mills in the Horton district; and that's as far as I'll go.

You can read his reply to the 1881 census official in two ways unfortunately: either he is working as a buyer for a mill-owning company, with his son William Cathcart in his office; or - now he has considerable experience of yarns and is a well-known figure in the industry - he has set up his own business as an independent buyer, working with his son. A reference to him in an obituary I found describes him as "efficient and upright man of business"; which sounds like what you might say about a man who ran his own business, but which I suppose might also refer to his way of doing business for an employer. If Jeremiah and William Cathcart Atherton did run their own business in the 1870s and 1880s, their timing wasn't good: my reading about the woollen industry in Bradford suggests that the 1870s, at least, were a time of depression in the industry, following a period of over-production. Mills had to make changes to the type of product they made; and some firms didn't survive.

I think I'm on safer ground with Jeremiah Atherton at the end of his working life, from 1881 at the latest, and probably up to his death: he was employed at a mill, to manage the mohair spinning works. According to the books I've looked at via googlebooks, the reference to 'mohair spinning' cuts the list of Jeremiah's possible employers down quite a bit, because only a few Bradford firms did mohair: Mitchell Brothers; Titus Salt and Co; Joseph Benn and Son; and S C Lister and Co. I'd love Jeremiah's employer to be John Foster, of the famous Black Dyke mill and band; but John Foster's firm was based at Queensbury, south-west of Bradford on the way to Halifax, and Jeremiah's various addresses are on the wrong side of town - surely he would live near his work? Joseph Benn and Son's mill was at Great Horton, also perhaps a bit far from Manningham and Bingley.

In trying to make a good guess as to where Jeremiah Atherton was working in (say) 1891 I'm also considering exactly how he and his son William Cathcart Atherton were earning their living on the day of the 1891 census. William Cathcart in particular, gave quite specific details to his census official and as a result, I'm going to suggest, cautiously, that in 1891 at least, William Cathcart Atherton worked for S C Lister and Co; and so did Jeremiah.

Samuel Cunliffe Lister (1815-1906) began as a worsted manufacturer in 1838 in partnership with his brother John. As much an inventor as an entrepreneur, his Lister nip comb of 1851 revolutionised the milling of wool by making it much easier and less dirty to straighten the fibres in a piece of fleece, ready for spinning. Around 1855, Lister began a series of experiments that almost bankrupted him before he finally discovered a way to re-use waste silk fibres as yarn. In the difficult economic conditions of the 1870s, his company diversified from worsteds into fake sealskin. However, the invention that made Lister rich was a loom that could weave fabrics which had a very deep pile: velvet and mohair.

In 1871 Lister's original mill burned down. Its replacement was finished in 1873 and with 27 acres of floor-space was the biggest silk mill in the world at that time: see the Italianate design and huge chimney at www.cottontown.org. The mill still exists, as flats and leisure facilities; it closed down as a working mill in 1990. When S C Lister and Co first used the mill, 5000 people (mostly women) worked in it and production concentrated on silk worsted, mohair and chiffon - luxury products where Samuel Cunliffe Lister held patents on the machinery.

I'm suggesting that both Jeremiah Atherton and William Cathcart Atherton were working for S C Lister and Co by 1891. However, if I'm right, what they told the census officials on the day of the 1891 census was only the half of it: father and son were in opposite camps, because in early April 1891 workers at the Manningham Mill were heading for the bitter end of a strike that had begun with the management's announcement (just before Christmas) of 25% wage-cuts for 1000 workers. The workers directly affected had gone on strike almost at once. The finishers - including (if I'm correct) William Cathcart Atherton - had joined them in February. The firm's directors had brought in strike-breaking workers and called in the police to break up the demonstrations at the Mill gates. By mid-April 1891 things were desperate for those on strike: money raised from union organisations all over the West Riding was beginning to run out and the company's directors were still refusing to negotiate or go to arbitration. Over the weekend of 11-12 April 1891 (a few days after the census), the Durham Light Infantry had been called out from their barracks at Bradford Moor to join the police in quelling a crowd of strikers massed outside the Town Hall. Stones and knives had been thrown at them; they had charged with fixed bayonets. The Riot Act had been read.

And then the strike collapsed. It's not clear to me whether the workers were allowed by the Company to go back to their jobs. If they were, it was of course at the lower rate of pay. Meanwhile the Company was still making a profit at that time and just to rub salt into the workers' wounds, Samuel Cunliffe Lister was given a peerage in 1891, becoming the first Baron Masham.

The 1890s and 1900s were hard times for Bradford's mills. The McKinley Tariff Act had been passed in the USA late in 1890 and had put a heavy tax on imported silk and other manufactured textiles. That was, of course, the reason for S C Lister and Co's decision to enforce a pay-cut. The directors knew that the firm's exports to the USA would take a big hit. Another Bradford firm, Joseph Benn and Son, moved most of their woollen production to Rhode Island after 1903. At least S C Lister and Co didn't do that. Jeremiah Atherton was working at the same job, presumably for the same employer, on the day of the 1901 census; and probably until his death.

Jeremiah Atherton's intellectual interests would have come as welcome relief, I imagine, in these increasingly difficult economic times. His interest in the occult may go back a long way. A book I found but would not like to place too much reliance on, describes three of the early members of the Horus Temple - Frank Harrison, Thomas Pattinson and Jeremiah Atherton - as “old occult students”; and suggests that they had known the alchemist Rev William Alexander Ayton for many years by the time the Golden Dawn was founded. Rev Ayton was one of the earliest members of the Golden Dawn’s Isis-Urania temple in London.

Jeremiah was a freemason in one local lodge and two local chapters: Scientific Lodge number 439, where he served his year as WM; Chapter of Moravia number 387; and Chapter of Sincerity number 600 (it has now been renumbered 61) where he served a year as PZ. The lodge and chapters had all been in existence since before Jeremiah Atherton had even been born and were based in different districts of the West Riding: Scientific Lodge 439 met in the Fleece Hotel, Main Street Bingley throughout the period that Jeremiah was a member; Chapter of Moravia was based in Baildon; and Chapter of Sincerity 61 (ex-600) is now based in Halifax, I’m not sure where it met in Jeremiah’s lifetime.

In 1887, shortly after it was founded, Jeremiah became a corresponding member of the lodge Quatuor Coronati 2076, whose purpose was to bring method and rigour to the investigation of the history of freemasonry. As QC2076's local secretary for West Yorkshire, Jeremiah went to a meeting in 1889 at which a paper ‘The Advance of Intelligent Masonry’ was read. The Bradford and District Masonic Literary Society was founded at the meeting and Jeremiah became one of its two vice-presidents.

Jeremiah was also a Mark Master Mason and the member of a very unusual MM lodge, the Old York Time Immemorial Lodge, which at least from 1852 to 1873 was its own master, not subject to the rules of any grand lodge, MM masons or otherwise. In 1873 it finally placed itself under the orders of the (Yorkshire based) Grand Lodge of Mark Master Masons of England. As preparation for this event, seven of its members were promoted to the Mark Degree; Jeremiah Atherton was one of the seven. Mark masonry was not accepted by the United Grand Lodge of England, which consequently had no authority over it.

As soon as he had two years experience as a master mason, and was the member of a Royal Arch chapter, Jeremiah became eligible to join the Order of the Temple, the knights templar. There was also an assumption that any candidate for membership would of course be a believer in Christianity. The Order of the Temple’s equivalent to a craft lodge was called a preceptory. Jeremiah was a member of Faith preceptory 13 which met at the Masonic Hall in Darley Street Bradford. It was one of the Order’s oldest preceptoriums, with a warrant dating to 1809. He may have been serving his year as its preceptor (the equivalent to a craft Worshipful Master) in 1890: in May 1890 he went to the annual meeting of the Order’s governing body in England and Wales, its Great National Priory. He was there as a representative of the Order in West Yorkshire; and as “Standard Bearer (Beauceant)”. This was the only annual meeting he attended, and by 1897 he was no longer in the Order.

The Ancient and Accepted Rite (AAR) was an organisation of freemasons separate from the craft lodges of the United Grand Lodge; with its own headquarters, in London; and its own lodge equivalents, its Rose Croix chapters. Membership was by invitation only, and like the Order of the Temple it was a consciously Christian organisation - candidates were required to believe in the Christian trinity. Jeremiah became a member of the AAR’s Prince of Wales 69 chapter, which was founded in 1876. It met in Huddersfield; there wasn’t an AAR lodge in Bradford. Jeremiah was serving as the chapter’s Recorder in 1888 and was its Most Wise Sovereign (MWS, equivalent to a craft lodge’s worshipful master) in 1889. He reached the AAR’s 30° in 1887 and was still a member of Prince of Wales 69 in 1900.

As a freemason Jeremiah was eligible to be elected to the Societas Rosicruciana in Anglia (SRIA); he joined its Hallamshire College in February 1883. Membership of SRIA would have put him in touch with William Wynne Westcott, if they did not already know each other through their occult interests. Westcott was a very active member of SRIA, attending nearly all of the meetings of its Metropolitan College, and giving many talks. He was SRIA's secretary during the 1880s before becoming its Supreme Magus (its most senior official) in 1892. Samuel Mathers was also a member but didn't attend quite so many meetings. Hallamshire College was very active, holding four meetings each year and organising visits for its members and their guests, to places of historical and iconographical interest: in the 1880s, for example, they went on trips to York and Fountains Abbey. As a senior member of Hallamshire College Jeremiah used his managerial skills when he served as its Celebrant in 1888-89 and organised College conferences (to take place in Bradford) in 1893 and 1900. (At the 1900 conference the Hallamshire College changed its name to York College.) In 1892 he was elected to SRIA's High Council at the special request of William Wynne Westcott, one of the first decisions Westcott made as Supreme Magus; though Jeremiah didn't get to the High Council's meetings very often as they were always held in London.

When the Order of the Golden Dawn arose out of the desire of Westcott and Samuel Mathers to do practical magic (SRIA was more of a research and discussion group), Jeremiah was one of the senior members of SRIA who they invited to help them by advising on suitable rituals and study-programmes for new initiates. All of those who did give advice were initiated as members of GD, though Jeremiah took a more active role in the GD than some of the others.

Jeremiah Leech Atherton died suddenly, on 14 August 1908. Before that time another of his children had died: his son Samuel died, unmarried, in 1897 and is buried with his grandmother and some of Jeremiah's other children in the Atherton family plot at Idle Upper Chapel graveyard; he was 33. And William Cathcart Atherton died aged 47 only a year after his father, in 1909.

BASIC SOURCES I USED for all Golden Dawn members.

Membership of the Golden Dawn: The Golden Dawn Companion by R A Gilbert. Northampton: The Aquarian Press 1986. Between pages 125 and 175, Gilbert lists the names, initiation dates and addresses of all those people who became members of the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn or its many daughter Orders between 1888 and 1914. The list is based on the Golden Dawn's administrative records and its Members' Roll - the large piece of parchment on which all new members signed their name at their initiation. All this information had been inherited by Gilbert but it's now in the Freemasons' Library at the United Grand Lodge of England building on Great Queen Street Covent Garden. Please note, though, that the records of the Amen-Ra Temple in Edinburgh were destroyed in 1900/01. The records of the Horus Temple at Bradford have not survived beyond 1896 either, but there's a history of the TS in Bradford on the web (though originally written in 1941) at www.ts-bradford.org.uk/theosoc/btshisto.htm in which a lot of the same people who joined the GD are mentioned. After surviving some difficult times in the 1890s, Bradford TS still seems to be going strong (as at December 2012). In April 2012 the History page was updated with the names of all the members at least up to 1941.

For the posts Atherton held in the Horus Temple, see Gilbert pp35-37.

The members of the GD at its Horus Temple were rather a bolshy lot and needed careful management!

Family history: freebmd; ancestry.co.uk (census and probate); findmypast.co.uk; familysearch; Burke's Peerage and Baronetage; Burke's Landed Gentry; Armorial Families; thepeerage.com; and a wide variety of family trees on the web.

Famous-people sources: mostly about men, of course, but very useful even for the female members of GD. Oxford Dictionary of National Biography. Who Was Who. Times Digital Archive.

Catalogues: British Library; Freemasons' Library.

Wikipedia; Google; Google Books - my three best resources. I also used other web pages, but with some caution, as - from the historian's point of view - they vary in quality a great deal.

--

SOURCES FOR JEREMIAH LEECH ATHERTON

ELIZABETH SHUTTLEWORTH ATHERTON

Via familysearch to details on England EASy film number 148 2456: William Atherton married Elizabeth Shuttleworth or Shuteleworth on 3 January 1837 at Prescott Lancs. There are no details in this record of who her parents were. When I searched with google, I didn't find any information specifically on her on the web; but I did see that there were plenty of people with that surname in the Prescott area: between Liverpool and St Helens.

WILLIAM ATHERTON

The Evangelical Magazine and Missionary Chronicle volume 19 p354 in the 'Home Chronicle' section: item describing the initiation day of Rev William Atherton "late of Middleton" as minister of the Independent Chapel at Bingley; on 19 May 1841. The ceremonies were attended by what must have been all the dissenting ministers of the district. Middleton is a small village south-west of Lancaster near the sea.

Website //vitaldb.moorlandit.com is called Vital Records Search and there are transcriptions there of registers from the Idle Upper Chapel independent church. The original chapel on the site had opened in 1717; it was rebuilt several times, the latest occasion being 1850.

VILLAGE OF IDLE

There was nothing useful on the history of the village on wikipedia but at www.visionofbritain.org.uk there's a map and description of Idle, published originally in 1870-72 in the Imperial Gazetteer of England and Wales by John Marius Wilson; no page number. Idle is 3 miles north-east of Bradford on the Leeds/Liverpool canal and the River Aire. There were plenty of woollen mills in the district. A rail link to Bradford opened in 1866. Idle is just south of Guiseley where I suggested that Jeremiah's first wife grew up.

Via ebooks to Idle Upper Chapel Burial Register and Graveyard Inscriptions. The Atherton family had 2 graveplots; Jeremiah had paid for several burials in them. The Athertons buried in graveplot AAA13 are:

Samuel died 30 October 1851 infant son of Rev William Atherton

Elizabeth died 16 December 1880 aged 74, wife of Rev William Atherton

Ann Maria died 10 August 1887 aged 49, wife of Jeremiah another Samuel died 12 Dec 1897 aged 33 (the son of Jeremiah who was born in 1864).

The book also gave dates for Rev William Atherton: born 8 February 1816; died 16 July 1850. He is buried in Wigan.

Ancient Bingley by Joseph Horsfall Turner gives a list of ministers at Bingley with details of their careers. P161 Rev William Atherton confirms information from elsewhere that he came from Middleton in Lancs. He started work at the chapel in Bingley in January 1841.

JEREMIAH ATHERTON'S WORKING LIFE

Connecting Seas and Connected Ocean Rims...Migrations from the 1830s to the 1930s, editors Donna R Gabaccia and Dirk Hoerder. Leiden and Boston Mass: Brill 2011. I saw this via the web, December 2012, and couldn't see the author of the article that was most useful. On p347 in the article The Transatlantic Worsted Trade: Salt and Sons and Samuel C Lister both diversified into silk plush and artificial sealskin in 1870s, which sold very well in the 1880s. P348 the US McKinley Tariff law of 1890 was a disaster for Bradford's woollen industry.

Technology and Culture volume 51 number 4 2010: article The Yankee Yorkshireman by Mary Blewett 2009 . Published Johns Hopkins University Press 2010. Seen on the web December 2012. On p36: the 1870s were a period of decline in production in the Bradford woollen mills. The decline led to diversification from cloth for women's dresses into p37 suiting for men's suits and outdoor wear.

SAMUEL CUNLIFFE LISTER at Manningham Mills:

See wikipedia on Samuel Cunliffe Lister, first Baron Masham; 1815-1906.

Seen December 2012 at www.cottontown.org. A photo of Lister's Mill - the 1873 one. Its huge Italianate chimney dominates it. Lister's Mill was known for its velvet, silk and mohair plush.

At www.gracesguide.co.uk, the British Industrial History website, a brief time-line for Samuel Cunliffe Lister and his firm.

See wikipedia on Manningham Mill which is no longer in operation though the building still exists and is Grade II listed.

MANNINGHAM MILLS STRIKE OF 1890-91:

I found the date of the end of the strike on website www.socialistparty.org.uk is the website of The Socialist newspaper. An article commemorating the end of the strike, published 27 April 2011, by Manny Dominguez, says that the strike ended on 27 April 1891. The Mill employed 5000 people at the time, most were women. The trouble had begun on 9 December [1890] when a notice from Management had appeared announcing a wage cut for 1000 workers, due to economic troubles; a lock-out was threatened if workers refused to accept it. The firm's managing director at the time was Jose Reixach; as far as I know there was never any question of Jeremiah Atherton reaching that level.

At www.manninghammasterplan.co.uk is a historical walk around Manningham issued by the City of Bradford. The details that accompany the Walk include the information that the company's proposed wage-cut was 25%; and that Lister and Co was still making a profit at the time of the strike. The strikers were supported by unions and other societies in West Riding but in the end they ran out of money and the strikers had to go back to work. The lack of any help given to the strikers by both the major political parties led to the creation of the Independent Labour Party out of a number of Yorkshire-based unions etc in 1893. The new political party held its first conference in Bradford. Manningham Mill closed down in 1990.

I found information on the strike, its causes, and the violence that surrounded its later days in the Times: Times Wed 29 October 1890 p5; Times Thurs 18 Dec 1890 p8; Times Fri 13 Feb 1891 p10; Times Tue 14 April 1891 p10 though I couldn't find any coverage at all of how the strike ended, or when, or on what terms. The Times' coverage was very pro-company.

For further information on this important piece of industrial action: The Manningham Mills Strike Bradford December 1890 to April 1891 by Cyril Pearce. Published University of Hull 1975. Though please note that I haven't read the book myself.

MY DUBIOUS SOURCE FOR ATHERTON AND THE OCCULT

The Strange World of the Brontës by Marie Campbell. Sigma Press 2001. This book does not give sources but I give this information for what it's worth: p175 Amongst the first members of the Golden Dawn's Horus Templar were F D Harrison and "J Leech Atherson (sic)" whom the author describes as "old occult students". The author names Ayton as a behind-the-scenes originator of occultism in Bradford p175 who had taught Pattinson and (unnamed) others.

ATHERTON AS A FREEMASON

Ars Quatuor Coronati number 2076 is the Transactions of Quatuor Coronati lodge number 2076. Volume 1 1886-88. Unnumbered pages at the back contain a list of the lodge's corresponding members: number 71 is Jeremiah Leech Atherton of 21 Fairfield Road Bradford, with a joining date of November 1887. PM lodge 439; PZ chapter 439; Past Provl GDC West Yorkshire. He was Quatuor Coronati 2076's local secretary for West Yorkshire.

AQC Volume II 1889: p82 in the news section, a report of a meeting held at the Masonic Hall Bradford on 26 February [1889], to discuss a paper: Advance of Intelligent Masonry. This was not a lodge meeting, it was open to all freemasons. Atherton attended it. A decision was taken at the meeting to found the Bradford and District Masonic Literary Society and Atherton was elected one of its 2 vice-presidents.

AQC Volume VIII 1895; p1 Unnumb endpages [p15] listing corresponding members: Jeremiah Leech Atherton now of 2 Leonard's Place Bingley. For the first time he is listed as a member of chapters 387 and 600 - PZ of 600.

AQC Volume XIII 1900: on an unnumbered page of corresponding members Atherton is now of Beech Grove Bingley (which was his last address).

From the Freemasons' Library Catalogue, some more information on the lodges and chapters Jeremiah Atherton was a member of in Yorkshire:

In the FML, a copy of Chapter of Moravia number 387: presentation of a centenary charter Baildon 1975. This booklet includes a brief history of the chapter. Author is G G Lane. The tenor of the Presentation suggests the Chapter was founded in 1875 BUT:

In the FML: letter written 2 August 1832 by R M Beverley to W H White. The letter's contents makes it clear that the Chapter of Moravia existed by that date; its number at that time was 814.

In the FML: The Chapter of Sincerity number 600 Bradford 1854-1954 by Wade Hurstwick; published 1954.

And some information from websites: both the chapters Jeremiah Atherton was a member of are mentioned at the website of the Masonic Province of West Riding - wrprovince.net:

(There's been a renumbering shuffle since Jeremiah's day and) Chapter of Sincerity is now number 61. It was consecrated in 1790. It now meets in Halifax.

Chapter of Moravia was consecrated in 1835. It now meets in Otley Road Baildon which is just north of a place on the website's map called Idle Moor.

ANCIENT AND ACCEPTED RITE

Rules and Reguls for the Govt of the Degrees from the 4° to 32° Inclusive under the Supreme Council 33° of the Ancient and Accepted Rite [in the British Empire etc etc]; plus a List of Members. I looked at the issues of 1880, 1885, 1888 and 1900.

Rules and Regulations... to 30 June 1885 was the earliest one in which Atherton appeared, in the issues I went through: p113 Atherton is now a member of AAR's Rose Croix chapter Prince of Wales 69.

Rules and Regulations... to 30 June 1888: p50, p59, p69.

Rules and Regulations... to 31 July 1900 p59, p195.

THE KNIGHTS TEMPLAR

Calendar of the Great Priory (of England and Wales) which in 1896 changed its title to Liber Ordinis Templi. I looked at its annual reports from 1870s to 1900 and he only appears once: 1890: p4, p34.

Liber Ordinis Templi volume 1 1896-1900. P256 as part of the 1898 Annual Report, a list of current Order members. Atherton isn't in it.

Ordo Templi Alphabetical List of Great Officers 1846-1915 Atherton isn't in this.

ATHERTON IN THE GOLDEN DAWN

The Freemasons' Library has 2 items written by him, of an administrative rather than an occult nature:

By-laws of the Horus Temple number 5 Bradford a set of cards to be completed and issued to members, giving date/place of the next meeting

This is a strange one: via www.brad.ac.uk (Seen December 2012) I found a website indicating that the University has records of freemasons lodges based in the Bradford area which were NOT affiliated to the United Grand Lodge of England whose Freemasons' Library is in London WC1. The website is entitled The Web of Hiram; and it's maintained by a University member of staff who's doing research. Atherton's name came up in the full text of a talk given by Bro C J Scott in November 1911 at Old York T I Lodge Bradford: The Tradition of The Old York T I Lodge of Mark Master Masons. Scott had been able to find evidence going back to 1680s to confirm the exist of freemasonry lodges in the Bradford area. TI = Time Immemorial; the lodge doesn't have a number, therefore. The Old York TI lodge became affiliated to the Grand Lodge of Mark Master Masons of England in 1873 having existed completely independent of any Grand Lodge from January 1852 to October 1873. At its last meeting as an independent lodge, in March 1873, 7 of its members were promoted to the Mark Degree; one of the 7 was Jeremiah Atherton. It had 71 members in 1873. Just to make things clear (from elsewhere in C J Scott's talk): the Grand Lodge of Mark Master Masons was based in West Yorkshire NOT in London; it was usually known as the Grand Mark Lodge.

C J Scott's talk also mentioned Scientific Lodge 439 in passing, as it was founded by Bro John Craven Taylor who was an important member of Old York TI Lodge. He died in 1891 and is buried in Cullingworth where Scientific Lodge 439 originally met. Its later meeting place, the Fleece Hotel, was in Main Street Bingley.

ATHERTON IN SOCIETAS ROSICRUCIANA IN ANGLIA (SRIA)

History of the Societas Rosicruciana in Anglia by the MW Supreme Magus Dr William Wynn Westcott. Privately printed London 1900. P21 J Leech Atherton was admitted into SRIA's Hallamshire College, later known as York College, on 24 February 1883. Westcott describes Atherton as having bec an imp member of SocRos since that date. P23: on 22 November 1888 Atherton was elected Celebrant. p24 Hallamshire College as a group was made a member of Quatuor Coronati 2076. Atherton was elected to SRIA's High Council on 2 April 1892 at Westcott's particular request. Atherton organised the meeting of Hallamshire College which took place in Bradford on 10 November 1893; p26 and the meeting at Bradford on 17 November 1900. P31 has a list of the members of SRIA's High Council as at 1900; J Leech Atherton is still a member, representing Hallamshire which is now called York College.

Transactions of Societas Rosicruciana Metropolitan College has some information on Atherton, but not much. Trans 1892-93 inside front cover Atherton was one of 2 Magistri Templi at SRIA's York (Hallamshire) College this year. He sometimes attends SRIA Metropolitan College meetings as a visitor.

ATHERTON'S DEATH

Seen on the web December 2012 a special edition of Ars Quatuor Coronati 2076 entitled The Collected Works of Sir Humphry Davy. On p183 was a brief item on Jeremiah Leech Atherton who'd died "suddenly" on 14 August 1908 at Beech Grove Bingley. The notice spoke of him as having "long experience of the worsted trade"; and as an "efficient and upright man of business".

Find the web pages of Roger Wright and Sally Davis, including my list of people initiated into the Order of the Golden Dawn between 1888 and 1901, at:

www.wrightanddavis.co.uk

***

William Alexander Ayton and his wife Anne Ayton were amongst the earliest members of the Order of the Golden Dawn, being initiated at its Isis-Urania temple in London in July 1888. They both chose Latin mottoes: William Alexander's was 'Virtute orta, occidunt rarius', Anne's was 'Quam potero adjutabo'. Fifteen months later they were both initiated into the GD's inner 2nd Order. Anne Ayton remained a member of the GD until her death; William Alexander until 1903 when he became a senior member of one of the GD's daughter orders, A E Waite's Independent and Rectified Rite (or Order).

Just a note before we start: you occasionally see their surname spelled AytoUn (including by R A Gilbert, my source for the GD members' names) but this does seem to be wrong. There's always confusion about women called Ann, or AnnE; most references to Mrs Ayton, including her death registration, give AnnE so I shall use that spelling.

If you want to cut to the chase and find out about William Alexander and Anne Ayton's lives in the world of the 19th century, occult, go to our web pages at and follow the links. If you want to know more about his family and his day-job, read on...

www.wrightanddavis.co.uk

William Alexander Ayton was by far the oldest man to be initiated into the GD: he was born the year after Waterloo. He was also by far the longest-lived: he died five years before World War 1 broke out. His life spanned most of the 19th century; yet he seems to me to be a very 18th-century figure.

William Alexander was already known to William Wynn Westcott and Samuel Liddell Mathers when they founded the GD: as a translator of occult texts from Latin; as a member of several occult societies that they knew of or had joined; and as a practising alchemist. Much if not all of the study necessary to join the GD's inner order was waived in his case, Westcott and Mathers thinking it more appropriate to ask him if he could help them to prepare teaching aids and compile exam papers.

William Alexander also proved willing to lend hand-written copies of his Latin translations to people (GD members and others) who wanted to study them. His letters to one of his manuscript-borrowers, Frederick Leigh Gardner, have survived and been published (see the details in the Sources section below). The letters cover 1889 to 1905 and when William Alexander is not advising Gardner on 'how to be an occultist', he's talking about his and Anne's lives inside and outside the occult. They are virtually the only source I've found that give details of the daily life of a GD member during the 1890s.

The Aytons were a Norfolk family. At the end of the 18th century William Alexander's grandfather, Armsby Ayton, lived in Great Yarmouth, where he ran a business moving heavy goods by horse-and-cart. He married Martha Capon and had at least two daughters, Frances and Elizabeth, and at least one son, William Capon Ayton, born 1786.

William Capon Ayton trained as a solicitor at Barnard's Inn in London and practiced law from various addresses in the Bedford Square area of Bloomsbury. His career as a solicitor seems to have had its ups and downs: I'm never very good at reading financial-cum-legal notices but I think he went bankrupt- or very nearly - around 1831 and I'm not sure whether he worked as a lawyer afterwards.

In 1814 William Capon Ayton married Nancy Mary Nicolson, daughter of Alexander Nicolson of West Harling near Thetford. They had two children: William Alexander the GD member, and Ellen. Nancy Mary Ayton had died by 1837. The fact that there were only two children suggests to me she may have died in the early 1820s. In his continuing search to combine cheap rents with modern facilities, William Capon changed addresses in his private life as often as in his professional one. His children were born in Bloomsbury but spent some years in the new suburb of Kentish Town in the 1820s before William Capon moved them on to Brompton in west London in the mid-1830s. On census day 1841, William Capon Ayton had moved yet again, to Islington. Ellen, now aged 20, was living with him and probably acting as housekeeper as they did not have any servants living-in; and William Alexander was also at home.

William Alexander Ayton was born on 28 April 1816. From March 1830 to May 1831 he was a day-pupil at Charterhouse School which was then still at its original address, in Charterhouse Square on the edge of the City of London. Fifteen months at school doesn't seem like much, but William Alexander was not the only GD member to spend so little time in formal education. All education had to be paid for at this time and many parents spent their education budget in this careful way. The rest of William Alexander's schooling will have been either at home with tutors, or at a local school of lesser reputation. That he did have much more schooling than his short time at Charterhouse implies is clearly shown by the fact that he got into Trinity Hall Cambridge in 1837 and won a prize there for a Latin essay. He graduated in 1841.

A young man from the middle-classes, with a good education but no money or influence in his family background, was destined for the professions. William Alexander opted not to follow his father into the law. He embarked instead on what I've come to believe could have been a brilliant career in the Church of England. He was ordained as a deacon in 1842 by the archbishop of Canterbury and ordained as a priest in 1843 by the archbishop of York. Very few new recruits to the Church of England had two archbishops take such an interest in them. In 1846 the archbishop of Canterbury, William Howley (uncle of GD member Lina Rowan Hamilton) found William Alexander his first job in the Church of England, as vicar of St Mary Magdalene at Monkton, near Ramsgate in Kent. As well as showing that Howley was taking an active part in promoting William Alexander's career, the appointment was also a generous one financially: in the 1870s the parish of Monkton had an income of about £670 per year, and its income in the 1840s must also have been a very tidy sum.

The problem with having the archbishop of Canterbury as a patron is that the archbishop is an old man by the time he's made it to the top of the tree; he will die soon and his successor may not feel the same way about you. William Howley died in 1848 and was succeeded as archbishop by John Bird Sumner, an energetic church-builder and skilled diplomat, but an Evangelical. And here is one of the things I mean when I say that in many ways William Alexander Ayton was an 18th-century man: I can't see him as an Evangelical, believing in the literal truth of the Bible. Ellic Howe, in his book on the GD, doubts that William Alexander had any deep religious belief at all. I'm inclined to agree, and to say that going into the Church for the assured income and the leisure it could offer you to pursue other interests is a very 18th-century thing to do; not a 19th-century one. I'm not saying that William Alexander didn't believe in God; I'm sure he did and in fact you had to believe in the one god to be a member of the GD, let alone the CofE. But he was not devout, in the way that a 19th-century man of the Church was expected to be devout.

If William Alexander was not an Evangelical - I haven't found any evidence that he was - archbishop Sumner would not have viewed him as suitable for further promotion and it wouldn't have mattered what else if anything William Alexander was doing with his time. I would like to suggest, though, that William Alexander was using his leisure hours to 'pursue other interests'. I think he was already an occultist and alchemist. The study of the occult takes time and effort and I can't see how William Alexander could have got the reputation he had amongst other occultists unless he'd been studying for many years. There's also the question of the gap between his being ordained as a priest (1843) and that first job at Monkton (1846). What was he doing in those three years? Waiting for an appointment, certainly. Dealing with the aftermath of his father's death in 1843, very likely. But supposing he was beginning his work as an occultist? - living on a shoestring, his inheritance from his father (if he had one); working at the many occult texts in the British Library (like Mathers did decades later); setting up his first alchemical experiments. It's possible that he even travelled abroad to do research and meet people there, although the evidence from the 1890s doesn't suggest he did that. The most famous evidence for William Alexander's alchemy is the references to his laboratory made by W B Yeats. Yeats met William Ayton through Samuel Liddell Mathers. William Ayton told Yeats about the alchemical laboratory himself, apparently at their first meeting. Yeats doesn't seem to have visited the Aytons so he never had a chance to see if the tale of the laboratory was true, but surely William Alexander must have been doing alchemical experiments for decades by 1888 when the GD was founded. Yeats writes of William Alexander as continually in fear that his bishop would find out about them.

Being an alchemist, studying occult documents, and being a pious Christian - these things are not necessarily mutually exclusive. Many 17th and 18th-century occultists began their investigations in the hope that they would be led to a deeper understanding of the workings of God, or of the divine mystery - however you like to think of it. But other Christians believed that seeking the details of God's plan in this way was blasphemous, and even dangerous to your immortal soul. William Alexander was probably right to take pains to make sure his church superiors didn't discover what he was doing.

In 1850, after what may have been two rather difficult years under the new archbishop's regime, William Alexander was offered a different job in the Church of England - on terms.

He must, I think, have been actively looking for a change. Sir Digby Cayley of Brompton in Yorkshire came to his rescue. The Cayley family were patrons of the rectory of St John the Baptist, Scampton, a village just north of Lincoln. In due course the rectory would be handed over to Sir Digby's third son Reginald, but Reginald was only 13 in 1850 - he wouldn't be qualified and ready to take it on for at least 10 years. Sir Digby was looking for a man to nurse it in the meantime - a similar situation provides some of the plot of Jane Austen's Persuasion. The rectory's income wasn't as grand as Monkton's but it was still pretty good as mid-19th century incomes went: about £300 per year in the early 1870s. William Alexander accepted Sir Digby's offer and left Kent for rural Lincolnshire.

It was during his time at Scampton that William Alexander got married twice. His first bride was Catherine Harriet Moore, daughter of Joseph Moore of Lincoln and his wife Catherine Amelia, née Roe. Joseph Moore worked as a solicitor in Lincoln. However, he told the 1851 census official that he'd been born in Hoxton, then a suburb just north of the City of London; so perhaps he had known William Alexander's father. He certainly kept up his contacts with London: in 1842 he took on an articled clerk who had been born there. Joseph and Catherine Amelia lived at 5 Pottergate near Lincoln cathedral. Catherine Harriet (born in 1835) was the eldest of their eight children. William Alexander and Catherine Harriet married in 1858 but their marriage lasted less than three years. Catherine Harriet may have been sent abroad in an attempt to preserve her health (there's no death registration for her in England), but she had died by census day 1861. If there were any children, they did not survive their infancy.

William Alexander did not remain a widower for long. In 1862 he married Anne Hempson.

The Hempsons were from the Suffolk-Essex border. Anne's father John Hempson farmed about 200 acres of land at Ramsey in Essex, just outside the port of Harwich. In 1818 he married Lydia Davey of Bures St Mary Suffolk. Lydia brought some property to the marriage as her dowry: three cottages, and two tenements in the village of Great Oakley, all of which were rented out to tenants, at least in the 1830s. John and Lydia lived at Hill House in Ramsey. They had three daughters - Lydia, Anne and Mary - and then two sons - George and Amis. I can't find a baptism record for Anne Hempson but from her replies to census officials down the years, she must have been born in 1820 or 1821.

Anne's younger sister Mary Hempson left home quite young - in 1847 she married John Charles Garrad, a businessman from Colchester. John Garrad died childless in 1865 and left Mary rather well-off. She was often abroad in the decades afterwards and it was Anne and Lydia who seem to have been closer as sisters, throughout their lives.

John Hempson died in 1856 and the family broke up. Anne's brother Amis and his wife Sarah Ann took over the farm. Amis became a noted breeder of shorthorn cattle. He also served on the Essex Chamber of Agriculture and on the local Board of Guardians where he seems to have been considered the local expert on rates and rates assessment. Anne's mother and her two unmarried daughters moved to Bures in Suffolk where Lydia Hempson senior had grown up, though Anne was not at home with the two Lydias on the day of the 1861 census. She was visiting family friends - barrister James Cockle, his wife Adelaide, and their two daughters. The Cockles were living at 76 Cambridge Terrace Paddington but James had been born in Great Oakley Essex and Adelaide in Walton Suffolk.

Anne's brothers, George and Amis Hempson, had been sent to school in Colchester, but it's likely that she and her sisters had their schooling in Ramsey. The Hempson's neighbour at Hill House in Ramsey was the local school-master: perhaps the Hempson girls attended his village school and got their basic literacy and bible knowledge there. In addition, their mother would have taught them the skills that had served her well as a farmer's wife and the owner of some property. Lydia Hempson senior and her daughters Lydia and Anne all told the 1861 census official that they were gentlewomen. Anne went a little further and described herself as a "Gentlewoman of Independent means". I find the use of the word 'gentlewoman' interesting as it has such an old-fashioned ring to it. Taken with the information that all three women had given census official in 1851 - that they were farmers (not farmer's wives and daughters) - it conjures up for me a woman, proud to be descended from the Tudor yeomanry, valuing her country skills - supervising the work of the dairy, making and mending, perhaps cooking, keeping the keys to the spice-box, going out to pick blackberries, coming back to make jam, attending church on Sunday with all the members of her household in tow - a fixed and important part of the rural scene. However, I wonder how much the Hempson women had updated the duties of the 'gentlewoman' to reflect the 19th-century rural scene. Did they include visiting people from their village who'd been sent to the local Poor Law Union workhouse because there was no farm-work for them, for example? Because Anne - like most of the women in the GD - left no papers when she died, we'll never know.

Anne's reference to having her own income, was perhaps made because of the very urban surroundings she was in on census day 1861 - she obviously wasn't quite sure the census official would understand the term 'gentlewoman' like she did herself. She did inherit something from her father, and something more when her mother died (in 1869), I think, because at her death her personal effects came to five thousand pounds or so, a larger sum than I had expected.

William Alexander Ayton was also in London on the day of the 1861 census, staying at a hotel in Paddington. I have no idea how he and Anne Hempson met, but they might have met at this time - April 1861 - through the Cockles. They were married in Ramsey in the autumn of 1862. In 1863 Anne's sister Lydia also married the vicar of a country parish - Mortimer Manley, vicar of Rainham in Essex.

The first few months of William Alexander and Anne Ayton's lives as a married couple were spent at Scampton, but in 1863 the inevitable day of William Alexander's departure arrived: the Cayley family decided Reginald Cayley was ready to take over the vicarage they had earmarked for him. I imagine William Alexander had been on the look-out for somewhere else to go for some time. The offer he accepted was made to him by John Lonsdale, bishop of Lichfield, who in the late 1820s had spent six years as rector of St George's Bloomsbury and may have known the Ayton family slightly. The job was as curate of Oakengates in Shropshire, which to me looks like a significant loss of church income and status for William Alexander: Oakengates already had a vicar who for some reason was not able to carry out his duties at the time; but the curate's salary would be taken out of the salary of the vicarage and in 1872, the vicarage only paid £89 per year. William Alexander did still accept the job. Perhaps Anne's own income made up the difference, financially speaking, and at some stage during his life William Alexander had bought some shares in a railway company, which were still paying him dividends in the 1900s. He and Anne could manage, therefore, on a small Church of England salary, and as long as he was left alone to pursue his own interests, William Alexander was prepared to put up with the job.

Oakengates was a small village on the edge of the industrial west Midlands; it has since been swallowed by the borough of Telford in Shropshire. The Aytons stayed there for five years until in 1868 they moved on or were moved on again. By this time bishop John Lonsdale had died and George Selwyn had been recalled from his job as Primate of New Zealand to take his place at Lichfield. At least the job Selwyn offered William Alexander was as a vicar not as a curate. Edingale in Staffordshire was an even smaller village than Oakengates but the yearly salary for its vicar was about the same as William Alexander had been earning as Oakengates' curate, so in financial terms nothing much was going to change. He might already have been finding George Selwyn more of a handful as his bishop, though. John Lonsdale was perhaps more William Alexander's kind of bishop - as Principal of King's College London and archdeacon of Middlesex, he was often away! George Selwyn, though, was a different kind of man: energetic, committed and very hard-working, he had done very well in the task set him in New Zealand of creating a Church of England infrastructure in the new colony. He was very hands-on, though, and I'm sure William Alexander would have preferred someone more hands-off! Edingale was closer to Lichfield than Oakengates was, as well - only seven miles away - and the hand of whoever was bishop at Lichfield was likely to be felt more heavily there, as the bishop was the lord of the local manor, as well as the vicarage's patron.

William Alexander and Anne stayed at Edingale for another set of five years before making their last Church of England move in 1873, when Elizabeth Wykeham-Martin chose William Alexander to be vicar of the Martin family vicarage at Chacombe, about three miles north-east of Banbury. Mrs Wykeham-Martin must have been acting on behalf of her husband Philip, MP for Rochester and owner of the estate of Chacombe Priory, of land in Warwickshire, and of Leeds Castle in Kent. Elizabeth's family came from north Kent - her father had been MP for Rochester before her husband was - and perhaps she remembered William Alexander from his time at Monkton. I haven't been able to find out how much the yearly income of Chacombe vicarage was, but I would suppose that it was rather more than the amount the Aytons had been receiving from William Alexander's last two appointments.

William Alexander always described Chacombe as being in Oxfordshire but in fact it's in Northamptonshire which meant that it was part of the diocese of Peterborough. During William Alexander's twenty-one years as vicar of Chacombe, he had to deal with two bishops of Peterborough. William Magee was the man in post in 1873 and must have ratified Mrs Wykeham-Martin's choice. Magee's family had been important figures in the Church of Ireland during the 18th century but Magee had served all his career in England. He had a reputation as an rousing preacher and was given the bishopric of Peterborough by Prime Minister Benjamin Disraeli for his fierce opposition to the dis-establishment of the church in Ireland. He had some very radical views - he wanted the Athanasian creed abolished because of its references to eternal damnation, and was an active temperance campaigner. I have no idea whether William Alexander agreed with Magee on these points, but I doubt if he appreciated Magee's skills as administrator and the zealous way he carried out his diocesan work. I assume that Magee was the bishop that William Alexander was so afraid would descend on him and find out about his alchemical laboratory, according to W B Yeats.

Chacombe, of course, was where William Alexander was working and he and Anne were living, during the first few years of the Order of the Golden Dawn. I think it suited them. The Wykeham-Martins did not live at Chacombe Priory, although they owned it, so the Aytons were not bothered by the continual presence of the vicarage's patron. The village was not added to the railway network until after the Aytons had gone - when they wanted to go into Banbury, they walked there. Chacombe was a quiet, easily-overlooked place in rural England - just what alchemist William Alexander wanted and what gentlewoman Anne was used to and trained for.

At the end of the 1880s, Percy William Bullock, Frederick Leigh Gardner and others were put in touch with William Alexander, probably by William Wynn Westcott who knew all three of them by this time. The idea was that William Alexander would act as guide to Bullock and Gardner, as they attempted alchemy and the study of occult manuscripts. William Alexander's letters provide an account not just of William Alexander's advice and opinions on occult matters, but also a record of the Aytons' lives in that period.

During the summer of 1889 - that is, the year after they joined the GD - the Aytons were away from Chacombe for a month or two. In 1889 they went to Brighton to stay with William Alexander's sister Ellen Riches. Then they spent several weeks at Staverton Lodge near Cheltenham, staying with Henry John Lay, who was possibly another occultist. Anne seems to have got on well with Henry Lay's wife - Isabella Lay and her daughter Robina Ross were staying with the Aytons on the day of the 1881 census. Feeling that the sea-bathing they'd done while at Brighton had done them a lot of good, the Aytons returned to stay with Ellen for a second time, before returning to Chacombe where Anne had visits from a friend (probably called Miss Waterhouse though I can't prove it) and from her sister Lydia Manley while William Alexander visited Gardner and his wife Miriam at their house in Chiswick. Then it was back to normal life at the vicarage.

Normal life included not much visiting or being visited in the rural winter; William Alexander attending to his parish duties; and probably alchemy. The Aytons didn't attend very many meetings of the GD's Isis-Urania temple as they all took place in London; though they did do their best to attend the big GD rituals around Whitsun and at the equinoxes, usually combining them with family and other business that could only be done in London. The 'other business' included going to meetings of the Theosophical Society - both the Aytons had joined the TS in July 1889 - and to more informal occasions with other TS members, like a seance at which Annie Besant was also present: I find it really hard to picture the Aytons round the same spiritualist table with Annie Besant.

What had probably been the Aytons' normal winter routine for many years was interrupted when Anne was ill in March 1890. The bishop allowed them to take a trip at short notice to Yorkshire - probably to Harrogate - to help her recovery.

In May-June 1890, GD member Mina Bergson stayed with the Aytons for three weeks to qualify as a resident of the parish. Then William Alexander officiated at her marriage to Samuel Liddell Mathers in his church. After the Mathers had left, Anne's friend Miss Simpson came to stay.

In February 1891, Frederick Leigh Gardner and Miriam went to stay with the Aytons at Chacombe for a long weekend. William Alexander and Anne had become vegetarians in the early 1880s but were happy to cook meat dishes for the Gardners. The four of them must have had a spiritualist seance, with Miriam Gardner as the medium, because in letters written after the Gardners had returned to London, William Alexander warned Frederick against the danger Miriam was putting herself in, allowing Elementals to speak through her.

Although it did not look like it at the time, June 1891 turned out to be a crucial month for both the Aytons. There was a flu epidemic that year: Helena Petrovna Blavatsky died in it on 8 May 1891. William Alexander was heading to be 80 and Anne was about to be 70 when they caught it, and they both seem to have been very ill indeed with it. Summer plans were put on hold and by November 1891 William Alexander was wondering if his new bishop would allow him to retire under the Resignation Act, which guaranteed him one-third of his previous income. The new bishop was Mandell Creighton, a very different kind of man from William Magee - not from a Church family, moderate in his religious views, scholarly, a lover of Italy, married to Louise (née von Glehn) an author and suffrage activist; and perhaps more amenable to a request to be allowed to give up work. To retire would mean the Aytons moving house yet again, but by making a careful choice of retirement destination, they would be able to cope financially, and be nearer their relations - William Alexander's sister Ellen in Brighton, or Anne's sister Lydia and brother Amis in Essex.

Over the next years William Alexander's letters were full of anxious references to Anne's health. W B Yeats (many years later) called William Alexander the most panic-stricken man he'd ever met, but in this case, he had something genuine to worry about. In September 1892 he was telling Frederick that Anne hadn't been completely well since the flu, and I get the impression that the attack had caused a permanent decline in her health. The Aytons began to avoid occasions like the big GD meetings for fear that they would catch another bout of flu at one of them.

Retirement took longer to achieve than William Alexander had expected, with one plan falling through in 1892. William Alexander had told Frederick that Hastings was his preferred choice of retirement town; but the south coast proved to be way above the Aytons' means and in 1894, when the Aytons finally left Chacombe, they moved to West Hoathley, near East Grinstead in Surrey.

William Alexander's own health was poor - he had rheumatism and was prey to attacks of bronchitis. During the first few years of his retirement he may not have done much alchemy. He did have more time to read the papers, though and to give his opinion on current politics - he was a staunch, probably life-long Conservative. One opinion that I particularly enjoyed was Ayton telling Gardner that Rosebery (who became Prime Minister in the General Election of 1895) was in league with the Jesuits to bring down the Empire.

Anne's brother-in-law Rev Mortimer Manley died early in 1896 and Lydia Manley moved to Brixton - not an obvious choice for the widow of a country vicar but it did mean that she was nearer to Anne. In October 1897 Anne went to Brixton on what was probably her last visit to Lydia. Anne's health was deteriorating rapidly. By December 1897, she spent most of her time in bed, finding any movement at all very painful. She died on 29 June 1898.

William Alexander went to stay with Ellen Riches and there was talk at least at the start of his second widower-hood of brother and sister pooling their resources and moving in together. This didn't happen though - I think they didn't really get on. William Alexander was telling Frederick Gardner that he was too frail and too ill to live alone (he'd had his 80th birthday in 1896); but Ellen was only four years younger and was perhaps not able, as well as not willing, to act as the carer-cum-housekeeper he felt he needed. Instead, William Alexander moved to Greenhithe in Kent, staying there for a year or so before moving to London's western suburbs. By 8 January 1900, he had moved into 285 Uxbridge Road. I think he took the decision to move back to London so that his GD and other London-based friends could visit him more easily and more often - his health probably being past his visiting them any longer (even a decade before he'd been finding travelling very stressful). During 1900 he mentioned to Frederick Gardner that Julius Kohn and Thomas W Wilson had been spending time with him at his new address, and it's likely that Gardner himself was a regular visitor - there aren't many letters from William Alexander to Gardner in 1900 and 1901. Percy William and Pamela Bullock might also have gone to see him, though I don't have direct evidence for that.

For a short time during 1900, the GD's most high-ranking woman member, Florence Farr, lived with William Alexander on Uxbridge Road. It should have been to both parties' benefit: William Alexander wanted someone in the house on a permanent basis in case he needed help; Florence Farr had only a small income and she was often short of money for rent. The arrangement didn't last though: no GD history that I've read is quite sure why, and William Alexander's letters don't explain what went on, they only say that what went on wasn't his fault. Knowing William Alexander as a Conservative and conservative man, and Florence as an independent-minded woman, I think they were bound to clash. She left, and by the day of the 1901 census William Alexander had hired Mary A Thomas, a widow in her early 50s, as his cook-cum-housekeeper.

In February 1901 William Alexander wrote to Frederick Gardner that he'd got another cold, and another bout of bronchitis. He was having to use an inhaler and was also taking "a special medicine I have for such emergencies" (given his alchemical and occult experience I dread to think what sort of things were in it!) By the end of 1901 he was admitting defeat: it was nice to live so near his occult friends, but the coal-fires of west London were having their inevitable effect. On 13 November 1901 William Alexander wrote to Frederick Gardner from his latest address, Grove Lodge Saffron Walden. It turned out to be his last, and once he was settled in he either continued, or re-started, his alchemical experiments.

At least up until 1904, William Alexander continued to read the papers and comment on the news to Frederick Gardner. In November 1901 he read with horror of the occurrence of the ultimate disaster in the life of a secret society: its existence being made public. In a hearing at Marylebone Police Court, a "Mr MacGregor Mathers" was mentioned by Mme Laura Horos (not her real name, needless to say), one of two defendants as the head of "a society in Paris called the order of the 'Golden Dawn'". Although the police explained that the society was a reputable one and had had nothing to do with the crimes committed by Mr and Mrs Horos, that the GD should be named in such a case was a truly terrible thing for its members - Mr Horos was being committed on various charges of deception and conspiracy to defraud, but also one of a rape in which stolen GD rituals had been used to frighten the victim. William Alexander expected that the GD would have to disband itself forthwith and it did cause a crisis: of course the ruling committee quickly changed the GD's name, but quite a few members decided to resign anyway. However, it was internal divisions over the future emphasis of the GD - mysticism or magic - that finally caused it to divide into two daughter orders in 1903. William Alexander went with the magicians: led by A E Waite, a group of them founded the Independent and Rectified Rite, which was consecrated in November 1903. William Alexander accepted Waite's invitation to become (with Waite and Algernon Blackwood) one of the Rite's three chiefs; and I guess held the post until his death.

In 1904 William Alexander still expecting the destruction of the British Empire by the Jesuits, possibly using the Russians and/or William Ewart Gladstone as their agent. William Alexander hated the idea of Home Rule for Ireland. Gladstone had been its most consistent supporter amongst English politicians; he'd died in 1898 but to a spiritualist, that was not a problem! William Alexander was also reading the Scottish magazine Chambers' Journal regularly in 1905. In 1906 he was 90 but possibly still working on occult documents: in 1908, his only venture into print was published by the Theosophical Publishing Society. It was a translation from the Latin of a biography of the Tudor magician John Dee. The British Library doesn't have a copy of it but you can buy copies via the web.

William Alexander Ayton died at Grove House on 1 January 1909.

In November 1898, William Alexander was engaged in the distressing task of preparing a new Will now that Anne was dead. He wrote to Frederick Gardner asking him to be one of its executors. William Alexander told him that he was going to name Percy William Bullock as his second executor, though he hadn't spoken to him about it yet. In naming two GD members to sort out his affairs when he died, William Alexander was probably thinking not so much of the money and assets he had to leave, but of his occult papers. Frederick Gardner replied that he'd be happy to act as executor. But William Alexander changed his mind: when his Will was finally registered at the Probate Registry, there was one executor, a woman called Alys Margaret Paton.

I've done a bit of research and I can't find any evidence that Alys Margaret Paton was a relation of William Alexander Ayton or Anne Hempson Ayton. Though she had spent her childhood in Suffolk, she wasn't living in Saffron Walden around the time of William Alexander's death. She wasn't a member of the GD. None of her family were amongst the visitors that William Alexander and Anne entertained at Chacombe during the early 1890s; nor did William Alexander mention in his letters any visit to her or her family during that time. So why William Alexander picked her to deal with his legal affairs, I do not know. I have one suggestion to make: that she was the daughter of a friend of either William Alexander or Anne. Alice Margaret Paton (she preferred the Welsh spelling of her forename) was born in 1859 to Rev Alexander Paton, vicar of Tuddenham in Suffolk, and his wife Ellen Willerton Paton, née Thorold. It's been difficult to find out much about Alexander Paton as he was born in Scotland. However, he was about William Alexander's age - born around 1814 - so it's possible that they could have done their training for the Church of England together. Ellen Paton came from a Church of England family. Ellen's father was a vicar and her brother Anthony Wilson Thorold became bishop of Rochester in 1877 and then bishop of Winchester in 1891; the historian of Roman Britain, Guy de la Bédoyère, is a descendant of his. Rev Alexander Paton died in 1889 and Ellen, Alys and Alys's brother John moved first to the Isle of Wight and then to Fishbourne in Sussex; another brother, Alexander, emigrated to New South Wales. Ellen Paton died in Fishbourne in 1906. Alys Margaret Paton never married; she died in London in 1922. I haven't paid for a copy of the Will to see what was mentioned in it and who the beneficiaries were. However, some of William Alexander's papers are now in the Freemasons' Library, having been deposited there by the Societas Rosicruciana in Anglia (SRIA). William Alexander must have left them to SRIA; although he was not a member, he knew plenty of men who were including its then head, the ubiquitous William Wynn Westcott.

BASIC SOURCES I USED for all Golden Dawn members.

Membership of the Golden Dawn: The Golden Dawn Companion by R A Gilbert. Northampton: The Aquarian Press 1986. Between pages 125 and 175, Gilbert lists the names, initiation dates and addresses of all those people who became members of the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn or its many daughter Orders between 1888 and 1914.

The list is based on the Golden Dawn's administrative records and its Members' Roll - the large piece of parchment on which all new members signed their name at their initiation. All this information had been inherited by Gilbert but it's now in the Freemasons' Library at the United Grand Lodge of England building on Great Queen Street Covent Garden. Please note, though, that the records of the Amen-Ra Temple in Edinburgh were destroyed in 1900/01. As far as I know, the records of the Horus Temple at Bradford have not survived either.

Family history: freebmd; ancestry.co.uk (census and probate); findmypast.co.uk; familysearch; Burke's Peerage and Baronetage; Burke's Landed Gentry; Armorial Families; thepeerage.com; and a wide variety of family trees on the web.

Famous-people sources: mostly about men, of course, but very useful even for the female members of GD. Oxford Dictionary of National Biography. Who Was Who. Times Digital Archive.

Catalogues: British Library; Freemasons' Library.

Wikipedia; Google; Google Books - my three best resources. I also used other web pages, but with some caution, as - from the historian's point of view - they vary in quality a great deal.

WILLIAM ALEXANDER AYTON

HIS CAREER IN THE CHURCH OF ENGLAND

Crockford's 1880 misses out this: Charterhouse Register 1769-1872 R L Arrowsmith 1974 p13 says that Ayton was appointed Curate of Monkton Kent in 1846.

Crockford's Clerical Directory 1880 p32 has him as William Alexander Aytoun (sic), corrected in the 1891 edition p47.

Crockford's Clerical Directory 1900 p49 William Alexander Ayton is now of Horns Cross Greenhithe. He no longer has charge of a parish.

THE LAB IN THE BASEMENT: the well-known reference to this is from The Trembling Veil by W B Yeats. I saw the original 1922 edition: London: Privately Printed for Subscribers Only by T Werner Laurie Ltd. The book is reminiscences. Yeats' meeting with William Alexander (who isn't named, only described) is covered on p70. The bit about the laboratory in the basement is in quotation marks and so is, supposedly, what Ayton actually said; however, the conversation took place around 1888-89 - that is, 30 years or more before Yeats started preparing the book.

Who was archbishop of Canterbury from the list on wikipedia. Who was archbishop of York from www.archbishopofyork.org; the one in post in 1843 was Edward Venables Vernon later Vernon-Harcourt 1807-47.

Details of the places Ayton worked are mostly from the individual villages' pages on wikipedia.

I also used this useful website: www.visionofbritain.org.uk which has items (though without page numbers) taken from Imperial Gazetteer of England and Wales by John Marius Wilson published 1870-72

The Cayley family, patrons of Scampton in Lincolnshire: website //cayleyfamilyhistory.moonfruit.com has a detailed list of the descendants of the 7th baronet, Sir Digby Cayley 1807-83 and his wife Dorothy. Their 3rd son Reginald Arthur Cayley 1837-1918 became rector of Scampton in 1863. Other information on the Cayley baronetcy from wikipedia.

The Wykeham-Martin family, patrons of Chacombe in Northamptonshire: at www.accessgenealogy.com, which uses information from The Martin Genealogy. They were the Martin, later Wykeham-Martin family, of Leeds Castle Kent, Chacombe Priory and later on somewhere in Warwickshire too. Member of the family Fiennes Wykeham 1799-1840 took the extra surname Martin by royal patent in 1821. His grandson Philip Wykeham-Martin (1829-78) married Elizabeth daughter of John Ward MP f Rochester. She is the person who appointed Ayton to Chacombe.

The wikipedia page for Squerryes Court, Westerham, Kent, says that the Warde family still live there.

Just confirming that Chacombe is in NORTHAMPTONSHIRE not Oxfordshire: The English Counties Delineated by Thomas Moule, published 1837 has a paragraph Chacombe on p231 headed Northamptonshire and listed as part of the Church of England. Midland Circuit. In 1837 there were 87 houses in Chacombe and 485 inhabitants.

WILLIAM ALEXANDER AYTON'S LETTERS TO FREDERICK LEIGH GARDNER are in

The Alchemist of the Golden Dawn: Letters of the Revd William Alexander Ayton to Frederick Leigh Gardner and Others 1886-1905 edited and with an introduction by Ellic Howe. Aquarian Press 1985. P16 Ayton's letters to Gardner were sold after his death by his sister. They were bought by Michael Houghton of the Atlantis Bookshop; they then went to Gerald Yorke and are now in the Gerald Yorke Collection at the Warburg Institute, University of London.

WILLIAM ALEXANDER AND ANNE GO VEGETARIAN

Dietetic Reformer and Vegetarian Messenger via the web got to an issue of 1883 p353 refers to a mtg (I couldn't see where or when in the snippet) at which a "Mr W Ayton" spoke saying that he'd given attention to the matter of dietetics in the past but "would now, with his family, go in for thorough..." I couldn't read any further on the snippet but I think I'm safe in saying that William Alexander and Anne went vegetarian in 1883.

Cultural Encyclopedia of Vegetarianism by Margaret Puskar-Pasewicz published 2010 focuses mainly on the USA, but on p259 in chapter The Vegetarian Society of the UK she says that the idea of being vegetarian only began to attract the middle-classes in the 1870s. Up until that time vegetarians had mostly been from the working-class. Vegetarians were often also anti-vaccination and anti-vivisection. The London Dietetic Reform Society was set up 1875.

AYTON FAMILY

Family history website www.foremanfamilyhistory.co.uk has a reference to a Frances Ayton, born in Great Yarmouth in 1783. On 28 June 1815 she married James Foreman, in Great Yarmouth.

At www.doun.org/transcriptions/surnames,: b/m/d list for people with the surname Ayton. Miscellanea Genealogica et Heraldica published by Hamilton Adams and Co 1880. On p357 there's an item I couldn't see very well in the snippet, apparently about the death of William Capon Ayton's aunt (his mother's sister), probably in January 1801. There's mention of Martha Ayton, William Capon Ayton; and of an Elizabeth Capon Ayton who is William Capon Ayton's sister.

At discovery.nationalarchives.gov.uk a list of Wills held at the PRO at Kew include PROB 11/1491/224, the Will of Armsby Ayton "Carter of Gt Yarmouth" dated 26 January 1809.

Gentleman's Magazine 1836 list of obituaries p333 include the widow of Armsby Ayton of Great Yarmouth (unnamed, but it's Martha)) on 15 January [1836] at Thorpe near Norwich aged 78.

Baptism of Nancy Mary Nicolson 9 April 1792 at West Harling Norfolk. Her parents are Alexander Nicolson and Margaret née Wright.

WILLIAM CAPON AYTON

Familysearch has 2 marriage registrations for him, but they don't agree on the date or the place!

1 = England EAS-y GS film 1470926: at Roudham Norfolk on 4 October 1814

2 = England EAS-y GS film 1595866: at Thetford Norfolk/Suffolk on 1 October 1814: marriage of William Capon Ayton to Nancy Mary Nicolson. This second registration gives Nancy's year of birth as 1793.

The Monthly Magazine volume 38 part 2 1814 p391 published a marriage: William Capon Ayton of Barnard's Inn London, to Nancy Mary Nicolson; though it doesn't give exact date or place. Nancy is the youngest daughter of the late Alexander Nicolson of West Harling.

On the history of Barnard's Inn, Holborn: wikipedia. See also www.gresham.ac.uk for m info and some pictures.

Did he go bankrupt? -

London Gazette p1483 which unfortunately didn't have the date of the issue: Notices Issued by the Court for Relief of Insolvent Debtors. Although I can't see the date I think it's 1831 because similar details appear in The Law Advertiser volume 9 1831 p488.

WILLIAM ALEXANDER

Tried familysearch for baptism of him and his sister Ellen Ayton: nothing.

Charterhouse Register 1769-1872 R L Arrowsmith 1974 p13.

Alumni Cantabrigiensis Part 2 Number 1 p105 William Alexander Ayton.

WILLIAM ALEXANDER's first wife Catherine Moore:

Via familysearch: marriage 18 June 1834 of Joseph Moore to Catherine (sic) Amelia Roe; at St Andrew Rugby. England ODM GS film 0554755 and 0554756.

Via familysearch: baptism of Catherine Harriet Moore at St Margaret-in-the-Close Lincoln took place 17 October 1835. Parents Joseph and Catharine (sic). England EAS-y GS film 1542052.

Legal Observer volume 23 1842 p55 for Joseph Moore's London-born articled clerk.

ELLEN AYTON RICHES

Via familysearch: Ellen Nicholson (sic) Ayton married John Louis Riches 29 December 1857 at St Stephen's Norwich. England-EASy GS film 1471611. The name 'Louis' may not be correct: at freebmd the registration has been transcribed thus: Ellen Nicolson Ayton to John LAIN Riches.

I couldn't find either him or her on any census after their marriage: most frustrating. Nor could I find anything which was definitely about him on the web. I tried both 'Louis' and 'Lain'. I couldn't find a death registration on freebmd for Ellen Ayton so she may have died abroad.

HEMPSON FAMILY ARE FROM RAMSEY NEAR HARWICH

The family's involvement in local affairs:

The Farmer's Magazine volume 8 1843.

Reports from Committees House of Commons 1868 p62 as part of the Minutes of Evidence Taken Before the Select Cttee on County Financial Arrangements, p66 evidence of Amis Hempson Friday 12 June 1868 as member of the Chamber of Agriculture of Essex and vice-president of the local Board of Guardians.

Shaw's Local Government Manual and Directory for Unions... 1881 p105. Poor Law unions, that is.

Coates's Herd Book volume 33 published by the Shorthorn Society of the UK 1887 p350.

Journal of the Royal Agricultural Society of England volume 49 1888 p496.

Essex Review volume 7 1898 p79 reported the death of Amis Hempson of Hill House Ramsey "on March 4th soon after the death of his eldest son". He'd been born in Ramsey 18 September 1827 son of John Hempson.

Lydia Hempson:

Allegations for Marriage Licenses in the Archdeaconry of Sudbury and County Suffolk published 1921: p192 John Hempson of Ramsey marriage to Lydia Davey of Bures St Mary Suffolk n 20 July 1818.

Essex Archives at seax.essexac.gov.uk. Manorial Records and Deeds of NE Essex, their ref D/DU 457/30: a fire insurance policy taken out 2 November 1838 by Lydia Hempson. The amount of the policy is £205; it's with the the Essex and Suffolk Equitable Insurance Co. The properties covered are 3 cottages on the street at Great Oakley; plus 2 tenements at their rear; all currently occupied.

ANNE'S TWO SISTERS BOTH MARRIED BUT NEITHER HAD ANY CHILDREN

MARY GARRAD

The Essex Almanac 1865 p72 lists of current members of the Corporation of Colchester includes J C Garrad, councillor for Colchester's 3rd ward. On p73 his was the first name on the list of Colchester's "Town and Channel Commissioners".

LYDIA MANLEY

Freebmd's transcription of the marriage registration of Lydia Hempson has got her husband's surname wrong: it gives it as MaUley but all other sources give MaNley. Marriage registered at St Faith's Norfolk April-June 1863.

WILLIAM ALEXANDER 1898-1909

That William Alexander was still doing alchemy in 1902 is mentioned in Yeats's Golden Dawn by George Mills Harper. Wellingborough Northants: The Aquarian Press 1974.

Footnote 17 on p188 quotes a letter Yeats wrote to Lady Gregory on 20 January 1902, in which Yeats was quite disparaging about the whole subject.

DEATH OF HELENA PETROVNA BLAVATSKY

Blavatsky died at the Theosophical Society headquarters in Regent's Park, where she was living in the household of Countess Wachtmeister. Freebmd has the death registration, in the Marylebone registration district, April-June quarter 1891. The exact date is given at //blavatskyarchives.com though the source for the information is not given.

THE HOROS FRAUDSTERS

The trial of Theodore and Laura Horos, real names Frank Dutton Jackson and Editha Loleta Jackson, received huge coverage in the papers. Even the Times succumbed and carried detailed reports on the committal hearings and the Old Bailey trial. You can read the blow-by-blow account in the Times starting on Friday 27 September 1901 and ending on Saturday 21 December 1901. Mr Horos was found guilty of rape and Mrs Horos of aiding and abetting; they both got penal servitude. Mention of Mathers and the GD was made by Mrs Horos during the committal hearing, report published in the Times of Friday 22 November 1901 p13. The Horoses were professional fraudsters. They had been allowed in to Athlone Temple in Paris by Mathers despite the fact that they were never GD members. He'd also lent them GD rituals to copy - rituals they never returned.

WILLIAM ALEXANDER'S EXECUTOR ALICE (ALYS) MARGARET PATON

Her family: at //suffolkurnames.co.uk is Ray Longs Cosford database. It has some Paton burials, with years of birth and dates of death. All were buried at Brent Eleigh Suffolk. Alice/Alys Margaret Paton is amongst them; but she is listed as Ann not Alice/Alys.

Suffolk Returns from the Census of Religious Worship 1851 editors T C B Timmins and D P Dymond published 1997: on p213, Rev Alexander Paton is already vicar of Tuddenham by this time.

At trove.nla.gov.au the Sydney Morning Herald of Friday 2 September 1892 p1 marriages notices includes one for the marriage of Rev J D Paton to Catherine Louise daughter of T P Payne of Southampton; on 13 July [1892] at St Mary's Southampton. J D Paton is son of the late Rev A Paton; his brother Alexander G H Paton is currently living at Carlingford New South Wales. Rev A W Thorold bishop of Winchester, uncle of the groom, officiated. Further details on A W Thorold from wikipedia.

Find the web pages of Roger Wright and Sally Davis, including my list of people initiated into the Order of the Golden Dawn between 1888 and 1901, at:

www.wrightanddavis.co.uk

***

This is a second file in my biographies of GD members William Alexander Ayton and his wife Anne Ayton née Hempson. Because William Alexander in particular was so involved in the 19th century English occult, in various ways, I thought it deserved separate coverage - with this proviso, that I've never studied the occult myself and I leave in-depth coverage of what he might have been doing to those with more experience. I'll just give an overview of the Aytons' life in the occult and try to identify some of their occult acquaintances.

UPDATE APRIL 2017

I originally sent my work on the Aytons to our web pages in 2013. However, a wide-ranging update is now needed, for two reasons:

1) in March 2017 I was contacted by Chris Bennett of Vancouver BC. Chris has written extensively on the use of drugs in esoteric practice, particularly focusing on cannabis but also covering the more deadly stuff. Many thanks to Chris for sending me lots of information and extracts from his publications and others, on this interesting subject, and making me look with new eyes at what really went on in esoteric circles in the mid-to-late 19th century.

2) information on William Alexander Ayton as a freemason is now available on Ancestry, to which I subscribe. He turns out to have joined more lodges than I knew about before.

TO START WITH

If you didn't bother with the first Ayton file: William Alexander Ayton was born in 1816 and died in 1909. He was a priest in the Church of England - probably not a very zealous one though he took his parish duties seriously enough - and while he was a member of the GD he was vicar of Chacombe, just outside Banbury. Anne Hempson was born in 1820 or 1821, daughter of John Hempson, farmer, of Ramsey in Essex; she married William Alexander in 1862 and died in 1898 after several years of ill-health.

A WORD ABOUT SOURCES

The occult insistence on secrecy gives historians a lot of trouble. Involvement in the occult is governed by two fears:

- of revealing to the unworthy details of the Divine Plan/secrets of the universe - however you like to think of it; and
- being 'outed' as an occultist yourself.

In the past, being outed as possessing occult knowledge might have resulted in charges of blasphemy, heresy or treason. By the 19th-century the consequences were not so serious, though if William Alexander had been found out by his Church of England superiors he probably would have lost his job. Secrecy was still the watchword, however - it was part of the game.

William Alexander's relationship with the occult obsession with secrecy was actually rather ambivalent. On the one hand, he appreciated the need for it and fretted about his activities being found out; and he was a man who worried about doing the correct thing, about keeping the rules. On the other hand, he wanted to talk about his occult work to people who showed an interest, and to share his knowledge with them; he was naturally an indiscreet talker and writer; and he was not a good judge of character in choosing who he blabbed to. Caught between these conflicting character traits, he came over to people who met him as a rather nervous, even highly-strung, man - Yeats and other GD members comment on it - and we know more about his occult activities than we might have done if he'd been more careful!

FREEMASONRY

Freemasonry is a forum where the occult and the world of business and the professions can meet. Individual freemasons have always been free to go more deeply into the occult side of freemasonry if they wish, but it's not a requirement. Despite his involvement in the occult, I think William Alexander thought of being a freemason more as a useful adjunct to his position as a working representative of the Church of England. He was a member of several freemasons' lodges, but kept his involvement at a very low level, acting as a lodge official in only one of them, and being appointed to a provincial rank but never a national one.

ST JOHN'S LODGE 601 was the lodge where William Alexander received his first initiation as a freemason, on 5 January 1866. The lodge was based at Wellington in Shropshire and was meeting at the Bull's Head in New Street when William Alexander was a member. It was probably the nearest lodge to the village of Oakengates, where William Alexander had been curate since 1863. He may have been offered membership of it as part of a recruitment drive undertaken by the year's Worshipful Master, S J Fellows. His name doesn't appear in the account of the lodge's history during those years, and I imagine that he let his membership lapse when he left Oakengates to take up an appointment in Edingale Staffordshire, in 1868.

Again, it took a while for the Aytons to embed themselves sufficiently at Edingale for William Alexander to be offered initiation into a nearby lodge. It was May 1871 - three years after their arrival - before he joined the MARMION LODGE 1060. This was a relatively new lodge (founded 1865) and was based in Tamworth in Staffordshire, a few miles south of Edingale. There's no history of this lodge in the collection at the Freemasons' Library, so the date of his initiation is all I know about William Alexander's time as a member.

At the end of 1871 William Alexander became a member of CHURCHILL LODGE 478, a lodge more in keeping with his educational background and personal interests. Churchill Lodge 478 had originally been based in Henley-on-Thames, but it had been meeting in Oxford - where William Alexander had been a student - since 1851. During the 1870s and 1880s, when William Alexander was living near enough to be an active member, a number of aristocrats joined it including (inevitably, given its name) Lord Randolph Spencer-Churchill (father of Winston Churchill) and the Duke of Marlborough. Prince Leopold became a member; in 1875 Oscar Wilde was initiated; and in 1885 Rev Henry Sayers joined the lodge - chaplain of Christ Church Oxford choir school and future father of Dorothy L Sayers (born 1893). Lodge fees were high - £5 at initiation, £10 per annum subscription during the late 19th century - but William Alexander probably thought of them as a good investment. It was during his active membership of this lodge that he undertook his only county-level role in freemasonry, serving as Provincial Grand Chaplain.

The lower the lodge's number, the more prestige it has within freemasonry. It must have been through contacts he made at Churchill Lodge 478 that William Alexander was offered membership of a very prestigious lodge indeed, WESTMINSTER AND KEYSTONE LODGE 10, founded (though with a different name) as early as 1722. He was initiated in February 1872 as a joining member and current Provincial Grand Chaplain of Oxfordshire. There was a close connection between Lodge 10 and Oxford at the time, the result of a bringing together - in 1855, by the United Grand Lodge of England - of Lodge 10's current members with a group of freemasons from Oxford who were looking for a freemasons' base in London. As a graduate of Oxford University William Alexander was charged only £5 (instead of the full £15) initiation fee, and the lodge's annual subscription at this time was quite modest - £1 without banqueting, £4 with it. William Alexander was able to afford to remain a member until December 1894, when he resigned as part of his preparations for retirement. While he was a member, on his visits to London he could have gone to the lodge meetings at the hub of freemasonry in England, the Freemasons' Hall in Great Queen Street. However, he didn't serve in any official capacity as a lodge officer.

In becoming a member of CHERWELL LODGE 599 William Alexander was continuing his policy of involving himself with the freemasons near where he was working. In 1873 he was appointed vicar of Chacombe, a village just outside Banbury in Oxfordshire. Cherwell Lodge 599 met in Banbury and William Alexander was initiated into it in 1875, as a visiting member. The lodge was emerging from a long period in the doldrums - very few members attending meetings, few volunteers willing to serve as lodge officials. Perhaps this was the reason why William Alexander agreed to climb the ladder of official posts within the lodge; though it hadn't persuaded him in other lodges suffering from the same lack of committed members. He reached the point of serving his 12 months as the lodge's Worshipful Master in 1878. He isn't mentioned in any other capacity in the history of the lodge that I read, so he didn't play a major role in the effort to raise funds for the lodge's own masonic hall (opened in 1883), and he didn't become a member of the lodge's chapter (founded in 1887). The information I've found doesn't say for how long William Alexander remained a member of Cherwell Lodge 599 but he would certainly not have been active there after he retired from Chacombe vicarage and went to live in Surrey, in 1894.

It's difficult to know whether William Alexander introduced any friends to the lodges he was a member of, as potential recruits; and how many times an acquaintance made through freemasonry turned into a friendship. I've found evidence of one friendship which extended to the wives of both men and other family members as well. Henry John Lay joined Cherwell Lodge 599 in 1876 and was a visitor at - though not a member of - Westminster and Keystone Lodge 10 between 1855 and 1878. It's not clear from the records I've found whether William Alexander knew Henry Lay before his initiation, but by 1889 he and Anne were sufficiently friendly with him, his wife Isabella and their daughters to spend part of the summer with them at Staverton Court, their house near Cheltenham. Henry Lay was one of the network of occultists that William Alexander knew; see below for more details of the network and some other names.

Two of the lodges William Alexander was a member of have published lodge histories with detailed lists of lodge members - St John's 601 and Westminster and Keystone 10. That's quite unusual - most lodge histories confine themselves to naming those who served the lodge as officers. The Westminster and Keystone 10 lodge history is particularly thorough, listing all those freemasons who were semi-official visitors to the lodge in the mid-19th century as well as all the full members. On the evidence of those two lodge histories, it seems that William Alexander did not know or get to know through freemasonry anyone who was later in the GD, or with whom he was involved in the non-GD groups I discuss below. Many of those men were freemasons; but not in the lodges William Alexander was a member of. It might be coincidence or just a lack of surviving evidence, but to me it looks like William Alexander kept his life as a freemason carefully separate from his other occult involvement and the contacts that brought him.

SOCIETAS ROSICRUCIANA IN ANGLIA (SRIA)

SRIA was a Rosicrucian study-group within freemasonry. GD founders William Wynn Westcott and Samuel Liddell Mathers were both members of it; many of its members joined the GD; and it is one organisation you would think William Alexander would be bound to have joined. A couple of sources I've come across even say that he was a member. I don't think he was, at least, not after 1890. I've looked at SRIA's membership lists from the time they were first published (around 1890) to 1909, and can't find William Alexander's name on them.

THEOSOPHICAL SOCIETY (TS)

The TS was founded in the United States in 1875 by Helena Petrovna Blavatsky and Colonel Olcott. It's better known now as one of the main routes by which Eastern philosophy became known in the West, but during its early years, Blavatsky and Olcott were more interested in western esotericism: they read the Kabbala; they studied the techniques of astral travelling and using mirrors for seeing the future (scrying); and Blavatsky acted as a clairvoyant. William Alexander and Anne Ayton were amongst Blavatsky and Olcott's earliest acquaintances in England. The four had met during a stop-over Blavatsky and Olcott made in England between December 1878 and February 1879, on their way to settle in India. Future GD member Isabel de Steiger also met Blavatsky and Olcott during that stop-over, though it's not so clear whether she also met the Aytons then.

At the end of the 1880s, with the TS undergoing a period of rapid expansion, an effort began to keep proper administrative records. Old members had to be signed up anew, and William Alexander and Anne Ayton appear on the TS membership registers with a joining date for each of them of July 1889. Anne remained a member until her death in 1898. William Alexander continued as a member until May 1907, when he became one of many people who decided that they no longer wanted to stay in the Society once Annie Besant was elected its leader-for-life.

The problem with the TS for the Aytons and people like them, was that while she was in India, Blavatsky's occult interests began to move away from the western esotericism towards a more Buddhist-influenced set of views. By as early as 1884 William Alexander was seeing this change in Blavatsky's thinking as a betrayal of the TS's principles. As he often did with occultists he'd fallen out with, he accused her of using occultism for her own evil ends.

Their entries in the TS membership registers describe William Alexander and Anne as members of Blavatsky Lodge in 1889. As its name suggests, during her lifetime it was dominated by Blavatsky and her hand-picked inner circle. It's not very likely that the Aytons were welcome there, by the late 1880s, and when William Alexander wrote to Frederick Leigh Gardner in May 1889, he mentioned that he was trying to set up a TS lodge in Banbury. Nothing came of it, however, and maybe it no longer mattered much to the Aytons, as they were now in the GD, whose emphasis was very much on the western magical tradition.

Despite the fact that Blavatsky was no longer interested in western esotericism and was not a member of the Golden Dawn, she found out about the GD's existence shortly after the Aytons had been initiated into it. She set up a rival to it within the TS - the TS's Esoteric Section - and issued an order that its members could not belong to any other occult organisation. There's no evidence that Anny Ayton ever joined the Esoteric Section, but William Alexander did. Then he began to worry - as usual - about breaking the rules even by accident, and wrote to Blavatsky to tell her what he'd done. She ordered him to give up the GD, and he did so. Other members of both organisations were less meek - they went to Blavatsky and argued. Probably the gist of their argument was that the two organisations were complementary - the Esoteric Section studying western occultism, and the GD putting study into practice. Blavatsky never really saw it that way, but she backed down; a large group of GD members joined the TS's Esoteric Section including William Wynn Westcott (one of the GD's founders); and William Alexander rejoined the GD.

In the years 1894 to 1896, the TS was - torn apart is not over-stating it - by arguments about who should lead it, and which direction it should go in (east or west) after Blavatsky's death. The dispute became very bitter, very public and caused all the lodges in the USA to secede and probably over half the TS's English members to resign. Many of the TS's most active lodges in England closed down. The Aytons took no part in the arguments and accusations, and they did continue as members, but the Esoteric Section was one of the dispute's casualties - it held no meetings after 1895 - which must have saddened William Alexander.

HERMETIC ORDER OF THE GOLDEN DAWN which originally was meant to be as much a secret as any other occult order

Both William Alexander and Anne Ayton were initiated into the GD in its very early stages, in July 1888. However, as an alchemist and translator of occult manuscripts, it was very definitely William Alexander that GD founders Westcott and Samuel Liddell Mathers were most anxious to have on board. Anne was a good spiritualist medium, and she could also bring to the GD her experience at scrying and (perhaps) at astral travelling; but the skill of a medium was both more widespread and (particularly in Mathers' eyes) less desirable amongst members of the GD.

Perhaps the most important single thing that William Alexander did for the GD was to pronounce as genuine a cipher manuscript handed to him by Westcott for his opinion as to its authenticity. I shall discuss this more in a section below on frauds in occultism that took William Alexander in.

As I'm not a magician I'm not going to discuss the other work that William Alexander did for the GD. You can get a flavour of it even without being able to see R A Gilbert's GD collection, now in the Freemasons' Library, by using the FML's catalogue search: follow the links at www.freemasonry.london.museum. Instead, I'll just discuss some techniques that William Alexander and Anne were using on a regular basis, while they were members of the GD but almost certainly from long before they were asked to join.

William Alexander and Anne were using a mirror to do scrying work by the 1880s if not before; I can be fairly sure of the date for reasons I'll attempt to explain when we get to the Hermetic Brotherhood of Luxor. A biography of the black American occultist Pascal Beverly Randolph mentions William Alexander having a magic mirror specially made for him to a design by a French occultist which involved two mirrors being clamped together so that there was space between them for - say - ink, for writing notes on your visions; or hashish, for helping you get your visions in the first place. This device was made for him by watchmaker T H Pattinson of Bradford, a leading TS and GD member.

The Aytons may have used a magic mirror for six weeks of concentrated invoking that they undertook around Christmas 1891; though William Alexander calls the aid they used a "crystal" so the device might have been a crystal ball rather than a mirror. Each of them took a turn each evening, except for about five days when Anne was ill or away. A summary of what they saw during the sessions was written up by William Alexander and is now in the GD collection at the Freemasons' Library, in the notebook entitled Grade of Geburah.

William Alexander didn't ever write down what he and Anne were actually trying to achieve with this focused programme, which continued right through one of their busiest times of the year as Church of England clergyman and clergyman's wife. However, from his notes I have deduced that it involved invoking a pentagram and placing it in a particular setting; though Anne seems to have departed from that aim quite early on, and gone with the flow more, just to see if she could interpret what did appear.

William Alexander seemed to be wanting to use his invocations to construct a cathedral building, and put his pentagram inside its east window. Perhaps he'd have wanted the east window to be a rose window, like that at Chartres and other cathedrals known to have a lot of magical symbolism in their architecture; that would fit nicely with the Rosicrucian organisation he understood the GD to be. But he just couldn't get the whole of what he wanted, to form! Both he and Anne saw colours in the crystal - William Alexander usually saw strong blue and red - but yellow and ultra-marine smoke would often blow across what he was really trying to invoke (fumes left over from his alchemy perhaps!) He struggled even to create the cathedral building in the crystal - sometimes he got a temple instead, usually the cathedral had no roof - and he also couldn't quite en-vision the full pentagram, he could get two points of it, or a triangle, but never the whole symbol with all its points linked by lines in its interior. And in the whole period he never managed to put more than two points of a star, let alone the full pentagram, into his east window. He did get better at invoking part at least of the cathedral building as the weeks passed - it began to appear almost as soon as he had finished doing the invocation ritual at the beginning of each session - but by New Year he was discouraged and I think, in the end, he was quite glad to bring the whole experiment to a halt.

William Alexander never saw a human figure in his visions; but then, he wasn't trying to invoke any. Anne, on the other hand, saw more and more figures. At the beginning of the six weeks, she was having as little success as her husband with the pentagram, though she did get six- and five-point stars quite quickly. But she always got figures, even in the second session, when a cauldron that appeared first was replaced by what Anne described as a Tudor gentlewoman (if you've read the first part of this biography of the Aytons, you'll know that Anne thought of herself as a gentlewoman). The figures, and the landscapes they inhabited, soon took over her visions. At one rather telling point, she saw a woman standing at a desk with a man stooping over her as she worked; Anne identified the stooping man as Samuel Liddell Mathers. The next night he was there again and the female figure was creeping past him trying - Anne told William Alexander - to escape. Perhaps the female figure (which Anne later identified as GD member Anna Blackwell) did escape, because Anne didn't see Mathers again in her visions. Instead she saw Anna Blackwell once more, continuing to work at her desk, without anyone looking over her shoulder. More and more people began to appear in Anne's visions. She had a nasty one where "all sorts of elementals" tore at the hair of a male figure Anne identified as a teacher (but not Mathers); apparently she viewed the teacher as hostile, because in her vision she squeezed past him and his attackers and "left him to his fate". Her visions then took an outdoor turn, with increasing numbers of people in beautiful green landscapes. She saw woodland, flowers and lovely sunrises, heard bees buzzing and music playing, and was aware of "a presiding spirit" and a "long ugly thing from the North" which kept interfering with what she was trying to invoke. Anne was eventually to see the presiding spirit she had at first only sensed; she saw it sometimes as a man, sometimes as a woman. Several times, Anne tried to build a cathedral in her vision, but she never got further than a few ruined arches in the midst of her green landscapes.

On the last two evenings of the programme, Anne saw William Alexander in her visions. The first time he was looking on in astonishment at the presiding spirit, which was sitting in the east of Anne's landscape surrounded by mathematical symbols. The second time Anne had invoked something she hadn't seen before in all the previous evenings - the arms of England, then a lion and a unicorn, and then a battle at sea. William Alexander appeared on the shore, watching and listening to the battle, and to the sound of the victors rejoicing. The sea-battle scene was replaced by a huge head, asleep. It rose up and disappeared into the clouds - and that was the last vision seen by Anne that William Alexander recorded. On the final night she tried hard, but couldn't invoke anything at all.

I've looked in detail at the Aytons' six weeks of scrying and departed from my practice of leaving the GD's magical practices to the experts for several reasons:

- the source for it isn't on the web and is therefore not easy for most people to see
- it illustrates the kind of magical work GD members were required to do
- there are a lot of websites featuring the GD on the web but they do concentrate on rituals and a few - usually the same few - personalities. I think the work of invocation and focusing your visions has been rather overlooked in comparison.

There's no explanation of why the Aytons brought the programme to an end. Perhaps they were just too busy to carry on. Perhaps the appearance of William Alexander in Anne's visions had disconcerted them. Perhaps Anne, like William Alexander, was becoming weary of not being able to invoke the symbols they wanted.

I think the visions that the Aytons saw during these evening sessions reflect their gender, and their views of their gender, rather well: William Alexander's full of stonework and symbol, definitely the work of Man (not the work of Woman); Anne's full of the natural world, of people, and of the process of learning. Was Anne perhaps conscious of lacking learning? - having never really had the opportunities to learn that the people in her visions were having?

The figures that Anne was able to identify from her visions are interesting. The appearance of Samuel Liddell Mathers, as a teacher-like personality peering over the student's shoulder as she worked, suggests that Anne was in awe of Mathers, even intimidated by him as a man much younger than herself but very learned, at least in the field of the occult. Anne worried about Mathers' affect on new GD members. The en-visioning sessions took place around the time that Anna Blackwell was initiated into the GD, to become its oldest woman member - like William Alexander, she had been born in 1816. Anna had spent most of the last 30 years living and working in Paris, so it's hard to see how she and Anne Ayton might have met; but Anne probably knew of Anna as a fellow-spiritualist and translator of books by the French spiritualist Allen Kardec, who tried to reconcile spiritualism with reincarnation. I think Anne was aware that Mathers regarded the skills of the spiritualist medium as too passive to make them successful magicians.

Living outside London, William Alexander and Anne were not suited to holding any of the administrative posts in the GD. Nor were they able to attend the monthly teaching-meetings and informal get-togethers that Isis-Urania temple's locally-based members could. However, until Anne's declining health made it impossible, they did go to London to attend the major rituals-plus-administrative meetings (held at Whitsun, and the two equinoxes) as often as they could. In 1900, two years after Anne's death, William Alexander moved to west London to be closer to his occult friends. Although he was now in his 80s he will have hoped to be able to play a more active part in the GD than he had previously. However, his arrival coincided with the beginning of a period of upheaval within the Order that ended with its break-up at the beginning of 1903.

INDEPENDENT AND RECTIFIED RITE

The Isis-Urania temple's annual meeting of spring 1903 ended with such dissent amongst the people that attended it that one group of senior members, led by A E Waite, decided to go its own way. A month or two later the group announced that it was going to form a new order. William Alexander was in that break-away group, and accepted an invitation from Waite to be one of the three chiefs of the Independent and Rectified Rite, which was consecrated in November 1903. The administrative records of the IRR haven't survived. I would suppose that William Alexander remained a member until his death in January 1909; though he may not have been very a very active chief - living on the Uxbridge Road made his bronchitis worse and after a year or two of poor health he moved to Saffron Walden.

The rest of this file concerns William Alexander Ayton only. I haven't found any evidence for Anne Ayton as a reader or translator of occult documents; as an alchemist; or as a member of any of the occult organisations I shall mention below.

TRANSLATION OF OCCULT DOCUMENTS

If you've read the first part of this biography of William Alexander and Anne Ayton, you will know that William Alexander was a graduate of Trinity Hall Cambridge, and that he had won a prize while an undergraduate there, for Latin translation. This gave him a very good basis from which to begin to translate occult manuscripts and books, which even into the 19th century were still written in Latin. He also understood enough French to be able to read books and manuscripts in it, and some of those that he possessed are now in the Freemasons' Library.

Unfortunately, the secrecy of the occult means that there's no list - probably never was a list - of the translations that William Alexander did. If I were an occultist I could probably put together a list of good guesses as to what might have been on the list, had there been one. As I'm not, I'm just going to list below a few that he definitely translated (and some that he definitely didn't) that I found being mentioned in books.

A translation William Alexander did do: in 1898 Helena Petrovna Blavatsky wrote in her diary that William Alexander had sent her a copy of a translation he'd done of Abbot Trithemius' Prophecies.

And another: a text referred to in letters written by William Alexander as Ms 476. Googling on the web, this was not as easy to identify as I'd supposed: I found several manuscripts numbered 476, and none of them looked more likely to be the one William Alexander meant, than any of the others. I'll suggest that he meant Harleian Ms 476, because it's easy to get at: all the Harleian manuscripts are in the British Library. The BL's Ms 476 is volume two of the diaries for 1641-42 written by John Moore, MP and one of the signers of Charles II's death warrant. One source I found said that there were references to astrology in it. It's in English but might well have needed a translation as apparently the writing is so awful it's almost impossible to make any sense of it.

And another, though less details were given about this one: an unidentified manuscript formerly owned (but probably not written) by the French occultist d'Éspagnet.

And one group of translations William Alexander definitely didn't do... In the late 1880s A E Waite was working on the publication of esoteric texts in the collection of a man he identified as Lord Strafford (I think he means Edward Stafford-Jerningham, 11th Baron Stafford). Waite knew that Lord Strafford had employed someone to translate the texts for him; and the translations had been so well done that Waite assumed they were William Alexander's work. However, when Waite asked him, William Alexander said that he was not the translator this time.

By the time the GD was founded, William Alexander's reputation as a translator and interpreter of (often impenetrable) occult manuscripts was well-known in occult circles. He did a lot of copying work for the GD. And he became the central pivot of a kind-of lending library for the texts he had in his possession, lending them to members of the GD and others for them to copy and return. GD members Percy William Bullock and Frederick Leigh Gardner were two of the borrowers and Bullock, at least, was still borrowing after the GD had collapsed: in 1904 William Alexander lent him the manuscript once owned by d'Éspagnet to Bullock.

In the 1880s, William Alexander also gave advice on how to study and interpret these difficult and obscure texts (see more about that below, in the section on the Hermetic Brotherhood of Luxor) and he continued to help GD members with their studies in the 1890s and 1900s.

It's a pity there isn't more information on this very important part of William Alexander's life as an occultist.

ALCHEMY

There's not much more information either for William Alexander's experiments with alchemy. Of course, part of the reason he was translating occult documents at all was to learn alchemy, to find out what equipment was needed and to try for himself experiments carried out by alchemists in the past. The main source for him as an alchemist is some references by W B Yeats; who was never convinced by alchemy and disparaged it, citing William Alexander's claims as an example of why it should be treated with caution.

W B Yeats and William Alexander were introduced by mutual acquaintance Samuel Liddell Mathers; probably in the British Museum reading room. Yeats wrote about the meeting over thirty years later - so he may not have remembered it accurately. He also didn't name the man Mathers had introduced him to; though the details Yeats gives about him make it clear it's William Alexander. Yeats' account of their first conversation was that William Alexander had told him that he had an alchemical laboratory in the cellar. As far as I can see, Yeats never actually visited the Aytons and saw the laboratory, so he couldn't describe what it looked like and what was in it; and in fact there is no description of it. Yeats asked William Alexander if he had ever been successful with his alchemical experiments; whereupon William Alexander told him that he'd once made the elixir of life, approved as the genuine article by a French alchemist he'd shown it to. However, he had never tried it, because the French alchemist had warned him that the first thing that happened to you after you took some was that your nails and hair fell out. (Isn't that defeating the object a bit?) Instead of swallowing it down, therefore, he had put it away for when he was old; but "when I got it down the other day it had all dried up"! William Alexander didn't name the alchemist he'd gone to, to have his elixir assessed. Yeats thought it might have been Eliphas Lévi but William Alexander knew a couple of other French alchemists so it might have been one of them instead.

The conversation probably took place in 1887 or 1888, just before the GD was founded. In 1902, Yeats wrote to his Irish friend Augusta, Lady Gregory, that he'd heard through the GD grapevine that William Alexander had made what he thought was the elixir of life for a second time, and was trying it out on rabbits to see if it worked.

I'd love to know whether William Alexander's recipe for the elixir of life was going the rounds of the GD members who were interested in alchemy. I wonder if any other GD members made any?

That he should go to the trouble of finding, buying and having made the equipment and materials necessary for a laboratory suggests that William Alexander saw alchemical texts as describing real techniques, not as allegory - a more modern interpretation of their contents. That being so, I would suppose that he didn't just concentrate on brewing the elixir of life. I would suppose he tried the other, time-honoured aims of alchemy, particularly making gold out of base metal. Without more records, though, it's impossible to say.

OCCULT ORGANISATIONS

There's quite a lot of evidence in the Freemasons' Library and elsewhere for a network of men who were involved in the occult in mid-19th century Britain, studying old texts, investigating symbolism, resurrecting or inventing ritual or any combination of the four. It was inevitable, really, that William Alexander should get to know many of these men and be invited by them to join the occult societies and orders they founded (the GD being one, of course), though I haven't found any evidence that William Alexander ever founded an order or society himself. I use the word 'men' here advisedly: even after the founding of the GD, none of the networkers William Alexander knew were women; and although the rules of one or two organisations that were founded accepted women members in theory, none of them seem to have had any women initiates in England.

This won't be a full list, but below I give the names of some of the other men who were in the network. How many of them William Alexander actually met - rather than knowing them by letter or repute - I really wouldn't know.

The first group were freemasons, though in different lodges from the ones William Alexander was a member of:

Benjamin Cox, who was initiated into the GD (died 1895)

Frederick Holland, chemist and metallurgist and mentor of Samuel Liddell Mathers

Frederick George Irwin (1828-93)

Henry John Lay

Kenneth MacKenzie who worked at the United Grand Lodge of England; compiler of the Royal Masonic Cyclopaedia amongst other works on freemasonry

Samuel Liddell Mathers, ritualist and translator of esoteric texts, a founder of the GD

John Yarker (1833-1913)

William Wynn Westcott physician, coroner, member of both the Theosophical Society and Societas Rosicruciana in Anglia, a founder of the GD

The next group were probably not freemasons:

Peter Davidson (1842-1916) violin maker; he knew Paschal Beverly Randolph in the 1870s

Frederick Hockley (died 1885), spiritualist

Julius Kohn, a doctor (died 1934)

Thomas Moore Johnson (1851-1919), president of the Brotherhood of Luxor in the USA, lawyer, publisher of the esoteric magazine The Platonist

The next group is of men who later joined the GD (though not necessarily at William Alexander's instigation); I don't think any of them were freemasons though I haven't investigated all of them:

Percy William Bullock, a legal clerk who later qualified as a solicitor

Dr George Dickson, a doctor, of Edinburgh

Frederick Leigh Gardner, a stock-broker and cataloguer of occult books

Frederick Jabez Johnson of London

Robert Palmer-Thomas who worked in the offices of a railway company

Thomas Henry Pattinson, who ran his own watch-making and jewellery business in Bradford

A E Waite, occultist and publisher

Thomas W Wilson, of York and then of Bradford; a pharmacist

And finally, a group of men that William Alexander knew OF, but probably only through their writings; it's not clear to me whether he had any personal connection with them, even by letter:

Edward Bulwer-Lytton, author of the 'occult' novel Zanoni

Eliphas Levi, influential writer on the history and practice of magic

Jean-Marie Ragon (died 1862)

Max Theon

There's something on most of those men on Wikipedia; and plenty elsewhere on the web on some of them. The Freemasons' Library has plenty on Yarker, Irwin, MacKenzie and their circle.

Through these male occult networks, William Alexander was invited to become a member of several occult orders:

William Alexander may have been a member of the SAT B'HAI ORDER OF SIKHA. I haven't found very much evidence for existence of this Order but it seems to have pre-dated the August Order of Light before later being equated with it or even amalgamated with it. Records of membership, if there were any, haven't survived but a copy of a ritual used by the Order, now in the Freemasons' Library, belonged to William Alexander at one time. The Sat B'hai Order was founded by John Yarker and incorporated some rituals that Yarker believed had a Jewish origin.

AUGUST ORDER OF LIGHT which apparently is also known as the Mysteries of Perfection of Sikha and Ekata.

The best source I found for the August Order of Light says that it was launched in November 1881 when its founder, Maurice Vidal Portman, issued a document of rules and rituals and announced himself as the August Order's Grand Hierophant. The document was sent, possibly to William Alexander himself but definitely to acquaintances of his like John Yarker and F G Irwin, both well-known personalities on the wilder shores of 19th century freemasonry.

M V Portman was a naval officer, normally stationed in the Indian Ocean as officer-in-charge at the Andaman Islands; but in 1881 he was in Europe in the middle of a long period of sick leave. In late 1883, he was passed fit and returned to the Andaman Islands, leaving those men who had joined his Order in a state of confusion about what would happen now.

William Alexander joined the August Order and a letter he wrote to M V Portman in January 1886 shows why: excited and intrigued by Portman's long experience of life in the East, he supposed the August Order had oriental origins - the letter was asking Portman to send more information about them. He also asked on what authority Portman claimed to be head of the August Order - perhaps expecting a reply saying that Portman (like Blavatsky) was acting as agent for unnamed orientals of very high occult status; or naming a suitable deputy now that Portman was back at work. He must have been surprised and disappointed at the reply he got. M V Portman spent as much of his letter moaning about the extra work that would be falling on him shortly as a result of British conquest of Burma, as explaining the status and origins of the August Order. Portman said that the August Order's main ritual was entirely English and that he hadn't compiled it himself anyway, the work had been done by Robert Palmer-Thomas (who later joined the GD). He did admit to having drawn up some rituals of his own; but again, their origins were in the West not the East as he had asked advice from Western occultists. As to the question of who was the head of the August Order, Portman said that he still was, as he had founded it.

I doubt if William Alexander found Portman's letter very satisfactory; and the August Order doesn't seem to have been very active anyway, perhaps suffering from its founder's absence.

HERMETIC BROTHERHOOD OF LUXOR

More is known about William Alexander's membership of this group than about most of his occult involvement, for the simple reason that some manuscripts concerning the HBL have survived in France; and some letters still exist that were written by William Alexander to members of the HBL in the USA in the mid-1880s. No list of members has survived. It's known that women could join, though there were more female members in the US than in Europe.

The HBL was founded by the man usually known as Max Theon, who had a past rather like Helena Petrovna Blavatsky, inasmuch as his life and true origins have been very hard to investigate. Theon was the HBL's Grand Master, but did not take any part in its daily administration. Collecting the money, liaising between members, and distributing the teaching aids was the province (at least in the early 1880s) of Peter Davidson and the man the members initially knew as T H Burgoyne.

The HBL advertised its existence and willingness to accept new members in an occult publication late in 1884. William Alexander was contacted by T H Burgoyne at this time and agreed to be its Provincial Grand Master in England. The HBL published the Occult Magazine during 1885 and 1886, but was primarily a kind-of distance-learning organisation attempting (as one member put it) to teach divine love through psychism and the development of the intuition. Those who found out about its existence could pay to receive occult instruction on these matters. The HBL didn't have meetings or rituals where all the members would gather together. Instead each member initiated themselves with paraphernalia and instructions sent by its administrators, with other members present at the initiation in astral form only. Members paid a fee to be sent occult texts which they studied on their own, though if they found the texts and instructions hard going: they could write to a more senior member for help.

The HBL's self-initiation ceremony involved drinking "soma juice" - cannabis. William Alexander described the effect it had, in a letter to another member of the Brotherhood, in which he makes it clear that he hadn't prepared the drink himself; I suppose it must have been sent from HBL's headquarters. He also makes it casually obvious that he was a regular drug-user - though I imagine some of his use was for medical reasons rather than as an occult aid:

"[W]hat purported to be the real soma juice [was] drunk at a certain stage...I hesitated very much to drink this drug...I thought of omitting it. However, I opened the bottle & smelt of it. All my life, I have been used to drugs, & I at once recognised this. I knew its effects were most powerful, but I decided to take it. Whether it was hallucination produced by this drug I know not, but I was conscious of another presence... I was fully 3 hours at it from midnight. When over, I felt my pulse, & found just what I expected, that it was intermittent, which was what I knew to be the effect of the drug I thought it was."

Chris Bennett has sent me ample evidence that using drugs as an aid, in occult situations, was fairly typical at that time. I was confused by the reference to drinking the cannabis rather than smoking it but Chris suggested that whatever it was that William Alexander drank was based on cannabis prepared as a tincture.

I think it must have been through his teaching role in the HBL that William Alexander first got to correspond with future GD members like Thomas Pattinson. Originally just involved with his mentees as a guide and teacher, he was soon playing a more active role protecting them from the pitfalls that those new to the occult were all too likely to fall into; in the course of which he blackened several reputations. In 1884, for example, one of his mentees (he called them by the Indian term chela) sent him a manuscript and asked him his opinion of it. It wasn't one that was on the HBL syllabus; the chela had bought it on the occult mail-order market and had paid the large sum of £10 for it. William Alexander later described the manuscript as containing "instructions of the worst kind of Black Magic by means of sexual intercourse". You could see William Alexander as the stereotype of the easily-shocked English country vicar; on the other hand, accusing people of using black magic was something that William Alexander did quite often, when he didn't agree with them. And it seems that it was not the sex magic itself that alarmed him, but the dark purposes it was being used for and "the most devastating results" he feared it could have on inexperienced people who tried it out. The fact that such manuscripts were being sold (and at such a price as well) seems to have brought out the worst in William Alexander and he began to spread hostile stories about its author, Paschal Beverly Randolph, and his works. He later admitted that he'd said and implied things about Randolph that he didn't know were true; but it was too late by then and the accusations have stuck, damaging Randolph's reputation. Amongst the stories that William Alexander spread were: that Randolph had been initiated into the HBL and had then betrayed that trust; and that Randolph had died before the HBL was founded. He also claimed that Randolph had attacked the TS's Colonel Olcott with black magic only to find that Olcott had "turned the circle back upon him". And he said that Randolph had committed suicide - which was true, Randolph did kill himself; but William Alexander told the story in such a way as to make it seem that Randolph's death was a direct result of Olcott's fight-back against magical attack.

As to whether experienced occultists William Alexander and Anne Ayton used sex magic as part of their occult life together... I must say I find it hard to imagine, but that's my problem. An experienced occultist like William Alexander would not have needed telling that the sexual or even symbolic union of male and female, in a ritual setting, raises powerful energies. So who knows?

The supposedly secret Hermetic Brotherhood of Luxor managed to survive having T H Burgoyne publish a lot of its supposedly secret documents in 1889, but was moribund by 1909. In England, recruitment of new members had come to an abrupt end in 1886, when the real identity of the man calling himself T H Burgoyne became known; see the FRAUDS section below. However, William Alexander continued to write to other members of the Brotherhood for several years afterwards. He also continued to use the seal he held as its Provincial Grand Master, at least until 1890.

William Alexander was NOT a member of the SOCIETY OF EIGHT despite knowing virtually all the men who were. It was set up by Frederick Holland (an early mentor of Samuel Liddell Mathers) in 1883 and one of the sources I found suggested that Holland had wanted William Alexander to join it. Two books I found both gave lists of the members; not quite the same lists unfortunately, though most names were on both. William Alexander wasn't on either list.

FRAUDS

I'll just say here that societies of occultists whose existence was supposed to be a secret; and whose members never met face-to-face; were a gift to would-be swindlers.

HERMETIC COLONY ASSOCIATION

In March 1886 a prospectus was issued by the Hermetic Colony Association Ltd, which was hurrying to raise £20,000 via 4000 shares at £5 each, to start a colony in Georgia USA. A site on which to establish the colony had already been found and inspected by one of the men listed as involved with the Association. The land was being held for the Association at a knock-down price, but not for long: time, therefore, was short and those wanting to buy shares had to pay for them in full within the next three months. In addition to six directors, the members of two working committees (one in the UK, one in the USA) were all named, and the names would have shown those in the know that the Association had close ties with the Brotherhood of Luxor: three of the directors were its two administrators - the man calling himself T H Burgoyne, and Peter Davidson - and William Alexander Ayton.

The Association was looking for "progressive minds" to fund and live at the colony, "advanced thinkers" who would pave the way for "the advancement of a new order of Society." Consequently the Association was circulating its prospectus amongst hermeticists, theosophists and spiritualists. Shareholders in the Association would be given preference when choosing who would be allowed to go and settle in the colony. Unlike many such schemes, the Association's colony would have a sound financial basis because the site in Georgia had good farmland - and gold underneath it.

The prospectus is now in the GD Collection at the Freemasons' Library. It's an impressive piece of work, well laid out and printed (a man who owned a printing firm was one of the directors) on very nice paper. The site's agricultural possibilities, and the quality of its gold, are discussed in detail with a wealth of statistics. I haven't been able to work out for sure, quite how the people involved with the Association came to realise it was an attempt at fraud; but a letter William Alexander sent to William Wynn Westcott in November 1888 named Thomas Pattinson as the whistle-blower. Somehow Pattinson had met, or seen a photograph of, the man calling himself T H Burgoyne and realised that as Thomas Henry Dalton, he had been convicted of fraud in Leeds in January 1883, a trial which Pattinson had attended. After serving his sentence Dalton and his family went to the USA. Dalton started calling himself Thomas Henry Burgoyne and with the writing name Zanoni, had articles published in occult magazines. He was thus able to involve himself with the Hermetic Brotherhood of Luxor as its Secretary, and couldn't resist trying another, grander, fraud scheme.

William Alexander was particularly bitter about being 'had' by Burgoyne/Dalton and his Hermetic Colony Association. If he had ever met T H Burgoyne in person, it would have been different. He would have realised that he'd had an encounter with him in 1881 when the man had contacted him as Thomas Henry Dalton and paid the Aytons a visit. During that visit, he had shocked William Alexander by his boasts of doing black magic. William Alexander had sent him away with a flea in his ear and expected not to hear of him again.

By 1888 William Alexander had come to regard the whole Hermetic Brotherhood of Luxor as nothing more than a cover for Burgoyne/Dalton's fraudulent schemes. At least he could take some comfort from realising that he was not the only one amongst his acquaintances to have been taken for a ride. Amongst the names on the Association's prospectus are three other men who would join the GD in due course, probably all of them Hermetic Brotherhood of Luxor members: Thomas W Wilson; Dr George Dickson; and Frederick Jabez Johnson. They had certainly all lost money like William Alexander had.

GOLDEN DAWN

I think it is ironic that in his letter to Westcott of November 1888, William Alexander was warning him not to be taken in by the Hermetic Colony Association. Because Westcott had recently sent him one of the documents on which the GD was founded and had asked him to give an opinion on whether it was old and genuine. William Alexander had concluded that it was. The document was the one now referred to as the 'Cipher Manuscript'; and as most GD historians are sure it was a fake, probably compiled by Westcott in the 1880s, what exactly was Westcott's purpose in letting William Alexander assess it? William Alexander might have felt flattered to be asked to vet the manuscript by someone who was no slouch at these matters himself. He would have considered that Westcott was being appropriately cautious, seeking a second opinion about a manuscript of uncertain origin. However, what Westcott was really doing was testing to see whether his fake would pass muster, and passing on to William Alexander some of the burden of proof. If it was vouched for by so senior an occultist, it wasn't very likely that anyone else would have the nerve to challenge it.

What would Westcott have done, I wonder, if William Alexander had raised any queries? Would he have admitted that he'd compiled the manuscript himself - that it was not the ancient piece of esoteric wisdom it purported to be? As it was, Westcott got away with it and the fraud went unacknowledged for a decade, during which every person who was initiated into the GD was a victim of it, including William Alexander. Eventually, Samuel Liddell Mathers' announcement that the letters that went with the cipher manuscript were frauds, caused senior GD members to lose faith in the cipher manuscript as well. Curiously enough, William Alexander doesn't seem to have been all that bothered by the possibility of fraud, when he found out that the Sprengel letters at least were under suspicion. Writing to Westcott in the midst of the controversy (1900), all he seemed to be worried about was whether he can still borrow a particular (unnamed) manuscript Westcott had promised to lend him; or whether he would have to wait until the hubbub had died down. Perhaps, as a long-time occultist, he was rather used to fakes.

BASIC SOURCES I USED for all Golden Dawn members.

Membership of the Golden Dawn: The Golden Dawn Companion by R A Gilbert.

Northampton: The Aquarian Press 1986. Between pages 125 and 175, Gilbert lists the names, initiation dates and addresses of all those people who became members of the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn or its many daughter Orders between 1888 and 1914. The list is based on the Golden Dawn's administrative records and its Members' Roll - the large piece of parchment on which all new members signed their name at their initiation. All this information had been inherited by Gilbert but it's now in the Freemasons' Library at the United Grand Lodge of England building on Great Queen Street Covent Garden. Please note, though, that the records of the Amen-Ra Temple in Edinburgh were destroyed in 1900/01. As far as I know, the records of the Horus Temple at Bradford have not survived either.

SOURCES FOR THE AYTONS' LIFE IN THE OCCULT

The reference that I found to William Alexander's only published book:

The Alchemist of the Golden Dawn: Letters of the Rev W A Ayton to F L Gardner and Others 1886-1905 edited by Ellic Howe. Aquarian Press 1985. It's a translation from the Latin of Thomas Smith's The Life of John Dee originally published 1707. Howe couldn't find a copy of it in either the British Library or the Library of Congress.

I found Ayton's translation via googlebooks: originally published by the Theosophical Publishing Society. I found several copies for sale on the web, at alibris etc. At Amazon.co.uk they had a facsimile edition published Pentacle Enterprises November 1999. Notes on the Amazon site said it was originally published in 1908.

Ayton's only published article, which was published anonymously:

A mention of it in:

Pascal Beverly Randolph: a Nineteenth Century Black American Spiritualist, Rosicrucian and Sex Magician by John Patrick Deveny. Published 1997 by State University of New York Press in its Western Esoteric Traditions series. In footnotes section p508 Deveny identifies an anonymous article on the Chinese Taro (sic), published in The Platonist (editor Thomas Moore Johnson) as by William Alexander. Deveny didn't give any more details but I found more information in:

Initiatic and Historical Documents for an Order of Practical Occultism. By Joscelyn Godwin, Christian Chanel and John P Deveney. York Beach Maine: Samuel Weiser Inc 1995 on p379: it was published in The Platonist volume 2 number 8 issue of August 1885. The magazine was published by Thomas Moore Johnson, president of the Hermetic Brotherhood of Luxor in the USA; and also a TS member from 1884.

Neither publication actually gives the source that they used to identify the article's author as William Alexander.

FREEMASONRY

Basic membership records from the United Grand Lodge of England now available through Ancestry.

For basic information on lodges founded during the 19th century see Lane's Masonic Records via www.hrionline.ac.uk/lane or via the Freemasons' Library website.

ST JOHN'S LODGE 601

In the collections at the Freemasons' Library:

By-Laws of St John's Lodge 601 printed Wellington Shropshire 1854.

A Brief History of St John's Lodge 601 Meeting at Wellington Shropshire 1852-1925 by B C W Johnson who is a PM; appendices compiled by George Jeffs. The book is based on the lodge Minute books; in 1925, at least, the lodge still had a good run of them. Printed England 1952: p8; pp26-27, p31. Appendix 1 pp49-51. Lists of officials pp58-61. Meeting places p62.

THE MARMION LODGE 1060

The Freemasons' Library has a history of the lodge's chapter but not one of its lodge.

THE CHURCHILL LODGE 478 p

A Short History of the Churchill Lodge of Antient, Free and Accepted Masons 478 by H R Cooper Smith. Edited by its centenary committee and printed in Oxford 1949. Revision of by-laws 1873 pp9-10. Beginning on p29 it lists everyone who had been initiated since its founding in 1841. For distinguished members see p34, p38, p44, p48, p51, p54; for William Alexander's initiation, p45. For its meeting places: p72, p82. Fees p77. Beginning on p25, a list of the lodge's Worshipful Masters does not include William Alexander.

WESTMINSTER AND KEY STONE LODGE 10

The Freemasons' Library has a large amount on this venerable lodge and its members. There are several lodge histories but I looked at the earliest:

History of the Westminster and Keystone Lodge 10...from date of its constitutions...to the year 1905 compiled by J W Sleigh Godding as a PM. Privately printed Plymouth: William Brendon and Son Ltd. Beginning p268 a list of all members listed in the lodge register between 1761 and 1906; with William Alexander on p269. Lodge meeting places: p267. On pp194-203 a list of lodge visitors. On p265 in a list of lodge members who achieved high rank within the UGLE: no mention of William Alexander. On pp262-263 Appendix B is a list of lodge officers; William Alexander isn't on it. On pp173-174 fees from the revised lodge by-laws issued in 1873. On p191 in a list of members who were initiated or joined the lodge between 1855 and 1878: William Alexander as a member of 1060 [Marmion Lodge Tamworth], initiated as a joining member, 8 February 1872. I didn't see any other GD members in the list for that period.

CHERWELL LODGE 599

William Alexander is not listed as a member of this lodge in the United Grand Lodge of England database of members. The source for his being a member was noticed by Roger Wright at <http://sueyounghistories.com/archives/2009/01/16>.

Sue Young researches biographies of homoeopaths. She doesn't usually give the sources for her information but confirmation of William Alexander's membership is in this lodge history in the Freemasons' Library:

The Cherwell Lodge 599 1852-1952 prepared by John R Railton, now in the Freemasons' Library. Based on the lodge's Minute Books. Entry for William Alexander Ayton and Capt H J Lay: p31.

Re the Lay family as friends of the Aytons:

The Alchemist of the Golden Dawn: Letters of the Revd William Alexander Ayton to Frederick Leigh Gardner and Others 1886-1905 edited and with an introduction by Ellic Howe. Aquarian Press 1985. Letter Ayton to Gardner 25 July 1889 written at the Lay family's house, Staverton Court near Cheltenham.

HENRY JOHN LAY

I've not had much luck finding this man using my usual family history searches. I did find him on the census of 1891, at Staverton Court; aged 55, born in Paisley Renfrewshire. His wife Isabella was 66, born in Liverpool. Also in the household that day was their daughter Elizabeth Lay, aged 35, who told the official she had been born in Montreal Canada. There were four live-in servants: a cook, a housemaid, a footman and a coachman. Henry John Lay described himself as a farmer but he hadn't lived at Staverton Court very long:

www.british-history.ac.uk, on the parish of Staverton near Cheltenham, an on line version of A History of the County of Gloucester volume 8 published Victoria County History 1968. The Staverton Court estate was owned by the St Clair family for most of the 19th century; so the Lays were probably renting the house from them.

I couldn't find the Lay family on the census in 1901; nor on Familysearch.

THEOSOPHICAL SOCIETY

Theosophical Society Membership Register January 1889-September 1891 p92 W A Ayton: application dated 30 July 1889; resigned 8 May 1907. Branch = Blavatsky.

Theosophical Society Membership Register January 1889-September 1891 p97 Ann (sic) Ayton: application dated 30 July 1889. Handwritten note "Died June 29th 1898". Branch = "unattached".

The Golden Dawn and the Esoteric Section by R A Gilbert. Published 1987, London: Theosophical History Centre. The mention of William Alexander is on p6; Gilbert is quoting Blavatsky's article Lodges of Magic, which appeared in Lucifer's issue of October 1888.

The Theosophical Enlightenment by Joscelyn Godwin. Published by the State Univ of New York Press in its Western Esoteric Traditions series 1994. The meeting of the Aytons with Olcott and Blavatsky: p307-08. The sources for it are The Spiritualist volume XIV January 1879: 41-42; and later Olcott's memoir Old Diary Leaves volume 2 pp 4-9.

Initiatic and Historical Documents for an Order of Practical Occultism. By Joscelyn Godwin, Christian Chanel and John P Deveney. York Beach Maine: Samuel Weiser Inc 1995 and very much focused on the US connection: p35, p60, p166 footnote 1, p334.

Pascal Beverly Randolph: a Nineteenth Century Black American Spiritualist, Rosicrucian and Sex Magician by John Patrick Deveney. Published 1997 by State University of New York Press in its Western Esoteric Traditions series. About astral travelling: p295. About scrying: p297. About Blavatsky's use of hashish in the 1870s: p298.

GOLDEN DAWN

Pascal Beverly Randolph: a Nineteenth Century Black American Spiritualist, Rosicrucian and Sex Magician by John Patrick Deveny. Published 1997 by State Univ of New York Press in its Western Esoteric Traditions series. The mirror device made for the Aytons by T H Pattinson: p56 but unfortunately it doesn't give a date for it.

Items in the Freemasons' Library GD collection:

Most are Flying Rolls written out by William Alexander for the use of new initiates.

GBR 1991 GD 2/1/1 GD's Grade of Geburah notebook, which is more of a motley crew than it sounds. There are a lot of hand-written rituals in it, some in William Alexander's handwriting. But it also has in it the GD members' address book. In the middle is the diary of the Aytons' invoking experiences; with page numbers in pencil added much later pp231-[237]. The diary begins with the session of 4 December 1891 and ends with that of 23 January 1892. As I am not an occultist I don't know how far the title of the whole notebook can be applied to the Diary. Geburah is a Kabbalistic term and is associated with the 6=5 Adeptus Major level.

Further thoughts on the invocation diary, after looking at it again in April 2017:

- I think the notes are too tidy to have been written down during the scrying sessions. They are also all in the past tense. I think that what is in the Grade of Geburah notebook is a fair copy, compiled from jottings and scribbles done during the sessions
- the fair copy is dated, but it's not signed, even with a GD motto. A note in pencil on the top of the first page attributes it to William Alexander Ayton; and "Anne" is referred to several times in the text
- to me, the text begins in the middle! - it goes straight into descriptions of the visions, there's no coverage of where they were seen - crystal ball, mirror or something else - and no description of how the Aytons (assuming it was them) prepared themselves for the sessions.

Some occult works owned by William Alexander, several of which found their way into the collection of the Societas Rosicruciana in Anglia after his death:

- * La Clef, a key to the work of Abbot Trithemius, by Max Theon.
- * Les Fables Egyptiennes et Greques by Antoine Joseph Pernety. Annotated "Wm Alexr Aytoun (sic) 1880".
- * Maçonnerie occulte suivie de l'initiation hermétique... by Jean-Marie Ragon 1781-1862. Published E Dentu Paris 1853. Annotated "Wm Alexr Ayton 1861" and he's made notes on it as well
- * Manuscript Sat B'hai Order of Sikha dated c 1875-80

Items concerning other occult orders:

- * letter Maurice V Portman to William Alexander 22 Jan 1886 in response to a letter from William Alexander
- * prospectus for the Hermetic Colony Association dated 24 March 1886.

Two letters by Westcott:

- * letter from Westcott to a recipient called Brown 17 April 1888.
- * letter from Westcott to William Alexander undated but March 1900, originally from GD source known as Private Collection A

That the cipher manuscript was a fraud probably compiled in the 1880s:

A E Waite analysed its content and published his belief that it was a 19th-century compilation in his memoir, Shadows of Life and Thought. In The Magicians of the Golden Dawn, Ellic Howe's investigations into the paper and the watermarks backed him up; pp2-3. By the time of R A Gilbert's The Golden Dawn Companion p4-5 it's an accepted fact that both the letters and the cipher manuscript were faked; Gilbert says that it's almost certain that Westcott forged the manuscript himself or got someone else to do so.

Shadows of Life and Thought: A Retrospective Review in the Form of Memoirs by Arthur Edward Waite. London: Selwyn and Blount of Paternoster House EC 1938 .

The Magicians of the Golden Dawn: A Documentary History of a Magical Order 1887-1923 by Ellic Howe. London: Routledge and Kegan Paul 1972. It was Howe's work on the Sprengel letters that established that they were definitely fakes.

The Golden Dawn Companion by R A Gilbert. Wellingborough Northants: The Aquarian Press 1986.

AFTER THE GOLDEN DAWN - INDEPENDENT AND RECTIFIED RITE/ORDER

A E Waite: A Magician of Many Parts by R A Gilbert. Wellingborough Northants 1987. Appendix C on p178 Appendix C.

WILLIAM ALEXANDER AS TRANSLATOR AND ASSESSOR OF OCCULT MANUSCRIPTS

Pascal Beverly Randolph: a Nineteenth Century Black American Spiritualist, Rosicrucian and Sex Magician by John Patrick Deveny. Published 1997 by State Univ of New York Press in its Western Esoteric Trads series. Translation of Abbot Trithemius' Prophecies: p508, original source Blavatsky's Diaries volume 1 p421.

Collected Letters of W B Yeats Vol II 1896-1900. That Westcott asked William Alexander to authenticate the cipher manuscript: p543 note 14; original source is a letter now in the Warburg Institute (and therefore in the Yorke Collection) from Westcott to Gardner, undated but assigned by editors to spring 1900.

Shadows of Life and Thought: A Retrospective Review in the Form of Memoirs by Arthur Edward Waite. London: Selwyn and Blount 1938. William Alexander not the translator of manuscripts owned by Lord Strafford: p134.

The Alchemist of the Golden Dawn: Letters of the Revd William Alexander Ayton to Frederick Leigh Gardner and Others 1886-1905 edited and with an introduction by Ellic Howe. Aquarian Press 1985. The letters used for the book were all written by William Alexander Ayton, most of them to Frederick Leigh Gardner who was initiated into the GD in 1894. During the 20th century the letters to Frederick Leigh Gardner made their way into the occult collection of Gerald Yorke which is now in the Warburg Institute, University of London.

What little I know about Harleian Ms 476 I found on a website about the life of John Moore MP: at www.robert-temple.com/articles/john\_moore.pdf.

WILLIAM ALEXANDER AS AN ALCHEMIST

The best known reference to William Alexander's alchemical work is: The Trembling Veil by W B Yeats. I saw the original 1922 edition: London: Privately Printed for Subscribers Only by T Werner Laurie Ltd; pp69-70. That he's still at it in 1902 is from Yeats's Golden Dawn by George Mills Harper. Wellingborough Northants: The Aquarian Press 1974 p188 quoting a letter from Yeats to Lady Gregory January 1902.

OCCULT SOCIETIES HE WAS OR WAS NOT A MEMBER OF AUGUST ORDER OF LIGHT

There's quite a bit of coverage in books and on the web but the most intelligible account I found is in Masonic Curiosities compiled by Yasha Beresiner, edited by Tony Pope. Published Melbourne: Australian and New Zealand Masonic Research Council 2000: pp189-191. Source for the section is letters from John Yarker to Frederick G Irwin 1890.

Freemasons' Library GD collection GD 2/5/4/1: letter from M V Portman to William Alexander, dated 22 January 1886 and written at Port Blair, Andaman Islands.

SOCIETY OF EIGHT

The best list of its members was compiled by Geraldine Beskin, curator of the Yarker Library, in 1989 and referred to in Paschal Beverly Randolph: A Nineteenth Century Black American Spiritualist, Rosicrucian and Sex Magician by John Patrick Deveny. 1997 by State University of New York Press in its Western Esoteric Traditions series: p508 in its footnotes section. The source is a talk given by Geraldine Beskin and R A Gilbert at the Theosophical History conference in 1989. According to Beskin's list, the members were Walter Moseley; Frederick Holland; Kenneth Mackenzie; Yarker; F G Irwin; Westcott; Benjamin Cox; William Oxley; and Samuel Liddell Mathers. But NOT William Alexander.

The Theosophical Enlightenment by Joscelyn Godwin. Published by the State University of New York Press in its Western Esoteric Traditions series 1994. On p222 Godwin says that it was founded by Frederick Holland in 1883. Hockley died in 1885 and Mathers replaced him.

That Holland would have liked William Alexander to be a member: Godwin p405 footnote 66 quoting Ellic Howe's article Fringe Masonry in England 1870-85, published in Ars Quatuor Coronati volume 85 1972 pp242-95.

HERMETIC BROTHERHOOD OF LUXOR

The Theosophical Enlightenment by Joscelyn Godwin. Published by the State Univ of New York Press in its Western Esoteric Traditions series 1994: pp353-356.

Initiatic and Historical Documents for an Order of Practical Occultism. By Joscelyn Godwin, Christian Chanel and John P Deveney. York Beach Maine: Samuel Weiser Inc 1995 and very much focused on the US connection. Hard to pick out any one page number in this volume, there were so many useful references. There are long quotes and complete reproductions of William Alexander's letters, including his account of the Brotherhood's self-initiation ritual.

On tinctures and how to make them. See wikipedia for an overview. There are plenty of web pages giving detailed instructions on how to make them yourself - I looked at //aromaticstudies.com.

You prepare a tincture by macerating leaves or roots of the plant in question in a solvent for a few weeks, to make a strong solution. The solvent used is often alcohol but you can use other things instead. When the tincture is ready, a few drops in (say) a glass of water is all that will be needed. At least, it is in modern herbal medicine but perhaps that wasn't peppy enough for the 19th century!

I found wikipedia's page on the Hermetic Brotherhood of Luxor not as clear as the books by Godwin and Deveney. It also contained some incorrect data, for example on Peter Davidson.

Influence of Randolph:

Pascal Beverly Randolph: a Nineteenth Century Black American Spiritualist, Rosicrucian and Sex Magician by John Patrick Deveney. Published 1997 by State University of New York Press in its Western Esoteric Traditions series. Brotherhood's existence published in an edition of The Divine Pyramider: p246. Brotherhood splitting up in 1886: p246. William Alexander on Randolph's sex magic: pp508 quoting letters written by William Alexander to an unknown correspondent, one in May 1885 and one in August 1886. I think the letters are in the Yorke Collection, Warburg Institute but the author doesn't specifically say so.

CANNABIS USE IN THE OCCULT with information and recommendations emailed to me by cannabis use expert Chris Bennett. He also sent me eye-popping details of the use of other drugs by some 19th century occultists - though not the Aytons - including such well-known killers as henbane, belladonna and aconite.

In 1995 Bennett published Green Gold the Tree of Life: Marijuana in Magic and Religion. In March 2017, however, he told me that he'd amassed so much more information since then, that he was going to write another account. He is hoping to start work on it this summer (2017); its provisional title is Cannabis and the Occult. You can read its chapter on cannabis at www.alchemylab.com/cannabis

On cannabis as part of the Brotherhood of Luxor's initiation ritual:

HERMETIC COLONY ASSOCIATION

Freemasons' Library GD 2/5/4/2 is the prospectus issued p4 on 24 March 1886.

Pattinson's involvement; and William Alexander warning Westcott against T H Burgoyne: Freemasons' Library GD 2/5/4/3 letter 3 November 1888.

Blavatsky warns theosophists against T H Burgoyne:

Lucifer: A Theosophical Magazine Volume V September 1889 to February 1890, published by the Theosophical Publishing Co of 7 Duke Street Adelphi. Volume V issue of 15 September 1889 p55 and editor's footnote p55.

SOME SOURCES FOR OCCULTISTS KNOWN TO WILLIAM ALEXANDER:

Thomas Moore Johnson 1851-1919, earning his money as a lawyer in Missouri but also a student of platonism. Published The Platonist sporadically between 1881 and 1888. Website for Johnson, who left a library: www.johnson-library.org.

Edward Bulwer-Lytton and Eliphas Levi: in Hidden Intercourse: Eros and Sexuality in the History of Western Esotericism by Wouter J Hanegraff and Jeffrey J Kripal. Pubd 2010. On p356 in a chapter by John Patrick Deveney, footnote 6 and footnote 7 quoting letters written by William Alexander in 1884 and 1886. However, the letters don't say that William Alexander knew either man personally, only that he knew Bulwer-Lytton's reputation, and Levi's work. This is also the source for William Alexander knowing the work of other French occultists.

Peter Davidson:

The Theosophical Enlightenment by Joscelyn Godwin. Published by the State Univ of New York Press in its Western Esoteric Traditions series 1994: p353.

Davidson's connection with Randolph:

Pascal Beverly Randolph: a Nineteenth Century Black American Spiritualist, Rosicrucian and Sex Magician by John Patrick Deveney. Published 1997 by State University of New York Press in its Western Esoteric Traditions series: p208 quoting a letter written by William Alexander.

A publication by Davidson: Hidden Mysteries Unveiled: or Vital Christianity published by Christian Life 1895; 28 pp. There's no copy of it in the British Library.

Freemasons:

The Theosophical Enlightenment by Joscelyn Godwin. Published by the State Univ of New York Press in its Western Esoteric Traditions series 1994: p353 as a friend of F G Irwin, Frederick Hockley and Kenneth Mackenzie.

Frederick Hockley, F G Irwin, Benjamin Cox, Mackenzie:

Pascal Beverly Randolph: a Nineteenth Century Black American Spiritualist, Rosicrucian and Sex Magician by John Patrick Deveney. Published 1997 by State Univ of New York Press in its Western Esoteric Traditions series: p34. On p253 Deveney calls William Alexander the "greatest occult gossip of the nineteenth century". Also on p253: that Blavatsky and Randolph loathed each other.

JULIUS KOHN

Wellcome Library has some Manuscript items by him: their Mss 3127 and 3128, typescripts dated 1921 and 1929 on The Ancient Magic of Charming by Enchantment. The Wellcome may have bought the typescripts in this sale: via the web to Books Including the Library of Julius Kohn and Stock of G E Friehold a sale catalogue published 1934 by Hodgson and Co auctioneers; the sale was due 24 October 1934.

Also via google to:

Splendor Solis: Alchemical Treatises of Solomon Trismosin, Adept edited by Julius Kohn.
1920

A mention in Studies in the History of Alternative Medicine Society for the Social History of Medicine, published Macmillan/St Antony's College Oxford and edited by Roger Cooter; on p88 footnote 20: Kohn was known to A E Waite

SALLY DAVIS

Copyright 23April 2017

Find the web pages of Roger Wright and Sally Davis, including my list of people initiated into the Order of the Golden Dawn between 1888 and 1901, at:

www.wrightanddavis.co.uk

***

Anna Mary Babington was initiated into the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn during 1893 at its Isis-Urania temple in London. She chose the Latin motto Perfecta victoria est de semitipso triumphare. She never really followed up her initiation and resigned from the Order in April 1895. It was probably just too difficult for her to be a committed member, as she had recently gone to live in Italy.

UPDATE DECEMBER 2016

From January to December this year, this biography contained a section on Benjamin Fayle, businessman and industrialist. However, in December 2016 a researcher on the industrial archaeology of Dorset contacted me, pointing out the errors in my account. There were rather a lot of them! - so I have decided to leave that section to the experts.

This file is still a complete rewrite (completed January 2016) of my original biography of Anna Mary. Nothing else was good enough after Terry Sheppard of the Rothley Heritage Trust contacted me to correct my original assumptions about Anna Mary's financial circumstances. Thanks are due to Terry, for drawing my attention to the clay business and the tea rooms; and for sending me his recent booklet, which had copies of all sorts of family documents in it.

THE BABINGTON FAMILY

The surname may ring a bell to those with an interest in Mary Queen of Scots: Anthony Babington of the 1586 plot to free the queen, was a member of the same family. Another line of Babingtons were lords of the manor of Rothley and Soke in Leicestershire until the early 19th century. Thomas Babington of the Rothley and Soke line (1758-1837) was a philanthropist, member of the Clapham Sect and anti-slavery campaigner. Thomas' brother-in-law Zachary Macaulay, another anti-slavery activist, gave his son the 'Babington' name and the son made it very famous: Thomas Babington Macaulay (1800-59) became a Whig politician and very influential historian.

So, plenty of distinguished Babingtons for Anna Mary to be proud of. However, I'm going to begin my rewritten biography with the friendship of physician William Babington and businessman Benjamin Fayle, great-grandfathers of Anna Mary Babington.

WILLIAM BABINGTON (1756-1833) was born in northern Ireland and became a doctor and surgeon. As was usual in the 18th century he began his training by serving an apprenticeship; then he went on to study medicine at Guy's Hospital in London and at Aberdeen University; and learned surgery at the Haslar naval hospital in Portsmouth. He returned to Guy's Hospital, as its apothecary and as a member of its teaching staff; was consulting physician to the Asylum for the Deaf and Dumb in Kent Road; and also ran a successful private practice in the City and the Finsbury area of London. However, if times had been different it's likely that he would not have chosen medicine as his profession: his main interests were in chemistry, and mineralogy. He bought the Earl of Bute's mineral collection and catalogued it. It was on his recommendation that the Government bought the Greville mineral collection which is now in the Natural History Museum. He was one of the founders of the Geological Society and a Fellow of the Royal Society. He knew Joseph Priestley, probably while the Priestleys were living in Clapton (1791-94); and Humphry Davy, who took up his post at the Royal Institution in London in 1801. Both men were chemists: Priestley has a claim to have discovered the existence of oxygen; Davy discovered the properties of sodium and potassium and did important work on the nature of chlorine. They also both investigated electricity.

Benjamin Fayle (1751-1831) was another Irishman who moved to London. His involvement in the extraction of clay for the Midlands pottery industry, from pits on the Isle of Purbeck, made him a wealthy man. William Babington was not a partner in the exploitation of the clay-pits, but his descendants too were made wealthy by them.

BENJAMIN GUY BABINGTON AND ANNA MARIA FAYLE

As Benjamin Fayle and William Babington were very close friends, both families must have been delighted when William's son Benjamin Guy married Benjamin's daughter Anna Maria, late in 1816.

Benjamin Guy was the fourth son of William Babington and his wife Martha Elizabeth, born in 1794. It was customary for the Babingtons to send their sons to Charterhouse School, which was then still in its original buildings on Charterhouse Square in the City. Benjamin Guy was a pupil there from 1803 to 1807. William Babington's sons all had to earn their own living but Benjamin Guy took a while to find work that he could settle in. He was in the navy long enough to see action at Walcheren and at Copenhagen; but then left to train at Haileybury for a career as an administrator with the East India Company. He held various posts in the Madras Presidency from 1812 until 1819, but then had to resign through ill-health. By 1820, he and Anna Maria were back in England, living at 5 St Mary Aldermanbury in the City of London.

Although it was Benjamin Guy's health that had been such a concern, it was Anna Maria who died young; in 1825, leaving four sons aged from seven to only four. By that time, Benjamin

Guy was several years into a second re-training, studying medicine at Guy's Hospital as his father had done, before going on to Pembroke College Cambridge, qualifying FRCP in 1831. He worked as a doctor at Guy's Hospital until 1855, and like his father worked as physician at the Asylum for the Deaf and Dumb. Like his father, though, he had wide interests. He invented an instrument for helping doctors see further into patients' throats; he was a founder of the Epidemiological Society; he was one of the first secretaries of the Royal Asiatic Society; and translated religious works from Tamil and medical texts from German.

Benjamin Fayle died on 23 February 1831 at Benjamin Guy Babington's house in Finsbury Square. I think Benjamin Guy Babington; his and Anna Maria's surviving sons; Benjamin Fayle; and Fayle's unmarried daughter Charlotte may all have been living there together. Charlotte Fayle continued to live with the Babingtons for the rest of her life.

BENJAMIN FAYLE AND CO IN THE MID-19TH CENTURY

It looks as though Richard Fayle was Benjamin Fayle's only son. Richard was a director of Benjamin Fayle and Co in the mid-19th century but was not involved with the firm on a daily basis: he became a Church of England clergyman and by 1840 had been appointed vicar of Trinity Church in Torquay. He was married twice, and had four daughters but no sons. With Rev Fayle living outside London and having parish duties to perform, the most active directors of Benjamin Fayle and Co in the mid-19th century were Charlotte Fayle, and Benjamin Guy Babington.

Benjamin Fayle and Co negotiated new leases for the clay pits in 1825, when Benjamin Fayle himself probably conducted the firm's negotiations; and again in 1846, when Benjamin Guy Babington and Charlotte Fayle must have done so. All three directors were present in May 1854 when the new railway from the clay pits at Newton to Goathorn Pier in Poole Harbour was opened. The opening ceremony was followed by a dinner at which the guests included the local vicar, Rev James Higgon Evans of Corfe Castle; Joseph Willis, Benjamin Fayle and Co's representative in Dorset; and 170 workers at the clay-pits. Charlotte Fayle, Richard Fayle and Benjamin Guy Babington were also those named when the Crown took the directors of Benjamin Fayle and Co to court over Poor Law rates liability in Dorset, in 1856.

Charlotte Fayle's role in the firm was at its most important in the late 1860s and early 1870s: Benjamin Guy Babington died in April 1866 and Rev Richard Fayle in 1872. In 1866, it was Charlotte who brought a case against the executor of the late Thomas Hanson Peile when the executor was refusing to act and release what were probably assets of Benjamin Fayle and Co. She was not daunted by the fact that the executor was her own sister-in-law (see below for how the warring women were related). Charlotte was also the one named as representing Benjamin Fayle and Co in a list of suppliers to the Navy, compiled in 1869. When Charlotte took sole possession of the house owned by the family at 1 Seymer Place, in 1878, it was perhaps as a residence for the periods she needed to be in Dorset. And on the 1881 census she was even listed as a "clay merchant". When Anna Mary Babington started the tea rooms, she had Charlotte Fayle as an excellent example of how even in the 19th century, the right kind of woman could be an influential figure in a business.

THE BABINGTONS AND THE PEILES

Benjamin Guy Babington and his wife Anna Maria (née Fayle) had four sons: Benjamin Babington, who was born in Madras in August 1818; the twins William Peile Babington and Stephen Peile Babington who were born at St Mary Aldermanbury in 1820; and Arthur, also born in the City, in 1821, but who died in 1829. Anna Mary Babington was a daughter of the eldest of the four.

Whereas most male members of the Babington family went to school at Charterhouse, Benjamin went to St Paul's School before going to Trinity Hall Cambridge. He was one of the first members of the family to qualify as a barrister, being called to the bar at Lincoln's Inn in 1844 or 1846 (the accounts I found disagreed about the year). He chose a specialism that was very useful to the family - drafting equity and conveyancing documents. For a time was secretary to the Land Transfer Commission. He was a keen member of the Inns of Court Rifle Volunteer Corps. In 1843, he married his first cousin, Helen Savery Peile.

'Peile' is an unusual surname. 19th century census entries show most people with the name lived in Cumberland. However, by the 1790s, one member of the family - Solomon Peile - was living in the Stamford Hill/Tottenham Green district just north of the London suburb of Dalston. Solomon Peile was in business as a wine merchant. In June 1818, two of his sons - another Solomon Peile, and Thomas Hanson Peile - married two of Dr William Babington's daughters, sisters of Benjamin Guy Babington, sisters-in-law of Anna Maria Fayle. Solomon married Anne; and Thomas Hanson married Elizabeth Helen.

Thomas Hanson Peile worked as a solicitor, based at various addresses in the City of London. The case brought by Charlotte Fayle against Elizabeth Helen Peile in 1866 suggests to me that he might have been solicitor to the Babington and Fayle families, and/or to Benjamin Fayle and Co. Helen Savery Peile was the eldest child of Thomas Hanson and Elizabeth Helen Peile; born in 1820 or 1821.

Benjamin Babington (the barrister) and his wife Helen had four children. Anna Mary was the eldest, born 14 February 1846 at 31 George Street Hanover Square, and named after her grandmother Anna Maria. After Anna Mary came Adeline Charlotte (born 1847); Colville Burroughs (I couldn't find a birth registration for him, but he must have been born about 1848); and Alice Helen (born 1850). The 1851 census shows them growing up in a crowded household: Benjamin and Helen lived with his father, Benjamin Guy; and Charlotte Fayle; and Benjamin's brother Stephen Peile Babington. Charlotte Fayle made sure she told the census official that she had an income from investments; though she didn't go as far as mentioning that the investments were in a firm of which she was a director. Stephen Peile Babington described himself as a "merchant". The census official didn't write down any details of his employer but Terry Sheppard has found that Stephen was employed by Benjamin Fayle and Co - taking the involvement of the Fayles and Babingtons with the firm into the next generation. The family was one of the wealthiest of any GD member; in 1851 it employed a butler, a footman, a cook, two housemaids and a nursemaid.

One of the earliest events Anna Mary may have been able to remember was the death of her infant sister Alice Helen, late in 1852. Even having a doctor as the head of the household had been unable to prevent it - that was the reality of Victorian life. It was followed a few months later by the death of Anna Mary's aunt Catherine Fayle, first wife of Rev Richard. The children of Benjamin and Helen Babington may not have known her well; but there would still have been mourning to observe. However, there were visits to Dorset and to Torquay, I imagine, and lots of weddings to go to in a family with so many cousins. In 1856 Rev Richard got married again, to Eleonora Savile. He lived in great style, at Park Hill Villa, Tormoham, Torquay. On census day 1861 he and Eleonora were living with their daughters Charlotte Bagshaw (a widow at 32) and Agnes (who hadn't yet married). To look after the four of them a cook, two lady's maids, a housemaid, a kitchen maid, a footman and a groom were employed.

Like most middle-class girls, Anna Mary and Adeline were educated at home: in 1861 the Babingtons employed a Swiss-born governess, who probably spoke French as well as German, to teach them what they felt a wealthy young woman should know. Both the sisters were at home at 31 George Street, Hanover Square, on census day 1861 and so was their brother Colville though I imagine he was being sent to school rather than learning at home. Benjamin and Helen were still living with Benjamin Guy Babington, Stephen Peile Babington and Charlotte Fayle and a slightly larger staff was employed in 1861 to that of 1851: a butler, a footman and a page; with a cook, a scullery maid and two housemaids.

Both Anna Mary's grandfathers died in 1866, when she was 20: Thomas Hanson Peile in March and Benjamin Guy Babington in April. A sad year. Changes were inevitable and by census day 1871, the old, large household had divided into two. Benjamin, Helen and Anna Mary were living in Brompton (I couldn't read the name of the street). Stephen Peile Babington, Anna Mary's sister Adeline, and Charlotte Fayle were living at 22 Taviton Street on the edge of Bloomsbury. Both households were run with a notably smaller staff of servants than when all the family was living under one roof: Benjamin and Helen had just a cook and housemaid; Stephen and Charlotte had the cook and the housemaid, but also a butler. Anna Mary's brother Colville doesn't appear on any census after 1861; I guess that by 1871 he had already gone to live in Argentina, where he married (in 1889) and was still living when he died.

Benjamin Babington became chronically ill with heart and lung trouble at a relatively early age. By the early 1870s, he was too ill to work and he, Helen and Anna Mary (but not Adeline, at least not at first) went to live at Vevey, on Lake Geneva near Montreux in Switzerland. Benjamin died there in August 1875 aged only 57. Their house there was probably the one at rue de Lemman 4 which was still being lived in by family members in 1910. Though a lawyer, he had not been very tidy about his own affairs: it was not until March 1877 that probate was granted to Stephen Peile Babington, acting on Helen's behalf; family members brought a case against the estate which was not settled until May 1877; and Stephen Peile Babington was still tidying up his brother's affairs in 1878. Benjamin had left relatively little money in any case, his income diminished by his ill-health; and the amount that was left for his wife and children was probably further eroded by all the legal action that was necessary in the wake of his death.

Helen Babington may have not liked the climate of Switzerland. She and Anna Mary continued to own the house at Vevey for many years, but very soon after her husband's death Helen moved to Hyères in the south of France. She may, however, have come back to England (like many did) for the London social season each spring - when in 1878 Helen and Anna Mary passed ownership of 1 Seymer Place Swanage over to Charlotte Fayle, their address as given as Gordon Square Bloomsbury.

As census day was in early April, before the start of the London Season, Helen and Anna Mary were not in England for it in 1881. Neither was Adeline - perhaps she was living with them by now, or visiting them in France. Stephen Peile Babington and Charlotte Fayle were still living together at 22 Taviton Street. It was an elderly household by now: Stephen was 60, and Charlotte 87. And James Pelly Babington, who had come to live with them, was 74. James was William Babington's youngest son; another doctor who had worked at Guy's Hospital, though more recently he had been helping his sister Angel Peile (another Babington sister who had married a Peile) run a boarding school, Northcotts in Hatfield. Five servants (one young boy and four women) were employed; though the census official didn't note down what each of them did.

With the death of Benjamin Guy Babington, it had been up to Rev Richard and his sister Charlotte Fayle to decide whether to appoint a new director of Benjamin Fayle and Co, to replace him; or whether to wait and run the firm between them. Although I haven't found evidence that states it in so many words, I think that Stephen Peile Babington became a director, either in 1866 or in 1872 when Rev Richard died.

INHERITANCE

Charlotte Fayle died in April 1882. That was to be expected, at her age. But in February 1886, Stephen Peile Babington died, in Guy's Hospital, aged 66. He left personal effects to the value of £9500 (which Terry Sheppard computes at about half a million in today's terms), probably mostly in shares in Benjamin Fayle and Co but also - possibly - from whatever income he might have had from a patent he'd been granted in 1848 for a new design of hat-peg. Stephen's Will set up a trust fund, the proceeds of which were to provide for his nieces and nephew as his brother had perhaps not been able to do well. Stephen had never married. Perhaps he thought of Anna Mary, Adeline and their brother Colville as the children he might have had: he certainly left them a very comfortable income.

In 1886 Anna Mary was 40 and Adeline 39 and neither had married. Evidence from later in the lives of the sisters suggested that both may have been glad to remain single. See below for how Anna Mary was not consigned to the fate of so many middle-class spinsters, of continuing attendance on an elderly parent. And her sister Adeline had a vocation. With her inheritance from her uncle, she may at last have had the resources with which to follow it. By 1891 she had become a Sister of Mercy at All Hallows, at Ditchingham in Norfolk; and she remained there until her death in 1923.

All Hallows was an anglican sisterhood, founded in 1854 by Lavinia Crosse (later known as Mother Lavinia), daughter of a surgeon based in Norwich. Such sisterhoods were frowned on by the Church of England as being too close to Catholicism for comfort; so they were very dependent on charitable donations and whatever money those who joined them could bring with them as personal income - which, of course, they would hand over for the good of the convent as a whole. Although not a closed order - the sisters did a great deal of training, nursing and child-care work in their local community, and also took in pupils - it's likely that Anna Mary didn't see her sister very often, after Adeline joined the community.

During the 19th century it was considered perfectly normal for unmarried daughters to live with their parents until they had both died, except perhaps for visits to other relations. Although a lack of money to finance any alternative was often an issue, it was not normally finances that kept unmarried women at home in this way - their filial and religious duty was thought to demand it. However, Helen Savery Babington doesn't seem to have been a typical Victorian, in that respect: when Anna Mary was offered the chance to go travelling in Europe with a younger woman who was looking for a knowledgeable companion, she allowed her to go. And the result was: Anna Mary's life opened out in several unforeseen ways, including the Theosophical Society, the GD, and the tea rooms.

ISABEL CARGILL

The family backgrounds of Isabel Cargill and Anna Mary Babington were similar in some ways. Like Anna Mary, Isabel had a religious martyr in the family though Isabel was a direct descendant of the Scottish Covenanter Donald Cargill who was executed in 1683. The 19th-century Cargills had kept to their ancestor's strict Presbyterian faith; and Donald Cargill's bible was still in their possession in 1903. As with Anna Mary's story, though, Isabel Cargill's can be said to begin with a grand-father, in this case Captain William Cargill who sailed to New Zealand in 1848 to help found the Otago Settlement on the South Island. Captain William and his wife Mary had 17 children (!); Isabel's father was the eighth of them, Edward Bowes Cargill, born in Edinburgh in 1823.

Edward Bowes Cargill didn't go with his parents to Otago: he had joined the merchant navy in 1837 and then gone to live in Ceylon where in the early 1850s he was employed by the Bank of Western India. He married Dora Jemima Newsham of Newcastle-upon-Tyne in 1854, and after a short time spent living in Melbourne Australia, moved to Dunedin in 1857. I'm not going to go into all Edward Bowes' business dealings as these were many and complex. I'll just say that they involved import/export, shipping, railways, gas and water supplies - all the necessities of 19th-century life - and that he lost money through shipwrecks or investments that went wrong, several times, but still became one of the wealthiest and most prominent of Dunedin's citizens. The big, Italianate house, first called The Cliffs but now known as Cargill Castle, was his pet project, begun in 1876.

Edward Bowes Cargill and his wife Dora had five daughters: Margaret, Frances, Annie, Isabel, and one other whose name I haven't discovered and who died before both her parents. Isabel was born in 1864 so perhaps she was the youngest. She lived in Dunedin until she was in her late twenties, when she left New Zealand for Europe. The story handed down by Isabel's descendants is that she went to Europe in order to marry someone - that is, someone in particular - but that the marriage fell through. The impression that story gives is of Isabel arriving in the UK alone; but her sister Annie was also living in Rome in 1903 and perhaps they travelled to Europe together. If the story's true about Isabel being left stranded at the altar by her intended, she certainly doesn't seem to have wasted much time feeling sorry about it, or planning how to return to New Zealand. She (and possibly her sister Annie) decided that they would see Europe - they had obviously inherited some of their father's willingness to travel. They felt, though, that they needed a companion - a guide, who knew the ropes, someone who could (as they probably could not) speak a European language. Again according to family legend, Isabel advertised for a suitable woman. I would suppose having friends recommend someone was a safer strategy; but however the two women found out about each other's existence, it was Anna Mary Babington that Isabel Cargill chose to go travelling with her. Possibly a certain amount of vetting had taken place before they set out, because Anna Mary's cousin-once-removed Harry Diamond Peile met Isabel; and as he spent most of the 1890s working in India, the early 1890s seem the most likely time for him to have been introduced.

BABINGTON'S TEA ROOMS

Anna Mary, Isabel, and Isabel's sister Annie, if she was with them, arrived in Rome in 1892 and of course they were following a very well-trodden route from Britain to Italy. From the 18th-century, Rome had exercised a particular hold on the British, despite - perhaps even because of - being the headquarters of world Catholicism. Although it was not as high-profile a place for it as the south of France, by the 19th century Rome was a popular choice for wealthy Britons wanting to spend the winter in a warm climate. And throughout the year there was art, there was culture; and by the 1890s Rome was the capital of Italy which meant royal pageantry to match the religious pageantry of the Vatican.

Isabel told her descendants that she and Anna Mary arrived in Rome with the intention of setting up a business there; so perhaps they didn't arrive in 1892 by accident. Rome was always teeming with foreign visitors but 1893 was going to be a year of higher-even-than-usual volumes of them.

Rome began 1893 with the jubilee of Pope Leo XIII on 19 February, with a procession to St Peter's, starting at 6am and led by pilgrims from Britain. In spring the focus turned to secular matters with the 25th wedding anniversary of King Umberto and Queen Margherita on 22 April. The week of celebrations in Rome included a military review, a garden party, a formal ball and lots of less high-profile meetings and dinners; and then the king and queen with their principle guests set out for Naples and more festivities. The principle guests made themselves very visible - Kaiser Wilhelm and his Empress. Conspicuous by their absence, at least from the official events, were the British royal family; rather pointedly not invited, though Queen Victoria did make her presence in Italy felt by a visit to Florence; and the Princess of Wales, two of her daughters and her son the Duke of York (the future George V) did just happen to be in Rome that April, doing the tourist thing and having an audience with the Pope. In September 1893, Rome should have hosted the 11th International Medical Congress; but in the summer, outbreaks of cholera in France and Germany caused it to be postponed and eventually it took place in March 1894, in time for Anna Mary and Isabel to benefit financially from those who attended it.

In his booklet on Anna Mary Babington, Terry Sheppard quotes a handbook from 1853 which remarked on the very well-organised way the British had made the district around the Piazza di Spagna their own even by then; so that you heard more English spoken in the streets around it, than Italian. The English still dominated the district in the 1890s and there were so many of them in more-or-less permanent residence that they were able to support a couple of English-language newspapers. One thing was lacking, however; and both Anna Mary and Isabel came from families which could spot a business opportunity when they saw it. Rome couldn't provide its British visitors with a decent cup of tea.

Perhaps it took them longer than they had hoped to find premises and fit them out; to order tea, tea-making and tea-serving items from England; and to publicise their new venture - so that they missed the big events of the spring - but Anna Mary and Isabel opened their Babington's Tea Rooms, in Via Due Macelli, in December 1893.

Why 'Babingtons'? Terry Sheppard, on the authority of Isabel's descendants, says that Anna Mary provided the bulk of the money that financed the venture - which she could well afford to do. I think, also, that it weighed with Anna Mary and Isabel that 'Babington' was a name likely to be better known amongst British visitors to Italy, than 'Cargill'. It sounds so very English, as well! - at least, I think so.

Babington's Tea Rooms were so successful that in the next three years they had to move to bigger premises twice. The second move, in 1896, took them to where they still are now, in the unused stable-block of a Roman palazzo just round the corner from the Piazza di Spagna; and by this time Anna Mary and Isabel had enough spare money to invest some in pushing the rooms towards the 20th-century by installing gas lighting. From the beginning they ran the business in person: when the tea rooms were open, one or the other of them would be at the front desk taking the customers' money. And perhaps this is how Anna Mary got invited to join the GD - Babington's tea rooms became the very hub of English-speaking society in Rome and perhaps one or two people who went there to drink tea and rest their feet were GD members.

By 1894 Anna Mary was perhaps realising how difficult it was to be a member of a society whose meetings were held several hundred miles away. In 1894, she joined the Theosophical Society, a group of whose members were based in Rome and met there regularly. At this time, all applications for membership had to have the support of two people who were already TS members. Anna Mary's two sponsors were a Mr E H J Murphy, and Alfred King. Neither man was a GD member and perhaps they were both visitors to Rome, or resident there. The TS's lodge in Rome had its own library at Via Porta Pinciana 74, and occasionally guest speakers would visit it from London (Isabel Cooper-Oakley, for example, who was in Italy in 1897). By 1897, however, Anna Mary had resigned from the TS as she had done from the GD and perhaps for the same reason. Babington's Tea Rooms was perhaps taking just too much of her time.

The address that Anna Mary gave both the GD and the TS was via dell'Aurora 35, Rome. I guess she was probably living there with Isabel and perhaps Annie Cargill as well. It might even have been the pensione Annie Cargill was running in Rome in 1903. Anna Mary did not spend all year every year in Rome, however - she could hardly do so, as she was the only one of her siblings who could visit Helen Babington, who was now in her seventies. Anna Mary was with Helen Babington on census day 1901, at 120 Madeira Road, in Ventnor on the Isle of Wight, perhaps settling her mother into a new home. Ventnor had a mild climate and may also have been a place that Helen had often visited when her children were young; her cousin the Rev Arthur Lewis Babington Peile was vicar of Holy Trinity Ventnor from 1862 to 1888 and from 1879 he was also honorary chaplain to Queen Victoria when she was at Osborne House - which she often was - so perhaps Helen could remember being invited to meet Her.

AFTER 1900

Anna Mary and Isabel had been friends for at least 10 years by 1903, and they had been business partners for almost as long. 1903 and 1904 were years of great change for Isabel - in May 1903, she married the artist Giuseppe da Pozzo; and in 1904, she had her only child, Dorothy or Dorotea. Although Isabel's sister Annie was in Rome to help Isabel through with the dangerous process of giving birth at the age of 39 or 40, Anna Mary may not have been able to be there.

Helen Savery Babington died in April 1904, in Ventnor. Helen did not have much to leave but Anna Mary was the executor of her Will, and the one to clear the house and deal with the lawyers. I presume it was now that Anna Mary came into possession of one of a group of small statues of her grand-father Benjamin Guy Babington, commissioned by the family and made by the sculptor C A Rivers, using Babington's death mask. The statues show Babington seated with legs crossed in what was probably a typical pose. He's holding a small, long box - perhaps the box in which a doctor would carry the throat-examination instrument Babington had invented.

After her mother's death there was not much for Anna Mary to return to England for; other than meetings with the family lawyers. She might have travelled to England in 1923 when her sister Adeline died in All Hallows Convent. Her brother Colville died in Argentina in 1928; by that time it was probably half a century since Anna Mary had seen him.

The house at rue de Leman 4, Vevey was still in the hands of the Babington family in October 1910 when Anna Mary's aunt Susette Peile (her mother's youngest sister) died in it; she'd probably been living there since the 1890s. Susette's long-time companion Ann Scott Tweedie was the executor of Susette's Will; but Anna Mary went to Vevey to help Ann sort out Susette's possessions, which included another of the small statues of Benjamin Guy Babington, and a signet ring which was to go to Susette's nephew Harry Diamond Peile.

Anna Mary wrote to Harry in November 1910 as soon as she got back to Rome. Left an item in the Will of a woman he doesn't seem to have heard of, he'd been asking Anna Mary exactly how they were related. Anna Mary tried to explain how they were all descended from Thomas Hanson Peile - Susette as a daughter, she as a grand-daughter, he as a great-grandson. In her letter, she mentioned a second house that she now owned, in the countryside of northern Italy. She needed places to retreat to from the heat and dust of Rome by this time. She told Harry that her health was pretty good for a woman of 65, but her eyes were giving her a great deal of trouble: glaucoma had blinded her right eye, and she also had regular attacks of what her doctor in Rome called conjunctivitis, during which she could often not see at all. When in Rome, Anna Mary lived with Isabel and her husband - in 1910 they were all at Via Calabria 56. It's clear from her letter that she and Harry hadn't been in touch for years. Isabel and her husband were Anna Mary's main family now; and Isabel's daughter was to Anna Mary the child she had never had herself.

Babington's tea rooms continued to flourish until 1914 but the outbreak of the first World War began a period of struggle for its owners. Isabel and her husband were particularly hard-hit by the sudden cutting-off of tourists coming from Britain and the USA, as they had less money than Anna Mary from other sources. Giuseppe da Pozzo's main source of income was from his portraits and of course, during the war he had fewer sitters. He died in 1919, from heart disease, just as the peace was beginning to allow visitors back to Rome.

Rome was occupied during the night of 27-28 October 1922 by Fascists demanding the resignation of the liberal government. King Victor Emmanuel II handed power to their leader, Benito Mussolini, who by 1925 had made Italy a dictatorship. He saw Britain and France as threats to his desire to found a new Italian empire. War between Italy and Britain over Corfu, in 1923, was avoided by diplomatic means after Mussolini decided that Italy wasn't yet ready to take Britain on; but life became difficult for English people living in Italy, and deterred visitors as well. Babington's Tea Rooms did stay open, but had to keep a low profile.

Anna Mary stayed at work at the tea rooms through this difficult political period and despite her age and health. But in 1928 she decided enough was enough, and retired from the business. She went back to Switzerland; though not to the house at Vevey. She chose instead to live at Baugy, on the outskirts of Montreux. She died there in August 1934 at her house, called Perceneige.

Isabel da Pozzo took sole charge of Babington's Tea Rooms when Anna Mary retired. The business was inherited by her daughter Dorotea, Contessa Bedini; and is still run by members of the Bedini family.

BASIC SOURCES I USED for all Golden Dawn members.

Membership of the Golden Dawn: The Golden Dawn Companion by R A Gilbert. Northampton: The Aquarian Press 1986. Between pages 125 and 175, Gilbert lists the names, initiation dates and addresses of all those people who became members of the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn or its many daughter Orders between 1888 and 1914. The list is based on the Golden Dawn's administrative records and its Members' Roll - the large piece of parchment on which all new members signed their name at their initiation. All this information had been inherited by Gilbert but it's now in the Freemasons' Library at the United Grand Lodge of England building on Great Queen Street Covent Garden. Please note, though, that the records of the Amen-Ra Temple in Edinburgh were destroyed in 1900/01. I have recently (July 2014) discovered that some records of the Horus Temple at Bradford have survived, though most have not; however those that have survived are not yet accessible to the public.

For the history of the GD during the 1890s I usually use Ellic Howe's The Magicians of the Golden Dawn: A Documentary History of a Magical Order 1887-1923. Published Routledge and Kegan Paul 1972. Foreword by Gerald Yorke. Howe is a historian of printing rather than of magic; he also makes no claims to be a magician himself, or even an occultist. He has no axe to grind.

Family history: freebmd; ancestry.co.uk (census and probate); findmypast.co.uk; familysearch; Burke's Peerage and Baronetage; Burke's Landed Gentry; Armorial Families; thepeerage.com; and a wide variety of family trees on the web.

Famous-people sources: mostly about men, of course, but very useful even for the female members of GD. Oxford Dictionary of National Biography. Who Was Who. Times Digital Archive.

Useful source for business and legal information: London Gazette and its Scottish counterpart Edinburgh Gazette. Now easy to find (with the right search information) on the web.

Catalogues: British Library; Freemasons' Library.

Wikipedia; Google; Google Books - my three best resources. I also used other web pages, but with some caution, as - from the historian's point of view - they vary in quality a great deal.

SOURCES FOR ANNA MARY BABINGTON

Terry Sheppard's booklet: On the Trail of Anna Mary Babington privately printed for the Rothley Heritage Trust 2015. I have made enthusiastic use of the booklet as its so full of reproductions of exactly the sort of documents I need. Terry's researches into the Babington family confirmed that Thomas Babington Macaulay anti-slavery campaigner and the Babingtons of Rothley and Soke in Leicestershire were related to Anna Mary. He also made contact with the people who run the tea rooms today, descendants of Isabel Cargill; they gave him all sorts of family history information and sent photocopies of original documents including Anna Mary Babington's birth certificate, reproduced on p22. He also looked at a copy of the Will of Stephen Peile Babington though that's not reproduced in the booklet. On p26: the reference to Benjamin Fayle and Co which I have chased up; and some details of what was in Stephen Peile Babington's Will. On pp30-31 the full text of a very useful letter from Anna Mary Babington to Harry Diamond Peile (1872-1959) dated 12 November 1910, Via Calabria 56, Rome containing family history details (not all of which are correct); the reference to Harry having known Isabel Cargill in England; the mentions of Anna Mary's eye troubles; the references to houses Anna Mary owned in Vevey and north Italy; and Solomon Peile's being in business as a wine merchant. On p32 a photo of the statue of Benjamin Guy Babington, owned by Anna Mary Babington.

BABINGTON PREDECESSORS

Oxford Dictionary of National Biography volume 3 p76 for Anthony Babington 1561-86.

Wikipedia for Thomas Macaulay 1800-59 and the man who was named after him, Thomas Babington Macaulay. Zachary Macaulay also gets a mention. The Clapham Sect are on wikipedia and plenty has been published on them.

DR WILLIAM BABINGTON

Oxford Dictionary of National Biography volume 3 p89 although Benjamin Fayle is not mentioned in William's entry.

A Topographical Dictionary of London and its Environs published 1831 p28 in its list of asylum charities: entry for the Asylum for the Deaf and Dumb; Kent Road.

The connection with Madras involves other members of the Babington family, not just Benjamin Guy: Gentleman's Magazine volume 95 1825 p368 marriages during October included, at Tottenham, that of Captain Babington of the Madras Cavalry, son of Dr Babington of Aldermanbury. He married Adeline 7th dtr of William Hobson of Markfield Stamford Hill. For more on the residents of Tottenham Green at this time, see below, the PEILE family.

BENJAMIN FAYLE: some sources for anyone wanting to follow up.

The original partnership he worked for, which was based in Dublin:

At www.irishtheatreinstitute.com text of 17 Eustace Street: A History by Robert Somerville-Woodward and Nicola Morris. Published Timeline Research Ltd 2007.

London Gazette; I couldn't see the date of the issue. On p8 of that issue, in a list of partnerships dissolved: a notice issued 3 December 1803 by Benjamin Fayle, Richard Chambers and Alexander Jaffray, merchants, of Dove Court London where they were in business as Benjamin Fayle and Co. The partnership was dissolved due to the retirement of Jaffray; Chambers and Fayle would continue in business, under the same name.

Via genesreunited to Staffordshire Advertiser of 3 November 1804 to confirm that Benjamin Fayle was living in London by this time; and was a person important enough in the Potteries to be mentioned in its local newspapers.

London Gazette but again I couldn't see the date of the issue. On p20 in a list of partnerships dissolved: a notice issued 31 December 1817 by Benjamin Fayle, Richard Chambers and Richard Jaffray of Dove Court, Lombard Street, trading as Benjamin Fayle and Co. Their partnership was dissolved by the consent of all three parties.

Gentleman's Magazine 1831 p282 Benjamin Fayle had died on 23 February 1831 at the house of his son-in-law, Benjamin Guy Babington, in Finsbury Square.

LONDON INSTITUTION

A modern source but relevant to the 1840s: via the web to Annals of Science volume 39 1982 pp229-54: William Robert Grove and the London Institution 1841-45 by M L Cooper and V M D Hall.

PURBECK CLAY

See wikipedia for an introduction to its industrial use; and to the careers of John Calcraft the elder 1726-72 and his son John the younger 1765-1831, who owned the land exploited for clay by Benjamin Fayle and his business partners.

Via www.nationalarchives.gov.uk to records of land owned by the Calcraft family in Dorset. John Calcraft senior bought the manor of Wareham 1768. The current owner of Rempstone Manor is a descendant, but isn't called Calcraft.

The Middlebere Plateway, an early railway built and used by Benjamin Fayle and Co to get their clay from the pits to the coast:

Web pages at www.semgonline.com are run by the Railway Structures Southern-E Group.

Dorset in the Age of Steam by Peter Stanier. Dorset Books 2002 p[x] gives 1795 as the year Jaffray, Chambers and Fayle began extracting Purbeck clay at Norden.

Proceedings of the Dorset Natural History and Archaeological Society volume 52 1931 plix gives 1803 as the date the partners took over the Purbeck clay works. It also confirms that Benjamin Fayle and Co was still in existence and still extracting clay on the Isle of Purbeck in 1931; by that date it had been turned into a limited company.

Web pages www.pmmm.org/FaylesCo.htm, the Purbeck Mineral and Mining Museum's page on the plateway of Benjamin Fayle and Co.

PROPERTY IN DORSET

At discovery.nationalarchives.gov.uk records at Dorset History Centre include a conveyance dated 22 November 1878 in which the parties were:

1 = Helen Savery Babington of Hyres (I think it means Hyères) France and Anna Mary Babington of Gordon Square spinster

2 = John Philip Martineau of Gray's Inn

Parties 1 and 2 are on one side of the deal.

3 = Charlotte Fayle spinster of Gordon Sq.

Prop in the conveyance is 1 Seymer Place.

See britishlistedbuildings.co.uk for Seymer Place whose modern address is 1 Seymer Road Swanage.

PORTRAITS OF BABINGTONS AND FAYLES BY SAME ARTIST:

At www.pastellists.com/Articles/SmithJR.pdf is the Dictionary of Pastellists Before 1800 by Neil Jeffares. See p1 for the career of John Raphael Smith 1751-1812 including reproductions of pastels by him of Dr William Babington FRCP and Mrs Fanny Adams, mother-in-law of Benjamin Fayle. They are both now in Sydney Art Gallery NSW, donated by a Brigadier Foot, descendant of Rev Richard Fayle. On p4 there's a reproduction of a pastel of Benjamin Fayle 1751-1831.

The descent of the pictures to the man who gave them to the Sydney Art Gallery is through Rev Richard's fourth daughter Sophia Maria Fayle, who married Cunningham Noel Foot in 1861.

BENJAMIN GUY BABINGTON

Oxford Dictionary of National Biography volume 3 p79. A small statue of Benjamin Guy was done by sculptor C A Rivers in 1867, based on his death mask. Sources for the ODNB entry: Lancet 21 April 1866; 1870.

Charterhouse Register 1769-1872 published 1974 p14; including what little information there was on his time in the navy.

The Monthly Magazine or British Register volume 42 1817 p563 listings for January 1817 though the marriage actually took place the month before: at St George's Bloomsbury, marriage of Benjamin Guy Babington esq of the Madras Civil Service to Anna Mary Fayle of Bloomsbury Square.

A Topographical Dictionary of London and its Environs published 1831 p28 in its list of asylum charities: entry for the Asylum for the Deaf and Dumb; Kent Road.

Benjamin Guy Babington and the Royal Asiatic Society: he's listed on a plaque in the lobby of the Royal Asiatic Society offices in Stephenson Way, Euston: as secretary 1827-30. The Royal Asiatic Society was founded in 1823.

ANNA MARIA BABINGTON née FAYLE, and her children

Parish registers of Presidency of Madras. Reference N-2-7: baptism of Benjamin Babington at St Mary Madras 23 September 1818; born 25 August 1818. Mother Anna; father Benjamin. Seen via findmypast at the British Library.

Boyd's Inhabitants of London. Item reference 11223: entries for the household at 5 St Mary Aldermanbury include the birth date of the twins William and Stephen; and date of birth and date of burial of Arthur. Also seen on findmypast at the British Library.

GL Ms 3572/3: City of London burials. Index of burials at St Mary the Virgin Aldermanbury 1825. Seen on findmypast at the British Library.

SCULPTOR C A RIVERS - CHARLES AUGUSTUS RIVERS 1811-70

There's very little information on him; and virtually nothing on the art sales websites.

There's a bit of information on him at sculpture.gla.ac.uk, Glasgow University's Mapping the Practice and Profession of Sculpture in Britain and Ireland 1851-1951. It's taken from the Biographical Dictionary of Sculptors in Britain 1660-1851 pp1047-48 and other ref works of that kind.

The one time there's plenty of coverage of him, it's as an expert witness in a murder trial, eg Central Criminal Court: Minutes of Evidence eighth session 1840 p271 Regina v François Benjamin Courvoisier.

The Art-Union volume 9 1847 p334 has his name in a long list of candidates for election as associates of the Royal Academy. I guess he didn't get in, as I couldn't find any item describing him as 'ARA'.

ANNA MARY'S FATHER BENJAMIN BABINGTON

Alumni Cantabrigiensis seen on the web so the volume number wasn't visible; but p106 in that volume.

Solicitor's Journal and Reporter 1875 p828: an obituary.

London Gazette 17 April 1877 p2649 notice of hearing in case of Babington v Babington, with family members claiming ag estate of late Benjamin Babington, late of Lincoln's Inn; and Stephen Peile Babington as the defendant, as administrator of the Will.

ANNA MARY'S UNCLE WILLIAM PEILE BABINGTON who doesn't figure much in her life-story. Like his brother Stephen, he never married. He died in 1900.

He's in Alumni Cantabrigiensis seen on the web so no volume number visible; its p108 and just noting, here, that there are lots of other Babingtons on p108 and p107.

Local and Personal Laws part 150 1854 p28.

Crockford's Clerical Directory 1868 p23.

London Gazette 13 April 1900 p2451 a 'claims on estate notice'.

ANNA MARY'S UNCLE STEPHEN PEILE BABINGTON of Benjamin Fayle and Co

Charterhouse Register 1769-1872 compiled by R L Arrowsmith published 1974: p14; source for his DOB.

List of Carthusians 1800-79 compiled by W D Parish; p8.

The hat-peg:

At discovery.nationalarchives.gov.uk reference BT 45/8/1596: a "Useful Registered Design" for a hat-peg or hat-stand, owned by Stephen Peile Babington of 31 George Street; dated 27 September 1848.

London Journal of Arts and Sciences 1848 p223: Irish patents. Similar information in the Mechanics Magazine volume 49 1848 p335.

As a freemason in Scotland: see www.thecelticlodge.org, the web pages of Celtic Lodge of Edinburgh and Leith number 291; information based on a list of members 1851-60. A search of the archives at the Freemasons' Library in London didn't produce any Babingtons other than Thomas Babington Macaulay.

London Gazette 9 July 1886 p3360 notice issued by Walker, Martineau and Co of 36 Theobald's Road.

CHARLOTTE FAYLE AS DIRECTOR

Law Times Reports volumes 26-27 issue of 26 April 1856: Regina v Fayle, with details about leases.

The Mercantile Navy List and Maritime Directory 1869 p337 in a list of suppliers to the navy, und heading RVWQ: Miss Charlotte Fayle of Norden Dorset.

JAMES HIGGON EVANS

My source for the 1854 opening of the railway to Goathorn Pier reads as if Rev J H Evans was a director of Benjamin Fayle and Co. I'm fairly sure he wasn't.

Via genesreunited to the Hampshire Telegraph 29 January 1848 and the Morning Chronicle 12 December 1855 for his time as curate of Corfe Castle.

THE PEILE FAMILY - ANNA MARY'S MOTHER

At www.myheritage.com; but with no source: Thomas Hanson Peile's parents are named as Solomon Peile and wife Jane née King.

Gentleman's Magazine 1818 p17?3 ?8 marriages in June include that of Thomas Hanson Peile son of S Peile Esq of Tottenham Green to Elizabeth Helen eldest daughter of Dr W Babington of Aldermanbury; and that of his brother Solomon Peile eldest son of S Peile Esq to Anne second daughter of Dr W Babington.

Thomas Hanson Peile as a solicitor:

The Legal Observer 1835 p394.

The History and Antiquities of the Parish of Tottenham by William Robinson 1840 has coverage of the Peile family and of two other families who are related: the Hobsons and the Mountfords. See p72 in the chapter The Church; a comprehensive list of people buried in the churchyard.

The Jurist volume 18 part 2 1855 p25 a list of partnerships dissolved included that of Thomas Hanson Peile, Rowland Babington Peile (Helen's elder brother) and William Henry Murch, in business as Peile, Son and Murch of Mansion House Place; on the retirement of Mr Murch.

At discovery.nationalarchives.gov.uk, records of Fayle v Peile, Cause Number 1866 P51. Ref C 16/365/P51. Charlotte Fayle is the plaintiff, bringing an administration summons with regard to estate of late Thomas Hanson Peile of 5 Barge Yard Bucklersbury; the defendant is Elizabeth Helen Peile, the widow.

VENTNOR and the Peile family:

Wikipedia on Holy Trin Church Ventnor

See www.isle-of-wight-fhs.co.uk for a list of inscriptions on memorial stones in Holy Trinity Ventnor with family history information on some of the people mentioned.

Helen Peile's younger brother Mountford joined the navy:

At www.pdavis.nl some info on his career in navy and details of his marriage. Admiral Mountford Peile died in 1885.

ANNA MARY'S SISTER ADELIN CHARLOTTE - ALL HALLOWS CONVENT

It still exists, though not in its original form, and is on the web at www.all-hallows.org; where there's an account of its early years. It is mentioned on wikipedia page though not in much detail; and it's on facebook.

The Churchman volume 62 1890 p148: announcement of the death of Mother Lavinia.

Mother Lavinia is in the Oxford Dictionary of National Biography.

Article May 2010 by Simon Knott seen at www.norfolkchurches.co.uk on All Hallows Convent chapel at Ditchingham with details from the original Dictionary of National Biography.

A modern account of 19th-century sisterhoods: Stolen Daughters, Virgin Mothers: Anglican Sisterhoods in Victorian Britain by Susan Mumm. London: Leicester University Press 1999.

ROME 1893/94

Pope's jubilee:

Times Mon 20 February 1893 p5

Taken from Wikipedia, the Popes who reigned during the time Anna Mary was living in Rome: Leo XIII 20 February 1878 to 20 July 1903, one of the longest; it's his jubilee in 1893. St Pius X 1903- 20 August 1914; Benedict XV September 1914 to January 1922; and Pius XI February 1922 to February 1939.

Umberto and Margherita's wedding anniversary:

Times Wed 19 April 1893 p5.

Times Sat 22 April 1893 p7.

Times Mon 24 April 1893 p9.

Times Tue 25 April 1893 p9.

Times Thur 27 April 1893 p5.

Times Wed 19 April 1893 p5.

Fall of the Italian government: Times Sat 2 December 1893 p5.

See wikipedia for Umberto I of Italy 1844-1900.

Members of the English royal family in Rome, seen on web at archive.thetablet.co.uk issue of 1 April 1893 p17: a report sent by their Rome correspondent on 26 March 1893.

Cholera in Europe in the early 1890s:

The Conquest of Epidemic Diseases by Charles Edward Amory Winslow. New Jersey: University of Wisconsin Press 1980. P338.

Encyclopedia of Plague and Pestilence by George C Kohn 2007 p18.

THEOSOPHICAL SOCIETY

Theosophical Society Membership Register June 1893 to March 1895 p93.

The TS lodge in Rome:

Lucifer: A Theosophical Magazine volume XVI Mar-August 1895 p78.

Lucifer: A Theosophical Magazine Volume XX March-August 1897. Volume XX number 118 issued 15 June 1897.

ISABEL CARGILL DA POZZO

Online The Cyclopedia of New Zealand information on Captain William Cargill and Edward Bowes Cargill.

Via paperspast.natlib.govt.nz to Otago Daily Times number 12737 issue of 10 August 1903 p6 a long and detailed obituary of Isabel's father Edward Bowes Cargill 1823-1903. Very good on his business ventures.

Wikipedia has information on Cargill Castle and it now has its own website as part of an attempt to restore it: www.cargillcastle.co.nz.

It's interesting that Isabel Cargill's marriage to a Roman Catholic was announced in a Dunedin newspaper: via paperspast.natlib.govt.nz to Otago Witness issue 2574 15 July 1903 p51.

There's very little information on Isabel's husband:

Giuseppe da Pozzo 1844-1919 by Raffaella Cargnelutti and Giuseppe Bergamini published Arti Grafiche Friulane 1996.

At www.bbc.co.uk/yourpaintings there are two portraits by him, clearly done as a set: Henry Spencer Lucy and his wife Christina Cameron Campbell Lucy.

THE TEA ROOMS

They have own website is at www.babingtons.com, in Italian and English. The web pages are the source for Isabel Cargill's year of birth.

They have a wikipedia page in English.

The 1853 account of the English in Rome quoted in Terry Sheppard's book is from George Stillman Hillard's Six Months in Italy. Two volumes, published London 1853, Boston Mass 1856.

About the English-language newspapers published in Rome: I found references to the Roman Herald and the Roman Times on the web; but not much in the way of detail and I couldn't see either of them in the British Library catalogue. Confirmation that they were both being published in the mid-1890s can be seen at archive.thetablet.co.uk issue of 12 October 1895 p17 in the middle of a rant against anti-Catholic propaganda being published in the press. Both the Roman Times and the Roman Herald are seen by The Tablet as anti-Catholic. The Tablet adds that the Roman Herald has recently become the mouth-piece of the American methodists.

A later mention of the tea rooms when they had become a Roman institution:

A Traveller in Rome by Henry Vollam Morton. London: Methuen and Co 1957. Seen on the web so I couldn't see the page numbers.

The Insider's Guide to Rome by Nick Wyke. Robson Books Ltd 2004 pp27-38 quotes the publicity given to the tea rooms by the Roman Herald around the time of their first day in business.

19 December 2016

2 November 2016

Find the web pages of Roger Wright and Sally Davis, including my list of people initiated into the Order of the Golden Dawn between 1888 and 1901, at:

www.wrightanddavis.co.uk

***

Julian Levett Baker was initiated into the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn at its Isis-Urania temple in London on 16 June 1894. He chose a Latin motto that reflected his interests: 'Causa scientiae'. Three other people were initiated in the same ceremony: Jean Brash Gillison, Henry Herbert Weltch, and Harold N Lancaster; but I don't think Julian Baker knew any of them before that evening. Although he worked full-time (which a lot of other members didn't) Julian Baker had a head start over many new initiates in undertaking the study required of them before they could get into the GD's inner, 2nd Order and start doing some practical magic. He was initiated into the 2nd Order less than two years later, on 18 March 1896. Julian Baker is best known now for having been the first member of the GD to meet Aleister Crowley.

THE BAKERS AND THE BUCKMANS

GD members Julian Baker and Katherine Julia Buckman were related through Julian's mother, Bessie Helen Buckman. Although I lack one important piece of information with which to prove it, I believe that Bessie Helen and Katherine Julia were first cousins. Katherine Julia's grandparents were John Buckman of Cheltenham and his wife Mary, née Bishop. John and Mary had a large family. Katherine Julia's father James Buckman, the naturalist and supporter of Charles Darwin's theories, was one of their children. I believe Bessie Helen Buckman's father, John Bishop Buckman, was another of them, possibly the youngest child; though I haven't been able to find any firm details of who his parents were. I like to know exactly how people were related but in this case perhaps it doesn't matter: my other evidence shows both the Bakers and the Buckmans acting as though they were related.

Through another of John and Mary Buckman's sons - Edwin Buckman - Katherine Julia and (I argue) Bessie Helen Baker were first cousins to the artist and lithographer Edwin Buckman, who spent several years as art tutor to Queen Alexandra and her daughters; and to his brother, the wood engraver Harry Buckman. Katherine Julia's brothers were the artist and art teacher Percy Buckman, and the palaeontologist Sydney Savory Buckman. So: a very interesting family for Julian Levett Baker to be related to, on his mother's side.

The Bakers: not so interesting perhaps. They worked in the tea trade and had - like John Bishop Buckman - family connections in south Wales.

BESSIE HELEN BUCKMAN

Bessie Helen Buckman was the only surviving child of John Bishop Buckman and his first wife Albinia. John Bishop Buckman was certainly born in Cheltenham in about 1817. John Buckman, who I believe is John Bishop Buckman's father, was a shoemaker in Cheltenham but none of his sons went into the business. I don't know how John Bishop Buckman's working life began but by 1851 he had taken on the lease of Cheltenham Spa's Assembly Rooms, at 392 High Street; he also acted as the Cheltenham agent for at least one insurance company. He married Albinia Crole in Swansea in 1843. Bessie Helen was probably born in 1844 but I can't find a birth registration for her.

Albinia Buckman died, probably in childbirth, in 1847. The baby Charles, who would have been Bessie Helen's younger brother, died too. In his grief, John Bishop Buckman registered both the birth and death of his son, but not the death of his wife. Bessie Helen was left motherless at three: not such an uncommon fate in the 19th century. A common response to the situation in the 19th century was for a family to select a woman - an unmarried sister, for example - to keep house for the widower and bring up his children; but I don't know whether the Buckmans did this. John Bishop Buckman might have sent his daughter to grow up with her Crole relations in Swansea.

In 1851, Bessie Helen's father got married again, to Eliza Burrows Oakey; although he had no more children. Whether Bessie Helen lived with John Bishop Buckman and his second wife I don't know; I think possibly not, but perhaps I was just unlucky that she was never at home with her father and step-mother on census day. She was at a boarding school in Portishead Somerset on the day of the 1851 census; and at Mary Ann Smith's school in Shire Hall Lane Worcester on the 1861 census day. Mary Ann Smith's school was a large one, as girls' boarding schools went at that time: there were 20 pupils, taught by four teachers, all women (of course), one of whom had been born in Switzerland and probably taught French and German; and a large staff of servants. So no money was being spared by John Bishop Buckman to fund his daughter's education; although he didn't go so far as to send her to the newly-founded Cheltenham Ladies' College. He was investing in his business at this time: encouraged by an increase in visitors to Cheltenham now that Cheltenham College and the ladies' college had been opened there, he organised the renovation of the Assembly Room's ballroom in 1860 and by 1863 had taken over the running of the Pittville spa.

The proof that Bessie Helen Buckman was the daughter of John Bishop Buckman is a lease (dated 1864) now held at Swansea Record Office. Albinia Buckman's family owned a market garden at Cwmdonkin outside Swansea: she was living there with her mother Elizabeth Crole on the day of the 1841 census. In the 1864 lease, Thomas Rees of Swansea, John Bishop Buckman and Bessie Helen Buckman let this land or part of it to market gardener George Nott. I interpret the lease this way: that the land being leased had been Albinia Crole's dowry, inherited by her daughter on her death but held in trust for her with her father as sole trustee or with Thomas Rees as joint trustee - so that all three are involved in leasing it. The rent of £50 per year that Nott was going to pay would have provided Bessie Helen with an income that was a lot more than it sounds now: even in the 1890s the GD's Florence Farr was renting rooms and living an independent life on about £50 a year.

On the day of the 1871 census, Bessie Helen Buckman was still not at home, she was visiting Martha Graham and her mother Louisa, in Portishead. Martha was about Bessie Helen's age and was probably a school friend. One thing Bessie Helen must have had a lot of is friends she had made at school; and it was perhaps through one of them that she met her future husband George Nathaniel Levett Baker.

I haven't been able to find out much about Julian Baker's grandfather George Baker. It's not just that 'George Baker' is a common name; it's more that he gave different information to census officials in 1851 and 1861, both about his age and about where he was born. As a result I couldn't identify him on the 1841 census; and by 1871 he was dead. Based on census from 1851 and 1861, he was born between 1812 and 1818, either in south Wales or in Somerset. It was much easier to find George Baker's wife, Julian's grandmother on the Baker side of the family. Her name was Melinda Harris Lovell and she was born around 1824 in Pembroke. In 1841, she was still living in the town, in the household of Jenkin Jenkin the schoolmaster - a household of six people where at 18, Melinda was by 35 years the youngest of them. None of them were called Lovell; and nor were any of the neighbours, so perhaps Melinda was an orphan by this early stage. Lodging with James Morris the butcher next door was a woman who figures in Melinda's later life: Elizabeth Harris, a spinster then in her forties. Perhaps she was Melinda's aunt and her closest relation. Both of them told the census official that they had an independent income - which usually meant money from rents, or shares.

THE BAKERS

Not knowing very much about George Baker, it's difficult for me to make a guess as to how he and Melinda Harris Lovell met; but they married early in 1843 in Pembroke. I would guess that George Baker was already working in London and that he, his bride and Elizabeth Harris as well took up residence in Newington on the South Bank immediately after they married. Julian Baker's father, George Nathaniel Levett Baker, was born at the end of 1843, George and Melinda's eldest child.

George and Melinda, their children George, Melinda and William, and Elizabeth Harris were all living in at 9 Manor Terrace Newington on the day of the 1851 census. George Baker told the census official that he was working as a clerk in the tea trade. When I read this, I was excited for a moment thinking that he worked for Horniman's, the firm that invented the pre-sealed packet; Annie Horniman, the grand-daughter of the firm's founder, was a prominent member of the Golden Dawn. However, it turned out that John Horniman didn't move his business from the Isle of Wight to London until 1852. London was the tea-trading capital of the world by the 1850s and there were dozens of firms involved in tea import and sale. I now cautiously advance the idea that George Baker may have worked for a firm called A Barwin and Co of Miles Lane Cannon Street in the City of London. George Baker's youngest son, Lovell Baker (Julian Baker's uncle), went into the tea trade in his turn, and in the 1880s was running A Barwin and Co with a partner, Alfred John Winney. Though I have to say that I couldn't find any evidence for the existence of A Barwin and Co before the mid-1880s.

On the day of the 1861 census George Baker, Melinda and Elizabeth Harris were still living in the same house as they had been in 1851 - I think - but Manor Terrace had been renamed Manor Road. Their daughter Melinda had died; but two more daughters and another son had been born - Emily, Amy and John. Two more children were born - Edith and Lovell - before George Baker died in 1867. I believe Elizabeth Harris may have died too during this decade. It's a common name and I wasn't able to pinpoint a death registration for her, but she was no longer living with Melinda Baker by 1871.

Melinda must have had a few difficult years in the late 1860s, but she was able to continue living in the same district, possibly in the same house. On the day of the 1871 census, her address was 18 Manor Road Newington - which may just be a renumbering of the original number '9'. Edith (aged 8) and Lovell (aged 5) were still at school but all George and Melinda's other children were earning - even the girls were going out to work, which was remarkable in a lower-middle class family in the 1870s. While George Baker had been alive there had been enough money coming in to employ one general servant, but now Melinda was making do without, even though there was more work to be done as there were three extra people living in her household. All three were described by the census official as boarders, but it's clear from their details that they were also the sons of people known to Melinda Baker or to George Baker. The most important one from my point of view was William H Norman: he had been born in Cheltenham and was probably related to the Buckmans through Benjamin Norman, who was James Buckman's brother-in-law and business partner of James' brother Edwin. William's presence in Melinda's household suggests that the Buckmans and the Bakers knew each other before George Baker and Bessie Helen Buckman married. They continued to keep in touch: way into the future, when John Bishop Buckman died, William Henry Norman was one of his executors; James Buckman's son Sydney Savory Buckman was the other. Melinda's other two boarders were probably brothers - Harry Phillips, a medical student, and Richard Phillips whose profession I couldn't read; they had both been born in Pembroke.

George Nathaniel Levett Baker - whom I shall call George Levett Baker because that seems to be what he called himself - was still living at home on the day of the 1871 census; he was working for a bank and had probably been employed by the same bank since he left school. He and Bessie Helen Buckman were married in Cheltenham in the summer of 1871; after the wedding ceremony perhaps they had a reception at John Bishop Buckman's Assembly Rooms, at 392 High Street. Julian Levett Baker - the future GD member - was their eldest child, born in 1873. His sisters Ethel Melinda and Muriel Albinia followed in 1874 and 1876; Ethel Melinda married Julian's great friend and fellow GD member George Cecil Jones. A fourth child was born to George Levett Baker and Bessie Helen during the 1870s, but had died before 1881.

On the day of the 1881 census the Bakers were living at 15 Windsor Road Camberwell. There were also three boarders in the household - Theodore Tries and Ernest Tries, who were probably brothers and had been born in south London; and Alfons Rehlender who was from Hamburg. The family employed the one general servant that was the basic requirement of middle-classness. By 1891 George Levett and Bessie Helen had moved their family to 57 Hendham Road Wandsworth. There had been a typical trade-off between the better address - there were some very fancy houses in Hendham Road, standing in their own grounds - and the fact that they wouldn't be able to afford a servant; on the other hand Bessie Helen was no longer taking lodgers and her daughters were old enough to help with the housework. Perhaps George Levett Baker had been promoted.

JULIAN BAKER

Julian Baker's first school was probably a local primary school but the main part of his education was at the City of London boys' school in Cheapside. George Baker may have used contacts he had made through his work to get his son accepted by the school - all applications had to have a reference from an alderman or councillor of the Corporation of London, which ran the school. Pupils were taken at any age between 7 and 15, and could stay until they were 19. Although the school was funded by a charitable endowment, pupils' parents had to pay 10 guineas per year, for which their sons received a comprehensive education: English, Latin, French, Greek, German and even Sanskrit were taught; with maths, arithmetic, drawing, basic chemistry, and natural philosophy; and elocution and vocal music. It was at City of London School that Julian made up his mind to be a professional chemist; and it was at City of London School that he first met his lifelong friend and eventual brother-in-law George Cecil Jones. I'm sure those two important things are connected. (For more on Cecil Jones see my biography of him.) Julian and Cecil were exactly the same age and I suppose were in the same class. Cecil Jones also wanted to work as a chemist; and the two boys shared an interest in their future profession's origins in classical and medieval alchemy. Their approach to alchemy was slightly different though: I haven't found any references to Julian reading medieval alchemical texts like Cecil Jones did, instead there's a reference from Aleister Crowley to Julian making mercury solidify at room temperature - the practical rather than the literary side of alchemy; though Cecil Jones would have been perfectly capable of doing the same, it was Julian that Crowley mentioned doing so, not Cecil Jones.

The best obituary of Julian Baker - which was written by Cecil Jones - says that Julian's days at City of London School ended prematurely and abruptly. Over Easter 1888 Julian came into contact with someone who developed scarlet fever. The school, panicking at the thought of an epidemic breaking out, refused to let him return for the summer term. In this crisis, George Baker asked the advice of a Mr Friswell, a friend of the family and perhaps another influence on Julian's choice of career, as he worked as a chemist at a firm of dyers. Friswell recommended that Julian apply to Finsbury Technical College, which was affiliated to the University of London and had a very active and reputable chemistry department. I was going to say that Julian's going to Finsbury Technical College set the stage for his subsequent career. Cecil Jones says that the contacts he made there - staff and fellow students - were an important feature of his working life, particularly in the 1890s and 1900s. But I think that Julian Baker had the kind of personality that led to his getting the best out of almost any circumstances, especially as regards people: he was both likable, and ready to like people, and people responded to that. He knew his stuff, of course, chemically speaking - Finsbury Technical College saw to that. And the unfortunate brush with scarlet fever - which he didn't catch himself - meant that he was at the College in 1889, when Dr E R Moritz, consultant chemist to the Country Brewers' Society, gave a series of six lectures on the science of brewing that were a turning point for Julian's view of his own future. According to Cecil Jones, Julian made up his mind at about this time that he wanted to work in the brewing industry.

In his obituary Cecil Jones names two friends, both professional chemists, that Julian Baker made at Finsbury Technical College. Of course, Julian made other friends but Cecil Jones mentioned these two because their names would be known to the obituary's readers. The first was Martin Onslow Forster (1872-1945) who went to India and eventually became Director of the Indian Institute for Science. The second was Gilbert Thomas Morgan (1872-1940) who when he left Finsbury Technical College went directly to the Royal College of Science - now Imperial College - as a lecturer, and then spent some years as an academic in Dublin and Birmingham before being appointed to run the government's Department of Scientific and Industrial Research's laboratory at Teddington.

When Julian Baker left Finsbury Technical College in 1891, it was still rare for any brewery to employ a professional chemist. Patience, and the gaining of some work experience, were going to be necessary if he was going to change the reluctance of the brewing industry to invest in the application of chemical know-how to the raw materials and processes of brewing. Julian took a job in the laboratory of London Beetroot Sugar Association, a trade organisation founded and funded by beet importing and broking firms. As well as defending their corner in legal cases the Association also acted to maintain standards, and all members were welcome to send samples to the Association for analysis. Julian's boss at the laboratory for his few first years there was Arthur Robert Ling (1861-1937) and the Finsbury Technical College connection must have helped Julian get the job in the first place. A R Ling had also been a student there and even after he had left, he used to return in the evenings to use the College's equipment to do research on nitrophenols and quinones; so Julian almost certainly knew him well before he went to work for him. Together, A R Ling and Julian worked on the constitution of starch, and Julian's first published works were two papers that he and Ling co-authored in 1895 (around the time he joined the GD) and 1897. When Ling left the Association in 1898, Julian was promoted to take Ling's job as chief chemist.

According to Cecil Jones, it was during Julian's time at the London Beetroot Sugar Association that he got to know Dr Henry Edward Armstrong (1848-1937). Armstrong had been a teacher at Finsbury Technical College in the 1870s. He had moved on to teach at the Central Technical College by the time Julian started at Finsbury but he often dropped in on Ling and Julian at the London Beetroot Sugar Association's offices. He gave Julian a lot of good advice - which Julian seems to have taken to such an extent that he was widely thought to be Armstrong's pupil. Armstrong was also probably the person who recommended Julian for membership of the Chemical Society of London, which Julian joined in 1893.

Unlike Cecil Jones, who tended to pursue a solitary course and was perhaps not all that sociable, Julian Baker was a great joiner. The Chemical Society of London was the first of quite a few societies for working chemists that he was elected to. John Frederick Briggs (brother of Mary Briggs who joined the GD in 1895) was also elected to the Chemical Society that year, and it's possible the two men knew each other although John Briggs had gone to work in Madras by 1893. Julian was a member of the Society of Chemical Industry from 1894; and a member of the Royal Institute of Chemistry, as an associate from 1894 and as a fellow from 1897. Quite when he joined the Institute of Brewing I'm not clear; there was no point, I suppose, in his joining it while he didn't work in the industry. But shortly after Dr Moritz had given his lectures, he founded the Laboratory Club, which Julian and perhaps Cecil Jones as well were members of. In November 1890 the Club turned into the Institute of Brewing; Julian was a founder member and so, probably, was Cecil Jones.

By the late 1890s Julian was beginning to be restless. He had several years' in a chemistry laboratory under his belt and through his membership of professional groups he knew a large number of chemists, some of whom had jobs to offer the right candidate. But he had not made any real advances towards achieving his ambition of a career in the brewing industry. In 1898, three of London's breweries merged to form Watney Combe Reid and Co. The new firm was the biggest brewer in the UK, with brewing facilities at four sites, and a large staff: if any brewery could afford to employ a professional chemist, it was this one. And it was right on Julian Baker's doorstep. Perhaps this spurred him on to make a life-changing decision: he gave up his job at the London Beetroot Sugar Association and went to spend several months at the University of Birmingham, where the UK's first university department of brewing was in the process of being set up.

My one source for Julian having spent time at the University of Birmingham is Cecil Jones' obituary. Unfortunately, though, he doesn't say exactly when it was that Julian was there, only that it was before he was offered his next job, in 1900. This is a pity - 1899 to 1901 is such an important time at the GD! Nor does Cecil Jones say whether Julian was at the university as a student, or as a staff member. I shall suppose that Julian Baker was in the department of brewing at the University of Birmingham for some months between early 1899 and 1900; and I think he was there to learn and was probably not being paid. He would have wanted to go to this new university department, to get some time working for Adrian John Brown (1852-1919) who had been offered the job as its first professor after 25 years working for Thomas Salt and Co of Burton-on-Trent. Though A J Brown was a specialist in fermentation, and its mysteries were what Julian most wanted to learn from him, Brown's most important contribution to the chemistry of brewing came in 1907 when he was the first person to describe the process of osmosis in barley seed.

The risk Julian took paid off. In 1900, he was appointed Watney Combe Reid and Co's first-ever professional chemist, to run their laboratory at the Stag brewery in Pimlico - which was presumably a brand new one - and take charge of the analysis of incoming raw materials and samples of barrels returned as unfit to sell; in an era of increasing regulation of all brewery processes. He also worked on making more efficient all the chemical processes involved in beer-making and its residues, and during his early years at the firm, applied for and was granted three patents. The first, in 1903, was for an improvement to the way in which yeast was prepared for use as a manure. The second (1905) was for an improved way of sulphuring hops and malts; he held this one jointly with A R Ling who by this time was working as an independent analytical chemist. And the third, from 1912, was for an improved method of making stout. Later on in his career there, Julian was also assigned two more patents. One in 1925 was for a gas dispenser for beer. The second, from 1944, was for improvements to how maltose was manufactured.

Julian stayed in his dream job for the rest of his working life - for longer than he had intended, in fact, as the outbreak of World War 2 caused him to postpone his retirement until 1946. In 1901, on the strength of his new job and its prospects, Julian Baker married Eveleen Daniel.

I always like to say something about the people GD members married: I think knowing about their wives or husbands can be illuminating. In Eveleen Daniel's case, though, I've found out absolutely nothing about her or her family beyond the facts that she was the daughter of H A Daniel of Fermoy county Cork, in Ireland; and that she never was a member either of GD or any of its daughter orders. She doesn't appear on any UK census before 1911 so I can only suppose that she was living in Ireland until shortly before her marriage. In which case, how and where did she and Julian meet? I can't shed any light on that mystery. However, there's no doubt that Eveleen felt herself to be Irish: she and Julian's three children all had Irish names - Sheila (1904), Patrick (1907) and Desmond (1913).

The high-profile job Julian Baker now had, and the contacts he had made through the various societies for chemists, meant that he was able to develop a parallel career as a writer and editor. Perhaps extra income was a factor in this, as he was now a family man, but I think he also knew the importance of publishing high-quality chemistry research and was prepared to do the extra hours to make sure it happened. I've listed as many of his publications as I can find in a separate file, but here I'll talk about Julian's most important and widely-known publishing work.

The second career began with a commission from Methuen and Co to write a book on brewing for their Books on Business series. Julian's The Brewing Industry was published in 1905. He may have drawn on knowledge of GD specialists in ancient Egyptian magic like Marcus Worsley Blackden and Florence Farr for his chapter on the history of brewing, which covered beer making in every culture from ancient Egypt and Greece to the contemporary scene. Then there were three chapters on the raw materials of brewing: barley, hops and water. Several more chapters covered the processes of beer making, including discussions of fermentations and yeasts and not fighting shy of mentioning costs. He also tackled the legal side of brewing - excise charges and the laws governing licensing and tied houses.

He discussed management, the connections between brewing and agriculture, brewing's importance to the economy; and finally lamented that the British industry was so far behind Europe in the education and training of brewery staff - arguing of course that trained chemists would soon repay their salary by the contribution they could make to the quality of the product. A chemist, he argued, could help deliver a standard product by checking the quality of raw materials: "Uniformity in materials means uniformity in the resulting beer, a matter of prime importance for the reputation of a brewery".

Methuen's budget for the book ran to some black and white photographs - none of the Stag brewery, I'm sorry to say - and a great many line drawings. The Brewing Industry was very favourably reviewed at the time and remained the best introduction to the industry for many years.

Its critical success led to him being approached to write on fermentation for the next edition of the Encyclopaedia Britannica, published in 29 volumes in 1910 and 1911. At the time it got a fair amount of criticism though none was specifically aimed at Julian's contribution; but now it's considered one of the best encyclopaedias ever published.

In 1907 Julian Baker took the job of editor of the magazine The Analyst, which published short abstracts of longer and more complex articles on chemistry. As well as the editing tasks, this job meant managing a small group of chemists who worked at reading the original articles and making precis of them. He soon started recruiting friends and colleagues to do this work: Cecil Jones was one of the group for several years, and so was Everard Hulton, who worked for Julian at Watney Combe Reid and Co. Julian edited The Analyst from 1907 to 1920, only leaving when A R Ling gave up working as editor of the Journal of the Institute of Brewing. Julian took over as editor of the Journal and continued in post even after he finally retired from Watney Combe Reid and Co - he only gave it up in 1949. Although he never edited the journal of the Society of Chemical Industry, as an editor of other journals read by chemists he was a member of the Society's publication committee at least from 1914 to 1943, and possibly longer.

Throughout his time working full-time as a chemist and editing as well, Julian found time to publish short articles connected to his work. He was able to pursue the interest in starches he had had since he'd worked with A R Ling. His articles were usually written with a co-author - the idea of the scientist working in splendid isolation was already moving into the past and in any case, Julian was a natural at enterprises undertaken cooperatively. His most frequent co-author was Everard Hulton, who had been hired to work at the Stag brewery's laboratory by 1907 at the latest; and who was actually a visitor at Julian and Eveleen's house on the day of the 1911 census. I haven't been able to discover much about Hulton though I have found that he and Julian had similar backgrounds - they were both Londoners, they were nearly the same age (Hulton was born in 1875); and both had been at Finsbury Technical College where they must have known each other as students. In the 1920s Julian and Hulton published a series of three articles on the amylases of cereal grains and they continued to publish together until the early 1930s. Hulton may have worked for Watney Combe Reid and Co until he died. His death in April 1939 at the age of 64 may have influenced Julian's decision to stay on at Watney Combe Reid and Co in 1939, when (according to Cecil Jones' obituary) he had been thinking of retiring. Another co-author who worked for Julian in the laboratory at Watney Combe Reid and Co was Frank E Day. However, Julian's collaboration with Day only lasted a few years, because Day didn't stay as long as a colleague: by 1929 he was employed on the Brewing Research Scheme at Rothamsted Experimental Station. In the 30s, a co-author who may have been a third Watney's employee was T J Ward.

Another source of extra income for Julian was working as an examiner of other chemists, and it's a mark of how quickly chemistry was developing as an academic discipline, that he will have been assessing the examination papers of chemists who were going to end up more highly qualified than he was: chemists like Frank E Day, for example - he had a science degree. Julian did a stint as examiner for the City and Guilds London Institute between 1908 and 1911; and from 1928 to 1931 continued his association with the University of Birmingham by acting as an examiner there, presumably of degrees in brewing.

Twice in his working life, Julian did pieces of research work in addition to his normal work; both one-off items, for Government. The first was requested in 1914, probably just before the first World War broke out: Julian was asked by the Local Government Board to analyse a group of 29 widely-available prepared baby foods. Quite why Julian was asked, rather than anyone else, is a mystery: perhaps it was not so much Julian as the resources of his laboratory that were required. Of course, that's not to say that Julian wasn't a good choice - the British Medical Journal later praised the "exhaustive chemical examination" he had carried out on each of his specimens. His work was a 'part 2' to some analysis done in 1911 by the chemist F J H Coutts, who had examined varieties of condensed milk. In each case, the analyst was asked to assess how nourishing the foods were for babies. Julian's conclusions were that the majority had too much carbohydrate and too little fat to be suitable food for infants; and that regular use of some of them would be likely to result in vitamin deficiencies. This report was immediately seen as an important piece of research and was widely referred to in scientific and medical magazines at the time; it has also been quoted several times in books and articles on infant diet since.

The first World War was one in which chemistry and thus chemists played an important, not to say deadly, role. However, it looks as though the other one-off piece of Government research was Julian's sole war work as the war dragged on. The indications are that he stayed in his job at Watney Combe Reid and Co, and was not co-opted onto any war-based chemistry project. In March 1917, food supplies were becoming a serious issue for Government and Julian was approached by the Royal Commission on Wheat Supplies to do some research for them on whether brewers' yeast could be used to make bread. If the members of the Commission had known more about how bread had traditionally been made, they wouldn't have needed any input from Julian. However, he did the research and presented his results - that yes, it could be used - at a meeting of the Society of Chemical Industry in May 1917. Julian wasn't paid for this research. However, I imagine he would have been shocked and possibly offended if any money had been offered: he would have seen it as a chance to contribute to the war effort.

Beginning in the 1900s, Julian had begun to take a more active and time-consuming role in chemistry's professional societies. By this time he had been a member of them all for several years; and unlike others, he was happy to do the committee and organising work that running that kind of society involves.

The earliest mention of Julian Baker that I could find in the Times was the result of some very hard organisational work he had put in on the 1905 conference of the Society of Chemical Industry. This was a big 'do' in every sense - two weeks'-worth of meetings, outings and social events, involving the housing in hotels in London and elsewhere of a large number of foreign guests and overseas' members of the Society. No one else was as involved as Julian in the work needed to ensure the conference's success; although his ex-boss A R Ling sat on more of the organising committees than most other members. Julian acted as honorary secretary of the conference's executive committee, its reception committee and even its ladies' committee though the ladies also had a woman hon sec. He persuaded Eveleen to join the ladies' committee, which liaised with the hostesses of the garden parties and receptions that were part of the conference's social calendar. When the arrangements had been made, Julian edited the conference handbook and saw it through the printing process ready for delegates to receive on their arrival. And as if he had not already got enough to do, as honorary secretary to the Society's London group, Julian was the main organiser of the visit delegates made to Greenwich and Woolwich Arsenal on Tuesday 11 July 1905; though he had some help from the newly-appointed United States ambassador, Whitelaw Reid, in persuading the military hierarchy at Woolwich to allow them to take a tour of the Arsenal. However, he was probably not the person who persuaded Sir John Pound, the current Lord Mayor of London, to host that evening's reception at the Mansion House; I think that would have needed some chemists rather better known than Julian was.

Cecil Jones remembered the day out to Woolwich Arsenal with affection even many years later: he remembered with amusement how all the delegates went from Westminster Pier to Woolwich on a steamer, dressed - rather oddly to modern ideas - in their frock coats and best silk hats.

Julian's contribution to the 1905 conference brought his name to the attention of the Times: he was the last named man in the guest-list (edited for 'well-known names only') that the Times published in its report on the AGM of the Society of Chemical Industry. This and the annual dinner took place on the evening of the trip to Woolwich Arsenal, at Goldsmith's Hall in the City of London: in composing his coverage of it, the Times' reporter decided that the name 'Julian Baker' might be one some of its readers would recognise.

By 1909, as honorary secretary of the Institute of Brewing, Julian Baker was starting to represent the Institute at funerals. Going to funerals is not the most joyful way of keeping in touch with your fellow professionals, but it's in that capacity that Julian Baker's name is most regularly mentioned in the Times.

In 1909, Julian was involved to some degree in the organisation of an even bigger science-cum-social event, the seventh International Congress of Applied Chemistry, which was held in London between 27 May and 2 June. He was not amongst the great and good of this Congress, but even so well-known a chemist as William Crookes - whom Julian Baker will have known through the GD and through the Society of Chemical Industry - hardly gets a mention in the account of what went on. Scientists came from all over the world to attend it, and it was such a prestigious event that the royal family played their part on the social side. The Prince and Princess of Wales (the future George V and Mary) went to the inaugural meeting, which was such a huge affair it was held in the Royal Albert Hall. The socialising during the Congress was on a truly monumental scale, eclipsing even that of the 1905 conference: there were several important social functions each day including a reception at Buckingham Palace, at which Edward VII greeted the guests; a banquet for 1500 at Crystal Palace; and two garden parties, one of which was organised by the Society of Chemical Industry's London branch - meaning, by Julian Baker. All with endless speech-making and hundreds of guests from the political and diplomatic worlds, as well as chemistry professionals and academics. Julian was on the Congress' organising committee; and again, may even have persuaded Eveleen to play a part as well - a Mrs Baker is listed as a member of the Congress' Ladies Committee, which had the task of organising the garden party at the Royal Botanic Gardens at Kew.

If you were still on your feet after all those social events, the Congress did have a scientific side as well and Julian also contributed to this, through two papers: one written with Everard Hulton - On the Behaviour of Wheaten Flours Towards Bakers' and Brewers' Yeasts; and one which he gave on his own - The Purchase of Malt on the Basis of Analysis. Julian was a member of one of the Congress' sub-groups, the starch group; and he spoke up at the Congress' closing session to make the sensible suggestion - which was adopted - that the starch group and the sugar group should be amalgamated as part of their continued existence after the Congress was over.

Julian's involvement in chemistry's professional societies wasn't just about committee meetings and big formal functions. His obituaries all say how much he liked to talk and listen, and he had the gift of being at home in any company (I wish I had it). With chemists, he enjoyed chats which ranged widely over chemistry's burgeoning specialisms. During Julian's lifetime, chemists could still just about manage to understand what specialist in other kinds of chemistry were saying about their work. I'm sure that he enjoyed equally much chatting with the other GD members who were interested in alchemy - Cecil Jones of course, but also Rev William Alexander Ayton, Percy William Bullock and Frederick Leigh Gardner. And on one occasion, on holiday in Switzerland, he even took pity on a non-chemist who was making rather an ass of himself talking about alchemy in a bar - he sought him out and started to chat; more of that later.

He helped - unpaid - to organise conferences, and he went to them too: that's what Julian was like and in this respect he was not at all like Cecil Jones, who didn't really do this sort of socialising. It's surprising even that he went on Julian's trip to Woolwich Arsenal in 1905. He didn't make it to the Times' list of guests at the dinner at the Goldsmith's Hall and probably didn't attend the AGM at all. He was a member of the 1909 Congress - but so was every chemist of note in the UK. I couldn't find his name in the accounts of the sessions at the Congress, though, so he may not have attended any of them, although he was entitled to. That's what Cecil Jones was like. Perhaps the length of the friendship between the two of them was due to each making allowances for the way the other differed from themselves. It's clear from their writings that each of them admired the talents and qualities of the other.

Julian and Eveleen Baker had started out on their married life in west London - daughter Sheila's birth was registered in Brentford, a district that included Chiswick. Julian's grandmother Melinda Baker, and her unmarried daughter, Julian's Aunt Amy, were living in Chiswick, at 10 Mayfield Avenue, where Melinda finally died in October 1910. Several GD members also lived in Chiswick: Edmund and Dorothea Hunter with Edmund's sister Amy Turner living in nearby Acton; Frederick Leigh Gardner; and fellow-scientist W F Kirby. Though the GD had turned into its daughter orders by the time Sheila was born, perhaps Julian kept up friendly relations with his GD neighbours for a time. However, by 1907 when Patrick Baker was born, Julian and Eveleen had decided to leave London. They moved to Staines and on the day of the 1911 census were living in a house called Stainesbury Holt on Kingston Road. Julian's father, George Levett Baker, had lived long enough to retire from the bank and to see Julian's three children and Ethel Melinda's two children born - that was still quite unusual in the early 20th century. On the day of the 1911 census he, Bessie Helen and Julian's unmarried sister Muriel Albinia were enjoying a holiday in Worthing, though they continued to live in south London. George Levett Baker died in 1922 at 16 Slaithwaite Road Lewisham. Bessie Helen Baker also died in Lewisham, having lived on until 1932; Julian was one of the two executors of her Will, the other being ex-GD member, solicitor Percy William Bullock.

Between 1913 and 1921, Julian, Eveleen and their children moved further still out of London, to Dial Cottage, Cookham Road Maidenhead. There, Julian's hospitable nature, and his new interest in fishing and golf, meant that they were soon moving in quite elevated social circles. In 1940 their son Patrick (who'd joined the RAF) married Helen Gardner, daughter of Sir Ernest Gardner, a local landowner and former Conservative MP. And it was in the local vicarage that Eveleen Baker died - presumably unexpectedly - in May 1945. Her death was the third (after those of Frank E Day and Everard Hulton) in a trend of Julian outliving people who were younger than he was.

Julian was finally able to retire from Watney Combe Reid and Co in 1946 at the age of 72 or 73. It came too late for a life of retirement with Eveleen, but in time for a short life together with Catherine Lucy Paul, whom he married in 1948. The bridegroom was 75; the bride was 72. Catherine Lucy Pearson, the daughter of a civil engineer, had married Arthur Clifford Saint Paul in 1904 in Bristol. Her husband had worked in the finance department of Bristol City Council, but had died in 1924. Catherine Lucy lived with Julian in Dial Cottage, and they had eight years together; but the marriage ended in 1956 with Catherine Lucy's death and Julian being widowed for the second time.

Julian Baker and Cecil Jones had moved from being friends to being in-laws when Cecil married Julian's sister Ethel Melinda in 1905. A few years afterwards, Cecil Jones had decided to leave the security of working for someone else and set up in business as a chemical analyst - following his own path, as so often, a very different one from Julian Baker's. And unlike Julian Baker, until late in 1910, Cecil Jones was still doing magic with Aleister Crowley and thought of himself as Crowley's friend. You can read about how the friendship ended in court in 1911 in my biography of Cecil Jones.

Cecil Jones and Ethel Melinda and their children continued to live in south London, quite near Julian's parents, until the second World War; so perhaps the two friends, the in-laws and their children met fairly frequently. However, Cecil Jones decided to close down his business and retire in 1939 and shortly afterwards he and Ethel Melinda moved to Hastings. Particularly in the difficult travel conditions of the War, he and Julian will have found it difficult to meet, though Cecil Jones was a great letter-writer and perhaps they kept in touch that way and by phone. They had a new interest in common - gardening. But their lives began more and more to touch only when someone had died: Eveleen Baker in 1946 - though it's nice to think of Cecil and Ethel Melinda, also in their seventies, as guests at Julian's second wedding; and then Ethel Melinda Jones, early in 1952. It's a strange thing, I think, that both Julian Baker and Cecil Jones outlived their wives; Julian outlived two. He also survived both his sisters; and Cecil all his sisters-in-law. Muriel Albinia, who had never married, died in 1955, naming Julian and Cecil Jones as her executors.

And of course, as Julian Baker and Cecil Jones entered into their eighties, not only were all their contemporaries in chemistry dying, but also some of the next generation. Cecil Jones' obituary mentions Julian (aged 84) saying sadly about a visit to his club in London (probably the Institute of Brewing's members' rooms), "I hardly saw a man I knew". A generation before, Cecil Jones had made a rare visit to Julian's club and he had thought to himself, "Baker seems to know everyone here and everyone knows Baker".

Julian Baker outlived his second wife by 18 months, dying on 29 January 1958 in Maidenhead Hospital. All his children survived him. It was Cecil Jones' task to write the most detailed obituary of his old friend; Cecil lived on until 1961.

JULIAN BAKER AND THE OCCULT

THE GOLDEN DAWN

Who recommended Julian Baker to Samuel Liddell Mathers and William Wynn Westcott as a suitable member of the GD? If you've read through all the biographical stuff above in this biography, you'll know that Julian Baker had lots of friends. Not many of them will have been in the GD, however. I can't find any specific evidence for this but my guess is that it was either William Crookes or Allan Bennett, who put forward his name. And my money is on Bennett, who was a contemporary of Julian: Crookes was a much older man. Bennett had been initiated into the GD in February 1894 and, like Julian, worked as a professional chemist. Although Bennett and Baker had not been at school or college together, they could easily have met on chemistry's social circuit in London - the world of chemistry as a profession was still quite a small one. If they did meet, say in the early 1890s, they will soon have discovered that they shared an interest in the alchemical origins of how they earned their wages; and as chemists working in laboratories, they were both well-placed to try and see if they could crack some of alchemy's puzzles. Describing the events of 1898 (though looking back from a distance of over 20 years) Crowley wrote that by that time, Julian Baker had "accomplished some remarkable work...he had prepared 'fixed mercury'... the pure metal in some form that was solid at ordinary temperatures". This wasn't, actually, as remarkable a feat as Crowley thought it: as my science advisor, Roger Wright describes it as a party trick, easily within the capabilities of any well-trained chemist: just add a little gold.

Julian Baker was a very well-trained chemist. The alchemical studies that initiates of the GD were required to follow will have been easy for him, therefore; though he may have found the GD's use of alchemical manuscripts to be a very different way of understanding them. Members could and did do alchemical laboratory work if they wanted to and had the facilities, but in the GD as a whole, alchemical texts were understood as metaphorical as well as practical, using the language of alchemy to describe processes of personal growth and training.

A few months after Julian Baker had joined the GD, Cecil Jones was initiated; both Baker and Bennett would have been happy to recommend him as a suitable candidate.

JULIAN BAKER AND ALEISTER CROWLEY

In August 1898 Julian Baker and some friends were on holiday, walking in Switzerland. This was a very popular form of vacation amongst British people at that time and perhaps Julian's group had been visiting the Alps regularly during the past few years; but this year turned out to be different. Staying the night at Zermatt, below the Matterhorn on the Swiss side, they spent the evening in a bier keller where they were obliged to listen to an unknown Englishman holding forth about alchemy. It was Aleister Crowley, who had gone to Switzerland for his health and had taken a copy of Mathers' translation of The Kabbalah Unveiled with him; but couldn't understand it, so - on his own admittance - he talked a lot of rubbish in that bier keller. Julian wasn't put off, though: he got into conversation with Crowley as everyone walked back to the hotel they all turned out to be staying in. He told Crowley that if he was serious about wanting to study alchemy, he could help him. However, that seems to be as far as it went in that first conversation. Julian Baker and his companions left the hotel the following morning and continued their walking tour without any arrangements being made between him and Crowley to meet again. Getting up rather later and finding that he'd missed him, Crowley spent the day chasing Julian Baker all over the valley below Zermatt, finally catching up with him at Brigue and getting him to promise that they would further their acquaintance when back in London. Excited at meeting someone who knew something - anything - about magic, Crowley asked him if he was the Master that he was looking for. Julian Baker was a man honest about his limitations: he said no, he wasn't, but that he could introduce Crowley to someone he knew who was a better alchemist than he was himself - he meant Cecil Jones, of course.

No way was Crowley going to let slip the opportunity that Julian Baker had offered him. The two of them did meet in London and in October - presumably when Cecil Jones was in London for a few days - Julian Baker introduced Jones and Crowley to each other. Thereafter Crowley pursued Cecil Jones more than Julian Baker, even going to stay with him in Basingstoke so that he could learn from him. However, Crowley says that it was Julian Baker who first introduced him to the theory and practice of astral travelling; and to the safeguards anyone should set in place before doing magic. And it was Julian Baker who first mentioned to Crowley the existence of a "Brotherhood of Initiates who jealously guard the perfect knowledge of God, nature and humanity" (that's the GD); though it was Cecil Jones who put forward Crowley's name to Mathers as a possible initiate.

Crowley was initiated into the GD in November 1898. I guess that it was on this occasion that Crowley, overawed by the ritual he was involved in, asked Julian "whether people often died during the ceremony". Julian reassured him. Crowley very quickly became disillusioned with the general mass of the GD's members, but always looked on both Julian and Cecil Jones as exceptions to his view that they were all mediocrities. When he got impatient with the study-material he was given, and moaned about it to them both, he did abide by their reply that he should accept the discipline of the study and the slowness of its progress. At least, he did at first. However, during 1899 he also batted on Allan Bennett to teach him on a one-to-one basis levels of magic that in the GD only 2nd Order members were allowed to do. Julian Baker doesn't seem to have taught Crowley much more; but that may be because this was time he was working at the University of Birmingham department of brewing, and he just wasn't around in London enough.

Living outside London he may have been but by April 1900 Julian had come to some conclusions about Crowley as a person; enough to make him regret having helped bring Crowley and the GD together. I don't know whether Julian was able to attend the relevant 2nd Order meeting in February 1900, the list of those who were present hasn't survived; but if he had been there, he would have been amongst those who voted to refuse Crowley initiation into the 2nd Order, despite Crowley having done all the work that was required and a great deal more. I daresay Julian was not surprised when Crowley refused to accept the vote, though probably even he didn't expect the amount of trouble Crowley would cause the GD in the aftermath of it.

Crowley went to Paris and got Mathers to give him the 2nd Order initiation; he also got Mathers to make him his envoy in London, to act for Mathers in bringing the GD back under Mathers' control. Crowley doesn't seem to have asked the advice of either Julian or Cecil Jones about doing his visit to Paris and what was agreed there. If he had asked them, it might have led to an argument between them, because the two friends didn't agree about Crowley. As the crisis developed, Julian described Crowley as "a man without principles", a dangerous lack that in his eyes outweighed any magical talent he might possess; whereas whatever Cecil Jones thought about Crowley on a personal level, he was prepared to overlook a great deal, in a man he thought was a particularly gifted magician.

Julian and Cecil Jones both got dragged into the problem of Crowley when Crowley returned to London to find himself still banned from being given documents restricted to 2nd Order members. The three of them, and Florence Farr (as the GD's senior member in London), got together - maybe several times - to try to find some sort of compromise. Inevitably, the subject of Mathers' increasingly autocratic behaviour as the GD's senior magician came up, and again Julian and Cecil Jones were on different sides of the argument. Cecil Jones stuck to the view that the GD would be useless without Mathers' experience and understanding of magic and ritual. Julian may have agreed with him on that point; but he felt that Mathers was behaving very badly as the Order's sole remaining Chief, and that he was a poor leader and manager. He had begun to think so several years before, when Mathers had expelled Annie Horniman from the Order for reasons that had nothing to do with magic; Julian had signed the petition to reinstate her.

The meeting or meetings about Crowley's difficulties didn't reach any conclusion, let alone a compromise that satisfied all parties. Crowley went ahead with a plan to take over the 2nd Order rooms at 36 Blythe Road on Mathers' behalf. And at the same time (but independently) a group of 2nd Order members set up a committee which would rule the GD in Mathers' stead. Julian might declare himself "sick of the whole business", but he was still willing to be made a member of the new committee. However, he was too busy at work to take any active part in preventing Crowley from carrying out his plan. Fearing the worst, he wrote to Edmund Hunter urging him to remove all the books and other 2nd Order ritual paraphernalia that were stored at the Mark Masons' Hall before Crowley could get his hands on them; apologising to Edmund for not being able to take time off work to do it himself. He told Edmund that "we must be prepared for anything" by way of response from Crowley - "a man without principles" - especially as Crowley had Mathers' authority to re-establish control of the Order.

Crowley did take possession of the rooms at 36 Blythe Road for a brief period; Edmund Hunter was amongst those who got him and his main conspirator, Elaine Simpson, thrown out again. A few days afterwards, Julian went to the 2nd Order meeting which voted to expel from the Order Crowley, Mathers, Elaine Simpson and several other members who had acted with them. That wasn't quite the end of it. Immediately after the meeting, the senior members of the GD, and Crowley, both consulted their lawyers: the GD to recover items that had gone missing from the rooms at 36 Blythe Road during the struggle for control of them; then Crowley because the GD's solicitor had said or written something about Elaine Simpson that Crowley thought was a slur on her reputation. Julian was asked by the 2nd Order to act as intermediary. He and Crowley met at the Holborn Restaurant on 24 May 1900. None of the threatened legal action reached court, so perhaps Baker's negotiating skills won the day; but as regards whatever was said or written about Elaine Simpson, it would have had to be Elaine herself who pursued a case - for libel or defamation - and she chose not to do so. Crowley never did go to a 2nd Order meeting or ritual so in the long run, Julian could be pleased with the outcome in that respect, but the whole affair did mark a certain parting of the ways between Julian and Cecil Jones. I can't find any evidence that Jones stayed in the GD after Mathers' expulsion, nor did he ever join either of its daughter orders; he chose to go with Crowley and did magic with Crowley on and off for the next ten years. Julian isn't mentioned by Crowley in the writings I've seen, after 1900, and I presume they didn't meet again. Julian and Cecil Jones' friendship continued, of course; but perhaps the subject of Crowley was one they agreed not to debate. Julian's anguish at the way Crowley and Cecil Jones parted company in 1911 must have been great (see my biography of Cecil Jones for what happened); but I doubt if Julian was surprised.

AFTER THE GOLDEN DAWN

1900 was the year that Julian started work for Watney Combe Reid and Co; 1901 was the year he got married. What with his exasperation at the GD's inability to lead a quiet life, and the big changes he was making in his professional and personal life, it's not surprising that Julian doesn't figure in accounts of the last days of the original GD, the period from May 1900 to spring 1903. He may also have felt that the GD wasn't quite the same without Cecil Jones in it: however, he did return to help the GD at yet another of its times of crisis.

During the spring of 1903 the GD finally split into two camps, the mystical and the magical (very roughly speaking) led by A E Waite and Robert William Felkin. Julian opted to go with Waite: he was one of the 14 members of the 2nd Order who signed the Manifesto of Independence in July 1903 and announced the founding of the Independent and Rectified Order or Rite. The IRRO/R was consecrated on 7 November 1903 and lasted until Waite closed it down in 1914. I don't know how active a role Julian Baker played in the IRRO/R after its first year, though I would think he would have found it difficult to be very committed, with all the other work he had taken on, and especially after he and his family moved out of London. Perhaps the yeasts and sugars that he worked on every day at Watney Combe Reid and Co, and the gardening he enjoyed once he had settled in Berkshire, were alchemy enough for him.

BASIC SOURCES I USED for all Golden Dawn members.

Membership of the Golden Dawn: The Golden Dawn Companion by R A Gilbert. Northampton: The Aquarian Press 1986. Between pages 125 and 175, Gilbert lists the names, initiation dates and addresses of all those people who became members of the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn or its many daughter Orders between 1888 and 1914. The list is based on the Golden Dawn's administrative records and its Members' Roll - the large piece of parchment on which all new members signed their name at their initiation. All this information had been inherited by Gilbert but it's now in the Freemasons' Library at the United Grand Lodge of England building on Great Queen Street Covent Garden. Please note, though, that the records of the Amen-Ra Temple in Edinburgh were destroyed in 1900/01. As far as I know, the records of the Horus Temple at Bradford have not survived either.

Family history: freebmd; ancestry.co.uk (census and probate); findmypast.co.uk; familysearch; Burke's Peerage and Baronetage; Burke's Landed Gentry; Armorial Families; thepeerage.com; and a wide variety of family trees on the web.

Famous-people sources: mostly about men, of course, but very useful even for the female members of GD. Oxford Dictionary of National Biography. Who Was Who. Times Digital Archive.

Useful source for business and legal information: London Gazette and its Scottish counterpart Edinburgh Gazette. Now easy to find (with the right search information) on the web.

Catalogues: British Library; Freemasons' Library.

Wikipedia; Google; Google Books - my three best resources. I also used other web pages, but with some caution, as - from the historian's point of view - they vary in quality a great deal.

SOURCES FOR JULIAN BAKER

THE BUCKMAN FAMILY - Julian's mother. AND THE CONNECTION WITH THE NORMAN FAMILY

The common ancestor is John Buckman.

Marriage of John Buckman to Mary Bishop in August 1795: see freepages.genealogy.rootsweb.ancestry.com/~wragg44/leigh/leighvol4.htm

James Buckman is the well-known son of John and Mary Buckman of Cheltenham. He's in the Oxford Dictionary of National Biography - see their web page at www.oxforddnb.com. The ODNB entry mentions brother Edwin and Benjamin Norman as a brother-in-law in business with Edwin; but no other family members apart from the parents are mentioned.

Geology and Religion: A History of Harmony and Hostility editor Martina Kölbl-Ebert. London: Geological Society c2009.

Norman's History of Cheltenham by John Goding published 1863 p576 events in 1848 included the death of Benjamin Norman "A few weeks" ago; information originally in The Examiner issue of 30 August [1848].

James Buckman's brother Edwin Buckman was the only member of the family whose baptism was at familysearch.

Bankruptcy of Edwin Buckman and Benjamin Norman: see London Gazette p3505 couldn't see the full date but it's 1844

Edwin Buckman the artist is the eldest son of Edwin Buckman. Harry George Buckman the third son is the wood engraver; he was Edwin the artist's executor when he died in 1930.

At www.allposters.co.uk see posters of works by Edwin Buckman.

Via genesunited to Gloucester Citizen and other papers in that area issue of 16 October 1930 obituary of Edwin Buckman the artist.

BESSIE HELEN BUCKMAN on the assumption that she is niece of James Buckman and therefore first cousin of GD member Katherine Julian Buckman.

JOHN BISHOP BUCKMAN. Familysearch had no baptism details for this man.

At www.cheltenham4u.co.uk there's the 1858-59 edition of Slater's Commercial Directory of Cheltenham which shows him as the lessee of 392 High Street, assembly and club rooms.

PO Directory of Gloucestershire edition of 1863 p226, p238.

Familysearch digital folder 004273261 records the marriage of Albinia Crole to John Bishop Buckman at St James Swansea 6 June 1843.

The exact date of Albinia Buckman's death is given in a probate registry document from 1865.

British Spas from 1815 to the Present: A Social History by Phyllis May Hembry, Leonard W Cowle, Evelyn R Cowle 1997. London: Athlone 1997 p200

THE PROOF THAT BESSIE HELEN IS DAUGHTER OF JOHN BISHOP BUCKMAN: at www.swansea.gov.uk the web pages of Swansea Record Office: their access number D/D Z 97/15 a lease dated 30 November 1864.

Death of John Bishop Buckman in February 1895, and the names of his executors: Probate Registry entry.

FLORENCE FARR'S YEARLY INCOME

Florence Farr: Bernard Shaw's New Woman by Josephine Johnson. Gerrard's Cross: Colin Smythe 1975: p13.

THE BAKER FAMILY - Julian's father's family

LOVELL SELDEN BAKER and A Barwin and Co

London Gazette 27 September 1887 p5281 list of dissolv partnerships

Commercial Gazette 16 March 1892 had the firm A Barwin and Co being run by an F G Honchin or poss Hguchin (sic).

Marriage of Julian and Eveleen's son Patrick

Times 27 November 1940 p7 marriage announcement Patrick Baker to Helen Gardner.

Seen via genesunited: Slough Eton and Windsor Observer 29 January 1910 p4 marriage announcement: Ernest Gardner and Amy Inglis Laurie.

At www.bbc.co.uk Your Paintings page has a portrait by David Lee in 1894 of Sir Ernest Gardner as mayor of Maidenhead.

Who's Who issue 1916 p773.

This was the only information I could find that was definitely about a child of Julian and Eveleen.

CATHERINE LUCY PAUL

At www.cliftonrfchistory.co.uk some information on her first husband Arthur Clifford Saint Paul. London Gazette 16 October 1956 page of notices under Section 27 of the Trustee Act 1925.

JULIAN'S WORKING LIFE

A good statistical introduction to chemistry as a profession in this period is on the web at www.euchems.eu, article by Anna Simmons of the Open University: Working in a Transitional Territory? Chemical Consultants in the United Kingdom 1870-1914. Read at the 6th International Conference on the History of Chemistry. I think the publication's title is Neighbours and Territories: the Evolving Identity of Chemistry: pp555-563.

Who's Who in Science (International) edited by H H Stephenson. London: J and A Churchill 1912 p38.

Who Was Who 1951-60 p56.

The obituary of Julian by Cecil Jones: The Analyst issue 985 April 1958: 187-88.

Perdurabo: The Life of Aleister Crowley by Richard Kaczynski. Berkeley CA: NAH Books orig 2000 this revised ed 2010: pp52-53.

A reminiscence of the life of Julian Baker by Professor A C Chibnall: Times 8 February 1958 p8.

EDUCATION

City of London School

Our Schools and Colleges: Volume I Boys by Frederick Shirley de Carteret-Bisson. London: 1879; p703.

Finsbury Technical College

The University of London 1858-1900: the Politics of Senate and Convocation by F M G Willson. The Boydell Press 2004 pp462-463.

Via archive.org to Moritz's A Text-Book of the Science of Brewing London, New York: E and F N Spon 1891: piii

A History of Beer and Brewing by Ian Spencer Hornsey. Cambridge: Royal Society of Chemistry 2003: p13 is quite useful as an overview; p587.

The Dynamics of the International Brewing Industry by Richard George Wilson and Terence Richard Gourvish. London: Routledge 1998 p101.

FORSTER, Martin Onslow is in wikipedia

MORGAN, Gilbert Thomas

Via archiveshub.ac.uk to material held at the Imperial College of Science, Technology and Medicine as file GB 98 B/MORGAN

Morgan is in wikipedia but only in German!

LONDON BEETROOT SUGAR ASSOCIATION

I couldn't find an exact date for the Association's founding but The Sugar Cane volume 17 1885 p132 says it existed by December 1884.

Treatise on the Law of Arbitration in Scotland by J C Irons and R D Melville. W Green 1903 p92.

Sugar, Cane and Beet: An Object Lesson by George Martineau. London: Sir Isaac Pitman and Sons Ltd in their series Pitman's Common Commodities of Commerce. 1910. Chapter XII p133-136.

The Digest: Annotated British Commonwealth and European Cases: Contract volumes 11-12. Butterworth 2001 p253 on an important case about breach of contract.

The Risk Controllers: Central Counterparty Clearing in Globalised Financial Markets by Peter Norman. Chichester: Wiley 2011.

ARTHUR ROBERT LING: via www.ncbi.nih.gov to back issues of the Biochemical Journal. Issue of September 1937 volume 31 number 9: 1439-40.

JULIAN'S TIME AT UNIVERSITY OF BIRMINGHAM

Only Cecil Jones' obituary mentions that he did this.

BROWN, ADRIAN JOHN is in wikipedia and there's an obituary via www.ncbi.nih.gov back issues of Biochemical Journal volume 14 number 1 February 1920: 1-3.

WATNEY, COMBE, REID AND CO

Are in wikipedia

Introduction to archives of Watney Combe Reid Ltd held at the London Metropolitan Archive as their reference ACC/2979.

THE PATENTS JULIAN HELD all from his time at Watney Combe Reid and Co:

His own:

At abebooks you could (24 March 2014) buy a copy of UK patent application 7921 for an improved method of treating and drying brewers' and distillers' yeast for use as a manure. Author: JLB. Published HMSO 1903. This patent was granted as 1904 GB190307921: see the details at www.patentmaps.com where you can also see information on the other two:

- The 1905 patent held jointly with Arthur Robert Ling: GB190416992-A
- The 1912 patent GB191123839.

Assigned to him, presumably for items he had not worked on - the 1925 piece of equipment is a bit outside his normal range of expertise. Again, see the details at www.patentmaps.com:

- 1925 GB235646-A
- 1944 GB564895-A.

HULTON, H F EVERARD

I found a little family history information on Everard Hulton, and one or two publications in which he was sole author:

Report on the Relation of the Nitrogenous Matter in Barley to Brewing Value by H F E Hulton. Originally in the Journal of the Institute of Brewing volume 28 number 1 as a Supplement; but then published as a pamphlet, by the Institute.

The British Library catalogue doesn't have a copy of the 1922 Report. It had only one item by Hulton: Beer published London: no details of a publisher but the year was 1934. A copy of this I found on amazon said that it was a publication of the 16th Streatfield Memorial Lecture, given by Hulton in 1933.

DAY, FRANK E

The Analyst volume 38 1913: p186a announced the election of F E Day B Sc as a member of the Society of Public Analysts.

List of Research Workers, Agriculture and Forestry, in the British Commonwealth issued by the Imperial Agricultural Bureau 1929 p97.

Records of Rothamsted Staff 1929 issued by the Rothamsted Experimental Station, Harpenden; p64.

Snippet seen via google: Journal of the Institute of Brewing issued 1936 p183 mentions that Day was dead. I couldn't identify his death on freebmd.

WARD, T J, Julian's co-author from 1935. I tried to find out about him on the web, but was defeated by the number of other people with those initials, including an American sportsman; so I gave up.

MEMBERSHIPS

Chemical Society:

The Chemical News and Journal of Physical Science volume 67 1893 p105.

At pubs.rsc.org Proceedings of the Chemical Society of London volume 9 number 119 issued 9 February 1893; with John Frederick Briggs and Julian L Baker next to each other in a list of men whose certificates in chemistry were being approved by the Society.

Proceedings of the Chemical Society volumes 9-10 1895 p29 and p89.

Journal of the Chemical Society volume 73 1898 p7.

Society of Chemical Industry:

Via archive.org to the earliest issue of the Journal of the Society of Chemical Industry that I could find on the web: volume XIII 1894. London: Eyre and Spottiswoode: piii Julian Baker and pxiii.

On the London group: via archive.org to Journal of the Society of Chemical Industry volume XVII 1897 piii, p4

As a member of the Society's publication committee: Journal of the Society of Chemical Industry volume 33 part 1 1914 p381. And Journal of the Society of Chemical Industry volume 62 1943 p62.

Royal Institute of Chemistry:

Royal Institute of Chemistry Register of Fellows, Associates and Students issued 1901: p13.

Via archive.org to Journal and Proceedings of the Institute of Chemistry of Great Britain and Ireland. 1921 part 1.

Institute of Brewing:

At onlinelibrary.wiley.com, Wiley Online Library, Journal of the Institute of Brewing volume 20 number 10 1922/23 p786 as part of the Report of the Malt Analysis Committee there's a list of the current members of the Standing Committee on Analysis: Alfred Chaston Chapman FRS FIC is its chair; Julian Levett Baker, Everard Hulton, A R Ling and Dr E R Moritz are all members. But Cecil Jones isn't.

Times 14 July 1905 p14.

Times 6 Feb 1909 p13.

THOSE BIG CONFERENCES

Society of Chemical Industry AGM 1905: Handbook of London and Provincial Excursions published for the Society by Spottiswoode and Co. Edited for the Society by Julian but compiled by Miss E Daniels (BA London).

Seventh International Congress of Applied Chemistry published in 6 volumes, editors Sir William Ramsay and William MacNab. London: Partridge and Cooper Ltd 1910. Unnumbered first volume p6, p8, p11, p43, p45, p102, p105, p113, p143-44, p156, p160, p206, p211, p221. And a separate volume - I'm not sure which one but found via google - p6, p105 for the two papers Julian was involved with that were given at the Congress.

Julian at Funerals

Times 21 October 1932 p17.

Times 17 July 1937 p17.

Times 5 Apr 1940 p11.

THE RESEARCH ON BABY FOODS

Reports to the Local Government Board on Public Health and Medical Subjects New Series number 80 Food Reports number 20. 1914. For references to this piece of research in other journals and modern works of history, see my file on Julian's Publications.

THE BIT OF WAR WORK

Journal of the Society of Chemical Industry issued 31 July 1917 reproduced with permission in Journal of the Institute of Brewing volume 23 number 6 1917 pp353-54 as an editorial: Julian's Use of Brewers' Yeast in Bread Making, originally read at a meeting of the Society. Via archive.org to Nature volume 100 September 1917-February 1918 for more details.

Use of brewers' yeast in traditional bread-making: see English Bread and Yeast Cookery by Elizabeth David. London: Allen Lane 1977 and Penguin Books 1979.

If you want to see more details of Julian's publications, follow the link HERE.

BAKER AND THE OCCULT

www.lashtal.com/wiki/Aleister\_Crowley\_Timeline website run by the Aleister Crowley Society.

The two versions of The Confessions:

The Spirit of Solitude: an Autohagiography subseq re-Antichristened The Confessions of Aleister Crowley. London: Mandrake Press Museum St 1929. This version ends at 1904. Volume 1 p229, p243. Volume 2 p40.

The Confessions of Aleister Crowley: An Autohagiography editors John Symonds and Kenneth Grant, pubd London, Boston, Henley: Routledge and Kegan Paul 1979: p16, p164-65, p172, p178, p194, p224.

A version of The Confessions is on the web at Www.hermetic.com/crowley/confessions:

Kabbala Denudata or The Kabbalah Unveiled translated by Samuel Liddell Mathers. Most GD members will have known this work from the 1887 edition. However, it's more likely that Crowley had bought a copy of the 1898 edition issued in London by Kegan Paul Trench Trübner.

Perdurabo: The Life of Aleister Crowley by Richard Kaczynski. Berkeley CA: NAH Books orig 2000 this revised ed 2010 p55, p61, p76.

AFTERMATH OF BLYTHE ROAD:

--

GD 2/4/3/23 is a letter from Causae Scientiae to "Care Frater"; JLB says at the end of it "greetings to Deo Date" [ie Dorothea Hunter] ((so recip almost cert Edmund Hunter)). Dtd 19 April 1900 on hdd paper: Stamford ?Bendham Road Upper Tooting. ((I think this is part of the new cttee-led GD)): JLB and recip have been made resp f rituals. In this context JLB has just heard from Florence Farr "that Blackden has thrown in his lot with Crowley"; so JLB urges the recip to take possn of "all our belongings" still at the Mark Masons' Hall bef Crowley cld do so, and keep them at his house f the time being ((actually Blackden got there first)). JLB wld do the taking possn himself but he'll be busy in the City f the next few days.

Letter is warning recip that anything might happen next. He says "we must be prepd f anything" and what he's worried abt is Crowley, "a man without principles": "one never knows to what lengths a man like Crowley will go" when he has been gvn "a free hand by Mathers".

Letter ends by saying JLB and the recip will meet on Sat.

--

GD 2/4/3/27a is a long but m corrected a/c of the mtg of the 21 April 1900. Amongst those present at the mtg: PWB; Helen Rand; JLB; WBY who gave a speech abt fraud, and noting that in the past few years one Chief had d and n been replaced ((Woodman)) and one Chief had stepped back/down and n been replaced ((WWW)) so that Mathers was now the only Chief, behaviour ever m "autocratic".

GD 2/4/3/37: typewritten order expelling those who had attempted to take control of the 2nd Order rooms on Mathers' behalf. 5 May 1900.

GD 2/4/3/38 series of letters and a bill for fees to Annie Horniman from solicitor Charles Russell of 31 Norfolk Street.

Meeting of Julian and Crowley at Holborn Restaurant: GD 2/4/3/40, short anonymous note written on Annie Horniman's notepaper.

THE INDEPENDENT RITE

A E Waite: A Magician of Many Parts by R A Gilbert. Wellingborough Northants 1987: p178 Appendix C.

22 April 2014

Find the web pages of Roger Wright and Sally Davis, including my list of people initiated into the Order of the Golden Dawn between 1888 and 1901, at:

www.wrightanddavis.co.uk

***

Golden Dawn member Julian Levett Baker: list of publications

The list below is definitely not complete. In his biography of Julian Baker's acquaintance Aleister Crowley, Richard Kaczynski says he found 50 publications in which Baker was author or co-author. Below I list all the ones that I've come across; most of them have been spotted using google.

THE FACT THAT THERE ARE 50 PUBLICATIONS:

Perdurabo: The Life of Aleister Crowley by Richard Kaczynski. Berkeley CA: NAH Books orig 2000 this revised ed 2010 p52. Some of them are listed on p580.

PUBLICATIONS I'VE FOUND THE DETAILS OF - a drop in the ocean, as I say above.

Chemical News and Journal of Industrial Science volume 71 1895: Octaestylmaltose by Arthur R Ling and Julian L Baker. The founder and editor of this magazine was Golden Dawn member Sir William Crookes.

The Brewing Industry Julian L Baker FIC FCS. Published 1905 London: Methuen and Co of 36 Essex St London WC in their series Books on Business.

Julian edits The Analyst from 1907 to 1920. It was a magazine for working chemists, publishing abstracts of longer articles.

Chemical News and Journal of Physical Science volume 98 1908 index p131 lists two articles involving Julian: Action of the Enzymes of Malt on Ungerminated Cereals, in which he's co-author with Everard Hulton. Preparation of Pure Maltose, in which his co-author is F E Day.

Encyclopaedia Britannica 11th edition published 1910-11 in 29 volumes: article on Fermentation. This article received an early quote in Béchamp or Pasteur? A Lost Chapter in the History of Biology by Ethel Douglas Hume. London: Simpkin Marshall Hamilton Kent and Co Ltd 1923: p161.

On the 11th edition: Encyclopaedias: their History through the Ages by Robert L Collison. NY, London: Hafner 1964 and a lot of editions since then.

The magazine Commercial Organic Analysis was taken over by Alfred Henry Allen in 1913. He renamed it Allen's Commercial Organic Analysis and that's how it seems to be most widely known. In the 1913 edition volume 1 there's an article by Julian as sole author: Malt and Malt Liquors. It seems to be still in the edition from 1924, by which time the compilers are Alfred Henry Allen with Samuel S Sadtler, Elbert C Lathrop and Charles A Mitchell.

by Alfred Henry Allen 1913

Reports to the Local Government Board on Public Health and Medical Subjects New Series number 80 Food Reports number 20. 1914. It consisted of these 2 reports:

1 = F J H Coutts: On the Use of Proprietary Foods for Infant Feeding.

2 = JLB: On the Analysis and Composition of Some Proprietary Foods for Infants.

Via lib3.dss.go.th: abstract of Julian's research in The Analyst volume 39 October 1914: 456-71.

References to it at the time:

- Parliamentary Papers, House of Commons and Command volume 25 1914: Appendix 1 p20
- British Medical Journal 1915 p77
- British Food Journal volume 18 1916: p265
- The Chemical Examination of Water, Sewage and Food by John E Purvis and Thomas R Hodgson. Cambridge Public Health Series: Cambridge University Press 1922. Chapter II: p140.

Some more modern references:

War is Good For Babies and other Young Children: A History of the Infant and Child Welfare Movement in England 1898-1918 by Deborah Dwork. London and NY: Tavistock Pubns 1987 p251, p268.

Article: Infant Foods in the United Kingdom from Victorian Times to the Present Day; by W F J Cuthbertson, in Infant Nutrition editors A F Walker and B A Rolls. London: Chapman and Hall 1994.

Journal of the Chemical Society Transactions volume 105 1914: 1529-36. The Action of Diastase on Starch Granules Part 1. By Julian and Hulton. This was obviously the first of a set of articles; but I couldn't find any of the rest of the set, at least, not on the web. Perhaps the war meant that the rest were never published.

Original Gravity Tables Computed to Hundredths of a Degree, from the table attached to the Finance Act 1914 (Session 2). It's another work with two authors but as G C Jones FIC is listed first, he probably did most of the preparatory work; Julian L Baker FIC as listed as co-author. Originally published in The Brewers' Journal 1915, then issued as a pamphlet, again by the The Brewers' Journal of Eastcheap Bldgs London EC; price 2/6. There's no publication date on the British Library's copy but the BL stamp says "15MAY15".

The Analyst volumes 41-42 1916. In this edition Julian is editor but also a contributor with co-author H F E Hulton: on p355 continuing on p383: Analytical Examination of Acorns and Horse Chestnuts. It's an abstract of an article originally published in Proceedings of the Society of Public Analysts etc.

Journal of the Chemical Society Transactions Part 1 1917: article by Julian and H F E Hulton: ?Evidence of the Existence in Malt of an Enzyme Hydrolysing the Furfuroids of Barley (their question mark).

Journal of the Society of Chemical Industry issued 31 July 1917 reproduced with permission in Journal of the Institute of Brewing volume 23 number 6 1917 pp353-54 as an editorial: Julian's article: Use of Brewers' Yeast in Bread Making, originally read at a meeting of the Society.

Chemical News and Journal of Industrial Society volumes 121-122 1920 p426: the announcement that Julian had resigned from the post of editor of the magazine The Analyst in order to take up the job of editor of the Journal of the Institute of Brewing.

Julian retires as editor of The Analyst in 1920, in order to take over as editor of the Journal of the Institute of Brewing. He continues as the Journal's editor until 1949.

At www.biochemj.org, Biochemical Journal volume LXXIII 1920 pp754-56: The Iodimetric Estimation of Sugars, by Julian and Henry Francis Everard Hulton.

At pubs.rsc.org a series of publications by Julian and Hulton which appeared in the Journal of the Chemical Society. To make the little list below a bit more intelligible: the Journal was published as Transactions from 1878 to 1925 with volume numbers; but in 1925 the word 'transactions' was dropped and so were the volume numbers.

- Journal of the Chemical Society Transactions volume 119 1921: 805-09. Amylases of the Cereal Grains - Rye. By Julian and Hulton.
- Journal of the Chemical Society Transactions volume 121 1922: 1929-34. Amylases of the Cereal Grain - the "insoluble" amylase of barley. By Julian and Hulton.
- Journal of the Chemical Society 1929: 1655-60. Amylases of the Cereal Grains - Oats. By Julian and Hulton.

At www.biochemj.org there are issues of Biochemical Journal. In volume 27 1933: 1040: the Removal of Sugars from Dilute Solutions, by JLB and H F E Hulton "from the Stag Brewery, Pimlico".

Seen at onlinelibrary.wiley.com: Journal of the Institute of Brewing volume 40 number 2 March-April 1934 pp171-73: the Estimation of Carbon Dioxide in Beer, by Julian and H F E Hulton.

Seen at onlinelibrary.wiley.com: Journal of the Institute of Brewing volume 41 number 5 September 1935 p376: note on the Occurrence of the Khapra Beetle in Malt Lofts. By Julian, this time with co-author T J Ward. And on the same page another article: the Separation of Products Rising from the Enzymic Hydrolysis of Starch, by Julian and his usual co-author H F E Hulton.

Journal of the Chemical Society volume 93 1937 p1749 Julian's obituary of Henry Edward Armstrong.

Journal of the Institute of Brewing volume 48 1942: p70 hydrolysis of Potato and Malt Starches by Malt Amylase, with Julian as sole author. This was the latest article by Julian that I was able to spot on the web.

22 April 2014

Amandragora@attglobal.net

Find the web pages of Roger Wright and Sally Davis, including my list of people initiated into the Order of the Golden Dawn between 1888 and 1901, at:

http://pws.prserv.net/Roger\_Wright/

***

Oswald BARCLAY was initiated into the Golden Dawn in February 1897 as a member of its Amen-Ra temple in Edinburgh. He took the Latin motto "Nota bene". His address at the time of his initiation was 11 Picardy Place Edinburgh.

It hasn't been easy for me to identify the members of GD's Amen-Ra group and follow their lives, because living in London I haven't been able to get to historical records for Scotland that aren't on the web, or for which you have to pay a lot. However, the name 'Oswald Barclay' is a rare one. There were only three people with that name in the UK on the 1891 census; and two of those were only six years old. I am suggesting that the GD's Oswald Barclay is the third of the three 1891 Oswald Barclays, who was living at 23 Union Place Edinburgh on the day of the census. He told the census official that he had been born in 1872 in England, so using the usual family history sources, I searched for him there.

Oswald Barclay was born early in 1872. His parents were Thomas, a gun maker by profession who had been born in Limehouse, London; and Emma, born in Staffordshire. On the day of the 1881 census Thomas and Emma had five children living at home - William who was working in a bank; Clara who was doing an apprenticeship as a dressmaker; Ernest, Oswald and Beatrice who were all at school. The census official didn't note anything for Emma in the box for 'income' and it's likely she didn't have any paid work. Instead she was at home running the household and doing the childcare - helped only by her daughters, I should imagine, as the family did not employ a live-in servant. Instead they had a lodger, James Paraham, who added to Emma's work but provided an extra source of income.

19th century census officials weren't interested in who anyone's employer was, only what kind of work they did, so I don't know where Thomas Barclay was working in 1881. He had been around in his time, though: William had been born in Québec; Clara and Ernest were born in Plymouth and Oswald in Portsea, a suburb of Portsmouth; then the family had crossed the Atlantic once again, in time for Beatrice to be born in Nova Scotia. Then they had returned to England and in 1881 were living in Stratford, then a new suburb on the north-east edge of London. Based on the information Thomas Barclay gave to the census official in 1901, he seems to have been working for the British Army, in its ordnance department; so naturally he and his family, went where he was sent; by 1891 he was a master armourer - skilled and experienced. He'd moved at least twice more and was in Daventry with daughter Beatrice; and he and Emma had had one more child, a daughter Maud, who'd been born in Newcastle-upon-Tyne.

If he was like most lower-class boys of his generation, Oswald left school aged 15 or so (around 1887) and got work. In the late 19th century, on the back of Empire and increased levels of bureaucracy, there was a huge increase in the number of jobs in offices, and Oswald told the 1891 census official he was a clerk. In 1909 he was working for the Inland Revenue at its offices in Gayfield Square Edinburgh; he'd probably been employed in the tax office all his working life and continued there until his retirement. His most senior appointment was as Assessor to the Commissioners of Income Tax for Edinburgh, which he achieved in 1920

I think Oswald may have arrived in Scotland only a short while before the 1891 census day, because his mother and sisters Clara and Maude had come with him and were all living together at the Union Place address. Once again, Emma Barclay had taken in a lodger to help her through a tricky time financially; Henry Perkins, a dental student, was living with the Barclays. Certainly by 1901 and probably later in 1891, though, Emma returned to Daventry where she and Thomas were still living (surely the longest they'd spent in one place in all their married life) with Maud (or Maud - census officials can't agree on it) who was now 13.

Oswald Barclay of the GD was not on the 1901 census; he was probably taking a holiday. Having got the job in Scotland he doesn't seem to have wanted to move away and he soon got involved in local life, through freemasonry. By 1896 he had been initiated into lodges 1, 83 and 97 (I believe they are all Scottish ones). In March 1896 he became a corresponding member of the English lodge Quatuor Coronati number 2076, giving 17 Picardy Place Edinburgh as his address. Quatuor Coronati had several GD members amongst its full members but as a corresponding member only, there was no requirement for Oswald Barclay to attend any lodge meetings and I couldn't find that he had done so in the accounts that I looked at, in Quatuor Coronati's Transactions volumes published around the time of his GD initiation. I don't think that it was the English Quatuor Coronati members that were WHO HE KNEW IN THE GOLDEN DAWN - it's more likely to be someone who was a fellow freemason in Scotland. Scotland is completely separate from England for the purposes of freemasonry and has its own archives, in Scotland; so I haven't been able to find out many details of Oswald Barclay's career as a freemason. However, an archive now at Cornell University includes a book on the history of the Royal Arch Chapter of Edinburgh from 1778 to 1911 in which he's listed amongst its most senior officers.

Oswald Barclay's life didn't just revolve around freemasonry, however. In 1909 he was made a fellow of the Royal Society of Antiquarians Edinburgh. And he also became a Justice of the Peace (JP).

It was probably the heights he'd reached in the civil service that led to his appointment as a Deputy Lieutenant for the City and County of Edinburgh in 1926; by this time his address was 17 Carlton Terrace. Being made a Deputy Lieutenant gets you onto government and royal lists for attendance at official functions. As a result, Oswald Barclay began to get some coverage in the Times: in August 1928 he went to the funeral of Lord Haldane at Gleneagles; in 1934 he was chosen by the Duke of Atholl to serve on a committee distributing the money raised by the Duke of Atholl's fund; in the 1920s and 1930s he attended garden parties and dinners given by a series of Lord High Commissioners, the King's official representatives in Scotland; in 1940 he went to the memorial service for Lord Tweedsmuir.

He was made a CBE in the New Year's Honours' List of January 1933 and made a trip to London to collect it at the investiture held by George V on Thursday 23 February 1933.

Not once does any of the coverage I've found for Oswald Barclay mention his going to any event with a wife and family; so I think he remained a bachelor. I haven't been able to discover the date of his death.

BASIC SOURCES I USED for all Golden Dawn members.

Membership of the Golden Dawn: The Golden Dawn Companion by R A Gilbert. Northampton: The Aquarian Press 1986. Between pages 125 and 175, Gilbert lists the names, initiation dates and addresses of all those people who became members of the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn or its many daughter Orders between 1888 and 1914. The list is based on the Golden Dawn's administrative records and its Members' Roll - the large piece of parchment on which all new members signed their name at their initiation. All this information had been inherited by Gilbert but it's now in the Freemasons' Library at the United Grand Lodge of England building on Great Queen Street Covent Garden.

Family history: freebmd; ancestry.co.uk (census and probate); findmypast.co.uk; familysearch; Burke's Peerage and Baronetage; Burke's Landed Gentry; Armorial Families; thepeerage.com; and a wide variety of family trees on the web.

Famous-people sources: mostly about men, of course, but very useful even for the female members of GD. Oxford Dictionary of National Biography. Who Was Who. Times Digital Archive.

Catalogues: British Library; Freemasons' Library.

Wikipedia; Google; Google Books - my three best resources. I also used other web pages, but with some caution, as - from the historian's point of view - they vary in quality a great deal.

Sources specific to Oswald Barclay:

Proceedings of the Society, that is, the Royal Society of Antiquarians in Edinburgh. Oswald Barclay was elected a Fellow at a meeting held on 10 May 1909; giving as his address for correspondent, the Inland Revenue Office at 17 Gayfield Square Edinburgh.

Scottish Law Times volume 2 1920 p55 announcement that Oswald Barclay JP had been appointed assessor to the Commissioners of Income Tax for the Royalty Division of Edinburgh.

London Gazette 10 September 1926 p5912 announcement that Oswald Barclay JP of 17 Carlton Terrace Edinburgh had been appointed a Deputy Lieutenant; issued by the Lord Lieutenant of the City and County of Edinburgh.

London Gazette 2 January 1933 p8, the New Year's Honours List: Oswald Barclay JP DL was made a CBE.

Times; Oswald Barclay didn't appear in it before the 1920s.

Find the web pages of Roger Wright and Sally Davis, including my list of people initiated into the Order of the Golden Dawn between 1888 and 1901, at:

www.wrightanddavis.co.uk

***

James Barraclough was initiated into the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn at its Horus Temple in Bradford in March 1894, choosing the motto 'Speranza'. At the time he was living at 83 Sydenham Place Bradford. He never seems to have pursued the interest that led him to accept the offer of membership.

James Barraclough is one of my failures: I haven't been able to identify him. I could probably have done a much better job of it if I lived in the Bradford area myself - I could at least have found out a bit more about him by pursuing the address he gave the GD - 83 Sydenham Place - through local directories and electoral registers. I did wonder if I could get lucky and find him on the 1891 census. But Barraclough is a common surname in the Bradford area; and on the day of the 1891 census there were 92 men and boys living in the city.

No one called James Barraclough was a member of the Theosophical Society; and the Freemasons' Library catalogue has no reference to a freemason with that name. Theosophy and freemasonry were two fruitful recruiting grounds for the Golden Dawn. If he isn't involved in either of those, and I don't even know his age...

I make one suggestion and it's a long shot: James Barraclough might have been a member of the Barraclough family of clock and watch-makers. John Barraclough is the best known of them, largely because of the clock he made for the Brontë family which is still in the parsonage at Howarth. As clock-makers, they would have been known to T H Pattinson, the owner of a clock and jewellery business in the centre of the city and one of the most influential members of the GD in Bradford. John Barraclough had a son James; but this James Barraclough was born in 1825 which makes him older than all but two of the GD members I've identified. A grandson of John - born around 1850, say - would be a more likely GD member. I couldn't find such a person, so I have given up.

See archiver.rootsweb.com for the descendants of John Barraclough, the Howarth clock-maker. John Barraclough had several descendants with the name 'James'. The GD member might be one of these; I only suggest it because T H Pattinson, senior figure in the GD at Bradford, was a watch-maker and jeweller and would have known the Barraclough family.

Watchmakers and Clockmakers of the World volume 2 p14 has some information on the Barraclough clock-making family. There is also some information on the web, mostly on the John Barraclough I've mentioned above.

BASIC SOURCES I USED for all Golden Dawn members.

Membership of the Golden Dawn: The Golden Dawn Companion by R A Gilbert. Northampton: The Aquarian Press 1986. Between pages 125 and 175, Gilbert lists the names, initiation dates and addresses of all those people who became members of the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn or its many daughter Orders between 1888 and 1914. The list is based on the Golden Dawn's administrative records and its Members' Roll - the large piece of parchment on which all new members signed their name at their initiation. All this information had been inherited by Gilbert but it's now in the Freemasons' Library at the United Grand Lodge of England building on Great Queen Street Covent Garden. Please note, though, that the records of the Amen-Ra Temple in Edinburgh were destroyed in 1900/01. The records of the Horus Temple at Bradford have not survived beyond 1896 either, but there's a history of the TS in Bradford on the web (though originally written in 1941) at www.ts-bradford.org.uk/theosoc/btshisto.htm in which a lot of the same people who joined the GD are mentioned. After surviving some difficult times in the 1890s, Bradford TS still seems to be going strong (as at December 2012). In April 2012 the History page was updated with the names of all the members at least up to 1941.

The members of the GD at its Horus Temple were rather a bolshy lot, and needed a lot of careful management!

Family history: freebmd; ancestry.co.uk (census and probate); findmypast.co.uk; familysearch; Burke's Peerage and Baronetage; Burke's Landed Gentry; Armorial Families; thepeerage.com; and a wide variety of family trees on the web.

Famous-people sources: mostly about men, of course, but very useful even for the female members of GD. Oxford Dictionary of National Biography. Who Was Who. Times Digital Archive.

Catalogues: British Library; Freemasons' Library.

Wikipedia; Google; Google Books - my three best resources. I also used other web pages, but with some caution, as - from the historian's point of view - they vary in quality a great deal.

6 February 2013

AMandragora@attglobal.net

Thomas Henry BEASLEY who was initiated into the Golden Dawn in October 1888 - one of its earliest members - and took the Latin motto 'Excelsus'. At that time he was living at 131 Prince of Wales Road, Kentish Town in north London. He didn't remain a member for long, though; he died very young.

I've found out very little about Thomas Henry Beasley which is a pity as - if I have identified him correctly - he's one of the more interesting GD members, as he seems to have made his way up (the Victorians would definitely consider this progress) during a short working lifetime from manual labour to an office job (albeit a very particular one). If I have identified him correctly; and I'm pretty sure I have, for reasons that will become very clear.

Beasley is a rather unusual surname but despite this, I haven't been able to find out anything, really, about Thomas Henry Beasley's early life. Between 1861 and 1881 he gave census officials data consistent with his having been born in or near Reading, about 1838 so this birth registration might be him: a male baby surname Beasley, forenames not recorded, registered in Reading in the quarter July-September 1838. I couldn't find a Thomas Beasley of the right age, still less a Thomas Henry Beasley, on the censuses of 1841 or 1851 so I have no information about his family.

This is probably him, though, on the 1861 census, living at 3 Rose Court in the St Giles parish of Reading, with his wife Sarah, née Langworthy; they had only just got married. Thomas Henry told the census official that he was a bricklayer. I'd love to know what happened in the next ten years: on the day of the 1871 census he had moved to 152 North Street Westminster. He and Sarah had had two daughters, Theodosia and Sarah, who'd both been born in Woolwich. And he was working - so he told the census official - as a police inspector. In 1881 he was still in the same job but had moved out of overcrowded Westminster to 109 Brixton Road Lambeth. He and Sarah had had three more children - Thomas Henry junior, born in Westminster, and Richard and Amy both born in Lambeth. Theodosia was still living at home; she was working as a dressmaker. Daughter Sarah was not at home on the day of the 1881 census; possibly she was working away from home although it's also possible that she had died in her early teens. The family had a lodger, a Miss Ann Wood. And Thomas Henry had achieved what Victorians understood to be the basis of middle-class-ness - he was earning enough for the family to employ one live-in servant. They were doing very nicely.

Senior officers of the Metropolitan Police were listed in the Post Office Directory for London. So I went to search the directories with reasonably high hopes of finding out a bit more about where Thomas Henry Beasley was working and how high in the Met he had got. I couldn't understand it when I couldn't find his name. However, in my searches for members of the GD I've got rather used to not being able to find people who ought to be easy to spot, and after going through several issues several times, I gave it up as a bad job. Several months later and looking for something else entirely, I found Thomas Henry Beasley in the Times; and realised that either there had been some confusion between him and the census officials, or that he had misled them a little: Thomas Henry Beasley worked for the coroner's office. Specifically for the County of Middlesex Central District coroner's office, where Dr George Danford Thomas was the senior official and Dr William Westcott was Danford Thomas' deputy. So Westcott is WHO BEASLEY KNEW IN THE GOLDEN DAWN.

The Times didn't normally cover inquests; but one in February 1884 was of more than local interest. It concerned the corpse of Thomas Baldwin of Litcham Street Kentish Town, who had died the previous week, allegedly of injuries inflicted by a police constable while the PC was taking him to the police station. Dr Danford Thomas was in charge of this inquest (I couldn't find any instance in the Times of Westcott and Beasley working at the same inquest). Mr Beasley, described in Times' report as "the coroner's officer", took the witness stand briefly at the end of the session to report that some new witnesses had come forward, other than those heard that day; so the inquest was adjourned. If the Times covered the subsequent hearings, Mr Beasley's part in them was not mentioned.

The following month the Times was back again in north London, for Dr Danford Thomas' inquest on a body that had taken some time to identify; and the report went into a bit more detail of what Thomas Henry Beasley's duties were as coroner's officer. In this case, it had been his task to get the corpse identified, and it had proved to be no easy task. Beasley had interviewed a man called Amos Parsons who had come to see the body in case it had turned out to be his cousin Mary Marshall, who had gone missing. However, on seeing the corpse and again at the inquest Parsons had stated it wasn't his missing relative, so Beasley had had to pursue other possibilities and it had taken him a while to establish that the corpse was Mary Ann Yates. I'm not quite sure why the case of Mary Ann Yates should appear in one of the many journals that (still!) follow Jack the Ripper, as the authors are quite sure the Ripper didn't kill her; but an article in Ripper Notes in 2005 gave more information on the inquest and Thomas Henry Beasley's part in the investigation of the death. Mary Ann Yates was strangled, in her room at 12 Burton Crescent, probably during the night of Saturday 8 March to Sunday 9 March 1884. In this account Beasley's job is described as Summoning Officer, meaning that the basis of his job was delivering summonses to court to anyone whose evidence would be needed during an inquest. However, as the Times' description of his job indicates, Beasley had a more active role than just issuing bits of paper. In the case of Mary Ann Yates he'd carried out a search of her room, including having to rummage through the bed-clothes on which her body had lain. He'd found a half-sovereign amongst the sheets - payment for her services, perhaps?

Those were the only two occasions on which Thomas Henry Beasley appeared in the Times in the course of his duties. He died aged only 54, in Reading, early in 1889.

BASIC SOURCES I USED for all Golden Dawn members.

Membership of the Golden Dawn: The Golden Dawn Companion by R A Gilbert. Northampton: The Aquarian Press 1986. Between pages 125 and 175, Gilbert lists the names, initiation dates and addresses of all those people who became members of the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn or its many daughter Orders between 1888 and 1914. The list is based on the Golden Dawn's administrative records and its Members' Roll - the large piece of parchment on which all new members signed their name at their initiation. All this information had been inherited by Gilbert but it's now in the Freemasons' Library at the United Grand Lodge of England building on Great Queen Street Covent Garden.

Family history: freebmd; ancestry.co.uk (census and probate); findmypast.co.uk; familysearch; Burke's Peerage and Baronetage; Burke's Landed Gentry; Armorial Families; thepeerage.com; and a wide variety of family trees on the web.

Famous-people sources: mostly about men, of course, but very useful even for the female members of GD. Oxford Dictionary of National Biography. Who Was Who. Times Digital Archive.

Catalogues: British Library; Freemasons' Library.

Wikipedia; Google; Google Books - my three best resources. I also used other web pages, but with some caution, as - from the historian's point of view - they vary in quality a great deal.

Specific to Beasley:

Times Monday 4 Feb 1884 p10e report on an inquest which had opened "On Saturday afternoon" [2 Feb 1884] at Crowndale Hall Camden.

Times Thursday 27 March 1884 p11f rpt the inquest on Mary Ann Yates which had resumed "yesterday" [Wed 26 March 1884] at Crowndale Hall, with coroner Dr G Danford Thomas in charge.

Ripper Notes issue of 22 April 2005: Murder by Numbers by Dan Norder, Wolf Vanderlinden and Jeffrey Bloomfield; pp41-42. The inquest on Mary Ann Yates opened on Wednesday 12 March 1884 at the St Pancras Coroner's Court and the coroner in charge was Dr Danford Thomas. Thomas Henry Beasley was the last person to give evidence that day, after which the inquest was adjourned for one week.

Post Office London Directory 1884 Law directory p2011 London and Middlesex coroners' offices. A Dr Danford Thomas is listed as the coroner for the County of Middlesex Central District. Its offices are at 68 St Mary's Terrace Paddington. Only two other people who worked in that office are listed: Westcott, and the Secretary Walter Schröder. Alas same story in PO London Dir 1886 law directory p2036; and PO London Dir 1888 law directory p2086. Beasley just wasn't senior enough to appear.

30 April 2012

AMandragora@attglobal.net

Edith Mary Beaufort came lately to the Order of the Golden Dawn, being initiated at its Isis-Urania temple in London on 20 March 1897. She chose the Latin motto 'Caritas'. She does seem to have begun the work of studying occult texts that was required if you wanted to get as far in the GD as doing practical magic. But then - according to the GD administrative records - she decided that couldn't afford to continue to pay her subscription. I used to think that this was a very strange reason for the wife of a barrister to give, for dropping out of the Order; but now, knowing a bit more about her and her husband, I think I can see why that happened.

Edith Mary Griffith was born in 1856, the eldest daughter of Rev Charles Higman Griffith and his wife Hannah, née Mockridge.

Griffith is the English spelling of a Welsh surname. Griffith (as opposed to Griffiths) is not a common surname but despite this I haven't been able to find out where in Wales the family originated. However, Edith's parents named her younger brother Llewellyn, so I assume that Charles Griffith thought he was Welsh and was proud of his ancestry. He might even have had reason to think he was descended from the Welsh prince Llywellyn ap Gruffydd who fought Edward I. He had been born in Bruce Castle, Tottenham, himself - it was then a pleasant suburb to the north of the City of London. His father, John William Griffith, had been born in the City; he worked as an architect and surveyor. Charles' mother, Philadelphia, also had Celtic ancestors - she had been born in Cornwall.

Charles was born in 1829, the youngest of John William and Philadelphia's children. As Charterhouse School was still at its original address, in Charterhouse Square next to Smithfield (it has since moved out of London), Charles was able to attend it as a day boy, from 1839 to 1847. For a couple of years after he left the school he used the education he got there working as a tutor in Classics. I cannot find any evidence that he went to university, but he must have studied theology somewhere because in 1853 he was ordained as Church of England priest. On the strength of having been offered a job as curate of St George's church in Wrotham, Kent, he married Hannah Mockridge, the daughter of a Somerset farmer, in 1853. Charles and Hannah lived in Wrotham for five years - their elder son William, and Edith, were born there - before a great stroke of luck befell them, probably through a recommendation made by the bishop of Winchester, who had presided over Charles' ordination: Charles was offered the job of curate of All Saints, Stratfield Turgis, Hampshire, by its patron, Arthur Richard Wellesley, 2nd Duke of Wellington, with the possibility of his taking over as Rector, if he satisfied the Duke's requirements.

The village of Stratfield Turgis still is owned by the Wellesley family and forms part of their estate; though the village of Stratfield Saye is nearer the house. The Griffiths moved into the Rectory in 1858. On the day of the 1861 census Charles and Hannah were there with William, and two daughters who had been born since their arrival in the village - Gertrude and Catherine - and a nine-year-old visitor from New Zealand. Charles' yearly salary was around £300 at this time, enough for him to afford a cook and a nursemaid. Edith wasn't with her parents on that day; she had gone on a visit to her grandmother, Martha Mockridge, who lived with her two unmarried daughters at Stapleford near Taunton. The following year, any uncertainty that Charles Griffith might have felt about the future was removed when the Duke confirmed him as the Rector of Stratfield Turgis. One more child was born to Charles and Hannah Griffith - the boy Llewellyn that I've mentioned above.

The job of rector or vicar of a parish was one you would hold for life unless circumstances intervened - promotion, for example. So Edith and her siblings grew up in Stratfield Turgis, with very little change to be seen in the household on the census of 1871. Much more change was noticeable on census day in 1881: Charles and Hannah's two sons were not at home on that day (in fact, I can't find Llewellyn Griffith anywhere after 1871); Catherine, too, was away visiting, but Edith and Gertrude were at home. As well as the family, there were four boys living in the household, all teenagers, pupils of Charles. Charles' income as rector was dependent on the profits of agriculture; and these were being squeezed by the 1880s.

1881 was the last census day Edith Griffith spent in Stratfield Turgis with her parents. Early in 1883 she married a barrister, Leicester Paul Beaufort. I have no idea how she met him.

Leicester Beaufort's ancestors on his father's side had come to England at the beginning of the 18th century, as Huguenot refugees fleeing France. The original immigrant, Daniel Cornelis de Beaufort, had joined the Church of England and held several important posts in the Church of Ireland; but the best-known of Leicester's Beaufort ancestors is his great-grandfather Rear-Admiral Francis Beaufort, naval surveyor and inventor of the 'Beaufort Scale' of wind-speeds. Leicester Beaufort's father was Francis' younger son, Rev Daniel Augustus Beaufort.

Looking at Leicester Beaufort's family for clues about his own life, I found more that was similar in his mother's family, the Davises (no relations of mine as far as I know, though they are - like me - from Bristol). Leicester's mother was Emily Nowell (some sources give Newel) Davis, whose grandfather and father had both had distinguished and lucrative careers in the service of the East India Company. Her grandfather, Samuel Davis, ended a long working life in India as the Company's Accountant General in Calcutta before returning to England and joining its board of directors. Her father, Sir John Francis Davis, worked in the Company's offices in Canton, went on Lord Amherst's diplomatic mission to the Emperor of China in 1816, and ended his working life as the second Governor of Hong Kong. He was created a baronet in 1845. He returned to England in 1848 and retired to his father's estate at Henbury on the outskirts of Bristol. He lived there, at Hollywood Towers; married a woman half his age after Emily's mother's death in 1866 and produced a second family; and died there in 1890 at the remarkable age (for the 19th century) of 95.

Daniel Augustus Beaufort married Emily Davis in 1851. They had two children: another Francis Beaufort, and Leicester Paul who was born in 1853. From 1850-72 Rev Daniel was rector of Warburton in Cheshire; he then retired from the church and went to live at Lee, Lewisham. Francis Beaufort joined the Royal Artillery and was sent to India. Leicester Beaufort went to Westminster School and then to Queen's College Oxford. He graduated in 1875 before becoming a barrister of the Inner Temple in 1879. When he married Edith Griffith he was working as a barrister in courts in the north of England, though he and Edith are more likely to have settled down into married life living near London, where the senior courts and all the barristers' offices were.

Edith began to do the duties of the wife of a professional man: she managed the household, and had children, two daughters - Marion Cicely, born 1884; and Ursula Ernestine born 1885. At some stage Leicester Beaufort was elected to the London School Board (I haven't been able to find exactly when). And their lives were going on in a very ordinary and predictable way when Leicester Beaufort was offered, and accepted, a job that - in due course - sent him and his family to the other end of the world. Of course, Australia and New Zealand are at the other end of the world from England. But I think it's a lot further, psychologically speaking, to Borneo.

I hope I've shown above that Leicester Beaufort's family had a track record of working for companies that traded through, and then governed, parts of the world that were not part of the British Empire - at least, not yet. Usually these parts of the world got absorbed into the Empire once the private companies had done all the hard work of getting their foot in the door. In the 1880s it was no longer an option for Leicester Beaufort to take a job with the East India Company; but there were other, similar, companies - including the British North Borneo Company, which had been (to quote a contemporary Cyclopaedia) "taken under the protection of the British crown" on 12 May 1888.

The British North Borneo Company had been founded in England in 1881 by two of the Dent brothers (of Dent and Co based in Hong Kong and Shanghai). They had got a royal charter issued allowing the Company to administer North Borneo on behalf of the British government. The Company's purpose was to exploit on behalf of its shareholders the northern tip of the larger island of Borneo (now known as Sabah, a province of Malaysia). The Dents had, perhaps, been inspired by the exploits of James Brooke, who in 1841 had been given the province of Sarawak by the Sultan of Brunei, to rule over it as its first (of three) white rajah. In 1882 the Company began the long project of turning northern Borneo into a plantation-based economy administered on typical British lines through a series of districts ruled by British employees of the Company, with cooperation from local tribal leaders where they could get it and with the help of immigrants, in north Borneo's case from India and China. All this was to be paid for by the profits of the plantations that would be established; and by taxes on the local population.

The Beauforts' long haul to North Borneo began in 1889, when Leicester Beaufort was appointed legal advisor to Charles Vandeleur Creagh, whom the directors of the Company had appointed governor of the territories it had taken. His job was to set up system which would apply the law (English law, of course), and to be the Company's senior legal official. He would also be required to stand in as acting governor for Vandeleur Creagh when necessary - which might have been as soon as the Beauforts arrived because some of my sources say that Vandeleur Creagh was on leave in 1889, back in Europe.

Some wives, when told that their husband was considering taking a job in a country they probably hadn't even heard of, might have opted to stay in England and let their husband take the risks alone, but Edith not only went with her husband herself, she took her two daughters as well. Wasn't she brave? A woman who had grown up in a village in rural southern England and who probably knew very little even about her own country. Weren't they all brave, the imperial wives who took the option to step into the unknown.

I presume that the Beauforts stopped off at Kuching, on their journey, to make the acquaintance of the 2nd white rajah, James Brooke's nephew Charles Johnson Brooke. Although the rudiments of colonial administration were quickly being laid out in north Borneo, and the first British administrators were in post, it's still likely that Charles Brooke's wife Margaret will still have been Edith's nearest European woman neighbour during her years in North Borneo - and Kuching was hundreds of miles away by boat (travel overland all but impossible), far beyond Edith being able to call for help when in need.

When the Beauforts finally arrived in north Borneo they will have set up home in Pulau Gaya where the Company was based. I haven't been able to find out much about what life in this Company town was like, but the number of Europeans living there would have been very small.

I imagine facilities were pretty basic, so that when Edith discovered she was pregnant again she must have felt as much anxiety as delight; but she survived giving birth to her third daughter, Monica, in 1893 and the baby, too, lived through her infancy there (Ranee Margaret of Sarawak had lost her three eldest children to an epidemic in 1873).

Sabah is known for its biodiversity but I doubt if Edith would have had many opportunities to set out in search of it, even if she had wanted to. Her husband may have glimpsed some of it, in their early years there, while out shooting it. However, the impositions of the British North Borneo Company on the native population, and the seizure of their lands, caused an insurrection to begin in 1894 that lasted, on and off, until 1900, threatening the Beauforts' safety and curtailing what little chance they had to travel around. A year into the uprising, Vandeleur Creagh resigned the job of governor. Instead of sending out a new man, perhaps someone with some military experience and who might arrive with a wife family to give Edith a woman friend to talk to, the Company opted to accept the suggestion of its managing director, William Cowie, to appoint Leicester to be the new governor. No doubt Edith was pleased with the Company's high opinion of her husband's abilities; but she must, surely, have wondered whether he could cope with all the extra demands which would be made of him. And, possibly, thought it unreasonable that he should be asked to take on so much more responsibility in a time of crisis.

Several of the books I referred to for this section of Edith's life say that Leicester Beaufort's promotion to the top job was a mistake; that he lacked administrative experience, and (unlike the Brookes) had no flair for it, and had thus reached the level of his incompetence. And of course, he had restless natives on his hands: as the Company's governor he was also its commander-in-chief, but one with no military experience at all, very few weapons, and probably no fighting men other than the Sikhs who had been brought in to run the Company's police force. It would have taken a man of greater abilities than Leicester Beaufort to make a success of such a situation. The insurrection wouldn't go away and - probably in 1896 though I can't find out the exact date - the Beauforts decided that it was just too dangerous for them all to live in north Borneo. Edith and the children went home - just in time, it would seem, because in 1897 the rebels destroyed the Pulau Gaya township; so thoroughly that it was never resettled. Leicester Beaufort survived the sacking of Pulau Gaya and his most positive contribution to the future of north Borneo was to be in charge of the founding and building of a new Company headquarters at the town now named Beaufort after him.

I can't imagine that Edith had many regrets about leaving north Borneo although to be separated from her husband when he was in some danger must have been a terrible worry; and - I would suppose - she had no idea how long they were going to have to live apart. She arrived back in England at a difficult time in her family. She had already missed her sister Gertrude's wedding in 1893. Her father died in April 1896 - Edith probably got home too late to see him before it happened - and her mother had to move out of the Rectory where Edith had grown up, to make way for the new parish incumbent. And then her father-in-law, Daniel Augustus Beaufort, died in 1898.

By 1898, Edith had moved into a house in Chiswick. I think Marion and Ursula were sent to school for the first time at this point, probably to Sadre School, Gunnersbury Lodge Brentford, a boarding school run by Jane and Elizabeth Spark; Monica was a pupil there on the day of the 1911 census. And it was while she was living in Chiswick that Edith is most likely to have met people who were members of the Order of the Golden Dawn; there were at least 10 GD members living in the district in the late 1890s.

Perhaps, when Edith was about to leave north Borneo, she and her husband had discussed the possibility of her returning when it was safer. In the event, neither Edith nor her daughters ever returned there. Leicester Beaufort carried on as governor of North Borneo until 1900 but then he was replaced; by the day of the 1901 census he was back in England and the family were staying (perhaps for the Easter holidays) in a house in Stratfield Turgis, a few doors away from Edith's mother, who was still living in the village with Edith's unmarried sister Catherine. But for a while Leicester Beaufort didn't have a job; his salary as Governor had been good, but while he looked for employment they will have had to be careful with their money. Hence Edith pleading 'poverty' to the Golden Dawn, and dropping out.

Leicester Beaufort may have had a very difficult last few years in north Borneo, but his work in what he knew - the law - had been good and had attracted notice. In 1901, he was offered a very similar kind of appointment by another of these empire-administering private companies, the best-known of them all at that time: Cecil Rhodes' British South Africa Company (BSAC).

The BSAC had been issued with a royal charter in 1889 which authorised it to act like an extended arm of the British government over whatever lands the Company could lay hold of in southern Africa. In January 1900 the British government issued a constitution for the territory that became known as Rhodesia after Rhodes' death (in 1902) and is now the separate states of Zimbabwe and Zambia. The newly-authorised territory needed English law and English lawyers to administer it, and that was where Leicester Beaufort came in: he was appointed the first judge of the territory of North-Eastern Rhodesia, to be based at the town then called Fort Jameson (now known as Chipata in the independent Zambia) with five British magistrates and 31 native commissioners working for him.

Edith will have known - or thought she knew - a great deal more about southern Africa than she did about Borneo. And at least the climate was rather less sapping and English civilization - in the shape of Cape Town and Durban - was not quite so long a journey from where she was going to live in Africa as they had been on Borneo. However, when I was following the BSAC through the Times between 1900 and 1912, I couldn't help noticing how isolated Edith still was at Fort Jameson: there was no railway link until 1910 and then it went to the Congo not to South Africa and was about exports not passengers; in 1903 letters to and from England took six weeks via Cape Town and Salisbury (now Harare); in 1912 there were still only 1497 Europeans living in all of North-East Rhodesia; and there was a high level of violence, particularly by employees of BSAC against natives objecting to being ousted from their tribal lands (though of course the Times didn't put it like that) and refusing to pay the BSAC's hut tax - with the inevitable resulting fear amongst white residents of native reprisals, which Edith would have known all too well.

Although Leicester Beaufort was the most senior legal official in Rhodesia there were three officials who out-ranked him already in place (though none of them were lawyers) when the Beauforts arrived there late in 1901: W H Milton, the top man, the Senior Administrator for all Rhodesia; Robert Codrington, a personal protégé of Cecil Rhodes, who although only in his early 30s was already Administrator of North-Eastern Rhodesia; and Codrington's equivalent for North-Western Rhodesia. Milton and Codrington were based in Fort Jameson, where Leicester Beaufort's offices and high court would be; the Administrator of North-Western Rhodesia was based in Livingstone.

Leicester Beaufort might be out-ranked by three old BSAC hands, but at least during 1904, Edith was the senior European woman in Fort Jameson. I'm very grateful to the compilers of the Purchase family history for publishing my only glimpse of Edith doing her duty as an imperial wife: in February 1904, she held the first ever formal dance to take place in Fort Jameson. It was a very sophisticated affair - so much so as to cause consternation as well as excitement amongst the invited guests as they searched or sent for such rarely-used items as evening shoes and long gloves. Despite the lack of resources at her command, Edith did the job properly: there was dancing, there was music, and a separate room for those who despised both of those and only wanted to play cards; there was a big supper at 11; and the guests finally began to go home at 3am.

1904 was a year of highs ending on a terrible low for Edith. It began with the social triumph of organising a dance in such difficult circumstances - the unprecedented event was reported in detail in at least one south African newspaper. In the summer Marion, her eldest daughter, married James Charles Spillane, a surgeon; though she married him in Lewisham and Edith may not have been able to be there. But at the end of the year Edith's second daughter, Ursula, got dysentery - that well-known killer of residents in the tropics - and died, at Fort Jameson, of its complications. Ursula was 19, and was about to embark on a survey of the flora of Rhodesia on behalf of the Royal Botanic Gardens at Kew, picking up where Robert Codrington had left off a couple of years earlier - he had attached an initial list of local plants to his BSAC accounts for the year to March 1901. In the Kew archive there is a sad little letter from Leicester Beaufort explaining why his daughter would not, after all, be collecting plants for Kew.

The grief that Ursula's death caused both her parents may not have been even slightly lifted until Marion and James Spillane came to visit them at Fort Jameson in 1906. Edith was able to be there when what turned out to be her only grandchild was born - Mona Beaufort Spillane. I haven't been able to find out very much about James Spillane, except that he specialised in tropical medicine. He may have worked in Natal - that was where he died, in 1938. If this is correct, he and Marion had the same difficult decisions to make about where to live, and what to do about the children, as Edith and Leicester Beaufort had done in north Borneo: on the day of the 1911 census, Marion and Mona were staying, or perhaps living more permanently, with Marion's grandmother (Edith's mother-in-law) Emily Beaufort, still alive at the age of 87 and living on Lewisham Hill. James Spillane was not in England or Wales on that day, presumably working abroad.

It was expected by BSAC's hierarchy that employees would cover for colleagues who were on leave or ill and Leicester Beaufort did act as a temporary Administrator several times, the longest-lasting occasion following the unexpected death of Robert Codrington in December 1908. However, these periods did not expose Beaufort's inadequacies and experience to the same extent as his time as Governor of North Borneo, as there were plenty of good and experienced administrators on the spot to help and advise him. The autumn of 1910 brought Queen Victoria's military son, the Duke of Connaught, and his wife to Rhodesia on an official visit, part of a larger tour of southern Africa. I couldn't discover from the coverage of the tour in the Times whether the royal couple actually made it to Fort Jameson - possibly not, as travel to it was still so slow, it took two weeks (for example) to get from Fort Jameson to Livingstone. However, they did go to Bulawayo and Barotseland, and Edith and Leicester Beaufort may have been allowed to travel to one of those places to meet them. In 1911, a big reorganisation of the way Rhodesia was governed included the establishment of its first High Court: Leicester Beaufort became its first High Court Judge. It was his last promotion: he retired in 1918 and was knighted in the 1919 New Year's Honours list, so that Edith became entitled to call herself 'Lady Beaufort' (these things made a big difference to your social life still, in 1919).

1918 was not a good year in which to think of coming back to England, even after many years in the colonies in which you had pinned all your hopes on doing just that. It's possible, though, that Edith and Leicester Beaufort didn't consider returning all that seriously. Edith's mother had died in 1905, Leicester's mother in 1916; as I've said, I think their son-in-law may have been working in South Africa; so they did not have much to return to Britain for. I imagine, too, that Leicester's pension from the BSAC would go a great deal further if he stayed in the area it governed. The Beauforts retired to Wynberg, a pleasant suburb of Cape Town, moving into a house called Sandown, in Broad Road. No doubt the fact that the Royal Cape Golf Club was in Wynberg influenced their decision: Leicester Beaufort was a keen golfer. They had not been there very long, however, when the great flu epidemic engulfed

South Africa.

Spanish flu was first detected in South Africa in Durban on 14 September 1918. In the next seven weeks half of the total population of 6 million people caught it, and 140,000 people died. It is well-known that the Spanish flu tended to take the young and spare the old; quite why that was so still puzzles medical researchers. The Cape was particularly hard hit by the epidemic and one of the casualties there was Edith and Leicester Beaufort's youngest daughter Monica, who died on 21 October of pneumonia and heart failure. She had been training as a nurse at the military hospital in Wynberg.

Both Edith's younger daughters had tried to break out of the limited roles allotted to them by the expectations of their times. I imagine their urge to do more was mainly Edith's doing. It must have added to her grief over their deaths that they had hardly been able even to get started before they died.

Leicester Paul Beaufort died, in Wynberg, on 13 August 1926. At some point between his death and her own, Edith finally returned to England. I haven't been able to find out the exact date but I think the move will have depended on Marion, now Edith's only surviving daughter: Edith will have moved to be near her, wherever she was, and I'm not sure where she was. I've said that Marion's husband died (in 1938) in Durban. Something in the probate registration to do with his death made me think he and Marion were living separately at the time of his death.

Surely Edith came to England, at least for a few weeks, to attend the wedding of her granddaughter, Marion's daughter Mona. Mona Spillane married Brigadier-General Francis Ernle Fowle in 1930. The Fowle family owned the Charlton estate in the vale of Pewsey in Wiltshire, not so far from where Edith had grown up. Whenever it was that Edith returned to England permanently, she went to live near Mona and her family. She and Marion (now widowed herself) were living at a house called Sundown, in Manningford Abbots in the vale of Pewsey by 1942; Edith died there on 17 December that year and Marion was still living there at her death in 1964.

----

BASIC SOURCES I USED for all Golden Dawn members.

Membership of the Golden Dawn: The Golden Dawn Companion by R A Gilbert. Northampton: The Aquarian Press 1986. Between pages 125 and 175, Gilbert lists the names, initiation dates and addresses of all those people who became members of the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn or its many daughter Orders between 1888 and 1914. The list is based on the Golden Dawn's administrative records and its Members' Roll - the large piece of parchment on which all new members signed their name at their initiation. All this information had been inherited by Gilbert but it's now in the Freemasons' Library at the United Grand Lodge of England building on Great Queen Street Covent Garden. Please note, though, that the records of the Amen-Ra Temple in Edinburgh were destroyed in 1900/01. As far as I know, the records of the Horus Temple at Bradford have not survived either.

Family history: freebmd; ancestry.co.uk (census and probate); findmypast.co.uk; familysearch; Burke's Peerage and Baronetage; Burke's Landed Gentry; Armorial Families; thepeerage.com; and a wide variety of family trees on the web.

Famous-people sources: mostly about men, of course, but very useful even for the female members of GD. Oxford Dictionary of National Biography. Who Was Who. Times Digital Archive.

Catalogues: British Library; Freemasons' Library.

Wikipedia; Google; Google Books - my three best resources. I also used other web pages, but with some caution, as - from the historian's point of view - they vary in quality a great deal.

--

THE BEAUFORT FAMILY

Wikipedia has good coverage of the family though as the names 'Daniel' and 'Daniel Augustus' occur several times it's a bit confusing.

County Families of the UK volume 59 published 1919 compiler/editor Edward Walford and it's generally known as Walford's County Families. Confirms the details of Leicester Paul Beaufort's parents, his school, university and qualification as a barrister. His father the Rev D A Beaufort died in 1898; his mother Emily died in 1916.

SIR FRANCIS BEAUFORT Leicester's grandfather. Plenty abt him on the web: 1774-1857, RN, hydrographer, surveyor of the Río de la Plata, trainer of Fitzroy who captained the Beagle when Darwin was on board; inventor of the Beaufort scale. FRS FRGS KCB 1848. Amazing revelation at wikipedia: between his two marriages (during 1830s) had a sexual relationship with his unmarried sister Harriet - he wrote about it in a cipher-code journal; code has now been cracked.

Leicester Paul's father DANIEL AUGUSTUS BEAUFORT

At history/beewarb.org/ is a history of the church at Warburton Cheshire, with a list of its rectors. Daniel Augustus Beaufort was appointed rector 1850 and remained in post until 1872 when a member of the Warburton family took over. Rev Daniel was a son of Sir Francis Beaufort the admiral, who'd had a problem getting his son a living until this one came up.

Via familysearch, England EASy source film 1595677: marr of Daniel Augustus Beaufort to Emily Nowell (sic) Davis 24 June 1851 at St Mary Henbury.

BRIEFLY ABOUT LEICESTER'S ELDER BROTHER

Via familysearch India-EASy source film 510868: Francis Beaufort married Adela Hasting (sic and incorrect) Divett, daughter of Edward Divett. The marriage took place in October 1882 at Ambala Bengal.

Website www.chch.ox.ac.uk is the website of Christ Church cathedral Oxford. It has memorials to the dead of the 2nd Oxfordshire and Buckinghamshire Light Infantry, including Francis Hugh Beaufort, born 1883 killed 15 May 1915 son of Major Francis Beaufort, Royal Artillery and his wife Adela Hastings (sic) Divett daughter of Edward Divett MP. This memorial gives details of Francis Hugh's career in the army - he hadn't only volunteered in 1914.

LEICESTER BEAUFORT'S COUSIN

At www.thepeerage.com Daniel Augustus Beaufort's sister Sophia (born 1819) married Rev William Palmer. They had two children:

Francis V Palmer born 1846

Blanche Palmer born 1848.

Francis V Palmer takes on his mother's original surname and becomes Sir Francis Beaufort Palmer. He's a barrister and author of legal text-books, eg Palmer's Company Law, reference works on insolvency etc.

LEICESTER BEAUFORT'S MOTHER'S FAMILY, the DAVISes of the East India Company:

See below the about the views of Bhutan, they were painted by Samuel Davis. The V&A has some of Samuel Davis' other works eg views of India, see //collections.vam.ac.uk. The V&A website has a short biography: 1760-1819. Born in West Indies where his father was Commissary-General. Joined Madras Light Infantry; arrived in Madras 1780. As Lieutenant in 1783, sent with others by Governor-General of India Warren Hastings on a mission to Tibet but refused entry, possibly because his habit of drawing caused suspicion. Various appointments back in India including as Collector, as a magistrate in Varanasi, as superintendant-general of police in Calcutta. Last job before retirement was as Accountant General of India 1804-06; he then returned to England with his family. He served as a director of the East India Company from 1810 to his death in 1819.

At www.holmesacourt.org/hac/4/9466.htm a rudimentary family tree indicates that Samuel Davis 1760-1819 married Henrietta Boileau 1773-1853.

JOHN FRANCIS DAVIS son of Samuel and Henrietta:

There's a wikipedia page on him.

At www.phoenixbonsai.com is a history of Bonsai; John Francis Davis was first English person to describe it, in one of his works on China.

My own list - compiled from the sources below - of John Francis Davis' marriages and children:

By his first marriage to Emily Humphrays:

Florence, who married Lt-Col James Burnie Lind in 1863, in Paris

Julia Sullivan, who married Robert Cann Lippincott of Over Court, Almondsbury near Bristol.

Emily Newel born c 1824, Leicester's mother

By his second marriage to Lucy Ellen Rocke:

Francis Boileau Davis 2nd Baronet born 1871

Henrietta.

At www.holmesacourt.org/hac/4/9466.htm a rudimentary family tree indicates that John Francis Davis' first marriage was April 1822 to Emily Humphrays.

At www.burningviolin.org/family is a family history website though I'm not sure who has compiled it. There's a reference to Julia Sullivan Davis who married Robert Cann Lippincott in 1854. This website confirms that John Francis' first wife was Emily née Humphrays and gives the date of Emily's death as 1866. Just noting that this site also has information on the Lind family, Leicester Beaufort's cousins.

1861 census has Lucy Rocke's father as vicar of Littleham Exmouth; she was living at home on that day: as yet unmarried, aged 31, born Burford Salop.

Confirmation of the death of Emily Davis: death registered Clifton (Bristol) July-Sep 1866; aged 65.

The marriage of Lucy Ellen Rocke to John Francis Davis was registered St Thomas (Exeter) Devon October-December 1867.

Times Fri 14 November 1890 p10 obituary of John Francis Davis who'd died "yesterday" at his home near Bristol. This is the source for the information now on wikipedia but it does add a few more details about his career with the East India Company.

Times Mon 17 Nov 1890 p1 death notices: John Francis Davis 1st Baronet had died on 12 November [1890] at his home at Hollywood Towers.

Times Mon 10 Dec 1890 p5 had a detailed account of John Francis Davis' rather complex will, which created two trust funds, one for his widow Lucy Ellen and the other for his son, now the 2nd Baronet, Francis Boileau Davis, to give them each an income. Bequests were made to all his daughters. In addition, the income from the trust fund for his son would go to his three daughters from his first marriage, on his son's death. John Francis Davis left landed property, together with personal effects worth £167,898/6/6.

LEICESTER PAUL BEAUFORT

The Record of Old Westminsters Volume 1 issued by the School in 1928: p66 has Leicester Beaufort on it though from the snippet I couldn't see which years he was at the school.

BEAUFORT AS A BARRISTER

Law List 1893 p16 Counsel list: Leicester Paul Beaufort called to bar 7 May 1879; Inner Temple. Working on the Northern circuit. He continues to have an entry in the Law List until 1925; I gather from the entries that he never worked as a barrister in England after 1893.

BRITISH NORTH BORNEO now called Sabah

My contemporary sources:

The Solicitors' Journal 1889 p111 announcement of the appointment of Leicester Paul Beaufort as "Legal Advisor to the Governor of North Borneo".

Proceedings of the Royal Colonial Institute 1901 (this was a google snippet and I couldn't see the page number): Leicester Beaufort had been elected a member in 1893.

Appleton's Annual Cyclopaedia volume for 1893 p326 the British North Borneo Company had been "taken under the protection of the British crown" on 12 May 1888. The current Governor of British North Borneo was Charles Vandeleur Creagh; Leicester Beaufort was Acting Governor.

Nature: International Journal of Science volume 48 1893 p15 a report of Beaufort presenting a crowned gibbon (stuffed, presumably); I couldn't see from the snippet which institution he was giving it to. He probably shot the gibbon himself.

For statistics on Sabah's biodiversity, listen to Brian Cox in episode 1 of his Wonders of Life series, first broadcast Sunday 27 February 2013. The sequence in Sabah shows the tropical rainforest and a sanctuary for orangutans; even in the 21st century, Cox had to reach the sanctuary by boat.

Appleton's Annual Cyclopaedia volume for 1898 p317 mentions that Beaufort been chosen for the post of Governor of British North Borneo by the Board of Directors of the British North Borneo Company; but the appointment had required ratification by the Colonial Office.

The Statesman's Year Book 1899 p110 British Empire - British Borneo. There is a political resident, a Col F A Wilson. Governor Beaufort earns a salary of $9850 pa. The Chairman of the Court of Directors of the British North Borneo Company is Richard B Martin MP, who is based in London.

Wikipedia on British North Borneo Company says that it issued its own currency which was the official currency of the area from 1882 to 1953; Beaufort's salary was paid in that currency.

Colonial Office List 1904 p217 the dist of Labuan was taken into British North Borneo in an agreement dated 1889. The Governor of North Borneo's official title is: "the Governor of the territory of the British North Borneo Company".

My modern sources:

There is now (January 2013) a good deal about the British North Borneo Company on wikipedia. And there's plenty there, too, about the Brookes, white rajahs of Sarawak.

Wikipedia has some information on the modern town of Beaufort: a district, and a town 90km south of Kota Kinabalu, nowadays a good place for white-water rafting. The railway station building is dated 1905 (after the Beauforts left, of course). The website says that Leicester Beaufort arrived in British North Borneo in 1889 and took up his post based at the town of Beaufort but I think that's not correct.

The town of Beaufort figures a lot on the web in English-language Malayan/Indonesian websites on their own history. Eg www.worldstatesmen.org/Malay\_states.htm which says that Beaufort's predecessor in the job in British North Borneo was Charles Vandelleur (sic the 2 l's and that's not correct) Creagh who served 1888-95. Then Beaufort did the job 1895-1900 when he was replaced by Hugh Charles Clifford.

A History of Modern Sabah by K G Tregonning. Sabah was called North Borneo between 1881 and 1963. This book says on p42 that Beaufort was sent out to British North Borneo to replace one of the Dent brothers, who'd been thrown "off the Court" (I'm not sure what that means exactly). As the first governor who had never been a colonial official before, Beaufort had a very hard time in the job.

Clifford, Imperial Consul by Harry A Gailey 1982 p27 Beaufort was appointed Governor on the recommendation of William Cowie. Beaufort was appointed in 1895, a lawyer with no administrative experience.

A Short History of Malaysia, Singapore and Brunei 1981 by Constance Mary Turnbull p168 she is explaining that North Borneo was NOT like Sarawak: the British North Borneo Company did not have the political and economic freedom that Rajah Brooke had in Sarawak. Beaufort "held office from 1895 to 1900" (as Governor that is).

THE BEAUFORTS AND THE BRITISH SOUTH AFRICA COMPANY

Firstly a bit from wikipedia on Robert Codrington mentioned a lot below: 1869-December 1908 in London; one of the Gloucestershire Codringtons. Brilliant career cut short by heart disease. Hand-picked protégé of Cecil Rhodes, very important in establishing government by professional, colonial-style officials in what became Rhodesia. Appointed by Rhodes as Administrator of North-Eastern Rhodesia (based at Fort Jameson) in 1898 with instructions to get Rhodes' way by any means necessary; in that job till April 1907 when he was moved to become Administrator of North-Western Rhodesia, based at Livingstone; he started work there in February 1908.

Contemporary:

Times articles about the British South Africa Company; I searched the whole period from 1899 to 1918. A general note, especially about the years 1900-05: much of central Africa is still at the 'being explored' stage; very few rail links as yet in what became northern Rhodesia.

Unfortunately I couldn't find any mention in the Times of Leicester Beaufort's appointment.

The most succinct information I got on how the BSAC got into what is now Zambia was wikipedia's page on the Northern Rhodesia Police. Rhodes got the British South Africa Company (BSAC) its royal charter in October 1889; to act as an arm of the British government, including having authority to negotiate treaties and set up police forces. From 1889 to 1899 BSAC ran what became Rhodesia through white "collectors" who attempted to raise money by collecting a tax on hut. An Order in Council issued by the British government in January 1900 formalised a constitution for the territory which became Rhodesia. The constitution established a system of courts to administer English law there. Leicester Beaufort arrived there in 1901 to be its first judge. He was based at Fort Jameson (now Chipata, very close to Zambia's border with what is now Malawi). He worked with 5 magistrates; and 31 native Commissioners who replaced the BSAC's original, white, tax collectors. In 1910 a railway was completed with linked northern Rhodesia to the Congo.

Times 3 August 1901 item on the financial statements issued by BSAC up to 31 March 1901; in which the costs of governing Rhodesia are included. The most senior official in Rhodesia is the Senior Administrator, a Mr W H Milton. Robert Codrington is Administrator for North-Eastern Rhodesia; he completes that part of the BSAC's financial statement which shows the figures for North-Eastern Rhodesia; but he also includes a section on its flora and fauna.

Times Sat 2 November 1901. At the moment what became Rhodesia is called the British Central Africa Protectorate. Very few Eurs lived there but one or two companies had their headquarters in the town, including an exploration company and a telegraph company.

Cecil Rhodes died on 26 March 1902 and in the following years, all my sources show the British government getting more and more involved in decisions about how Rhodesia is governed.

Times Mon 27 July 1903 (I forgot to get the page number): mention that letters to/from GB to Fort Jameson took 6 weeks and went via Cape Town and Salisbury.

The Genealogy of the Purchase Family in Britain and Southern Africa published 2008, by Nancy R Purchase and H Graham Purchase. On p44 there's coverage of Edith's dance at Fort Jameson, taken from a report in a local newspaper. Harvey George Purchase and his wife Grace Lillie were two of Edith's guests. Harvey Purchase worked for BSAC; and Grace had been a nurse at the Nyasa Industrial Mission until her marriage to Harvey in April 1903.

Proceedings of the Royal Colonial Institute 1908. This was a google snippet and I couldn't see the page number: Beaufort was still a member of the Institute, with address Fort Jameson North-Eastern Rhodesia.

Times Wed 27 January 1909 p6 reported that Robert Codrington had recently died in London; he'd been Acting Administrator of North-Western Rhodesia since April 1907. In the wake of Codrington's death there had been a shift-around of personnel: L P Beaufort had been appointed Acting Administrator of North-Eastern Rhodesia as part of it. L A Wallace had been appointed Administrator of North-Western Rhodesia. Wallace was senior to Beaufort, he had been working in Rhodesia since 1895. These appointments had to have the approval of the Secretary of State for the Colonies but the men involved would still be working for the BSAC.

Hazell's Annual 1910 p162 section on Rhodesia. Fort Jameson was the site of the new High Court of North-Eastern Rhodesia, with Beaufort as the senior judge based there.

Times November-December 1910 covered the south African tour made by the Duke and Duchess of Connaught. They did visit parts of Rhodesia but I couldn't find a reference to their having spent any time at Fort Jameson.

Times Tue 22 November 1910 p5 the Connaughts had done a day of official engagements in Bulawayo.

Times Thurs 17 August 1911 p3 item on Northern Rhodesia detailing the government reorganisation which was coming into effect there. The report noted that only 1200 white people were living there. As result of the changes, L A Wallace would become Resident Commissioner, governing all of northern Rhodesia as representative of BSAC; the old divisions of Rhodesia into NW and NE would cease. Wallace would rule the larger area with an administrative council which would include legal officials as members. A High Court would come into existence.

LEICESTER BEAUFORT'S KNIGHTHOOD

The Law Times 1918 volume 146 (I couldn't see the page number in the google snippet): the announcement of Leicester Paul Beaufort's knighthood; as "Lately Judge of the High Court of Northern Rhodesia".

Times Wed 1 November 1919 p9g an Honours' list p10 includes Leicester Beaufort's knighthood.

SOME EXTRA INFORMATION ON LEICESTER BEAUFORT

The Rulers of British Africa 1870-1914 1978 by Lewis H Gann and Peter Duignan. P237 Beaufort born Warburton, the son of a vicar. Educated Westminster School, Oxford. Barrister Inner Temple, member of London School Board. Who's Who says recreations shooting, fishing, golf.

EDITH'S FATHER CHARLES HIGMAN GRIFFITH

I couldn't get any information on John William Griffith from the web; nor on his wife despite her unusual name. There was a lot of information on a group of Quakers called Griffith, originally from Gwynedd/Merioneth, but now living in Philadelphia County Pennsylvania. Despite the very detailed accounts of this family on the web, I couldn't spot John William amongst all the references that came up. I couldn't find any details for a marriage of John William Griffith to Philadelphia on familysearch or anywhere else, so I do not know what Philadelphia's original surname was.

Charterhouse Register 1769-1872 editor R L Arrowsmith, published 1974. Charles Higman Griffith was born 14 April 1829, son of John William Griffith of Bruce Castle Tottenham. He was a day pupil from 1839 to 1847.

Crockford's Clerical Directory issue of 1868 p276 Charles Higman Griffith: ordained priest 1853 by bishop of Winchester. Currently rector of Stratfield Turgis, appointed 1862, its patron is the Duke of Wellington.

Wikipedia for which Duke appointed Charles Griffith: he was made curate in 1858 so that means it's the great duke's son, the 2nd duke, Arthur Richard Wellington 1807-84. Royal Horse Guards; then Rifle Corps 1830. MP 1830s. Married 1839 Elizabeth Hay; no children, the marriage was unhappy. On his death he was succeeded by his nephew Henry 1846-1900 as 3rd duke.

Crockford's Clerical Directory issue 1880 gave more details of Charles Griffith's career p413: ordained deacon 1852, priest 1853, both by bishop of Winchester. Curate St George's Wrotham Kent 1853-57; curate of Stratfield Turgis 1858-62.

Crockford's Clerical Directory issue of 1895 p551 has Charles Higman Griffith still in the same job.

None of the Crockford's issues give any details of where he qualified for the priesthood; I'm rather puzzled about that.

A BIT ABOUT STRATFIELD TURGIS

Wikipedia has very little about Stratfield Turgis but there's a picture of All Saints; it's now de-consecrated.

Antiquarian and Topographical Sketches of Hampshire by Henry Moody 1846, curator of the museum at Winchester. On p132 Stratfield Turgis is mentioned in the Domesday Book. It's a smaller parish than Stratfield Saye. It's now part of the lands owned by the Wellesley family, dukes of Wellington. The rectory's current annual value is £320.

Victoria County History of Hampshire and Isle of Wight volume 4 by H A Doubleday published 1973 p64: the dukes of Wellington own every single thing in the parish of Stratfield Turgis and are lords of the manor there.

Via googlebooks, one publication by Rev Charles Higman Griffith came up: A History of Strathfield Saye published 1892. I checked the British Library catalogue: this was the only item registered under his full name.

EDITH'S MOTHER HANNAH MOCKRIDGE: details from the 1851 census at Greenway House, St James Taunton head John Mockridge, 52, farmer of 200 acres with 9 employees, born Taunton. Also in the household: his wife Martha 51; his children Hannah 22, Martha 18, John 15, Robert 11, Edward 7. Plus a housekeeper and various farm servants.

EDITH AND LEICESTER IN BRITAIN 1898-1901

Via google to a list of addresses on www.docstoc.com, prob a Directory of some sort but I couldn't see the source details: an address 1898 for Edith Beaufort of 36 Cornwall Grove Chiswick. And another address 1898 at www.genesreunited.co.uk at Newton Abbot but the website says it's a death registration so there's something wrong somewhere.

MARION CICELY BEAUFORT'S MARRIAGE

Law Times volume 117 1904 p328 in a list of marriages: Marion Cicely Beaufort to James Charles Spillane MB MRCS; at St Stephen's Lewisham.

Law Times volume 118 p424 in list of death notices: Ursula Ernestine Beaufort aged 19, at Fort Jameson NE Rhodesia. I couldn't see the exact date on the google snippet though the year was 1904.

DEATH OF URSULA BEAUFORT

At plants.jstor.org/visual/kadc5376, Directors' Correspondence volume 193/181, the Kew Archives on the web: a letter dated 13 January 1905 written at Fort Jameson northern Rhodesia by Leicester Paul Beaufort to the Director of the Royal Botanic Gardens Kew. Beaufort explains that his daughter has died of heart failure, just as she was beginning to recover from dysentery. As a result, she wouldn't be undertaking the work for Kew that she'd been so looking forward to doing. Nice comments on how happy and loving a daughter she'd been.

LEICESTER BEAUFORT'S RETIREMENT; MONICA'S DEATH

Wikipedia on WYNBERG: it's a suburb on the south side of Cape Town. The Royal Cape Golf Club was established there in 1885. The Wynberg Military Camp is there.

At www.health24.com there was a short article on the Spanish flu in South Africa, added to the website in November 2012. South Africa was hit very hard: ½ million died in all, 62% of whom lived in the Cape. 140,000 people died in 7 weeks during September-October 1918.

At www.sahistory.org.za from these 2 sources:

Nuusdagboek: feite en fratse oor 1000 jaar by F Wallis 2000.

Standard Encyclopaedia of Southern Africa eds D Potgeiter et al 1970. At the time the Encyclopaedia was compiled, Spanish flu was still the worst ever epidemic to hit South Africa. It was first diagnosed in Durban on 14 September 1918. The population of South Africa at that time was 6 million; nearly half of them caught it. This site confirms the data of 140,000 deaths but says it was 6 weeks. Blacks and coloured people were particularly badly hit although death rates were especially high amongst whites, often from secondary infections like pneumonia.

Times Fri 29 November 1918 p1b death notices: Leicester Beaufort's youngest daughter Monica Gertrude Alice had died "On the 21st October [1918]" of pneumonia and heart failure at Wynberg Military Hospital, Cape Colony where she had been training as a nurse.

It's unusual to have so many details of the death in a Times announcement.

Times Sat 14 August 1926 p10d obituary of Leicester Paul Beaufort issued by Reuters "Cape Town, August 13 [1926]".

Probate Registry 1926: Sir Leicester Paul Beaufort died on 13 Aug 1926. Last address Sandown, Broad Road, Wynberg South Africa.

EDITH'S SON-IN-LAW JAMES CHARLES SPILLANE

A quick search with google suggested to me that he was a specialist in tropical medicine. Via Ancestry to the General Medical Council Registers: he's listed in them for the first time in 1907 and for the last in 1919, with the poste restante-type address Royal Societies Club St James's St. MB London 1895. MRCS 1895. LRCP 1895.

Probate Registry: Spillane still has the Royal Societies Club address but it's clear he has been living abroad: he died on 9 April 1938 at 51 Surrey Mansions, 323 Currie Road Durban Natal. Probate London 7 June [1938] to Mona Beaufort Fowle wife of Francis Ernle Fowle; and to Horace Tyrrell Lewis, solicitor.

MONA SPILLANE FOWLE

Francis Ernle Fowle's family owned the Charlton estate in the Vale of Pewsey: via www.british-history.ac.uk information from A History of the County of Wiltshire volume 10, published 1975, on the manor of Charlton, centered 4 miles SW of Pewsey and including bits of the Ridgeway and of the Vale of Pewsey. The manor of Charlton was owned by the Mundy family in the 17th century; then by the Giffard family. It was bought by William Fowle before 1838. By the end of the 19th century, the family was calling itself Ernle Fowle - the Ernle family were also long-time gentry, but based in Sussex, Dorset etc. Thomas Ernle Fowle inherited the Charlton estate in 1893. He sold some of the estate's downland to the War Department in 1902, but bought Drax farm in 1919 and Coombe Farm later. He died in 1932 and his son Francis succeeded (that's Mona's husband). Francis died in 1969; his son W F B Fowle succeeded and still owned the Charlton estate in 1972.

Mona inherited some drawings that had been in the Davis and Beaufort families since the 18th century: part of the collection of drawings done by Samuel Davis, of India and other places that he was sent to in the course of his career with the East India Company. Most of his drawings of India became part of the collection of the Director General of Archaeology of India; Marion and then Mona inherited the others. The pictures owned by Mona Fowle have now been published as Views of Medieval Bhutan: The Diary and Drawings of Samuel Davis 1783 by Samuel Davis and Michael Aris. Published Serindia 1982. In the book's introduction, on p39, Aris states Mona was the only child of Marion, daughter of Leicester Beaufort; and that Mona married Brigadier-General Francis Fowle in 1930. The drawings and diary remained in the Fowle family until 1967 when they were bought by the Paul Mellon Collection at the Yale Center for British Art, which is where they are now.

7 January 2012

AMandragora@attglobal.net

Mrs Ida BENNETT was initiated into the Golden Dawn in December 1900 and took the Latin motto 'Bene tenax', a play on her own surname.

By 1900 the administrators at the GD were not noting down the addresses of new initiates. However, in 1896 Ida Bennett had joined the Theosophical Society (TS) and the address she gave them was The Grange, Pulham St Mary, Harleston in Norfolk, so I did have somewhere to start when looking for her. All new applicants to the TS had to have two sponsors and I learned at the outset WHO SHE KNEW IN THE GOLDEN DAWN because both her sponsors were members of the GD already: Louisa Florence ffoulkes and Hugh Elliot (full name John Hugh Armstrong Elliot).

Ida Bennett was born in Birmingham during 1849 into a newly wealthy family. She was a daughter of Wright Turner whose firm, Wright Turner and Sons owned Kingsford Mill at Brindle Heath in Salford where by 1861 250 people were employed to make rope, twine and cotton bands. Wright Turner seems to have been the typical self-made Victorian man: starting out with a small enterprise making twine only, in his home-town of Hayfield in Derbyshire and ending with two seasons as mayor of Salford, 1864/65 and 1865/66 before dying in 1880 with a personal fortune of around £140,000 (which would of course have gone a lot further in 1880 than it does now).

Wright Turner and his wife Anna (or possibly Anne, the censuses are not consistent) had a large family - four girls (Ida was the third) and three boys but there was money enough coming in for them all to live in some luxury: in 1861 a cook, a nurse and a housemaid were employed by them; and Ida was one of only a handful of members of the GD to have grown up in a house that had a butler - this was serious money. However, it may not have gained Ida any better an education than a girl from a less rich background. The family did not employ a governess in 1861, so I suppose the daughters were going to a local school, probably one which didn't provide much in the way of intellectual challenge to its pupils. Certainly her subsequent career gives the impression of a woman for whom marriage and family were all the focus she wanted - more or less.

The sons, of course, were destined to join the family business, although like many newly-rich manufacturers, Wright Turner did encourage at least his eldest boy, William Alfred, to have interests that stretched beyond the mill. William Alfred became the firm's junior partner and took over when Wright Turner died in 1880 but he was also one of the first collectors of the works of Dante Gabriel Rossetti. He started out modestly by buying a watercolour drawing in the early 1870s but later bought several large works including Joli Coeur (painted 1867 and now in the Manchester City Art Gallery) Proserpine (painted 1877); and commissioned A Vision of Fiammetta (painted 1878 and now owned by Andrew Lloyd Webber). William Alfred Turner and Rossetti corresponded from 1873 and finally met in 1877 during negotiations for the purchase of a chalk drawing called Water Willow. It may have been William Alfred's interest in the use of new inventions which prompted Wright Turner's mill to become the first factory in the Manchester area to install electric lighting. William Alfred was a director of the Edison Electric Lighting Company for a time.

Throughout my research on the members of the Golden Dawn it has always been easier to find out about the men in their lives than about the GD's women members. In the case of Ida Turner, however, I'm not sure that there's very much more to find. Her life seems to have been very ordinary!

I hope that Ida saw and appreciated William Alfred's pre-Raphaelite paintings but by the time he had bought the first one, she had left Salford. In the summer of 1869 she had married Adrian Bennett, a captain in the 7th Regiment of Foot. He was considerably older than Ida and had seen a lot of tough service, in the Crimean War at the battles of Alma and Inkerman and the siege of Sebastopol; and then on the Indian North-West frontier in the 1860s in the continuing (and they continue until this day) struggles to pacify the hill-tribes. I think these hard years' work may have damaged his health because although he was promoted to major in 1871 and then to lieutenant-colonel, Bennett seems to have been given two relatively undemanding postings in the early years of his marriage and then gone into semi-retirement. Ida began her marriage following her husband's postings in Weymouth, where her son Lacy Walter Bennett was born in 1870; Portsea (part of Portsmouth); and possibly Colchester for a while; before settling in Norfolk. She and Adrian had two more children, Ethel in 1875 and Ida Gwynedd in 1876.

By the day of the 1881 census and again in 1891 Ida, Adrian and their children were living at a house called The Grange, in the small village of Pulham St Mary Virgin in Norfolk. Do I get the impression Ida was trying to have the quiet, traditional rural life that was as far from the way she had grown up as she could get? Even her household was more modest than the one she had been used to as a child. The only servants to live in were a cook and a couple of housemaids. The only things she did that were not entirely what might be expected of her by her neighbours were joining the TS and the GD; and she can't have been an active member of either, living in a remote part of Norfolk.

Ida's daughter Ethel married the Rev William Cleaver in 1894 and produced Ida's first grandchild, Denis. Her son Lacy married Maude Sutherland in 1900. And her younger daughter Ida (possibly called Gwynedd rather than Ida) married Frederic Doggett in 1908. Despite being so much younger than her husband Ida Bennett died first, aged only 62, in 1910. Adrian Bennett lived on through the world war, dying at the end of 1918.

BASIC SOURCES I USED for all Golden Dawn members.

Membership of the Golden Dawn: The Golden Dawn Companion by R A Gilbert. Northampton: The Aquarian Press 1986. Between pages 125 and 175, Gilbert lists the names, initiation dates and addresses of all those people who became members of the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn or its many daughter Orders between 1888 and 1914.

The list is based on the Golden Dawn's administrative records and its Members' Roll - the large piece of parchment on which all new members signed their name at their initiation. All this information had been inherited by Gilbert but it's now in the Freemasons' Library at the United Grand Lodge of England building on Great Queen Street Covent Garden.

Family history: freebmd; ancestry.co.uk (census and probate); findmypast.co.uk; familysearch; Burke's Peerage and Baronetage; Burke's Landed Gentry; Armorial Families; thepeerage.com; and a wide variety of family trees on the web.

Famous-people sources: mostly about men, of course, but very useful even for the female members of GD. Oxford Dictionary of National Biography. Who Was Who. Times Digital Archive.

Catalogues: British Library; Freemasons' Library.

Wikipedia; Google; Google Books - my three best resources. I also used other web pages, but with some caution, as - from the historian's point of view - they vary in quality a great deal.

FOR IDA TURNER BENNETT

The Wright Turner and Son Ltd company: lists of archives at Bolton Archive and Local Studies Service and Greater Manchester Records Office both accessed via the web. Also History, Topography and Directory of Derbyshire published by T Bulmer and C0 1895 p184. Transactions of the Manchester Association of Engineers issue of 1887 p255. Probate Registry records accessed via Ancestry.

Connection with Rossetti: Correspondence of Dante Gabriel Rossetti: the Last Decade edited by William Evan Fredeman 2006 p42-43. <http://www.nationalarchives.gov.uk>

For the Theosophical Society (TS): Members' Registers 1888-1900 held at the TS headquarters in Gloucester Place London W1.

2 May 2012

AMandragora@attglobal.net

Marcus Worsley Blackden (known as 'Worsley' not Marcus) was initiated into the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn at its Isis-Urania temple in London on 27 August 1896. Irene Augusta Lloyd was initiated as part of the same ritual, but I don't think the two of them knew each other beforehand. Although he had little occult experience, Worsley Blackden worked his way quickly through the study needed to be eligible for the GD's inner 2nd Order, and was initiated into that on 6 November 1897. He played a prominent role in the turbulent period 1900-1903, and then joined one of the two daughter orders that were founded in 1903.

BEFORE I GET STARTED a huge 'thank you' to MWB's great-grand-daughter Nadine, of Ontario, Canada, for all the photos of paintings and family documents that she sent me.

There would have been much less of this 'life by dates' without them!

There are plenty of sources for some of the events in Worsley Blackden's life, so I've decided to do a 'life-by-dates' set of three files; in which he'll appear as 'MWB'. This is the first file: YOUTH and BACKGROUND. The other two are: Egypt and the GD; and After the GD. Standing rather outside the sequence are two examples of Blackden's work on the Book of the Dead - translations of chapter 62; and of the Hymn to Osiris.

1761

The wealth of the 19th and 20th century Blackden family was established by the latest of many Benjamin Blackdens born into the family, who bought the old City of London gates of Cripplegate, Aldersgate and Moorgate from the Corporation of London, with permission to demolish.

1764

A Benjamin Blackden who may have been the same man as in 1761, or his son, obtained from the Corporation of London a lease of a thousand-foot length of frontage on Fore Street and Coleman Street, where the gates at Cripplegate and Moorgate had stood.

A condition of Benjamin Blackden's lease was that he develop the land within the next four years; a duty he carried out by building warehouses, residences and shops, rents from which formed the basis of the family income for the next 170-odd years.

Sources for 1761 and 1764:

Cripplegate: One of the Twenty-Six Wards of the City of London by John James Baddeley: p15, p244. Privately printed; no date on title page but Baddeley's introduction is dated December 1921. Sources for individual items of evidence are not specified in the book but there are photographs of records now held by the City Lands Committee; and references to contemporary Wills. Text of book seen at www.mocavo.co.uk.

Times Friday 3 August 1934 p6 Estate Market column.

APRIL 1824

Marriage (at St George's Hanover Square) of MWB's grandparents on the Blackden side: John Chalfont Blackden son of Benjamin; and Isabella Worsley.

Sources: Gentleman's Magazine 1824 p368 marriages during April. The New Monthly volume 12 1824 p277.

19 NOVEMBER 1825

Death of MWB's great-grandfather Benjamin Blackden, the grandson or great-grandson of the 1761 Benjamin Blackden.

The marriages of the man himself (to a Cayley), his children and his grand-children, established the thicket of cousin-relationships between the Blackden, Cayley, Worsley, Hollond and Franklyn families; the Hall and Browne families were slightly less closely connected.

Source for his death: PROB 11/1705/322 Will of Benjamin Blackden of Hitchenden Buckinghamshire. Now held at the Public Record Office; see discovery.nationalarchives.gov.uk.

Sources for the inter-marriages: look on the web using the individual surnames. For the Cayley family see Debrett's Baronetage issue of 1828 p203 on the family of Sir Thomas Cayley 5th baronet. For the Hollond and Franklyn families see A Genealogical and Heraldic Dictionary of the Landed Gentry volume 3 p167; from which it becomes relatively clear that MWB and the woman he eventually married were related several times over.

OCTOBER or NOVEMBER 1826

Birth of MWB's father Marcus Seton Blackden, second son of John Chalfont Blackden and Isabella née Worsley.

Marcus Seton Blackden had one older brother and one younger brother - Frederick and Walter; and three sisters - Mary Isabella, Fanny and Ada.

Source: Familysearch England-EASy GS film numbers. Specifically for Marcus Seton Blackden: England-EASy GS film number 1279474 baptisms at Warfield Buckinghamshire.

11 JUNE 1862

MWB's father Marcus Seton Blackden married Fanny Franklyn, daughter of Rev Thomas Ward Franklyn. Fanny's sister Sophia had already married Marcus Seton's brother Frederick.

Sources: Gentleman's Magazine vol 213 p97. A Genealogical and Heraldic Dictionary of the Landed Gentry volume 3 p167.

FIRST QUARTER 1863

Birth of MWB's elder, military, brother, Leonard Shadwell Blackden.

Source: birth registration freebmd.

JANUARY 1863

MWB's aunt Mary Blackden died. She lived at Radipole near Weymouth, and at 17 Wilton Crescent, with her brother Rev Charles Blackden; and he inherited some at least of her estate.

Source: Probate Registry.

AUGUST 1864

Birth of Marcus Worsley Blackden, known as Worsley'. His parents were living at Upton in Worcestershire at that time.

Sources: A Genealogical and Heraldic Dictionary of the Landed Gentry later ed 1937 p176 - children of Marcus Seton Blackden.

MAY 1866

MWB's aunt Henrietta Blackden died. Like her sister Mary (died 1863) Henrietta lived with her brother Rev Charles Blackden; and left him some at least of her money.

Source: Probate Registry.

CENSUS DAY 1871

MWB, his brother Leonard and his parents Marcus Seton Blackden and Fanny, were all visiting MWB's grandfather John Chalfont Blackden, in Worcestershire.

Source: 1871 census.

SPRING 1872

GD member MWB's sister Ada Mary born

Source: birth registration freebmd.

FIRST QUARTER 1876

Death of MWB and Ada Mary's mother Fanny Blackden née Franklyn, aged 41.

Marcus Seton and Fanny Blackden had moved from Worcestershire to Malvern, perhaps in search of better health for Fanny. When Fanny died, they were living at Larch Hill Malvern Wells.

Source for the death: death registration freebmd. Source for where MWB was living: The Malvern Register 1865-1904 originally compiled by L S Milward and E C Bullock; I saw the 2nd edition, updated by R T C Cookson and published in 1905: p98.

JANUARY TO EASTER 1876 - that is to say, around the time of his mother's death.

MWB and his brother Leonard were day pupils at Malvern School. Leonard had started at the school in September 1875; they both left at Easter 1876.

Source: The Malvern Register 1865-1904 originally compiled by L S Milward and E C Bullock; I saw the 2nd edition, updated by R T C Cookson and published in 1905: p91, p96, p98.

5 NOVEMBER 1880

Death of MWB's grandfather John Chalfont Blackden, at his house at Aspley Guise Woburn.

He left an estate worth over £50,000. Marcus Seton Blackden and his two brothers were the executors of the Will; and I would imagine they were the major beneficiaries as well.

Source: probate registry.

SEPTEMBER 1880 TO APRIL 1882

MWB was a pupil at Repton School

Sources: Repton School Register Supplement to the 1910 Edition published by the School 1922, edited by the widow of Mr G S Messiter: p89, p94. More generally on Repton School see its own website at www.repton.org.uk and its wikipedia page. Ex-pupils from later eras include Christopher Isherwood, Basil Rathbone, archbishop Ramsey, Graeme Garden and Jeremy Clarkson.

CENSUS DAY 1881

It was term-time so MWB was at Repton School Burton-on-Trent. His widowed father Marcus Seton Blackden had gone to live with his uncle (MWB's great-uncle) Rev Charles Blackden at 17 Wilton Crescent in Belgravia.

Sources: census.

2 JULY 1883

Death of MWB and Ada Mary's uncle Rev Charles Blackden of Wilton Crescent Knightsbridge.

Sources: Times Wednesday 4 July 1883 p1 death announcements.

Probate Registry; death registration freebmd.

Illustrated London News of 8 September 1883 p246.

Comment by Sally Davis: inheriting money from his dead sisters Mary and Henrietta (see 1863 and 1866) in addition to his inheritance from his father, the Rev Charles left personal effects worth over £66,000, and his share of the family property on Fore Street near Moorgate. The bulk of his property went to his nephews, Marcus Seton Blackden and his brothers Frederick and Walter.

1884

MWB and Ada Mary's father Marcus Seton Blackden married for a second time. His bride was Mary Elizabeth Cotter (born 1851) whose mother was a member of the Hall family.

Sources for Joseph Rogerson Cotter the younger:

At www.bryan-martin.net a family tree of the elder Joseph Rogerson Cotter the elder (1790-1868) and his descendants through his 18 children.

For Joseph Rogerson Cotter the younger see www.thepeerage.com which uses Burke's Peerage as its main source.

1884

Birth of Theodora Cayley Blackden, daughter of Marcus Seton Blackden and Mary Elizabeth; half-sister of MWB and Ada Mary.

Source: birth registration though without full names, freebmd.

SPRING 1885

Birth of MWB's first cousin and future wife Hilda Alethea Franklyn. Her parents were Hollond Franklyn, brother of MWB's mother Fanny; and Hollond's second wife Lottie née Alves Jones, the daughter of a businessman with interests in England and New York.

Comment by Sally Davis: at the time of Hilda's birth, her parents were living at Waltham St Lawrence in Berkshire; Hilda's brother Alwyn was also born there, in 1897. They didn't remain there long, however: by 1896 they had leased Longcroft Hall at Yoxall near Lichfield.

Sources: for the birth - registration freebmd.

For Longcroft Hall see

* www.genuki.org.uk quote from History, Gazetteer and Directory of Staffordshire 1851.

* www.visionofbritain.org.uk which uses Imperial Gazetteer of England and Wales compiled by John Marius Wilson and published 1870-72.

* at ln.matthewbeckett.com Lost Heritage there's a photograph of Longcroft Hall, looking rather grim; it has since been demolished.

* at places.wishful-thinking-org.uk there's a transcription done in 2012 of Kelly's Directory of Staffordshire issue of 1896.

AUGUST 1885

MWB came of age.

Source: A Genealogical and Heraldic Dictionary of the Landed Gentry later ed 1937 p176 - children of Marcus Seton Blackden.

Comment by Sally Davis: unless a different age was specified in the legal documents, on his 21st birthday MWB will have gained access to money and income left to him by the various relations in whose Wills he was a beneficiary. The money was paid through a trust fund, and was enough to make him independent of his father; it also meant he didn't have to work if he didn't chose to. One source says that later in his life he became a journalist; but at least during the time he was going to Egypt and being a member of the GD, he was not doing any paid work.

8 OCTOBER 1885

Death of MWB and Ada Mary's grandmother Mary Blackden née Franklyn, of 6 Norfolk Crescent.

Comment by Sally Davis: Mary Blackden was the most seriously wealthy of all MWB's relations: she left personal estate worth about £90,000. Her nephew Hollond Franklyn (MWB's future father-in-law) was one of her executors.

Source: Probate Registry.

?1886 TO 1888

MWB studied drawing and painting at the Royal Academy Schools. In his last (or only) year there he won a prize in the RA's 'painting of figure from the life' section. As it is not dated, I'm cautiously placing to about this time a self-portrait in oil and pastels that MWB painted.

Sources for the prize: The British Architect: A Journal of Architecture and its Accessory Arts volume 31 July-Dec 1888. Published London: p431 in issue of 14 December 1888: Royal Academy Schools awards. Frederick, Lord Leighton handed out the prizes, in a ceremony on 10 December 1888. And The Magazine of Art London, Paris, New York, Melbourne: Cassell and Co Ltd 1889. At the back in the Chronology of Art section: p xv.

Sources for the self-portrait: the painting, now owned by MWB's great-grand-daughter.

1890

MWB exhibited one work at the Royal Academy and one at the Walker Art Gallery (possibly the same work). The work at the RA was catalogue number 386: An Episode of the Deluge.

Comment by Sally Davis: although MWB had an agent in 1890 - J B Smith of 117 Hampstead Road - he never exhibited any works after 1890.

Sources for what little art work MWB did exhibit:

Royal Academy of Arts. Exhibitors 1769-1904 volume 1 A-D p206.

The Dictionary of British Artists 1880-1940 published by the Antique Collectors' Club 1976: p61.

Seen 19 July 2013, www.bbc.co.uk/yourpaintings which lists 212,055 paintings now in public collections (though not necessarily on display). The website has no works at all by MWB.

?1890

MWB's sculpture Bather Surprised was exhibited. It might be the work exhibited at the Walker Art Gallery.

98cm high by 20cm maximum width by 20 cm maximum depth; plaster finished with bronze; signed.

Sources are all websites of antiques dealers, and none give details of where it was exhibited. The statue was sold by Bamfords Auctioneers on 12 February 2014; it had a reserve price of £200. You can see pictures of it at www.dragon-antiques.com and www.sellingantiques.co.uk; and details of the sale at www.bamfords-auctions.co.uk.

LAST QUARTER 1890

Birth of Seton Blackden, youngest child of Marcus Seton Blackden and his second wife Mary Elizabeth; half-brother of MWB and Ada Mary.

Sources: birth registration though without forenames, freebmd.

WINTER 1890-91

MWB was in Egypt - see that file for further details.

CENSUS DAY 1891

MWB hadn't returned from Egypt yet. His father Marcus Seton and his family - wife Mary Elizabeth, daughters Ada Mary and Theodora, and son Seton, were all living at 16a Oxford Square Paddington, where they employed a cook, two housemaids, a nurse and a nursery maid.

Not very many of the GD members came from a family which could afford that many servants.

Sources: census.

THE NEXT FILE IN THE SEQUENCE IS: EGYPT AND IN THE GD.

BASIC SOURCES I USED for all Golden Dawn members.

Membership of the Golden Dawn: The Golden Dawn Companion by R A Gilbert. Northampton: The Aquarian Press 1986. Between pages 125 and 175, Gilbert lists the names, initiation dates and addresses of all those people who became members of the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn or its many daughter Orders between 1888 and 1914. The list is based on the Golden Dawn's administrative records and its Members' Roll - the large piece of parchment on which all new members signed their name at their initiation. All this information had been inherited by Gilbert but it's now in the Freemasons' Library at the United Grand Lodge of England building on Great Queen Street Covent Garden. Please note, though, that the records of the Amen-Ra Temple in Edinburgh were destroyed in 1900/01. I have recently (July 2014) discovered that some records of the Horus Temple at Bradford have survived, though most have not; however those that have survived are not yet accessible to the public.

For the history of the GD during the 1890s I usually use Ellic Howe's The Magicians of the Golden Dawn: A Documentary History of a Magical Order 1887-1923. Published Routledge and Kegan Paul 1972. Foreword by Gerald Yorke. Howe is a historian of printing rather than of magic; he also makes no claims to be a magician himself, or even an occultist. He has no axe to grind.

Family history: freebmd; ancestry.co.uk (census and probate); findmypast.co.uk; familysearch; Burke's Peerage and Baronetage; Burke's Landed Gentry; Armorial Families; thepeerage.com; and a wide variety of family trees on the web.

Famous-people sources: mostly about men, of course, but very useful even for the female members of GD. Oxford Dictionary of National Biography. Who Was Who. Times Digital Archive.

Useful source for business and legal information: London Gazette and its Scottish counterpart Edinburgh Gazette. Now easy to find (with the right search information) on the web.

Catalogues: British Library; Freemasons' Library.

Wikipedia; Google; Google Books - my three best resources. I also used other web pages, but with some caution, as - from the historian's point of view - they vary in quality a great deal.

18 May 2015

Amandragora@attglobal.net

Find the web pages of Roger Wright and Sally Davis, including my list of people initiated into the Order of the Golden Dawn between 1888 and 1901, at:

http://pws.prserv.net/Roger\_Wright/

Marcus Worsley Blackden (known as 'Worsley' not Marcus) was initiated into the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn at its Isis-Urania temple in London on 27 August 1896. Irene Augusta Lloyd was initiated as part of the same ritual, but I don't think the two of them knew each other beforehand. Although he had little occult experience, Worsley Blackden worked his way quickly through the study needed to be eligible for the GD's inner 2nd Order, and was initiated into that on 6 November 1897. He played a prominent role in the turbulent period 1900-1903, and then joined one of the two daughter orders that were founded in 1903.

BEFORE I GET STARTED and in case you haven't seen the first file in this sequence: a huge 'thank you' to MWB's great-grand-daughter Nadine, of Ontario, Canada, for all the photos of paintings and family documents that she sent me. There would have been much less of this 'life by dates' without them!

There are plenty of sources for some of the events in Worsley Blackden's life, so I've decided to do a 'life-by-dates' set of three files; in which he'll appear as 'MWB'. This is the second file: Egypt and the GD. The first is: Youth and Background; the last is After the GD; and standing rather outside the sequence, two items from Blackden's work on the Book of the Dead: chapter 62, and The Hymn to Osiris.

EGYPT AND THE GOLDEN DAWN

Comment by Sally Davis before we start, on transliterations of ancient Egyptian hieroglyphs. MWB was working in Egypt before the modern standard for transliteration was agreed. So in contemporary sources the place I'm going to type as 'Hatnub' has quite a few other transliterations, for example as 'Hat-nub' and 'Hetnub'.

General information on the personalities of 1890s archaeology in ancient Egypt:

Who was Who in Egyptology London: Egypt Exploration Society 1972 compilers Warren R Dawson and Eric P Uphill. MWB on p29; George Willoughby Fraser p109; Percy Edward Newberry on p216. Also, of course, entries for Howard Carter, Flinders Petrie and others.

?LATE 1880s

By this time if no earlier: MWB was well-acquainted with Egyptian hieroglyphs, both reading and writing them. He'd also read a great deal on ancient Egypt - travellers' tales, accounts of archaeological finds etc.

Comment from Sally Davis on the source for this: I don't actually have a source as such, I've just gained that impression from his work on ancient Egyptian texts.

2 FEBRUARY TO ?SPRING 1891

MWB was working as a volunteer for the Egypt Exploration Fund (not yet calling itself the Egypt Exploration Society) at Beni-Hasan, 170 miles south of Cairo. He had offered to help the expedition members in their task of colouring in tracings of wall paintings, but soon became involved in other tasks. The EEF's surveyor George Willoughby Fraser stayed on at the site until June 1891 but everyone else seems to have left several months before; including MWB I would suppose.

Comments by Sally Davis. The site called Beni Hasan was a set of 11th and 12th dynasty rock-cut tombs, on the eastern side of the Nile. The EEF's work there was part of its Archaeological Survey of Egypt project. Winter was the digging season in Egypt so the EEF's two-man survey team arrived in November 1891 and set up home in one of the tombs. MWB seems to have been acquainted already with Percy Newberry, the survey team's leader. MWB appeared at Beni Hasan some weeks after the survey work began, as an independent traveller. As a trained artist his offer to help out was very welcome, both to those doing the survey and to their bosses in London. Newberry might also have welcomed a third person to the team as he and George Willoughby Fraser were very different types and didn't really get on. The task facing the survey team was enormous: the tombs were being robbed and left open to the elements and 12000 square feet of wall-paintings needed recording before they disintegrated. His main task was to take the tracings already done by Percy Newberry as his template, and colour them in, trying to use colours and shades as close to the original colours as he could. But he helped out in other ways as well: he designed a set of pulleys to help lift a fallen column upright; and a hoist to speed the removal of 40 tons of debris from two shafts which led down to the tomb of Khnumhotep. Despite the trouble they had reaching Khnumhotep's tomb, the EEF's men still found that tomb-robbers had got there first.

Sources:

Times Monday 23 February 1891 p13 Amelia Edwards' report to the EEF's 4th ordinary general meeting held in London.

Times Thursday 18 June 1891 p12 The Royal Society - Ladies' Conversazione.

Egypt Exploration Fund Special Extra Report: The Season's Work at Ahnas and Beni Hasan. This volume covers work done in 1890-91 and contains an introduction by Amelia Edwards and reports by Édouard Naville on Ahnas (also spelled Hanes or Henassieh); and by Percy Newberry and George Willoughby Fraser on Beni Hasan. Published 1891 London: Gilbert and Rivington Ltd for the EEF.

Archaeological Survey of Egypt. Beni Hasan Part 1. As volume one of the EEF's Archaeological Survey of Egypt, series editor: F L Griffith BA FSA. Authors Percy Newberry with plans and measurements by George Willoughby Fraser. Published 1893 London: Gilbert and Rivington Ltd for the EEF.

That MWB and Newberry had met before 1891; and more on Beni Hasan:

Howard Carter: the Path to Tutankhamun by T G H James. Kegan Paul International 1992: pp12, pp15-28.

17 JUNE 1891

The Egypt Exploration Fund took some wall space at a Royal Society evening event at Burlington House; and showed some of MWB's coloured copies of wall paintings from Beni Hasan. There were also some wall paintings from the tombs of Ameni and Khnumhotep on display.

Times Thursday 18 June 1891 p12 The Royal Society - Ladies' Conversazione. The guest list as reproduced in the Times only covered the great and good, unfortunately, so it's not clear whether MWB actually went to the soirée.

MID-DECEMBER 1891 TO 2 JANUARY 1892

MWB was in Egypt again, doing another session with the EEF as a volunteer. This time he was at El Bersheh, a site of middle-kingdom tombs. As well as doing copying and colouring work he also acted as George Willoughby Fraser's assistant surveyor.

Comment by Sally Davis: perhaps this time MWB was taken on as a volunteer by prior arrangement rather than just turning up. Percy Newberry and George Willoughby Fraser were working together again at El Bersheh; but this time they had with them Howard Carter, just starting out on his career. With Carter doing most of the work tracing and copying the wall-paintings, MWB and George Willoughby Fraser worked together to survey the whole valley; unlike Beni Hasan where the tombs were all in a line like a street of houses, the tombs at El Bersheh were scattered over a wide area.

Sources:

For the survey at El Bersheh: Archaeological Survey of Egypt: El Bersheh. Part I: The Tomb of Tehuti-Hetep by Percy E Newberry; with a plan and measurements of the tomb by G Willoughby Fraser FSA. London: Special Publication of the Egypt Exploration Fund 1895. Based on Newberry's records and his reports to the EEF Council. The frontispiece of this volume is MWB's copy of part of a frieze from El Bersheh Tomb 2, the tomb of Tehutihetep. It shows a young woman holding a lotus flower. MWB's copies of wall-paintings also appear in later volumes on El Bersheh.

Archaeological Survey of Egypt: El Bersheh. Part II series editor F L Griffith, BA FSA. Authors: F L Griffith and Percy E Newberry with plan and measurements of the tombs by George Willoughby Fraser FSA. London: special publication of the EEF 1895. This volume contains most of the reproductions of the wall-paintings but only Plate V was coloured by MWB. Most of the reproductions were coloured by Percy Newberry and by another, later, volunteer, Rosalind Paget. For MWB's surveying work at El Bersheh: Willoughby Fraser's report: p55.

CHRISTMAS 1891

MWB, Percy Newberry and George Willoughby Fraser spent the Christmas holiday as guests of Robert Hanbury Brown, an Irrigation Inspector working for the Egyptian government.

Source:

Howard Carter: the Path to Tutankhamun by T G H James. Kegan Paul International 1992: pp12-15-28.

More on Major Brown, Royal Engineers:

The Knights of England p393 Major RHB was knighted in the list issued 6 December 1902, as Inspector-General of Irrigation for Lower Egypt.

At www.sussex-opc.org LG 25 June 1926 p4161 list issued und Trustee Act 1925 includes Robert Hanbury Brown of Newlands, Crawley Down Sussex WHO'D DIED on 4 May 1926 CHECK WHO WAS WHO. THIS WILL HAVE TO WAIT UNTIL YOU GET BACK TO LONDON

Some publications by RHB:

The Fayum and Lake Moeris London: Edward Stanford 1892.

The Land of Goshen and the Exodus London: Edward Stanford 1899.

Irrigation: its Principles and Practice as a Branch of Engineering London: A Constable and Co 1907.

28 DECEMBER 1891

Percy Newberry, MWB and George Willoughby Fraser made a short trip to what they had been told was a tomb but turned out to be the alabaster quarries at Hatnub. The quarries had supplied the alabaster for the rulers who had been buried at El Bersheh but Newberry decided that they didn't really have time to investigate them further at the moment. This annoyed MWB and Willoughby Fraser who sent a report on their discovery to London for publication.

Sources:

Times Monday 3 October 1892 p14 The Alabaster Quarries of Ha-Nub: letter from MWB and G Willoughby Fraser.

Proceedings of the Society of Biblical Archaeology volume 16 November 1893-December 1894 published 1894 by the Society. In the full volume pp78-82 an article that had originally appeared in issue number 19, that of the 9 January 1894: G Willoughby Fraser FSA: Hat-Nub.

Howard Carter: the Path to Tutankhamun by T G H James. Kegan Paul International 1992: pp12-15-28 though James seems to imply that only MWB and Willoughby Fraser went to Hatnub; that Newberry wasn't with them, having had a surfeit of their company over Christmas.

EARLY-JANUARY 1892

The work at El Bersheh was finished and Percy Newberry returned to England to begin the follow-up work. MWB and George Willoughby Fraser went back to Hatnub and started to survey and record the inscriptions that they found there.

Sources: G Willoughby Fraser in Proceedings of the Society of Biblical Archaeology 1894: 78-82.

Comment by Sally Davis: MWB and Willoughby Fraser's work at Hatnub was their own idea, and they seem to have financed it themselves (that is to say, MWB probably came up with the money); it wasn't an official part of the EEF's survey work.

23 JANUARY 1892

MWB and Willoughby Fraser's account of the discovery of the quarries at Hatnub was published in London.

Howard Carter: the Path to Tutankhamun by T G H James. Kegan Paul International 1992: pp12, pp15-28. The account appeared in the magazine The Academy issue of 23 January 1892.

LATER IN JANUARY 1892

MWB returned to Beni Hasan to finish off the work he had been doing there; but he became ill in February, and had to stop.

Source for the dates and what MWB did on his return to Beni Hasan:

Archaeological Survey of Egypt. Beni Hasan Part 1. As volume one of the EEF's Archaeological Survey of Egypt, series editor: F L Griffith BA FSA. Beni Hasan Part 1 by Percy Newberry with plans and measurements by George Willoughby Fraser. Published London 1893. Printed for the EEF by Gilbert and Rivington Ltd of London.

Comment by Sally Davis: it's easy to get ill in hot climates, of course, but even contemporary sources suggested that MWB's illness was the result of the bad feeling that now existed between him and senior EEF employees (mainly Newberry but also Flinders Petrie and others) over the expedition to Hatnub made by MWB and George Willoughby Fraser. They had made it without Newberry's consent and had used time which he wanted Willoughby Fraser to spend concentrating on writing up El Bersheh - Newberry had a deadline of November 1892 to meet, by which time all the work on El Bersheh had to be finished. Later in 1892 the artist Percy Buckman was sent by the EEF to finish the tracing and copying work MWB had not been able to; Percy Buckman's sister Katherine Julia later joined the GD. It had been mooted within the the EEF that MWB might be offered more training with Newberry at Beni Hasan and Flinders Petrie at Tell al Amarna during the 1891/1892 digging season, with a view to employing him as an archaeologist. Newberry was also considering publishing a book of MWB's watercolour copies of wall paintings. But MWB's behaviour over the quarries at Hatnub changed people's minds. MWB never worked for the EEF again, even as a volunteer; George Willoughby Fraser ceased to be an EEF employee; and when Percy Newberry left the EEF in 1894, the difficulties he'd had with the two men were thought to be one of his reasons for seeking another employer. The EEF trained Howard Carter instead.

Sources for the bad feeling about the behaviour of MWB and George Willoughby Fraser, all of which are using the EEF's own records amongst others:

Saluki: The Desert Hound and the English Travelers who brought it to the West. By Brian P Duggan with foreword by Terence Clark. Jefferson North Carolina: McFarland 2009: p55.

Flinders Petrie: A Life in Archaeology by Margaret S Drower. University of Wisconsin Press 1st edition 1985; this is from the 2nd edition, published 1995: p171, pp186-193.

Howard Carter: the Path to Tutankhamun by T G H James. Kegan Paul International 1992: pp12-15-28.

DURING 1892

MWB remained in Egypt for at least part of the year. He and George Willoughby Fraser made two more expeditions to Hatnub, surveying the quarries, compiling a map and tracing and copying the many inscriptions (in ancient Egyptian hieratic script) that they found there.

Sources: G Willoughby Fraser Proceedings of the Society of Biblical Archaeology 1894: 78-82; and Times Monday 3 October 1892 p14.

Comment from Sally Davis: there was no water supply at Hatnub so each night a camel had to be sent to bring back a day's supply. However, the results were worth the difficult conditions: MWB and Willoughby Fraser found a second quarry, evidence of several rockfalls, and remains of the houses and tools used by the masons. From the graffiti they identified several kings previously unknown to archaeologists; and they were able to work out that the quarries had been in use from the time of the 4th ancient Egyptian dynasty to about the 12th.

MID SEPTEMBER 1892

MWB and George Willoughby Fraser, finishing off their work at Hatnub, sent a short account of what they had found there to the Times newspaper.

Source: Times Monday 3 October 1892 p14 The Alabaster Quarries of Ha-Nub: letter from MWB and J Willoughby Fraser; written 15 September [1892] at Dahobyah Strange Hathor, Manfalût.

Comment by Sally Davis: I think the letter was by way of preparation for the publication of the graffiti they had copied at Hatnub:

Collection of Hieratic Graffiti from the Alabaster Quarry of Hat-nub (sic) situated near Tell el Amarna. "For Private Circulation Only"; there's no indication of how many copies were printed. No date of publication appears in the volume but the British Library catalogue dates it as 1892. Just noting that T G H James thought the publication was a poor-quality one, particularly in not having an introduction: see Howard Carter: the Path to Tutankhamun by T G H James. Kegan Paul International 1992: p27.

3 OCTOBER 1892

Times published MWB and G Willoughby Fraser's letter.

BY 1894

MWB was back in England - at least, I think his two paintings dated 1894 were done in England. Never exhibited to my knowledge, they were two portraits, meant to be a set. They're both now owned by MWB's great-grand-daughter. Both dated "1894" and initialled "WB". One of the two was a self-portrait.

Source: the portraits, photographed 2014 by MWB's great-grand-daughter.

Comment by Sally Davis: In his self-portrait MWB showed himself wearing a light brown suit, sitting in a chair against a dark background. MWB has a neat beard; both it and his hair are grey, making him look older than you'd expect a man who was 30 to look. Perhaps this was the effect of a couple of years in north Africa. MWB's great-grand-daughter is sure the companion portrait is of Hilda Franklyn, MWB's wife-to-be. However, I would question this: Hilda (born 1885) was only 9 at the time it was painted. The subject is clearly a woman in her twenties or thirties, sitting reading in what looks like a nice conservatory. It's more likely to be Hilda's mother Lottie Franklyn, née Alves Jones; or maybe his sister Ada Mary (then aged 22). Either that or MWB is looking to a future in which he and an adult Hilda will be companion pieces; that might also explain how old MWB looks in his self-portrait - that's how he will look when Hilda is an adult.

1895

MWB bought a copy of Collectanea Hermetica volume 6 - The Chaldaean Oracles of Zoroaster.

Source: the book, now in the Freemasons' Library, with MWB's name in pencil on it and annotations to some pages, also assumed to be by him. Publication details: Collectanea Hermetica Volume 6: The Chaldaean Oracles attributed to Zoroaster. Series editor: Sapere Aude. Introduction by LO. Translated and with a preface by William Wynn Westcott. Published 1895 London: Theosophical Publishing Society. And Madras: office of The Theosophist, Adyar.

Comments by Sally Davis: there's nothing remarkable in MWB buying a book, of course, and this book was not so far from his interests as you might think - the introduction argued that the Oracles should be studied with the Kabbalah, Egyptian theology and the tarot (which was also thought to have Egyptian origins) in mind. However, probably unbeknown to him at this stage, MWB was making first contact with the GD. The Collectanea Hermetica series, though available to the public, was a GD project: William Wynn Westcott as Sapere Aude was the series' editor and the contributors were GD members, the contributor in this case being Levavi Oculos - Percy William Bullock.

See wikipedia for more on the Chaldaean Oracles which are now thought to be not ancient Persian as Westcott assumed, but Hellenistic, probably from 2nd century AD.

17 FEBRUARY 1896

Several years after he had gone off in a huff (his own account) or become persona non grata (account of the GD's SRIA members) a ballot of members allowed A E Waite back into the GD's Isis-Urania Temple.

Source for the readmittance: Freemasons' Library GD collection GD 2/3/1/9: the certificate which readmitted him.

Comment by Sally Davis. There was an on-off friendship between A E Waite and Robert Palmer-Thomas during the 1890s and early 1900s. It was Palmer-Thomas whose enthusiasm for what was going on in the GD persuaded Waite to ask to be taken on again. During his second-time-round membership Waite despised William Wynn Westcott and Samuel Liddell Mathers just as much as he had done after his original initiation in 1891. But he did stay a member for rather longer this second time; and got to know MWB well.

Source for AEW's side of it:

Shadows of Life and Thought: A Retrospective Review in the Form of Memoirs by Arthur Edward Waite. London: Selwyn & Blount of Paternoster House EC4 1938 pp159-160.

LATE 1896

Florence Farr's treatise on Egyptian Magic was published.

Source:

Collectanea Hermetica volume VIII, which contains the article Egyptian Magic by SSDD (shorthand form of Sapientia Sapienti Dono Data - GD motto of Florence Farr). Series editor William Wynn Westcott as Sapere Aude. London: Theosophical Publishing Society 1896.

Comment by Sally Davis: there's no direct evidence that MWB owned a copy of Florence Farr's treatise but I find it hard to believe he would not want to have a copy, once he'd found out about it. It's just possible, I suppose, that MWB joined the GD in time to have been able to contribute some input to Florence Farr's work - but that's just speculation on my part.

27 AUGUST 1896

MWB was initiated into the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn, at its Isis-Urania temple in London.

Source: R A Gilbert's The Golden Dawn Companion p156.

Comment by Sally Davis: MWB may have had friends in the GD in 1895-96 - though they weren't supposed to let on about it to non-members - but he could equally easily have contacted Westcott or Bullock via Collectanea Hermetica's publisher, and been drawn in to the GD that way.

MWB's motto is an interesting one: Ma Wahanu Thesi, which I've never seen translated. I very cautiously suggest that it's MWB's transliteration of some Egyptian hieroglyphs.

MWB will have been particularly sought-after as a possible initiate: although many members of the GD were interested in the religions and magic of ancient Egypt, hardly any members had actually been to the country to see its famous sites or had been able to master ancient Egyptian hieroglyphs and hieratic script. Once he was a member, MWB would have gained access to the GD's own literature on ancient Egyptian magic, much of which circulated amongst the members in manuscript; including Florence Farr's The Book of the Concourse of the Forces which contained watercolour drawings of Egyptian gods.

Source for the book: Freemasons' Library GD collection GD 2/1/8: The Book of the Concourse of the Forces; with date 12 October 1893.

A more mundane comment: in 1896 MWB's address for post from the GD was 16a Oxford Square, Paddington but he didn't do more than stay there occasionally, it wasn't his home but his father's. Marcus Seton Blackden seems to have moved into the house in preparation for his second marriage to Mary Elizabeth Cotter in 1884. They were living there with their daughter and son, and MWB's full-sister Ada Mary.

6 NOVEMBER 1897

MWB was initiated into the GD's inner, 2nd Order - until you had achieved this second initiation, you were not allowed to do any practical magic.

Source: RAG Companion p156.

Comment by Sally Davis: from original initiation to 2nd Order initiation within 15 months was rare in the GD for a number of good reasons. MWB had an advantage over most new initiates when it came to doing the study-work and exams quickly - he knew a lot about Egyptian magic and symbolism already; and he didn't have to go to work or run a household and family. Nevertheless, the speed at which he gained that level of proficiency in the western occult tradition is impressive.

DURING 1898

MWB spent much of the year living in East Anglia, in Norwich and at Oulton Broad in Suffolk. He joined the Norfolk and Norwich Art Circle and exhibited with them.

MID-1898

MWB joined the Sphere Group, a sub-group within the GD led by Florence Farr.

Sources:

R A Gilbert's The Golden Dawn Companion

Ellic Howe's The Magicians of the Golden Dawn (full details in the Sources section below) pp250-51; quoting a later account of the Group, written by one of its members, Robert William Felkin: The Group As I Knew It.

For the Sphere Group's purpose:

A E Waite: Magician of Many Parts R A Gilbert. Wellingborough: Thorsons Publishing Group Ltd under its 'Crucible' imprint. 1987. Chapter 12 p113.

Cauda Pavonis volumes 11-16 1992: article on the Sphere Group by Sharon E Cogdill pp7-12. Cauda Pavonis was the newsletter/journal of the Hermetic Text Society, published by the Department of English, Washington State University at Pullman, beginning in 1982 though I'm not sure when publication ceased. Some at least of its volumes can be seen at www.alchemywebsite.com/cauda.html

Comments by Sally Davis: information on the Sphere Group isn't all that easy to find - it was an informal group which didn't really keep records. However, Sharon Cogdill was able to say that Florence Farr had originally founded the group to teach Egyptian symbolism and invocation, and it seems to have developed and matured from there. Felkin listed its human members: himself; Ada Waters; Cecilia Macrae; Helen Rand; Florence Kennedy; Florence Farr's sister Henrietta Paget; Robert Palmer Thomas (of whom more later); Edmund Hunter; Dorothea Hunter; Fanny Hunter; and MWB who must have known as much about the subject in terms of ancient Egypt as Florence Farr, but perhaps not as much about the way the ancient symbols might be used in a modern magical order. An astral entity understood by the group's members to be "an Egyptian figure" (to quote Felkin) appeared at the centre of the sphere during the ritual, which lasted about an hour. The members of the group didn't have to be in the same place to play their part in the ritual; but they did have meetings, which would have been an opportunity for MWB to get to know Robert Palmer-Thomas. According to Felkin's account, the group lasted from mid-1898 to 1901, when the astral entity announced that he (sic) would no longer be available to the group; so that it had to be reconstituted.

Sources for East Anglia though unfortunately neither of the websites gives details of what works MWB exhibited in 1898.

Website www.suffolkpainters.co.uk, entry for MWB which has a lovely illustration, one of the copies MWB did at Beni Hasan - a bush full of birds, part of the larger fishing scene from Beni Hasan tomb 14, the tomb of Khnumhotep.

Website www.nnartcircle.com

22 JUNE 1899

MWB's sister Ada Mary was initiated into the Order of the Golden Dawn.

Source: RAG The Golden Dawn Companion p160.

Though never as active a member as her brother, Ada Mary did do the work necessary to be admitted to the 2nd, inner order, on 22 November 1900. She was not a member of either the Independent or Rectified Rite or Stella Matutina.

DATED JUNE 1899

MWB copied out Samuel Liddell Mathers' "Abridged Treatise on the Taro" (sic). This was a set of instructions on how to use tarot cards for divination; and some tables of correspondences between particular tarot cards and symbols from the Kabbalah, colours, and the signs of the zodiac.

Source: the original 214-page volume, now in Freemasons' Library GD collection and signed by MWB: call number GD 2/1/23.

Comment by Sally Davis: being handed a manuscript of magical instructions, for you to copy out, was the usual way of learning in the GD.

1900

Some of MWB's work at Beni Hasan appeared in two small volumes on the site.

Sources:

Beni Hasan 1900, 9 pages. Contributors: Howard Carter, MWB, Percy Brown. I take it this is not the same book as Zoological and Other Details Volume 4 of Beni Hasan, Volume 7 of Memoir. Published by the Archaeological Survey of Egypt. 9 pages. 1900. Contributors: Howard Carter, MWB, Percy Brown, Percy Buckman, Percy Edward Newberry.

DURING 1900

MWB was living at 6 Topsfield Parade Crouch End.

Sources: some of the documents I mention as sources for the trouble in the GD in spring 1900 have this as MWB's address.

DURING 1900

MWB was working on Egyptian compilation known as The Book of the Dead: the meaning of the Pillars which are often referred to in it.

Comment by Sally Davis: this was the beginning of a programme of translating and interpreting The Book of the Dead, which continued until around 1914.

Source:

Yeats's Golden Dawn by George Mills Harper using GD papers kept by Yeats after he resigned, and now in the Yeats' collection in Ireland. London and Basingstoke: Macmillan Press Ltd 1974.

The papers include The Scribe's Account of the Executive Difficulty, prepared 26-27 February 1901 by Annie Horniman, to give her side of the events of a particularly rumbustious meeting of the new GD Council; about which, more below. Specific reference to MWB's talk is on p61. Annie H was infuriated because in order to allow him more time to prepare his talk, MWB was let off doing the "D exam". London and Basingstoke: Macmillan Press Ltd 1974.

FEBRUARY TO APRIL 1900

MWB got caught up in the aftermath of a letter Samuel Liddell Mathers sent Florence Farr, in which he told her that the GD's founding documents were faked.

A summing-up of what happened, in date order: RAG The Golden Dawn Companion pp73-78. See also Ellic Howe.

EARLY MARCH 1900

MWB agreed to join a committee set up by Florence Farr and Percy William Bullock to investigate whether Mathers' allegations were true. At some point before April 1900 he also agreed to take charge of the contents of the Isis-Urania temple, which included manuscripts as well as furniture and other paraphernalia used in rituals.

Comment by Sally Davis: Mathers swore Florence Farr to silence on the subject but after several days of worry she decided she really must tell other senior members of the GD. Although he had not been a member as long as some others, Florence trusted MWB's opinion and discretion enough to make him one of the few people she told.

Source: Freemasons' Library GD collection call number: GD 2/4/3/2.

END MARCH 1900

As the investigation began, Mathers attempted by letter to reassert his authority over the GD members in London.

MID APRIL 1900

Threatening letters having failed, Mathers authorised a group led by Aleister Crowley to take possession of the 2nd Order's rooms at 36 Blythe Road Hammersmith and restore his authority by making every 2nd Order member take a new oath of allegiance. Crowley and his group failed to keep control of the Blythe Road rooms, partly because MWB did not give them the help Mathers and Crowley had expected from him.

A good source for the events in date order: RAG The Golden Dawn Companion pp73-78.

The source I usually use: Ellic Howe's The Magicians of the Golden Dawn: p220; p222 Howe had access to GD archives and also to a copy of Crowley's Abra-Melin diary in which Crowley wrote up his view of what was going on (which is not necessarily to be relied on).

Comment by Sally Davis: not all 2nd Order members had a key to the rooms in Blythe Road. MWB was one of those who did have a key and initially, Mathers hoped that MWB would hand it over to Crowley when asked. But he didn't; Crowley had to ask Dr Berridge instead. Mathers had also told Crowley to ask MWB for a list of the 2nd Order's current members. But MWB didn't hand that over either.

21 APRIL 1900

MWB went to the Mark Masons' Hall in Covent Garden, which was rented by the GD for rituals and meetings involving all the members. He took away various GD props and paraphernalia that were stored there, and hid them in a safe place. He wrote a note to the investigating committee saying he wouldn't allow anyone access to them until the situation with Mathers and Crowley had been resolved.

Source:

Freemasons' Library GD collection call number: GD 2/4/3/28, MWB's note to the other members of the investigating committee, dated 21 April 1900.

Comment by Sally Davis: as you can also see from his actions in Egypt, MWB was rather high-handed. However, his quick action probably saved a lot of the GD's property from falling into the hands of Mathers' supporters in the GD. It seems that the GD's contemporary members never got their possessions back: the hoard passed into the keeping of MWB, and then Helen Rand, as senior members of the Independent and Rectified Rite (for more of this Order see the net file in this life-by-dates sequence) resurfacing in 1930 after Helen's death.

Source: Yeats's Golden Dawn by George Mills Harper using GD papers kept by Yeats after he resigned, and now in the Yeats' collection in Ireland. London and Basingstoke: Macmillan Press Ltd 1974: p155.

21 APRIL 1900

The 2nd Order held a hastily-arranged meeting. At this meeting, MWB was deemed no longer to be a member of the investigating committee. Helen Rand replaced him.

Source: Freemasons' Library GD collection call number: GD 2/4/3/26a, GD 2/4/3/35.

Comment by Sally Davis: Not all the people who attended the meeting of 21 April 1900 are named; but MWB is not amongst the names that are listed. I think he didn't attend the meeting; perhaps if he had, there wouldn't have been so much doubt about which side he was on.

AROUND 21 APRIL 1900

MWB wrote to Samuel Liddell Mathers, asking why Mathers' had refused to cooperate with the investigating committee; and exactly what Crowley's involvement was.

Source: Mathers' reply, in the Freemasons' Library GD collection, call number GD 2/4/3/31.

Comment by Sally Davis:

The letter MWB wrote has been lost, but in his reply Mathers did quote from it and it does seem that MWB had not been tactful in his approach. He had written not in bewilderment, but in some anger at the way Mathers was behaving: "Am I to understand", he'd said, "that there is never to be any truth and light let in upon the Order?" However, he did warn Mathers that the GD members in London were seriously considering a future without him; and asked him what he should do about it. Any criticism of his actions, however slight and politely phrased, always brought out the worst in Mathers and MWB received in reply a rant in which other GD members were called "swine" and "rebellious children" though he himself was only accused of acting with "more precipitation than discretion" and condemned for "the liberty of speech that you have dared to indulge”.

27 APRIL 1900

MWB received a telegram from Aleister Crowley asking him to keep secret the fact that he was acting as Mathers' agent in London.

Comment by Sally Davis: MWB might have dropped out of the investigating committee, but he was not completely on Mathers' side either: he handed over Crowley's telegram to the investigating committee. It was far too late for Crowley to be seeking anonymity: that he was the man who had acted for Mathers in attempting to seize the rooms at Blythe Road was widely known in the GD's 2nd Order.

Source: Freemasons' Library GD collection call number GD 2/4/3/33a-c, which is the telegram, one copy of it and the envelope it was delivered in.

19 APRIL 1900

Mathers and his supporters were expelled from the GD.

21 APRIL 1900

A new, post-Mathers, constitution and administrative/ritual hierarchy was formulated for the GD, in which MWB agreed to serve, as Adeptus Litteratus with responsibility for ceremonial.

Sources: RAG The Golden Dawn Companion pp77-78.

Ellic Howe The Magicians of the Golden Dawn p228. There were seven adepti litterati, each with responsibility for teaching and advising on their particular area of expertise.

Collected Letters of W B Yeats Volume III 1901-94 pp32-33 lists the Council members.

Comment by Sally Davis: the other members of the Executive Council to run the GD from now on were Florence Farr; Dorothea and Edmund Hunter; Henrietta Paget; Helen Rand; and Robert Palmer-Thomas, all of whom were in the Sphere Group; so MWB was amongst friends.

AROUND END APRIL 1900

If MWB had any doubts about whether to remain loyal to Mathers, these must have been eased by receiving SLM's ranting letter from Paris, written on 26 April 1900.

Source: the letter, now in the Freemasons' Library GD collection, call number GD 2/4/3/31.

Comment by Sally Davis: as with the telegram from Crowley; MWB felt enough loyalty to the GD in London to hand them the letter.

NOVEMBER 1900

MWB gave his talk to GD members on the meaning of the Pillars in the Book of the Dead.

Source: Yeats's Golden Dawn by George Mills Harper using GD papers kept by Yeats after he resigned, and now in the Yeats' collection in Ireland. London and Basingstoke: Macmillan Press Ltd 1974; p61.

1901

The Egypt Society was founded, with MWB as its first president.

Source for its founding though the founding date isn't mentioned: Collected Letters of W B

Yeats Volume III 1901-94 p121 note 7.

Comment by Sally Davis: there doesn't seem to be much information on the Egypt Society and perhaps it didn't last very long. It may have only had one purpose: to get a play put on in public, whose subject was taken from ancient Egyptian myth. I would suppose that MWB was elected its first president because he had been very active getting the Society off the ground. It's likely Florence Farr was active too - it was her play.

1901

The Sphere Group was reconstituted with less Egyptian input: the figure at the centre of the sphere now being the Holy Grail.

Source: Robert Felkin's account of the Sphere Group, quoted in Ellic Howe's The Magicians of the Golden Dawn pp250-251 though it's not clear from the account exactly which Sphere Group members moved on to the new group, and which dropped out.

MID-FEBRUARY 1901

GD Council members began to prepare for a Council meeting at which they would discuss a way of holding elections to the Council. MWB sent a letter to the Council secretary (Scribe) Annie Horniman, putting forward 3 motions to be discussed at the meeting; one about alterations to the 5=6 ceremony; 2 others about how the voting in Council elections was to be counted and by whom.

Source: Yeats's Golden Dawn by George Mills Harper using GD papers kept by Yeats after he resigned, and now in the Yeats' collection in Ireland. London and Basingstoke: Macmillan Press Ltd 1974; p37, p41 and p229 et seq.

Comment by Sally Davis: after the meeting Annie Horniman was quite sure that MWB had been acting, not alone but as spokesman for a group of Council members who opposed the ideas she was proposing; I imagine she was right about that.

25 FEBRUARY 1901

MWB played a major role at the GD Council meeting - 2 hours of acrimonious debate over electoral procedure and the existence of cross-rank sub-groups, in which Annie Horniman and W B Yeats were opposed by the majority of the GD Council members. MWB apparently acted as the main spokesman for the majority group, as the meeting fought its way through the agenda.

Sources:

Yeats's Golden Dawn by George Mills Harper using GD papers kept by Yeats after he resigned from the Order; now in the Yeats' collection in Ireland. London and Basingstoke: Macmillan Press Ltd 1974. Particularly the Appendix The Scribe's Account of the Executive Difficulty, Annie Horniman's take on what happened p229 et seq, in which she seems to be blaming MWB for all the uproar; but also pp37-45 and pp61-64.

Collected Letters of W B Yeats Volume III 1901-94 pp32-33.

Ellic Howe The Magicians of the Golden Dawn pp247-251.

Comment by Sally Davis: the meeting went on so long that some of the 12 Council members who'd been there at the start had had to leave. Although most of the debate was about how to carry out elections to the GD Council, the real point on which Annie Horniman and W B Yeats disagreed with everyone else at the meeting was the existence of sub-groups within the Order. The Sphere Group and others like it, had broken the rule of magical orders that subgroups within them could only consist of members at the same level of initiation - that is, the same level of learning and understanding. The 12 who argued against Annie Horniman and W B Yeats had all been members of the Sphere Group - Annie Horniman was all too aware of that; but she didn't understand how much the Sphere Group's members had got, out of being members of it. The meeting ended with a vote 6:2 in favour of the continuation of the sub-groups; Annie Horniman's ideas for the handling of Council elections were also voted out. Annie Horniman and W B Yeats were the '2'; they both resigned from the GD on 27 February 1901.

FEBRUARY 1901-END 1902

Nearly all of the GD Council members who had attended the meeting of 25 February 1901 resigned from the GD; for a variety of reasons. MWB and Helen Rand became de facto leaders of those who remained.

Source for the resignations: Yeats's Golden Dawn by George Mills Harper using GD papers kept by Yeats after he resigned, and now in the Yeats' collection in Ireland. London and Basingstoke: Macmillan Press Ltd 1974: p96. Those who left included some of the GD's most long-serving and respected members: Florence Farr and Henrietta Paget; and Dorothea and Edmund Hunter.

CENSUS DAY (April) 1901

MWB had moved into what might have been a Blackden family-owned house in London - 3 Wells Road Regent's Park. Ada Mary was keeping house for him there.

Sources: family papers; census 1901

SEPTEMBER 1901

MWB and A E Waite were initiated as freemasons at Runymede Lodge. They were both recommended to the Lodge by the GD's W F Kirby who was already a member.

Comment by Sally Davis: there's much more about this in the next of the Blackden 'life by dates' files.

16 NOVEMBER 1901

The Egypt Society staged the play Beloved of Hathor, the Shrine of the Golden Hawk; written by Florence Farr and her friend Olivia Shakespear.

Comment by Sally Davis: the Egypt Society members hired the Victoria Hall, at 21 Archer Street Westbourne Grove, for their production of the play. Olivia Shakespear was not in the GD.

Sources:

Collected Letters of W B Yeats Vol III 1901-94 p121 note 7.

At www.archive.org you can see the full script of Beloved of Hathor, The Shrine of the Golden Hawk. There's an outline of the plot and an introduction about how it should be staged and what the characters in it should wear.

Website www.arthurlloyd.co.uk is a music hall and theatre history site which uses local sources. There's a good section on the Victoria Hall, with photos.

SPRING 1902

The GD changed its name, and a new set of bye-laws was issued.

Comment by Sally Davis: with so many senior GD members resigning, it's likely that MWB played an important role in getting these changes agreed.

Source I used (though there's plenty of other information out there): Yeats's Golden Dawn by George Mills Harper using GD papers kept by Yeats after he resigned, and now in the Yeats' collection in Ireland. London and Basingstoke: Macmillan Press Ltd 1974; p96.

21 and 22 APRIL 1902

There were two more performances of Beloved of Hathor, The Shrine of the Golden Hawk, and the text was published.

Source:

Freemasons' Library call number SRIA 399: Text of Beloved of Hathor and The Shrine of the Golden Hawk, by Florence Farr and Olivia Shakespear. Printed by Farncombe and Son. A note on the upper flyleaf of the SRIA's copy gives the dates in April 1902 that the play was performed.

BY AUTUMN 1902 probably long before this date

Sub-groups of the GD like the Sphere Group had ceased to function.

Source:

Ellic Howe The Magicians of the Golden Dawn p251.

END OF FILE ON MARCUS WORSLEY BLACKDEN: EGYPT AND THE GOLDEN DAWN

BASIC SOURCES I USED for all Golden Dawn members.

Membership of the Golden Dawn: The Golden Dawn Companion by R A Gilbert. Northampton: The Aquarian Press 1986. Between pages 125 and 175, Gilbert lists the names, initiation dates and addresses of all those people who became members of the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn or its many daughter Orders between 1888 and 1914. The list is based on the Golden Dawn's administrative records and its Members' Roll - the large piece of parchment on which all new members signed their name at their initiation. All this information had been inherited by Gilbert but it's now in the Freemasons' Library at the United Grand Lodge of England building on Great Queen Street Covent Garden. Please note, though, that the records of the Amen-Ra Temple in Edinburgh were destroyed in 1900/01. I have recently (July 2014) discovered that some records of the Horus Temple at Bradford have survived, though most have not; however those that have survived are not yet accessible to the public.

For the history of the GD during the 1890s I usually use Ellic Howe's The Magicians of the Golden Dawn: A Documentary History of a Magical Order 1887-1923. Published Routledge and Kegan Paul 1972. Foreword by Gerald Yorke. Howe is a historian of printing rather than of magic; he also makes no claims to be a magician himself, or even an occultist. He has no axe to grind.

Family history: freebmd; ancestry.co.uk (census and probate); findmypast.co.uk; familysearch; Burke's Peerage and Baronetage; Burke's Landed Gentry; Armorial Families; thepeerage.com; and a wide variety of family trees on the web.

Famous-people sources: mostly about men, of course, but very useful even for the female members of GD. Oxford Dictionary of National Biography. Who Was Who. Times Digital Archive.

Useful source for business and legal information: London Gazette and its Scottish counterpart Edinburgh Gazette. Now easy to find (with the right search information) on the web.

Catalogues: British Library; Freemasons' Library.

Wikipedia; Google; Google Books - my three best resources. I also used other web pages, but with some caution, as - from the historian's point of view - they vary in quality a great deal.

18 May 2015

Amandragora@attglobal.net

Find the web pages of Roger Wright and Sally Davis, including my list of people initiated into the Order of the Golden Dawn between 1888 and 1901, at:

http://pws.prserv.net/Roger\_Wright/

30 March 2015

Amandragora@attglobal.net

Find the web pages of Roger Wright and Sally Davis, including my list of people initiated into the Order of the Golden Dawn between 1888 and 1901, at:

http://pws.prserv.net/Roger\_Wright

***

Marcus Worsley Blackden (known as 'Worsley' not Marcus) was initiated into the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn at its Isis-Urania temple in London on 27 August 1896. Irene Augusta Lloyd was initiated as part of the same ritual, but I don't think the two of them knew each other beforehand. Although he had little occult experience, Worsley Blackden worked his way quickly through the study needed to be eligible for the GD's inner 2nd Order, and was initiated into that on 6 November 1897. He played a prominent role in the turbulent period 1900-1903, and then joined one of the two daughter orders that were founded in 1903.

BEFORE I GET STARTED and in case this is the first of the files that you've seen: a huge 'thank you' to MWB's great-grand-daughter Nadine Artemis, of Ontario, Canada, for all the photos of paintings and family documents that she sent me. There would have been much less of this 'life by dates' without them!

There are plenty of sources for some of the events in Worsley Blackden's life, so I've decided to do a 'life-by-dates' set of three files; in which he'll appear as 'MWB'. This is the last file: After the Golden Dawn. The first two are: Youth and Background; and Egypt and the GD. And standing rather outside the sequence is a copy of his translations of parts of the Egyptian Book of the Dead - Chapter 62; and The Hymn to Osiris.

AFTER THE GOLDEN DAWN

?LATE 1890s, ?AROUND 1901. POSSIBLY MANY YEARS EARLIER

MWB began his work on the compilation known as the Egyptian Book of the Dead, or the Book of the Coming Forth by Day. It continued to be the most important occult work in his life until about 1914.

Source: there isn't a source for when MWB began this great work. I've deduced a possible start-date from the time he was ready to publish his first article on it.

DURING 1901

MWB and A E Waite, already friendly through the GD, began to wonder whether being freemasons would help them understand particular kinds of symbolism and ritual more deeply.

Sources:

A E Waite: Magician of Many Parts R A Gilbert. Wellingborough: Thorsons Publishing Group Ltd under its 'Crucible' imprint. 1987; using Waite's diaries where they still exist; they exist for the period October 1902 to October 1903. P127 quoting A E Waite's memoirs Shadows of Life and Thought p161.

Shadows of Life and Thought: A Retrospective Review in the Form of Memoirs by Arthur Edward Waite. London: Selwyn and Blount of Paternoster House EC 1938: p161-62 though Waite has got it wrong about who introduced him and MWB to Runymede Lodge 2430; he says it was Robert Palmer-Thomas but Palmer-Thomas was not a member of it as far as I can see; Kirby (see 1902 below) was.

19 SEPTEMBER 1901

MWB and A E Waite were both initiated as freemasons in Runymede Lodge 2430.

10 FEBRUARY 1902

The two of them were raised as Master Masons in St Marylebone Lodge 1305.

Source for both the initiations: R A Gilbert in Magician of Many Parts, in which he's quoting from Shadows of Life and Thought p161 and p127.

Comment by Sally Davis: as the GD continued through a period of growing pains, MWB and others began look for similar experiences elsewhere. MWB and A E Waite were introduced to the members of Runymede Lodge 2430 by GD member William Forsell Kirby, the naturalist and translator. The members of Runymede Lodge 2430 was a rather light-hearted group. Many of them worked in the publishing industry and the lodge existed largely to organise pleasant days out on the Thames in summer; it didn't take itself too seriously. I wasn't able to find out how long MWB remained a member of the lodge; but he never served as an officer in it.

Source:

Runymede Lodge no 2430: Centenary 1892-1992

The only source I could find for St Marylebone Lodge 1305 was Bye-Laws of the St Marylebone Lodge no 1305 printed 1898 London: G S Beeching 174 Strand, Beeching being a member of the lodge. No history of the lodge seems ever to have been written so it wasn't possible for me to try to discover what entrée MWB and A E Waite had there. I suppose one of them knew one of the members.

1902-08

A series of articles by MWB was published in Theosophical Review. The articles were all commentaries on and translations of chapters of the Egyptian Book of the Dead.

MARCH 1902

MWB became a corresponding member of the freemasons' lodge Quatuor Coronati 2076. Corresponding members were not permitted to take any part in the running of the lodge but they could attend its meetings and they received its magazine Ars Quatuor Coronati.

Sources: Ars Quatuor Coronati...being the Transactions of Quatuor Coronati lodge 2076 volume XV 1902 p50, p69, p177; and list of corresponding members p19, p50 and p64.

AQC...Transactions...QC2076 vol XXIII 1910; main text and corresponding members' list p20, p63 and p81.

Comment by Sally Davis: QC2076 had been founded as a forum for the study of the origins and symbolism of freemasonry; so it was an ideal place for MWB, Waite and Palmer-Thomas to find out more about freemasonry's rituals. Palmer-Thomas had been a corresponding member since June 1891 - he probably recommended it to the two others, who joined at exactly the same time, as part of the bigger plan. In later years none of the three went to many meetings but in this first year they made more of an effort. MWB went to the meeting of 7 March 1902 (as a visitor, probably making up his mind whether to invest in being a member); and as a corresponding member to that of Friday 2 May 1902 when Palmer-Thomas and Waite were with him. They all went to the meeting of Friday 3 October 1902 when E J Castle gave a talk on The Reception (Initiation) of a Templar; and MWB and Palmer-Thomas also went to the Four Crowned Martyrs meeting on 8 November 1902, when the worshipful master for the next 12 months was installed.

All three were still corresponding members in 1910 but none of them went to any meetings that year.

10 APRIL 1902

MWB and A E Waite were made members of Societas Rosicruciana in Anglia (SRIA).

Comment by Sally Davis: it was as members of SRIA that William Wynn Westcott and Samuel Liddell Mathers had founded the GD. In its first years (though not so much later) the GD focused on rituals derived from Rosicrucian sources and some of SRIA's most senior members were initiated into the GD to help put the rituals together and advise on symbolism. In 1892, Westcott was elected the SRIA's Supreme Magus, a post you held for life. SRIA was not a freemasons' lodge; but it was organised along similar lines and you did have to be a freemason to be a member of it.

Source:

Transactions of Societas Rosicruciana Metropolitan College 1902 p2-3 meeting of 10 April 1902.

SRIA's Transactions volumes 1902 to 1925 to see how active MWB was as a member, particularly Transactions... 1909 p2 meeting of 14 January 1909.

JULY, SEPTEMBER and OCTOBER 1902

MWB's first article in Theosophical Review, which was published in three parts, with the overall title The Mysteries and the Book of the Dead, also known as the Book of Epiphany.

Sources: Theosophical Review volume 30 March-August 1902. Volume 30 number 179 issue of July 1902: pp393-406. MWB's article: The Mysteries and the Book of the Dead, also known as the Book of Epiphany. Part 1. Theosophical Review volume 31 September 1902 to February 1903. Volume 31 number 181 issue of September 1902: pp9-19. Part 2 (I). Theosophical Review volume 32 September 1902 to February 1903. Volume 32 number 182 issue of October 1902: pp 105-110. Part 2 (II).

Comment by Sally Davis: It's clear that this three-part article was the first of a series and perhaps MWB already knew which chapters he would be covering in future articles. The beginning of the first part of the article is an introduction to the Book of the Dead and an explanation of why MWB preferred to translate the title as 'The Book of Epiphany'. MWB touched on a subject that exercised the minds of many GD members - what place there was now for the study of "the infinite", the "Cause of all existence", in a world in which science was increasingly looked to for all the answers. MWB was sure that science had not replaced the search for these Truths, and stated that he believed freemasonry to be the modern descendant of an ancient Mystery tradition which searched for them; now "deformed out of all recognition" and detectable only by the "most persevering student". Next came a short section on the vexed questions of on the origins of the Book of the Dead and the different versions of it.

MWB's argument throughout the series was that the chapters of the Book of the Dead that he had chosen were evidence of an ancient Egyptian Mystery tradition, with later commentaries that (either by accident or deliberately) had obscured their original meanings. In his view, very little of the Book of the Dead was actually to do with funeral rites. Some chapters were initiation rituals; others were to help the successful initiates go further, to aid their meditations on the themes of death and rebirth. In this, he was going against other contemporary work on the Book of the Dead, a fact he was very well aware of. He was trying to defend his corner as well as he could. He argued that the Mystery tradition could also be found in the Chaldaean Oracles, Gnostic texts and the Kabbala. How far he was influenced in his views by discussions with A E Waite is difficult to tell - he may have had 'ancient Mystery tradition handed down in secret' idea in his mind for a long time. A E Waite also believed it but the two men were looking at different traditions (and consequently different eras) for their evidence: Waite wanted to find such a thing in relatively recent Christianity; MWB, of course, went and looked in Egypt.

With his general introduction to the series out of the way, MWB moved on to this first three-part article, laying it out in a way that he continued to use in the rest of the series: he explained how he had translated certain hieroglyphs or sets of hieroglyphs and why; he would discuss which sources he had used; and he would then give the translation of the chapter or chapters that were the subject of the article, with notes, particularly on the more obscure symbolism.

2 DECEMBER 1902

At A E Waite's suggestion, The Secret Council of Rites was founded (with a Constitution drawn up in May 1903). A E Waite, Robert Palmer-Thomas and MWB were its members and they agreed to work together collecting examples of rituals from freemasonry and quasi-freemasonry groups; in the hope of finding a line of descent for them from the Middle Ages.

Comment by Sally Davis: the sources for this are books by and about A E Waite and MWB's part in the collecting of rituals is rather hard to ascertain. I don't think the other two worked as hard at it as Waite; nor were the other two initiated into nearly so many orders of freemasons and quasi-freemasons. MWB kept his eyes firmly on The Book of the Dead.

Source:

A E Waite: Magician of Many Parts R A Gilbert. Wellingborough: Thorsons Publishing Group Ltd under its 'Crucible' imprint. 1987: p201 about the sources - A E Waite's diaries for the period October 1902 to October 1903 are extant. And p116 on the Council of Rites. The 3 men I've named were probably its only members.

LAST MONTHS OF GD

Shadows of Life and Thought: A Retrospective Review in the Form of Memoirs by Arthur Edward Waite. London: Selwyn and Blount of Paternoster House EC 1938: p227 when A E Waite is discussing the period in which John William Brodie-Innes, Robert William Felkin and MWB were the 3 GD Chiefs; and p222 where Waite describes MWB as having "general charge" of the GD (by which I suppose he means daily charge, as the other 2 had jobs to do).

MAY 1903

The next of MWB's articles on the Book of the Dead was published, a translation of its chapter 17: An Ancient Cantata, the Triumph of Man Made Perfect.

Sources: Theosophical Review volume 32 March-August 1903. Volume 32 number 189 issue of May 1903 pp258-70.

Comment by Sally Davis: MWB believed that chapter 17 was one of the few parts of The Book of the Dead that was a genuine funeral rite. But he told his readers that the ancient Egyptians thought of death very differently from modern Christians - death to them was not a putting out to sea on an uncertain voyage; but a coming home to a safe harbour. For his translation, MWB removed 70 of the 290 lines that appeared in Wallis Budge's translation, on the grounds that they were commentary not the original text. The chapter emerged from the cutting process as a song of triumph to be sung (MWB reckoned) by two soloists and a chorus; the triumph being a spiritual one. In the course of his explanations of what was going on in the cantata, MWB wrote that the ancient Egyptians "believed that the Gods were liable to be compelled by the powers of magic” - shedding some light on why a modern man might join the Order of the Golden Dawn.

The book by Wallis Budge that MWB used as his starting point is: The Book of the Dead. The Chapters of Coming Forth by Day... by E A Wallis Budge. London: Kegan Paul and Co 1898. See wikipedia for work of Ernest Alfred Wallis Budge 1857-1934 Keeper of Egyptian and Assyrian Antiquities British Museum 1894-1924 and a representative of the more orthodox school of translation of hieroglyphs that MWB disagreed with.

BY MARCH 1903

After a couple of years helping to keep the GD afloat, MWB believed that it needed a good shake-up to bring back some vitality.

Source: A E Waite, diary entry for 12 March 1903 quoted in A E Waite: Magician of Many Parts R A Gilbert. Wellingborough: Thorsons Publishing Group Ltd under its ‘Crucible’ imprint 1987: p116.

Comment on the source by Sally Davis: not sure I’d trust Waite’s word on any of this. It’s so easy, long after the original events, to give them a coherence and a plan that they didn’t really have at the time.

MAY 1903

GD met to decide its future after a year being run by three chiefs. A E Waite got together a voting block with the intention of returning the GD to the state that it was in, in 1890. MWB was one of three men elected to run the GD for the next year; but disagreements about what kind of Order the GD should now be, were so deep that the Order never recovered. MWB became a senior member of one of the two daughter orders that emerged from the wreckage.

The source for A E Waite’s part in it is not a particularly reliable one: diary entries of A E Waite (who benefited very much from the chaotic results of the meeting) in A E Waite: Magician of Many Parts R A Gilbert. Wellingborough: Thorsons Publishing Group Ltd under its ‘Crucible’ imprint 1987: p116-120. However, other sources do agree that the meeting of the May 1903 was the last one of the GD in its original form.

Comment by Sally Davis: A E Waite was aware that his proposals would never get the support of the other two chiefs, John William Brodie-Innes and Robert William Felkin. Waite had organised a group of long-serving members to vote with him, and with their help he did get some of his proposals through; but it was against the wishes of a great many of the other members and at the end of the meeting the GD was in complete disarray. In the uncertainty that followed, Waite was able to do what he’d probably always intended - set up a new Order with himself in charge. His voting block became the first members of the Independent and Rectified Rite; including MWB.

Source for the break-away group that became the Independent and Rectified Rite: RAG The Golden Dawn Companion p169.

24 JULY 1903

Waite’s voting block issued a Manifesto of Independence (independence from the GD, that is).

Source: RAG The Golden Dawn Companion p169.

7 NOVEMBER 1903

The Independent and Rectified Rite was formally inaugurated. In theory it was run by three chiefs - MWB, Rev Alexander Ayton, and A W Waite; but it was Waite's baby and what he said, went. For its first two years, the IRR's meetings were held at the Mark Masons' Hall in Great Queen Street.

Sources:

RAG The Golden Dawn Companion p169.

A E Waite: Magician of Many Parts R A Gilbert. Wellingborough: Thorsons Publishing Group Ltd under its 'Crucible' imprint 1987: p118-122 and based on Waite's diaries and other contemporary sources.

1904

Death of MWB and Ada Mary's step-mother Mary Elizabeth Blackden née Cotter.

Source: death registration at freebmd.

MAY and JUNE 1904

Somehow MWB had managed to keep working through all the uproar within the GD, and the next, two-part, article on the Book of the Dead was published: An Invocation and Vision of Horus from the Book of Transformations.

Sources: Theosophical Review volume 34 March-August 1904. Volume 34 number 210 issue of May 1904: pp260-66. MWB's article: An Invocation and Vision of Horus from the Book of Transformations. Part 1. Theosophical Review volume 34 March-August 1904. Volume 34 number 211 issue of June 1904: pp313-19. An Invocation and Vision of Horus from the Book of Transformations. Part 2.

Comment by Sally Davis: the Book of Transformations was the 78th chapter of the Book of the Dead whose title MWB translated as Chapter of Making Transformation as a Divine Hawk. MWB saw the chapter as a series of meditational aids, with the meditator lying in a specially-prepared room whose decoration (specified quite minutely) was meant to represent the cosmos. Part two of the article was MWB's translation of the Invocation.

1905

MWB moved into 16 Allison Road Acton where the Independent and Rectified Rite held its meetings until 1909. Although his sister Ada Mary had been keeping house for him in 1901, she had had to return to Tunbridge Wells after her step-mother's death to look after their father, Marcus Seton Blackden, and their two much younger step-siblings.

Source:

A E Waite: Magician of Many Parts R A Gilbert. Wellingborough: Thorsons Publishing Group Ltd under its 'Crucible' imprint 1987: p118-122 and based on Waite's diaries.

JUNE 1905

MWB's latest article on the Book of the Dead was published: The Garden of Rest, Chapter 110 of the Book of the Dead.

Source: Theosophical Review volume 36 March-August 1905. Volume 36 number 214 issue of June 1905: pp313-25. MWB's article: The Garden of Rest. Chapter 110 of the Book of the Dead.

Comment by Sally Davis: in which MWB disagreed with the orthodox view of the time - that there was somehow not enough religion in the Book of the Dead - saying that the spirituality was there, but you had to know how to read it; of course implying that orthodox translators couldn't do that bit. In his article that MWB argued that the Garden of Rest wasn't a physical place (it has no entrances) it was a place that the initiate could enter in his mind, not with his body.

JUNE and JULY 1907

MWB's latest article, on Chapter 64 of the Book of the Dead was published, in two parts.

Sources: Theosophical Review volume 40 March-August 1907. Volume 40 number 238 issue of June 1907: pp 297-306. London: Theosophical Publishing Society of 161 New Bond St. Chicago: Theosophical Book Concern 26 van Buren Street. Benares: Theosophical Publishing Society. Madras: office of The Theosophist Adyar. MWB's article appears in volume 40 number 238 pp297-306; and in volume 40 number 239 pp393-401.

Comment by Sally Davis: if he had not been from the start (the earlier articles don't actually say), by this time MWB was working on the Book of the Dead from original papyri, as well as from Wallis Budge's translations. At the start of this 1907 set of two articles MWB took his argument about the Mysteries being passed down through history one step further, saying that in his view there was only one Mystery (not several) and that in printed books, errors had been introduced deliberately to prevent it becoming more widely known; the error-free information was passed down in manuscripts only. In taking this view he was following the opinion of William Wynn Westcott - he quoted at length from Westcott's edition of the Sepher Yetzirah. MWB was also heavily influenced by Waite: the article mentioned Waite's The Real History of the Rosicrucians and his A Book of Mystery and Vision.

As well as studying manuscripts of the Book of the Dead Chapter 64 in the British Museum's selection MWB had been travelling in Europe so as to compare them with manuscripts in Basel, in Turin; and in Paris at the Louvre and the Bibliothèque Nationale. He may have dropped in to see Samuel Liddell Mathers while he was in Paris though I don't think he will have had a pleasant welcome there.

Introducing his translation of The Book of the Dead Chapter 64, MWB seems (for once) to have agreed with contemporary scholars, that it was the oldest part of the Book, and consequently the most ravaged by later copying errors. His comparisons of the versions of it now available in Europe had led him to conclude that there were two versions of chapter 64; always differing in the same ways in different manuscripts. He'd taken a common-sense approach to translating the chapter, choosing whichever of the manuscripts had the "clearest rendering" of the hieroglyphs.

Chapter 64 as MWB translated it was instructions for someone preparing to undergo a particular initiation involving passage through a gate into a chamber where the usual mystical (not actual) death and rebirth would take place; particular phrases in the chapter were meant as hints for the guided visualisation of the gate and the chamber, and the final "Coming-Forth into the Day".

Part 2 of the article was a discussion of the meaning of the pentagram in the Book of the Dead - MWB sees it as symbolising the tomb of Osiris - and his translation of Chapter 64.

Works by Waite mentioned by MWB in his 1907 articles:

The Real History of the Rosicrucians by A E Waite. London: George Redway 1887. If MWB wanted to keep 'in' with the members of the SRIA it was best not to go on about this book and its author too much. Westcott had taken the lead in demanding from Waite an apology for gross breach of copyright after Waite had quoted the SRIA's regulations without permission. Transactions of the SRIA Metropolitan College issue of 1887 pp8-9.

A Book of Mystery and Vision by A E Waite. London: Philip Wellby 1902.

JULY 1907

An article by MWB was published in Occult Review volume 5 number 6 pp305-17: The Wisdom of the Mysteries in Egypt.

Source: Occult Review volume 5 number 6 June 1907 pp305-17 including pp315-316 the translation of Chapter 62, clumsily entitled "Chapter of Repelling the Dismemberment which is carried out in the divine underworld" - see the fourth, separate file in MWB's biography for the full translation. Published London: William Rider and Son. Editor Ralph Shirley.

Comment by Sally Davis: though published in a different magazine, this article stuck to the formula MWB had adopted for the Theosophical Review: introduction; translation; discussion of difficult points in the translation. In the first few pages, MWB considered ancient Egyptian religion as the source material for both Judaism and Christianity; and wondered - in that case - why it was so little studied. One answer to this puzzle was the difficulties of making a good translation of such manuscripts as survived, littered as they were with copying errors, and full as they were of concealed meanings. MWB was sure that a definitive translation of the Book of the Dead papyri could only be achieved by those who studied the Mysteries - people like himself, in fact, who "learn, not in order to know, but in order to be". He then gave his translation, and in the last few pages explained why he had chosen to interpret some important hieroglyphs in a manner very different from the more orthodox academic translations, resulting (he argued) in a spell that could be easily understood by any mystic.

APRIL and MAY 1908

MWB's articles in Theosophical Review came to an end with the translations of two more chapters from The Book of the Dead: number 65, A Chapter of Coming Forth into Day Victorious over the Opposer; and Chapter 15, the Hymn to Osiris.

Sources: Theosophical Review volume 42 March-August 1908. Volume 42 number 248 issue of April 1908: pp105-113. Publication details as for 1907. MWB's article: Some Fragments of the Book of the Dead. Part 1 - The Chapter of Coming Forth by Day. Theosophical Review volume 42 March-August 1908. Volume 42 number 249 issue of May 1908: pp233-40. MWB's article: Some Fragments of the Book of the Dead. Part 2 - The Hymn to Osiris.

Comment by Sally Davis: in these two last articles, MWB tidied up his work on The Book of the Dead. He now saw the whole work as a set of texts that even in ancient Egyptian times had lost their original purpose as aids to the initiates of a Mystery tradition. With their meaning no longer understood, the texts had then been made unintelligible by the addition of ill-informed commentary and explanation; and by the adding in of spells and supposedly magical formulae designed to make money for temples by giving the living a chance to buy happiness for their dead relations. In his work on them MWB had been attempting to strip away all the later verbiage and get back - as far as was possible - to the original texts. He thought that, stripped back to basics in this way, the chapters of the Book of the Dead could still be used as they had been originally.

The action in Chapter 65 follows on from Chapter 64 the subject of MWB's articles of 1907. The initiate, now in the chamber, is given instructions on how to get to the other side of a veil that he or she can see there.

5 NOVEMBER 1908

The Times announced the engagement of MWB to his first cousin Hilda Alethea Franklyn, the daughter of MWB's mother's brother. He was 44; she was 23.

Times Thursday 5 November 1908 p11: court circular.

14 JANUARY 1909

Extracts from a work by MWB were read at a SRIA meeting though apparently MWB wasn't at the meeting himself.

Source:

Transactions of Societas Rosicruciana Metropolitan College 1909 p2 meeting of 14 January 1909. Comment by Sally Davis: in MWB's absence, A J Cadbury read the extract from what was called MWB's "Egyptian Ritual of the Dead". The work was probably an early version of, or an extract from The Ritual of the Mystery of the Judgement of the Soul (see 1914 below). MWB might have had two reasons for wanting the SRIA members to find out about what he was doing. Firstly, he was looking for a publisher. And secondly, he was working on a version of a ritual not just as an interesting piece of translation, but in the hope that it would be used - that people would speak the words in it; and he might have wanted some feedback on how the text sounded when spoken. It's a pity he wasn't able to be there to speak it himself. I think he was busy:

3 FEBRUARY 1909

MWB and Hilda Franklyn were married at St Paul's Knightsbridge. After a reception at 11 Lowndes Square (which I think was Hilda's parents' house) MWB and his bride went to the south of France for their honeymoon.

Sources: marriage registration at freebmd.

Times 5 February 1909 p11 court circular.

A Genealogical and Heraldic Dictionary of the Landed Gentry 1937 edition p176.

1909

MWB and Hilda set up home at Langley Lodge at Fawley, near Southampton. For nearly five years, MWB seems to have dropped right out of the Independent and Rectified Rite, not going to any rituals and losing contact with its members. MWB's marriage was thus a big break with the past; and it seems as good a place as any to mention two features MWB's later life that I haven't been able to tie down very well. The first was that MWB was a keen yachtsman and wanted to live nearer the sea; the second was that MWB became a journalist.

Sources for Langley Lodge:

census 1911

History, Gazetteer and Directory of the County of Hampshire issue of 1878 p243 was the earliest mention of the house that I could find on the web.

Lawrence of Arabia by David Murphy. Oxford: Osprey 2011 p7 for the house's connection with T E Lawrence.

Source for the yachting and the journalism:

A E Waite: Magician of Many Parts R A Gilbert. Wellingborough: Thorsons Publishing Group Ltd under its 'Crucible' imprint. 1987. On p201 Gilbert discussed the sources he used, which included appointments diaries covering 1909-42 (1911 and 1914 were missing). The reference to MWB dropping out of the Independent and Rectified Rite is p197 footnote. The reference to the yachting and the journalism is p122 though no date is given for either of them and I haven't been able to find any other references to MWB in connection with either yachting or work as a journalist.

Another source for the yachting but only from 1929:

Armorial Families 1929 p163 entry for the Blackden family in which MWB is described as a member of the Royal Southampton Yacht Club.

15 JANUARY 1910

MWB and Hilda's only child was born: Olive Hermione Blackden (always called Hermione).

Sources: birth registration of a female child with the surname Blackden, registered New Forest district January-March 1910; freebmd.

Times Tuesday 18 January 1910 p1 births announcements, though the child's name is not given.

CENSUS DAY 1911

MWB, Hilda and Hermione were living at Langley Lodge. The Lodge was a substantial residence (it had 18 habitable rooms) and stood in its own grounds. The Blackdens employed a German cook, a housemaid and a children's nurse.

Source: census form completed by MWB.

1914

Publication of MWB's The Ritual of the Mystery of the Judgement of the Soul, a culmination of his work on The Book of the Dead.

Source: The Ritual of the Mystery of the Judgement of the Soul. Undated. Printed for Societas Rosicruciana In Anglia in London by Bernard Quaritch of 11 Grafton Street. MWB as translator and editor, with a note on the illustration by William Wynn Westcott as the SRIA's Supreme Magus. MWB had used three different papyri in the British Museum collections to put together a text in which a would-be initiate has to answer for his or her sins in life; and - if he or she is judged sufficiently sin-free - is guided by Thoth to the throne of Osiris.

Comment by Sally Davis: the small book is the only work by MWB that is in the British Library. It was his last work on the Mysteries of ancient Egypt. He didn't publish anything more, either as article or as book.

1914

MWB was appealed to by a number of members of the Independent and Rectified Rite, to settle a dispute they had with A E Waite.

Source:

A E Waite: Magician of Many Parts R A Gilbert. Wellingborough: Thorsons Pubg Group Ltd

und its 'Crucible' imprint. 1987. Sources used by Gilbert: p201. What happened in 1914: p122.

Comment by Sally Davis: the question of the forged documents used to found the GD had raised its ugly head again and caused strife. It's clear from what happened in the Independent and Rectified Rite that not even everybody who had been in GD in 1900 had been informed that they were forgeries when Samuel Liddell Mathers had admitted they were. A E Waite had been amongst those who had not been told they were fakes, although by 1914 he had worked out that they must have been. The trouble was that when he told the other members of the Independent and Rectified Rite, they didn't believe him. They appealed to MWB to give his opinion and MWB strongly defended the documents' authenticity. Waite was furious. The two men had a row and didn't speak for over a decade. And unable to control the order's members any more, Waite disbanded the Independent and Rectified Rite altogether and blamed MWB for it.

16 JUNE 1916

Marcus Seton Blackden, father of MWB and Ada Mary, died at the age of 89. The Blackden estate on Fore Street, City of London, had been run for many years by a family trust (with family members as trustees) and so didn't figure in the Will. Marcus Seton Blackden still had plenty of movable goods to leave his five children though - paintings (including family portraits) jewellery, china, glassware and furniture to the value of £35862/0/8 . MWB and Seton were the Will's executors. All three sons became trustees of the family's City property.

Sources:

A Genealogical and Heraldic Dictionary of the Landed Gentry edition of 1937 p176.

Extract from the Will of Marcus Seton Blackden; sent to me by MWB's great-grand-daughter.

Comment by Sally Davis: with Marcus Seton Blackden so old, it's likely that MWB at least was already one of the family property's trustees.

DURING 1919

MWB took over the management of the Blackden Estate on Fore Street.

Source: deeds, Wills and trust documents now held by descendants of the Blackdens; details sent to me by MWB's great-grand-daughter.

Comment by Sally Davis: this handing over of the day-to-day business of the Blackden family's City property was really just a recognition of the situation that had prevailed since 1916; because Leonard, an army officer, was stationed in the West Indies, and the third brother, Seton, was so much younger than the other two - 26 to MWB's 52 - it had been up to MWB to make the decisions.

11 OCTOBER 1919

Death of MWB's father-in-law Hollond Franklyn. MWB was one of the Will's executors, this time together with Hilda's mother Lottie and Hilda's brother Alwyne.

Sources: probate registration.

Comment by Sally Davis: all the Blackdens and their relations were wealthy: Hollond Franklyn left £53220/7/5's worth of movable goods; though probably not any land as Longcroft Hall in Yoxall, Staffordshire, where he and his family had lived since the 1890s, is likely to have been rented rather than owned by him. I haven't seen the Will but I would suppose that everything was left to Hollond Franklyn's wife and two children, increasing MWB's wealth but adding to the time he must have been spending on estate administration and leases.

1924

After ten years of estrangement, MWB and A E Waite were reconciled. They remained friends until MWB's death.

Source:

A E Waite: Magician of Many Parts R A Gilbert. Wellingborough: Thorsons Publishing Group Ltd under its 'Crucible' imprint. 1987: footnote p197.

Comment by Sally Davis: Waite went to visit MWB and Hilda at Langley Lodge as part of the efforts they were making to patch up their differences. The two men held a little ceremony in which - alas! they burned MWB's copies of GD rituals and other GD papers. What an act of vandalism!

1925

MWB was still a member of SRIA although no longer an active one.

Source:

Transactions of Societas Rosicruciana Metropolitan College 1925 p57 show he was still a member.

1927

As trustees of the Blackden Estate, MWB and his brothers Leonard and Seton decided to sell the land in the City of London.

Sources: deeds, Wills and trust documents now held by descendants of the Blackdens; details sent to me by MWB's great-grand-daughter. Also Times Friday 3 August 1934 p6 Estate Market column.

Comment by Sally Davis: Blackdens and relations of Blackdens had done very well out of the 1000-feet of Fore Street that their ancestor had leased from the Corporation of London in the mid-18th century. This decision to give the land up seems rather odd to me; maybe their lease was going to run out soon. The Corporation was likely to demand far more income if it was renewed. And perhaps the family had spent all the income they had received in living well; and had not put any of it back into keeping the properties up to date, so that now, putting in modern facilities and refurbishing the buildings would involve serious investment.

?LATE 1920s, though possibly as late as EARLY 1930s

MWB refused to allow his daughter Hermione to study art in Paris.

Sources: information from Hermione's grand-daughter; sent by email 1 December 2014 with photos of two works that Hermione painted later in life.

Comment by Sally Davis: the reputation that Paris had in the 1920s might have given any careful father pause, but MWB's great-grand-daughter says of MWB's refusal, that "he questioned her artistry, he so precise and she more abstract". I think you can take that interesting comment on two levels, both of which show the wideness of the gap between a father born in the 1860s and a daughter born in 1910. Firstly: as a comment on Hermione's preferred style of drawing and painting, it illustrates rather nicely how even in Britain, art had changed between the late 1880s when MWB did his training and the late 1920s when Europe had moved through post-Impressionism, fauvism, cubism and expressionism to dadaism. I can almost hear MWB saying what he thought of those! British art had stood aloof from much of this turbulent and almost continual change. Though it had made changes of its own, particularly in subject-matter; I have to say, from my researches into the GD's other artists, that even in the late 1880s the Royal Academy's emphasis on the classical and its view of what was the proper subject-matter for 'great art' was seen as behind the times. Secondly: I talk about this more in my biography of MWB's sister Ada Mary Blackden, but I detect a very conservative attitude in the Blackden family and its cousins towards the proper roles for women; and even (now I think about it) for men. I think MWB may even have admitted to the disparagement of women's creativity that Virginia Woolf puts into the mouth of Mr Tansley in To The Lighthouse as: "women can't paint, women can't write".

Source for the quote:

To The Lighthouse by Virginia Woolf. First published in 1927, right about the time MWB and Hermione may have been falling out over Hermione's wish to be a trained painter. In my Penguin Popular Classics edition I've quoted from p75 when artist Lily Briscoe has just found her painting "bad, it was bad, it was infinitely bad". Every artist should be their own critic; but to have a man peer over your shoulder and condemn your painting - any painting - just because a woman had painted it, is a different matter.

1930

I seem to have lost the source I had for the assertion that Charles Williams lampooned as Sir Giles Tumulty, one of the villains in his novel War in Heaven. So you need to take this item with a pinch of salt.

The novel in question was: War in Heaven by Charles Williams, published Faber and Faber 1930 and you can read the full text and get a good feel for Tumulty and his crass, arrogant behaviour at gutenberg.net.au/ebooks06/0601451.txt

That Charles Williams knew A E Waite: Charles Williams: An exploration of his life and work by Alice Mary Hadfield. New York and Oxford: Oxford University Press 1983: p6, p10. Charles Williams was a member of Waite's Fellowship of the Rosy Cross from 1917 and a friendship of sorts continued between them until 1931.

Comment by Sally Davis. Clearly, MWB could have met Charles Williams once he and A E Waite were friendly again. I sincerely hope my source (whatever it was) for the Tumulty connection was wrong: Tumulty was an objectionable man.

21 SEPTEMBER 1934

MWB died, aged 70. He left movable goods worth £26380/2/6 and some land that was not held in trust for the family - perhaps the land at Langley Lodge.

Sources: probate registry; Times Monday 24 September 1934 p1 death announcements.

AFTER MWB'S DEATH

DECEMBER 1935

Hermione Blackden married James Plomer in St John, New Brunswick Canada. James Plomer joined the Canadian navy and retired in the late 1950s with the rank of admiral. The marriage didn't last, and they had separated by 1942.

Source for the marriage: Times Saturday 7 December 1935 p1 marriage announcements.
Source for its failure: MWB's great-grand-daughter, by email 6 July 2015.

James Plomer was a brother of the author, poet, editor and librettist William Plomer (1903-73), friend of Leonard and Virginia Woolf whose Hogarth Press published several of his works; and later of Ian Fleming, who dedicated Goldfinger to him. See wikipedia for more information.

GRADUALLY BETWEEN 1919 AND THE LATE 1940s

MWB's family moved to Canada, where their descendents still live.

Source: MWB's great-grand-daughter by email 6 July 2015 though further information including exact dates was lost in a fire a few years ago.

Comment by Sally Davis: the process began with Hilda's mother and brother: they may have emigrated as early as the 1920s and it seems likely that Hermione was visiting them when she married James Plomer. Information at familysearch shows Hilda crossing the Atlantic several times during the 1930s and 1940s but in the end she too, settled down in Canada. Originally settling in New Brunswick, they all ended up in British Columbia.

1942

Hermione and James' only child, Deirdre Plomer, was born. As a child she lived mostly with Hilda Blackden.

Source: MWB's great-grand-daughter by email 6 July 2015.

?1950s

Hermione married Douglas Dixie, a British civil servant who worked in Sierra Leone and later in the Bahamas. Although she never did do a proper, full-time art training, Hermione did paint, and some of her works are still owned by her descendents.

Source, for the marriage: MWB's great-grand-daughter by email 6 July 2015. And for the paintings although without a precise date for them: information from MWB's great-grand-daughter; sent by email 1 December 2014 with photos of two works that Hermione painted during her time in Sierra Leone. The paintings show the influence of expressionism and Picasso's Les Femmes d'Alger (O. J. R. M.).

NOVEMBER 1965

MWB's sister Ada Mary Blackden died - the last surviving member of the 1890s GD as far as I know.

Source for her death: Probate Registry.

1987

MWB's widow Hilda Blackden died, in British Columbia. She was 102!

Source: MWB's great-grand-daughter by email 6 July 2015.

2002

Hermione Dixie died, in Victoria British Columbia. She had called her house there Langley Lodge, in memory of her parents' home at Fawley.

Source: MWB's great-grand-daughter by email 6 July 2015.

Comment by Sally Davis: Langley Lodge Victoria still exists, I saw several references to it on the web; it's a care home now.

Some at least of MWB's abilities and interests have gone down the generations in his descendents. Deirdre Plomer worked as a designer and her son is a photographer. However, MWB's interest in alternative ways of understanding the cosmos skipped a couple of generations, before coming out again in his great-grand-daughter Nadine. Times have moved on since MWB's time, though and the knowledge and understanding of cultures that looked primitive to people of MWB's time is now valued: Nadine trained with a shaman in the western USA, which I don't think MWB would ever have considered doing even if such training had been available to him. Nadine describes herself now as a "botanical muse", making beauty and health products from plants - perhaps the oldest form of alchemy and again, a type of occult knowledge that MWB wasn't all that interested in, his was a very cerebral approach. It's also fitting - at least it seems so to me - that Nadine's partner is a yoga practitioner. See their website at livinglibations.com.

BASIC SOURCES I USED for all Golden Dawn members.

Membership of the Golden Dawn: The Golden Dawn Companion by R A Gilbert. Northampton: The Aquarian Press 1986. Between pages 125 and 175, Gilbert lists the names, initiation dates and addresses of all those people who became members of the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn or its many daughter Orders between 1888 and 1914. The list is based on the Golden Dawn's administrative records and its Members' Roll - the large piece of parchment on which all new members signed their name at their initiation. All this information had been inherited by Gilbert but it's now in the Freemasons' Library at the United Grand Lodge of England building on Great Queen Street Covent Garden. Please note, though, that the records of the Amen-Ra Temple in Edinburgh were destroyed in 1900/01. I have recently (July 2014) discovered that some records of the Horus Temple at Bradford have survived, though most have not; however those that have survived are not yet accessible to the public.

For the history of the GD during the 1890s I usually use Ellic Howe's The Magicians of the Golden Dawn: A Documentary History of a Magical Order 1887-1923. Published Routledge and Kegan Paul 1972. Foreword by Gerald Yorke. Howe is a historian of printing rather than of magic; he also makes no claims to be a magician himself, or even an occultist. He has no axe to grind.

Family history: freebmd; ancestry.co.uk (census and probate); findmypast.co.uk; familysearch; Burke's Peerage and Baronetage; Burke's Landed Gentry; Armorial Families; thepeerage.com; and a wide variety of family trees on the web.

Famous-people sources: mostly about men, of course, but very useful even for the female members of GD. Oxford Dictionary of National Biography. Who Was Who. Times Digital Archive.

Useful source for business and legal information: London Gazette and its Scottish counterpart Edinburgh Gazette. Now easy to find (with the right search information) on the web.

Catalogues: British Library; Freemasons' Library.

Wikipedia; Google; Google Books - my three best resources. I also used other web pages, but with some caution, as - from the historian's point of view - they vary in quality a great deal.

15 August 2015

">mailto:

Email me at

Find the web pages of Roger Wright and Sally Davis, including my list of people initiated into the Order of the Golden Dawn between 1888 and 1901, at:

www.wrightanddavis.co.uk

***

From: SALLY DAVIS (for contact details see below)

May 2015

This is the last in my sequence of 'life by date' files charting the life of Marcus Worsley Blackden who was initiated into the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn in August 1896. It contains two translations Blackden made of passages from the Egyptian Book of the Dead.

There's no explanation in either article for the [] brackets but I imagine they are words inserted by Blackden to make the text clearer, and perhaps also to make it easier to chant or sing.

1) Repelling the Dismemberment which is carried out in the divine underworld (though Blackden notes that the concept 'underworld' was completely unknown in ancient Egypt). It appeared in Occult Review volume 5 January-June 1907; volume 5 number 6, June 1907: The Wisdom of the Mysteries in Egypt. Published London: William Rider and Son, editor Ralph Shirley. The quotation marks are Blackden's.

P315

"I am" is the divine luminary of each day [and] I cannot be taken by my arms. I cannot be seized by my hands; neither men, nor gods, nor shining ones, nor the dead, whether mortal or immortal, whether Initiate or yet unborn can work me Violence.

“I am” is the manifestation of wholeness; his Name is not known.

“I am” is of the Past, but beholder of the Aeons [of futurity] is my name.

Pass! Pass! Along the paths, O ye awarding judges, for “I am” is the lord of Eternity, and my award, yea, even mine, is to be like the Creator.

“I am” is the Lord of the Royal Crown.

“I am” is the dweller in God’s Eye [even in] my dual egg, my twin eggs whence I derive my life.

“I am” is in God’s Eye when it is closed, and I am the protector thereof, for I have come forth; I have risen cloudless; I have entered into my life.

P316

“I am” is in God’s Eye, and my place is upon my Throne; yea, I sit thereon within my shrine.

“I am” is Horus, the traveller of the Aeons, and I have commanded my throne; yea, I rule it, for behold! between utterance and silence I am balanced, and lo! my thoughts are cast down.

“I am” is “Beautiful Being”, and season after season he hath his possessions therein, one by one as it passeth round.

“I am” is the dweller in God’s Eye, and no evil thing can happen unto me; the makers of turmoil are not for me.

“I am” is the opener of the five-rayed star in Heaven, the ruler of the throne, the appointer of the births in to-day of the smitten child declared of yesterday.

“I am” is “to-day”.

O! Nation after nation, “I am” is your protector unto the Aeons; but whether ye are of Heaven or of earth, of the south, the north the east or the west, my fear is in your bodies.

“I am” is the ideal in his eye, and I die no more, but my moment is in your bodies and my thought is within me.

“I am” is the unknown, but the Red Ones turn their faces unto me.

“I am” is the unbinder, and this season cannot find what he hath done for me, yet heaven is revealed, earth is discerned, births cease, they cannot bind, that my name should pass away, by any evil thing.

O! Great one of utterance in Speech, I speak to thee. "I am" is risen cloudless, illuminating wall after wall, one after the other, until the day lacks nothing that it should possess, passing! Passing! Past! Past! Lo! I have spoken to thee.

"I am" is the flower-bloom manifesting in the primeval waters, and my mother is the abyss of Heaven. Hail! to my creator.

"I am" is the motionless [one], the great knot within the past, and the power of binding is within my hand; I am not known, he knoweth me. I am not grasped, he graspeth me. Hail! to my Egg, my Egg.

"I am" is Horus, ruling within the Aeons, but my flame is toward their faces, and their hearts flee from me.

I rule my throne; the present passes along the path I have appointed, for I am set free from all evil.

"I am" is the essential spirit of the gold of [the balance(1)] having neither hands nor feet, yet ruling within the temple of the pattern (2) of the artificer (3), and my wholeness is the wholeness of the essential spirit who ruleth within the temple of the pattern (2) of the artificer (3).

**

Blackden's notes:

- (1) 'balance' is Blackden's best guess at a word in the text which is now indecipherable.
- (2) Blackden has translated this word as 'pattern' but he says that it could equally well be translated as 'shape'; original word was 'Ka'.
- (3) the 'artificer' is the god Ptah.

2) The Hymn to Osiris, his translation of a passage from the Egyptian Book of the Dead. It was published in Theosophical Review volume 42 number 249 May 1908: p238-40. The capitals are Blackden's.

P238

Worship OSIRIS, Lord of Eternity, Beautiful Being,
Horus of the East and of the West,
[Whose] shapes are countless [in variety],
[Whose] forms are infinite,
Opener and Closer,
Master in the City of the Sun,

p239 Lord of the Hall of Mystery,

Designer of the Archetype of Deity.

The Leaders of the Pentagram give glory unto Thee,
[When] Thou retest in the firmament,
[When] ISIS folds Thee in her arms in peace,
[When] she turns back the storm from the gate of Thy paths,
[When] Thou showest Thy face to the West,
Lighting up the Two Lands with Thy silver gold,
[And] the dead rise up to look towards Thee,
[For] they taste of the winds when they see Thy face,
Like the disk rising cloudless in his horizon.
Their heart knows peace because of Thine act,
Thou who art the eternal Aeon.

The lamps of ON give homage unto Thee
[With] the unborn souls in the City of Strife,
O Being more glorious than the gods of the mystery
Which dwells in the City of the Sun.

The Pillars of the Altar give Thee homage,
Vast [One], Horus of the Twin Horizons;
The span of whose stride crosses the Heavens,
Who art Heru Ikhuti.

Homage unto Thee, Soul of the Aeon,
Dual soul dwelling between the Pillars,
Beautiful Being, Child of the Heavenly Abyss,
Who art Lord of the Silent Mountain.

Homage unto Thee when Thou rulest the Pillars;
The double crown is firm upon Thy brow,
Thou art UNITY making his own protection,
Thy peace is between the Pillars.

Homage unto Thee as Lord of the Tree,
Placing the Barge of Finality upon her launching-slip,
Repelling the Demons of Destiny,
Giving rest to the Eye at her place.

P240

Homage unto Thee, Strong One in His moment,
Great chief, ruling within the Desert Shrine,
Lord of the Aeon, Maker of Eternity,
Thou art Lord of the Royal Child.

Homage unto Thee, resting upon Truth,
Thou art Lord of the Shrine of the Unmanifest,
The Holy Land hath formed Thy Limbs,
Thou art He whose abomination is deceit.

Homage unto Thee in the midst of His Barque,
[Whom] the Heavenly Nile beareth from His cavern,
[When] the Light riseth cloudless upon his body.
He is the dweller in the Child.

Homage unto Thee, Maker of Gods,
King of the Upper and the Lower, OSIRIS! True of voice;
Grasping the Two Lands in his times of perfection,
He is Lord both of the Outer and the Inner.

Give Thou unto me a path that I may pass into Peace;
[For] 'I am' is [the] Balanced [One];
[Yea], I utter no lie, because I know.

**

If you want to read the other files in this sequence, Worsley Blackden's 'life by dates' 1864 to 1934, find the web pages of Roger Wright and Sally Davis, including my list of people initiated into the Order of the Golden Dawn between 1888 and 1901, at:

http://pws.prserv.net/Roger\_Wright/

BASIC SOURCES I USED for all Golden Dawn members.

Membership of the Golden Dawn: The Golden Dawn Companion by R A Gilbert.
Northampton: The Aquarian Press 1986. Between pages 125 and 175, Gilbert lists the names, initiation dates and addresses of all those people who became members of the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn or its many daughter Orders between 1888 and 1914. The list is based on the Golden Dawn's administrative records and its Members' Roll - the large piece of parchment on which all new members signed their name at their initiation. All this information had been inherited by Gilbert but it's now in the Freemasons' Library at the United Grand Lodge of England building on Great Queen Street Covent Garden. Please note, though, that the records of the Amen-Ra Temple in Edinburgh were destroyed in 1900/01. I have recently (July 2014) discovered that some records of the Horus Temple at Bradford have survived, though most have not; however those that have survived are not yet accessible to the public.

For the history of the GD during the 1890s I usually use Ellic Howe's The Magicians of the Golden Dawn: A Documentary History of a Magical Order 1887-1923. Published Routledge and Kegan Paul 1972. Foreword by Gerald Yorke. Howe is a historian of printing rather than of magic; he also makes no claims to be a magician himself, or even an occultist. He has no axe to grind.

Family history: freebmd; ancestry.co.uk (census and probate); findmypast.co.uk; familysearch; Burke's Peerage and Baronetage; Burke's Landed Gentry; Armorial Families; thepeerage.com; and a wide variety of family trees on the web.

Famous-people sources: mostly about men, of course, but very useful even for the female members of GD. Oxford Dictionary of National Biography. Who Was Who. Times Digital Archive.

Useful source for business and legal information: London Gazette and its Scottish counterpart Edinburgh Gazette. Now easy to find (with the right search information) on the web.

Catalogues: British Library; Freemasons' Library.

Wikipedia; Google; Google Books - my three best resources. I also used other web pages, but with some caution, as - from the historian's point of view - they vary in quality a great deal.

18 May 2015

Amandragora@attglobal.net

Find the web pages of Roger Wright and Sally Davis, including my list of people initiated into the Order of the Golden Dawn between 1888 and 1901, at:

http://pws.prserv.net/Roger\_Wright/

***

Ada Mary Blackden was initiated into the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn at its Isis-Urania temple in London, on 22 June 1899. She chose the Latin motto 'Volo aspirare'. Eliza Augusta Venner Morris and Frederick Charles Gobert were initiated as part of the same ceremony, but I don't think it's likely that Ada Mary knew either of them beforehand. Ada Mary worked quickly on the study necessary to be eligible for the GD's inner, 2nd Order, and was initiated into that order on 22 November 1900.

Ada Mary's older brother, Marcus Worsley Blackden, had been a GD member since 1896 and was one of the order's experts on the religions of ancient Egypt. In 1903, when the GD turned into its two daughter orders, both siblings decided to become members of A E Waite's daughter order, the Independent and Rectified Rite; though for reasons I give below, Ada Mary may not have been able to be a very active member of it.

BEFORE WE START yet another moan on the lack of sources for the lives of 19th-century women. Whereas Marcus Worsley Blackden's life is quite well documented, as non-famous people's lives go, I have found a pitiful amount of information on his sister's. However, I do have a feeling that in this case it's not just the lack of sources that's a problem; it's how a very conservative family saw the role of its women, even in a time when some women were challenging the restrictions that social and class expectations imposed on them.

Ada Mary Blackden was born in 1872, only daughter of Marcus Seton Blackden and his wife Fanny née Franklyn. Both her parents came from families with backgrounds in business but also in the landed gentry; and I get the impression that both families were rather anxious to leave the business side of their ancestry behind them. Fanny Franklyn's grandfather George had founded a tobacco firm based in Bristol. Fanny's father, Thomas Ward Franklyn, had gone to Cambridge University and was ordained as a Church of England priest. His younger brother George Woodroffe Franklyn ran the family firm with two partners, as Franklyn, Morgan and Davey. Thomas Ward Franklyn's income from the tobacco business was large enough for him to pay £8500 to buy himself a church building and thus a parish, in 1840. The church was the partly-built Christ Church, on the High Street in Tunbridge Wells - a town that Ada Mary would live in twice, at different times in her life. But by the time of Fanny's marriage, the Rev Ward Franklyn was no longer active as a priest and the family had gone to live on Sydenham Hill in south London, in a house called Birchwood.

The Blackdens were probably the wealthier family. A mid-18th century ancestor had founded the family fortunes by leasing part of Fore Street from the Corporation of London. Fore Street was near where Moorgate station is now, and the Blackdens lived off the rents they were paid on warehouses, shops and offices the 18th-century Blackdens had built.

Marcus Seton Blackden and Fanny Franklyn had probably known each other for years. They had certainly known each other since 1856 when Marcus Seton's elder brother Frederick married Fanny's sister Sophia. Marcus Seton and Fanny married in 1862. There was no need for Marcus Seton Blackden to work for a living and he never did so. He and his wife lived firstly in north Wales, where their first son, Leonard Shadwell Blackden was born in 1863; and then at Upton-on-Severn in Worcestershire, where the GD member Marcus Worsley (known as Worsley) was born in 1864. There was a gap of several years before another son was born to them late in 1871 - Nugent Lyttleton Blackden, who died after only a few weeks. Ada Mary, Fanny's last child, was born a few months after Nugent's death, in the spring of 1872. Nugent and Ada Mary were both born in Tunbridge Wells, where the family had perhaps gone in an increasingly anxious search for better health for Fanny. However, the Blackdens were back in Upton-on-Severn when Fanny died, aged 41, in 1876. Ada Mary was three.

I couldn't find out exactly when Marcus Seton Blackden moved from the house in Upton-on-Severn but he was no longer living there by 1880. He was staying with his uncle, the Rev Charles Blackden, at 17 Wilton Crescent in Belgravia on the day of the 1881 census, in between temporary rentings; by 1883 he had moved into 3 Wells Road Regent's Park and by late 1884 he had leased 16a Oxford Square of Edgware Road. On census day 1881 all Marcus Seton's children were away at boarding schools: Leonard Shadwell and Marcus Worsley were at together at Repton School. Ada Mary was back in Tunbridge Wells, at age 9 the youngest of 21 pupils in the school run by Susan Oken at The Mount, Albert Road. I couldn't find out anything more about Miss Oken's school so it's impossible to know what Ada Mary might have been learning there; apart from German, which was taught there by a woman born in Switzerland. All of the Blackdens will have been in mourning on census day, for Marcus Seton Blackden's father, John Chalfont Blackden, who had died the previous November. The Rev Charles Blackden died in July 1883. Inheritances from those two Blackdens increased Marcus Seton Blackden's income a great deal - Rev Charles, a bachelor, left personal effects alone worth £66059 in the money of time. Marcus Seton also began to accumulate the large number of movable goods that were later mentioned in his Will - pictures, jewellery, silverware, chinaware, furniture - the comforts of upper-middle-class life.

Ada Mary was 10 when her father (aged about 58) married Mary Elizabeth Cotter (aged 34), the daughter of Rev Joseph Rogerson Cotter, rector of St Mary Magdalene Colchester. Was Ada Mary's life turned upside down by this - yet again? Did she get on with her new step-mother - did she resent her intrusion or welcome her as a substitute for the mother she could barely remember? I don't know. As well as needing to adjusting to having a step-mother in 1884, within two years she was no longer her father's only daughter: her half-sister Theodora Cayley Blackden was born in the autumn of 1886. A half-brother, Seton Cotter Blackden, followed in 1890, the last of Marcus Seton Blackden's children, whose births spanned nearly 30 years. There is some evidence - if you want to interpret it that way - that all was not sweetness and light between the children of Marcus Seton's first wife and the children of his second. Leonard Shadwell and Marcus Worsley Blackden don't seem to have lived with their father after the late 1880s. I'll speculate about Ada Mary and Theodora later in this biography; though Ada Mary and Seton seem to have been friendly enough.

Perhaps I'm making too much of the fact that Ada Mary's older brothers don't seem to have been part of the family after their father's remarriage. They both had excuses that would serve if they wanted not to live at home while not creating bad feeling; and they had the financial means to live independently. Unlike nearly all the men in his family, Leonard had chosen to pursue a career, joining the army in 1885. After training as an artist, Marcus Worsley Blackden chose to go travelling. In 1891 he went to Egypt, which I think he had been longing to visit for years. Ada Mary (now in her late teens) did not go with him. Maybe neither of them had wanted her to tag along. But I suggest that even if she had wanted to see Egypt, her family was in a position to have prevented it. Evidence from Marcus Seton Blackden's Will suggests that not only did Ada Mary not have much money (if any) of her own until he died; but also that the income she had after his death was managed by her male relatives, through their position as trustees of the Blackden family trust. As far as I can see, no women ever served as trustees of the Blackden family's money. Ada Mary's situation was typical of young women of her class. Even in wealthy families, a lack of any money which was their own to spend, restricted young women's opportunities. With many families including the Blackdens, however, there were other restraints. The Blackdens and all the families that they were related to - the Cotters, the Hollonds, the Cayleys, the Worsleys and others - were very conservative, socially. They were pillars of the church - until Leonard Shadwell Blackden bucked the family trend, being a clergyman was the only profession that seemed to be acceptable to any of them. And they were Conservative in their politics - Ada Mary's uncle George Woodroffe Franklyn was a Tory MP and member of the Tory Carlton Club, and he seems typical of the family in general. It was inevitable, I think, that expectations for Ada Mary would be limited to a suitable marriage (preferably with a family member - marriages between cousins were commonplace in all the families); or to dutiful attendance on an ageing parent or step-parent until their death left her, in middle-age, without a role in life.

What did Ada Mary think of her options? I don't know. If she hated them, she left no record of it. If she rebelled against them; the details were kept a secret and she wasn't able to get away. Alas! It's much more likely that she did - even thought - exactly what was expected of her. I could only find two instances where she showed a little independence of mind: when no one else in her family would do so, she donated some money towards relief of a famine in Bengal; and she joined the GD. Significantly I think, she decided to do both these things when she was living with her brother, a period of relative freedom for her in between two periods living in her father's household.

In 1891 Ada Mary, 18, was living with her father, her step-mother and their two children at 16a Oxford Square. Unless she enjoyed looking after Theodora (4) and Seton (6 months) there was little for her to do in the house: a cook and two housemaids were employed. She was probably superfluous even in the nursery as Mary Elizabeth Blackden had both a nurse (for the baby) and a nursery-maid to look after her children. Both Ada Mary's full-blood brothers were abroad; let's hope she had some good friends amongst her cousins (there were loads of those) or girls she knew through church or from her school-days.

In the late 1890s, Marcus Seton and Mary Elizabeth decided to move out of town. Marcus Seton was entering his 70s; perhaps London life was beginning to affect his health. They chose to move to Tunbridge Wells and leased 9 Boyne Park in the Mount Ephraim district of the town, a house well-suited to the social status they wanted to advertise: detached (at that time), double drawing-room and conservatory, dining room, seven bedrooms plus a boudoir for Mary Elizabeth, a bathroom (the house was modern as well as opulent) and a kitchen and other offices on the ground floor. Although 9 Boyne Park was certainly bigger than 16a Oxford Square, Marcus Seton and Mary Elizabeth cut down on the number of staff they thought necessary: Theodora and young Seton no longer needed nurse-maids so in 1901 only a cook and one parlourmaid were employed. If Ada Mary had been living there she might have found more to do in the house; but she had been sent by her father or claimed by her brother when Marcus Worsley Blackden set up his own household; just around the time Ada Mary joined the GD. She might have been keeping house for him as early as 1898, when he was living in East Anglia; and in the early months of 1900 when he was at 6 Topsfield Crescent Crouch End. They were definitely living together by census day 1901, at 3 Wells Road, Regent's Park; the house that Marcus Seton Blackden had lived in during 1883-84 and which perhaps was owned by the family. Ada Mary was managing the house for him, probably taking that role for the first time. She had the help of one general servant who I imagine did the cooking as well as all the cleaning, though washing was probably sent to a laundry; whatever Ada Mary learned at her boarding school or schools, it won't have been how to cook.

Marcus Worsley Blackden had joined the GD in August 1896. When Ada went to keep house for him she will have been able to study at leisure the paintings, artefacts and perhaps papyri he had brought back from Egypt. Even if Ada Mary had not shared his interest in ancient Egypt before this time, her curiosity was aroused when - as a new GD initiate - he started bringing home the manuscripts on the western occult that he needed to study to progress into the GD's 2nd Order where you were allowed to do practical magic. One thing led to another and resulted in Ada Mary being initiated in 1899; and joining the 2nd Order in November 1900. There was a lot of work required of those who wanted the 2nd Order initiation - a wide range of esoteric material had to be studied and exams in it had to be passed. If she got in a jam with any of Ada Mary will have had her brother to help her out, but it will have been as a result of her own efforts and her own persistence that Ada Mary became eligible for that second initiation - showing what she might have made of her life if her circumstances and her personality had been different.

Ada Mary was needed more by Marcus Worsley than by her father and step-mother, so I think she lived with her brother until 1904. She will have been around, therefore, as Marcus Worsley began his decade and a half of work on the ancient Egyptian Book of the Dead, and perhaps read or even edited and commented on the earliest articles he published on it. 1900 to 1904 was a turbulent period in the GD's history but unlike Marcus Worsley, Ada Mary did not play a prominent role in all the disputes that arose between the factions the order was falling into. She might have been a member of one of the groups that had been formed within the GD in the late 1890s. Lists of members of most of these groups haven't survived, if they ever existed, and most of them seemed to be defunct by 1902. Slightly later, she must have got to know her brother's closest allies in the GD - Robert Palmer-Thomas and A E Waite. At the spring meeting of the GD which led to its collapse and the formation of the two daughter orders, both Marcus Worsley and Ada Mary chose to be a member of the voting block that A E Waite organised. In July 1903, a group of those who had voted with A E Waite issued a Manifesto of Independence from the GD: both Marcus Worsley and Ada Mary were amongst the 14 people who signed it. The result of the Manifesto was the setting up of the Independent and Rectified Rite (or Order), whose first ritual was held on 7 November 1903; though no list has survived of those who attended, it's likely both Marcus Worsley and Ada Mary were there.

For a few months Ada Mary would have been able to go to the Rite's rituals, which were held in those early years at the Mark Masons' Hall in Covent Garden. However, in the spring of 1904 Mary Elizabeth Blackden - although a generation younger than Marcus Seton Blackden - died before her husband.

At the point where he became a widower for the second time, Marcus Seton Blackden was nearly 80. He had probably supposed if he thought about it at all, that he would die before his second wife. If he had at any time blamed Ada Mary for not attracting a husband to herself, he was now likely to be grateful she wasn't married; because he needed not only a housekeeper and hostess but possibly also a nurse. In addition - he might die himself at any moment - someone was needed to take care of his two younger children, Theodora (aged 18 in 1904, and marriageable) and Seton (aged 14 and still at school). Marcus Seton Blackden made a Will that shows his intention to continue to make maximum use of Ada Mary even after his death. With or without her consent: though I can't believe she would willingly have left her two step-siblings to fend for themselves, duty to her relatives, at the cost of her own freedom of action, was something that would have been dinned into Ada Mary from an early age in such a family, and reinforced by the teachings of the Church. In Marcus Seton Blackden's Will he left Ada Mary and Mary Elizabeth's sister Katharine Louisa Cotter to look after Theodora and Seton until they were of age. The children were to live with Ada Mary in a house within walking distance of Holy Trinity Church in Tunbridge Wells; presumably the church where Marcus Seton Blackden and his family were parishioners. Despite having the charge of two young people and being in her late twenties if not early thirties (I'm not sure when the Will was prepared) Ada Mary was not, however, to have any charge of the finances of the household: Leonard Shadwell and Marcus Worsley were to find a house and pay the lease and household expenses. Marcus Seton did, however, make provision for Ada Mary to have an income of her own after his death - possibly the first money she'd ever possessed on her own account: Leonard Shadwell and Marcus Seton were to invest £2000 for her and pay her an income from the profits.

In the meantime, and probably as soon after Mary Elizabeth's death as could be managed, Ada Mary will have left her brother to his own devices in London, and moved back into 9 Boyne Park Tunbridge Wells. Though it won't have been impossible for her to continue to be an active member of the Independent and Rectified Rite, it will have been increasingly difficult for her to leave her and the household, to make visits to London.

This is speculation on a small amount of evidence, but I think that if any woman in the Blackden family resented the restrictions of the life she was expected to lead, it was Ada Mary's half-sister, who had a father old enough to be her grandfather and with notions of behaviour to suit his age. As soon as she was 21, Theodora married. Like so many in the Blackden family tree, she married a cousin; though in her case it was at least a cousin she had only met recently - perhaps that was what made him attractive to her. Frank Arthur Worsley was related to the Blackdens several times over, through marriages in the first half of the 19th-century. His particular branch of the Worsleys had emigrated to New Zealand in 1851 and Frank (born 1872) had grown up on the North Island.

Being related to them, however distantly, Arthur was taken in socially by his Worsley and other relations when he arrived in England after a spell working in the Pacific as a merchant seaman with the New Zealand Government Steamer Service. I don't suppose Marcus Seton Blackden saw any reason to object to Theodora marrying him, which she did in December 1907 at Marcus Seton's preferred church of Holy Trinity Tunbridge Wells. However, the marriage went horribly wrong, very soon after the wedding, possibly as early as the honeymoon (which leaves me wondering whether the problems were sexual). Certainly, Arthur and Theodora were not living together on the day of the 1911 census. Of course, Arthur might have been away at sea anyway on that day. However when Theodora filled in the census form she admitted she was married, but described herself as the head of the household - the usual practice in this situation was for the husband to be depicted as head of household despite his absence. It's clear that Theodora had gained possession of some family money at least, at her marriage. Her father had given her a dowry; and she was holding on to it even though she and her husband had probably split up. Perhaps Marcus Seton Blackden would not allow a woman who was separated from her husband to live in his house, be she never so much his daughter; but there's also the possibility that Theodora had used her dowry income to get away from her father, her aunt Ada Mary and Tunbridge Wells. She was living in The Rectory, Erpingham, on the north Norfolk coast, an area with no Blackden connections at all. It was a large house (it had 10 habitable rooms) which she ran with the help of two servants. Her cousin Ellen Harriet Cotter, and a friend, Margaret Gertrude Turner, were visiting her.

Census day 1911 found Ada Mary at 9 Boyne Park in the household headed by her father. Her half-brother Seton, a law student, was at home as it was the Easter holidays. Marcus Seton had taken on more staff than he had employed in 1901: Ada Mary had the help of a cook, a housemaid, a tweenie and a parlourmaid in running the house. I note that he was not employing a nurse, or at least not one who was living-in; though now in his mid-80s, perhaps Marcus Seton was still able to get about. Marcus Worsley had married his and Ada Mary's first cousin, Hilda Alethea Franklyn, in 1909. I don't know whether she and Ada Mary were friends but Hilda was a contemporary of Theodora, not of Ada Mary; Marcus Worsley had continued a family tradition of husbands old enough to be their wife's father. On his marriage, Marcus Worsley had dropped out of the Independent and Rectified Rite. He and Hilda had moved to Fawley, near Southampton, and now had a baby, Hermione. Leonard Shadwell Blackden was stationed in the West Indies. It's likely that Ada Mary's membership of the Rite had lapsed when her brother's had, if not earlier - in 1906 meetings of the Rite had moved from central to west London making them harder to get to from Kent. So Ada Mary was now rather isolated, even from close family, in Tunbridge Wells.

A lot of the anxieties that beset Marcus Seton Blackden when he made his Will didn't come to pass: he out-lived Katharine Louisa Cotter which would have left Ada Mary as his two youngest children's sole carer had the situation arisen; but Theodora and Seton were well over 21 at his death. He died in June 1916 at the age of 89. As well as possibly her first independent income, Ada Mary (like all of the children) was left a few of the possessions that Marcus Seton had accumulated over many years of inheritance and gift-receiving: a portrait of Barbara Worsley (for a tentative identification of this woman, see the Sources section); and some of her mother Fanny's jewellery and other personal items. However, some of Marcus Seton's possessions Ada Mary had the use of during her lifetime only, before they were handed on to Theodora at her death: a silver tea service; a Dollond telescope. They were not hers to do with as she chose. And all the other contents of 9 Boyne Park were left to Leonard Shadwell and Marcus Worsley to be held in trust: Ada Mary, Theodora and Seton could continue to use them, but none of them owned any of them, so they couldn't get rid of them without their elder brothers' consent.

Ada Mary was 44 when she came - or had to come - out of the shadow of her father. Was she her own woman at last? Or was she bewildered and frightened by the chance to decide for herself what she was going to do next? What happened in the next 15 years or so isn't clear to me - not without at least the 1921 census to look at - but I think she remained in the house at 9 Boyne Park until 1931, when it was put up for sale. She did at least have some relations living near her from 1919 onwards: when Leonard Shadwell Blackden retired from the army after World War 1 was over, he and his wife Mary Helen moved to within a few miles of Tunbridge Wells, to the The Jewell House, in Marden. Neither Theodora nor Seton needed her however and neither lived near her. In the early 1920s Theodora was still living in Norfolk, though she had moved from Erpingham to Sheringham. Seton lived mostly in London and (from the 1930s) in Shropshire.

By Marcus Seton's death there were signs that the changing times had reached as far as the Blackden family. Seton had refused to follow the programme laid down for him by his family; and been allowed to choose a very different way of life. In 1916, he was studying singing, and during the 1920s he became one of the proprietors of the Kingsway Theatre, appearing in minor acting roles in some of its plays. In one production he was on the same cast list as the young Ivor Novello. He married Mary Stewart Earle (or possibly Earle Stewart, I'm not too clear on the woman's surname), an independently wealthy woman, in 1924. In 1923, Arthur and Theodora Worsley dragged the family further into the 20th century by getting divorced. Arthur took the blame for the breakdown, as was standard at the time, and produced evidence of adultery (a woman and a hotel bill); but it was still divorce and I wonder how the Blackdens coped with it. And in 1927 the Blackdens made a further big break with the past when the trustees of the Blackden estate on Fore Street decided to sell the land. Ada Mary had not been made a trustee as far as I know; so presumably had no say in this, but if I understand Marcus Seton Blackden's Will correctly, the sale probably didn't make much difference to her. Ada Mary's income was derived from other investments, not the Fore Street rents. It may have declined due to the hard times of the 1920s - and probably declined more after the Wall Street Crash - but it won't have changed as a result of the sale of the land.

Was it Ada Mary's choice to leave 9 Boyne Park? Probably not, I think. I think the house was owned by the Blackden family trust after Marcus Seton Blackden died; so it was the trustees - Ada Mary's brothers - who had the final say. She might have been relieved though - she was now in her 60s and it was a big house for just one person to live in, on an income that didn't go as far as it had once done. As seems typical of her, she made the best of decisions made largely by other people. She moved to a place which perhaps she knew from holidays but which the Blackdens had never lived in, though the Cotters had once lived in the same county. By 1937 she had found a house in Uplyme, in Dorset, on the hill above Lyme Regis. Perhaps she felt her decision had been justified - moving so far from the rest of the family - when first Marcus Worsley died, in 1934, and then Leonard Shadwell did, in 1937, cutting more of the old ties. The house where Ada Mary lived - the only home of her own choice that she ever had - still exists, with the same name: Clanbury, on Rhode Lane in Uplyme. The views from above Lyme Regis are fabulous and perhaps Ada Mary made good use of the Dollond telescope that was hers to use though not hers to bequeath.

Ada Mary lived in Uplyme for the rest of her life. By the early 1960s, Seton and his wife Mary had moved to within a few miles of her, to a house called Wayside (which also still exists) in the village of Chardstock between Chard and Axminster. Perhaps Ada Mary and Seton visited each other occasionally although they were both very old by now. Theodora, however, continued to live near London; despite the lack of evidence I've built up a picture of there being no meeting of minds between Theodora and the rest of the family.

Ada Mary Blackden has the distinction of being the last member of the 1890s GD to die. She lived until November 1965. She died, aged 93, not at home in Uplyme but in Buckfield House nursing home, on West Hill Road further down the hill. Seton Cotter Blackden was her executor.

BASIC SOURCES I USED for all Golden Dawn members.

Membership of the Golden Dawn: The Golden Dawn Companion by R A Gilbert. Northampton: The Aquarian Press 1986. Between pages 125 and 175, Gilbert lists the names, initiation dates and addresses of all those people who became members of the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn or its many daughter Orders between 1888 and 1914. The list is based on the Golden Dawn's administrative records and its Members' Roll - the large piece of parchment on which all new members signed their name at their initiation. All this information had been inherited by Gilbert but it's now in the Freemasons' Library at the United Grand Lodge of England building on Great Queen Street Covent Garden. Please note, though, that the records of the Amen-Ra Temple in Edinburgh were destroyed in 1900/01. I have recently (July 2014) discovered that some records of the Horus Temple at Bradford have survived, though most have not; however those that have survived are not yet accessible to the public.

For the history of the GD during the 1890s I usually use Ellic Howe's The Magicians of the Golden Dawn: A Documentary History of a Magical Order 1887-1923. Published Routledge and Kegan Paul 1972. Foreword by Gerald Yorke. Howe is a historian of printing rather than of magic; he also makes no claims to be a magician himself, or even an occultist. He has no axe to grind.

Family history: freebmd; ancestry.co.uk (census and probate); findmypast.co.uk; familysearch; Burke's Peerage and Baronetage; Burke's Landed Gentry; Armorial Families; thepeerage.com; and a wide variety of family trees on the web.

Famous-people sources: mostly about men, of course, but very useful even for the female members of GD. Oxford Dictionary of National Biography. Who Was Who. Times Digital Archive.

Useful source for business and legal information: London Gazette and its Scottish counterpart Edinburgh Gazette. Now easy to find (with the right search information) on the web.

Catalogues: British Library; Freemasons' Library.

Wikipedia; Google; Google Books - my three best resources. I also used other web pages, but with some caution, as - from the historian's point of view - they vary in quality a great deal.

SOURCES FOR ADA MARY BLACKDEN

THE FRANKLYN FAMILY

The will of George Franklyn founder of the tobacco firm is at the Public Record Office at Kew: see discovery.nationalarchives.gov.uk PROB 11/1634/301, dated 22 September 1820.

Burke's A Genealogical and Heraldic Dictionary of the Landed Gentry 1863 p1605-06.

George Woodroffe Franklyn:

Walford's The County Families of the UK p238 on George Woodroffe Franklyn.

Bristol and its Municipal Government 1820-51 by Graham William Arthur Bush. Published 1976 by Bristol Record Society; p128.

Bristol Mercury 15 April 1880, glimpsed via genesreunited.

W D and H O Wills and the Development of the UK Tobacco Industry by Bernard William Ernest Alford. Published London: Methuen 1973: p161, p202,

Rev Thomas Ward Franklyn:

Career details from db.theclergydatabase.org.uk. His dates are 1801-1876. He married Sophia Hollond in September 1825.

The British Library catalogue has one item by him: The Kingdom of God: A Sermon on Acts 20: 25-27 by Thomas Ward Franklyn. Published London 1830.

Colbran's Hand-Book and Directory for Tunbridge Wells issue of 1850 p28.

Colbran's Hand-Book and Visitor's Guide for Tunbridge Wells by John Colbran 1863 p33.

THE HOLLOND FAMILY

Burke's A Genealogical and Heraldic Dictionary of the Landed Gentry volume 3 p167 Hollond family of Benhall Lodge Suffolk.

FIRST MARRIAGE OF MARCUS SETON BLACKDEN TO FANNY FRANKLYN

Gentleman's Magazine volume 213 1862 p97

THE COTTER FAMILY

BEWARE! There are several men of different generations with exactly the same name - Joseph Rogerson Cotter. The habit continued into the 20th century - the Ellen Harriet Cotter of the 1911 census married an engineering lecturer called Joseph Rogerson Cotter - see probate registry for 1948.

At www.bryan-martin.net a family tree of the elder Joseph Rogerson Cotter and his descendants via two marriages.

See www.thepeerage.com (which uses Burke's Peerage) for Mary Elizabeth Cotter's parents and sisters.

SECOND MARRIAGE OF MARCUS SETON BLACKDEN TO MARY ELIZABETH COTTER

Essex Standard of 8 November 1884 glimpsed via genesreunited.

ADA MARY'S DONATION FOR THE FAMINE IN INDIA

Times Wed 25 July 1900 p10, list of those who had recently donated to the Lord Mayor's fund. She gave £1.

BARBARA WORSLEY whose portrait Ada Mary inherited in 1916. I'm not sure of the identification but this woman - despite apparently being Anne Barbara - does seem very likely:

Debrett's Baronetage edition of 1840 p594 on Sir William Worsley 1st baronet of Hovingham Hall North Yorkshire. He married Sarah Philadelphia, 4th daughter of Sir George Cayley Baronet. Their daughter Anne Barbara was born 8 December 1833.

Anne Barbara is the only Barbara Worsley on the 1851 census; written in as "A B".

I then skipped to 1901. The only Barbara Worsley on that was the 33-year-old wife of an accountant in Prestwich. Anne Barbara Worsley was not listed as 'barbara'.

Probate Registry 1909 entry for Anne Barbara Worsley, spinster of Hovingham Yorkshire, who had died on 26 October 1908. Probate to Sir William Henry Arthington Worsley* and one other man. Wikipedia page on the baronets Worsley of Hovingham indicates that this person was the 4th baronet, 1890-1973.

I looked on the web to see if the portrait still existed but couldn't find anything. If the painting still exists, the sitter's name has been lost. I didn't find any evidence, either, about who painted it.

9 BOYNE PARK; BLACKDEN FAMILY TRUST WHICH RAN THE ESTATE ON FORE STREET CITY OF LONDON; ADA MARY'S MOVE TO UPLYME

Deeds, Wills and trust documents now held by descendants of the Blackdens; details sent to me by Marcus Worsley Blackden's great-grand-daughter.

Sale of 9 Boyne Park: Country Life volume 70 1931 p458.

WILL OF MARCUS SETON BLACKDEN

Sent to me by email by Marcus Worsley Blackden's great-grand-daughter though I couldn't see the date it was signed.

BUCKFIELD RESIDENTIAL HOME which still exists

Website exeter.yalwa.co.uk gives its full address as West Hill Road Lyme Regis.

Some ads from the 1960s all of which say phone and TV in each room - unusual for the time - and all of which stress the beautiful views.

Medical Social Work volume 21 1969 p60, p232, p333.

Social Work Today vol 1 1970 p55.

D Ada M Blackden r Bridport Dorset Oct-Dec 1965; aged 93. Probate Registry: Ada Mary Blackden of Buckfield House Nursing Home Lyme Regis Dorset d 14 Nov 1965. Probate Exeter 11 Feb 1966 to Lloyds Bank Ltd and Seton Cotter "of no occupation". Personal effects £5383.

ADA MARY BLACKDEN'S SIBLINGS

LEONARD SHADWELL BLACKDEN

Times Wednesday 8 April 1891 p1 announcement of his marriage on 24 April at St Paul's Cambridge, to Mary Helen daughter of the late Rev William Bennett Pike, fellow and tutor at Downing College.

Magazine Saddlery and Harness volume 7 1898 p199 has their current address as Paston House Cambridge.

Armorial Families for details of Leonard Shadwell and Mary Helen's five sons.

Two of the sons died in the world wars: see www.cwgc.org/find-war-dead

Who Was Who volume III 1929-40 p119 gives details of his army career. He fought in Sierra Leone in 1898 and during World War 1 was in charge of the British troops in the West Indies.

MARCUS WORSLEY BLACKDEN the GD member: see his three-part 'life by dates' biography elsewhere on this web page.

THEODORA CAYLEY BLACKDEN WORSLEY

Theodora's unloved husband is quite well-known: he went with Shackleton's expedition, as captain of the Endeavour.

The ill-fated marriage: via trove.nla.gov.au to The Argus (Melbourne) of Monday 12 October 1908 p1 marriage announcements including one that had actually taken place 17 December [1907].

See www.enduranceobituaries.co.uk for a short biography of Frank Arthur Worsley DSO OBE RD RNR. He married for a second time in 1926.

See also his wikipedia page.

The divorce: <http://www.teara.govt.nz/en/biographies>

Times Wednesday 18 April 1923 p5 Probate Divorce and Admiralty Division. The article makes it clear that it had been Frank Arthur Worsley who had wanted the divorce. However, the Blackden family was against him starting the proceedings, fearing the social consequences for Theodora. So Frank agreed to get some evidence of adultery and it was Theodora that brought the 1923 petition; an earlier petition having been refused because of suspicion that the divorcing parties were colluding.

Theodora never married again. She died late in 1967.

<http://www.uk.mundia.com><http://www.uk.mundia.com>

SETON COTTER BLACKDEN

As an actor and theatrical impresario:

The London Stage 1920-29: A Calendar of Productions by J P (John Peter) Wearing: p174 in Productions 1922; no 193. Published Metuchen New Jersey: Scarecrow Press 1984.

I had trouble down-loading all of this but at fultonhistory.com/Newspaper 15/Variety/Variety 1922 there was some information about the Kingsway Theatre and a group calling itself Ben-rimo and Associates. Seton Blackden is one of the associates, described as an actor and translator.

I couldn't see the date of this but it's likely to have been the late 1930s: Spotlight issue 60 p156.

Armorial Families: p163.

Seton Cotter Blackden killed his wife:

Website discovery.nationalarchives.gov.uk lists documents at the Public Record Office under reference ASSI 26/437: the trial of Seton Cotter Blackden for murder; 1967. Details of what happened can be found at <http://www.blackkalendar.nl>

<http://www.nationalarchive.gov.uk>www.blackkalendar.nl. Seton beat his wife to death early in the morning of 1 November 1966. He was convicted of manslaughter on 16 January 1967. He died in Exe Vale Hospital Exminster, while serving his sentence.

London Gazette issued 15 January 1970, p634: appeals under the Trustees Act 1925: Seton Cotter Blackden had died on 3 September 1969.

14 April 2015

Amandragora@attglobal.net

Find the web pages of Roger Wright and Sally Davis, including my list of people initiated into the Order of the Golden Dawn between 1888 and 1901, at:

http://pws.prserv.net/Roger\_Wright/

***

Anna Blackwell was initiated into the Order of the Golden Dawn in January 1892 at its Isis-

Urania temple in London. She took the Latin motto 'esse quam videri'. She worked hard and quickly to do the required study and was initiated into the GD's inner Second Order on 27 July 1893.

This can't be a thorough biography, unfortunately. During a long life, Anna Blackwell lived in the USA; and then in France for 42 years; but in England for only a few years, when a child and then at the end of her life. In order to do her justice I'd have to do research in countries as far-flung as France, South Africa and the USA, and I can't afford to do that; my French isn't up to those 42 years either!

Anna Blackwell was the oldest woman, almost the oldest person, to be initiated into the GD in the period I'm looking at - 1888 to 1901. She was born in 1816, daughter of Samuel Blackwell and his wife Hannah. The Blackwells were a Worcestershire family but Samuel Blackwell had moved to Bristol and become a partner in a sugar-refining firm. He had married Hannah Lane, the daughter of a Bristol jeweller and goldsmith. Anna Blackwell was the eldest of their eight children, five girls and three boys. In 1832 a fire destroyed Samuel Blackwell's business and he opted to take his family to America rather than start again in Bristol. Anna was 16 when the family left England and she always considered England to be her native land. On arriving in the United States, the Blackwells settled in New York, but they all moved to Ohio shortly before Samuel's death in 1838.

Samuel and Hannah Blackwell held views far in advance of their time and brought up their children accordingly. When living in Bristol they were already involved in the anti-slavery movement. Their involvement in the cause continued when they moved to the United States and through it they met a great many of the social and political radicals of New England. Their children grew up hearing their parents and their friends discuss some of the most advanced - and therefore the most contentious - issues of the day, including abolition, property rights and the position of women in society.

The Blackwells brought up their daughters, as well as their sons, to expect to work and with the skills to do so. Compared to most of her female contemporaries, Anna was very well educated: she was able to read French and German and was happy to tackle difficult metaphysical tomes in both those languages. She wrote for publication in English and in French. She read voraciously throughout her life and (at least by the 1870s) had a grasp of the scientific method - the importance of having testable hypotheses and of getting evidence to prove (or disprove) them.

Samuel Blackwell never made a success of business in the US, so his death left the family short of funds, but Anna and Elizabeth set to and founded a school, to earn money for the family's keep and to ensure that their brothers (who were still of school-age) could continue in education until they were qualified for a profession. All the Blackwell daughters taught in the early years after their father's death, but only Ellen focused on teaching as her profession. Elizabeth and Emily were two of the first women to qualify as doctors - Dr Elizabeth Blackwell is the 'Blackwell' most people have heard of. Marian combined teaching with looking after Hannah. None of the five married; although Ellen and Elizabeth both adopted children.

It must have been through acquaintances like Oliver Wendell Holmes and the Beecher family that Anna Blackwell discovered the existence of the Brooke Farm community, at West Roxbury, near Boston Massachusetts. The community had been founded in 1841 as an attempt to put into practice the ideas of the French philosopher Charles Fourier that any society should be based on the principles of concern for others; cooperation between members; and equal opportunities for women. All those living at Brooke Farm had to do some hours of manual labour each day - Fourier believed that events in the physical world had a spiritual side to them; and the residents also thought that a healthy mind needed a healthy body. If all this sounds rather high-principled and stoic, the members of the community had fun, too, and many of them looked back on their time at Brooke Farm as one of enjoyment, though they did also feel that the whole concept of it had, perhaps, been rather naïve. For the community lasted only until 1847 - it had never been financially secure and was pushed over the edge when a building burned down that the community had not been able to insure.

Anna Blackwell wasn't one of the 15 founding members of the Brooke Farm community. She joined it in 1845. Members had to buy a share in the community's joint stock company, to help its funds, at $500 per share; so Anna may have needed to work for several years to raise the money - which she subsequently will have lost. Leaving the community after the fire in 1847 she may have been feeling the effects of doing all that physical farm labouring work, which I'm sure was not what her parents had meant when they had expected their daughters to earn their own living. She spent some time in 1848 recovering at a 'water cure' spa in New York state and then its owner, Mrs Gove Nichols, arranged for her to go and board with a friend of her's in the country for a few weeks. The friend was Mrs Clemm, mother-in-law of Edgar Allan Poe.

All the sources I found agreed that Anna Blackwell's acquaintance with Poe was slight. The two did meet - although his wife Virginia had died in 1847, Poe was still living with Mrs Clemm in 1848; but during Anna's stay in the house, he was away a lot. Nevertheless, Anna felt she knew him sufficiently to write to him for some help, after she had left the household. She had been writing poetry for some time. In 1846 she had had four poems published and one song, for which she had written both words and music. They had appeared in the new New York literary journal The Columbian Magazine. And during 1848 one poem, Legend of the Waterfall, was chosen to appear in an anthology that matched poems with engravings of landscapes by American artists. That was all very encouraging, but what was the next step?

Anna's letter to Poe doesn't seem to exist any longer, only his reply. The reply is on the web in full but I couldn't decide from it exactly what advice it was that Anna had been wanting: was it practical help in getting more of her poems published, this time in book form? Was she asking him to recommend her to a publisher he knew? Or was she wanting something far more difficult to provide? - some lit crit? In his reply Poe announced himself as quite incompetent to act as literary critic of Anna's work; and chose to concentrate on some honest, but pessimistic, advice - as from an old hand - about the finances of having books of poetry published. The poet Sarah Helen Whitman, a friend of both Poe and Anna in the 1840s, said many years later that Anna had given Poe the brush-off after receiving this reply: the following year (1849), while staying with friends in Providence, Anna was invited to a social function where Poe was to be one of the main guests, but had not shown up. There are other reasons why you might not go to a particular party; but it's true that Poe and Anna didn't meet again and that Anna's friendship with Mrs Whitman didn't last much longer either.

Anna did get her book of poems published; though I daresay Poe was right in warning her that she'd be expected either to pay all the costs herself, or to wait to be paid until the publishing firm had seen its costs recouped in full. The poems were published in 1853 by the London firm of John Chapman.

I couldn't discover exactly when Anna left the United States to live in Europe; though a date in the late 1840s seems most likely. Anna herself mentioned in one of her books that she was in England during 1845, but that was just a visit. Anna's sister Elizabeth moved to England in 1849, to work at St Bartholomew's Hospital; Anna may have sailed to London with her. A couple of years after Elizabeth Blackwell moved to London, their sister Ellen also arrived, intending to spend time enhancing her teaching by studying art and design. Perhaps Anna came with her. Whenever it was that Anna arrived back in Europe, family contacts and friends of her parents made establishing herself in London very easy. The short biography of Dr Elizabeth Blackwell that I list in my Sources section (below) says that Elizabeth quickly got to know Bessie Rayner Parkes (who was a cousin of the Blackwells anyway), Barbara Leigh Smith and Frances Power Cobbe who all later became well-known as women's rights campaigners. Through them, Elizabeth met the Herschels, Faraday, Herbert Spencer, Mary Ann Evans (who was not George Eliot yet), Rossetti and others. Anna also knew these people, perhaps better than Elizabeth who was so committed to her career in medicine. When Ellen arrived in Europe, she went first to Paris, and then spent time in London taking lessons with John Ruskin so that Anna met him and his social circle as well. There was one group of London residents that Anna met that Elizabeth and Ellen didn't, however - the spiritualists.

Spiritualism is generally thought to have begun in 1848 with some larking-about by the Fox sisters of Hydesville New York State. A very bald definition of what its followers thought it consisted of is 'communication with the dead'. I find it astonishing, how quickly spiritualism became accepted by people in the United States and the UK. One source I looked at suggested that most major radical American families had at least one spiritualist member by the early 1850s. Spiritualism spread into Europe within a few years, too. Writing in the 1870s Anna claimed that it had been an article of hers in the magazine Journal du Magnétisme that had first introduced spiritualism to the French (in 1850).

In 1872 Anna wrote that she had believed in what she called the "pre-existence of the soul", and that the souls of the dead could communicate with the living, since her childhood. Such deeply-held beliefs have a tendency to be reinforced by experience, and on many occasions things happened to Anna that confirmed them. She saw at least one ghost, "the spirit of a man...in broad daylight", at which she "nearly died of the shock". She was contacted during a seance by a spirit that she understood to be her own guardian angel, predicted by a clairvoyant she had consulted many years before. She communicated with entities who described her past reincarnations and told her of their current ones. And she endured "spirit tormentings" - by which she seems to have meant spirits which threatened her. Eventually got so difficult to cope with that she kept away from spiritualism for a short time (in the late 1850s/early 1860s) though she soon went back, and the problem never affected her belief in spiritualism which lasted till her death.

Anna seems to have received a lot of invitations to seances - perhaps the mediums hoped she would be sufficiently impressed to publish an article about their medium-ship skills. Spending some time in London during 1853, for example, she went to a seance held by the American Maria Hayden, one of the earliest professional mediums, who was on her first visit to Europe. Another guest at Mrs Hayden's seances was Edward Bulwer-Lytton, author of Zanoni (published 1842) which first brought the Rosicrucians to the attention of the novel-reading public; though I couldn't work out from my source for Mrs Hayden, whether he and Anna had actually met.

Sister Elizabeth, though a staunch non-believer in spirit manifestations, turned out to be good at automatic writing - the medium allowing a spirit to communicate by using the medium to write messages down. Anna, however, seems to have thought herself lacking in what was required to be a successful medium. Though she did have some 'medium-istic' experiences when on her own in her own house, on the whole she confined herself to going to seances; acting as hostess; and writing on spiritualism, explaining it and defending it. She soon became the most well-known English-speaking proponent of a particular sub-set of spiritualism which had begun in France and became popular in Europe: spiritism. John Ruskin for example, in a letter written in 1866, mentions a seance in Paris held by Anna, Ruskin identifying her to his correspondent specifically as a "disciple" of Kardec. Allan Kardec was the writing name of Léon Hippolyte Denisart Rivail (1804-69), the French teacher, amateur scientist and medium who formulated spiritism.

In 1869 Anna and a variety other spiritualists were interviewed by members of a committee formed by the Dialectical Society to investigate the claims of spiritualism and decide whether what happened at seances was genuine contact with the dead, or just a series of manipulative hoaxes. In 1870, as the Dialectical Society prepared to publish its findings, she wrote a very long, considered piece, expanding what she had told them the previous year. With an approach she continued to use whenever she wrote about spiritism, Anna tried to describe spiritism in terms of a logical argument. She wrote that spiritism argued for a universe created by an intelligence according to a plan, and called the creating intelligence an Engineer (in much the same manner as freemasons call it the great Architect). The Engineer's universe had in it entities with varying degrees of spiritual awareness from the very basic - animals, perhaps even stones - to Great Souls. Souls made their way to higher levels of spiritual awareness (and also downwards to lower levels, presumably, though I can't find a work in which Anna says so) via a series of reincarnations. Spiritism believed that when souls reincarnated as human beings, they were in the middle of the process, with quite a number of reincarnations to go until they reached the point where they would be reincarnated as a Great Soul.

Now things get a bit circular because I don't know in which order these two important events in Anna's life happened - when exactly she first heard of Allan Kardec; and when she first moved to France. In the middle of the 19th century, no one needed to find any particular justification for going to live in Paris: it was the agreed centre of the cultural and artistic world. I think, though, that Anna moved to France because of her interest in spiritism, intending to finance her life there by her writing.

According to the Scoop! database of 19th-century journalism, when Anna left the US for Europe she already had a great deal of experience of writing for newspapers - she had begun to do so in the 1830s, just after the Blackwell family moved to Ohio. The only certain dates I could find, however, for her career as a newspaper correspondent are:

- she was appointed by the Sydney Morning Herald to be its foreign correspondent, based in Paris, late in 1860
- she continued to work for the SMH until 1890
- she stopped working for a newspaper based in Montreal, Canada, in 1885.

Anna's newspaper work is one of the parts of her life that I'd have to do a great deal of travel to research thoroughly. None of Anna's newspaper articles was credited to her by name - that was standard practice at that time but it does make individual writers hard to spot. Two pseudonyms used by Anna for her newspaper writing have been discovered (not by me, I hasten to add - I wouldn't have known how to go about it): she wrote for the SMH as Fidelitas; and some other newspapers as Stella. Articles signed with just 'AB' are also assumed to be by her. If I spent time in Ohio and in Canada I might be able to work out which newspapers she worked for in those two places, and possible dates during which she was employed by them. But she also worked for newspapers in India and South Africa - I've no idea which papers or when and it's just too time and money-consuming for me to attempt to find out.

The Scoop! database states that Anna was living in Paris from as early as the late 1840s. I've already mentioned evidence I've found that she often spent part of each year in England. Although Anna might have struggled at first to converse in French with French people, as early as 1847 her French had been capable of translating George Sand's novel Jacques (published in 1833). As she only ever translated one other fiction-work, Jacques must have had a particular resonance for Anna and might even sum up one important reason why she never married. Jacques is about the marriage of mismatched partners who cannot escape and start their lives again because there is no divorce. George Sand shows a teenage bride pushed into the marriage by her family; and puts some arguments into the mouth of the hero Jacques, that all the Blackwells could identify with - about education and independence for women.

You will have noticed that one thing Anna doesn't seem to have done, was work for a newspaper in Britain. These GD members, they never do the easy thing! But I think there's a reason why Anna didn't. To have a woman reporter was very unusual for a 19th-century newspaper. Newspapers - both writers and readers - were a man's world. Anna Blackwell was not the only GD woman writer to find that British newspapers were particularly resistant to the idea of women on the staff. Newspapers in newer countries were rather more flexible.

Anna was happy to write about anything her editors asked her to cover, from politics to 'high-life' gossip; but her relaxed, chatty style was something very new, and caused her Australian employer, John Fairfax, some qualms when he read the first piece she sent him. However, his son's support for her style won him over, and Anna must also have been professional and reliable about copy deadlines to keep the job for so long.

Anna did write a few articles for journals, but not very many as what time she could spare from her newspaper work was taken up, especially after the mid-1860s, with her efforts to promote spiritism. In 1858 and 1860 she wrote two short biographies for the English Woman's Journal, which was produced by her friends Barbara Leigh Smith and Bessie Rayner Parkes. The subjects of both Anna's articles were contemporary French women artists - Rosa Bonheur and Henriette Browne. She did also write one article for Chambers's Journal of Popular Literature Science and Arts. This piece was written in the 1860s but not published, for some reason, until 1897.

In 1869, Anna's translation of La Petite Bohémienne was published as The Little Gipsy: it had been written for a child, Edma Fröhlich, by Élie Sauvage (normally a playwright) and illustrated with pictures by Edma's father, the illustrator Lorenz Fröhlich. The illustrations to the French original were put into Anna's English version.

The years between 1868 and 1873 were a turbulent time in Anna's life. This rough period began with the sudden death of Allan Kardec (Hippolyte Rivail) in April 1869. Just three weeks later, a spirit made contact with Anna in a seance Anna was having with her sister Marian, a good medium and like Anna a believer in spiritism. The spirit gave Anna an answer to a question about Kardec which she later found to be correct; from then on she believed that the spirit was the archangel Uriel, come to be the guardian angel she had been awaiting for many years. A couple of months after that, Anna gave her evidence to the Dialectical Society's investigating committee.

The three events caused Anna to think deeply about what exactly she believed, and to begin work on two major pieces of writing (in English) about the meaning of spiritism - the follow-up to her Dialectical Society evidence which was published as part of the final Report and which I've talked about above; and a book called The Philosophy of Existence. The Philosophy of Existence was meant to be in three parts: Soul and Body; The Testimony of the Ages; and Christ and Antichrist. Part two, The Testimony of the Ages, was published, firstly as articles in the magazine Human Nature and then in book form, the printing of which Anna paid for herself. The book version went on sale in June 1871 at London's Progressive Library at 15 Southampton Row in Bloomsbury. It is, essentially, a defence of reincarnation, Anna quoting an astonishing range of sources from the ancient mystery cults through the Vedas and Confucius to the Edda tales and the Kabbala, to justify her belief in the continually-reborn soul; though she didn't go quite as far as to say that the soul was eternal - in a later work she suggested only that it could exist, being reincarnated, for perhaps millions of years.

The other two parts of Anna's The Philosophy of Existence never got as far as being published. Further disruption in her life may have thrown her off-course permanently - the Franco-Prussian war broke out. When Napoléon III declared war on Prussia in July 1870, Anna was still in France completing her written evidence for the Dialectical Society. She must have left, though, before the Prussian siege of Paris began on 19 September, or she would have been trapped in the city. The siege was lifted on 28 January 1871 because the French sued for peace, but the citizens of Paris rose up in revolt against the terms France was having to accept, and the Paris Commune began. The only time I caught Anna Blackwell on the UK census was 1871 - the Paris Commune was still hanging on at this point (early April), and Anna was stuck in London, staying with her spiritualist friend María, Condesa de Pomar. The Commune collapsed in May 1871. I haven't been able to find out when Anna thought it safe to return to Paris, but she was able to give vivid descriptions to her newspapers of what the city looked like, after all the violence and destruction.

Then Anna's mother died, in 1872. Late that year, Anna was still talking of The Philosophy of Existence as a work in progress, but all the recent upheaval and distress in her life had sapped her momentum, and she abandoned what would have been her great work on spiritism. Instead she began working her way through translations into English of Kardec's three major works, which provided a kind-of 'how to' and 'what to expect' manual for mediums. Anna's translations of The Spirits' Book, The Mediums' Book and Heaven and Hell were published in 1875, 1876 and 1878 respectively.

It was inevitable that senior spiritists would worry about what would happen to spiritism after the death of its founder: hence the translations into English of his major works. Anna also took the initiative in September 1872 when the beliefs of spiritists were attacked by other spiritualists. Anna was a member of the Paris Spiritist Society. Ordinarily she would have looked to its president to make a response to the attack, but he was away travelling, so - though on holiday herself (at Wimereux in the Pas de Calais) - Anna undertook to write two long replies to letters by a Monsieur Clavaïroz which had appeared in Human Nature magazine. In those replies she defended spiritism as a “broad, rational, coherent theory” and contrasted it with spiritualism in general which she described as a “parcel of incoherent guesses”.

At the end of 1872 - already a difficult year - Anna Blackwell was mentioned by name in one of the Times’ occasional attacks on spiritualism; and her written evidence to the Dialectical Society committee was described as such as to make the reader believe either himself or the author mad. The article also made a silly typographical error, describing Anna’s deity as a “Casual” rather than a ‘causal’ being. Or was it an error? - there are not many typo’s in the Times at this period, so perhaps it was a joke; one that spiritists would not find very funny. Anna was spending Christmas in Paris, at her flat in Avenue d’Eylau, and might have got away with not knowing anything about the Times’ jibes; but a friend in London undertook to send the relevant copy of the Times to her and having read the offending article, she felt she had to respond. She tried to keep her annoyance out of it and make a rational response to the Times’ criticisms of spiritualism. She also asked the pertinent question why Materialists seemed to feel it so important that spiritism should be disproved (she did not say ‘ridiculed’ although she could have). She wrote her reply on 6 January, the day that the Times brought an end to the affair by printing a short piece in response to several other spiritualists who had written in to express their indignation and whose letters they had published. The Times never published Anna’s letter, so she put it together with the two letters replying to Monsieur Clavaïroz and had them all printed herself, by H Nisbet of Glasgow, publishing them in 1873 as Spiritualism and Spiritism. I do think it was very unsporting and ungentlemanly of the Times to criticise Anna by name and then refuse to print her response.

Anna’s belief in spiritism fitted with the wish of all members of the Blackwell family to work for a better society. As Anna saw it, spiritism could rid the world of the evils that beset it by enabling humans to communicate with spirits on a higher level of existence and learn from them a better way of organising things. With this in view, she took part in a competition organised by the British National Association of Spiritualists for essays on the subject The Probable Effect of Spiritualism upon the Social, Moral and Religious Condition of Society. Her essay won first prize and was published in 1876.

Despite Anna’s efforts, spiritism never really caught on in England; though I notice from the web that there are spiritist organisations still active in several countries, notably Brasil.

Anna’s kind of long-distance writing work - about six weeks in 1860, for example, between her writing the article and the SMH publishing it - was superseded in the end as cables were laid under the oceans. Communication got speedier and editors began to expect more up-to-date copy; and perhaps shorter articles - the first submission Anna sent to SMH was six pages long! And handwritten, I suppose. My best source for Anna’s newspaper career says that by 1890 the SMH was Anna’s only employer, all her other employers having, gradually, dispensed with her services (including the newspaper in Montreal in 1885). In 1890, Anna was over 70 and may have accepted her redundancy as an enforced retirement.

Anna was never a person to give money much priority in her life. In any case, taking the advice of her brother George Washington Blackwell (who had turned out to have a real talent for buying real estate) she had built up a nice portfolio of investments that added to her income. However, in 1885 put her financial circumstances in jeopardy when she moved out of Paris at least for a few months, to Triel-sur-Seine a few kilometres west of the city, for the most extraordinary, 'Dan Brown'-like reason: she wanted to dig for James II's jewellery.

When Britain's James II was deposed in 1688, he and his family went to live in France at St Germain-en-Laye in a chateau lent them by Louis XIV. James II died there and was buried in the parish church. So far so truthful, but by the middle of the 19th-century a rumour had got about that James had fled England with some of the British crown jewels and his own personal jewellery packed up in crates, and that the crates had been buried in Triel-sur-Seine to await better times. Several investigations by various French authorities have all found that there was no evidence at all that James II ever had such a hoard, let alone buried it under a garden in Triel; but when has that ever stopped anyone? Before Anna arrived on the scene, large sums of money had been spent by a number of people trying to find the supposed crates and grab their contents - steam diggers had been used, long and large (and dangerous) tunnels had been dug. A body had been found and some coins, but nothing like James II's crates had been seen. In 1886, Anna agreed with Madame Deville (the owner of the land under which the crates were supposed to be) to live with Mme Deville and pay her for board and lodging while she took her turn at trying to find the hoard. And according to the biographical section of the Schlesinger Library's Blackwell Collection, Anna wasted a lot of her money doing so, and found nothing at all before she gave up, probably when Mme Deville died in January 1886 and the land passed into the ownership of a Monsieur de la Bastie.

Throughout the decades she spent living most of the year in France, Anna had the habit of making regular visits to England to see friends and relations and keep up to date with trends in British thought. In July 1857 Anna, Barbara Leigh Smith and Bessie Rayner Parkes were three of the 15 women present at Lord Brougham's house at the meeting which founded the National Association for the Promotion of Social Science (NAPSS). In 1864 she was available (so presumably in London) to sign Barbara Bodichon's first petition to the Houses of Parliament for legislation to allow married women's their earnings and property - what became the married women's property acts. In 1869 while she was in London to speak to the Dialectical Society, Anna, María de Pomar and a number of other women friends went to a seance at the home of Samuel Carter Hall and his wife. And in the 1880s she must have gone to meetings of the Theosophical Society in London (there wasn't a branch of the TS in Paris until the 1890s) because William Forsell Kirby wrote in a theosophical magazine about having a discussion with her at a TS meeting about whether theosophy should include a belief in reincarnation. Anna's translations of Kardec were known to members of the TS - Isabel de Steiger mentions in her Memoirs that she had read them - but the ideas in them were controversial amongst TS members. William Kirby describes how he and Francesca Arundale were "regarded almost as heretics" by other theosophists for defending the idea of reincarnation as a part of theosophy. The fact that other theosophists rejected the idea is almost certainly why Anna didn't join the TS officially (though her sister Marian was a member in the mid-1890s). De Steiger and Kirby both later joined the Golden Dawn.

Anna was always broad-minded. Just as she went to TS meetings while not really identifying with Eastern philosophy, she also kept abreast of developments in other strands of spiritualism. She was a subscriber to the weekly spiritualist newspaper Light, probably from its first issue in 1881, and continued to read it until her death.

Scoop! database states that Anna lived in France until 1896 but Golden Dawn and census evidence shows that she moved to live permanently in England at the end of 1891. She settled in Hastings, in a house that was a short walk from where Elizabeth Blackwell had been living for some years. Sunnyside, Dudley Road Hastings was the address Anna gave when she was initiated into the Golden Dawn. After Hannah Blackwell's death (1872), sister Marian had moved to Europe, dividing her time between living with Anna and living with Elizabeth. This had meant a lot of travelling between France and England until Anna's return, but when Anna rented the house in Hastings, Marian Blackwell moved permanently into another house on Dudley Road; she died in 1897.

Anna might have been in her mid-70s but moving to England was not an indication that she was ready to take life easy. She kept up with many of the interests that had always been important to her.

Anna had felt moved and excited by looking up at the stars and planets all her life, and in the 1890s she was (still?) a member of the Société Astronomique de France. The wonder of the night sky is a recurring theme in Anna's Poems of 1853, particularly the one entitled A Song of the Stars which has a sub-section called 'Urania's song', rather apt for a future GD member. The stars and planets were an important part of theory of spiritism: spiritism argued that the stars and planets were inhabited by the higher intelligences spiritists sought out through seances. Anna and Marian will have seen some wonderful starscapes from the cliffs at Hastings. Perhaps Anna wondered which of the stars or planets (she wouldn't have known of galaxies) she might inhabit in a future reincarnation; she had learned in one seance that a father from a previous incarnation of hers was now incarnated on Jupiter.

Anna's mind in the 1890s was still in full working order and she was able to write one last attempt to get spiritism accepted. In Whence and Whither? she wondered what the outcome would be of the "general throwing of Beliefs into the crucible of analytic examination" that had occurred in her lifetime: it was obvious that society would change as a result of changes in the beliefs that underpinned it, but what sort of society was going to emerge from the changes she had observed? Although as a spiritist she viewed all things as subject to continual change, Anna thought that the changes currently being brought about by the rise of Materialism were likely to end in the destruction of the human race. To prevent that, and to steer society through difficult times, she advocated a concerted effort by Materialists and others to contact entities in higher spheres who could tell mankind how to prevent disaster. She reminded Materialists that even Materialism was a transitory state, and would not last. And though a human life was "but one step of the endless career we have before us", "the use we make of each phase of our existence decides the character of the next phase of our career" (all Anna's italics): it was in the individual's interests to do the right thing in this life, so that the next incarnation would be at a higher level. Anna was right about humankind being in the process of destroying itself; the process continues. But of course, as Anna's way of saving mankind involved spiritism and an assumption of reincarnation, no one took any notice of her.

Seeking, perhaps, a different way of putting her spiritist point over, Anna looked again at the poems she had written in her 20s and 30s, and re-published the last poem in her Poems book: A Vision. Her views - on work, on people working together, on the possibility of a society based on justice and freedom for all - had not changed, in the years since she had written it. A Vision is a description of a dream/vision in which the poet first looks out over an all-too-real world full of poverty, disease, war, crime and vice; and then is gently taken in hand by an Angel (who is female) and shown what the world could become if humanity were one: enough food for all, physical work as enjoyment not drudgery, all men and women united in faith and Truth, an end to the horrors of violence and starvation. It ends with the poet awaking to a dawn of renewed hope and belief.

Anna was in her mid-70s when she accepted the offer of initiation into the Golden Dawn. I've indicated above that Anna had some experience of many of the skills that GD members were expected to learn, even if it was only as a client, not as a practitioner. She had consulted an astrologer in England (in 1845) and the clairvoyant 'Edmond' in France (in 1856), so she had seen the use of birth data and cards (tarot cards I presume) as aids to prediction; and she at least knew about the existence of the Kabbala although I don't think she would have claimed to be an expert in understanding it. I don't think she knew much about any western occult texts, but her habit of reading metaphysical and philosophical works made her more able than most of the GD's women members to cope with the study required by the GD of initiates who wanted to make progress. And her lack of skill as a medium was actually a help, rather than a hindrance, in the GD. A good medium was receptive, open to communications that spirits were sending. Good medium-ship was a listening, almost a passive skill - which is why women were so good at it. Magic, on the other hand, required decision and action, even the willingness to take risks - completely different qualities.

Anna used days in London to borrow and return copies of study-items prepared by William Wynne Westcott for his GD students: a description of the lesser pentagram ritual, for example, and a lecture on pillars; signing them out in the GD's Lending Book in dashing purple ink. It might have been William Wynne Westcott who saw Anna as a likely candidate for initiation into the GD: although Kirby didn't mention Westcott in the article in which he remembered talking to Anna at a TS meeting, Westcott had also been a member of the TS since the early 1880s and would have known Anna and her writing (though he was never a spiritualist himself).

Anna Blackwell died on 4 January 1900. If she was right about reincarnation, I wonder where - and who - she is now.

ANNA'S PUBLICATIONS (other than the newspaper columns)

SOME POEMS

The Columbian Magazine volumes 5-6 1846

p6 Night and Morning

p128 Invocation

p208 To the Artist

p280 The Persian Wife, for which Blackwell wrote both words and music p286 The Lay of the Lady Alice.

The Columbian Magazine was published in New York by John Inman and Robert A West.

Searching with google I found editions of this magazine from volumes 1-2 (1844) to volume 7 (1847) but nothing any later so I guess volume 7 was the last one issued.

ANNA'S POEM LEGEND OF THE WATERFALL

This poem was published in the painting anthology The American Gallery of Art, edited by J Sartain, published c 1848 Philadelphia: Lindsay and Blakiston. Each poem is illustrated by an engraving by Sartain from an original painting by an American artist. The Legend of the Waterfall was also included in Anna's volume, Poems, published in 1853.

ARTICLE SAID BY ANNA TO HAVE INTRODUCED SPIRITUALISM TO THE FRENCH

In the Journal du Magnétisme volume issued 1850. Article by Anna: Les Coups Mystérieux. I haven't seen this journal. I only found out about it because Anna mentioned it, and the article she had written, in Spiritualism and Spiritism (1873).

ANNA'S ARTICLES IN THE ENGLISH WOMAN'S JOURNAL

- June 1858: Rosa Bonheur, An Authorised Biography; and
- April 1860: Henriette Browne.

I must say that I haven't read either of these, I have just noted down the details from Beyond the Frame: Feminism and Visual Culture in Britain 1850-1900 by Deborah Cherry, who is also the source for Anna's work being signed sometimes with the initials AB. Cherry discusses Anna's two articles on pp53-54 - in which she confirms that Anna knew Bonheur personally - and pp91-92.

Wikipedia on the 2 artists:

ROSA BONHEUR full name Marie-Rosalie Bonheur. 1822-99, artist and sculptor particularly of animals. Her best-known work is The Horse Fair (1853).

HENRIETTE BROWNE is the professional name of Sophie de Boutellier (1829-1901), later Mme Jules de Saulx, traveller and artist specialising in oriental subjects. The Tate has some of her works, see www.tate.org/art/artists/henriette-browne.

THE ONLY OTHER ARTICLE BY ANNA THAT I KNOW OF, IN A NON-SPIRITUALIST MAGAZINE

Chambers's Journal of Popular Literature Science and Arts vol 74 1897 p425 article by Anna Blackwell: The Providence of Book Hunters. It's about book collecting and there's a note with it saying that in the 1860s Anna was a friend of Robert Browning's father and sister (though not, apparently, of the poet himself), and that Mr Browning senior had told her some of the anecdotes related in the article.

ITEMS IN THE BRITISH LIBRARY CATALOGUE

Just noting, firstly, that I did search the catalogue using Anna's writing names 'Fidelitas', 'Stella' and 'AB'. I didn't see anything that was likely to have been written by Anna though I did get vast numbers of responses on Stella and AB so I might have missed something.

1847 Jacques, translated by Anna from the French novel by George Sand. Published in New York. Wikipedia on George Sand, real name [Amantine Lucile] Aurore Dupin, who married Baron Casimir Dudevant but left him later; 2 children. Series of relationships including the famous one, with Chopin. First novel as George Sand published 1832. Jacques originally published in French 1833.

1853 Poems published London: John Chapman of 142 Strand. On p29, in her poem De Profundis, Anna says, "There is no Death; but only Change" - which sums up her beliefs in a few words.

Apart from the re-publication of A Vision, I couldn't find any poems by Anna published later than this volume. Via google, I found a review of the book in Westminster Review volume 61 1854 p165 the (anonymous) reviewer feels Anna is imitating Tennyson, probably without being aware of it. I imagine half the poets writing in English were doing that at the time!

1869 The Little Gipsy translated by Anna from the French children's book by Élie Sauvage. Published London: Griffith and Farran.

French wikipedia on Élie François Victor Sauvage 1814-71. He seems to have lived most of his life in Paris though he wasn't born there. His earliest work is a play published 1833; he wrote 13 plays in all, some with collaborators, including one on Jeanne d'Arc; he also did a translation of King Lear. Most of his output is plays but he published one book of poetry and two novels. La Petite Bohémienne is mentioned on this website as having been translated into English; but the translator isn't named.

Anna's English translation is available on the web via archive.org. Text by Sauvage, pictures (lots) by Lorenz Frölich. On pi a translation of Sauvage's dedication, to Edma Frölich, daughter of a friend of the author. On piv there's a short note by Anna as translator, just saying that the book is very popular in France and is used by some schools.

1871 The Philosophy of Existence: the Testimony of the Ages published London June 1871: sold by J Burns at the Progressive Library, 15 Southampton Row. It is comprised of articles by Anna originally published in the magazine Human Nature. On the last page, p92, The Philosophy of Existence is described as having 3 parts, 2 of which are forthcoming. The magazine Human Nature London was published in London between 1867 and 1878.

1873 Spiritualism and Spiritism. Published privately for Anna by H Nisbet of Glasgow and consisting of 3 letters, written in 1872 and 1873. In the first two letters, Anna talks more about her own beliefs and experiences than in anything else she ever published; perhaps because she was writing them for a spiritualist audience and contributing to debates amongst spiritualists. She also mentioned that her sister Marian was a spiritist, not just a spiritualist.

What provoked Anna to write the third letter in Spiritualism and Spiritism:

Times Thursday 26 December 1872 p5 long article Spiritualism and Science purporting to commemorate the 20th-anniversary of Faraday's offering of proof that table-turning is/can be done by human muscle movements; and noting how little difference this proof had made to people believing in spiritualism. The writer (who's anonymous of course) uses the word "epidemic" to describe how widespread belief in spiritualism has become. Half way through this denunciation, the writer gets to the report issued by the Dialectical Society on its investigations into spiritualism. The writer mentions 2 submissions to it in particular, both by women (though the writer doesn't comment on that fact) and who are both named: Anna Blackwell and the then Condesa de Pomar who is now Countess of Caithness. The writer mentions Anna's "fifty pages of close print" expounding Kardec's belief that the Deity is a "Casual Being" (sic) and ending by saying that Anna's piece must surely convince any reader that “either he (again sic) or the author is stark and staring mad”. Anna’s work is described as putting “Spiritualistic experience side by side with her philosophic convictions”. The writer describes Anna as one of the group of followers of the school of “spiritist philosophy” founded by the late Allan Kardec. Then the writer goes on to quote Pomar and rubbish her submission at length as well. The Times writer is firm in refusing to believe in a “Psychic Force”. The writer applauds G H Lewes for “Distinguishing between facts and inferences from facts”: when spiritualists talk about tables being lifted by spirits, the Times is not doubting the rising tables, only the spirits.

Following the Spiritualism and Science article, the Times printed several replies between 1 and 6 January 1873. Please note that I didn’t look at any of the contents of the replies, just who had written them, so I don’t know whether they agreed with the Times’ scepticism or not - though I suppose not. The authors of the replies were: Edward W Cox; Henry Dircks FCS; “F.G.S.”; Alfred R Wallace; “An Eight Years’ Spiritualist”; John Algernon Clarke; and Fenton Cameron MD. In response to the replies, the Times printed a final article on Monday 6 January 1873, sticking to the view of its original article and closing the debate. Searching using ‘spiritualism’ I didn’t get a single response from Times for the rest of 1873.

Anna’s translations of Allan Kardec, writing name of Léon Hippolyte Denisart Rivail 1804-69:

1875 Spiritualist Philosophy: The Spirits’ Book

1876 Experimental Spiritism: The Mediums’ Book

1878 Practical Spiritism: Heaven and Hell, Divine Justice Vindicated in the Plurality of Existences

All published London: Trübner and Co.

1898 Whence and Whither? Correlation between Philosophic Convictions and Social Forms Published London: G Redway.

1898 A Vision. Published London: G Redway.

NOT IN THE BRITISH LIBRARY

Via google I was able to look at this work via a copy now in the library at Cornell University:

1876 Probable Effect of Spiritualism upon the Social, Moral and Religious Condition of Society. Published for the British National Association of Spiritualists by E W Allen.

The volume contains the first and second prize-winning entries in a competition to write on that subject. The first prize in the competition was a gold medal and £20; Anna’s essay won it! The second-prize essay was by a G F Green. In the Preface (unnumbered page): the competition entries had been judged by a committee which included Alfred Russel Wallace. Anna’s essay occupies pp5-40 in the volume; on p5 is a handwritten dedication by Anna sending this copy to Mr and Mrs ?H Stanton, on 20 April 1888 “with the Authoress’s Kind Regards”.

If I’ve read the dedication correctly, the most likely dedicatee is H B Stanton, son of Elizabeth Cady Stanton, a friend of all the Blackwells.

BASIC SOURCES I USED for all Golden Dawn members.

Membership of the Golden Dawn: The Golden Dawn Companion by R A Gilbert. Northampton: The Aquarian Press 1986. Between pages 125 and 175, Gilbert lists the names, initiation dates and addresses of all those people who became members of the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn or its many daughter Orders between 1888 and 1914. The list is based on the Golden Dawn's administrative records and its Members' Roll - the large piece of parchment on which all new members signed their name at their initiation. All this information had been inherited by Gilbert but it's now in the Freemasons' Library at the United Grand Lodge of England building on Great Queen Street Covent Garden. Please note, though, that the records of the Amen-Ra Temple in Edinburgh were destroyed in 1900/01. As far as I know, the records of the Horus Temple at Bradford have not survived either.

Family history: freebmd; ancestry.co.uk (census and probate); findmypast.co.uk; familysearch; Burke's Peerage and Baronetage; Burke's Landed Gentry; Armorial Families; thepeerage.com; and a wide variety of family trees on the web.

Famous-people sources: mostly about men, of course, but very useful even for the female members of GD. Oxford Dictionary of National Biography. Who Was Who. Times Digital Archive.

Catalogues: British Library; Freemasons' Library.

Wikipedia; Google; Google Books - my three best resources for history, biography etc. I also used other web pages, but with some caution, as - from the historian's point of view - they vary in quality a great deal.

SOURCES FOR ANNA BLACKWELL

ABOUT WHAT ANNA BORROWED FROM THE GOLDEN DAWN'S TEACHING COLLECTION:

Freemasons' Library Golden Dawn collection GBR GD2/2/8a Receipts for items (usually books) borrowed from William Wynne Westcott during period 1891-1892.

THE BLACKWELL FAMILY OF ENGLAND AND USA

At oasis.lib.harvard.edu/oasis/deliver/~sch00050 is a list of the Blackwell collection in the Arthur and Elizabeth Schlesinger Library at the Radcliffe Institute, Harvard University. The collection covers 1832 to 1981 and begins with a biographical section and discussion of the people they knew. Eventually, family members were scattered from Wisconsin to India but they remained a very tight-knit group, exchanging letters constantly. It's those letters that are the basis of Harvard University's collection.

The Schlesinger website recommends Those Extraordinary Blackwells by Elinor Rice Hays published 1967, for further information.

THE BRISTOL BOOK ON THE BLACKWELL FAMILY Elizabeth Blackwell of Bristol: The First Woman Doctor by Mary Wright. Pamphlet printed by the Bristol Branch of the Historical Association. No date of publication but the British Library accession date-stamp says 1996.

BROOKE FARM COMMUNITY

There's plenty on it on the web, largely through its connection with Ralph Waldo Emerson though he never lived there. My information is based on its wikipedia page.

ON EMERSON'S TRANSCENDENTALISM from //transcendentalism.tamu.edu which is the website of the American Transcendentalists - the idea still exists and is seen as an American contribution to the subject, not anything imported from Europe.

AND ON CHARLES FOURIER: see wikipedia he's François Marie Charles Fourier, 1772-1837 French philosopher and proponent of social and moral views way ahead of his time; generally credited with having invented the word 'feminism'. Ideas tried out in the 1848 revolution in France, and the Paris Commune were influenced by him.

EDGAR ALLAN POE

On the web, www.eapoe.org has letters to/from Poe available to read including LTR-270 from Poe to Anna Blackwell, dated 14 June 1848 from Fordham.

Elsewhere at www.eapoe.org/studies/ps1970/p1979202.htm more on this exchange of letters, in an article originally in Poe Studies volume XII number 2 issued December 1979: Poe and Miss Anna Blackwell by John C Miller of Old Dominion University. This was helpful about what happened after the exchange of letters.

Wikipedia on Whitman: she's Sarah Helen Whitman, friend/correspondent of Poe; her Poe collection is at the University of Virginia now.

ANNA AS A FOREIGN CORRESPONDENT

A general work on women in this job: Battling for News: the Rise of the Woman Reporter by Anne Sebba. Hodder and Stoughton 1994.

The British Library has a database of 19th and 20th century journalists called Scoop! The database doesn't give many sources for the information in it. Scoop gives Fidelitas, and Stella, as the writing names Anna used but only has information on what she wrote as Fidelitas. It's this database that has the information on when Anna began writing for newspapers. It also reckons she moved to Paris as early as the late 1840s; though it says she lived there until 1896 which I have found is wrong. Scoop! is also wrong about the period in which Anna wrote for the Sydney Morning Herald, which makes me a bit worried about some of the other information in the database.

At www.austlit.ed.au is the Australian Literature Research site, which knows of 8 works by Anna as Stella; 1 by Anna as Fidelitas; and none at all by her as AB. You needed to subscribe to get into the full database, so I couldn't get any more information.

At www.uow.edu.au/cgi/ is the University of Wollongong's Research Online Thesis Collection including the full text of G R Tucker's thesis from 1991: From Novelist to Essayist: the Charmian Clift Phenomenon. The thesis' Chapter XI is called Woman Columnists and discusses the situation pre-Clift. On p228 the Sydney Morning Herald had been happy to employ woman journalists right from its foundation. A job as a foreign correspondent was "coveted" by aspiring journalists. Anna wrote as 'Stella' for the SMH. She was appointed its foreign correspondent in 1860 and kept the job for over 30 years. Her first column was 6 pages long, written in Paris October 1860 and published by SMH in its edition of 18 December 1860. Tucker describes Anna's style as "chatty" and says she wrote her columns in the first person. This was so different from what was typical of newspaper writing styles at the time - formal, 3rd-person, unpersonal - that SMH's owner, John Fairfax, had to be reassured that it would appeal to the readers by his son James, who supported Anna's approach when they discussed it. Tucker p229 notes that this kind of column-writing became obsolete with the advent of communication by cable. As a result Anna's newspaper employer in Montreal "dispensed with" her column in 1885 so that SMH was her only employer. I looked at the footnotes for this chapter but couldn't figure out where Tucker had seen the information about Anna's employer in Montreal.

FRANCO-PRUSSIAN WAR AND PARIS COMMUNE

From wikipedia: war was declared July 1870; fighting stopped with an armistice January 1871 and a peace deal was signed May 1871. The war had rather a lot of important consequences including the fall of Napoléon III amidst a general feeling that France was behind Prussia in technology and had been inadequately prepared for war; and the Paris Commune which lasted from January to 28 May 1871.

ANNA AND SPIRITUALISM

Some good modern sources for spiritualism in general:

The Other World: Spiritualism and Psychical Research in England 1850-1914 by Janet Oppenheim. Cambridge University Press 1985.

The Darkened Room: Women, Power and Spiritualism in Late Victorian England by Alex Owen. Chicago and London: University of Chicago Press 2004.

Radical Spirits: Spiritualism and Women's Rights in 19th Century America. Ann Braude. Boston Mass: Beacon Press 1989. This is a good source for how many of Anna's siblings and their spouses were spiritualists.

Some contemporary sources for Anna's involvement in spiritualism:

At www.woodlandway.org is the electronic newsletter Psypioneer founded by Leslie Price, edited by Paul J Gaunt. In volume 2 number 10 issued October 2006 is a long article p221 about the impact of the first visit to Britain by the American medium Mrs Maria Hayden, in 1853; based on letters sent during her visit by her husband W R Hayden to his friend Samuel Britten. On p224 Anna is mentioned by W R Hayden as someone who went to one of Maria Hayden's seances; the novelist Edward Bulwer Lytton is also mentioned as having gone to at least one of them.

Alex Owen p19 describes Maria Hayden as beginning her career as a public medium in October 1852 and as having introduced spiritualism “to the fashionable world” (in England), the first of a flood of mediums from the US to do a tour in Britain.

Christmas Story: John Ruskin’s Venetian Letters of 1876-77 edited by van Akin Burd. P63 is part of a chapter on Ruskin’s Inquiry into Spiritualism and covers letters written in 1866. “In Paris in August” Ruskin’s friend Cowper went to a séance held by “the English spiritualist Anna Blackwell, a disciple of the French medium Hippolyte Rivail”.

Oppenheim (index) identifies Cowper as later being given a peerage as Lord Mount-Temple. Wikipedia: William Francis Cowper 1811-88, 2nd son of 5th Earl Cowper and wife Emily who later married Lord Palmerston. Liberal MP. When Lord Palmerston was Prime Minister, he gave Cowper several appointments including a spell as First Commissioner of Works. Emily Palmerston died in 1869. Later Cowper inherited estates including Broadlands from Lord Palmerston and added Palmerston’s surname ‘Temple’ to his own. Became a peer as first and only Baron Mount-Temple. Married twice, no children. The 2nd marriage was to Georgiana Tollemache who died 1901.

Via google: The Spiritual Magazine volume 4 1869 p473 has a list of people attesting the contents of an article by S C Hall describing events during a seance at his house on 18 July [?1869], one of a series of five using a Mrs Everett (sic) as medium. The list is of people who are defending Everett against accusations of fraud; it included Anna Blackwell and María de Pomar.

Oppenheim p34, 35 and Owen p89 both know who the medium was, but spell her name Everitt. Oppenheim p42 says she was the wife of Thomas Everitt, a tailor. Owen p89 describes Mrs Everitt as a talented medium but never a professional one. S C Hall is identified by Oppenheim p34 as Samuel Carter Hall, a journalist and editor of the magazine Art Journal 1839-80. His wife was also a writer - Anna Maria Fielding Hall. The Halls were champions of the famous medium Daniel Hume. Oppenheim thinks them both rather credulous. P35 Ruskin knows both S C Hall and Mrs Cowper.

ANNA’S EVIDENCE TO THE DIALECTICAL SOCIETY 1869

Report on Spiritualism of the Committee of the London Dialectical Society, Together with the Evidence.... London: Longmans, Green, Reader and Dyer. 1871.

Preface pvi: the Society agreed to carry out the investigation at a meeting held on Wednesday 6 January 1869; the members of the investigating committee were appointed at the meeting of 26 January 1869; they included Charles Bradlaugh and Alfred Russel Wallace. T H Huxley and George Henry Lewes were asked to help the committee but were not official members of it. The committee heard evidence from 33 people including 9 women. In the Report, the evidence heard was published as a summing-up of what had been said, not verbatim.

P217-222 Anna Blackwell and María de Pomar both gave evidence to the committee during the afternoon of Tuesday 20 July 1869. Anna was asked about whether spirits would manifest themselves in the presence of people who didn’t believe in spiritualism; whether bad spirits as well as good ones (whatever that might mean) could manifest themselves during seances; and if and how people at a seance could distinguish between a good spirit and a bad one. In her evidence, Anna used the example of her sister (Anna didn’t give her name but I think it's Elizabeth) as someone who could communicate as "a writing medium" despite being a firm non-believer in spirit manifestations. Anna had experienced manifestations of bad spirits herself during seances - one spirit had hit her, but she and her sister had continued to let it communicate in the hope of improving its behaviour. Dr Edmunds, who was chairing that afternoon's session, asked Anna if she thought this violent spirit was a devil; and in her reply Anna began to expound the spiritist argument that she wrote up the following year at much greater length. She said, "I do not believe in a special devil but the imperfect spirits are all in a manner devils". Dr Edmunds followed this up by asking Anna whether she believed spirits could go back and forth between animals and people. Anna said no, but that she did think that there was a general progression of spirits "from gases to crystals, from animals to man" although "there was a reason why one thing is a cress and another a flower". Dr Edmunds wasn't satisfied with this reply - which does seem to contradict itself - he asked Anna if she thought that "the spirit which animates a man" might once have animated a horse. Again Anna gave a rather contradictory set of answers, by saying no but adding that in spiritism a spirit could progress and "become purified...so as to reach a higher stage".

As this is a biography of a member of the Golden Dawn, I thought I'd note it down that (p224) another person giving evidence that afternoon spoke of using what must have been a kind of banishing ceremony, at the end of a seance. And (p222) Anna said that she and her sister "never begin [a seance] without a prayer".

It seems from Anna's published work of 1870 that after giving evidence formally to the committee, she was asked to return the following day. What was said at that second session is unknown, unless the details made their way into Anna's written submission to the Committee, because that second session was an informal session and not included in the committee's Report.

Anna's evidence confirms what I've said in the main biography, about Anna never seeing herself as a good medium - I daresay that by this time she had tried and failed.

Light: A Journal of Psychical, Occult and Mystical Research. Published London: Eclectic Publishing Co Ltd of 2 Duke St Adelphi; first issue 1881. In its early years Light was published by the British National Association of Spiritualists. By 1890, however, it had been taken over by the London Spiritualist Alliance of 2 Duke St Adelphi. In Volume 22 January-December 1900: p14; number 992 issue of Saturday 13 January 1900, a one paragraph obituary of long-time reader Anna Blackwell.

SPIRITISM and ALLAN KARDEC, Léon Hippolyte Denisart Rivail 1804-69.

Virtually all Anna's appearances via google are as translator of Kardec's works into English. Editions of Anna's translations are still in print - on the web I saw one of Heaven and Hell published in 2003. While I was searching google for spiritism I noticed that it's still fairly active in Roman Catholic countries especially Brasil: eg at www.geae.inf.br/en/books/codification/ there's the entire text of Heaven and Hell in a pdf file.

At the spiritist website reflight.blogspot.com/2007/07/carrying-on-spiritist-tradition, Anna's translation of The Spirits' Book is described as a "decent introduction" to spiritism.

Encyclopedia of Occultism and Parapsychology part 2, Lewis Spence 2003 seen via google p865 short entry for spiritists describes them as the group within spiritualism who believed in reincarnation. Spence describes Anna as spiritism's only proponent in Britain; he sees her as having tried "without success" to establish spiritism in Britain.

ANNA AND THEOSOPHY

Biography of Anna Bonus Kingsford and her founding of the Hermetic Society by Samuel Hopgood Hart. My copy was printed in 2013 by Kessinger Publishing but originally it was the Biographical Preface to a much longer work, Hart's Credo of Christendom and other Addresses and Essays on Esoteric Christianity. Via the web it looks like the full book was published in 1930. On p5 Hart is discussing reincarnation. He specifically states that as Helena Petrovna Blavatsky had not mentioned it in her (1877) Isis Unveiled regarded by all TS members as the TS's "chief text-book", reincarnation was not a doctrine put forward by the TS. Further down the page, Hart mentions some criticisms of Kardec's works made by Kingsford who was president of the TS during the early 1880s; Kingsford called them "unscientific and erroneous" and based on "ordinary mediumship...no true spiritual vision but only the ideas of living persons, whom they reflected."

Confirmation that Blavatsky had tried and rejected Kardec's ideas in the early 1870s: H.P. Blavatsky: Collected Writings volume VI covering 1883-85. Compiled and with notes by Boris de Zirkoff. Published Los Angeles California: Blavatsky Writings Publication Fund 1954: p308-12.

Lucifer: A Theosophical Magazine Volume XI covering September 1892 to February 1893. Published London: Theosophical Publishing Society of 7 Duke Street Adelphi. Volume XI number 66 issued 15 February 1893 p515 news item on Chiswick Lodge which met at the house of Golden Dawn member Frederick Leigh Gardner: in January [1893] W F Kirby had lectured on French Spiritism in Relation to Theosophy.

Lucifer: A Theosophical Magazine Volume XII covers March-August 1893. Volume VII number 69 issued 15 May 1893. Kirby's lecture on French spiritism was printed, beginning on p193. Kirby described modern spiritualism as following 3 main lines of enquiry:

- 1 in England: attempting to interpret spirit manifestations in a manner as close to orthodox Christian teaching as possible;
- 2 mainly in United States: interpretation with a "more general and Pantheistic character";
- 3 a particularly French line of enquiry advocated by Allan Kardec, J B Roustaing and Anna Blackwell.

The rest of Kirby's lecture focused on the French interpretation: he saw it as the nearest of the three variants to theosophy, because it assumed reincarnation. Although he wondered whether it was, "too orthodox and too dogmatic" he still viewed spiritism as "one of the most satisfying systems of Western Philosophy with which I am acquainted". He thought spiritism was particularly suited to people who had been educated in the western tradition and were interested in theosophy, but who found theosophy's basis in eastern philosophy rather hard to accept.

The publication of Kirby's lecture provoked a number of responses from readers. In Lucifer:

A Theosophical Magazine volume XII number 71 issued 15 July 1893, p514 in the letters section, he replied to them, and to a note posted at the end of his lecture by Lucifer's editor (Annie Besant). Kirby reminded readers that reincarnation had not always been a tenet of theosophy: "I have been in touch with the movement ever since its commencement", he said, and as a result he was able to be very sure that, "before Mr Sinnett's arrival in London very little was heard of Reincarnation". In the days before Sinnett, he and Francesca Arundale had been almost the only theosophists in London to think that theosophy must contain reincarnation; they were p515 "regarded almost as heretics in consequence". During the pre-Sinnett period, Kirby had discussed the omission of reincarnation from theosophy with Anna Blackwell. He still felt that those theosophists who wouldn't countenance reincarnation were giving "exaggerated importance" to "personal identity".

Memorabilia: Reminiscences of a Woman Artist and Writer by Isabelle de Steiger. London: Rider and Co; no publication date but the British library accession-date stamp says "27 May 27". On p153-54 de Steiger is talking about her acquaintances in the 1880s when she was living in London. She had read works by Kardec and she notes that some of them had been translated into English by Anna Blackwell. de Steiger and Anna had a mutual friend in Emily Kislingbury, secretary of the British National Association of Spiritualists. However, from the way de Steiger writes this passage, it's not clear to me whether she actually knew Anna personally, or just knew of her. On p246 in a passage on the Hermetic Society (the GD's immediate predecessor from the mid-1880s), de Steiger makes one more brief mention of Kardec, saying that Anna Kingsford taught Kardec's "new doctrine of reincarnation". De Steiger doesn't mention it, but it's possible that Anna Blackwell knew Anna Bonus Kingsford, founder of the Hermetic Society.

THOUGH IT'S MARIAN NOT ANNA WHO'S A MEMBER OF THE THEOSOPHICAL SOCIETY:

Theosophical Society Membership Register June 1893 to March 1895 p133 entry for Miss Marian Blackwell, who paid membership subscriptions to the TS from 1894 to 1898. The address she gave was South View, Dudley Road, Clive Vale Hastings. The sponsor of her application to be a member was TS General Secretary G R S Mead. While I was researching the (strong) connections between the TS and the GD I went through all the TS Membership Registers for the period 1888 to 1901; I couldn't see any evidence that either Anna or Elizabeth Blackwell were members of the TS during that time.

ANNA AND JAMES II'S JEWELLERY

She didn't invent the idea! - the first rumours are from a lot earlier in the 19th-century. There's quite a lot about this on the web.

Wikipedia short article on St Germain-en-Laye, in the Île de France about 11m/19km west of Paris. Louis XIV was born at the royal chateau there. On the arrival of James II and his family in France in 1688, Louis XIV gave them the chateau to live in. James II's last child was born there; and he died there in September 1701 and is buried in the parish church in the town.

However, everybody's looking for James II's jewellery in Triel-sur-Seine not in St Germain-en-Laye and I'm not quite sure why. At www.triel-sur-seine.fr/Le-mystere-du-tresor-de-Jacques-II.html there's an account of the various treasure-hunters which I'm prepared to trust: posted 20 September 2002 by Daniel Biget as co-author of Triel, son histoire, ses légendes.

Please note that as the account is in French, and my French is not good, I'm not sure how many of the details I got. But it's pretty clear that people have been searching one particular place in the town for a bit of the British Crown Jewels, and jewels owned personally - some sources say there were three crates-full - supposedly brought into exile by James II. Though right at the end of this article the author reminds us that at no time did James II ever mention bringing into exile anything of the sort - not to his son, and not even when making his final confession on his death bed.

It wasn't clear to me from the article exactly when the first rumours about the jewellery and/or the three crates got about, but as early as 1800s Lord Palmerston was nosing about in French archives trying to find evidence of the jewellery being in France; and as the 19th and 20th century progressed there were several official French investigations into its supposed existence. People began actually digging, on the site of a particular group of houses and a garden in Triel-sur-Seine (all one property and owned by one person at a time) opposite the parish church of Triel-sur-Seine, as early as 1845. A particular thread I noticed through in this account and elsewhere on the web, was how much of the digging was financed by women of unknown ancestry using wealth from unknown sources. Anna Blackwell comes into the process in 1885, when the land had been owned for many years by a Madame Deville who is definitely one of the dubious women. In 1885 Mme Deville was 78 and had nearly bankrupted herself trying to find this jewellery hoard without any more success than anyone else. Anna is described in the article as "curieuse femme à la personnalité ambiguë". Anna and Mme Deville came to an agreement the exact details of which my French isn't up to understanding - I got stuck on how you translate the verb 'louer'. But the results of the deal were clear enough: Anna lodged with Mme Deville and her daughter in one of the houses on the property; and Anna would be allowed to have a part of whatever treasure was found by the digging funded by Anna. That's the only mention of Anna in the article so I take it she dug and found nothing. (The biographical sketch of Anna in the Schlesinger collection suggests she lost a lot of money through her involvement with Mme Deville.) Whatever Anna did, it didn't help Mme Deville's financial situation and in May 1885 Mme Deville sold the property to a Monsieur de la Bastie with the proviso that she was able to continue to live on it for the next three years. In fact she died on 29 January 1886 and Monsieur de la Bastie took full possession of it (and carried on the digging I presume - I didn't follow the rest of the tale in detail).

I think that Daniel Biget doesn't believe there's anything of James II's to find in Triel-sur-Seine; though via trove.nla.gov.au (the Trove Digitised Newspapers) I found an article in the Launceston Examiner of Monday 30 December 1895 p3 which said that by 1892 a burial had been found on the site, of a woman, with coins thought to be 15th or 16th century. The plot of land was now owned by "an American lady; she is over eighty, and is confident of finding the treasure". She wasn't named and I don't think she can be Anna as Anna had moved to England by then.

ANNA INTERESTED IN ASTRONOMY at least later in life.

Bulletin de la Société Astronomique de France volume 9 1895 p41 probably a list of members though I couldn't see the top of the list on google's snippet: Anna Blackwell, of Sunnyside, Dudley Road Hastings.

ANNA AND FEMINISM

Science, Reform and Politics in Victorian Britain by Lawrence Goldman. Cambridge University Press 2002. Anna Blackwell is mentioned on pp29-32 which cover the meeting which founded the National Association for the Promotion of Social Science. It took place on 29 July 1857 at Lord Brougham's house in Grafton Street. P30: 43 people were there, and Goldman argues that the interests and concerns of those who were present set the agenda for what the new association would do - what subjects it would discuss. Therefore it's relevant to Goldman's argument that (p30) 15 of those present were women including (p31) Barbara Bodichon, Bessie Rayner Parkes and Anna Blackwell. On p32 Goldman says that six of the 15 women would sign the first petition demanding a married women's property act and the whole 15 represented the beginnings of an organised feminist movement in the UK.

The Jurist volume 12 March 1864 p134 contains the petition to the Houses of Parliament organised by Barbara Leigh Smith and her circle as part of the campaign for married women's property rights. By virtue of having a surname beginning with B, Anna Blackwell heads the list of signatories as laid out in The Jurist. The list also includes Amelia Edwards, Elizabeth Gaskell, Elizabeth Barrett Browning, Anna Jameson, Bessie Rayner Parkes and Barbara Leigh Smith. There's plenty of information on all those women on the web, if you don't already know who they are.

Frances Power Cobbe: Victorian Feminist, Journalist, Reformer. Sally Mitchell. Charlottesville and London: University of Virginia Press 2004. P3 on Cobbe's 80th birthday in 1902 a testimonial with 400 signatures was presented to her. Elizabeth Blackwell was one of the 400; of course Anna had died by then but it does indicate a link between the Blackwell sisters and Cobbe.

ANNA'S SISTER DR ELIZABETH BLACKWELL. There isn't much mention of Anna in books on Elizabeth.

Sex and Suffrage in Britain 1860-1914 by Susan Kingsley Kent. Princeton New Jersey: Princeton University Press 1987.

The Women's Suffrage Movement in Britain and Ireland by Elizabeth Crawford. Routledge: 2006. Reforming Women's Fashion 1850-1920: Politics, Health and Art. Patricia A Cunningham 2003. Kent State University Press. This book also talks about Elizabeth Blackwell as the dress reform movement saw women's fashion as a health issue.

Journal of the Society for Psychical Research volume 4 1889-90, published by the Society for members only: on p201 issue of February 1890: Elizabeth Blackwell had asked to change her membership from full member to associate member. On p203 it says that even associate members had to be elected.

Proceedings of the Society for Psychical Research volume XI 1895 p 606 Elizabeth Blackwell is still an associate member, at Rock House Hastings.

I went through the Journal from the 1880s to 1900: at no time was Anna Blackwell a member of the Society for Psychical Research. The Society was founded by a group of academics at Cambridge University to do scientific research into the phenomena of spiritualism.

***

Find the web pages of Roger Wright and Sally Davis, including my list of people initiated into the Order of the Golden Dawn between 1888 and 1901, at:

www.wrightanddavis.co.uk

Wilfred George Frederick Praeger was initiated into the Order of the Golden Dawn at its Isis-Urania temple in London on 28 May 1892, taking the Latin motto 'Perficit qui mavult'. There was some confusion in 1894 as to whether he'd resigned; but he hadn't and in fact he was initiated into the GD's inner, 2nd Order on 3 March 1897.

R A Gilbert believes that Lilian Grace Mary Blyth was initiated into the Order of the Golden Dawn at its Horus temple in Bradford in 1893; though as the Bradford records have been lost, he couldn't be sure. Later, she was a member of the Isis-Urania temple in London, where she used the motto 'Deo volante'. It was in London that she was initiated into the 2nd Order, on 6 April 1897; though she was excused the yearly subscription on grounds of poverty (the GD hierarchy was very generous about this sort of thing, with a member they thought was good).

Wilfred Praeger and Lilian Blyth were married in 1898. They may be one of several couples who married after first meeting at the Golden Dawn; but I think they might have known each other before they were initiated, because of this man - a third person in their marriage, you could say he was - William John Manners Tollemache (1859-1935), 9th Earl of Dysart.

I'm going to start this Blyth-Praeger biography with the Earl, a generous benefactor of both the Blyth and the Praeger families.

The Dysart earldom was created in the 17th century and is a very rare bird - it can be inherited by a woman and has been so inherited many times in its history. In September 1878 the 9th earl succeeded to the title in the more time-honoured way when his grandfather died, his father having been dead several years by this time. Along with the earldom went 27000 acres of land in Surrey, Lincolnshire and Leicestershire and two houses: Buckminster Park near Grantham, built in the 1790s and with grounds landscaped by Repton; and the 17th-century Ham House on the Thames near Richmond, built by the first earl of Dysart and his daughter Elizabeth the 2nd Countess, who married the Duke of Lauderdale. His grandfather's Will prevented the 9th Earl having sole control of these estates until September 1899, but with the consent of the his trustees he had already begun to spend money making much-needed repairs to Ham House before this time. He travelled widely, farmed, bred shorthorns and Shire horses, and took an interest in the history of the counties in which the family lands were situated.

However, his life had a tragic side to it, because he went blind at quite a young age. Music became his solace - that's where the Praeger family comes in. And although he came to need secretarial and other help to make his way through his days, he was a wealthy man - even in the 1920s and 1930s he could still afford to employ 20 servants and keep four fancy cars. And he could still make all the decisions that went with wealth and the power of patronage - that too involves the Praegers and is also where the Blyth family comes in.

In 1885 the 9th Earl married Cecilia Florence Newton, daughter of George Newton of Croxton Park Cambridgeshire; but relations between them deteriorated so that she left him at some time during the 1900s. The 9th Earl and his wife had no children, so on the earl's death, the title was inherited by Wenefryde Greaves, daughter of his sister Agnes Lindsay-Tollemache-Scott; the lands were divided between members of the Tollemache family.

9TH EARL OF DYSART AND THE BLYTH FAMILY

One of the duties of the earls of Dysart was to appoint and to pay suitable men to work as Church of England priests in the churches situated on their lands. When a vacancy arose in 1881 at the church in Buckminster, the 9th Earl remembered a clergyman who had been curate at Kew-with-Petersham, and appointed him - Lilian Blyth's father the Rev Frederic Cavan Blyth - to the job.

LILIAN BLYTH

The Blythe or Blyth family claimed to be able to trace itself back through 40 generations to a Duke Altorf of Bavaria who was alive in AD820. Lilian Blyth was descended from the Yorkshire branch of the family, which had begun with the purchase (in 1367) of land at Norton Lees, near Sheffield by a man called John de Blida in the Latin of the time. John Blythe's descendants married over the next several hundred years into similar families in Yorkshire and Lincolnshire - Sir Isaac Newton's grandmother was Margaret Blythe. Lilian's great-grandfather Joseph Blythe was the man who dropped the 'e' and became Blyth. He lived at an estate that he had bought from the Duke of Kingston, at Cotness on the River Ouse. Lilian's grandfather, Joseph's son George Blanshard Blyth, was the vicar of a parish near Brough in Yorkshire. He married Mary Popham, the daughter of an army officer, who had grown up in Paris and the West Indies where her father had been stationed. George and Mary had a large family including five sons, two of whom joined the army and three of whom joined the church.

Frederic Cavan Blyth was the youngest of the three sons who joined the church. After following his older brothers to St Paul's School in London, he went to Oriel College Oxford. In 1860 he was ordained by the bishop of Lincoln, who also found him his first job, as curate of Kirkby-with-Asgarby in Lincolnshire. Frederic Blyth went from there to two more short-lived appointments (at Wimbleton and at Frittenden in Kent) before becoming curate at Kew-with-Petersham in 1867, where he stayed for ten years. During 1873 he was also chaplain to the Richmond Poor Law Union, but this seems to have been a temporary appointment. The job at Kew-with-Petersham brought him to the attention of some very influential people, including the Dysarts and John, Earl Russell, who lived with his large family at Pembroke Lodge in Richmond Park.

In 1863 Frederic Blyth had married Eliza Ann Holder Christie, the daughter of Robert Christie (a surgeon) and his wife Matilda. Lilian Grace Mary was their eldest child, born in Sleaford Lincolnshire in 1864. Frederic and Eliza had five more children: Edith born in 1866; twins Gertrude and Frederick William born in 1868; Mary Agatha born in 1869; and William born in 1873. Frederick William was either born dead or died shortly after his birth, but all the other children grew to adulthood. The curate of Kew-with-Petersham didn't have a vicarage to live in, so on the day of the 1871 census, Frederic and Eliza Blyth and their children were living at 8 Cambridge Gardens Richmond. Also in the household were Frederic's unmarried sister Alice, and two young boys, Frederic Blyth's pupils, whose fees were helping the Blyths afford a cook, as well as a nurse and a housemaid.

In 1877, Frederic Blyth moved to his next job, as vicar of Quatford in Shropshire and chaplain to the Bridgenorth Poor Law Union. On the day of the 1881 census the Blyths were living in the Vicarage at Eardington just outside Bridgenorth. Alice Blyth was no longer living with them; and Frederic had no pupils at the time, but he was still able to employ a cook as well as a housemaid. He could not afford a governess, I should imagine; certainly the Blyths didn't employ a resident governess in 1881. However, Frederic Blyth told the census official that Lilian (now 16) and Edith (now 15) were still in education, so either he had found the money to send them away to school, or he was teaching them himself; I haven't been able to find out which. What Lilian was being taught will become clear.

The Blyths' time in Shropshire was short. The offer to Frederic of an appointment in a county they knew, with an employer they were acquainted with and perhaps a better salary, was too good to be turned down. In 1882 Frederic Blyth became vicar at Buckminster - a village more or less entirely owned by the Tollemache family. He remained there until 1896, when he moved to another of the Earl of Dysart's vicarages, at Silk Willoughby, near Sleaford where he and Eliza had lived just after their marriage 30 years before.

On the day of the 1891 census, Frederic and Eliza Blyth were well settled at the Vicarage in Buckminster. I cannot find their daughter Gertrude on any census after 1881; and Edith wasn't in the UK on 1891 census day; but Mary Agatha, William, and Lilian were all at home. Mary Agatha's occupation or source of income was left blank; as it usually was with unmarried middle-class women, whatever they spent their lives doing. William's was as well although it's obvious from later information that he was still at school or about to go to university. However, Lilian (now 26) told the census official that she did have a profession: she was a musician, and a member of the National Society of Professional Musicians (NSPM). She could also have told him that she was a composer: in 1890, the German music publishing firm of Schott and Co had published a Prelude for organ by "L G M Blyth".

I know it's only one, probably quite short work, but Lilian's Prelude does show how much effort she put in to her music and how much she wanted to be taken seriously as a professional. I think she didn't tell her contacts at Schott and Co that she was a woman, so that her work would be considered on its merits, not on her gender: no one took women seriously as composers. Although I haven't found any evidence that she went to music college, she must - surely - have studied composition somewhere. Perhaps with Ferdinand Praeger who might also have had the contacts in Germany to put her in touch with Schotts. But then again, perhaps not: my modern source for late 19th century musicians says that Praeger was one of the many who believed that women were intellectually inferior to men. I hope Lilian found someone more sympathetic to teach her. If she did study with Praeger despite his attitude, she may not have been his only woman pupil: Ethel Smyth might also have studied with him.

You couldn't just pay a yearly subscription and get to be a member of the NSPM. The Society had been founded in 1885 with the specific aim of raising standards of musicianship amongst players in Britain and getting in was meant to be a challenge: you had to be recommended by a proposer and a seconder who were already members; then your musical competence was assessed; your social status was scrutinised (this was still Victorian England after all); and if you survived all that investigation, your name was put forward to an election process. It's no wonder Lilian Blyth was so proud of being a member that she insisted the census official make a note of it.

Getting in to the Order of the Golden Dawn was peanuts in comparison!

That I haven't been able to find out much about Lilian Blyth's career in music is one of my greatest disappointments in all my work on the members of the Golden Dawn. Her prelude for organ is the only information I've found. I haven't come across a single reference to her playing in concerts either as a soloist or with other musicians; though it's possible that most of her engagements - if she had them (see below) - were at private functions in people's houses where there was a portable organ or harmonium. I've had to fall back on more general histories of women musicians in the late 19th century to get a feel of how her life in music might have gone.

Of course, plenty of vicars' daughters were proficient enough on the organ or harmonium to play in church services; as volunteers. But in 1891 Lilian was claiming a proficiency and a seriousness about her music that were on an altogether different level. My best general source says she would have found the going tough, forging a professional career. There was an assumption that instruments like the violin were too technically demanding for women; and that the way you have to move your mouth to play a wind instrument was unladylike. By the 1890s women were proving these prejudices outdated. However, there were also too many professionals (male and female) chasing too few engagements; and if Lilian had chosen the organ as her main instrument, she might have found it difficult to get paid work even in the women's orchestras that were being founded, which focused on music for strings.

Put simply: unless you were brilliant, very very determined, and knew the right people, you would struggle as a female musician. The lack of information I've found on Lilian's career suggests she struggled. That doesn't mean she was only an adequate musician - obviously not, as she was a member of the NSPM; but you had to be SO good, so outstanding, as a woman, to get any work at all.

If you were not able to make ends meet through being paid as a performer, there was one other way to make music your profession. Lilian didn't take it, but her sister Edith did. Edith told the 1901 census official that she was a musician but she also said she gave singing lessons. When the family broke up after Frederic Blyth's death, she got a job teaching music at the Girls' Grammar School run by Charlotte M Hopkirk at Ashby-de-la-Zouch.

If you were determined to be a professional musician in the 1890s it would help you to live in London, at least during the 'season' (roughly April to July), and that was no less true for a woman than for a man. R A Gilbert's evidence about where Lilian joined the Golden Dawn suggests that she wasn't living in London before 1893. Although times were changing, the proper place for an unmarried woman was still thought to be 'living with her parents'. But then, I can't explain how she came to be initiated in Bradford - if R A Gilbert's correct about that (I'm sure he is). Perhaps she played in concerts or a church there sometimes and got to know people. I don't know who she knew there - that bit of her life is a mystery. By the end of the 1890s, though, Lilian does seem to have been living in London at least some of the year and - I hope - doing her best to be a professional organist. In 1894 she had reached the age of 30, regarded as a watershed after which the chances of a woman's marrying were assumed (erroneously, if members of the GD are typical) to be in steep decline. In some families, when an unmarried woman reached 30, control over what she did was relaxed. Frederic and Eliza Blyth seem to have let Lilian go to London on her own, at least sometimes. It was not as though she had no friends there, after all - she knew the Russell family, the Earl of Dysart and his wife, and - probably - the Praegers.

Lilian and Frances, Countess Russell kept in touch after the Blyths had moved away from west London - a letter from the Countess to Lilian written in 1883 still exists. And Lilian also knew Countess Russell's grandson Bertrand, though probably not very well; Bertrand was much younger than her, and he and his siblings had only come to live with their grandmother the Countess after their father's death in 1876. Lilian's acquaintance with the Earl and Countess of Dysart was probably more formal, but the Earl took the concept of noblesse oblige seriously and I'm sure he would have helped Lilian out if she needed it while living in London, as the daughter of a man who was one of his dependants. As for Lilian knowing the Praegers, that's a bit speculative for the years before the 1890s. It depends on whether the Praegers attended the parish church in Hammersmith. The Praegers were living in Hammersmith by 1871, and from 1871 to 1878, Lilian's uncle, Rev Edward Hamilton Blyth, was vicar of Hammersmith. However, even if the Blyths and the Praegers hadn't met then, I do think Lilian will have met the Praegers in the early 1890s if not sooner, especially if she admired Wagner.

THE PRAEGERS

Wilfred Praeger was a son and a grandson of composers. His grandfather was Heinrich Aloys Praeger (1783-1854), a Dutch composer and conductor. His father was Ferdinand Praeger, pianist, composer, teacher and London correspondent of Neue Zeitschrift für Musik, the journal founded by Robert Schumann. Ferdinand Praeger was born in 1815 in Leipzig but came to England in 1834 and lived in London - with trips abroad - for the rest of his life. My best source of information on Ferdinand Praeger that says his mother was English, and although I can't find out anything more about her, it's likely Ferdinand Praeger could speak some English before he arrived here. In 1849 he married Léonie Eugénie Alexandrine Bazile, another woman I've failed to discover anything much about. Although Léonie had been born in Paris, she and Ferdinand married in London. They had the typical Victorian large family, although half the children that were born to them died young. Wilfred George Ferdinand Praeger was the youngest son, born in 1869. Surviving with him to adulthood were the eldest child (born 1850) Henry John (Heinrich Johann) Ferdinand and two sisters; Léonie (born 1866); and the youngest child, Brunhilde (born 1871).

Ferdinand Praeger's obituary in the Times says that he wrote 36 sonatas, 25 quartets, some orchestral works, a sacred cantata called Magdalene, a large number of songs and many short pieces for the piano. During his lifetime these were better known, because played more often, in Europe than in Britain. In Britain his main claim to fame was his relationship with one of the greats of 19th-century music and the name Ferdinand gave his youngest child will have given you a clue as to which one it was. However, it turns out to be a moot point exactly how well Ferdinand Praeger knew Richard Wagner.

Although Ferdinand Praeger was based in London he travelled abroad a great deal and met Wagner in Dresden, through a mutual friend, in about 1843. In the years that followed they corresponded, and met occasionally. Whenever Wagner was paying a visit to London he was always grateful for the help Ferdinand Praeger gave him, describing him later as, "uncommonly good-natured". In 1855, when he was in England for several miserable months as the much-criticised conductor of the Philharmonic and Sacred Harmonic Societies' concerts, Wagner stood as godfather to Ferdinand's son Richard Wagner Charles Henry Praeger. (The child was still alive in 1861 but disappears from view afterwards and is generally assumed to have died young.) It's possible that in 1876, Wagner sent Praeger a copy of the first edition of the score of Der Ring des Nibelungen; certainly, a first edition of it was later owned by Lilian's daughter-in-law Sheila, presumably inherited from Lilian and Wilfred. But it's also possible that Praeger had had to buy a copy; perhaps while at Bayreuth to see the first production of all four operas that year. Because...

As early as 1859, a concerned friend had warned Wagner that Praeger was developing a tendency to claim more friendship with him than actually existed. Praeger was also not doing as much as a friend might have, to get Wagner's music played more often in England. It wasn't Praeger's idea to found the Wagner Society, for example, that was the work of the German-American composer Edward Dannreuther, in 1872. Once the Bayreuth festival was up and running (first year, 1876) the Society organised trips to see his operas there; but it was set up to get extracts from Wagner's big operas played in England. A high spot in the Wagner Society's efforts was a festival of Wagner's music, held in London in 1877. It was Dannreuther that organised it and Dannreuther that Wagner stayed with on his visit to it; not the Praegers.

By 1890, though, it was generally accepted in musical circles in London that Ferdinand Praeger was someone who had known Wagner well; and by this time, being understood to have known Wagner well counted for something. A big milestone in the process of establishing Wagner as The Great Composer had been passed in May 1882 when the complete Ring cycle received its first performances in London. Even the Times, though rather reserved about the increasing influence in Britain of German culture, described Wagner as the composer who "at present above all others occupies the attention of the musical world"; and looked forward to the London performances as an event whose importance "can scarcely be over-rated".

I think Praeger encouraged people to bracket his name with Wagner's, because as Wagner-fever began to grip English musical circles, the relationship got him noticed. In April 1888, for example, the Royal Musical Association was due to hear a talk by J S Shedlock on the correspondence between Wagner and Liszt, and Praeger was asked to chair the meeting: if you couldn't get Wagner (and you couldn't - he'd died in 1883) Praeger was the next best thing. Praeger was finding, too, that the great and good, who otherwise would not have known his name, were seeking him out: people like the 9th Earl of Dysart wanted to know him.

Praeger seems to have seized the opportunities offered by a very rich man, a great admirer of Wagner, making his acquaintance: by 1890 he had persuaded the Earl to pay him to compose music. In an exhibition of some works by Ferdinand Praeger at the University of Buffalo music library in 2012, one of the exhibits was a contract dated March 1890 in which the 9th Earl promised to pay Praeger £2400, in instalments of £200 per quarter, for new works composed by Praeger. Provided he produced music, Praeger would earn £800 a year (an enormous sum in the money of the day, though one the Earl could well afford) for the next three years. On the day the contract was signed, Praeger delivered to the Earl the first two compositions, his fourth and fourteenth string quartets. I don't quite understand why - if the Earl was such a Wagner fan - he should commission works from someone else. Perhaps the idea was that the works would show the influence of Wagner - Praeger once more being the next best thing.

It may have been in his capacity as president of the Wagner Society that the Earl commissioned another work from Ferdinand Praeger: he asked Praeger to write a book on his friendship with the great man.

Which was a bit of a problem...

Ferdinand Praeger's Wagner as I Knew Him was published on 17 February 1892. A one-paragraph review in the Times a few days later gave no hint of what was to come, but within a very short time there was gossip about the content of the book. Praeger had included a set of letters written to him by Wagner; and if he had wanted to keep his status as Wagner's great friend he had made a very great mistake, because he published them in the original German and with his own translation into English. Anyone with sufficient knowledge of German - and there were plenty of those amongst Wagner lovers - could compare the two versions. The Germanophile Houston Stewart Chamberlain gained access to 34 of the original letters which were by then owned by the Earl of Dysart (yet another thing he had paid Praeger for, I suppose) and published his own translation of them in 1894. Stewart Chamberlain's work showed all-too-clearly that Praeger's translations were not accurate, and in particular had greatly exaggerated not only the closeness of the two men but also Praeger's influence over Wagner (which seems in reality to have been non-existent). Stewart Chamberlain had not found all the letters in Wagner as I Knew Him amongst those now owned by the Earl of Dysart. He speculated that the missing ones had been invented by Praeger.

Ferdinand Praeger was not around to defend himself. He had died on 2 September 1891. His sons Henry John and Wilfred, and the rest of the family, had pressed on with the publication of the book perhaps in ignorance - maybe they too believed Ferdinand's version of his friendship with Wagner and wanted to have it honoured; perhaps for the money it would bring in, especially to help Léonie Praeger in her widowhood; and of course to fulfil the contract. They took no active part in the uproar; I suppose there was nothing much they could say. After Stewart Chamberlain's translations were published, Wagner as I Knew Him's publisher - not the Praeger family - withdrew the book from sale and issued a public apology. However, that wasn't the end of it. The feathers began to fly in the Wagner Society: Wagner as I Knew Him was attacked by prominent members like William Ashton Ellis, while other members took great offence, on Praeger's behalf, at the accusations Stewart Chamberlain was making. When the different factions took to airing their views in the newspapers, the Earl of Dysart - unwitting instigator of the disaster - decided that he had to resign as the Society's president.

I think it was very generous of the Earl not to visit the sins of the father upon the sons: instead of thinking that the Praeger family might have known better than to let Ferdinand's book be published, and refusing to have any more to do with them, he offered Wilfred Praeger a job.

I know very little about Wilfred Praeger's early life, except one piece of what you could call negative information: he and his siblings grew up in a household full of music, but none of them became musicians or composers. They probably didn't inherit any musical talent from their father; if they did, they didn't feel any burning need to develop it, except as well-taught amateurs. Wilfred and Ferdinand did have an interest in poetry that Wilfred's siblings didn't share, though neither of them ever published any poetry and they probably never wrote any. In 1890, it was to Wilfred that Ferdinand Praeger handed on his copy of Joseph and his Brethren: A Dramatic Poem by Charles Wells. Ferdinand's copy had been given him by George Ernest John Powell, the poet and friend of Algernon Swinburne. Powell had contributed to the Wagner-fuelled English interest in ancient Germanic culture by translating some of the Icelandic sagas. I would guess that Powell was a friend of both Ferdinand and Wilfred.

Wilfred's youthful ambitions were to have a career in art: he told the 1891 census official that he was an artist and art critic. However, I couldn't find any evidence that he was able to work as a professional artist, and I could only find three short pieces of writing on art published by him. They appeared in the magazine Atalanta, in 1891 and 1892, and were all profiles of well-known artists: Frederick Leighton; William Blake Richmond; and Louise Jopling. They don't seem to have led to more regular art-critical work and in the end Wilfred followed his siblings, who seem to have sought out safe occupations, as if knowing where next year's income was going to come from was important to them: Henry John went into the offices of a City business and was an important member of London's voluntary militia; sister Léonie married a civil servant; and even while he was hoping to be an artist Wilfred, in 1890, was not working at his painting, but was probably employed in the office of one of the local committees of the Charity Organisation Society (I've had trouble following up my one reference to this so I'm not clear whether he was being paid).

Moving in artistic circles in west London, Wilfred Praeger got to know W B Yeats; or perhaps it was their two families that knew each other. In 1891-92 Wilfred was a regular guest at the Butler family's house in Bedford Park, where they were all 'at home' on Monday evenings, and it must have been during those evenings that he found out about the existence of the GD and probably met other members, like Annie Horniman, Florence Farr and the Pagets - Henry and Henrietta - who were all friends of W B. W B Yeats recommended Wilfred to the GD hierarchy as a suitable member, and meant to facilitate Wilfred's application by getting the necessary forms sent to him; but then he forgot and Wilfred seems to have had to prompt him about it. In the end, Yeats just gave Wilfred Annie Horniman's telephone number, and Wilfred organised the sending of the pledge form himself.

LILIAN AND WILFRED

How did Wilfred and Lilian meet?

Although I've suggested that the Blyths and the Praegers may have known each other since the 1870s, Wilfred and Lilian may not have met as adults until they were both in the Order of the Golden Dawn. They could, however, have met through Ferdinand Praeger and Wagner and they had at least two chances to do this. The first chance, I've mentioned already: Lilian taking lessons with Ferdinand Praeger in musical composition. The second is if Lilian was thrilled by the operas of Wagner. I hope I've illustrated that if you liked Wagner in the 1880s in London, you would have been bound to come across Ferdinand Praeger sooner or later: the Great Composer's friend. I take it that Wilfred Praeger, too, would have been curious at least, to know more about Wagner and his music - I think he may have been too young ever to have met him.

Hoped-for careers in the arts, that never really materialised, were something that Wilfred and Lilian had in common; although perhaps they never talked of it in quite that way. (It was something they also shared with Annie Horniman, who had wanted to be an artist but soon realised she didn't have the talent.) Whenever it finally was that Wilfred and Lilian met, their backgrounds and interests were enough to form the basis of a marriage. They needed enough money to get married on, of course; and this once again is where the 9th Earl of Dysart comes in.

I haven't been able to find, from the documents I've been able to consult, exactly when Wilfred Praeger went to work for the 9th Earl of Dysart. All I can say for certain is that Wilfred was a member of the Earl's staff by the day of the 1901 census. He was working as assistant to the Earl's private secretary, and I'm going to speculate that he'd been on the Earl's payroll for a few years by 1901 - though I may be quite wrong about this. I also don't know what salary the Earl was willing to pay Wilfred, but the job did come with perks as well as money, in the shape of a house on the Buckminster Park estate for when the Earl was in residence there; and he possibly contributed to the rent of the flat in Putney that Lilian and Wilfred lived in when the Earl was at Ham House. Definitely the sort of job you could get married on.

Lilian and Wilfred were married at All Saints Marylebone on 19 July 1898, with Lilian's father, Frederic Cavan Blyth taking the service; and Wilfred's mother Léonie and Lilian's sister Edith amongst the witnesses. On the day of the 1901 census, the Praegers were one of three households living at 21 Chelverton Road Putney; from the way the census entry was laid out, I'd say they were occupying the top floor.

Lilian was 34 when she married. By the mid-1900s she and Wilfred might have resigned themselves to being childless; but in the autumn of 1906, while they were living at Buckminster Park, Lilian (now 42) gave birth to John Frederic Blyth Ferdinand Praeger. John Praeger - later Blyth-Praeger - turned out to be not only Lilian and Wilfred's only child, but probably the only child born to any of the children of Frederic and Eliza Blyth. Lilian's sisters Edith and Mary Agatha never married; Lilian's brother William married Constance Norah McDermott in 1905 but by 1911 they hadn't had any children. William had succeeded his father as vicar of Silk Willoughby: another instance of the 9th Earl of Dysart's continuing support of the Blyth and Praeger families.

Frederic Cavan Blyth had died very suddenly in August 1904. In the years after, the health of Eliza Blyth began to deteriorate. It's likely that Mary Agatha cared for her at first but by 1911 she needed professional and perhaps constant attention, and her children had installed her in a house in Westcliff-on-Sea, with a full-time nurse-companion, who filled in the census form as head of the household, and described Eliza as her "patient". Mary Agatha had gone to live with William and Norah at Silk Willoughby. On census day 1911, Lilian and Wilfred were once again in the flat at 21 Chelverton Road. I think Wilfred had been promoted (or perhaps he was exaggerating a little - his family did have a track record of that, after all): he described himself as "private secretary to peer": no mention this time of being an assistant. Their son John was now five and at school, and Lilian was working on the Blyth family history that was published in 1912. Between 1911 and 1914 Eliza Blyth was moved either to live with Lilian and Wilfred or near them; her death was registered in Wandsworth in 1914.

I've made it fairly clear, I hope, that Lilian was the daughter of a Church of England vicar. I also assume Ferdinand Praeger to have been brought up as a Protestant and to have remained one. However, Lilian and Wilfred sent their son to the co-ed Roman Catholic school Stonyhurst College, in Lancashire. The choice of Stonyhurst College is one of two pieces of evidence I have that Lilian at least had become a Roman Catholic convert; several Golden Dawn members did so, though not (I think) while they were still active in the GD. The second piece of evidence for Lilian's conversion is the church where her funeral took place.

Although the wikipedia page on Ham House describes the 9th Earl of Dysart as “eccentric and difficult”, Wilfred Praeger was still working as his private secretary in the 1930s. The first world war had not interrupted this because by 1916 Wilfred was too old to be called up; but he did join the London volunteer militia. By the 1930s, as a senior and long-serving member of the Earl’s staff, Wilfred and Lilian had a status with the Tollemaches which was more than just employee and employee’s wife - occasionally they got invited to family marriages. The Earl had a flair for investment, he’d made a great deal of money that way. In 1934 Wilfred had acted for him in the negotiations when he had bought some bearer certificates from Howie Gold Mines (which in due course caused his heirs a great deal of trouble). In November of that year, Wilfred represented him at Howie Gold Mines’ AGM. Perhaps taking the Earl’s advice, Wilfred also invested some money on his own account. He bought shares in the British Empire Academy Club Limited, of 19 Dover Street, and as one of its directors, suffered all the embarrassment of being charged with selling alcohol without a licence and after hours, when the Club’s ballroom in New Burlington Galleries was raided twice by the police. All the directors, and the Club’s secretary, had to appear before the magistrates at Marlborough Street Police Court in May 1931; I wish I knew what happened afterwards but I can’t find any coverage of a trial. Perhaps they all just admitted they were guilty - though they probably hadn’t been in the ballroom on the nights in question - paid the fines and hoped that was the end of it.

The 9th Earl of Dysart died on 22 November 1935. He was 76. With heavy death duties to pay and the estates being broken up, there was no chance that the the large number of staff employed by the Earl could all continue in their jobs. Within a few weeks, the Earl’s valet was advertising for work; and I imagine Wilfred - who was nearly 70 himself - was encouraged to retire.

Lilian Blyth died on 16 April 1942. I don’t know where she is buried but her funeral service was held at the convent of the Society of the Sacred Heart in Roehampton. The convent was an English branch of a Roman Catholic women’s teaching order founded in France by Madeleine Sophie Barat (1779-1865); and is my second piece of evidence for Lilian having become a Roman Catholic convert. I’ve found some evidence that the Blyths were high church Anglicans, so Lilian would have grown up familiar with the emphasis on ritual and perhaps even with the idea of the use of ritual as an aid to mystical experience. That upbringing would have served her well in the Golden Dawn; and the move to Catholicism perhaps wouldn’t have been as far for her as for other people. But actually taking that final step and becoming a Catholic was still a controversial move, in the early part of the 20th century.

Whether Wilfred also converted to Roman Catholicism I haven’t been able to discover. He lived for many years after Lilian’s death; and died in a mental hospital. Holloway Sanatorium at Virginia Water was founded by Thomas Holloway, who also sponsored and funded Royal Holloway College. From when it opened in the 1880s, until 1948 when it was incorporated into the new NHS, it was a mental hospital for the middle-classes, with a suitably splendid building, high-quality facilities and - I would suppose - fees to match. Wilfred may already have been an inmate there at the time of Lilian’s death: their daughter-in-law was Lilian’s executor. Wilfred died at Holloway Sanatorium on 10 October 1955.

Lilian and Wilfred’s son John became a civil servant. He inherited his parents’ interest in alternative ways of understanding how the world works - he became a well-known dowser and served as vice-president of the British Society of Dowsers.

BASIC SOURCES I USED for all Golden Dawn members.

Membership of the Golden Dawn: The Golden Dawn Companion by R A Gilbert. Northampton: The Aquarian Press 1986. Between pages 125 and 175, Gilbert lists the names, initiation dates and addresses of all those people who became members of the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn or its many daughter Orders between 1888 and 1914. The list is based on the Golden Dawn's administrative records and its Members' Roll - the large piece of parchment on which all new members signed their name at their initiation. All this information had been inherited by Gilbert but it's now in the Freemasons' Library at the United Grand Lodge of England building on Great Queen Street Covent Garden. Please note, though, that the records of the Amen-Ra Temple in Edinburgh were destroyed in 1900/01. As far as I know, the records of the Horus Temple at Bradford have not survived either.

Family history: freebmd; ancestry.co.uk (census and probate); findmypast.co.uk; familysearch; Burke's Peerage and Baronetage; Burke's Landed Gentry; Armorial Families; thepeerage.com; and a wide variety of family trees on the web.

Famous-people sources: mostly about men, of course, but very useful even for the female members of GD. Oxford Dictionary of National Biography. Who Was Who. Times Digital Archive.

Catalogues: British Library; Freemasons' Library.

Wikipedia; Google; Google Books - my three best resources. I also used other web pages, but with some caution, as - from the historian's point of view - they vary in quality a great deal.

SOURCES FOR LILIAN BLYTH, WILFRED PRAEGER and 9TH EARL OF DYSART

THE BLYTH FAMILY

Lilian's contribution to the family genealogies is:

Notes on the Yorkshire Branch of the Family of Blyth of Norton Lees published by The Pan Press 1912, by L G M Praeger. On pp47 and 50 Lilian mentions the Descent of the Family of Blyth from the Royal Houses of Guelph and Este, also published by the Pan Press. P50: the descent is through 40 generations beginning with Altorf D of Bavaria fl AD820 and ending with John Frederic Blyth Ferdinand Praeger, born 1906, son of Wilfred and Lilian. The gist of Lilian's book is that the Yorkshire branch of the Blythe/Blyth family has been excluded from earlier genealogies despite plenty of evidence establishing the fact that they are family members. The exclusion has resulted from an assumption made by previous family histories that William Blythe, and Elizabeth Stapleton, who married in the first half of the 16th century, did not have any male descendants. Lilian is actually a descendant of these two people and she proves it.

Lilian mentions the sources she used to put the Yorkshire Blyths and Blythes back into the family: details from tombs of Blyth/Blythe ancestors in the Sheffield, York and Lincolnshire areas; Harleian Mss 4630 and 1468 in the British Library; Wills written in the 17th and 18th centuries; and information compiled by a distant cousin of hers, John Blythe-Robinson, from parish records in the Beverley and York area. It sounds like a very good piece of genealogy. At the end of the work is a family tree, details of the careers and marriages of her uncles and father, and a list of Yorkshire Blyths alive in 1912.

Lilian's is a great-grand-daughter of Joseph Blythe later Blyth is through his son the Rev George Blanshard Blyth. George Blanshard Blyth's sons are:

- Rev George Francis Popham Blyth, 1st bishop of Rangoon and then 4th Church of England bishop of Jerusalem, who will have known Golden Dawn member Frank Tate Ellis
- Rev Edward Hamilton Blyth, the one with the possible Praeger connection as he was vicar of Hammersmith from 1871 to 1878
- Joseph Harry Franklyn Blyth who joined the Connaught Rangers and fought in the Crimean War

[Frederic Cavan Blyth fits here]

- Cheslyn Abney Blyth, who also went into the army.

Lilian's father:

Frederic Cavan Blyth, 5th child, 4th son. Like all the boys, he went to St Paul's School; he was School Captain. Oriel College Oxford. Ordained priest 1860. His work as a clergyman, as listed by Lilian:

curate            Kirkby-la-Thorpe Lincs
                      Wimbledon
                      Frittenden Kent
                      Kew-with-Petersham 1867-77

vicar             Quatford Salop 1877-81
                      Buckminster Leics 1881-96

rector            Silk Willoughby Lincs from 1896 to his death on 14 August 1904 from what sounds to me like a stroke or brain haemorrhage.

MORE INFORMATION ON FREDERIC CAVAN BLYTH, Lilian's father:

Crockford's Clerical Directory issues of 1880 p 101 and 1895 p134 confirm Lilian's details.

At www.familysearch.org some information on the parish of Kirkby Laythorpe with Asgarby.

This website quotes A Guide to the Local Administrative Units of England volume 2 by Frederic A Youngs, published by the Royal Historical Society 1991: the parish was created in 1737 by an amalgamation of the 2 original parishes, its parish church is St Denis. The website also quotes A Topographical Dictionary of England by Samuel A Lewis published 1848: the amalgamated parish had a rector (rather than a vicar). The parish's patron was the Marquess of Bristol; and its income at 1848 was £287 pa.

The parish of Kew-with-Petersham: London Gazette 27 March 1866 published the full text of a plea submitted to Queen Victoria by the Ecclesiastical Commissioners dated 24 March 1866 to do a swap deal in patronage. Currently the Provost and scholars of King's College Cambridge owned the advowson of the vicarage of Kew-w-Petersham; and the Crown was currently patron of the rectory of Great Munden Herts. Subject to Queen Victoria's approval, the swap would see King's College Cambridge taking over the patronage of Gt Munden; and the Crown taking over Kew-with-Petersham. John, Earl Russell is mentioned in the plea as bringing the request of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners to the Crown's attention. The attached schedule showed Kew-with-Petersham didn't have a vicarage building; the parish currently had a population of 1736; and the yearly income of the vicar was £485. The plea, and thus the swap, was agreed by the Queen and its details were issued on 24 March 1866 by Buckingham Palace. Frederic Cavan Blyth was therefore appointed to the vicarage of Kew-with-Petersham by the Provost of King's College Cambridge; which was odd, seeing he was an Oxford man.

The British Library catalogue had a few publications by Frederic Cavan Blyth:

Thoughts on the Seven Last Words of Christ Crucified

Thoughts on the Lord's Prayer published 1882

Invitation to Confirmation; and several other works addressed to people preparing for their confirmation.

LILIAN AND THE RUSSELLS

At www.archive.org you can read the full text of a copy of Lady John Russell: A Memoir now in Cornell University Library; published in 1910 or shortly after, editor Desmond McCarthy. On a website at www.munseys.com I found a letter dated 16 November 1883 from Countess Russell (now a widow) to Miss Lilian Blyth, written from Dunrozel Haslemere; number 104 in a collection of her letters. The text begins: "Your letter is just like you, and that means all that is dear and good and loving"; it goes on to say that Lady Russell feels even this late in her life it's better to look forward than back.

Via the web to snippet of The Collected Papers of Bertrand Russell edited by Kenneth Blackwell Volume 1 published 1983 p383 Annotations to Paper 9, footnote 44:5 is a brief note on Lilian Blyth, called "Lilly". The footnote describes her as a "close friend of the Russell family". However, the footnote is the only mention of anyone called Blyth in this Volume and Lilian's only other appearance in any of the Collected Papers is in Volume 14, edited K Blackwell published 1988. I think I'm safe in saying that Lilian's closest friend amongst the Russells was Countess Russell. See wikipedia for Bertrand Russell's childhood.

LILIAN'S ONE MUSICAL COMPOSITION

Bibliography of Organ Music by W B Henshaw. The 2nd edition, published 2002 by Bardon Enterprises of Portsmouth. The main text is composers for organ, with lists of their organ works. On p120 ONE piece of music by "L G M" Blyth. It's a prelude for organ, published in 1890 by Schott. On p1316 in a list of the main music publishers: Schott and Co of Mainz Germany www.schott-music.com.

NATIONAL SOCIETY OF PROFESSIONAL MUSICIANS

A precis of the coverage by Times of National Society of Professional Musicians. The Times' earliest coverage of the Society was 1886, the latest 1892; so I'm not sure whether it continued after this date. The Times covered the Society's annual conference, and reported its keynote speech at some length. The general gist of these was the poor quality of musical education in Britain, leading to a lack of sufficiently trained musicians for orchestras etc. Every person mentioned in the Times' coverage was male; in most years the Times only noted the names of the important speakers. These items seemed more relevant to Lilian Blyth:

Times 9 January 1886 p10 report on the Society's first ever annual conference, at the Charing Cross Hotel. An effort had been made to encourage musicians based in London to attend it; the Society was actively canvassing for new members. Mr Chadfield was its secretary; his speech was about the need for potential concert audiences to be sure that the musicians they might hear had been properly trained. This report described the organisation of the Society in some detail, including the vetting process. The Society was divided into two sets of sections: one with reference to the instruments the members might play; and one based on regions within Britain. In each instrumental section, there would be a secretary and a ruling Council with 15 elected members.

My modern source: Musical Women in England 1870-1914: Encroaching on all Man's Privileges, by Paula Gillett. Macmillan 2000. Lilian Blyth is not in the index.

Books; Ltd Editions... 22pp catalogue issued by Phillips, Son and Neale of New Bond Street 1973 for an auction due Tuesday 26 June 1973. The items for sale included a "presentation" copy first edition of Wagner's Der Ring; plus maps and other Mss previously owned by Mrs Blyth-Praeger.

FERDINAND PRAEGER

Times 3 September 1891 p7: obituary.

The University of Buffalo's Music Library has the largest set of pieces composed by Ferdinand Praeger. The University's websites were a good source for Praeger. The University's catalogue Mus.Arc.46 lists 480 scores, the majority of which are works for piano.

Musical Women in England 1870-1914 by Paula Gillett, see above for its publication details. Just noting that on p25 Gillett describes Ferdinand Praeger as agreeing with the widely-held belief that women were intellectually inferior to men.

At www.jstor.org a copy of the Proceedings of the Royal Musical Association's 14th session 1887-88. The Association's meeting of 2 April 1888 was chaired by Ferdinand Praeger. J S Shedlock read a paper on the correspondence between Wagner and Liszt.

Richard Wagner and the English by Anne Dzamba Sessa 1979 p43 says that the Royal Musical Association was founded in 1874; for the study of music rather than the performing of it. See the web - it still exists.

WAGNER AND PRAEGER

At www.wagnersociety.org you can see that the Wagner Society is still very much alive. The London branch is just one of many all over the world.

The Pursuit of High Culture: John Ella and Chamber Music in Victorian London by Christina Bashford 2007. On p304: London Wagner Society founded 1872 by Edward Dannreuther. Its 1st president was Lord Lindsay. Beginning in 1873 it organised performances of “sections” of Wagner’s operas and helped fuel (quoting Bashford) “the first upsurge in Wagnerism in Britain” which she dates to the 1880s and 1890s. The Society publishes a journal, originally called Meister but having various other titles since.

Historical Dictionary of English Music c1400-1958 editors Steven E Plank and Charles E McGuire. 2011. NB that this book wasn’t in the BL catalogue so I haven’t been able to get full publication details. However, you can read the entire text on the web. Entry p104 for Edward Dannreuther. 1844-1905. With William Ashton Ellis, one of the great promoters of Wagner’s works, in late 19th century Britain. He translated Wagner’s prose works and wrote on Wagner for Grove’s Dictionary of Music and Musicians. Born Germany, childhood in US before studying at Leipzig Conservatory 1860-63. Arrived London 1863. Professor of piano, Royal College of Music. In 1877 organised a London-based Wagner festival; Wagner came to it and stayed w Dannreuther.

The Wagner Society journal Meister:

Lucifer: A Theosophical Magazine published London: George Redway of York Street Covent Garden. Volume I September 1887-February 1888. Volume 1 number 6 issued 15 February 1888 p500 mentioned the publication of a new journal devoted to Wagner, called The Meister and published by George Redway for the Richard Wagner Society. It was edited by William Ashton Ellis, author of Theosophy In The Works of Richard Wagner. On p501 there’s a reference to one member of the committee of the Richard Wagner Society being also a member of TS’s London Lodge; unfortunately it doesn’t say who.

A modern assessment of Wagner and Praeger:

Wagner: A Biography by Curt von Westernhagen 1981 in the Chapter Der Ring des Nibelungen on p208 von Westernhagen says that Wagner mentioned Ferdinand Praeger in his Mein Leben as having helped Wagner when Wagner was visiting London. Von Westernhagen quotes Wagner’s description of Praeger: “uncommonly good-natured...too touchy about his educational qualifications”. According to this biography, Wagner visited Ferdinand Praeger occasionally, but in Europe not in London. I used Von Westernhagen as my main source for the controversy over Wagner as I Knew Him; he covers it on pp 208-09.

THE BOOK WAGNER AS I KNEW HIM a reprint of the original 1892 edition, published 2003 by the University Press of the Pacific in Honolulu Hawaii is on the web via googlebooks.

Times Wed 17 February 1892 p11 Publications To-Day includes Wagner as I knew him.

In Times Thursday 25 February 1892 p4 Books of the Week, Wagner as I knew him gets a paragraph.

See wikipedia on Houston Stewart Chamberlain.

Richard Wagner and the English by Anne Dzamba Sessa 1979 also covers the uproar, pp42-44.

Despite being discredited Wagner as I Knew Him was often used as a source in early biographies of Wagner, eg Wagner and His Works: the Story of his Life with Critical Comments by Henry T Finck.

WAGNER'S OPERAS IN LONDON

Times 2 Jan 1882 p4 reported the details of Carl Rosa's opera season at Her Majesty's Theatre, which had just been released.

Times Wed 26 April 1882 German opera season gave full details of the coming Ring cycles.

Annie Horniman: A Pioneer in the Theatre by Sheila Gooddie. London: Methuen 1990. On p23 Gooddie says that the Ring cycle of 1882 used the scenery from original 1876 performances at Bayreuth. Annie and her brother Emslie went and became (quoting Gooddie) "disciples of Wagner". Annie was Wagner's "devoted pilgrim" going to Bayreuth every year but one in the next 30. She also became a Germanophile, particularly liking Munich's cleanliness and its beer. Her interest in Wagner led to a friendship p24 with William Ashton Ellis, editor of Meister magazine and translator of Wagner's prose works and his journal. Annie helped Ellis with those translations.

FERDINAND PRAEGER'S OTHER INTERESTS

Via google to A Bookman's Catalogue Volume 2, its section on Swinburne. One of the books listed there is a copy of Charles Wells' Joseph and his Brethren: A Dramatic Poem, published by Chatto and Windus 1876; to which Swinburne had written the introduction. The book is inscribed "Dr Ferdinand Praeger with George E J Powell's friendly regards"; and it's also signed Wilfred G F Praeger 5 January 1890.

At www.archiveswales.org.uk: the George Powell archive. George Ernest John Powell 1842-1882. Son of a landowner; estate is Nanteos nr Aberystwyth. Eton. Brasenose College. Traveller. Collector. 3 volumes poetry. Translated some Icelandic sagas. Knew Swinburne and Longfellow. Inherited the Nanteos estate 1878. Married 1881 Dinah T Harries of Goodwick Pembrokeshire. No child.

FERDINAND PRAEGER MARRIAGE AND CHILDREN

Marriage of Ferdinand Wilhelm Christian Praeger to Léonie Eugenie Alexandrina Bazile registered Marylebone January-March quarter 1849.

Birth Henry Johann (John) Ferdinand Praeger registered Marylebone October-December 1850.

Birth Adele Mary Franciska Praeger registered Marylebone April-June 1852; her death registered Marylebone Apr-June 1853

Birth Richard Wagner Charles Henry Praeger registered Marylebone July-September 1855. I found him living at home on the 1861 census but he wasn't on any census after that. Writers on Praeger and on Wagner assume that the boy died. I couldn't find a death registration on freebmd but that's actually not unusual with the deaths of young children.

Birth Edward Paul René Praeger registered Kensington January-March 1858; his death registered Kensington October-December 1858

Birth Ferdinand Ernest Frederick Praeger registered Kensington April-June 1861; his death registered Kensington Apr-June 1863.

I found no further death registrations in this Praeger family before end 1881.

Birth Léonie E C Praeger registered Kensington January-March 1866

Birth Wilfred George F Praeger registered Kensington January-March 1869

Birth Brunhilde Claire M Praeger registered Kensington January-March 1871

I found no further birth registrations in this Praeger family after 1871.

WILFRED PRAEGER'S SIBLINGS

Marriage Léonie Elise C Praeger to John Andrew Edwards registered Fulham July-September 1887

Times 24 June 1902 p1a: marriage notice for Wilfred's brother Lt-Col Henry, to Kate Lucy Houtchen.

Kate Lucy Houtchen Praeger must have died, though I couldn't find a death registration for her on freebmd. Because Marriage Henry John F Praeger registered Fulham January-March 1907; the bride was either Agnes Wallace or Lucy Anna Dawes; I haven't been able to find out which.

Wilfred's brother Henry John F Praeger is the Colonel Praeger Henry Norris knew:

Times 18 October 1909 p12 Col H J F Praeger is chair of the board of management of Kensington and Fulham General Hospital.

Seen via Ancestry: marriage of Brunhilde Claire Myria Praeger to Frederick James Harriman took place 1919 in Winnipeg Times Saturday 7 April 1951 p1a death notices: Léonie Edwards had died on 5 April 1951; widow of John A Edwards of the War Office. Mother of Dick [Edwards] and of Muriel Monier-Williams.

WILFRED PRAEGER

A possible first job for him: via google to a snippet from a Charities Digest issued by the Charities Organisation Society (now known as the Family Welfare Association) in 1890; on p271 Wilfred Praeger is described as Assistant Secretary, working for an elected Management Committee and with an Honorary Lady Superintendent. I've tried to follow up this snippet, to find out exactly where Wilfred was employed, but I can't track down a paper version of this book. It's most likely that he was working for one of the COS's local committees - the COS had one for each Poor Law Board.

ARTISTIC INTERESTS and the GD

Collected Letters of W B Yeats Volume IV covering 1905-1907 but also containing an Addenda section of newly-discovered letters from earlier, which would have been published in volumes I-III if they had been known then. Editors John Kelly and Ronald Schuchard. Published Oxford University Press 2005. On p935 in the Addenda section; letter to W Praeger, apologising for the delay in sending Annie Horniman's telephone number so that Praeger can ask her to send a GD Pledge Form; and inviting him to next Monday's 'at home'. From W B Yeats to W Praeger at 23 Brackenbury Road; no date but postmarked "AP 1 92". The biographical details attached to this letter are not good: they call Wilfred 'William' and suppose that he was related to an Irish family of Praegers, which as far as I could discover, he wasn't.

The Musical World 1866-91 by Richard Kitson and Liesbeth Hoedemaeker 2006 p2057 mentions a letter written by Wilfred Praeger to the magazine Musical World, in response to an article by Cave Thomas about beauty in art. I couldn't see a date on this for Wilfred's letter on this snippet and I couldn't find a copy of the book at the British Library.

The website www.philsp.com/homeville/FMI/1854.htm is The Fiction Magazines Index. There are three entries only from Wilfred Praeger, all in the magazine Atalanta:

March 1891: Sir Frederick Leighton PRA

May 1891: W B Richmond ARA

March 1892: Women in Contemporary Art Part I: Mrs Jopling.

See wikipedia for more on Atalanta magazine which ran from 1887 to 1898.

World War 1: London Gazette Supplement issued 3 July 1917 p6642 in the middle of a very long list of temporary promotions and appointments: Wilfred George Ferdinand Praeger is promoted as of 15 June 1917 to be a temporary 2nd Lieutenant in the 20th battalion, County of London Volunteer Regiment.

LILIAN AND WILFRED ARE MARRIED

Times 21 July 1898 p1a: the marriage of Lilian Blyth and Wilfred Praeger had taken place "on the 19th inst" [19 July 1898]. Rev Blyth had conducted the marriage service.

Via Ancestry's London marriages to the entry for Wilfred and Lilian. As you don't seem to be able to access these any more I give the details: the marriage of Wilfred George Frederick Praeger to Lilian Grace Mary Blyth took place on 19 July 1898 at All Saints Marylebone.

Wilfred: 29; bachelor; "Gentleman"; of All Saints Margaret St; father Ferdinand, professor of music.

Lilian: 34; spinster; rank/profession crossed through as it usually was with brides; I couldn't read Lilian's address which was a pity; father Frederic Cavan Blyth, clerk in holy orders.

Witnesses included: Léonie Praeger; Edith Douglas Popham Blyth; Frank ?Ainley; Frank Edward P[surname]

THE PRAEGERS IN THE 1930s

Times 15 April 1931 p17 a "Mr and Mrs Praeger" attended the marriage of Lieutenant-Commander D H Tollemache RN son of Mr H G Tollemache of Ham House Richmond, and his late wife. The bride was Alys K Bebbington daughter of Canon J H Bebbington of Slinfold Sussex. The Times printed only a short list of guests; no one else called Blyth or Praeger was mentioned.

BRITISH EMPIRE ACADEMY CLUB

Times 1 June 1931 p11 reported two police raids, on 3 December [1930] and again in January [1931] on the British Empire Academy Club, during which they caught the club infringing the licensing laws. An initial hearing in the case had taken place "on Saturday" at Marlborough Police Court. The accused was the British Empire Academy Club Ltd of 19 Dover St which had a place for dancing etc like a nightclub at the BEA Club in the New Burlington Galleries; it was there that the offences and the raids took place. The BEA Club was now being accused of selling alcohol without a licence and selling it after hours. In the dock were: W G F Praeger, one of BEA Ltd's directors, of Werter Road Putney; Charles Pears of Bedford Park, Thomas Henry Dey of New Bond Street, and the BEA Club's secretary Ursula Dimsdale. Other named people were accused of aiding and abetting them. The court heard that BEA Ltd had first been registered on 24 December 1927; and that its Club had been registered on 5 February 1930. They were both private limited companies; Lord Howard de Walden had originally been a director. The case was adjourned and I couldn't find any other reports on it in the Times.

LILIAN'S DEATH

Times 18 April 1942 p1a death notice for Lilian Grace Mary wife of Wilfred Praeger late of Buckminster and Putney; eldest daughter of the late Rev F C Blyth rector of Silk Willoughby. She had died on 16 April 1942 in London. Times 20 Apr 1942 p1b repeated the information given in the notice of the 18th, and added that the funeral would be at 12 noon "to-day (Mon)" at Sacred Heart Convent Roehampton.

Further information on Sacred Heart Convent from Roehampton University's website as the Convent's teacher training college is now part of the university. There is still a Society of the Sacred Heart at 83 Roehampton Lane.

For an account of a father-in-law who gained custody of his grandchild in 1915 on the grounds that the child's father was a Roman Catholic convert, see Bosie: A Biography of Lord Alfred Douglas by Douglas Murray. Published Hodder and Stoughton 2000.

WILFRED'S DEATH

Probate Registry: Wilfred George Frederick Praeger of Holloway Sanatorium Virginia Water died on 10 October 1955. See wikipedia for Holloway Sanatorium including an engraving of the hospital as originally built.

LILIAN AND WILFRED'S SON JOHN BLYTH-PRAEGER

Times 4 July 1932 p15 report on the Stonyhurst Association dinner held at Claridge's "on Saturday". Mr J Praeger was at the dinner; and he was in the list of people who were not guests, so I assume he's an old-boy of the school. See wikipedia for further information on Stonyhurst College, first founded in 1593.

Times 14 June 1933 p17 engagement announcements: John Frederic Blyth Praeger only son of Mr and Mrs W Praeger, to Sheila daughter of the late Mr and the late Mrs W Rice Healy. The marriage would take place in July.

Times 3 July 1934 p1a birth notices: John Blyth Praeger and Sheila née Healy had had a daughter, born 1 July 1934 at Wimbledon.

This is probably the daughter: Ampleforth Journal volumes 65-66 1960 p54 reported the wedding of Ann Blyth-Praeger to John Peter Harvest.

John Blyth-Praeger's interests:

1) Aylesford Mss now in the Lilly Library Indiana University: covering the period 1941-68, material (letters notes etc) collected by Father Brocard Sewell when he was editor of the Aylesford Review, a literary quarterly magazine sponsored by the British Carmelites and which ran 1955-68. John Blyth-Praeger has some material in the collection; so has Gerald Yorke. Not all of the writers are Roman Catholics.

2) the Radionic Journal 1954-2003, magazine of the Radionic Society, has articles and lectures by John Blyth-Praeger covering 1958, 1963, 1966, 1970, 1972 (2 pieces), 1974, 1978 but not later. In 1963 Blyth-Praeger was vice-president of the British Society of Dowzers. Website www.radionic.co.uk descs radionics as a method of “sending precisely defined healing energy” over distances; based on a belief that every living body has an energy field arnd it which is weakened by stress or pollution, making it vulnerable to illness. This is definitely Golden Dawn territory! At //homepage.ntlworld.com, information that the Radionic Association was founded in 1943 for professionals and interested lay-people.

At www.britishdowzers.org: the British Society of Dowzers was founded in 1933 and is still in existence.

THE 9TH EARL OF DYSART

Descent of the earldom to the Manners and Tollemache families: see www.cracroftspeerage.co.uk

Wikipedia on the earldom of Dysart: it's a Scottish peerage, created 1643 for William Murray. The 8th Earl is Lionel William John Tollemache 1794-1878. It's the 9th Earl who knows the Blyth and Praeger families: William John Manners Tollemache 1859-1935. The 9th Earl was President of the London Wagner Society from 1884 to 1895. As earl of Dysart he owned these houses: Ham House, Petersham Surrey; and Buckminster Park Grantham. At his death his sister's daughter, Wynefryde succeeded him as the 10th Countess; and the house and land at Ham went to relations called Tollemache.

9TH EARL OF DYSART AND THE PRAEGER FAMILY

Rediscovering Pieces of the Past: Ferdinand Praeger is the catalogue, now online, of an exhibition in the University of Buffalo Music Library during 2012, curated by Jessica Nay. On p2: the British Library has 93 of Ferdinand Praeger's works. On p8 there's a reproduction of an Impromptu by Ferdinand Praeger composed in June 1889 and dedicated to Ethel Smyth (1858-1944). On p12 is the reproduction of the contract between the Earl of Dysart and Ferdinand Praeger, dated 1 March 1890. A note on p12 says it was also the Earl who commissioned from Praeger the book that became Wagner as I knew him. On p14 there's a reproduction of Praeger's last composition, with a note to that effect written on it by his wife Léonie; it's the Volkslied of 7 June 1891.

OTHER INFORMATION ON 9TH EARL OF DYSART

Reports and papers of the Architectural and Archaeological Societies of the Counties of Lincoln and Northamptonshire volume 18 1885 pli has the Earl of Dysart in a list, probably of current members.

Transactions of the Leicestershire Architectural and Archaeological Society volume 6 1888 pxiii the Earl of Dysart in another list, again probably of current members.

Coates's Herd Book volume 41 issued 1895 by the Shorthorn Society of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland; p684 refers to an animal bred at Buckminster Park.

Notice of the death of the 9th Earl's mother, I couldn't see the month on the snippet: Annual Register volume 138 1896 p192 list of death notices includess one for Lady Huntingtower - Katharine Elizabeth Camilla, daughter of Sir Joseph Burke 11th Baronet of Glinsk; who'd died “on the 20th, at Buckminster Park, Grantham”.

Bristol and West and Southern Counties Society [1897] pviii and pix lists 2 separate horses bred by the 9th Earl of Dysart at Buckminster Park.

Shire Horse Stud Book volume 26 1905 issued by the Shire Horse Society; p891 the 9th Earl of Dysart has been a member since July 1885. He's a registered breeder with 2 horses in this year's book, both foaled in 1903.

Armstrong Siddeley Motors: The Cars, the Company and the People by Bill Smith 2006; has a list of all cars sold, with details of their purchasers. On p199 in section The Roaring Twenties car number 6070, a Grasmere 34 Landaulette was sold on 17 February 1928 to William Tollemache 9th Earl of Dysart. A note says that the 9th Earl owned 27000 acres, in Surrey and around Grantham.

There don't seem to be similar books listing who bought which Rolls Royce! Still a company secret I guess.

THE 9TH EARL'S DEATH

Times Saturday 23 November 1935 p16 obituary of the 9th Earl of Dysart who had died "yesterday" at Buckminster Park.

Times Tuesday 26 November 1935 p17 a very short report on the 9th Earl's funeral; the only mourners mentioned by name are members of the Tollemache family.

9TH EARL AND HAM HOUSE is from the wikipedia page on the HOUSE not on the Dysarts. Source for the information is probably articles in Ham House and its Owners through Five Centuries editor Evelyn Pritchard, published Richmond Local History Society; though wikipedia page had no footnote indications on the paragraph on the 9th Earl.

BUCKMINSTER PARK

At //lh.matthewbeckett.com/houses/lh\_leicestershire\_buckminsterpark\_info\_gallery.html the Lost Heritage site, there are some pictures of the Buckminster Park, the house the 9th Earl knew and lived in. It's a pity they are only of the outside and don't include the top-lit staircase mentioned in Pevsner.

Leicestershire and Rutland by N Pevsner, E Williamson and Geoffrey K Brandwood 1985; on p37 Buckminster Park house is described as the "grandest" classical-style building in Leicestershire; designed by Samuel Saxon built 1793-98 with a spectacular staircase. P37 says this house was knocked down "in 1950" but on p117 in the section on the villages of Buckminster and Burbage, the date of the demolition is given as 1952. The big house was replaced by a smaller neo-Georgian building. Landscaping of the estate was to a design by Repton c 1793; some of it is still there. P116 St John the Baptist church has the Dysart mausoleum. The church was restored 1883-84 by C Kirk of Sleaford; Pevsner describes it as "dull". A footnote on p117: the 1790s big house was built for Sir William Manners. It had a "spectacular top-lit staircase hall". Its architect Samuel Saxon had been a pupil of Sir William Chambers.

It's clear from various websites including nationalarchives etc that records for the Ham House estate and Buckminster Park, and records of the Tollemache family, are still kept at Buckminster; and that various historians have been allowed to look at them. I haven't tried to gain access to them myself.

THE 9th EARL'S EXECUTORS SUE HOWIE GOLD MINES

At www.bonhams.com an advert dated 25 October 2005 for a forthcoming sale which would include 20 bearer certificates issued by Howie Gold Mines Ltd in 1934. I think it was bearer certificates issued at around this time that became the subject of the court case.

Times 29 November 1934 p23 in the business news: a news:long report of a meeting of Howie Gold Mines “yesterday” at Winchester House Old Broad Street. This is the meeting Wilfred Praeger attended. The report said of Praeger, not that he was a shareholder himself but that he “represented a very substantial holding in the company and its allied interests”.

[THE 9TH EARL OF DYSART DIED AT THIS POINT, November 1935]

Times Wednesday 30 December 1936 p17: a report on the AGM of Howie Gold Mines Ltd which had been held “yesterday”. Three of the firm’s directors had died during the past 12 months, and as a result A Garner Stevens (see below, he’s the company secretary) had joined the board. The meeting had been dominated by the mine the Company owned in Sumatra. The company had used up all its cash reserves trying to develop it, and had had to take out a loan. An action being brought against the board of directors by an unnamed person or persons had held up the company’s attempts to raise money. The action was about “transactions in the Bearer shares”.

London Gazette 8 February 1938 p857: notices under the Companies Act 1929 included one issued 5 February 1938 by A Garner Stevens, as company secretary of Howie Gold Mines. A meeting of the company’s creditors would be held at Winchester House Old Broad Street.

Times Fri 21 April 1939 p4 Shares Sold to the Late Earl of Dysart: announcing that a date of 6 June 1939 had been set for this case in which the executors of the Earl were the plaintiffs; and the defendants had all been directors of Howie Gold Mines when the Earl had bought shares in the company. The hearing was having to wait until Edward Lionel Fletcher, one of the defendants, had returned from Australia. The Earl’s executors were alleging that the directors had made false claims to induce the Earl to buy shares. The defendants were countering that there had been no fraud, that they had been acting on “information on which they were entitled to rely”. At the time he had bought the shares the Earl had been “very old and unable to do business properly by himself”. His private secretary (that’s Wilfred Praeger) had represented him in the negotiations; he (Praeger) was now described as “also an old man, about to undergo a serious operation”.

Times Friday 9 June 1939 p4 Law Notices: actions today has “Dysart and anr” v Howie Gold Mines and Others at the top of the waiting list.

There was no more coverage of the case in the Times or on the web. However, the outcome of the trial didn’t benefit Howie Gold Mines:

London Gazette 28 February 1941 p1238 Companies Act 1929, voluntary liquidations. Notice issued 28 February 1941 announcing that a final meeting of creditors of Howie Gold Mines would take place on 31 March 1941.

Howie Gold Mines did continue to exist after the liquidation:

At www.geology.ontario.mndmf.gov.on.ca is a list issued by the Ontario Ministry of Northern Dvpt and Mines; a list of possible and actual mining sites in the province. They include Hutchison Lake Mine; Howie Gold Mines had held an option on mining at the Lake, but dropped it in 1946.

Canadian National Magazine volumes 41-42 1955 p15 a reference to what I suppose is the same firm but now it’s called Consolidated Howie Gold Mines.

11 August 2015

Find the web pages of Roger Wright and Sally Davis, including my list of people initiated into the Order of the Golden Dawn between 1888 and 1901, at:

www.wrightanddavis.co.uk

***

Bogdan Edward Jastrzebski Edwards was one of the earliest members of the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn, being initiated in November 1888 at its Horus Temple in Bradford, which he had helped to found. He chose the Latin motto "Deus lux solis", a motto he also used in another secret order. He was an experienced occultist so the work demanded of initiates before they could progress further in the Order was no problem for him. However, he was a very busy man so it was February 1893 before he was initiated into the GD's 2nd, inner order (where you were actually allowed to do practical magic). He continued to be an important member of the Horus Temple at Bradford during the 1890s and was the temple's Praemonstrator as late as 1900; though I think he did not remain committed for much longer than that. His wife Henrietta Edwards was initiated into the GD several years later, in March 1892, choosing the Latin motto "Spes et caritas". Her commitment was not as great as her husband's; she doesn't seem to have done much of the study that was required for initiation into the GD's 2nd order and may not have gone to many rituals.

Bogdan Edwards' brother, Stanley Jastrzebski (later Jast) was also a member of the GD.

A WORD OF WARNING BEFORE I START: this is my biography of two members of the Golden Dawn who lived in Yorkshire. I could have done a much better job of it if I lived in the area myself and could look at local archives. In this particular case I could also have done a better job were it not for the family's original surname! (It's Polish and is pronounced Yast-shemb-ski.) And all the times it was mis-spelled by British officials!! It's no wonder several members of the family opted to give it up as a bad job and take a surname whose spelling and pronunciation weren't in doubt.

THE JASTRZEBSKI FAMILY

Bogdan Edwards and Stanley Jast were sons of a man who had moved to England from the Austro-Hungarian empire. A short but thorough biography of Stanley Jast was published in 1966 (for details see the Sources section below) and here I borrow from the biography the story of why Stanley's father came here. It was a typically 19th-century story, of political struggle, failure and exile.

Stefan Louis de Jastrzebski had been born in 1823 near Cracow. He had become an activist on behalf of an independent Poland in his early twenties and had visited England and France to try to drum up support for the cause. When Lajos (Louis) Kossuth had attempted to lead Hungary out of the empire, in 1848, he had joined the Polish Legion that fought on Kossuth's side. Kossuth was defeated, however and he and many people who had fought for Hungary's independence fled abroad. Stefan Louis de Jastrzebski was one of them and he never went back to his homeland, becoming a British citizen in the 1870s.

I haven't been able to find out exactly when or how Stefan Louis de Jastrzebski got to England; I can only say that he will have arrived between 1849 (when the Austrians forced Hungary back into the empire) and 1859. Quite how he ended up in Kidderminster is a mystery, but that was where he met Elizabeth (Lizzie) Morgan, whom he married in 1859. Soon after they married, Stefan and Lizzie moved to the wealthy mill town of Halifax in west Yorkshire, and set up a tobacconist's business in the street that was known then as Barum Top but is now called George Street. They lived in Halifax for at least the next thirty years.

Stefan and Lizzie had three sons: Bogdan, Thaddeus and Louis (or Lewis) Stanley. Stefan and Lizzie were both great readers. They also believed in education as a way into the middle-classes and financial security, and were prepared to make sacrifices to ensure their sons got the kind of schooling that would lead to jobs in the professions. The boys all attended Park Congregational Chapel school to begin with, but then Stefan and Lizzie found extra money to pay for them to go to Field's Academy (sometimes referred to as Mr Field's Academy) in Halifax. Stefan and Lizzie's efforts were successful: Bogdan became a doctor and surgeon; Thaddeus joined the English civil service; Stanley became a librarian. Bogdan studied the Kabbala and the religions of ancient civilizations; Thaddeus wrote poetry; Stanley read theosophy and wrote plays.

Bogdan Edward Jastrzebski was the eldest son, born in 1860. After school, he went to Edinburgh University to study medicine. He graduated in 1884 and - in preparation for a lifetime of needing to have a name his patients could say - decided to change his surname. He opted to make his second forename into a surname, and so was known as Bogdan Edwards for the rest of his life.

Bogdan began his working life as house doctor and surgeon at Halifax Infirmary. After several years gaining experience there - I'm not sure exactly when but perhaps around the time of his marriage - he decided to become a general practitioner. By 1891 he was working as a GP in the village of Brookfoot, near Brighouse, living above his consulting rooms at 138 Elland Road. He had married Henrietta Palmer in 1887.

Henrietta Palmer was born in 1861 in Halifax. Her mother Ellen (sometimes spelled Hellen) was a local woman but her father, John Castledine Palmer, had moved to Yorkshire from Huntingdonshire. I couldn't identify either Ellen or John Castledine Palmer on the 1861 census but in 1871 John Castledine Palmer was in business for himself as a tailor, at 8 Waterhouse Street Halifax. A bit of evidence from the 1881 census suggests that Ellen might have helped run the business. Henrietta had two elder brothers, William and Thomas; and two sisters, Emily Ann who was older than her, and Louisa who was by several years the youngest in the family.

I don't know where Henrietta and her siblings went to school. By 1881 Henrietta was working as a hosier, probably in her father's business which was expanding at that time to include drapery as well as tailoring. But John Castledine Palmer over-reached himself: I found some evidence on the web that the business went into liquidation around 1889.

In 1891 Bogdan and Henrietta Edwards were living in the village of Hipperholme-cum-Brighouse with their son Harold (born 1890). They had one more child, Elsie, born in 1897. By 1901 they had moved to 46 Bradford Road Brighouse where they were still living in 1911. They lived modestly with the one live-in servant regarded by Victorians as the base-level for describing yourself (and being seen by others) as middle-class. Bogdan continued as a GP until his death though he did take on two other jobs as well. I haven't been able to check the references as they are in local government records, but articles on him on several websites say that Bogdan was appointed Medical Officer of Health for the parish of Southowram in 1890. Later he also worked as Medical Officer for the district of Brighouse, Clifton and Hartshead. As a medical officer he was in charge of compiling health statistics for the parish (later the local council) and overseeing the testing of water supplies. In addition to this heavy workload he also did a lot of voluntary work. He helped to set up the local brigade of the St John's Ambulance corps; and was Scoutmaster of the local Boy Scouts and on the executive committee of the Boy Scouts Association. Henrietta also volunteered with St John's Ambulance and I'm suggesting (for the evidence see the War years below) that she helped Bogdan with his medical practice, perhaps not so much as a nurse but as her husband's receptionist/secretary.

I haven't been able to find out exactly when Bogdan Edwards first became interested in the occult but I would guess it was during his 20s - the 1880s. He learned Hebrew in order to study the Kabbalah from original texts. He had grown up bi-lingual, I imagine (Polish and English) and even learned Esperanto later in life. This ability to learn foreign languages quickly and easily meant that he was able to read some Hindu texts, and perhaps Mexican and Ancient Egyptian hieroglyphs (he is known to have studied both).

It was probably through his interest in the Kabbalah that Bogdan became friendly with Thomas Henry Pattinson, who ran his own watch-making and jewellery business in Bradford. Pattinson was a keen occultist with many contacts in English occult circles including the alchemist Alexander William Ayton (who became a senior member of the GD) and freemasons like F G Irwin and John Yarker who researched symbolism and reconstructed/invented freemasonry rituals.

This allowed him to become a member of the Halifax Past Masters' Association; and he also rose through the local freemasons' ranks to be Provincial Senior Grand Deacon of West Yorkshire. He served as a governor of the West Yorkshire Educational and Benevolent Institution.

I think it was through Pattinson that Bogdan became involved with the August Order of Light, confusingly also known as the Oriental Order of Light.

The exact date that Bogdan and Pattinson found out about the AOL's existence is a matter of some debate amongst historians of 19th century freemasonry. Yasha Beresiner's Masonic Curiosities, the most intelligible account of the A/OOL that I found, argues that Bogdan and Pattinson got permission from M V Portman to set up an offshoot of the August Order of Light in Bradford as early as 1890; though that date is a deduction by Beresiner as the warrant that Portman issued to them (which still exists, in the Masonic Hall in Blackwell, Halifax) is undated. It was not until 1902 that the Bradford Garuda Temple of the Oriental Order of Light was officially launched. Although it was organised and ordered like a freemasons' lodge, with a proper hierarchy of officials and job titles for them, set dates for meetings, the idea of the senior officers serving for one year in the job etc, it wasn't affiliated to the United Grand Lodge of England and - I suppose and at least to begin with - membership was open to non-freemasons. Its most senior officer seems to have been called the Guardian of Light. As the A/OOL's founders, Thomas Henry Pattinson (1902) and Bogdan Edwards (1902-03) were its first two Guardians of Light; later they were given the title Arch-President to denote their status as founders. The Garuda Temple held its meetings during Bogdan's lifetime at 81 King's Arcade, Market Street Bradford, very near to where Pattinson had his shop. Bogdan lectured regularly at the Temple's meetings.

Portman had given Bogdan and Pattinson a copy of the ritual he had devised for his August Order of Light when he'd sent them their warrant. Between that date (whenever it was) and 1902, the two of them had worked on it, adding in symbolism and ritual inspired by ancient Greece and Rome, ancient Egypt (probably Bogdan's contribution) and ancient and modern India.

In Bradford, the August or Oriental Order of Light (A/OOL), the Order of the Golden Dawn, and the Theosophical Society all started up at about the same time. Pattinson was a prime mover in all of them: he was a freemason and he was the one who knew William Wynn Westcott, senior member of the Theosophical Society in London and one of the founders of the GD. Bogdan almost certainly met Westcott through Pattinson and was probably offered initiation into the GD on the strength of his interest in the Kabbala and his ritual-writing for the A/OOL. He joined the Theosophical Society a little later, in 1891. He and his brother Louis Stanley were both founder-members of the TS's Bradford Lodge in February 1891 and at this stage all the Lodge's committee and nearly all its ordinary members were members of the GD as well. Bogdan was elected vice-president for its year 1892-93 but left Bradford Lodge in August 1893 to become a senior member of the city's other lodge, called Athene (there was never a TS lodge in Brighouse).

Freemasonry was a men-only preserve of course. But the GD and the TS both allowed women in. Henrietta Edwards did not perhaps have much time for studying occult texts and rituals, and it may have been more difficult for her to find time to attend meetings in Bradford; but she did join the TS, in 1893, and remained a member for longer than her husband. She was never a member of Bradford Lodge, only of Athene Lodge, its opponent in what might have been a Bradford reflection of the bitter power struggle that tore apart the TS in the mid-1890s. Like many other members, Bogdan and Henrietta let their membership lapse as the power struggle continued. Many TS members who had supported the side that eventually lost never renewed their membership, and Bogdan was one of them. Both Bradford lodges were in abeyance in the late 1890s and neither Bogdan nor Henrietta were active members after Bradford Lodge was set up for a second time in 1902. Perhaps Bogdan's interest in the A/OOL was rekindled by the rows that beset the GD as well as the TS at this time; and in 1902 he finally became a freemason, joining Brighouse Lodge 1301.

Brighouse Lodge 1301 was a typical local freemasons' lodge, its members being local professionals and tradesmen. It did not have many members, so Bogdan served his year as the lodge's Worshipful Master only a few years after being initiated, from December 1907 to December 1908.

Despite no longer being active in the GD, Bogdan and Pattinson both kept in touch with William Wynn Westcott, who often went north to give talks at the A/OOL in the early 1900s. In 1908 or 1909 Bogdan joined the Societas Rosicruciana in Anglia (SRIA), of which Westcott was Supreme Magus. Not exactly a freemasons' lodge, but open to freemasons only, SRIA members studied Rosicrucian texts, history and symbolism. Though Bogdan was a member of SRIA's Woodman College which was based in Bradford, in 1911 he did submit one paper to the London college (known as the Metropolitan College): The Vision of Mer-

Amen Ramzes 12th king of the 19th dynasty. He was too busy to get to London to read it himself, however - or maybe wanted to avoid awkward questions; so it was read by T W Lemon. Purporting to be a fable from ancient Egypt, the Vision was in fact a modern piece of fiction; I'm not sure how many of the listening SRIA members were aware of that! Bogdan's little leg-pull, perhaps; and very much in the GD tradition.

Bogdan continued to be a member of the A/OOL Garuda Temple, of SRIA, and probably of Brighthouse Lodge 1301 until his death.

The life of general practice, housework and voluntary work that Bogdan and Henrietta were leading was interrupted by World War 1. In late 1915 or early 1916 the Brighthouse corps of the St John's Ambulance brigade began to raise money to set up two field hospitals to help cope with the ever-increasing number of seriously injured casualties being sent back from the trenches. As senior members of the brigade, Bogdan and Henrietta led this fund-raising effort. Boothroyde Hospital at Rastrick (now the William Henry Smith school) opened in February 1916. This of course was the year of the Somme and by mid-summer its original 20 beds were totally inadequate. At first, tents in the grounds were set up, but with winter coming on, more money was raised and a second hospital set up in Brighthouse: Longroyde Hospital which opened in November 1916. Though some of the staff of both hospitals were paid, most (including Bogdan and Henrietta) were volunteers, with Bogdan Edwards as Commandant and head of the medical staff and Henrietta as Matron (of both hospitals, that is). Boothroyde Hospital treated 1082 patients before it was able to shut down in February 1919; Longroyde Hospital treated 893 patients and was needed for a little longer, the last of the inmates being moved to other hospitals only days before it closed in May. On Saturday 31 May 1919 the people involved at Longroyde held a closing and presentation ceremony: Bogdan and Henrietta were given a silver tea-set, Bogdan made the 'thank-you' speech. Both Bogdan and Henrietta got their due rewards elsewhere too: they met George V, who visited the hospitals several times; and Bogdan was awarded the MBE in 1920 and Henrietta the Royal Red Cross in 1918. Henrietta went to Buckingham Palace on 26 July 1918 with a group of VADs from the British Red Cross, to receive her award. I haven't found information confirming Bogdan at the Palace to receive his MBE.

My research on Henry George Norris has left me with the strong impression that 1917 was the worst year in World War 1. It was a terrible year personally for the Jastrzebski family. In the spring, Thaddeus de Jastrzebski's only son Hubert was killed in France; and in December 1917 Bogdan and Henrietta's son Harold died. Harold died in Brighthouse and was consequently able to be buried in the family plot; though I'm sure that was not much consolation to his parents. I haven't found any evidence that Harold fought in the war. In 1911 he was training to be a civil engineer so his skills may have been needed for the war effort at home. However, he might have volunteered, or been called up, and then failed his medical - perhaps that was the reason why he was not in the armed forces, as he was only 27 when he died. Grief and the strain of working at both the hospitals and in his GP practice took their toll particularly on Bogdan Edwards - his friends in the A/OOL agreed that his war experiences shortened his life. He died on 23 February 1923; aged only 63. Henrietta lived until 1946.

--

BASIC SOURCES I USED for all Golden Dawn members.

Membership of the Golden Dawn: The Golden Dawn Companion by R A Gilbert. Northampton: The Aquarian Press 1986. Between pages 125 and 175, Gilbert lists the names, initiation dates and addresses of all those people who became members of the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn or its many daughter Orders between 1888 and 1914. The list is based on the Golden Dawn's administrative records and its Members' Roll - the large piece of parchment on which all new members signed their name at their initiation. All this information had been inherited by Gilbert but it's now in the Freemasons' Library at the United Grand Lodge of England building on Great Queen Street Covent Garden. Please note, though, that the records of the Amen-Ra Temple in Edinburgh were destroyed in 1900/01. The records of the Horus Temple at Bradford have not survived beyond 1896 either, but there's a history of the TS in Bradford on the web (though originally written in 1941) at www.ts-bradford.org.uk/theosoc/btshisto.htm in which a lot of the same people who joined the GD are mentioned. After surviving some difficult times in the 1890s, Bradford TS still seems to be going strong (as at December 2012). In April 2012 the History page was updated with the names of all the members at least up to 1941.

The members of the GD at its Horus Temple were rather a bolshy lot, and needed careful management!

Family history: freebmd; ancestry.co.uk (census and probate); findmypast.co.uk; familysearch; Burke's Peerage and Baronetage; Burke's Landed Gentry; Armorial Families; thepeerage.com; and a wide variety of family trees on the web.

Famous-people sources: mostly about men, of course, but very useful even for the female members of GD. Oxford Dictionary of National Biography. Who Was Who. Times Digital Archive.

Useful source for business and legal information: London Gazette and its Scottish counterpart Edinburgh Gazette. Now easy to find (with the right search information) on the web.

Catalogues: British Library; Freemasons' Library.

Wikipedia; Google; Google Books - my three best resources. I also used other web pages, but with some caution, as - from the historian's point of view - they vary in quality a great deal.

SOURCES FOR BOGDAN AND HENRIETTA EDWARDS

As the Jastrzebski surname is so problematic I give below census/freebmd details I normally don't include in my Sources section:

Marriage of Elizabeth Morgan to Louis Tastrzebski (sic) registered Kidderminster January-March quarter 1859.

Birth of Bogdan Edward Iastizebski (sic) registered Halifax January-March quarter 1860.

Yet another spelling: marriage of Thaddeus T S de Jastestaski registered Halifax April-June quarter 1890; his bride was Frances Elizabeth Thackrah.

Then brother Thaddeus muddied the waters even further by adding a 'de' in front of the surname: his daughter was registered Halifax July-September quarter 1891, as Norah de Jastrzebski. At least the registrar got the surname spelled correctly this time: perhaps Thaddeus did the registration himself, as he worked in that government department.

STEFAN JASTRZEBSKI AND BOGDAN'S CHILDHOOD

Louis Stanley Jast: A Biographical Sketch published London: The Library Association 1966. By W G Fry and W A Munford. Both Fry and Munford knew Stan Jast professionally. Mr B Klec-Pitewski had given them details of Stefan's early life in Poland and fighting for Kossuth's revolution. They had asked Bogdan Edward's daughter Elsie for details of the Jastrzebski family's life in Halifax.

For the life of Lajos (Louis) Kossuth: wikipedia.

Oxford Dictionary of National Biography volume 29 p816 has an entry for Stanley Jast, based on the book by Fry and Munford but also adding these details: Stefan and Lizzie's sons had all gone to the Halifax Park Chapel (probably the Sunday school); and that the third brother, Thaddeus, who never joined the GD, joined the civil service and ended his career as Assistant Registrar of England, in charge of births, marriages and deaths.

For more information on the schools that the Jastrzebski brothers attended see freepages.history.rootsweb.ancestry.com at Malcolm Bull's Calderdale Companion.

Details of Bogdan's work as a Medical Officer; and the early addresses of his GP's practice were at this website though the sources of the information were not given: lowcalderlegends.wordpress.com, its Ghosts and Legends of the Lower Calder Valley page, where Bogdan is called "The Brighthouse Magus". At the bottom of the page is a photograph of the headstone on the Edwards family plot, with dates of death carved on it for Bogdan, Henrietta and Harold, but not for Elsie.

BOGDAN AND HENRIETTA IN THE THEOSOPHICAL SOCIETY

Bogdan Edwards: Theosophical Society Membership Register vol January 1889-September 1891 p106 in a Bradford batch of people almost all of whom were in the GD as well.
Henrietta Edwards: Theosophical Society Membership Register June 1893 to March 1895 p65.

Lucifer: A Theosophical Magazine Volume XII covers March-August 1893. Published by Theosophical Publishing Society of 7 Duke Street Adelphi. Volume VII number 67 issued 15 March 1893 p78 news section: report on the officials elected to serve at the Bradford Lodge for the year 1893-94.

Lucifer: A Theosophical Magazine Volume XII covers March-August 1893. Volume XIV number 79 issued 15 March 1894: p82 news section report that "Dr Edwards" had given the first talk at the newly-founded Athene Lodge.

Bradford Lodge is one of the best documented TS lodges, with a history on its website at www.ts-bradford.org.uk, compiled as far as the 1920s by F D Harrison, a founder-member and (for a short while only) a member of the GD. There's a list of members, which includes Bogdan, but not Henrietta. The history says that both lodges were moribund by 1899. The remaining members of each got together to re-found Bradford Lodge in 1902. It's still going (September 2013).

MY BEST SOURCE FOR THE AUGUST/ORIENTAL ORDER OF LIGHT

Masonic Curiosities compiled by Yasha Beresiner, edited by Tony Pope. Published Melbourne: Australian and New Zealand Masonic Research Council 2000. Section on the August Order of LIGHT is p189-95 in the section Some Judaic Aspects of Freemasonry though one influence the ritual of the A/OOL doesn't seem to have is the Jewish one.

BOGDAN AS A FREEMASON; AND IN THE ORIENTAL ORDER OF LIGHT which in this volume is still called by M V Portman's original name, the August Order of Light:

Masonic Secrets of the Antient Mysteries subtitle In Memoriam Worshipful Brother Dr Edwards MBE. Privately printed limited edition of 200. I saw copy 191, now in the British Library. Clarence Press Bradford 1923. The frontispiece is a photograph of "Brother Dr Bogdan E Jastrzebski Edwards...Passed within the Veil, 23rd February 1923...Deus Lux Solis". Short biography pp7-20.

OTHER SOURCES FOR THE AUGUST/ORIENTAL ORDER OF LIGHT

New Encyclopaedia of Freemasonry by GD member A E Waite: p214

Encyclopaedia of Occultism and Parapsychology by Lewis Spence P70.

WESTCOTT AT THE A/OOL:

Representative British Freemasons published 1915 by Dod's Peerage Ltd p160.

National Union Catalog pre-1956 Imprints volume 657 1979 p466 lists a printed version of a lecture The Serpent Myth, given by Westcott to the Bradford lodge of the August/Oriental Order of Light in 1906.

BRIGHOUSE LODGE 1301

Brighouse Lodge 1301: a History of Brighouse Lodge for the Period from the Consecration in 1870 to the Centenary Year 1970 written by Arthur Murray MM, PPGD and based on Minutes of Lodge meetings: p28, p29, p30.

BOGDAN IN SOCIETAS ROSICRUCIANA IN ANGLIA. Its Minute Books and Transactions are now in the Freemasons' Library in Covent Garden.

Transactions 1909 et seq to 1924 on inside cover: group of members at the 8th grade honoris causa. Transactions 1911 p29 for The Vision of Ramzes which was read at the meeting of 13 July 1911; Transactions 1918 p3. Transactions 1923 p24.

Bogdan's paper, as printed, did give a clue about where he had got the original story of The Vision; but you would only have been able to guess what was up if you had known him well. Westcott knew him well, but was ill and couldn't attend the meeting. The Vision of Ramzes XII had been translated by Bogdan from "Faraone" by "B. Prus". For more on Polish freedom-fighter, journalist and novelist Boleslaw Prus, see wikipedia. His novel Faraon was written in 1894-95. Part of it was translated into English (not very well, I gather) in 1902; not by Bogdan Edwards. It had to wait for a good translation until 2001.

BOOTHROYDE AND LONGROYDE HOSPITALS; NB some sources spell them 'boothroyd' and 'longroyd' and as a non-local I'm not sure which spellings are correct. Location of both hospitals from website www.halifaxgreatwar.org which is the forum of the Halifax Great War Trail Association.

Website www.yorkshireindexers.co.uk had a series of articles originally in the local papers, covering the closing of both hospitals:

Brighouse Echo 7 March 1919 p3; Brighouse Echo 23 May 1919 p3; and Brighouse Echo 30 May 1919 p6.

For Henrietta's award:

Via www.archive.org to the British Journal of Nursing volume LXI issue of 20 July 1918 p43.

Via archive.org to British Journal of Nursing volume LXI issue of 3 August 1918 p78.

16 September 2013

AMandragora@attglobal.net

***

Gabrielle Margaret Ariana Borthwick was initiated into the Order of the Golden Dawn at its Isis-Urania temple in London, in July 1891. She chose the Latin motto 'Sine metu'. Although she worked only slowly at the required reading (for reasons I'll guess at below) she eventually passed the exams was initiated into the GD's inner order, the 2nd Order, on 8 July 1897. As a member of the 2nd Order she will have been able to begin doing practical magic; but she wasn't able to be as active as she might have liked as she lived abroad for most of the year at this time.

UPDATE MAY 2017

I've recently read two memoirs by members of the Theosophical Society in England in the early 1880s: Alfred Percy Sinnett, and George Wyld. They both mention Gabrielle's family.

UPDATE JANUARY 2017

My biographies tend to run out of steam in the 1920s! There's a lack of sources for GD members who lived longer than that. So it was great, in November, to be contacted by Nina Baker with news of Gabrielle's doings in the 1920s and 1930s. Many thanks to Nina for alerting me, and for emailing me copies of documents that she was using for her own research. Inspired by her enthusiasm, I also found some newly available information on my own account.

Dr Nina Baker researches the history of engineering. She also works as a voluntary historian for the Women's Engineering Society: see their blog at //womenengineerssite.wordpress.com

THE BORTHWICK FAMILY

The Borthwick family were Scottish. At //clanborthwick.com you can read more about the clan they belonged to. Gabrielle was the eldest child of Cunninghame Borthwick, who was either the 16th or the 19th Baron Borthwick, depending on how you count it.

I shall go into this business of how you count the barons Borthwick as I think it really mattered to Gabrielle's father in a way that is difficult to appreciate from the 21st century. The barony of Borthwick had lain dormant since the death of a Baron Borthwick in 1772 without any obvious heirs. Cunninghame Borthwick's father, Patrick Borthwick, had claimed the dormant peerage in 1816. Cunninghame's elder brother Archibald took up the claim when Patrick died; and when Archibald died in his turn in 1867, the baton passed to Cunninghame as Patrick's younger son. Cunninghame went into the matter with a great deal more energy and determination than either his father or his brother: he spent a great deal of time and money petitioning the House of Lords to agree that he was the true baron, against the claims being made by two other members of the clan. After four years of effort by Cunninghame, the House of Lords' Privileges Committee finally agreed with him, and he was declared the 16th Baron Borthwick on 5 May 1870.

Barons occupied the bottom rung of the peerage: viscounts, earls, marquises and dukes all out-ranked them. But in an era in which precedence and deference still really counted, some men were prepared to move heaven and earth even to be a baron. Cunninghame Borthwick really did want to be a baron. He wanted to claim what his branch of the family thought was their rightful place in the social hierarchy; and to have all the privileges that went with it. By the mid-19th-century the Borthwick barony lacked one of the most important defining characteristics of a peerage: it no longer had a landed estate. No matter: Cunninghame bought one in 1870. It was on the Machars peninsula in what was then the county of Wigtownshire (it's now in Dumfries and Galloway). The land came complete with a castle, Ravenstone Castle, some parts of which dated back to the 15th-century. The Borthwick barony was a Scottish one, and not all Scottish peers had a right to sit in the House of Lords. No problem for a man who was patient: for 10 years after becoming the 16th Baron, Cunninghame worked for the Conservative Party in Scotland and joined the right clubs in London to build up a circle of useful acquaintances, and in 1880 he was elected as what was called a 'representative peer' for Scotland, and took up one of their seats in the House of Lords.

What a fuss about a barony. But as a historian I'm delighted with it: in order to make his claim to the barony stick, Cunninghame Borthwick was obliged to produce evidence the House of Lords' Privileges Committee would believe, of births, marriages and deaths in his family. The evidence he produced was that it showed that the family was known and respected in Scotland, and was well-off as well. But the family money came from business - and in the endless hierarchy the mid-Victorians always carried in their minds, business always soiled your hands and mattered less than land, no matter how successful you were at it.

Patrick Borthwick was appointed the first manager of the National Bank of Scotland, when it was founded in Edinburgh, with a salary (enormous for those days) of £1000 per year. He married Ariana Corbett, daughter of Cunninghame Corbett of Tolcross and Glasgow, in 1804. I've seen two descriptions of what Ariana's father did: one says he was a businessman based in Glasgow; the other says he was a landowner in Renfrewshire. Of course he could have been both.

Patrick and Ariana's second son Cunninghame was born in 1813. By the mid-1830s he was working as an actuary in the family accountancy business in Edinburgh. However, his father and his younger brother died around 1840 and although the business in Edinburgh may have continued, at some point in the 1840s Cunninghame had cut loose from it. He moved to London and became a partner in the stockbroking firm of Dowling and Borthwick of 75 Old Broad Street. The partnership with Dionysius Wilfred Dowling (what a wonderful name!) was ended by mutual agreement in 1853, I think because Cunninghame had received a better offer. For the next 20 or so years he was a partner - I think, the senior partner - in another stockbroking firm, Borthwick, Wark and Company of Bartholomew House, Bartholomew Lane (also in the City). Cunninghame's daily involvement with Borthwick, Wark and Company ceased in 1877 but the firm continued in business, keeping the full name, and after Cunninghame's death his son Archibald joined it as a partner.

I think it was as a partner in a City firm, rather than as a would-be Scottish peer, that Cunninghame Borthwick married Harriet Alice Day in 1865. If he was looking for a bride as the hopeful baron Borthwick, Harriet was rather a strange choice, in that she was not related to any peer's family as far as I can discover, nor from a family of particularly great wealth, from any source. Harriet - who was over 20 years Cunninghame's junior - was the daughter of Thomas Hermitage Day, whose family ran a bank in Rochester Kent. The bank doesn't seem to have survived long after T H Day's death in 1869. One of Harriet's brothers became a clergyman, the other two joined the army - the kinds of career that bring a regular income and respectability as a professional, to men without a high-society or wealthy backgrounds. Cunninghame was marrying a woman who was like what he was, not like what he wanted to be.

From the point of view of the Day family, Harriet made a very good marriage: they probably didn't rate her prospective husband's chances of becoming a baron very highly, but they could appreciate the more tangible advantages he offered Harriet. Between 1865 and 1880 the Borthwicks lived most of the year in various houses in fashionable and expensive

Mayfair; and after 1870 there was the estate in Scotland where they could spend summers and Christmas.

In her biography of Alva and Consuelo Vanderbilt, Amanda Mackenzie Stuart credits Consuelo with inventing the neat summing-up of the duty of a peeress to her husband: the 'heir and a spare'. Consuelo was speaking in the 1890s but of course the understanding of what was required was centuries old. Harriet Borthwick did part of what was expected, giving birth to a son in 1867 - I think it's significant that Cunninghame's efforts to get the barony resuscitated became more systematic from that year. However, Harriet was not able to supply a spare as well. Cunninghame and Harriet had five children, but the other four were daughters. In one other respect, Harriet didn't measure up to the job-description for the wife of a peer or other man who wished to be upwardly mobile: from my readings of the Court Circular pages in the Times I've come away with the impression that she didn't work the social scene in the way you needed to, to get your husband noticed when jobs were being handed out - giving dinners and balls, holding house parties, attending royal events - meeting and cultivating the right people. More or less the only times I found her in the Court Circular reports was when she went to Buckingham Palace (on four occasions over 10 years) to launch her daughters' social careers by presenting them to royalty. It was not, of course, a way of life Harriet had been bred to; but she didn't do it. From what I've read of her, I think she was just not very sociable.

Despite the fact that the Borthwicks were not really a part of the upper-class social whirl, they lived in opulent style. I can't find them anywhere in the UK on the 1871 census but on the day of the 1881 census they and their daughters were at their Mayfair house, where their household included a butler, footman, cook, a lady's maid, the daughters' governess, two housemaids, two nursemaids and a kitchen maid. Although Cunninghame Borthwick seems to have drawn the line at having his own personal valet, the employment of two male servants indicates the amount he was prepared to spend on giving visitors a good impression, and on his family's comfort - male servants came expensive. In addition, he will also have employed a coachman and one groom, perhaps two, to drive at least one carriage and look after its horses; but they were living in a separate household, probably in the rooms over the stables round the back of the house. Even as a widow, Harriet Borthwick was able to maintain a high standard of living; and she hadn't had to move out of Mayfair to anywhere cheaper. On the day of the 1891 census she was living at 14 Seymour Street, and could afford to employ a governess for her youngest daughter, a butler, footman, cook, two housemaids and a kitchen maid. Almost certainly - although again the coachman and groom lived in a separate household - she will still have had one carriage.

Gabrielle Margaret Ariana Borthwick was the eldest of the five children growing up in the Borthwicks' lavishly-funded household. She was born on 30 June 1866. The heir Archibald was born in 1867; Alice in 1868; Violet in 1871; and Mary in 1876. I haven't found out much about Gabrielle's childhood other than what I can deduce from her parents' way of life. She must have spent her first few years based in London, as her father was still working for the stockbroking partnership; though after 1870, the family had the estate at Ravenstone Castle to go to for summer, and Christmas, and of course they had relations living in Scotland. From 1877, when Cunninghame left Borthwick, Wark and Co, to 1880 when he got his seat in the House of Lords, it's possible that the family spent most of the year at Ravenstone. Archibald was sent away to school; but Gabrielle and her sisters were educated by the governesses I saw on the 1881 and 1891 censuses. A conscientious member of the House of Lords needed to be in London when Parliament was sitting, so from 1880 the Borthwicks' yearly schedule changed again. And as the 1880s advanced, the future began to loom large in the family's planning - the need to set the heir up for his future career, and find the right kind of husband for the daughters.

In March 1884, Harriet Borthwick overcame her reluctance to socialise with her peers and went with her daughter to Buckingham Palace to introduce the Honourable Gabrielle Borthwick to the Princess of Wales (who was standing in, as she normally did these days, for Queen Victoria). This bringing of your daughter to the attention of royalty was an important event in what was a longer round of social occasions covering (roughly) April to July each year and referred to as 'the season'; occasions where social and political links were restated and reinforced; and daughters were introduced to a carefully-selected short-list of possible marriage partners. If their daughter had the kind of looks, personality and financial backing, she might be lucky and find a husband even in Victorian England, where demand out-stripped supply. Any one daughter only had a limited time in which to achieve this, especially in families where there were several daughters...

Gabrielle had been through two 'seasons' when, on the day before Christmas, 1885, Cunninghame Borthwick died. It may have suited Harriet Borthwick's un-social personality to have an excuse to observe the one-year-long period of mourning that was expected of the widow and children; but Gabrielle's momentum as a young woman of marriageable age in British high society was slowed down and I get the impression that it never really speeded up again. With three other daughters and the heir to establish, Harriet moved on: Alice had her first 'season' in 1888; Violet her's in 1890 and Mary her's in 1894. Archibald was introduced to the Prince of Wales by the Earl of Orkney during a levee - the male equivalent of the women-only 'drawing-room' - in 1889.

Harriet Borthwick married off three of her daughters, but she failed with Gabrielle. That might have been intentional - some mothers hoped to have, or even schemed at getting, one daughter who remained unmarried to look after them when they were old. However, Gabrielle and her mother have bit-parts to play in two sets of memoirs that suggest a variation on that story.

Both the memoirs are from Gabrielle's time in the Golden Dawn and the years immediately after it; and concern a group of wealthy ex-pats who spent all or part of their year in Florence. The memoir-writers are Walburga Paget, widow of the English diplomat Augustus Berkeley Paget; and Mabel Dodge Luhan, an American banker's daughter. And of course, in such a small social group, they knew each other. I'll start with Walburga Paget as she seems to have moved to Florence first, in about 1894 while her husband was still alive. After his death she continued to spend the winters and springs at her house there - the Villa Bellosguardo - before going to England for the summer to spend time with family.

Walburga Paget must have been a very effective diplomat's wife - even in her widowhood she entertained constantly, and she knew a great variety of people. She even knew some Italians, which for ex-pat residents in Florence was very unusual. Everybody from Cosima Wagner through Indian brahmins to Wilfred Scawen Blunt spent time as her guests in Florence. She was interested in spiritualism and was also a member of the Theosophical Society. It may have been through the TS in London that Walburga Paget got to know Gabrielle Borthwick - Walburga's daughter was married to an Englishman and Walburga visited her very often during the London 'season'. By June 1900, Gabrielle and Walburga Paget were well enough acquainted for Walburga to write to a friend that, “Miss Bayly with red hair and Gabrielle Borthwick with black, both handsome, are staying with me”. I couldn’t figure out from Walburga’s memoirs how long Gabrielle was her guest at Villa Bellosguardo, but a typical stay would have lasted weeks - after all, none of these ex-pats had a job to go to. Harriet Borthwick had not been included in Walburga Paget’s invitation and I think that Gabrielle was able to accept it because her absence in Italy would not have been leaving Harriet alone: Violet was not married yet so she was still living with her mother that summer.

Walburga Paget doesn’t mention having Gabrielle to stay again but will have seen each other regularly over the next few years. In November 1900, Violet was the last of Harriet’s other daughters to get married. With that marriage Harriet decided that her social duties were finally done, as far as they could be, and for the next few years she spent her winters in Florence. It was Gabrielle’s duty, as her only unmarried daughter, to go with her.

Apart from confusing one year’s events with another’s, Walburga Paget strikes me as a fairly reliable memoir-writer. I’m not so sure about Mabel Dodge Luhan, however: she exaggerates, and I feel she is a bit too anxious to portray her lifestyle as one of conscious and unashamed rule-breaking. So I am not quite sure how much reliance to place on Mabel Dodge Luhan’s suggestion that she and Gabrielle Borthwick had a lesbian relationship; although an attraction to women rather than men could be one reason why Gabrielle didn’t marry.

Mabel Dodge Luhan arrived in Florence in 1905, moved into the Villa Curonia, and with Walburga Paget’s help quickly got herself established among the ex-pats. Here’s how Mabel describes Gabrielle: “Plump and pretty, though her skin was so gray”. It’s an odd way to describe a woman who had her 40th birthday in 1906, but in my reading around the period I’ve noticed a tendency for unmarried women to be seen as somehow not quite adult, however old they were. But then Mabel says that Gabrielle, “used to sniff something from a little bottle, and then her child-like, deep-set gray eyes would lighten up a little.” What would this curious substance have been? Smelling-salts? If it was smelling-salts I don’t think Mabel would have mentioned them: too conventional! If any reader can guess what was in the little bottle, do let me know. And did Gabrielle first find out about this useful aid to cheering yourself up, from members of the Golden Dawn?

Mabel admits in her memoir that she was strongly attracted to Gabrielle from the start; and she means sexually. Before long she was inviting Gabrielle to stay at her villa. These visits seem to have taken place in a hot-house atmosphere of the sort that ends in tears. Mabel likes to feel that everyone she meets is sexually attracted to her; but she describes her son’s nanny, Marguerite, as having feelings towards Mabel that were certainly possessive, if not sexual, and sufficiently out-of-control as to be obvious to others in the house. She says that Gabrielle was one of several women-friends of Mabel’s who “made Marguerite suffer” over it, but goes further in Gabrielle’s case, describing how “her own [Gabrielle’s] muscles dimpled, reflecting the titillation of her being at someone else’s pain”. That’s not the way to behave towards anyone, least of all a servant; Gabrielle and Mabel ought both to have been ashamed of themselves. According to Mabel’s memoir, Gabrielle’s particular way of getting at Marguerite was to suggest to Mabel that they go and lie down together for a while. Does this mean there was a lesbian relationship between Gabrielle and Mabel? Maybe. Or maybe not, but they both wanted Marguerite to think so, and be jealous and hurt.

I wonder if it doesn’t just mean that these restricted societies full of people with nothing much to do, encourage everyone to act their worst.

Writing her memoir in the 1930s, Mabel hadn't had second thoughts about Gabrielle's sexuality - she still believed Gabrielle was a lesbian, and grouped her with women she knew in Florence whom Mabel thought of as never having any men in their lives, the group's leader (if it had such a thing) being Violet Paget (not sure whether she's a relation of Walburga), who dressed as a man and preferred to be known as Vernon Lee. Marriage was not had not been a bar to being one of this group: Mabel includes in it Mary Berenson despite her being married to Bernard Berenson who in his turn seemed to hate all women.

As regards relations between Harriet Borthwick and Gabrielle, Mabel's memoir does suggest that she was in Gabrielle's confidence, or close enough to her to make a good guess about things not actually stated in so many words. Mabel writes that, "The Honorable Gabrielle was in a hateful position of dependence upon her mother whom she disliked but lived with because they were so poor." I'm not sure I agree that Harriet Borthwick was poor; she was certainly managing well enough in 1891. (Neither Harriet nor Gabrielle was on the census in the UK in 1901 or 1911; they were in Italy, I suppose.) It's probably true, though, that Gabrielle was financially dependent on her mother at this stage in her life. And I think Mabel got it right when she surmised that mother and daughter had very little in common. But as the only remaining unmarried daughter, it was expected of Gabrielle that she would live with her ageing mother.

Cunninghame Borthwick had leisure interests which Harriet doesn't seem to have shared but which he did share with some of his children. None of them shared his curiosity about spiritualism, but Gabrielle, Archibald and Mary were all interested in that area where archaeology, antiquarianism and folk history all meet. Archibald was a member of the Glasgow Archaeological Society; Mary's first book was a selection of folk tales from Lancashire; and in the years before the first World War Gabrielle was a member of the Gypsy Lore Society.

Gabrielle and her mother were the only members of the family who joined the London Lodge of the Theosophical Society. They had joined it by August 1885, when the Sinnetts - Alfred Percy and Patience - came to stay with the Borthwicks at Ravenstone. In his autobiography, Alfred noted that he found Gabrielle's mother "not altogether an easy person to get on with" but Gabrielle became a close friend of both Sinnetts. Gabrielle kept up her membership of London Lodge until Patience died, in November 1908. When the time came for Patience's friends to pay their subscriptions for 1909, Gabrielle and her mother were amongst several who decided they didn't want to continue in the TS now she was gone; but Gabrielle was still in touch with Alfred Sinnett as late as 1912. Another member of London Lodge in its early years (but not later) was George Wyld. Gabrielle will have known him too, as a friend and business acquaintance of Cunninghame Borthwick.

London Lodge held itself rather aloof from the TS in general, particularly after Alfred Sinnett and Blavatsky fell out, but the TS held other, regular meetings in London, with a programme of lectures by members and visitors, followed by time for discussion. If you went to those meetings on a regular basis in the 1880s you will soon have met people who were later in the Golden Dawn - William Forsell Kirby for example, Isabel de Steiger, Lady Eleanor Harbord, Agnes de Pallandt (although these people were all much older than Gabrielle); and GD founder William Wynn Westcott. The TS was a very fruitful source of GD members especially in the early 1890s. As Gabrielle was thought interested enough in western occultism to be offered membership of the GD, she might also have gone to meetings of the Hermetic Society, which started out within the TS but became a separate society in 1884; but that Society's records are lost and I can't be certain she knew of it. If she did go to any Hermetic Society meetings she will have met another founder of the GD, Samuel Liddell Mathers.

During the 1890s Gabrielle kept up her theosophy-based friendship with the Sinnetts and also worked when she could at the reading and other study required of Golden Dawn members if they wanted to be initiated into its inner, second order and do some real magic. Her progress was slow, though. In 1896 Gabrielle reached her 30th birthday and passed through the barrier that separated the possibly-still-marriageable from the unlikely-ever-to-marry. Given the lesbian feelings that Mabel Dodge Luhan was sure Gabrielle had, she may have seen reaching 30 as a release from a burden and a source of tension in the family; but she still would have had social duties to perform, as a member of the upper-classes, and it's extraordinary how much time these took up: visits to well-known and influential hostesses in Florence, for example. However, there was another reason why Gabrielle wasn't willing to give the attention to the GD's programme of learning that some more enthusiastic members did: Gabrielle had discovered the excitements to be had from another kind of alchemy - the internal combustion engine.

In 1915 the Times described Gabrielle as having many years' experience as a car driver. Although they were still very unreliable, the internal combustion engine was still being developed, and petrol had not yet won the battle to be the major source of fuel, cars were beginning to be everywhere in the 1890s. A quick search of the web established that both Benz and Daimler were attempting to make cars in numbers rather than as one-offs by 1890; the first organised motor race was held in 1894 and the first grand prix in 1901 (both in France). Bridget Driscoll became the first UK pedestrian to be killed by a car, in 1896; and in 1898 Henry Lindfield was the first UK car driver to be killed in a car crash. The UK Association of Motor Manufacturers and Traders was founded in 1902 and held its first motor show in 1903.

The Automobile Club of Great Britain (now the Royal Automobile Club) was founded in 1897. Like most clubs, it had a 'men only' policy; but by 1903 the agitation from women drivers was so noisy that it authorised the setting up of a Ladies' Automobile Club. The early members of the LAC were all wealthy aristocrats - Consuelo Duchess of Marlborough was one of them. Like the fledgling RAC, the LAC was as much a members' club as a car club - membership was by election; though motoring was such an expensive hobby (both in money and time) that only the rich were able to indulge in it. By August 1903 the LAC had rented rooms for club meetings and a garage, and in the summer of 1904 it organised its first trip out for its members - a drive beginning on Piccadilly and ending at Ranelagh, the sports club in Fulham, where all the participants had tea. A few years later the LAC had 400 members.

I'm assuming that Gabrielle's interest in cars dates from the 1890s but when I researched the founding of the LAC, I didn't see her name mentioned in connection with it; I suppose being so often in Italy with her mother meant she couldn't take a very active role.

The fact that the LAC so quickly organised access for its members to a garage reflected the hazards of early motoring: cars broke down so often! Even a woman driver was going to need to know how to fix the engine; or at least what was wrong with it so she could direct someone else while they attempted repairs. By 1906 the LAC was employing Mr R

Sedgewick Currie to teach its members car mechanics. By 1907 he'd given four sets of lessons, each attended by 20-30 LAC members. He taught theory but also practice, on a six-cylinder Minerva supplied by a garage in Marylebone. I've said that I couldn't find Gabrielle's name as a member of the LAC in its earliest years, but I'm pretty sure she must have been elected a member of the LAC and done one of the LAC's courses in car mechanics. And then practiced a lot on her own cars, despite how unfeminine her mother probably thought it.

Georgine Classen's research for her book Eat My Dust: Early Women Motorists has established that Gabrielle went into business as a woman garage proprietor at some time before the first World War, firstly in Slough, later in Northwood in west London. Late in 1915 Gabrielle rented a garage at 8 Brick Street, a side-alley off Piccadilly. I think it was in Brick Lane that Gabrielle posed with her great dane dog for a photograph now (February 2013) available through the website www.topfoto.co.uk. Topfoto dates the portrait to the 1920s or 1930s but for several reasons I think it was taken in 1915 or early 1916. In it, Gabrielle's wearing a black dress covered with a loose, long black overall, exactly what she's wearing in another of the photographs which shows her bending over a car engine watched by two other women, obviously her students. She must be working on the four-cylinder chassis that she was using at Brick Street to show her students how to take an engine apart. They also learned how to maintain the car's valves with grinding equipment, to change a wheel, to take off and put on tyres, and to make running repairs using a soldering iron, screws and a screwdriver, and a hacksaw.

The photographs were part of Gabrielle's attempt to show that her driving and vehicle maintenance courses could help women make a contribution to the war effort. Many women had already joined the work-force to do the work of men who had volunteered for the armed forces. On 11 December 1915, Gabrielle was mentioned by name and her garage featured by the Times in an article called 'Increasing demand for women drivers'. A series of adverts for the garage at Brick Street appeared in the Times in January and February 1916, just as the first conscription laws were passed.

In 1918 Gabrielle advertised her courses again, this time focusing on ambulance driving. A course of 10 lessons would cost 5 guineas. Later coverage of Gabrielle's courses said that some of the women she'd taught had gone to drive ambulances in France and Serbia, but they were also needed in the UK. Georgine Classen feels that charging 5 guineas meant that learning driving and maintenance with Gabrielle was not for the hard-up; but by 1918 enough women had found the money for her to rent a second garage in Kinnerton Street Knightsbridge; which means that by this time she must have had a second tutor.

Running a garage and trying to get women to think of motoring as a source of employment, brought Gabrielle into a world she may not have experienced quite so directly in the rest of her life: the world where women worked, at a disadvantage. Although the motoring industry was a new one, it was already seen by men and women as a male preserve, so that women seeking a foothold in it were struggling against the same attitudes that prevailed in older industries. By the time World War 1 began, Gabrielle was taking part in the formation of a trade union for women, the Society of Women Motor Drivers, founded to fight women's corner in the battle to be taken seriously in the motoring trade and have the same rights as its male workers. Another of the Society's founder members was Barbara, social campaigner and wife of Bernard Drake who was a nephew of Beatrice Webb; so Gabrielle was making some very radical acquaintances through her garage business.

The Society's Secretary, writing in 1918, described how much prejudice there was against the idea of trade unions, amongst upper-class women who might otherwise have joined the Society; Gabrielle may have had to overcome such prejudice in herself before she was able to become a member. Other women weren't able to overcome their distrust, unfortunately, and the Society struggled to campaign effectively. In March 1918, after some difficult negotiations, it became a branch of a union it had probably seen as a rival until then - the (male dominated) Licensed Vehicle Workers' Union; though the skill of the women in the negotiations ensured their women's branch was allowed to be self-governing; that women members would pay the same subscriptions as the men and be entitled to the same protection from exploitation; and that the women's branch would continue to hold its own monthly meetings. The idea of forming what became the Society of Women Motor Drivers had originally come from the London Society for Women's Suffrage, and the Society met at its Women's Service Bureau in 58 Victoria Street London. I haven't been able to decide, from the information I've found, whether Gabrielle was a member of the London Society for Women's Suffrage; or whether she was just recruited by them as a well-known woman motorist. I'd like to think that she was already a member.

Whether Gabrielle was still living with her mother while she was running her garage businesses and getting involved in all this politicised campaigning work, I don't know. 1910 was a year of tragedy for the Borthwicks: in June Gabrielle's sister Violet died aged 38; and then Archibald died at the age of only 43. I imagine Harriet Borthwick was hit hard, especially by the death of her only son. She was getting very old (she was 80 in 1914). She will have needed extra care, perhaps even nursing care, and may have been dogged, too, by a sense of her husband's great project having failed. The Borthwicks tended to run to daughters, and Archibald had married into another family with the same problem. He and his wife, Susanna MacTaggart Stewart, had not produced a male heir to the barony Cunninghame had worked so hard to revive. Apparently, there was some discussion in the family about whether the Borthwick peerage could be inherited by Archibald's only child, Isolde; but there was no documentation to back that argument up, so the matter was allowed to drop. The barony went into abeyance again on Archibald's death and remains dormant to this day.

Harriet Borthwick died at Sevenoaks in Kent, on 17 February 1917. Gabrielle was the chief mourner when she was buried. The restrictions of wartime meant that the funeral was a small one. Gabrielle's brother-in-law Harold Chaloner Dowdall (husband of Gabrielle's sister Mary) managed to attend - he was the executor of Harriet's Will; Harriet's brother Francis Day and his wife and daughter were there; and Archibald's widow Susanna who was now Countess of Euston. In January 1916 Susanna had married Alfred Fitzroy, heir of the 7th duke of Grafton; he was a brother of TS and GD member Lady Eleanor Harbord.

It was either when her father died or - more likely - now on her mother's death, that income from a trust fund became available to Gabrielle; probably with Harold Chaloner Dowdall (who was a barrister) as a trustee. However, Gabrielle didn't consider shutting down her garages and retiring, even after the war finally dragged itself to a conclusion. The Borthwick Garages and her campaigning work gave her a purpose that she had not had before. She found being in business a challenge, though. The type of education given to upper-class girls in the 1870s and 1880s didn't include book-keeping, let alone mechanics and engineering, and Gabrielle was really stretching her mental resources taking them on. Her campaigning work, too, moved her into areas where a woman needed to put ideas across by speaking in public and debate complex issues with a well-educated and possibly hostile audience. I think this must be why Gabrielle became involved with the Pelman system of mental training.

There's a good website on the Pelman system of mental training at www.ennever.com, compiled by descendants of the man most associated with it in the UK. The system can be thought of as a kind of mental equivalent of working-out, and was popular from the 1890s (when it was formulated) until the 1960s, with (during Gabrielle's lifetime) such prominent men (the names I found were all of men) as Herbert Asquith and Lord Baden-Powell using it. I haven't been able to find out when Gabrielle started using the Pelman system but she was convinced it had benefited her: in April 1920 she chaired an evening meeting at the Pelman Institute at 4 Bloomsbury Street, during which a lecture on how it worked was given by a senior employee, who took questions from the audience afterwards. I wish I could find out whether she had recently been elected to the board of governors; but I don't think any such records have survived.

The other photograph I've found of Gabrielle comes from this period of her life. She had it taken on 5 September 1951 by the fashionable photography firm of Bassano Limited, and it may have been connected with the role she was taking at the Pelman Institute. Part of the Bassano Collection of portraits is now at the National Portrait Gallery and you can see this photograph of Gabrielle via the NPG's website.

I have only one source for this, and that from Australia not from the UK, but one thing seems to have led to another with The Borthwick Garages and by the early 1920s Gabrielle's business had branched out into the running of a restaurant and a hostel (I couldn't find out where these were located). She had acquired a business partner, Lady Gertrude Crawford.

If Gabrielle was a rare bird - a female member of the aristocracy working as a garage proprietor - so was Lady Gertrude though in a rather different way: she was an experienced and talented worker with lathes. Lady Gertrude Crawford (1868-1937) had been born Lady Gertrude Eleanor Molyneux; she was the daughter of the 4th Earl of Sefton. Both her father and her grandfather the third earl had been enthusiastic 'turners' - they used a lathe to make things out of ivory and wood - and Lady Gertrude's father had started her off in the craft by buying her a lathe when she was two! She inherited both his talent and his enthusiasm and continued to do 'turning' work all her life, exhibiting her work, winning awards and being made a Freeman of the Worshipful Company of Master Turners in 1907; although she never took payment for her work. Lady Gertrude married Captain John Halket Crawford in 1905. They lived mostly in London, where Crawford was stationed. Gabrielle and Lady Gertrude were nearly the same age and could have known each other at least slightly from their days doing the London 'season'; but it's nice to speculate that they came together over the question of lathes and car engines and met - for example - on one of the mechanics courses run by the Ladies Automobile Club.

In 1924, Gabrielle and Lady Gertrude expanded their business yet again, opening an estate agency (again I don't know where its offices were, but they were probably in or near Brick Street). But taking on yet another outlet was a step too far, in very difficult economic times, and later that year a receiver was appointed to take control of Borthwick Garages Ltd after a court order against Gabrielle's firm had been obtained by one of its creditors. Gabrielle and Lady Gertrude seem to have been able to fight off bankruptcy that time but the firm's financial situation didn't improve and at the beginning of 1927, another set of bankruptcy proceedings began and this time Borthwick Garages Ltd shut up shop for good. As the firm was a limited company, neither Gabrielle nor Lady Gertrude will have lost their shirt or their home as a result, but the failure of their firm must still have been very hard to take. Lady Gertrude held an exhibition of her turning work at Leighton House in 1929 where, for the first time, some of the exhibits were for sale; I couldn't help wondering if this was a rather forelorn attempt to raise money to pay some of Borthwick Garages Ltd's creditors and save at least some dignity from the wreck.

At the same time as they were expanding the number of their own businesses, Gabrielle and Lady Gertrude also committed themselves to another company run by a woman, someone Gabrielle at least almost certainly knew as a fellow woman motorist. The gloriously-named Cleone de Heveningham Benest was from a well-known Channel Islands family, though she herself was born in London; for reasons that aren't quite clear, between about 1915 and about 1927, she called herself Cleone Griff. Cleone had taken advantage of the options open to those born a generation after Gabrielle, and had a certificate in motor engineering. In 1915, she too was running a garage for women, in Dover Street Piccadilly, a short walk away from Gabrielle's own garage; though later in the war she was employed by Vickers as an inspector of aircraft. In 1922 or 1923, Cleone had founded the Stainless and Non-Corrosive Metals Company Ltd, based in Birmingham, to make high-quality household goods. Cleone herself was chairman and managing director, and a list of shareholders in the firm shows that the overwhelming majority of them were women. At the beginning of 1924, Cleone was planning an expansion of the firm's range of products and wanted to move to bigger premises. As part of the fund-raising effort she sold 100 shares from her original holding of 1000: 50 to Lady Gertrude, and 50 to Gabrielle. Lady Gertrude and Gabrielle joined the Company's board of directors; though Cleone remained its chairman. It seems, though, that the Company over-reached itself: at a meeting in December 1925, the shareholders agreed that as it couldn't pay its current debts, it should be wound up. Even in this crisis, though, the preponderance of women involved with the Company continued: the liquidator was a woman, Florence Durant of 230 Rotton Park Road Edgbaston.

Gabrielle had celebrated her 60th birthday in 1926, in the wake of the collapse of Cleone Griff's business and while she was trying hard to prevent herself from going bankrupt a second time. Lady Gertrude was only two years younger, and after the winding-up of Borthwick Garages Ltd neither of them seem to have ventured into business again. Gabrielle was by no means finished with cars, however: in 1929 she got involved with the Women's Automobile and Sports Association, which was founded to organise and promote sports events for women competitors.

As you would expect, WASA was a moneyed, upper-class club. Its first headquarters were at the St Ermin's Hotel Westminster and it had negotiated a deal whereby its members could have rooms there, presumably at a discount. Later it had enough funds to lease its own headquarters building, at 17 Buckingham Palace Gardens. It held its annual dinners at the Savoy Hotel. When it decided to hold a motor rally to raise funds for George V's jubilee, in 1935, it was able to hire the very exclusive Hurlingham Club as the venue.

WASA's first president was Irene Mountbatten, the Marchioness of Carisbrooke; formerly Lady Irene Denison, a relation of GD member Albertina Herbert. Its second was Ermine Oliphant-Murray, Viscountess Elibank. WASA's secretary was the author Edith Waldemar Leverton. Gabrielle was an active member of WASA from the beginning. At one of its first meetings she was elected chairman of its executive committee and she continued in that role until the second World War.

Although it held other events from time to time, WASA's main function was to organise cross-country trials for vehicles whose drivers were mostly women. The trials were mostly for cars though one or two, especially in WASA's early days, were for motorbikes. The first trial was held in 1929, from Slough to Exeter and back again, and from that year until 1939 there were three trials a year, noted for their good organisation and the level of challenge presented to the drivers and navigators. The one held on a circuit around Llandrindod Wells was regarded as particularly tough. Lord Wakefield of Hythe was persuaded to donate a trophy for the trials' overall winner, which was presented at the annual dinner. WASA also took part in motor-racing at Brooklands and at Montlhery in France.

None of the references I found for WASA suggested Gabrielle had ever taken part in any of its trial-races: she was probably too busy running them. She was also in her 60s and then 70s and might have reached the stage when cross-country driving at night was a step too far for her.

During the 1920s and probably until the second World War, Gabrielle was still living in London, at 106 Ebury Street. However, she may have had a place in the country for when she could spare a weekend: a house called Wickhurst, in Broadbridge Heath just outside Horsham. By her death it had become her main residence. WASA went into abeyance at the start of World War 2 and was not reconstituted afterwards, so Gabrielle would have been free to leave London permanently if she had wanted to.

The women in Gabrielle's life had begun to die off in the 1930s. Lady Gertrude Crawford died in 1937 at her house near Lymington in Hampshire. Gabrielle's sister Mary died a few months before the 1939 Register was taken; and her sister Alice died only a few weeks before it, leaving Gabrielle the last survivor of Cunninghame and Harriet's children, though the oldest. On the day of the 1939 Register - 29 September 1939 - Gabrielle was at Wickhurst. With her were two women, though whether they were living there or just visiting isn't clear, because the Register didn't note that kind of information down. Either way, they were friends of Gabrielle, so it's a pity that I didn't recognise either of their names and I haven't been able to identify either of them for sure from other sources. They were both widows, Mrs Evelyn C White, and Mrs Mary B Carleton. Mrs White's year of birth was not transcribed for the Findmypast edition of the Register; but Mrs Carleton was a contemporary of Cleone Griff rather than Gabrielle - born in 1886. Gabrielle and Mrs White both told the Register official that they had no occupation, but Mrs Carleton told him or her she was a company director.

Gabrielle died, at Wickhurst, on 10 October 1952, leaving personal belongings valued at about £10,000 - which was worth a lot more than it is now, if you see what I mean. A few months later some jewellery Gabrielle had owned was sent for sale at Christie's by her executors.

Gabrielle's barrister brother-in-law, Harold Chaloner Dowdall lived on until 1955 and she could have made him the executor of her Will. But he was in his 70s and she could not be sure he would still be alive to do the work, so instead, when she made her Will, she chose two women as her executors: not Evelyn White or Mary Carleton, her friends from 1939, but a Mrs Teresa Mary Cecilia Muckleston, and a Miss Mary Charman.

Teresa Mary Cecilia Healy was born in 1893. I found her on the 1901 census living in Hornsey, north London, with her mother Margaret and a step-father, Alexander Cheffins, who worked for the Post Office. In 1901 Teresa had one full sister, Dorothy, and a step-sister, Gladys. In 1919 Teresa married Bertram Brookes Muckleston, whom she may have known from her childhood as he'd also grown up in north London, in Muswell Hill. The only information I found about what Bertram Muckleston did for a living was from an official employees list issued in 1941 when he was working in the office of the Permanent Under-Secretary for the Air Force. What he was doing in 1941 may not have been typical of his working life, but perhaps he was a civil servant. Bertram Muckleston was born in 1888. If he was able to retire he would have done so around 1950; perhaps he and his wife retired to Broadbridge Green. I can't think how else the upper-class Gabrielle Borthwick would have got to know the wife of a civil servant.

The Charman family had been living in Sussex for many centuries. Looking on the web and the 1911 census I saw several women called Mary Charman. The Mary Charman named by Gabrielle must have been over 21 to be old enough (legally speaking) to act on her behalf; but I feel myself that Miss Charman was probably well over 21 at Gabrielle's death. On freebmd I also found two girls called Mary Charman born in Sussex in 1911; one in Horsham. Both of these women would have been 41 when Gabrielle died and, if unmarried, might have had the kind of relationship with Gabrielle that made her trust Mary to act as executor. This could have included a lesbian relationship, but the Charmans I found on the web seem to be ordinary people; so I suggest the relationship was more likely to be that of elderly upper-class village resident and neighbour who did some work for her.

Rather an uncertain note to end with; but that's history for you!

***

BASIC SOURCES I USED for all Golden Dawn members.

Membership of the Golden Dawn: The Golden Dawn Companion by R A Gilbert. Northampton: The Aquarian Press 1986. Between pages 125 and 175, Gilbert lists the names, initiation dates and addresses of all those people who became members of the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn or its many daughter Orders between 1888 and 1914. The list is based on the Golden Dawn's administrative records and its Members' Roll - the large piece of parchment on which all new members signed their name at their initiation. All this information had been inherited by Gilbert but it's now in the Freemasons' Library at the United Grand Lodge of England building on Great Queen Street Covent Garden. Please note, though, that the records of the Amen-Ra Temple in Edinburgh were destroyed in 1900/01. As far as I know, the records of the Horus Temple at Bradford have not survived either.

Family history: freebmd; ancestry.co.uk (census and probate); findmypast.co.uk; familysearch; Burke's Peerage and Baronetage; Burke's Landed Gentry; Armorial Families; thepeerage.com; and a wide variety of family trees on the web.

Famous-people sources: mostly about men, of course, but very useful even for the female members of GD. Oxford Dictionary of National Biography. Who Was Who. Times Digital Archive.

Catalogues: British Library; Freemasons' Library.

Wikipedia; Google; Google Books - my three best resources. I also used other web pages, but with some caution, as - from the historian's point of view - they vary in quality a great deal.

CLAIM TO THE BARONY BORTHWICK

At www.clanborthwick.com there's a timeline indicating that Cunninghame's branch of the family had been claiming the title since 1816. Some details on Cunninghame Borthwick: educated Edinburgh High School and Edinburgh University. Member of London Stock Exchange 1853-77. Cunninghame's claim to be barony as 19th baron was allowed on 5 May 1870.

Sessional Papers House of Lords 1869 p6 Cunninghame Borthwick's plea to revive the barony of Borthwick was heard by the House of Lords Privileges Committee. This family history evidence formed part of his case and was included in the the Minutes of the hearing:

pA6

- marriage record of Patrick Borthwick to Ariana Corbett daughter of Cunningham (sic) Corbett "merchant in Glasgow"; the marriage took place on 13 November 1804
- baptism record, parish of South Leith: Archibald Borthwick, August 1811
- baptism record, parish of South Leith: Cunninghame (sic) Borthwick, born 6 June 1813
- burial record of Patrick Borthwick dated 16 April 1840; he was buried in the Centre Lair, Borthwick's Tomb, West Ground

pA7 Patrick Borthwick described as manager of the National Bank of Scotland

- burial record of Archibald Borthwick, 8 July 1863.

Verification that Patrick Borthwick had three sons: Archibald, Cunninghame and Thomas

- confirmation that Archibald Borthwick had died without male heirs; he'd only had pA8 daughters

pA9

- confirmation that the last holder of the title recognised by the House of Lords, Henry Lord Borthwick, had died in 1772 without issue.

There were two other men with surname Borthwick attempting to claim the barony.

Notes and Queries 4th Series number IV issued 18 December 1869 p535 has an article: Filius naturalis: Borthwick Peerage. In it there are a few more details of the evidence Privileges Committee was having to consider. There were allegations from the other claimants to the barony that Cunninghame's claim was invalid because of an illegitimacy (I think it was in the 14th century!). Cunninghame in his turn was alleging that documents supporting the other claims were forgeries. Evidence p536 was being heard dating back to 1511!

Times Wednesday 4 May 1870 p13 rpt of House of Lords business, about the Borthwick barony. On behalf of the Crown, the Attorney-General had said at the hearing that he was satisfied that Cunninghame's claim had been "satisfactorily established"; and so the Committee had allowed Cunninghame's claim.

Times Thursday 12 May 1870 p9 A Scotch Barony Revived: this report said the barony had originally been created during reign of James II of Scotland, in the mid-15th century. Cunninghame's revival of his family's claim to the barony had begun in 1867.

HE'S VERY ANXIOUS TO ENSURE HIS NEW STATUS IS RECOGNISED: Times Saturday 8 April 1871 p4 letter dated 6 April [1871] to Times from Grahames and Wardlaw of 30 Gt George Street Westminster, who act for Baron Borthwick. On Lord Borthwick's behalf, Grahames and Wardlaw were protesting that he had been left off a list of peerages issued by the Times recently. The letter reminded the Times that Borthwick was now a peer and should have been included in the list.

EXERCISING HIS RIGHTS AS A SCOTTISH BARON AND WORKING TOWARDS BEING A REPRESENTATIVE PEER FOR SCOTLAND

Times Fri 5 August 1870 p7 Election of a Scotch Representative Peer. Election held "yesterday" at Holyrood House. Baron Borthwick attended and voted. Voting ended with the Earl of Strathmore being unanimously elected in place of the late Earl of Haddington.

Times Fri 8 March 1872 p7 coverage of another election of a Scottish representative peer. Baron Borthwick was there and voted. This time there was much more argument between advocates of several possible candidates; though eventually the Marquis of Queensberry was elected unanimously.

CUNNINGHAME GETS ELECTED HIMSELF: Times Saturday 17 April 1880 p12 report on elections for Scottish representative peers, issued Edinburgh 16 April [1880]. The elections took place (as usual) at Holyrood Palace and this time there were 10 slots available. The meeting lasted 4 hours and was very fractious. Baron Borthwick got elected to one of the 10 slots.

FIRST SPOTTED IN HOUSE OF LORDS: Times Thursday 17 June 1880 p6 report House of Lords business Tuesday 15 June [1880] - voting on the Burials Bill. Baron Borthwick was in House of Lords and voted.

HE'S A TORY: at //special.lib.gla.ac.uk are listings of archives held in Glasgow University's Special Collections. The University has a collection of manuscripts from Paisley Beaconsfield Club and Conservative Association, covering 1880-1905. It includes one letter from Cunninghame Borthwick to Sir A Campbell dated 1 November 1884, apologising for not being able to attend a particular meeting.

RAVENSTONE CASTLE which is the correct sp - with the 'e'.

Burke's Peerage states that the estate at Ravenstone Wigtownshire was bought by Cunninghame Borthwick in 1870. Wife Harriet Day was dtr of Thomas Hermitage Day, banker.

Wikipedia: Wigtownshire is now part of the county of Dumfries and Galloway. The website on Wigtownshire has a picture of Ravenstone Castle which is at Glasserton.

Website www.francisfrith.com is the site of Francis Frith Nostalgic Photographs, maps etc. Another pic of Ravenstone Castle, taken in 1951.

At //canmore.rcahms.gov.uk there's a section on Ravenstone Castle: it's an L-shaped tower house w interesting barrel-vaulted basements. In the 18th cent alterations were made to 16th-century oblong tower. This website isn't quite up to date - it describes the Castle as derelict and roofless. It had been put on Buildings at Risk register in 1992.

However, Ravenstone Castle has recently been rescued:

The website www.buildingsatrisk.org.uk says a wing was added in the early 19th century. There were more additions to the house c 1875 - by Cunninghame Borthwick. The result of the alterations was the alteration of the original floor-plan to more or less cruciform shape. The website has some sad-looking pictures of the Castle without roof and windows. However, it changed hands in 2000 and by 2008 the new owners had put a new roof on, renewed the windows and replaced a rotten door. As at July 2011 the Castle is still privately owned, by Mr and Mrs S Atterton, who were engaged in a room-by-room refurbishment of the interior (which sounds like Grand Designs!!)

NOT CLEAR EXACTLY WHERE THIS IS, BUT PRESUMABLY ON THE RAVENSTONE CASTLE ESTATE: Times Tuesday 16 September 1884 p3 Ancient Lake Dwellings in Scotland: there had been an archaeological dig at the crannog at Airrieouland, Dowalton. Lord Borthwick was now owner of the bed of the lake in which the crannogs were; he had lent some estate workers to help at the dig.

A BIT MORE ON BORTHWICK FAMILY BUSINESS CONNECTIONS

Seekers of Truth: The Scottish Founders of Modern Public Accountancy T A Lee 2006 p80 on Patrick Borthwick, whom the author describes as “a leading merchant and Burgess of Edinburgh”. In 1825 Patrick was appointed the first ever manager of the National Bank of Scotland on a salary of £1000 pa. His sons were all in practice together as accountants in the 1830s but the youngest of the brothers died in 1839 aged 22. This book is the source for two items of information I haven’t found elsewhere: that Archibald made a formal claim to the Borthwick barony, which was rejected; and that the father of Patrick’s wife Ariana was a landowner (rather than a businessman).

CUNNINGHAME’S BUSINESS INVOLVEMENT IN LONDON

London Gazette no date at the top of the page at this early date but p1246 is a list of legal notices issued dissolving partnerships. The list includes one issued 29 April 1853 by the partners Dionysius Wilfred Dowling and Cunninghame Borthwick dissolving of their partnership. They had been stockbrokers at 75 Old Broad Street. D W Dowling would be carrying on the business.

I searched the Times for mention of Borthwick, Wark and Co but didn’t find a single item between 1850 and 1870; I think that the firm was under the Times’ radar during those years.

Times Thursday 7 September 1871 p5 Money Market and City Intelligence: Borthwick, Wark and Co, the Imperial Bank and Messrs Clews Habicht and Co were all acting together as “authorized agents of the State of Georgia” which was looking to float a loan of $1,400,000. Clews Habicht and Co were the main contractors for the loan; Borthwick, Wark and Co’s role was subsidiary.

Times Monday 15 February 1875 p13 advert issued by Robert Benson and Co: Bensons and Borthwick, Wark and Co had been authorised to sell 6% Construction Bonds about to be issued by the Illinois Central Railroad and Co. Borthwick, Wark and Co’s current address is Bartholomew House London EC.

Times Friday 6 July 1877 p10 Money Market and City Intelligence: an announcement that Cunninghame Borthwick had retired from Borthwick, Wark and Co. Andrew Wark and John Wark junior would continue “under the same style”. The firm’s address would continue to be Bartholomew House.

The History of Foreign Investment in the United States to 1914 by Mira Wilkins 1989. P490 Chapter 14: Financial, Commercial and Communication Services, Section on Stockbrokers:

Borthwick, Wark worked with London-based merchant bankers “in U.S. (sic) transactions”. No Other references in the same paragraph are to events in the 1870s and 1880s.

Slow Train to Paradise: How Dutch Investment Helped Build American Railroads by A J Veenendaal 1996. California: Stanford University Press. On p213 not in main text but in a section called Alphabetic Survey: an entry dated 1881 for Borthwick, Wark and Co; they had sold some stocks in Chicago and Lake Superior “div. gold loan” in London though most of the shares were sold in Netherlands.

Transactions of the Glasgow Archaeological Society volume 1 1890 p118 a reference to Baron Borthwick (that’s Gabrielle’s brother Archibald) as “now head of the firm Borthwick, Wark and Co of London, stock-brokers”.

For the location of Bartholomew House: via the web to From Tinfoil to Stereo which is an account of the early record industry, by W W Welch and Leah B S Burt 1994. On p108 refers to the Edison Bell Phonograph company opening offices in 1892 at Bartholomew House, Bartholomew Lane London.

The firm moved shortly afterwards: at //search.freefind.com a London Directory issued 1894 lists Borthwick, Wark and Co stocks and shares brokers at 11 Caphall Court London EC.

CUNNINGHAME’S ADDRESSES

PO Court Directory 1880 p2049 Lord Borthwick’s current address is 35 Hertford Street.

PO Court Directory 1881 p2075 Lord Borthwick FSA can now only be contact at Ravenstone, Whithorn Wigtownshire or via the Junior Carlton Club. He doesn’t have a house in London.

CUNNINGHAME’S OTHER INTERESTS

Proceedings of the Society for the Encouragement of the Useful Arts in Scotland issued 1836 p164 at a meeting held at the Royal Institution Edinburgh on 9 March 1836 p166 Cunninghame Borthwick of 27 Albany Street Edinburgh was one of several men elected as Ord members.

Transactions of the Royal Scottish Society of Arts 1841 p45 at a meeting held at the Royal Institution Edinburgh on 13 November 1839 p46 Cunninghame Borthwick “actuary” of 5 North Street David Street Edinburgh was one of several men elected as Ordinary members.

Report on Spiritualism of the Committee of the London Dialectical Society, Together with the Evidence.... London: Longmans, Green, Reader and Dyer 1871. Pvi the had been formed and the research begun in January 1869. On p145 giving evidence to the Committee on Tuesday 11 May 1869 was Mr Borthwick now (that is, by the time the Report was published) Lord Borthwick. His evidence concerned “some spirit drawings that had been produced in his presence” - he couldn’t explain how they had been done.

Probate Registry: notice dated 12 March 1886. The Rt Hon Cunninghame Lord Borthwick had died at Ravenstone Castle Wigtownshire on 24 December 1885. This notice is confirmation of the Commissariat of the County of Wigtownshire dated 6 March 1886 that the Rt Hon Lady Borthwick is the “Executrix Nominated” - (the only one!!). As was usual with notices concerning deaths in Scotland, no financial details were given - alas!

Website www.forum/gravestonephotos.com has a photo of the grave of Cunninghame Borthwick, their reference GPR 73728; it's at Dean 2e Cemetery Edinburgh. Harriet Borthwick is in that grave as well.

GABRIELLE'S MOTHER

THE DAY FAMILY

Via familysearch reference England-ODM 9002530: baptism record for Thomas Hermitage Day, 10 February 1802 at St Nicholas Rochester. His parents were David Hermitage Day and wife Mary Ann.

Via familysearch reference England EASy 1469314 first marriage: Thomas Hermitage Day to Harriet Stone; at Bexley Kent 10 June 1828.

Twiggs' Corrected List of the Country Bankers of England and Wales by T Twigg issued 1830 p67 bankers in Rochester: the only ones listed are Day and Sons, with conns to (the London firm of) Glyn and Co. The partners in Day and Sons are David Hermitage Day, David John Day and Thomas Hermitage Day.

At www.serendib.co.uk is a full transcription of the Will of William Alston of Rochester; from 1833. It mentions David Hermitage Day, David John Day and Thomas Hermitage Day, all "of the city of Rochester aforesaid Bankers".

Via familysearch reference England-ODM 0992530: baptism record for Harriet Alice Day, 1 January 1835 at St Nicholas Rochester.

At //freepages.genealogy.rootsweb.ancestry.com is a trans of a Directory issued 1838 and covering Frindsbury in Kent. Listed under "clergy, gentry etc" are a William Day of Little Hermitage; and Thomas H Day of Frindsbury Road.

Freebmd: birth of Francis Harry Emilius Day registered North Aylesford Kent July-Sep 1839

<http://www.genesreunited.co.uk> death of Harriet Day registered North Aylesford Kent July-Sep 1839.

Via familysearch ref England EASy 1835969 2nd marriage: Thomas Hermitage Day to Emma Bingham, at St Margaret Next Rochester on 19 May 1846.

Via familysearch but I didn't note down the dtls: Thomas Hermitage Day's children. From the first marriage:

- Hermitage Charles Day born 1833
- Harriet born 1834
- Francis Harry Emilius; he marries Elisa Boulcott Taylor at St James Westminster in 1863

From the second marriage:

- Thomas Hulkes Bingham-Day; he marries Katharine Margaret Watts in 1884 in Bengal
- and two more daughters, seen on the 1851 census

Website www.frindsburyextra-pc.gov.uk is the site of Frindsbury Extra Parish Council. St Philip and St James Upnor, a chapel and a school-building, were built in 1869-78 and paid for by Thomas Hermitage Day and his wife (the second wife, that is - Emma).

London Gazette 5 April 1870 p2076 legal notice issued by Tathams Curling and Walls of 3 Frederick's Place Old Jewry following the death of Thomas Hermitage Day on 9 December 1869. The notice mentions a Will and a Trust; Emma is one of a number of executors.

Website www.stwerburghhoopeninsula.webeden.co.uk is the site for the church of St Weburgh on the Hoo peninsula in north Kent. The church's east window is dedicated to the memory of Thomas Hermitage Day.

HARRIET'S BROTHERS

At //singletonsdiary.wordpress.com is a transcription by Radley College of the 1847 "Diary of a Victorian Educational Reformer": Robert Corbet Singleton, co-founder of Radley College. There's a note on H Charles Day, taken from College records: born 1833, son of Thomas Hermitage Day. A pupil at the College 1848-51. Then Brasenose College Oxford 1851; BA 1855. Ordained priest 1856. Vicar of Bredhurst Kent 1864-78. Died in Frindsbury Kent 29 September 1917.

London Gazette 13 November 1860 p4178 promotions from cadet to Lieutenant include that of Francis Harry Emilius Day, as from 1 November 1860.

Hart's New Army List 1868 p71 long list of lieutenants in the Royal Artillery includes Francis Harry Emilius Day.

London Gazette 10 November 1871 p4598 Lieutenant Francis Harry Emilius Day had been allowed to retire from the army with an annuity; issued 11 November 1871.

Probate Registry: Francis Harry Emilius Day of West Malling Kent died 21 December 1915. Probate granted at London 18 January [1916] to Francis Hermitage Day "gentleman" (a son of Francis, I guess)).

At www.cwgc.org there are notes on Harriet's half-brother Thomas Day, though I don't know why because he didn't die as a result of injuries incurred during World War 1: Thomas Hulkes Bingham-Day had died on 11 April 1917; son of Thomas Hermitage Day and his wife Emma. Husband of Katherine Margaret Bingham-Day. A career army officer: 5th Batt Devonshire Regiment. Served in South Africa (they mean the Boer War, I think). Buried in Bishopstrow churchyard Wiltshire.

THE HEIR AND THE SPARE

Consuelo and Alva Vanderbilt: the Story of a Mother and a Daughter in the Gilded Age by Amanda Mackenzie Stuart. New York London Toronto Sydney: Harper Perennial 2005. Pushed into it by her mother, Consuelo married 9th Duke of Marlborough in 1895. She duly produced two sons but the marriage was unhappy from the start and the miserable parties to it agreed a separation in 1906. The 'heir and a spare' phrase is mentioned on p224 though Mackenzie Stuart does say it's not absolutely certain who it originated with.

Harriet Borthwick must have been presented at court sometime, because she presented all her daughters and she could only have done so if she had been presented herself. I searched Times 1865 and 1866 to see if she had been presented on her marriage; but she hadn't been. So I searched 1870 and 1871 to see if the presentation had happened on her husband getting the Borthwick peerage, but it didn't. I'm a bit puzzled about that.

Details of Harriet Borthwick's death and funeral were published in Times Fri 23 February 1917 p9.

GABRIELLE'S SIBLINGS

At //clanborthwick.com/lineage09.htm there's stuff on GMAB's siblings. Confirmation of most of it is on www.thepeerage.com

- Archibald 1867-1910 - see a bit further down, for more details on him.
- Alice Rachel Anne born 17 December 1868 married July 1893 Captain Alexander Stratton Campbell of Weasenham Norfolk. She died in August 1939
- Violet Dagmar Marion Olga born 3 June 1871 married November 1900 Captain Lewis Grey Freeland. Violet died in June 1910.
- Mary Frances Harriet born 11 February 1876 married July 1897 Harold Chaloner Dowdall (1868-1955); barrister of Inner Temple - see below.

MARY DOWDALL Gabrielle's youngest sister and the most interesting of them.

Times Wed 28 Feb 1894 p7 report on the Drawing Room held "yesterday" at Buckingham Palace. Queen Victoria attended it (she usually didn't); the Prince and Princess of Wales and Princess Alice of Hesse (Queen Victoria's second daughter) were also there. Amongst those presented: Hon Mary Borthwick, presented by her mother Lady Borthwick.

Times 2 July 1897 p10 Court Circ report issued Windsor Castle 1 July [1897]. A short paragraph, with no guest list, giving notice of the marriage of Harold Dowdall to Mary Borthwick at St Mary Abbot's Kensington. The service was taken by the bishop of Glasgow and Galloway, assisted by the Rev Lancelot D Dowdall and Rev Charles Ridlay. Lady Borthwick gave a reception afterwards.

Mary was an author. Between 1911 and 1927 she published a book of folk tales; several novels; and some essays.

Via the web to a copy of Mary's novel The Book of Martha. It has a frontispiece by Augustus John. Published 1913 by Duckworth and Co. NB that it is NOT a bible story; it's a modern-day tale.

At www.ngv.vic.gov.au website of the National Gallery of Victoria: a reproduction of a portrait by Augustus John now in its collection, of Harold Chaloner Dowdall dressed for his role as Lord Mayor of Liverpool; portrait by Augustus John. Apparently there was a companion portrait of Mary Dowdall; but I can't find a picture of it on the web.

Times Sat 20 May 1939 p14: one-paragraph obituary of Hon Mrs Chaloner Dowdall, wife of Judge Dowdall KC, who'd died "on Thursday after a long illness" at Melfort Cottage, Boar's Hill Oxford. Born 11 February 1876; married 1 July 1897; 1son 3daughters. No mention of her career as a writer.

The obituary of Mary's husband has more information on Mary: Times Fri 22 April 1955 p15 obituary of Harold Chaloner Dowdall QC who'd died "on Good Friday" at his home near Oxford. The Dowdall family was Irish. Harold was the youngest son of Thomas Dowdall, who was a stockbroker. Trinity College Oxford where he studied Natural Sciences. Qualified for the bar 1893. Inner Temple. Practised as a barrister in Liverpool until 1917. QC1920. County Court Judge on Circuit 6 - Liverpool - May 1921 to 1940. Held a number of posts in the CofE - chancellor etc. Wife Mary: "a lady of intellect, wit and charm"; a "prominent figure" in Liverpool's social life especially the circle around the University. She wrote novels and "amusing sketches and essays". There are portraits of Mary by Augustus John and Charles Shannon. Mary and Harold's son was also a barrister; and they had three daughters. All their children were still alive in 1955.

Via www.nationalarchives.gov.uk/a2a to list of contents of Liverpool Record Office. List includes a large collection, correspondence and other papers of Harold Chaloner Dowdall and Mary Dowdall, covering 1901-54. Part of the collection is letters to/from Augustus John, who taught at Liverpool School of Art; and became friends with both the Dowdalls then.

One of Mary Dowdall's daughters, probably a god-daughter of Gabrielle is mentioned on www.thepeerage.com: Ursula Gabrielle Borthwick Dowdall who married 1920 Charles Alexander Petrie later 3rd Baronet but got divorced quite soon afterwards. Ursula died in October 1962.

GABRIELLE'S BROTHER ARCHIBALD, the 17th Baron Borthwick:

Times Wed 8 May 1889 p13 report on the levee at St James's Palace yesterday, with the Prince of Wales presiding. Amongst the presentations made to the Prince: Baron Borthwick, who was introduced by the Earl of Orkney. In next few years I saw Baron Borthwick named in the Times as attending quite a few royal functions.

Wikipedia: it must have been the 6th Earl of Orkney: George Fitzmaurice 1827 to 21 October 1889; married, no children, succeeded by his nephew Edmond 1867-1951.

Transactions of the Glasgow Archaeological Society volume 1 1890 p118 a reference to Baron Borthwick "now head of the firm Borthwick, Wark and Co of London, stock-brokers". (Presumably, Lord Borthwick is a member of the Society).

Times 19 July 1901 p10 Court Circular, short report on the marriage of Baron Borthwick to Susanna Mary daughter of Sir Mark and Lady Stewart, at Ardwell Church. Gabrielle was a bridesmaid.

Armorial Families p300 on Mark John Stewart, later MacTaggart Stewart. He's 1st Baronet and his main estate is Southwick Kirkcudbright. Born 1834. Tory MP 1874-80 and again 1885. Married 1866 Marianne Susanna Ommaney whose mother was the only child and heiress of Sir John MacTaggart of Ardwell. Sir John MacTaggart died in 1895 and Mark inherited Sir John's estate on condition that he take the MacTaggart surname. Mark and Marianne had a large family, Susanna being one of the younger daughters. My Book of the Road shows Ardwell on the east side of the Mull of Galloway peninsula; originally it was in Wigtownshire, it's now in Dumfries and Galloway.

Times 5 October 1910 p11 obituary of 17th Lord Borthwick who'd died "at his town house yesterday". He was Archibald P T Borthwick, only son of 16th baron and his wife Harriet Alice née Day. The 17th baron was born in 1867. He became a partner in the stockbroking firm Borthwick, Wark and Co which had been founded by his father. The 17th baron was also an accomplished musician. In 1901 he married Susanna MacTaggart Stewart. They had one child, a daughter, and the barony would probably have to go into abeyance again. The funeral would be on Saturday at Kirkmadrine Ardwell Wigtownshire. The Hon Gabrielle Borthwick, Lady Cassilis (one of Susanna's sisters) and Mr E O Stewart, Grenadier Guards (Susanna's brother) were comforting Lady Borthwick.

Whitaker's Peerage, Baronetage etc... 1910 p191 a note about the Borthwick barony: "Recently it was a question whether it was open to female succession" as no papers existed any longer which indicated exactly the conditions under which the barony could be inherited.

Using Burke's Peerage on the dukes of Grafton. P1193 the 8th Duke of Grafton's 2nd marr, in January 1916, was to Susanna Mary, widow of Baron Borthwick.

GABRIELLE'S SISTERS ALICE AND DAGMAR

Times Sat 25 April 1888 p10 rpt on Queen Victoria's drawing-room held at Buckingham Palace "yesterday afternoon". Lady Borthwick presented the Hon Alice Borthwick.

Alice had children, including three sons: at genforum.genealogy.com/campbell there was a message posted February 2007 by Ian Campbell who's a descendant of Alexander Stratton Campbell and his wife Alice, via their middle son of three, Michael; Patrick was older, David was younger.

Times Thurs 6 March 1890 p10 report on the drawing room at Buckingham Palace yesterday; at which Queen Victoria was actually present, with the Prince and Princess of Wales and Princesses Victoria and Maud. Amongst those presented was the Hon Violet Borthwick, by her mother Lady Borthwick.

Times Fri 23 Nov 1900 p7 Court Circular issued 22 November [1900] includes a brief notice of the marriage of Violet Borthwick to Captain Lewis Gray Freeland of Northamptonshire Regiment, "lately invalided from South Africa". The wedding at Holy Trinity Sloane Square "yesterday afternoon". Archibald Borthwick gave Violet away. Other guests included a Colonel Freeland (probably the groom's father), another Captain Freeland (a brother?) and his wife; Vicountess Gage; Lord Glenesk; Miss Borthwick (Gabrielle); Captain and the Hon Mrs Campbell (Alice); and Hon Sydney St John. The Dowdalls aren't listed so I suppose they couldn't go to the wedding.

Probate Registry: Hon Violet Dagmar Marion Olga Freeland of Gestingthorpe Castle, Hedingham Essex wife of Lewis Gray Freeland had died on 13 June 1910. Administration 26 Aug [1910] London to Lewis Freeland as Captain (ret'd). At tribalpages.com Freeland family page but no source: Lewis Gray Freeland born 1867 Marylebone, died 1938 Bath.

GABRIELLE:

Via google books found these:

Burke's Landed Gentry of Great Britain 2001 ed p77 gives Gabrielle's date of birth as 30 June 1866: Gabrielle Margaret Ariana.

SHE COMES OUT

Times Sat 15 March 1884 p12 The Drawing Room held "yesterday afternoon" at Buckingham Palace, at which the Princess of Wales had stood in for Queen Victoria. Amongst those presented was Hon Gabrielle Borthwick; presented by her mother.

THE GIPSY LORE SOCIETY

Seen via archive.org/stream at the online collection of the University of Toronto:

- Journal of the Gipsy Lore Society New Series Volume 2 July 1908-April 1909. Printed for the Society by Edinburgh University Press though the offices of the Society are at 6 Hope Place Liverpool. On pxii a list of members: Gabrielle at the Ravenstone Castle address.

- Journal of the Gipsy Lore Society New Series Volume 5 July 1911-April 1912. Printed for Society by Edinburgh University Press; offices now at 21a Alfred Street Liverpool. On pxii in members list: Gabrielle still at the Ravenstone Castle address.

No other person called Borthwick is a member; in either publication.

SHE'S IN THE THEOSOPHICAL SOCIETY

Theosophical Society Membership Register June 1898-February 1901 has her sponsoring a new member: p21 July 1898 it was Miss Annie Roby Evans of Boundary Road London NW. Annie's other sponsor was A P Sinnett. On p184 of the 1898-1901 volume there's finally a membership entry for her, in a group of members known personally to Patience Sinnett; the details of this group of people only got added to the membership list after Patience Sinnett's death on 9 November 1908. None of this group of members has an application date, there are no details of subscriptions paid, no proper addresses and their sponsors are not named: on p184 against the entry for Gabrielle Borthwick are membership dates of 1900-09 (which can't be correct) and then a note, "Resigned March 1. 1909". Gabrielle's address from 1900-09 was: Viale Regina, Vittoria, Florence, but she was a member of the London lodge, not the active lodge based in Florence. The only other GD member in Patience Sinnett's personal group of friends was Lina Rowan Hamilton.

The Sinnetts:

Autobiography of Alfred Percy Sinnett published in an unedited version by the Theosophical History Centre, Gloucester Place, 1986: pp32-33 although Gabrielle's parents' titles are wrongly given as "Lord and Lady Northwick".

George Wyld:

Notes of My Life by George Wyld MD. London: Kegan Paul Trench Trübner and Co 1903: p42.

HERMETIC SOCIETY: there's a very short account of it on pp322-23 of Gnosis and Hermeticism from Antiquity to Modern Times by R van den Broek and Wouter J Hanegraaff, 1998. There's more but possibly not so reliable on the web; and search also for Anna Bonus Kingsford, the Society's president.

THE TWO MEMOIR-WRITERS

FIRST is Mabel Dodge Luhan. Wikipedia on her: 1879-1962, wealthy American patron of the arts. Married 4 times (though she was on number two when Gabrielle knew her):

Married (1) 1900 Karl Evans, who was killed in an accident while out shooting, in 1902. Mabel's son from this short marriage was her only child.

Married (2) 1904 in France, architect Edwin Dodge.

Mabel is described on her wikipedia page as actively bisexual. She lived in Florence from 1905 to 1912; and then again for a few months in 1913 with her lover Maurice Sterne (who became husband number 3). The wikipedia page has a great deal more on her extraordinary life but from 1912 she lived in the USA.

Mabel Dodge Luhan's memoirs are in 4 volumes. Gabrielle Borthwick appears in the 2nd: Intimate Memories published 1935. The references to Gabrielle come on p164, where Mabel writes that Gabrielle called her 'hourì'. The fuller description of Gabrielle and her circumstances, and the unpleasant goings-on in Mabel's house when Gabrielle was a guest there is at p280; and the placing of Gabrielle in a wider group of women-without-men is on p283. Again on p450 Mabel speaks of Gabrielle as very intimate with her at a time (p445-46) when Mabel's marriage to Edwin Dodge is in a bad way but she can't yet face the social consequences (which were very great) of getting a divorce. Mabel speaks of Walburga Paget's socialising and her social status in Florence on p450. On p183 Mabel says that Walburga Paget actually helped to launch Mabel on the Florence social scene when she first came to live there.

I checked the third volume of Mabel Dodge Luhan's memoirs - Movers and Shakers, published in 1936. It concerns the years after Mabel returned to live permanently in the USA. Gabrielle's name doesn't appear in it and in Intimate Memories p185 Mabel states that she kept up with very few of her acquaintances in Florence after she stopped living there.

SECOND is Countess Walburga Paget often wrongly spelled WalPurga. Wikipedia, in French but not in English, on Walburga Paget: Walburga Ehrengarde Helen von/de Hohenthal, daughter of Count Charles von Hohenthal, born 1831 in Berlin. Lady-in-waiting to Queen Victoria's eldest daughter Victoria after she married Prince Frederick of Prussia. Marries Augustus Berkeley Paget (1823-96) British ambassador to Denmark; then Rome; then Vienna. After her husband's death Walburga spent winters at Villa Bellosguardo in Florence. She died in 1929 at Newham-on-Severn.

Wikipedia in English, on Augustus Berkeley Paget: 1823-96 son of Sir Arthur Paget and his wife Lady Augusta née Fane; grandson of the 1st Earl of Uxbridge who led the cavalry at the battle of Waterloo. Married Walburga 1860; 2sons 1daughter. British minister to Italy 1867-76; British ambassador to Italy 1876-83; British ambassador to Austria-Hungary 1884-93.

Not always trustworthy website thepeerage.com says Walburga and Augustus' two sons both married but neither had any children. Their daughter married the 1st Earl of Plymouth.

In My Tower by Walburga, Lady Paget. London, Hutchinson and Co 1924 and it's volume 2 of 2 with the index to both volumes. The 'name' Borthwick doesn't appear in the index which seems just to consist of the famous and the titled. The book is based on diary entries and letters. It's not organised very systematically and has very few fixed dates, so I could anchor events in Walburga's life only when she referred to events which were taking place in the wider world. There is a yearly pattern in the book, though: Walburga seems to go to London from about July to about October, most years. The section containing the reference to Gabrielle begins on p321 with a diary entry p323 dated "January 27"; by p324 we're at April 28th. On p327 Walburga says her daughter and daughter's family have all come to visit. The quote about Gabrielle being one of her houseguests the week is on p330. A diary entry on p328 gives this houseparty as including "June 19th"; I established the year from a reference on p329 that it's one week after Lord Airlie has been killed while on active service in the Boer War.

DATING GABRIELLE'S VISIT TO WALBURGA PAGET IN FLORENCE AS TAKING PLACE IN 1900:

The date of Lord Airlie: wikipedia on the earls of Airlie establishes that Walburga means the 11th earl, David Stanley William Ogilvy, born 1856 in Florence, son of 10th earl and his wife Henrietta née Stanley. Career army officer. He'd married in 1886 and had 6 children; his eldest son inherited the earldom at the age of 6. At time of his death he'd been fighting in South Africa for a while and had already been badly wounded once. He was killed during a battle at Diamond Hill Pretoria, leading his troops in a charge, on 11 June 1900.

A BIT MORE ON WALBURGA PAGET:

Journal of the Society for Psychical Research volume 4 1889-90. Published by the Society for members only. On p65 issue of May 1889; a list of new associate members includes Lady Paget c/o The Embassy, Vienna. Just noting p203 that even associate members have to be elected. Proceedings of the Society for Psychical Research volume XI 1895 p618 Lady Paget is still an associate member but now at Villa Bellosguardo Florence. Proceedings of the Society for Psychical Research volume XV 1900-01 p502 Lady Paget still an associate member at the Florence address.

FOUNDATION OF THE LADIES' AUTOMOBILE CLUB

I followed it through the Times from February 1903 to June 1904.

A Monthly Magazine devoted to the interests of New York Athletic Club volume 12 1903 p20 describes looking down the list of members of the LAC as like reading an edition of Burke's Peerage.

Good Housekeeping volume 38 1904 p343 names the Duchess of Marlborough as one of the the LAC's members.

Via google I reached www.gracesguide.co.uk/1904\_Ladies\_Automobile\_Club where there was a list of the members of LAC in that year. Gabrielle was not on the list.

The Horseless Age volume 17 1906 p56 noted that the LAC had taken on an engineer to teach car mechanics, a Mr R Sedgewick Currie. P604 the LAC's members had a special day at the Crystal Palace Show in February 1904.

The Auto: The Motorist's Pictorial volume 12 1907 p329 gave a description of Mr Sedgewick Currie's classes and the car the students worked on.

Automobile Topics volume 16 1908 p1157 the LAC was already organising races for its members.

Royal Automobile Club Yearbook 1908 p1 lists member clubs, which include the LAC. On p217 a note that you had to be elected to be a member of LAC.

Gabrielle's work during the war:

Times 11 December 1915 p11 an article with title 'Increasing demand for women drivers', as indicated by large number of adverts now appearing in the Times' small ads for women who could drive and act as companion.

Times 4 February 1916 p13 and 17 February 1916 p2 in small ads: adverts for driving courses at Gabrielle's driving school, where she was the Principal. There were no such adverts during the whole of 1917 but in Times 18 September 1918 p3 and 22 October 1918 p13, the advert does appear again. A slightly different wording was published in Times 27 February 1918 p14a this time specifying a training in driving ambulances.

Woman's Leader volume 10 1918 p58 and again p223: an advert for a course in driving motor ambulances: 10 lessons for 5 guineas with "individual tuition" though the advert doesn't say who will do the teaching. The lessons will take place at "the Hon Gabrielle Borthwick's workshops" at 8 Brick Street; there's a telephone number, which wasn't the case in the adverts in the Times.

Aeronautics volume 14 1918 p540 also has an advert for Gabrielle's training courses. This gives two addresses: Brick Street, and 87 Kinnerton Street Knightsbridge.

Sketch: A Journal of Art and Actuality volume 115 number 1493 1921 p360 confirms that Gabrielle herself was able to strip down a car engine.

A TRADE UNION FOR WOMEN IN THE MOTORING INDUSTRY

Via the web to The Common Cause issue of 3 May 1918 article: the women motor drivers TU. This had been formed at the outset of World War 1 by Mrs Bernard Drake; “the Hon Gabrielle Borthwick, of the Borthwick garage”; Miss McLaren; Miss Tynan, who had experience of trade union organisation; and Mrs Chettle who became its first Secretary.

Via the web to Women’s Leader volume 10 1918 p145 refers to 58 Victoria Street as the headquarters of the Women’s Service Bureau and of the London Society for Women’s Suffrage.

Women in Trade Unions by Barbara Drake. Saw one via archive.org from Cornell Univ’s library but couldn’t find a date of publication on it; though all research ended with 1918. It’s TU Series no 6, published jointly by the Labour Research Department of 34 Eccleston Square; and George Allen and Unwin. Couldn’t find a page number for this but somewhere in the text it says that the women motor drivers’ union was formed by the London Society for Women’s Suffrage.

Barbara Drake is Mrs Bernard Drake; Bernard Drake is Beatrice Webb’s nephew: all quite clearly stated in a letter from Sidney Webb to John Maynard Keynes dated 6 Dec 1930. In The Letters of Sidney and Beatrice Webb volume 3, ed Norman Mackenzie, published 2008.

Modern sources on early women motorists:

Eat My Dust: Early Women Motorists by Georgine Classen. Johns Hopkins University Press 2008. Gabrielle is the only GD member mentioned in this book.

Dictionary of British Women’s Organisations 1825-1960 Peter Gordon and David Doughan 2005 On p70 this book states that the LAC was founded because the RAC had decided that it wouldn’t have women as members. The LAC was formed by a group of women led by Lady Cecil Scott Montague and had a number of objectives: to fund and find a place where women drivers could meet; to help women drivers get the necessary technical skills and experience; to provide driving lessons; to organise touring and competitions; and to help women obtain the necessary papers to drive abroad.

Via the web to The Car and British Society by Sean P O’Connell. Published Manchester 1998: Manchester University Press p48 the meeting that led to founding of LAC was held in April 1903 and only 17 women were present at it. However, by 1909 the LAC had 400 members. (Unlike the RAC) the AA always has allowed women to be members.

THE PELMAN SYSTEM

Wikipedia: a system of mind-training popular in the first half of 20th century. Devised in the UK and taught by the Pelman Institute of London through correspondence courses. Pelman training can be seen as a mind-equivalent of physical training; it was claimed it would get rid of forgetfulness, depression, phobias etc.

-

Website www.ennever.com is run by a descendant of William Joseph Ennever who developed the Pelman system though the name comes from a man claiming to be Christopher Louis Pelman, who is generally thought to have put together the actual course by which the system was taught. Very little is known about Pelman. A suggestion made by this site is that he was American but he might also have been German, with his surname originally spelled Poehlman or Pöhlman.

Ennever's Pelman course was probably launched in 1900 and in 1901 the School of Memory Training was listed at 70 Berners St, the same house that Ennever's wife was living in. The Institute's office was at 4 Bloomsbury Street until the 1920s. In 1930s it was at Adam House, Strand.

These people were listed by www.ennever.com as using the Pelman system: Herbert Asquith the Liberal Prime Minister; Baden-Powell founder of the scouts movement; H Rider Haggard, author of She; and others, mostly men but also including the composer Ethel Smyth.

Pelman training was especially popular between the world wars but even survived Ennever's bankruptcy which happened in 1940; the last ads for the training that the website could find were from 1967. Some good illustrations on this website.

-

The Accountant volume 62 1920 p82 advert for an evening meeting due at the Pelman Institute on 15 April [1920]: a talk on the Pelman system would be given by the Institute's Director of Instruction, T Sharper Knowlson; followed by a discussion. Gabrielle Borthwick would be chairing the meeting. Woman's Leader volume 12 1920 p191 has the same advert.

GERTRUDE ELEANOR MOLYNEUX CRAWFORD:

At //ornamentalturning.net/history, website of the Worshipful Company of Turners; and entry for her in their page 'Turners of the Victorian Era': Lady Gertrude Crawford 1868-1937, daughter of the 4th Earl of Sefton. Both the fourth and third earls were expert turners, using ivory - a collection of pieces they made is still on show at Croxteth Hall. Gertrude's father bought her her first lathe when she was 2! He and his father both used Holtzapffel lathes and in 1897, Lady Gertrude commissioned her own lathe from Holtzapffel - the firm's number 2332 which is now at Croxteth Hall. Lady Gertrude moved to live in London on her marriage. She had received several awards for her turning already, and in 1907 she was made a Freeman of the Company as John Halket Crawford's wife. She later won the Company's silver medal, and then its gold medal, for her work. In 1923, G A Grace's Ornamental Turning Design featured illustrations of 10 items by Lady Gertrude. In 1929 she organised an exhibition of her own work at Leighton House; some items were for sale. This exhibition was covered in the magazine English Mechanic. Gertrude had an article on her work in Society of Ornamental Turners Bulletins 88. The Company of Turners created the Gertrude Crawford medal in her honour.

Times Sat 27 April 1907 p11 Court Circular issued Marlborough House 26 April [1907]. Gertrude Eleanor wife of Captain John Halket Crawford of 32nd Lancers Indian Army had been admitted to the freedom of the Turners' Company "yesterday" as a "skilled amateur". She was a frequent exhibitor with the Company. Just noting that Angela Burdett-Coutts had also been a member of the Company. Gertrude made a speech of acceptance saying that her father had taught her her skills; he'd been an "enthusiastic amateur". The ceremony was at the Guildhall.

Via web I came across a book for sale: Original Patent Application Number 4169... pubd HMSO 1898; it's a patent owned by Lady Gertrude for improvements to the design of the pocket knife.

List of the Fellows...of the Zoological Society of London issued 1922 by the Society; p39

Gertrude Eleanor Crawford is a Fellow; elected 1900.

List of the Fellows...of the Zoological Society of London issued 1926 by the Society; p49
Gertrude is still a Fellow.

SHE MARRIES JOHN HALKET (SIC) CRAWFORD

At www.thepeerage.com: Gertrude Eleanor Molyneux married John Halket Crawford on 25 April 1905. There's no indication that they had any children. He died 23 September 1936; she died 5 November 1937.

Visitation of England and Wales volume 17, privately printed 1911; by Joseph Jackson Howard. On pxxxiv report of the marriage of John Halket Crawford to Gertrude Molyneux 25 April 1905. Crawford was a Captain in the 31st Lancers, Indian Army at the time.

Times Sat 26 Sep 1936 p1 death notices: John Halket Crawford had died "On September 23 1936 at Dieppe". He was the eldest son of John Thomson Crawford BCS.

OBITUARY OF GERTRUDE CRAWFORD:

Times Mon 8 Nov 1937 p19 Gertrude Crawford had died in Lymington Hospital "on Friday". She had been the wife Lieutenant-Colonel John Halket Crawford; and daughter of the 4th Earl of Sefton. In 1918 she had become the first ever Chief Commandant of the Women's Royal Air Force. She had been known as an "amateur wood turner". In 1915 the Turners' Co had given her a special badge to commemorate her work as an amateur turner and her "patriotic efforts in supervising the manufacture of munitions". Her work as a turner had been "distinguished by ingenuity and discovering new possibilities of the lathe and tools". She'd been given the freedom of the City of London in 1934.

At her death she was still preparing to show her work: Times Tue 9 November 1937 p13: Gertrude Crawford had got a stall of her work at the 15th Annual Exhibition of Applied Arts and Crafts which had opened "yesterday" at the Royal Horticultural Halls Westminster. She was the "only woman master turner". More coverage of her work appeared in Times Wed 10 November 1937 p16: she worked in wood, ivory and plastic. Times described Gertrude as a "sound craftswoman" though "a little inclined to over-elaborate".

Times 24 December 1937 an advert for Gertrude's house, Coxhill near Lymington, now up for sale.

WITH GABRIELLE'S GARAGE ONE THING LED TO ANOTHER: via trove.nla.gov.au to Launceston Examiner Tue 6 May 1924 p7 short item saying that Gabrielle and Lady Gertrude Cochrane, sister of Lord Sefton, were in business together. They had been running a garage at Piccadilly, a restaurant and a hostel; and now they were setting up as estate agents. Gabrielle was described in the article as, "A qualified engineer". Gertrude was a master turner and freeman of the Turners' Company.

NB the Launceston Examiner has got Lady Gertrude's surname wrong: the woman who fits the description as a master turner and sister of the Earl of Sefton is Lady Gertrude CRAWFORD.

BANKRUPTCY OF GABRIELLE'S BUSINESS

The only other references I found for the businesses run by Gabrielle and Lady Gertrude were these:

RAC Guide and Handbook for 1927 p50 has an advert for The Borthwick Garages.

The World's Carriers and Carrying Trades' Review pubd 1925 by the Carriers Pubg Co; p132 notice about Borthwick Garages ltd: Sir William H Peat of 11 Ironmonger Lane had been appointed Receiver and Manager by a court order issued 26 November 1924.

Gabrielle and Lady Gertrude seem to have stayed that one off but in 1927:

London Gazette 18 March 1927 p1845 a set of winding-up petitions issued under the Companies Acts 1908-17 includes one issued 15 March 1927 for The Borthwick Garages Ltd of 8 Brick St.

London Gazette 24 May 1927 p3435 winding-up orders under the Companies Acts 1908-17; re The Borthwick Garages Ltd of 8 Brick Street. The first meeting of the firm's creditors would take place on 2 June 1927 at 33 Carey St L Inn.

London Gazette 14 Aug 1928 p5496 Notices of Release of Liquidator: the list includes a Notice for Borthwick Garages Ltd, registered office 8 Brick Street Piccadilly. This company was released 18 July 1928 by the liquidator George Digby Pepys of 33 Carey Street Lincoln's Inn.

London Gazette 13 March 1931 p1727 and again London Gazette 16 June 1931 p3922. Both under the Companies Act 1929 Section 295(5): long lists of companies recently dissolved, including Borthwick Garages Ltd.

Sent to me by Nina Baker in her email of 7 Nov 2016: list of items at the National Archives concerning the winding up of Borthwick Garages Ltd, company reference number 150653. Incorporated 1918. Document references J 13/11308; J 107/39; BT 34/4281/150563 the liquidator's accounts; and BT 31/24082/150563.

CLEONE GRIFF'S STAINLESS AND NON-CORROSIVE METALS COMPANY LTD

Items sent in November and December 2016 by Nina Baker PhD who researches the history of engineering and runs the occasional blog Women in Engineering History:

- extract from The Woman Engineer volume 1 number 17 1923 p280: profile of Cleone Griff.
- London Gazette 29 Dec 1925 p8674 re the winding-up meeting.
- items now at the National Archives concerning the winding-up of the company: list of shareholders with their addresses and the number of shares they owned; and a list of the company's directors - Cleone, Lady Gertrude and Gabrielle who was described as a "motor car business proprietor" (though Lady Gertrude wasn't).

And a couple of items I found:

Via www.newspapers.com to the Albuquerque Journal of New Mexico Sunday 2 December 1923 p9 a photo of Cleone Griff dressed as a pilot; and as Managing Director of the Stainless and Non-Corrosive Metal (sic) Co ltd of GB, which had what was thought to be the only all-woman board of directors in the world.

At archive.commercialmotor.com, a short reference to the Company in Commercial Motor 8 September 1925 announcing its new address - 149 Sherborne Street Birmingham. Its expanded range of products would include stainless steel castings and pressings, particularly suitable for car dashboards.

A modern reference to Cleone Griff, in Women, A Modern Political Dictionary by Cheryl Law. 2000 London: I B Tauris: p70

WOMEN'S AUTOMOBILE AND SPORTS ASSOCIATION

Sent by email 9 Nov 2016 by Nina Baker. From The Woman Engineer vol 3 issue 1 1929 p4:

The Women's Automobile and Sports

Association. An interesting new Club has been formed, with headquarters at St. Ermin's Hotel, Westminster, to promote women's interest in automobile and sports events. The President is the Most Hon. the Marchioness of Carisbrooke, and the Vice-President the Viscountess Elibank. We are pleased to see that Miss Borthwick has been elected Chairman of the Executive Committee.

Full particulars of the Club can be obtained from the Secretary, Mrs. Waldemar Leverton, St. Ermin's, Westminster. This Association is responsible for the first girl road scout, Miss Grace New, who made her appearance recently on the roads. It also organised the first Women's Classic Motor Trial London-Exeter-London.

Follow up WASA:

Times didn't have anything on a rally of cars orgd by the Wood Green and Dist MC but on Tue 11 Jan 1927 p12 there was a short rpt on their wmn-only motorcycle trial, through Herts. There were 50 competitors; some were named but no mention of Gabrielle or Benest/Griff.

Times nothing on the setting up of WASA but Times Wed 6 Nov 1929 p17 in the Arrgts of Today section of the Ct Circe page: annct of the inaugural dinner of WASA at the St Ermin's Hotel 8pm.

Wiki on St Ermin's Hotel wh still exists, horseshoe shaped bldg at 2 Caxton St W/m. Orig built as a block of flats 1880s converted to a hotel reopening 1899. Long assoc w MI5 and MI6.

Times Wed 4 Dec 1929 p1 Personal Ads; in the Club Anncts section an ad for WASA "a club for sportswomen" but also offering hotel accomm. The first 3000 members wldn't be charged an "entry fee". Contact is the Sec. Club already has a tel number. Ad rptd in Times 9 Dec and 11 Dec 1929.

From 1929 no coverage in Times of any event orgd by WASA.

Times 2 Jan 1935 p13 had a ref to a wedding reception held in WASA's hq at 17 Buckingham Palace Gdns ((so they've still got the bldg at that stage)).

Times 27 March 1935 p11 at the bottom of an article on events orgd to benefit the ((GV)) Jubilee Trust Fund: WASA Ltd (sic) wld be holding a motor gala w proceeds going to the Fund; on Sun 14 July. Fur dtls wld be avail 8 April [1935]. Lord Rothermere had donated 50gns to get the prize fund started. After that, Times had no fur coverage of it. Next mention of WASA was:

Times Fri 22 Nov 1935 p17 Court Circe: Vcts Elibank wld preside at the annual dinner of WASA on "Tues" [26 Nov 1935] at the Savoy Hotel ((perhaps Elibank is the pres now)). The year's trial prizes wld be pres'd at the dinner, incl the Lord Wakefield Trophy. No coverage of the actual event.

Via www.motorsportmagazine.com to issues of Motorsport in which WASA figured. I searched for Borthwick but all responses were men; searching for Gabrielle got no responses. Issues of:

December 1931 p32 WASA members were eligible to compete in the 21st London to Gloucester trial.

July 1932 p10.

April 1934 p34 descg WASA's trials as "well-orgd".

Dec 1935 p17

Aug 1937 p24 WASA did allow men into some but n all of their Wakefield Trophy trials.

Aug 1938 p20 another mention of the Wakefield Trophy named after Lord Wakefield of Hythe. WASA's 3 trials per year were consid the "most difficult" trials competitions.

And a mod take on it:

April 1996 p76 by "WB" who mentiond sevl drivers at the time thinking that WASA putting its own scouts out on the road was "overambitious". The Wood Green and Dist Motor Club ran a trial f wmn in Jan 1927: Ally Pally to tring in a set time; lunch; then back again. No mention of any of WASA's first-year officers in the a/c of that trial but the formn of WASA was a direct res of it. WASA's first compv event was a night drive from Slough to Exeter and then back to Basingstoke; some of the navigators were men. In 1930 there was a trial to Land's End; and trials at Montlhery in France and at Brooklands. WASA took part in inter-club racing at Brooklands; some of the team members named in the article - not Gabrielle. WASA did a Welsh trial bsd round Llandrindod Wells wh was regarded as partic chall. In 1935 WASA held a gala at Hurl Club as part of King's Jubilee.

End Motorsport mag

WASA's first-year officers:

Pres Mcs Carisbrooke who's a ?niece ?gt-niece of Albertina Herbert:

Wkp on the only Mqs of Carisbrooke, title cr 1917 f P Alexander of Battenberg 1886-1960, gson of QV via her ygt dtr Ps Beatrice; his sister marr Alfonso of Spain. Surname change July 1917 to Mountbatten. Marr July 1917 Irene Francis Adza Denison 1890-1956 only dtr of 2nd E of Londesborough. They had 1 child, Iris, 1920-1982 but Cecil Beaton's diaries allege that the Mqs had a long-term male lover. The Mqs was the first member of the royal family to do a proper day's work: starting in the offices of Lazard Brothers.

V-pres Vcts Elibank. Wkp on the viscounts Elibank. Viscountcy cr 1911 f a man who was already a baron; old Scottish title. WASA's vcts is wife of the 2nd Vct: Gideon Oliphant-Murray 1877-1951; colonial cvl serv; unionist MP to 1922. V conserv; v implt. Marr 1908 Ermine M K Aspinwall née Madocks. No child. They moved to S Africa 1950 and he d there 1951.

At www.npgprints.com item X121207 is a photo of Vcts Elibank tkn 1948 at Bassano and Vandyk. She d 1955.

Sec Mrs Waldemar Leverton. Cldn't see m abt her or indeed abt him via google - no dates, no wkp page. Google had books incl householdbooks.com a copy of her The Veg Cookery Book pubd George Newnes Ltd; no pubn date.

BL catal had others but n that one. Her name's Edith:

Little Economies and How to Practice Them. C Arthur Pearson Ltd 1903

Small Homes and How to Furnish Them. C Arthur Pearson Ltd 1903

Little Entertainments and How to Manage Them. C Arthur Pearson Ltd 1904

In entry f mag The World of Dress, pubd 1898-1905 by C Arthur Pearson Ltd she's listed as the editor of its last volume; but there's a diff name editing the first few vols.

Dressmaking Made Easy. London: George Newnes 1910

Housekeeping Made Easy. Subtitle states it's aimed at the m-c mistress of h/h. London: George Newnes 1910

Servants and their Duties. A Helpful Manual for Mistress and Servant. London: C Arthur Pearson Ltd 1912

Modern: Women, Clubs and Assocs in Britain by David Doughan and Peter Gordon 2007. In section Sporting Clubs p81 it's mentioned in their a/c of the Wmn's Billiards Assoc, founded 1931. Its first Pres was Vcts Elibank; v-chair Teresa Billington-Greig. Had its hq at 17 Buckingham Palace Gdns SW1 courtesy of WASA. NB that's the only ref to WASA in the book. At speedqueens.blogspot.co.uk, item added 6 Nov 2016 on WASA. Anon; no sources. Lots of names of participants but I cldn't see any ref to Gabrielle in the a/cs of the trials. WASA was founded fllwg the success of the Wood Green and Dist wmn-only trial of early 1927. The first event staged by WASA was in 1929: Exeter, w 38 cars and 17 all-wmn crews ((driver and car mech)). 1930 trial to Land's End staged by WASA. The WASA trophy (pictured on the site) was awarded at least up to 1938; but WASA didn't get started again after WW2.

GABRIELLE'S DEATH

Probate registry: Gabrielle Margaret Ariana Borthwick of Wickhurst, Broadbridge Heath Sussex, spinster, died on 10 October 1952. Probate granted at the London office on 9 January 1953 to Teresa Mary Cecilia Muckleston, married woman, and Mary Charman, spinster. Effects £10589/10/7.

London Gazette 27 February 1953 p1208. As sent to the web, the page doesn't say what list this is, but I can tell from experience with other GD members that it's a list of people lately dead who had an income from a trust fund. The people are listed in accordance with the Trustee Act 1925 as part of the winding-up of the dead person's estate. The list includes Gabrielle Borthwick. Interested parties were to contact Eager and Sons solicitors of 8 North Street Horsham; who were acting for Teresa Mary Cecilia Muckleston and Mary Charman.

Muckleston:

At www.mytrees.com there's a page for the Healy family. Teresa Mary Cecilia Healy is 1893-1973; she married 1919 Bertram Brookes Muckleston 1888-1983 - marriage details from freebmd.

Via archive.org/stream to the Air Force List for July 1941. On p7 a B B Muckleston is working in the Department of the Permanent Under-Secretary; he is not on active duty.

Charman:

A Complete Memoir of Richard Haines.. by Charles Reginald Haines, published 1899 pxxi describes the Charman or Carman family as "an old and important clan in Sussex...in the neighbourhood of Horsham, Warnham and Shinfold".

At www.wscountytimes.co.uk an article from Tue 10 April 2012 about Mike Holmwood, who had traced his family history back to the 16th cent and discovered people called Charman in it. A John James Charman had gone down with the Titanic (April 1912) aged 26; he was a son of Solomon and Mary Charman who lived in the Gardner's Cottage, Pondtail Road Horsham.

Times 3 March 1953 p14e in set of adverts for forthcoming sales at Christies: some jewellery once owned by Gabrielle Borthwick was part of a bigger sale of such items; they were being sold by her executrices.

PORTRAITS OF GABRIELLE

At www.npg.org.uk there's a portrait of her done by Bassano on 5 September 1921. NPG x121152.

Wikipedia on Bassano. The firm was started by Alexander Bassano 1829-1913, born London of Italian extraction. He opened his first photography studio in Regent Street in 1850 and became THE society photographer at that and various other addresses. His main studio was at 25 Old Bond Street from 1876 to 1921; during 1921 it moved to 38 Dover Street. Many of Bassano's company's original glass plates are now held by the National Portrait Gallery so Gabrielle's photograph at their website must be one of those.

Confirmation that Gabrielle's photo is in the Bassano archives: at //library.temple.edu/collections/scrc/bassano-ltd-photograph, there's a list of their collection of photos of society figures taken by Bassano Ltd between 1920 and 1939. The photograph of Gabrielle Borthwick is in the collection's Box 3. The list doesn't include dates for any of the photographs in it.

A couple of Gabrielle, and several of the garage including her working on an engine: at www.topfoto.co.uk/gallery.wwiwomenatwork.ppages/ppage44.htm

- number 1067006 is Hon G M A Borthwick School of Motoring and Engineering, Piccadilly London. Showing 3 women removing a car axle.

At //cache33.fkft02.de.topfoto.co.uk file number 1067012

- a photo of Gabrielle posing with her Great Dane. The website suggests the photograph is from the 1920s or 1930s but her dress is nearly to her ankles and her hair is long and done up Edwardian style, so I think it must be earlier. She's standing in an empty side-street, between imposing looking stone walls. I think she must be near her School of Motoring therefore it's probably Brick Street Piccadilly. She's wearing the same dress/overall in the photograph below:

At thumb16.jpg@theimageworks.com:

- She's leaning over a car engine, watched by 2 other women also in grubby overalls - probably trainees.

14 May 2017

Find the web pages of Roger Wright and Sally Davis, including my list of people initiated into the Order of the Golden Dawn between 1888 and 1901, at:

www.wrightanddavis.co.uk

***

July 2015. This file is a complete rewrite of my original biography, the result of being contacted by two members of the Boxer family and being handed more, and more accurate, information on Edward and his family. Thanks are due to a descendent of one of Edward's brothers; and to a descendent of William, a brother of the Rear-Admiral Edward Boxer I mention below.

Edward Boxer was initiated into the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn at its Isis-Urania temple in London, on 18 December 1894. He chose the Latin motto 'Nec temere nec timide'. Two other men were initiated at the same ritual - Victor Toller and George Minson - and Edward might have known George Minson through their work, though he probably didn't know Victor Toller. Although Edward doesn't seem to have resigned in so many words, he doesn't seem to have followed up the initiation, either; he made no attempt to do the work necessary for progression into the GD's inner, 2nd Order.

THE BOXERS

The Boxer family historians have traced their ancestors back to a Daniel Boxer who lived in 18th-century Dover. He, poor man, ended up in the workhouse, but his male descendents went into the navy and there are records of them in the National Maritime Museum at Greenwich. Edward's grandfather and one of his many uncles made it to rear-admiral. However, family members also succumbed to the hazards of life in the navy. Some had to retire before their time, and some died young.

Perhaps the glory of the 19th-century Boxers was Edward's grandfather, after whom the GD member was named. Rear-Admiral Edward Boxer (1784-1855) died of cholera on board ship at Balaklava on 4 June 1855. At the time he was blamed by officials who were no nearer to the war than London for the logistical disasters of the Crimea. More recent accounts credit him with bringing some kind of order to the supply situation there. He'd had a distinguished career before that, in Canada, the West Indies and the Mediterranean and had taken part (in 1840) in the capture of Acre.

Edward was too young to know Rear-Admiral Edward but he did know Edward's son Charles Richard Fox Boxer who served in China, the Pacific and North America before being invalided out with the rank of rear-admiral in 1884 after a tour of duty in the West Indies. Rear-Admiral Charles died in 1887 but Edward was in touch with his family until his own death.

JAMES MICHAEL BOXER

Edward's father, James Michael Boxer was born in 1816 when Rear-Admiral Edward and his wife Elizabeth were living in Deal. He took the path followed by so many of his forebears and joined the navy aged only 11, in 1827. He too served at Acre, on the Vesuvius, and as a result of his actions during the siege, was promoted to lieutenant in 1840. However, he was unlucky: after spending three years based in Canada, he was either injured or became ill, and had to retire in 1844 on half-pay (which wasn't much - in 1858 his total income was £91 per year). He may have done one more tour of duty in the late 1840s; and he appeared in the Navy List as late as 1861; but was on half-pay in 1861 and had probably been so throughout the 1850s.

In 1839 James Michael had married Elizabeth Kingston. Elizabeth, too, had been born in Deal and perhaps they had known each other from childhood. They had four children, the first of them not born until they had been married nearly a decade: Harriet Elizabeth (1847); Charles (1850); Frederick Thomas (1852); and the GD's Edward, born in 1856. Harriet Elizabeth was born in Canada; but the three boys were all born in Kent, where James Michael and Elizabeth were living - sometimes in Deal and sometimes in Faversham - in the 1850s and 1860s.

The navy took care of its own, and ensured that James Michael's children got a basic education. In 1861 both Harriet Elizabeth and Frederick were being educated at the Navy's expense: Harriet Elizabeth was at the Navy's Royal Female School at Richmond Green; and Frederick was at the Royal Mathematical School Christ's Hospital, at Hertford near Rochester, having followed oldest brother Charles there. However, Edward did not follow his brothers there: instead, he was sent to the Royal Naval School at New Cross in south London; he was there on the day of the 1871 census. Both the schools offered education to the sons of impoverished naval officers with the proviso that on leaving school, the boys should join the navy.

Years later, in 1886, Edward and another ex-pupil, George Murray Rolland, had belongings stolen from them at the Royal Naval School, by Mark Oborn (17) and Robert Jones (15), presumably during a school reunion. Edward's missing possessions were his hat, and his cigarette case; worth 10 shillings. Oborn had worked at the school in the past; this was the third or fourth time he'd been caught, breaking and entering its buildings stealing from the residents. He and Jones pawned most of the items they stole but it sounds as though Edward did get his cigarette case back - Jones seems to have had it on him when he was arrested.

The navy also took care of Edward's mother Elizabeth Boxer. By 1881 she had been allocated a naval almshouse, number 7 Royal Naval Cottages, on St John's Road in Penge; her income came from an annuity which may have been something she had inherited, but was more likely to have been a naval pension. She lived at the Royal Naval Cottages until her death 20 years later.

James Michael Boxer died in 1865; and his family dispersed. His widow's sister-in-law Mary Eliza Kingston died in 1870 and by census day 1871 Elizabeth Boxer had moved into 3 William Terrace Chiswick to keep house for her brother Thomas Kingston and be a mother to his children, the youngest of whom was only three. Edward was at school. Frederick had gone into the navy and was serving overseas. Charles had started work in an accounts office and was living on his own in Hampton. And Harriet Elizabeth had gone to live in Tenbury, Worcestershire, with a cousin, Mary K Woodward, whose husband - another naval officer - was also abroad. In 1877 Harriet Elizabeth married a man whom she had met while living in Tenbury - Arthur Priestman Bloome who later added on another surname and became Bloome-Ansley.

Of the three Boxer brothers, only Frederick stayed in the navy for more than the length of time they were all obliged to serve as a condition of their education at a charity school. As the Navy Lists only deal with officers, I haven't been able to ascertain when Edward joined, or when he left; but 1871 seems a likely date for his joining. During his short period of service he was a crew-member on the frigate Phaeton and the family still has a photograph of him in his uniform. Not for Edward the excitement - and the dangers - of sailing far-off seas like Frederick, who in 1874 went to the East Indies to join the crew of the Glasgow. During the mid-1870s the Phaeton doesn't seem to have left Chatham! As soon as he was entitled to leave the navy, Edward did so. His education at the navy's expense stood him in good stead at this planned change of career, and he was able to get work in a bank. He stayed as a bank employee until his retirement, probably staying at the same bank throughout and definitely being promoted several times, to end his working life as a departmental manager. I do not know which bank this was: that's not the sort of information that appears on a census form, unfortunately, and no one in the family can recall any mention of Edward's employer.

It was probably during Edward's short term as a seaman that a big break with the past occurred in the family, with the death in April 1873 (at the age of 82) of Edward's grandmother Elizabeth, Rear-Admiral Edward Boxer's widow. For some of her widowhood she had been living in a grace-and-favour apartment at Hampton Court Palace; but by the end of her life she had moved into town, to 3 Sumner Terrace, Onslow Square in South Kensington. Her unmarried daughter Mary was probably living with her; Mary certainly inherited a lot of the memorabilia Elizabeth had collected during her long life.

EDWARD AND EDITH

On the strength of finding work that suited him, that he thought he could stick to, that Edward married in 1876. His bride was Harriet Edith Mitchell (known as Edith, not Harriet), the daughter of Rev Thomas Mitchell and his wife Sarah. The Rev Thomas led a peripatetic life as a Church of England clergyman, working in parishes in south London, Surrey, Berkshire and Oxfordshire, and was vicar of Little Tew in Oxfordshire when Edith married. Edith (born 1850 and so several years older than her husband) was born while her father was rector of Catmore near Newbury.

On the day of the 1881 census Edward and Edith were living in Camberwell. Their only child, Arthur Edward (named for his uncle Arthur Bloome-Ansley) was 4. They were being cautious with money, I think, because on census day they were not employing even the basic live-in general servant; though I daresay they found the money to pay a woman to come in to clean by the day. By 1891 they had moved to 39 Hurstbourne Road Lewisham. Their financial situation had improved. Arthur was 14 but was already working, as a clerk; possibly for the diamond merchant's firm that employed him in 1901. And Edward and Edith had one lodger, Arthur Pugh, a bank clerk who might have worked in Edward's office. So they could afford that one live-in servant that made all the difference to a middle-class woman's view of her life.

On the surface, therefore, all was well with Edward and Edith Boxer in 1891. However, under that surface things had probably gone wrong already and by 1901 they had separated. When he joined the GD, Edward gave as his address Inverness House, Carshalton Grove Sutton. I wondered if this was a boarding house and might indicate that Edward was on his own by 1894; but I haven't been able to find anything about the house as yet (July 2015) so I can't be sure. If it's just an ordinary house where any family might live, the Edward and Edith were probably living in it together still and their marriage had a few more years in which to stagger on.

On the day of the 1901 census, Edith was living alone at 133 Upland Road Camberwell; when the census official asked her what was her marital status, her answer was so equivocal, that that box on the form is just a big blot. Edward had moved to the north side of the river and was lodging with Mrs Jane Gatliff in Fulham; he gave his marital status as 'married'. And Arthur wasn't living with either of his parents; he too was in lodgings, at 58 East Dulwich Grove, boarding with Mrs Clara Ansell and her daughters.

Was Edward's interest in theosophy one of the subjects on which he and Edith could not agree? It might have been, though it might also have been something he took refuge in, as his relationship with his wife deteriorated. Though the Theosophical Society did have members who managed to believe in both theosophy and Christianity, they found it a challenge to reconcile the two, and Edith might have considered Edward to be in danger of losing his faith; or of encouraging her to lose her own. I don't know, of course, whether theosophy widened the breach between husband and wife; but it wasn't an interest they shared - Edith never joined the TS; but Edward did do so. When I was going through the TS's records, I missed his membership application, but he was definitely a member by 1891. In December 1891 Edward was one of two TS members who sponsored the application of William Jameson. Jameson's other sponsor was Harold Levett. Levett worked for the London Joint Stock Bank. Perhaps Edward worked for it too. Or perhaps they met at a TS meeting and found themselves with banking as well as theosophy in common. They will have been able to meet quite a number of GD members at meetings of the TS, including its founders William Wynn Westcott and Samuel Liddell Mathers; and Harold Levett followed Edward into the GD, being initiated in 1895.

More people joined the GD from the TS than from any other one source of recruits. Most were initiated in the early 1890s; Edward and Harold Levett were a little behind the curve, waiting until 1894 and 1895. During those years, the TS was in the throes of an internal dispute, essentially about the direction and leadership of the Society now that Helena Petrovna Blavatsky had died. The dispute got very bitter and eventually very public. A lot of people let their membership lapse, did their study at home, and just met in informal groups if they met at all. However, like most members of the GD who had come from the TS, Edward didn't stay. Theosophy and western esotericism could be seen as complementary, but both had a demanding programme of study; so that people who were working, especially, couldn't really do justice to both at the same time. Most theosophists opted to go with eastern philosophy rather than western magic, when presented with that problem, and dropped out of the GD as a result. It looks like Edward was one of them and so, I think, was Harold Levett.

EDWARD ALONE

All the evidence is that Edward and Edith never lived together after they split up at some time during the 1890s. At that time it was still an unusual step for a no-longer-consenting couple actually to go their separate ways; so whatever had been wrong between them must have been very wrong indeed. They must both have been aware when they parted, that they could not afford either the financial or the social consequences of a divorce; even Edward's career at the bank might have been blighted by such a thing. And of course not being divorced would mean that even if they met somebody whom they cared for that much in the years ahead, they would not be able to marry them. I daresay they reached an agreement whereby Edward continued to support Edith financially. By 1901 Edward had been promoted to the position of cashier at his bank and perhaps had a little more money with which to fund a separate household for Edith. But that - most unsatisfactorily - would have been that; until the death of one of the partners released the other. Edith was the one that was released, in 1935; but it was a pyrrhic victory. In his will, Edward left everything he had to leave to a woman Edith had probably never even heard of, Ellen Boyce Miller.

THE GATLIFF FAMILY

On census day 1901, Edward was living with the Gatliffs at 10 Burnfoot Avenue, All Saints, Fulham; near where Allen and Norris (see my other history work on our web-page: The Life and Times of Henry George Norris) were building new houses in Fulham borough. Jane Gatliff had been widowed in 1894. Her husband, William Goodman Gatliff, had been a civil servant and they had been comfortably off while he'd been alive; but his death made Jane decide she would take in lodgers, and her daughter Maude decide that she would go out to work - by 1901 she had trained as a typist. Also in the household was Jane's son Ralph, who worked as a broker; probably in offices in the City of London.

Edward stayed as a lodger with the Gatliff family for many years; perhaps to as late as 1919. Certainly he was Maude's lodger on census day 1911, while Jane and Ralph were out of the country. Maude (listed as head of household) had rented Huntley Cottage in East Malling, Kent.

By the first world war, the Gatliffs were living at 13 Dealtry Road Putney; presumably they moved in when Jane came back from wherever she was in April 1911. Isobel Rebecca Gatliff (a cousin whose parents were in India) may have been living with them by the outbreak of World War 1; and I think, so still was Edward Boxer. Jane Gatliff died in July 1916; and Isobel married Frederick Marshall Cowan in 1918; but Maude was still living at 13 Dealtry Road when she too died, in March 1919. Isobel Cowan and Edward Boxer were Maud's executors.

Isobel's marriage and Maude's death (at only 51) meant the end of Edward's association with the family, if he hadn't left the household already. But the 1911 stay in East Malling had had lasting results: Edward probably remembered the area well, from his childhood, and he decided that he would move there when he retired. When Maude died he was still working; but by 1925 he had retired. By 1929 he was living at More Cottages, East Malling; and Ellen Boyce Miller was almost certainly living there with him - she, not he, was the holder of the cottage's lease.

ELLEN BOYCE MILLER

Edith and Arthur supposed that Ellen Boyce Miller was Edward Boxer's housekeeper; and that, consequently, was the tale that went down through the generations. However, when I did my usual 'family history' searches on Ellen, I soon began to doubt that view (though I could quite see how it had arisen). My opinion now is that although Ellen might have kept house, she was not being paid to be Edward's housekeeper. She was not of the social class from which servants tended to be drawn; and in any case, the census information indicates that she did very different work.

Ellen Boyce Miller was born in 1873, the youngest child of William Miller, who worked as an actuary for a savings bank in Sherborne, Dorset. He had died by 1891 and had left his family not especially well off; so that his widow Emily, and all her daughters except the eldest, were working; though none as a servant. Ellen and her older sister Emma were working at home making gloves, but Ellen clearly had ambitions above the long hours and poor pay of such work. By 1901 she had left home, moved to London, and got herself qualified as a typist. On the day of the 1901 census Ellen and three other working women were all living together at 31 Arvon Road Highbury, about five minutes' walk from where I live in north London. The other women in the household were Annie Smith and Mary Archer, who both worked as clerks in the offices of an engineering firm; and Marianne Shaw, another typist, whom the census official wrote down as head of the household, as she (at 40) was the eldest. Marianne and Ellen were still living together on the day of the 1911 census though they had moved a few streets, to 23 Corsica Street. Smith and Archer had left the household, but Ellen's sister Emily had joined it, working as an accounts clerk. Both Marianne and Ellen were keeping up with the rapidly-moving technology and expectations of office work: they had both learned shorthand and were working as shorthand typists. The way they both filled in the census form suggests that by this time they might have been running their own typing and shorthand bureau: they both described themselves as 'employer', not employee.

Ellen, then, was an independent woman with very saleable skills, working in offices and later, possibly, as a partner in a business: a middle-class woman. She and Edward might have met through leisure interests they had in common or people they were both acquainted with (Maude Gatliff, for example); but they could also have met in a way that had hardly been possible before the end of the 19th century - through work. Perhaps, at some time, Ellen had worked in Edward's bank.

EDWARD AND ELLEN

I don't know when and how Edward and Ellen got together. Their relationship was complicated, obviously, by marriage being out of the question; but get together in some sense - possibly even the sexual sense - they definitely did. Perhaps the big step was taken when Edward retired: in a new place, where no one really knew them, they could live together, perhaps telling everyone they were brother and sister, or calling themselves Mr and Mrs Boxer - though I note that Ellen used her usual name on the lease and that was how she was referred to in Edward's Will.

EDWARD AND THE BOXERS

It's hard to tell how Edward and Edith's separation went down with their families though I imagine none of the Mitchells had anything to do with Edward ever again. On Edward's side of the argument, the Boxer family historians mentioned to me that their older relations couldn't remember having met Edith; though they knew Arthur and his son. One person who did find it very difficult to come to terms with the breakdown of the marriage was Edward's mother Elizabeth, who was still alive when the separation took place. When she died, in February 1901, Elizabeth's Will named her son Frederick Thomas, and her son-in-law Arthur Bloome-Ansley, as executors. Edward may have been a witness of course (I haven't read the Will) but that would have meant he wouldn't be inheriting anything from her - a Will's witnesses can't inherit - so either way it does seem like a snub, especially when so many other people thought Edward would be a good executor. Nor did his brother Frederick Thomas Boxer get Edward involved when he died in 1908: Frederick's Will had one executor, his wife Agnes (he had married Agnes Pope in 1890).

Deaths, weddings and births: tricky times when you no longer live with your spouse. Arthur married Ada White in 1903. I presume Edith was at the wedding but Edward was not and it's not clear, even to family members, how much contact Edward had with Arthur and Ada, though their son was named Edward Vincent (Teds), keeping to the family tradition. The Boxer family know that Arthur took over the diamond business he was working for in 1901 or launched a rival business of his own; but it didn't do particularly well - dragged down by the depression of the 1930s, perhaps - and he set up a wireless business with his son.

Edward continued to have good relationships with his cousins, the children of Admiral Charles R F Boxer. Charles had married Harline Kimber, a member of a prominent French-Canadian family, in 1874 when he was stationed in Canada. They had five children before Charles died. As a widow Harline was very well off indeed; so well off that I wonder if the money hadn't been hers to start with; because the rest of the 19th-century Boxers were genteel, but noticeably not wealthy. In the 1890s Harline and her children were living in Upper Norwood, so Edward and Edith probably saw them quite often. By 1901, they had moved into town, to 8 Lancaster Gate; still easy to visit. I presume that Edward would have been invited when Harline's daughter Eveline married Cyril Longhurst at St George's Hanover Square in 1906. From 1901 to 1904 Cyril had worked for Sir Clements Markham at the National Antarctic Expedition, which launched the short but eye-catching career of Robert Falcon Scott. During the later part of the first World War he was private secretary to Lord Curzon.

By 1911, with only daughters Cecile and Violet still living at home, Harline had decided to leave London. On the day of the 1911 census she was living at the house that's still called 'Firwood', on Burnaby Road, Alum Chine, in Bournemouth. She died there in 1933 and Cecile was still living there in 1961.

Edward's relationship with his maiden aunt Mary Fox Boxer (sister of Lt James Michael Boxer and Admiral Charles R F Boxer), can only have been intermittent, at least before the first World War. She seems to have lived abroad a great deal (I can't find her on the censuses of 1891, 1901 or 1911); though by the 1920s she had moved into a flat in York Mansions, Earl's Court Road. When she died in 1925, Edward and Cyril Longhurst were her executors. Mary Fox Boxer had inherited a lot of Boxer family memorabilia, and she left Edward his choice of her pictures, specifically including portraits of Rear-Admiral Edward Boxer and his wife (another Elizabeth); and a painting of HMS Pique, the ship that Rear-Admiral Edward had commanded from 1837 to 1839 in the north Atlantic and the West Indies. Eveline was left Mary's emerald bracelet; and Cecile got Rear-Admiral Edward's Turkish Order of the Medjidie for her lifetime before being required to pass it on to her brother Hugh.

Edward also acted as executor when his brother-in-law Arthur Bloome-Ansley died in 1929; with sister Harriet as co-executor. Though he wasn't called on when Harline Fox Boxer died in 1933.

Edward seems to have got on particularly well with his cousin Cecile. Cecile had been born in 1875, the eldest of Harline's children. Perhaps she seemed like a daughter to Edward. In late 1924 Cecile was inspired to enter the National Festival of Community Drama - maybe Edward was amongst those encouraging her to do so. Her one-act play The Call won its local heat, and was broadcast on BBC radio on 23 January 1925 with 'Cuckoo' Savelli and Jim Crawford in the leading roles; but only in the Bournemouth area, so while Edward and Ellen must have read Cecile's script, they may not have been able to hear it broadcast. It was published in 1929. Cecile's two novels weren't published until 1953; but perhaps she was already writing fiction pieces while Edward was alive.

The Boxer family historians suggest that Edward was visiting Cecile when he began to suffer from his last illness. I wonder if Ellen was with him? When Edward was given a grim prognosis on the illness, it was certainly Ellen he worried about - as his Significant Other, but with no automatic entitlement to his estate. His Will in her favour was signed on 16 August and he died two weeks later. Edith and Arthur were outraged when they found out. They challenged the Will on grounds of 'undue influence' but Edward had had Cecile Boxer's help in making sure its credentials were impeccable. Cecile witnessed the Will herself; with Archibald Langworthy (a local businessman who was not a relation either of the Boxers or of Ellen). Though Edith's legal challenge delayed the granting of probate by nearly a year, it did fail; and Ellen inherited an estate worth £7313, including (presumably) the pictures left to Edward by his aunt Mary.

Edward died on 2 September 1935 and was buried at Brompton Cemetery. There's no account of the funeral - it would be interesting to know who attended it. After the question of Edward's Will was settled, Ellen Boyce Miller left East Malling and moved to Reculver Lodge, Beltinge, Herne Bay. She died in 1943, and sister Emily was her executor, probably inheriting everything as well. Emily died in Sherborne in 1951.

Edith Boxer died, probably still rather bitter, in 1941. Arthur died in 1960 and Teds in 1992. Teds never married, so Edward has no known descendents.

Cecile Boxer died in 1961. In 1953 she had had two novels published. In the wake of her death, the Boxer family memorabilia were sold at auction and sent all over the world; it is a dreadful shame.

BASIC SOURCES I USED for all Golden Dawn members.

Membership of the Golden Dawn: The Golden Dawn Companion by R A Gilbert. Northampton: The Aquarian Press 1986. Between pages 125 and 175, Gilbert lists the names, initiation dates and addresses of all those people who became members of the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn or its many daughter Orders between 1888 and 1914. The list is based on the Golden Dawn's administrative records and its Members' Roll - the large piece of parchment on which all new members signed their name at their initiation. All this information had been inherited by Gilbert but it's now in the Freemasons' Library at the United Grand Lodge of England building on Great Queen Street Covent Garden. Please note, though, that the records of the Amen-Ra Temple in Edinburgh were destroyed in 1900/01. I have recently (July 2014) discovered that some records of the Horus Temple at Bradford have survived, though most have not; however those that have survived are not yet accessible to the public.

For the history of the GD during the 1890s I usually use Ellic Howe's The Magicians of the Golden Dawn: A Documentary History of a Magical Order 1887-1923. Published Routledge and Kegan Paul 1972. Foreword by Gerald Yorke. Howe is a historian of printing rather than of magic; he also makes no claims to be a magician himself, or even an occultist. He has no axe to grind.

Family history: freebmd; ancestry.co.uk (census and probate); findmypast.co.uk; familysearch; Burke's Peerage and Baronetage; Burke's Landed Gentry; Armorial Families;

thepeerage.com; and a wide variety of family trees on the web.

Famous-people sources: mostly about men, of course, but very useful even for the female members of GD. Oxford Dictionary of National Biography. Who Was Who. Times Digital Archive.

Useful source for business and legal information: London Gazette and its Scottish counterpart Edinburgh Gazette. Now easy to find (with the right search information) on the web.

Catalogues: British Library; Freemasons' Library.

Wikipedia; Google; Google Books - my three best resources. I also used other web pages, but with some caution, as - from the historian's point of view - they vary in quality a great deal.

SOURCES FOR EDWARD BOXER

INFORMATION FROM THE BOXER FAMILY HISTORIANS sent in emails during June 2015: including the text of Wills and details of the executors; family trees and explanations of how everyone was related; details of naval careers; letters about Arthur and Teds; and lots of stories that only family members would know. Included was a transcript of James Michael Boxer's petition of 1858 for a place for Charles Edward Boxer at the Royal Mathematical School; which quoted his current income. They also gave me more information on Edward's eldest brother Charles Edward; one of the family historians is working (July 2015) on an article on him, so in this biography I shall only say that he died in 1884. Once again, thanks to you both.

IN THE THEOSOPHICAL SOCIETY

Theosophical Society Membership Register for September 1891 to January 1893 p44 application of William Jameson of Essex, December 1891.

Kelly's Royal Blue Book Court and Palace Guide 1911 edition p239 Harold J Levett was by then manager of the London Joint Stock Bank's branch on the corner of Gloucester Terrace in Bayswater.

OTHER SOURCES OF BOXER FAMILY HISTORY

EDWARD'S GRANDFATHER REAR-ADMIRAL EDWARD BOXER

Oxford Dictionary of National Biography volume 7 p8. Beware however: it says that the Rear-Admiral's wife Elizabeth died in 1826. Thanks to the Boxer family historians for drawing my attention to this error and giving me the proper date of death.

EDWARD'S FATHER JAMES MICHAEL BOXER

Birth at Deal in May 1816: Familysearch England-EASy GS film number 1786327.

At en.wikisource.org is a Naval Biographical Dictionary. Author, William Richard O'Byrne.

Evidence of where James Michael Boxer was living from 1838 to 1855: Familysearch had set of records, I'm not quite sure what they represented, probably men eligible to vote.

Navy List 1860 p44

Navy List 1861 p19.

ADMIRAL CHARLES RICHARD FOX BOXER

At www.pdavis.nl a short account of career of Charles Richard Fox Boxer (1833-87).

HARLINE KIMBER FOX-BOXER

Pierre Berthelet and his Family by Édouard Fabre Surveyor. Printed for the Royal Society of Canada 1943. On p67 Harline Kimber married Charles Richard Fox Boxer on 28 November 1874.

CECILE BOXER'S PUBLICATIONS:

1929 The Call. Published in London and New York in the French's Acting Edition series.

1953 Light in Darkness. London: Hutchinson

Little Girl with a Bell. Also London but Frederick Muller.

EVELINE BOXER'S HUSBAND CYRIL LONGHURST 1879-1948; Eveline's dates are 1879-1952

I thought I'd include some further reading for Longhurst's interesting career.

At the National Antarctic Expedition 1901-04, where his immediate boss was Sir Clements R Markham 1830-1916; see wikipedia for Markham, Secretary to the Royal Geographical Society 1863-88..

The Voyage of the Discovery by Robert F Scott. London: Smith Elder 1905 p35.

The Lands of Silence: A History of Arctic and Antarctic Exploration by Clements R Markham. Cambridge University Press 1921 p467.

The Life of Sir Clements R Markham by Albert Hastings Markham. London: John Murray 1917. In his introduction, A H Markham describes Longhurst as a friend of Sir Clements, not just an employee. Longhurst had helped A H Markham by compiling the book's index.

I May Be Some Time: Ice and the English Imagination by Francis Spufford, who suggests on p406 that Longhurst may have been Sir Clement's lover. London: Faber and Faber 1996.

The Voyages of the Discovery by Ann Savours. London: Chatham 2001.

And later as private secretary to Marquis Curzon during the first World War:

Curzon and British Imperialism in the Middle East by John Fisher. London: Cass 1999 p65 footnote 94 referring particularly to September 1917.

HARRIET EDITH MITCHELL daughter of Rev Thomas Mitchell (1819-79) and his wife Sarah née Trevett (1818-1905). See also collins-family-site.

At www.connectedhistories.org a newspaper announcement of Rev Thomas's appointment to the rectory of Catmore; which was in gift of the dean and chapter of Windsor.

Crockford's Clerical Directory 1872 p596.

Crockford's Clerical Directory 1880. From 1877 until his death Rev Thomas Mitchell was vicar of Great Tew, Enstone, Oxfords, in the gift of M T W Boulton.

FREDERICK THOMAS BOXER AND EDWARD BOXER IN THE NAVY

Navy List 1860-61 p172 for more details of the Phaeton.

Navy List January 1874 p469 only has Charles R F Boxer; and Frederick Thomas Boxer who gets in because he has reached the rank of “navigating Midshipman”. Whereabouts of the frigate Phaeton. Frederick en route to the far East: p469, as navigating sub-Lieutenant.

ELLEN BOYCE MILLER

Information on Ellen’s early life: see colinmiller.com.

London Gazette 24 September 1929, a notice issued by the Land Registry of properties whose title is about to be registered.

DEATH and notice of funeral OF EDWARD BOXER

Times Thursday 5 September 1935 p1.

22 July 2015

">

Find the web pages of Roger Wright and Sally Davis, including my list of people initiated into the Order of the Golden Dawn between 1888 and 1901, at:

www.wrightanddavis.co.uk

***

John Brettell was one of the first people to join the Golden Dawn. He was initiated in April 1888, taking the Latin motto ‘Luci’. In January 1893 he reached the GD’s 2nd Order level, at which you could start to do some practical magic rather than just reading about it. Although he was a member of the Isis-Urania temple, which held its meetings and rituals in London, he lived and ran his own business in the Midlands so he may not have been able to be a very active member.

November 2014: a big update to my biography of John Brettell is required after family historian Mary Brettell contacted me from Brisbane Australia. See her web pages tracing some lines of the family back as far as the Middle Ages, at

//freepages.genealogy.rootsweb.ancestry.com/~brettell/BRETTELL/Brettell\_Families.html

Her distant cousin Shane Brettell then sent details of his web pages; he’s a direct descendant of John Brettell through John’s son Thomas. As a result I’ve been inspired to widen my look at John Brettell’s life and to embed him a bit more in the 19th-century industrial Midlands. The ‘family history’ side of John’s life uses information collected by both of them, from original sources.

THE BRETTELLS, SMETHWICK AND WEST BROMWICH

Mary Brettell’s history of the family of Brettell (and its many other possible spellings) shows it to be a rather rare surname. Owners of it were concentrated in the south Midlands with offshoots in London by the late 18th century and in Liverpool by the mid-19th. John Brettell’s father Thomas was baptised (as Brittel) in 1799 at St Giles Cripplegate; one of the children of Nathan Brettell and his wife Leah. Although he grew up in London, family ties with Brettells in West Bromwich were still close, and it's likely that Thomas moved there to serve an apprenticeship and then to work as a smith, taking advantage of the recent growth of the West Bromwich/Smethwick area as an iron- and brass-working district.

The West Midlands had been known for its nail and chain-making industry at least since the 16th century, but production was largely on a domestic scale, with people making the goods in their back yards, until the building of the Birmingham Canal in the 1760s and the invention not long afterwards of steam-powered engines. The Birmingham canal passed between West Bromwich (to its north) and the small villages of Harborne and Smethwick (to its south). It met the Wednesbury Canal near Spon Lane, an old route between West Bromwich and Smethwick. The first iron foundry in the district was opened in West Bromwich a few years later, by Matthew Boulton and James Watt. In 1795 the two men leased land on Merry Hill, beside the canal, and began to make steam engines at their Soho Foundry. Other factories followed including the iron-foundry of Henry Downing; and Thomas Shutt's window-making business, taken over by the Chance brothers in the early 1820s. At the end of the 1820s Thomas Telford was called in to design a big re-digging of the Birmingham canal, already seen as inadequate and slow: it was made deeper and its route was made straighter, a set of six locks was dispensed with, and the Galton Bridge was built over it, at the time the longest single-span in the world. Housing for workers in these factories was being built on farmland near to the canals by this time. Skilled and even unskilled people could move to the area with a realistic hope of finding regular work.

Thomas Brettell was living in West Bromwich by the mid-1820s when he married Catharine (or Catherine, both spellings appear on different census forms) Ensor, a woman from Birmingham. Their son John was born in 1829 or 1830, the youngest of four sons in the family. On the day of the 1841 census John and Catharine were one of several couples named Brettell who were living on Spon Lane. John, aged 12, was probably still at school but all his older brothers were working. The writing on the 1841 census is always a trial to interpret but I think that at least one brother, Thomas (aged 15) was working as a smith; though the eldest son, William, had left the shop-floor for the office and was working at a foundry, but as a clerk.

Thomas Brettell seemed always to have worked for other people: as late as 1851 he was describing himself to a census official as a "jobbing" smith, which I read as meaning that he did not run his own business. One of the firms he worked for may have been the Britannia Bedstead Works, owned by Thomas and James Middleton and based at the Victoria Iron Foundry in Smethwick's Rolfe Street; though he won't have worked for them at that address before the 1830s, as Rolfe Street was not laid out and built on until then. If he didn't actually work for the Middleton brothers he might have been employed by one of their many sub-contractors - makers of tubes, angles and brass mounts. There must have been some connection between Thomas Brettell and the Middletons, because (probably as soon as he left school) John Brettell was taken on by the Middletons as an apprentice iron-moulder, possibly following in the footsteps of his elder brother Joseph, who had finished his apprenticeship and was working as an iron-moulder by 1851. The Britannia Bedstead Works was not a particularly large employer by local standards - in 1851 it employed 80 men - but it was profitable enough to enable James Middleton and his wife Elizabeth to live in a house in New Street, North Harborne, and to employ a servant - one of the first they will have had - a cook. John was nearing the end of his seven years as an apprentice on the day of the 1851 census, and was living in James Middleton's household. In 1853, his apprenticeship over, he married James Middleton's daughter Anne (or Ann), at Smethwick's Wesleyan Methodists' chapel.

The early 1850s were a very exciting time to be living in the Black Country. 1851 was the year of the Great Exhibition and two of the district's biggest firms were heavily involved in the creation of the ground-breaking and breath-taking Crystal Palace which housed it: Fox Henderson and Co built the Crystal Palace's steel core; and Chance Brothers, already famous for making windows for Big Ben and the new Houses of Parliament, made its huge expanses of glass. Perhaps John Brettell regretted, from time to time, that he wasn't working for either of those firms. I'm sure he will have made the trip to London to see the Exhibition. The following year was also a landmark year for Smethwick: the London and North Western Railway built a railway station at Spon Lane. However, as so often in Victorian industry, boom and bust existed close together: in 1856 Fox Henderson and Co went bankrupt, a disaster for the local economy as about 2000 local people were economically dependent on the firm, either directly as employees or indirectly through sub-contractors.

T AND J BRETTELL

Perhaps John Brettell had been all set to become a senior employee of Thomas and James Middleton; with maybe even the possibility of being taken into partnership in due course. But if there were any such plans they were upset by one of those tragedies that were all too familiar in Victorian England: Anne Brettell died in childbirth in 1854, and the baby, Samuel Brettell, died as well. John's father Thomas had also died, in 1853, and John Brettell's life took a different course. By 1859 he was one of the proprietors - or possibly the sole proprietor - of T and J Brettell of the Spon Lane Foundry at 193 Spon Lane, iron founders and engineers. The name of the firm has confused me; because I'm not sure which 'T' is 'J's partner in it. At different times, three different men called 'thomas Brettell' may have been involved in the business: John's father (though only for a short time), John's brother, and one of John's sons (other sons also worked for him). However, none of them seem very likely partners to me, for various reasons, and perhaps John always ran the firm alone while remembering his father in the name he chose for it.

By setting up in business for himself in the mid-to-late 1850s, John Brettell may have been able to take advantage of the misfortunes of others by offering work to some of the skilled men made unemployed by the collapse of Fox Henderson and Co. However he may also have learned caution from the misfortunes of that big, but surprisingly vulnerable, firm. In my reading about the industries of Smethwick in the 19th century, I didn't find any mention of T and J Brettell; which means that the firm never got very big, it never dominated the local economy. I found an advert in a Black Country yearbook published some time during the 1890s in which T and J Brettell, iron-founders and machinists, described themselves as makers of boot rivets, nuts and bolts; and I imagine the firm had specialised in these items from its beginnings - products needed by a wide range of other local businesses.

In 1857, with his firm negotiating its first few years, John Brettell married again. His second wife was Elizabeth Nock, the daughter of a man who worked as an engineer on the canals. John and Elizabeth set up home in Harborne; Elizabeth's mother Ellen who lived with them until her death in 1876, aged 84. John and Elizabeth had six children with (like John's father) a preponderance of boys: Edward Nock Brettell, born 1858; Samuel born 1860; Thomas John born 1862; Walter born 1863; Howard Ridsdale born 1865; and the only daughter, Mary Ellen, born 1867. By the day of the 1871 census, the Brettells and Mrs Nock had moved to 68 Union Street, a house they still seemed to be living in, in 1901. By that time, John's foundry was making enough money for him to employ one live-in servant to help his wife with her household chores; by doing so, John and Elizabeth had achieved one of the basic requirements of middle-classness in Victorian Britain. In 1873 there was money enough, or need enough, for a programme of rebuilding walls at the Spon Lane Foundry; perhaps the opportunity was taken, to enclose a larger area. And in the mid-1870s some of the burden of command should have been lifted from John Brettell's shoulders by his eldest son Edward leaving school and starting work in the foundry's offices; except that it didn't work out like that.

On the day of the 1881 census, John and Elizabeth Brettell's youngest child, Mary Ellen, was still at school. All her elder brothers were working, however, and most were still living at home, so I found it quite surprising that the Brettells were still only employing the one live-in servant. The details of how Samuel and Thomas were earning their money are very difficult to read; but Walter was described as "engineer fitter at works" and was probably working the family firm. Howard was employed as a clerk; the census official didn't give any details of where, but information from later in the century suggests that he was not employed by T and J Brettell, which perhaps hadn't got enough work for two sons in the office. Edward had moved out of his parents' house. He had married Elizabeth Povey in 1878, when both of them were 20 - I get the impression that's rather a young age at marriage for people in the lower-middle-classes at the time. Their address was 193 Spon Lane so they must have had rooms within the foundry walls; their daughter Sarah had been born a few weeks before.

So that was the situation at the end of the 1880s when John Brettell was initiated into the GD: family firm in one of the Midlands' basic and best-known industries, with some at least of John's sons working with him and perhaps giving him a little leisure time after many decades of effort.

OUTSIDE INTERESTS

In the 1860s and early 1870s especially, John Brettell probably had little time for leisure: his business was still establishing itself, and his children were too young to be able to help him run it. He did, in 1859, join the Phonetic Society, but this may have been connected with the burdens of his work, not something he was pursuing in any spare time he did have. The Phonetic Society had been founded in 1843 as one of the many ideas put forward by Isaac Pitman. John Brettell, struggling with office work and accounts, perhaps for the first time in his life, probably appreciated the Society's intention of working towards "the general introduction of phonetic spelling both in writing and printing". However, I found very little about the Society on the web; I think it didn't last long and John Brettell was obliged like the rest of us to grapple with the English language as it still is, with all its idiosyncracies.

John Brettell did, in the end, get leisure enough; and he chose to use it by becoming involved in local public life: Sandwell Community History and Archives Service has evidence of him serving in local government. He was also an active supporter of Smethwick's free library. Libraries which anyone could use, without paying a subscription, were such an important feature of 19th-century life. One of the earliest such libraries had been set up in the West Midlands: in 1680, Rev Thomas Hall had founded one in King's Norton. King's Norton looks a little far away from Smethwick for John Brettell to have been a regular borrower or reader there; but he will have known about it and wanted his own town to have something similar. A lot of the voluntary work John did for the free library would have been in the area of seeking donations - books, and money for a suitable building. Smethwick free library was opened in August 1880; and moved to new premises in 1899.

JOHN BRETTELL IN THE GD

John Brettell's involvement with the GD is one of the few pieces of evidence I have for his use of such leisure time as he was able to find. He might have had an interest in the occult from long before he discovered the GD - after all, iron-making is alchemy - but it is the very nature of the occult, that evidence for people being involved in studying it, is hard to find; and the first definite indication that John had an interest in western esotericism is his GD initiation date, April 1888.

It's often hard to figure out how members of the GD came to know about the Order and be recommended as suitable initiates. Most of the GD's earliest initiates were freemason friends of William Wynn Westcott. I haven't found any evidence that John Brettell was a freemason, but he was asked to be present at a ceremony with several other GD members in 1890 - when he had been in the Order for two years - and may have known them for several years before he was initiated.

John Brettell must be the man wrongly spelled and named (by Ellic Howe and Ithell Colquhoun, presumably using the same mis-transcribed source) as 'John W Brettle' who acted as one of the witnesses when GD member Rev William Alexander Ayton officiated at the marriage of GD members Mina Bergson and Samuel Liddell Mathers, on 16 June 1890 at the parish church in Chacombe, just north-east of Banbury in Oxfordshire, where Ayton was the vicar. Mathers was one of the GD's founders, but his interest in western magic was mainly theoretical and theatrical - the translation of important esoteric texts and the creating of magical rituals. I'm more inclined to think that it was Rev Ayton and his wife Anne (also a GD member and the other witness of the Mathers' marriage) that John Brettell knew. Like Mathers, William Ayton was a keen translator of alchemical texts; but he was also a practising alchemist with a laboratory in his basement. He will have required, from time to time, individually made metal bits and pieces for his experiments; and John Brettell might have made and supplied him with those; though how and when the two of them first got to know of each other's existence I cannot explain. They are not likely to have met each other before 1868 when William Ayton became vicar of Edingale in Staffordshire (he moved on to Chacombe in 1873); though they could have corresponded before that time, as William Ayton was at the centre of a web of occult students to whom he lent items from his collection of alchemical manuscripts; but again, I don't know how Ayton and Brettell would have found out about each other - these were very secret, loosely-based groups. The Aytons were actually initiated into the GD a couple of months after John Brettell but that's probably because they were by this time quite elderly and didn't travel a great deal; their initiation had to wait until they made one of their two trips a year to the capital.

It's just possible that it was Samuel Liddell Mathers whom John Brettell knew; not William Ayton; and that they knew each other through the Theosophical Society. There's no question that John Brettell was a member of the TS: there's a membership record for him in the TS's Membership Registers. His application to be a TS member was dated 5 July 1889 - after he'd been a member of the GD for over a year. Most people applying to join the TS at this time needed to be sponsored by two people who were already members. No sponsors' names were noted down in John Brettell's case however. This might just have been a mistake by the TS member compiling the ledger; but in 1888 and 1889 the TS was going through a programme of updating and collecting in one place all the details of all its current members; and those who had been members for a long time were judged not to need sponsors. So: either John Brettell was one of the TS's earliest members; or he was a completely new member but someone forgot to note his sponsors down. I'd actually prefer the second explanation, despite the absence of the names of his sponsors which could have told me so much. The first explanation needs John Brettell to be able to spare the time to visit London on a regular basis to attend TS meetings and to socialise enough at them to be known well by at least some of the TS's senior members. That's not to say he wasn't an enthusiast for theosophy; but by 1888/89 there were quite a few books on the subject that you could read in Smethwick, perhaps even books borrowed from your local free library.

Although John Brettell continued to be a member of both the TS and the GD until his death, he was not able to play a prominent role in either organisation; though he will probably have tried - like the Aytons did - to get to the GD's main London ritual-cum-meeting of the year, held around Whitsun. However, he did do the study required to be eligible for the GD's inner, 2nd Order; he was initiated into it in January 1893. And late in 1896, he felt strongly enough about Mathers' expulsion of Annie Horniman from the GD, to sign the petition to have her reinstated that Frederick Leigh Gardner circulated just before Christmas (to no avail). By this time, any friendship he may have had with the Aytons had become more difficult to pursue: in 1894, Rev William retired from his parish work, and he and Anne left Oxfordshire to live near East Grinstead in Surrey.

John Brettell's reading on theosophy and the study he did for his GD exams (there were exams!) might have been a welcome distraction from family troubles. There's evidence that he and his eldest son - the one most likely to have had the business handed on to him - did not get on. Although Edward Nock Brettell was employed by T and J Brettell in 1881, he probably left it in 1884 - I don't see how you can work for the family firm and run a pub at the same time. For two years from 1884, Edward was the licensee of the Brewers' Arms at the West Bromwich end of Spon Lane, but his career as a publican came to a halt during 1886 when he was unable to pay some of his bills and was taken to Court by one or more of his creditors. Outright bankruptcy was avoided, and the official receiver did find enough money in the accounts for some of the debts to be paid; but it seems that Edward had to return to his old job and his father had to take him back on. On the day of the 1891 census Edward and Elizabeth were living at the Spon Lane Foundry again, with their children Sarah, John, Albert and Mary; and Edward was once again working as an "iron founders' clerk". No doubt both father and son were very fed up about it; and John must have been worried about what would happen to the firm he had founded if it was ever left in the hands of Edward.

At least John's younger sons were turning out all right. By the day of the 1891 census both Walter and Samuel had left home: Walter married Kate Angelina Howle in 1887, Samuel married Clara Hudson in 1888. It's hard to tell from their census entries for 1891 whether they worked for their father, though they probably did (not so sure about Samuel). Walter was employed as a machine fitter, working on lathes; he and Kate were living at 12 Side Street Harborne with their daughter Glendora. Samuel was a turner and fitter in an engine works; he and Clara were also living in Harborne with their son Frederick. Only Mary Ellen, Thomas and Howard were still living at home. The census official didn't note down any employment for Mary Ellen and she probably didn't have a job. Thomas was working as a travelling salesman and Howard was still working as a clerk; evidence from later that decade suggests that neither of them worked for T and J Brettell, they were involved in another of the district's industries, a left-over from its days as farmland - brewing. In 1896 they were both described as "maltster's manager" with Thomas also working as a traveller.

The late 1890s were a time of tragedy and worry for John and Elizabeth Brettell; and it's likely that John - with other things on his mind - was less and less active as a GD member.

The tragedy happened late in 1896: John's sons Thomas and Howard Brettell both died; Thomas in mid-October of a tumour in the brain, Howard in late November, of meningitis. Howard was still single and living at home at the time of his death. But Thomas had married Mary Jane Snape, of Wem in Shropshire, in 1893; they had two small children. John Brettell was left to wind up the financial affairs of Howard, and to help Mary Jane with Thomas's estate; there hadn't been time for either man to write a Will.

I think John Brettell's death might even have been hastened by the deaths of two of his sons; and it might also have been hurried along by eldest son Edward's troubles which ended by becoming something that it was difficult for his family to ignore. John died in February 1901. In his Will he left his personal estate (as opposed to the assets tied up in the business) to Elizabeth for her life. At her death (she lived until 1913) they were divided between his daughter Mary Ellen; his grandchildren Frank Snape Brettell and Kathleen Mary Brettell, the children of his dead son Thomas; and his sons Samuel and Walter who I suppose also inherited the family business. To the troublesome one, Edward Nock Brettell, he left £50, and nothing else.

Mary Brettell and I have been speculating as to quite how much John and Elizabeth Brettell knew, before John died, of the affair between Edward Nock Brettell and Alice Turberfield, the wife of a man who worked on the narrow boats. Of course, it's impossible now to tell when the relationship began. In terms of a broken-down marriage it doesn't mean a great deal, but in 1901 Edward and his wife Elizabeth were still living under the same roof. In 1911 Edward and Alice were living as man and wife in a flat in Aston on the other side of Birmingham. Completing the census form as head of the household, Edward wrote down Alice's name as 'Alice Turberfield Brettell'. They had two children, both with the surname 'Brettell', born in 1907 and 1909. Edward's abandoned wife was described as a widow by the head of her household; she and her three youngest children had moved in with her daughter Sarah Stone and Sarah's husband Thomas. Alice Turberfield had also abandoned a husband and children. Divorce and remarriage in such a case were only for the rich; and even for them the social consequences were very serious. For the less well-off, the options were not even as good as that. And rather than admit to the failure of a marriage and the abandonment of or by a partner, people pretended.

T and J Brettell actually benefited from Edward and Alice running off: Edward left his job at the firm behind him - probably without much regret on either side - and in 1911 he was employed as a time-keeper at a firm of lamp manufacturers. John's other sons managed the family firm well and in 1938 it was still in business, as a limited company. Most of its directors at that time had the surname Cook, but there was one director who was still a Brettell - Kate.

**

BASIC SOURCES I USED for all Golden Dawn members.

Membership of the Golden Dawn: The Golden Dawn Companion by R A Gilbert.
Northampton: The Aquarian Press 1986. Between pages 125 and 175, Gilbert lists the names, initiation dates and addresses of all those people who became members of the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn or its many daughter Orders between 1888 and 1914. The list is based on the Golden Dawn's administrative records and its Members' Roll - the large piece of parchment on which all new members signed their name at their initiation. All this information had been inherited by Gilbert but it's now in the Freemasons' Library at the United Grand Lodge of England building on Great Queen Street Covent Garden.

Family history: freebmd; ancestry.co.uk (census and probate); findmypast.co.uk; familysearch; Burke's Peerage and Baronetage; Burke's Landed Gentry; Armorial Families; thepeerage.com; and a wide variety of family trees on the web. Particularly for the Brettell family: via www.genealogyforum.co.uk to Ancestry where there is a family tree.

Famous-people sources: mostly about men, of course, but very useful even for the female members of GD. Oxford Dictionary of National Biography. Who Was Who. Times Digital Archive.

Catalogues: British Library; Freemasons' Library.

Wikipedia; Google; Google Books - my three best resources. I also used other web pages, but with some caution, as - from the historian's point of view - they vary in quality a great deal.

SOURCES FOR JOHN BRETTELL

FAMILY HISTORY

See Mary Brettell's family web pages at

//freepages.genealogy.rootsweb.ancestry.com/~brettell/BRETTELL/Brettell\_Families.html

During October and November 2014 Mary also sent a series of emails answering my bombardment of queries and correcting my wrong guesses about John Brettell's early life.

ABOUT SMETHWICK v imp indl and comms area

See Wikipedia on Smethwick, now in the Metropolitan Borough of Sandwell

Excellent coverage of the history and architecture of the area at www.british-history.ac.uk, British History Online, using A History of the County of Stafford volume 17 published 1976 in the Victoria County History series. The firm of T and J Brettell is not mentioned anywhere on these web-pages; from which I deduce it was not a big, or a particularly innovative firm.

I saw several adverts for the Middleton's Victoria Iron Foundry while searching with google; all from around 1877-78.

T AND J BRETTELL

Seen at blackcountryhistory.org, in list of archives at Sandwell Archives: a couple of relevant planning applications:

* 1873 one for rebuilding walls, by John Brettell at the Spon Foundry

* 1936 T and J Brettell of Spon Lane, application to build a steel-framed building.

Adverts for T and J Brettell and its products, seen at www.blackcountrybugle.co.uk article posted 2006 by author 'Black Country Bugle User' on adverts appearing in a yearbook undated except to "1890s".

Commercial Directory and Shipper's Guide issue of 1862 Black Country Section.

The Foundry trade journal volume 48 1933, I couldn't see the page number.

PHONETICS

Aims of the Society from List of New Members... Of the Phonetic Society. 24pp issued by the Phonetic Society of Great Britain and Ireland 1851. Published by Isaac Pitman 1852.

The Phonetic Journal volume 18 p434 issue of 10 September 1859 short list of new members.

I also saw on the web a Constitution for the Society published in 1856. The Society's publishers were T and F Brettell of London, distant relations of John Brettell.

LOCAL GOVERNMENT

Unfortunately I couldn't find any evidence on the web about exactly what variety of local government John Brettell was involved in: there were the Poor Law Board, the Vestry (later Urban District Council) and (from 1870) the School Board for him to have got involved in; and you would have to visit Sandwell Archives to resolve the issue.

At www.bookrags.com I found a list of local free libraries in Showell's Dictionary of Birmingham compiled by Thomas T Harman and published in 1885.

At www.emeraldinsight.com I couldn't get through to the full text of Library World volume 1 issue 12 published 1899: but within pages 241-64 there was mention of the opening on 8 May of a new building to house the Smethwick free library. I couldn't see John Brettell's name in the account; the opening ceremony was carried out by a local councillor, name of Jones.

There was a catalogue of Smethwick free library at scans.library.utoronto.ca but I had a lot of trouble trying to get it to download, so I couldn't see the date it was compiled.

FOOTBALLER/MANAGER FRANK BRETTELL

Points at which my GD research touches my first project, the Life and Times of Henry George Norris, are few and far between! But John Brettell was a distant relation of the footballer Frank Brettell who was born in Smethwick though he grew up in Liverpool. See toffeeweb.com, an article by regular contributor Tony Onslow: The Life and Times of Frank Brettell.

PROBLEMATIC CAREER OF EDWARD NOCK BRETTELL

London Gazette 8 March 1887 p1279 a notice issued by Luke Jesson Sharp of Whitehall Chambers, 25 Colmore Row Birmingham, as official receiver.

Brettell and the Brewers' Arms also came up in Law Journal volume 22 1887 p79.

Mary Brettell recommends this website for details of the pub: web page of Hitchmough's Black Country Pubs, copyright Tony Hitchmough 2008.

1911 census at various addresses in the Birmingham area. Mary Brettell and I found family history evidence that could suggest an early date for the onset of the relationship between Edward and Alice; but it's not provable so I've left it out.

Will of John Brettell, 1901, now in the possession of Shane Brettell.

THEOSOPHICAL SOCIETY

Theosophical Society Membership Register covering January 1889 to September 1891 p95.

JOHN BRETTELL IN THE GD

The Magicians of the Golden Dawn: A Documentary History of a Magical Order 1887-1923. Published Routledge and Kegan Paul 1972. Foreword by Gerald Yorke. Pages 97 139, 143.

Sword of Wisdom: MacGregor Mathers and the Golden Dawn, by Ithell Colquhoun. Published London: Neville Spearman 1975: p52.

The Alchemist of the Golden Dawn: Letters of the Revd William Alexander Ayton to Frederick Leigh Gardner and Others 1886-1905 edited and with an introduction by Ellic Howe. Aquarian Press 1985: p77.

6 May 2012

Big revision 15 November 2014 using the information gathered by Mary Brettell of Brisbane Australia, who's a family historian not especially closely related to John and his family; and then by Shane Brettell, farmer in Shropshire.

See Mary Brettell's research at "Some Spon Lane Brettells" pdf document, which you can reach via http://freepages.genealogy.rootsweb.ancestry.com/~brettell/BRETTELL/Brettell\_Families.html.

Contact Sally at Amandragora@attglobal.net

Find the web pages of Roger Wright and Sally Davis, including my list of people initiated into the Order of the Golden Dawn between 1888 and 1901, at:

http://pws.prserv.net/Roger\_Wright/

***

Mary Briggs was initiated into the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn at its Isis-Urania temple in London, on 16 December 1895. She chose the Latin motto 'Per mare ad astra'. She worked through the necessary study quickly and was initiated into the GD's 2nd, inner order on 1 April 1897. W B Yeats regarded her as one of the best seers in the GD. However, I believe she may have dropped out of the GD; possibly in 1900 when she married; but definitely after 1901 when she and her husband went to live in the United States.

A NOTE ON TRYING TO FIND OUT ABOUT VICTORIAN WOMEN

I've said this in other biographies I've written on women members of the GD, though it actually applies to most Victorian men as well: they have left virtually nothing behind them which you can use to write about their lives. In the case of the GD's women, I've been reduced to trying to sketch out what they might have been like by using the sources that exist for the men in the lives. That's true of Mary Briggs. Better than nothing, certainly; but I always end up feeling that I've missed the essence of them.

INTRODUCTION TO THE UPDATE OF OCTOBER 2014

This update, with lots of extra information on Howard Swan, and on Mary Briggs' father and his radical political connections, was prompted by Genevieve Kang of Sydney New South Wales. She has been using the National Library of Australia's on-line newspaper collection, and Pro Quest, to research the ramifications of her own family, the Fergusons. She has also managed to establish contact with Australian descendants of Mary's brother C T Briggs, as a result of which she discovered the existence of Mary's daughter. The connection between Mary Briggs and Genevieve shows how wide Genevieve has been spreading her net: Mary Briggs' niece Amy Briggs married into a branch of the Ferguson family in the 1880s. Many thanks to Genevieve for sending all that wonderful stuff on Mary, Thomas Briggs the first, Howard and his family, and Radia.

THE BRIGGS FAMILY OF SALFORD and the family business

At the beginning of the 19th century, Manchester and Salford were a magnet for young people hoping to better themselves. Thomas Briggs (born around 1809) was one of them, leaving behind the village of Milnthorpe in Westmorland to set up the business that was later called Thomas Briggs (Manchester) Limited. Thomas Briggs was living and working in Manchester by the mid-1830s, and had probably founded the firm by then. Later, production was moved out of the city to Richmond Hill and Springfield Mill in Salford. The firm he founded made canvas covers for railway wagons, tarpaulins and oil cloth, using manufacturing processes which Thomas Briggs patented. By the end of the 19th century it was also making hessian sacks for the transport of dry goods such as sugar and coffee. Not glamorous or exciting products, but very necessary. Thomas Briggs prospered: by 1851 the firm was employing 104 people, and Thomas had been able to move out of industrial Manchester and take on a farm at Great Warford Cheshire. The farm wasn't big - 68 acres - but employed three labourers and probably provided the family with a lot of its food. I shall call this man Thomas Briggs the first as the tale is about to get complicated.

Thomas Briggs the first was married twice. His first wife was Mary, a girl he'd known in Westmorland. They had three children: James; Elizabeth; and (born 1836) the Thomas Briggs I shall call 'the second', who took over the running of the family firm. Mary died in 1866, and at the end of the 1860s Thomas Briggs married a second time and had another five children, the youngest being born in 1877, about 40 years after his first. The huge difference in dates of birth between eldest and youngest half-siblings meant that the youngest few had nieces and nephews that were older than they were.

At some point during the 1860s, Thomas Briggs the first decided to step back from active involvement in his firm and hand over management to the second Thomas. During the 1870s and some at least of the 1880s, Thomas Briggs the second ran the firm in partnership with his sister Elizabeth's husband, John Breakell, and a third man, Andrew McQuade; and the three were also in partnership at Lees near Oldham, as owners of a cotton spinning mill. However, it does seem to have been Thomas Briggs the second who had the major say in the oil cloth firm's continued expansion and in the keeping up of the reputation it had established. Amongst the firm's customers by the end of the century were the War Office, for whom it made canvas tents, and some other government departments, which it supplied with sacking. The second Thomas Briggs was also married twice. His first wife was his sister-in-law Mary Jane Ellis, sister of his brother James's wife Sarah Ann Ellis; they were the daughters of Samuel Ellis and his wife Jane, née Irlam. Mary Jane died young, though, and then he married Emily Gittings. Both marriages produced large families. By the 1880s he, Emily and Thomas the second's children by both wives were living at a house called Hazelslack, on Old Hall Road in the exclusive Salford suburb of Broughton Park. The eldest of Thomas Briggs the second's daughters was the Amy Briggs whose marriage (in 1883) led to Genevieve Kang getting in touch with me. Amy married Robert Ferguson Miller, of R F Miller and Co, chartered accountants in Salford.

Thomas Briggs the second died in 1894 and management of the firm passed into the hands of his son, the third Thomas Briggs, Thomas Ellis Briggs. There doesn't seem to have been any decline in the firm's reputation and amount of business under the third generation's leadership and in 1905, as well as its offices in Manchester and its mills in Salford, the firm had two depots in London and one depot each in Liverpool, Glasgow, Belfast and Dublin.

THOMAS BRIGGS THE FIRST, AND SARAH JANE BREAKELL

In 1868, Thomas Briggs the first got married for the second time, to a woman 30 years his junior, the sister of his daughter Elizabeth's husband. Sarah Jane Breakell had been born in central Manchester in 1839, to John and Mary Breakell. John Breakell was a book-keeper and worked for the same firm - Samuel and Thomas Ashton, of York Street Manchester - for 42 years. In 1841 he and his family were living on Regent Road Salford. John was earning enough by this stage to employ one general servant. However, he died in 1848, aged only 54 and there's evidence that his wife and daughters may have struggled, financially, in the next few years. In the early 1860s Mary Breakell was living in Southport, trying to make ends meet by taking in lodgers; but on the day of the 1861 census, no lodgers were living in her house at 11 Higher Bold Street, North Meols. She got married for a second time in 1864, to a widower with the wonderful name of Caesar Lawson.

John and Mary Breakell's son John William also trained as a book-keeper, and this is how he described himself to the census official in 1861. By that time, however, he had married Elizabeth, daughter of Thomas Briggs the first; and the marriage led in due course to his becoming a partner of his brother-in-law, Thomas Briggs the second, in the oil cloth and cotton spinning businesses. Later, he ran his own quarrying and colour manufacturing firm although he did go bankrupt around 1890.

THOMAS BRIGGS THE FIRST IN RETIREMENT

Thomas Briggs the first had radical political views and had done some active campaigning in support of them even while still running the family firm. He had been a member of the Anti-Corn Law League, through which he had met its leader in Parliament, Richard Cobden. Thomas Briggs the first and Cobden had a lot in common: whatever education they had obtained, they had got for themselves; they had both built up businesses in Manchester from very humble beginnings; and they saw the repealing of the corn laws as only part of a wider campaign for the abolition of all restraints to complete free trade. In this context, slavery was seen as a kind of protectionism. Thomas Briggs was an opponent of slavery at a time when the British cotton industry was dependent on supplies of raw cotton from the slave-owning estates of the southern United States. His views didn't endear him to his fellow businessmen in Manchester, but they brought him into contact with many American anti-slavery campaigners including the political economist Henry George, their friendship lasting until Thomas Briggs the first's death.

With slavery abolished in the USA and the Civil War over, Thomas Briggs the first turned his attention to the need (as he saw it) for financial reforms in Britain. Between 1868 and 1875 a series of pamphlets advocating free trade and direct taxation were published, based on talks given by Thomas Briggs the first at the annual congresses of the National Association for the Promotion of Social Science (NAPSS) and at the East India Association. Thomas Briggs the first also joined the Financial Reform Association, which in the 1890s and 1900s had as its secretary GD member James W S Callie. The FRA was a protégé organisation of the Gladstone family and I imagine that as a member, Thomas Briggs the first became acquainted with Henry Gladstone and possibly even the Liberal Prime Minister, Henry's brother William Ewart Gladstone. Henry George was inclined to criticise the FRA and other British free trade campaigners for not having the courage of their convictions when it came to abolishing British laws protecting owners of property. However, he exempted Thomas Briggs the first from this general criticism, saying that he had "constantly advocated the carrying of free trade to its final conclusions" - those conclusions being the complete abolition of private property. A radical indeed!

THOMAS BRIGGS IN LONDON

After their marriage, Thomas the first and Sarah Jane moved to Richmond, south-west of London, and never lived in Manchester or Salford again. The GD's Mary Briggs was the eldest of their five children. She was born in 1869 and named after a number of Marys already in the family. Her full siblings were John Frederick (born 1872), Maggie (born 1873), Frank Cobden (born 1875 and named in honour of his father's friend Richard Cobden) and Charles Tennant (born 1877, the last of Thomas Briggs the first's sprawling brood).

On the day of the census 1871, James Briggs and his wife and family were visiting Thomas Briggs the first and his wife and family at their house, Holmstead, on Sion Row in Richmond. Despite the large number of people staying in his house on census day, Thomas Briggs the first was employing rather fewer servants than I would expect - just the two, and a nurse. James' wife had given birth only a few days before and was not (according to the customs of the time) likely to be able to travel for several weeks. However, James could spare the time for a long visit to his father - he had not joined the family business. In a big step up the social ladder for the Briggs family, he had been ordained as a priest in the Church of England. However, he was not working as a parish priest on census day and was, I suppose, maintaining his family with income from the family firm. His health seems to have been uncertain: he died in 1874, in his early forties leaving a wife and seven daughters.

By 1881 Thomas and Sarah Jane had moved from Richmond to Dulwich and were living in Bela House, Allwyn Park. Sarah Jane's mother Mary (now widowed for a second time) and her unmarried sister Maria Abigail were living with them and the household now employed a nurse, a housemaid, and a dressmaker, though I find it a bit odd that they didn't have a cook. There was a governess, Anna Munkton (sic - there are so many different ways to spell this surname!) for Maggie, Frank and Charles; but neither John Frederick nor Mary was at home. I couldn't find Mary anywhere in the UK; perhaps she was at school abroad. Back in Broughton Park Salford, Mary's half-brother Thomas Briggs the second, his wife Emily and their children were already living at the house called Hazelslack. Their next-door neighbours, George R Clayton and his wife Caroline, had some visitors: the writer and needlework expert Sophia Caulfeild and her journalist friend Dora de Blaquièrre. Dora was initiated into the GD in 1888, six years before Mary Briggs was. If Dora met any member of the Briggs family on that visit to the Claytons, she may have sought out the Briggs's who lived in Dulwich when she and Sophia returned to London; so that Mary would have known Dora from her early teens. Dora had recently moved to England from Paris and might have been looking to build up a network of acquaintances here.

I find it annoying and depressing how many male political radicals return home and leave their views behind them at the front door. Thomas Briggs' expectations for his daughters were limited to what was the badge of status of the middle-classes: a life of charity work, visiting, and social engagements while they waited to marry someone; then, the same life with the addition of child-bearing and household management, only dominated by a husband not a father. His daughters were all educated to this very limited end. Of course, Thomas Briggs and his wife were new entrants to the middle-classes, still finding their feet and probably anxious not to draw attention to themselves. Mary and her sister may have been conscious, as a result, of needing to conform to some rather narrow preconceptions. If Mary might have preferred a more challenging education and a different kind of life to the one her parents envisaged for her, I couldn't find any evidence of it. On the day of the 1891 census, Mary Briggs was carrying out at least one item on the normal programme for a young middle-class woman - she was visiting. She had gone to see the family's ex-governess, Anna, who had married Henry William Morris. Anna and Henry William were living at 11 High Street, Thame Oxfordshire. Henry Morris described himself to the census official as a chemist, which I presume means that he ran his own pharmacy in the town. It's probably not a coincidence that on census day Thomas Briggs and Frank were staying in lodgings in Christchurch operated by a Miss Mary Monckton; I found some information on the census to indicate that Anna Morris and Mary Monckton were sisters (despite their surnames being spelled differently by different census officials). Sarah Jane Briggs, John Frederick, Maggie and Charles were at home, which by this time was 70 St Ann's Hill Wandsworth, the address Mary gave when she joined the GD.

Until the late 1880s there had been a great deal of continuity in Mary's life. But a period of uncertainty had begun for her in 1887 with the death of her grandmother, Mary Breakell Lawson. Then the businesses run by Mary's aunt's husband John William Breakell, went bankrupt. By the early 1890s the health of Thomas Briggs the first was causing concern. He was now over 80 and on the day of the 1891 census he was staying in lodgings by the sea in Dorset, probably on the orders of his doctor. He died, of a chill that turned into pleurisy and pneumonia, at home in Wandsworth, in April 1892, worrying to the end about who would carry on the baton of arguing for free trade after he was gone. (No one in his family did, that I can see.) Thomas Briggs the second was one of his executors, representing the firm's interests as well as the family. Only a few months after her father's death, Mary's half-sister Elizabeth Breakell also died, aged 60 (Mary was 22 or 23).

Now a widow, Sarah Jane Briggs was probably not short of money - she was even able to stay at 70 St Ann's Hill for the next few years. However, there was more change for the family to negotiate in the mid-1890s. Thomas Briggs the second only survived his father by two years, dying shortly after he had completed the acquisition of the Barrow Flax and Jute Company Limited, which I imagine was meant just to be a particular high point in the expansion of the firm, not the end of his contributions to it. Mary's first cousin Thomas Ellis Briggs took over the business; but although Thomas Briggs the first had been buried back in Cheshire (in a family plot in the church at Prestwich), old ties with Salford were being replaced by ones in London and further afield. Mary and Maggie, now in their mid-twenties, may have gained a little more freedom as a result of the years of upheaval and mourning; and it was in these changing circumstances that Mary joined the GD.

MARY IN THE GOLDEN DAWN

Mary was an enthusiastic GD member - witness the speed at which she got through the work needed to reach the 2nd Order. The GD had given her intellectual challenges like she'd never been offered before; she got stuck into the required study with a will. In 1897, although she was one of the 2nd Order's newest members she was also one of the keenest, and took on the secretarial work of notifying members of forthcoming rituals. Unfortunately, in July, she somehow left Frederick Leigh Gardner's name off her list of members and didn't send him the letter giving details of the ritual due on 7 August; and he was not the kind of person who would excuse her mistake as 'just one of those things'. He found out about the ritual through other GD members and wrote to Mary about her lapse in such language that she complained about it to Florence Farr, the current Praemonstrator. For Florence this was the last straw, because Mary's complaint was just the latest in quite a long line of them - many members found Gardner's attitude was not what they expected from a fellow member of a magical Order. Mary was not the only person hurt and offended by his abrasive and condescending manner; and Florence was getting fed up at fielding complaints about Gardner's way of taking command of the rituals - more like a drill-sergeant than a celebrant. In this way Mary contributed her mite to Florence's decision to ban Gardner from taking any further part in Isis-Urania's rituals; she told him to go to the Horus Temple in Bradford and join in their rituals instead.

The incident with Gardner was upsetting but in general, Mary's experiences in the GD were very positive and she was seen as a productive and skilled member. It's infuriating but I haven't been able to see a very good piece of evidence for the kind of thing Mary Briggs was doing when she was in the GD: it's a manuscript called (in a kind of shorthand) Visions on The Paths, Explorations of Paths in Tree, now in the Yeats papers in Eire. The manuscript was Mary's notes on a series of visions she had between 8 July and 21 September 1897 in which she focused her attention on the Kabbalistic tree of life - presumably that part of the GD syllabus for study that most appealed to her. She showed the results of her visions to Yeats (and probably others), and Yeats was particularly impressed by one vision, in which the Ark of the Covenant gave Mary details of how to use the image of the sphinx to search out past and future lives. Mary showing Yeats the results of her visions was timely, because Yeats was trying to get a project started on the theme of re-visiting and re-creating Irish myths. He asked Mary to be a member of a small group he was forming to do some astral travelling and see what they could en-vision in the way of old Irish gods and goddesses. Writing to GD member Dorothea Hunter, asking her and her husband Edmund to join the group as well, he described Mary as "one of the best of our seers". Mary was delighted to be asked and suggested to Yeats that she and Dorothea spend an evening, just the two of them, working on "some visions of the Divine World".

Yeats's en-visioning group of GD members held their first session on 29 December 1897 in the 2nd Order rooms at 36 Blythe Road Hammersmith. Yeats, Mary, Ada Waters, Dorothea Hunter, Dorothea's husband Edmund, and William Forsell Kirby were all there. There was a second session, round the table at the Hunters' house in Chiswick on 1 January 1898, with more or less the same people present except that Ada Waters couldn't go, and Florence Farr did go. Mary acted as scribe at least at the second session and probably at both of them, writing down what everyone saw in them, even drawing little sketches of the gods and goddesses who appeared in their visions. No more sessions took place, however, and although Yeats kept writing to people about his Celtic project for several more months in early 1898, and went to see the Mathers about it in Paris, the scheme seems to have petered out for some reason. Mary must have been disappointed.

GOLDEN DAWN, CHEMISTRY AND ELECTRICITY

I think of the GD, and late 19th-century science, as having more in common than either side would have liked to admit: they were both searching for explanations of how the universe worked, particularly the universe that no one could really see but which was obviously acting on the world that people could experience. Magic, theosophy, even spiritualism thought of this world beyond sight as full of beings with powers that - perhaps - people could access or even use. Some GD members even believed that when human beings died, they were reincarnated as those beings: this was the essence of 'spiritism', a version of spiritualism put forward by the French psychic Allan Kardec. GD member Anna Blackwell translated Kardec's major works into English in the 1870s and was widely known as his most active English-speaking defender. Such beliefs also informed the visions and visionary writings of the American Thomas Lake Harris; GD members Edward William Berridge, Charles W Pearce and Isabella Duncan were followers of Harris. Science rejected the idea of a universe full of beings with amazing powers, of course, preferring explanations involving forces like electro-magnetism and chemical elements. But by the 1890s scientific discoveries were challenging old theories. What were X-rays? - discovered by Wilhelm Roentgen in 1895. Or radio-waves? - Heinrich Hertz demonstrated that you could detect them and even produce them, in experiments between 1888 and 1894. GD members might have considered that x-rays and radio-waves could be thought of along lines that Arthur C Clarke later formulated into his Law that any sufficiently advanced technology looks like magic.

Mary Briggs' life in the 1890s was balanced between the two approaches. On the one hand there was the GD, where rituals were carried out to offer the opportunity for beings from the world beyond sight to bring new knowledge to suitably prepared magicians. On the other hand there were Mary's brothers, who had inherited the technical interests of their father and chosen to work in contemporary science. Perhaps Mary had inherited these interests as well; but as a woman, she was given no chance to follow them up through a career in science, or even - probably - by studying them seriously. Only magic was open to her and at least it made good use of her psychic and artistic talents and her imagination.

The eldest of Mary's three brothers, John Frederick, trained and worked as an analytical chemist: that is, he studied the properties of chemicals and the way complex chemicals were put together from simpler elements; and worked out how chemicals could be used in the service of Man. I haven't found out where John Frederick studied chemistry, but he joined the Chemical Society in 1893 in the same batch of newly-qualified men as Julian Levett Baker, who had trained at Finsbury Technical College. Baker and his close friend, chemical engineer Cecil Jones, had one foot in each camp as regards explanations of how the universe worked: although trained as chemists in the latest manner, they were both interested in the subject's roots in medieval alchemy; and both joined the GD. Baker was universally friendly; it seems inconceivable to me that he didn't know John Frederick Briggs, at least as a professional acquaintance; and Mary may have met Baker through John Frederick. At the very least Mary would have been aware of chemistry as a descendant of alchemy, and as an alternative to the GD's magic, in explaining the universe's mysteries. However, John Frederick was never in the GD himself: by 1893 he had moved to Madras (Chennai) to work for Parry and Co.

Mary's younger brothers both became engineers. Frank Cobden Briggs died in 1904. After training as an electrical engineer, Frank had gone to work for the electric lighting department of the Postal Telegraph Factory. He was elected an Associate of the Institute of Electrical Engineers in 1894. I think he was still in the same job on census day 1901, living in the Midlands.

Mary's brother, the youngest child of Thomas Briggs the first, was Charles Tennant Briggs, better known as C T Briggs. He specialised in mechanical engineering and there is a biography of him that focuses on his contributions to the technology of coal-fired power - the GD's Cecil Jones was doing similar work in the 1890s. Charles was working in the north of England around 1904 - at the end of that year he married Clara Clark in Newcastle-upon-Tyne. They emigrated to Australia around 1910, probably to South Australia where he was employed by Messrs Charles Atkins and Co Ltd of Adelaide in 1919. Later, he was one of the first employees of the Australian State Electricity Commission and remained on its staff until 1943, when he went into private practice. He died in 1954 in Mornington, south of Melbourne, Victoria. He and Clara had a large family and he has descendants in Australia, including his biographer.

Even Mary's brother-in-law was a scientist. Mary's sister Maggie married Sydney George Starling in 1899. He was a physics teacher, employed by West Ham council at least until 1911. He had a long parallel or second career as a writer of physics and maths textbooks for Longmans and Macmillans. Some of the books originally written by him and his co-author John Duncan were still in use in the 1950s, re-written several times to take account of the extraordinary developments in the subjects during the first half of the 19th century - the work of Einstein and the quantum theorists and the splitting of the atom, to name three.

HOWARD SWAN

It's very likely that it was through her brothers' friends that Mary Briggs met her future husband, Howard Swan, who was trained as an electrical engineer, and also a member of the Society of Telephone Engineers; although he doesn't seem to have worked as either for more than a short time. Howard was over a decade older than Mary's brothers and perhaps more en-meshed in the mid-Victorian certainties: his writings in the 1890s show him trying to maintain his Christian belief in an age increasingly dominated by the scientific-materialist view of how the world worked. Mary may have known these religious struggles in her own life.

Howard Swan, his sister Mabel and his brother Godfrey, were children of Henry Swan and his wife Emily Elizabeth, née Connell. Both his parents were Quakers, and they had met in London in the 1850s, where Emily's family lived and Henry Swan had moved to train as an engraver. While he had been in London, Henry Swan had attended some of the classes Ruskin taught at the Working Men's College, and the two men had become friendly despite their very different backgrounds. Impressed by Henry Swan's skills, Ruskin asked him to engrave some of the plates for his book Modern Painters; once qualified, Henry also worked for Isaac Pitman. His interests spread a lot wider than his work, however: he experimented with photographic techniques; and invented a system of musical notation and one of writing English phonetically. Though he was better at inventing things than he was at publicising them and earning money from them. After Henry and Emily were married in 1859, they moved to Sheffield, where Henry set up in business there. Ruskin often visited them there, so Howard must have known him quite well. During one particular visit, in 1875, the idea was born between John Ruskin and Henry Swan of creating a museum that would focus on the history and traditions of iron-working in the area. Later that year Ruskin bought a cottage in the village of Walkley, within walking distance of the city, and gave Henry Swan the job of curator at what became known as St George's Museum. Henry, Emily and Howard moved out of Sheffield to rooms at the Museum. Henry Swan was a diligent worker and the number of exhibits rapidly outgrew the space available in the cottage; so that Howard's teenage years were spent in the midst of an increasing clutter of industrial artefacts and of building work, as extensions were added to the original cottage.

The life of Howard Swan deserves a biography; though as he was never in the GD, I'm not going to do one myself. His interests and talents were as wide and multifarious as his father's and he clearly inherited many of his father's skills.

By 1881, Howard had left school and begun work as a clerk at a Sheffield steel works. However, within a few years (probably by 1886) he had left office life behind and moved to London in search of new scientific skills, particularly those connected with lighting. One source from his later life seems to suggest that he'd got this technical education at the City and Guilds College in London, now part of Imperial College London.

Howard Swan was certainly living in London by 1889. In the late 1880s he and John Ruskin were working together on a catalogue of St George's Museum, which was published in 1888, a few months before Henry Swan died. As well as working on that catalogue, Howard was a member of the Institution of Electrical Engineers and assistant editor of its magazine and was also employed as a demonstrator at University College London. Comments he made in 1899 and 1890 on two papers heard at Institution meetings led to his being involved in two important publications: Electrical Distribution, its Theory and Practice published in 1893; and the first volume of Practical Electrical Engineering: A Complete Treatise... published in 1894; though he was not the main author of either work. As late as 1897, by which time he was very very busy with other projects, he still found time to do some work on how the eye reacts to light and to sound. And he continued to keep up with scientific publications into the early 1900s.

It was probably because works on the fast-moving fields of electricity and engineering were being published as much in other languages as in English that Howard first became interested in learning the basics of a foreign language quickly. He himself had already learned two foreign languages - one dead (Greek, for bible study) and one living (French). In 1891 or 1892 he met François Gouin (1831-96) in Paris, while on an assignment for the Institution of Electrical Engineers to cover an exhibition for its magazine. Gouin was developing a method of quick language-learning where students learned to remember foreign words by associating them with particular objects, pictures and even gestures; for this reason it was often referred to as the 'psychological' method of language learning. By the early 1890s Gouin already had one man, Victor Betis, working for him; but he authorised Howard to write the preface to the first translation into English of his book L'art d'enseigner et d'étudier les langues - the art of teaching and studying languages, published in Britain in 1892. The book launched Howard on a third career (he was just over 30), as a promoter - some commentators even called him a disciple - of the Gouin language-learning system. An important step along the way was taken when Howard cornered the journalist W T Stead in the office of Stead's magazine Review of Reviews, and persuaded him to write an article publicising the Gouin system. He also lectured widely on the subject - George Bernard Shaw went to hear him at the Latin Hall in Gray's Inn in May 1892, and going to one of these lectures might have been another way in which Mary first came across him. The lecture Shaw went to was aimed at the general public, but Howard also spoke to teachers and later became an advisor on language teaching to the London School Board.

Howard and Victor Betis went into partnership. As a result of their work, Gouin's methods of language learning became very popular in the UK and the USA in the 1890s and 1900s, with the 1892 translation in its sixth edition by 1906, and schools teaching languages using the Gouin method opening in London and several American cities. Howard and Betis collaborated on two different series of textbooks. One, with the overall title Facts of Life, purported to translate a Gouin original; but a reviewer in the magazine Education Outlook commented that Howard Swan and Victor Betis were no longer sticking religiously to Gouin's methods - they had begun introducing their own improvements to his ideas. A slightly different series was the one with the over-arching title Travellers' Colloquial..., the sort of handbook a tourist could use, beginning with a volume for Italian and including one for Spanish although Spain was not yet a popular tourist destination.

The Central School of Foreign Tongues was founded in London to teach the Gouin method, with Howard Swan and Victor Betis as joint owners; though in 1896 Betis went to Boston to set up the first Gouin school in America, leaving Howard as sole director of the London School. The School's address in 1894 was Howard House, Arundel Street in the Strand. Courses lasted two months and by 1896 the curriculum had broadened out from the original French classes to include German, Italian and Greek. Perhaps Mary took some classes at the School. Howard also founded a school to teach Classics using the Gouin method. The school was open to boys and girls and was in Bedford Park in West London, where several GD members lived.

In the late 1890s - at the time that Mary Briggs was most involved with the GD - Howard Swan was getting through an amazing amount of work. 1899 was an annus mirabilis for him with a novel set in South Africa; two poems for children; a play about the Dreyfus case; a 'fairy tale' about Old Age pensions; several works on the Boer war; and a religious work published. His Quaker beliefs informed his politics and some of his published works; and he was a member of the Fabian Society. He still made time to attend Quaker services where people came together in silence to contemplate God's word. An article by Howard appeared in 1900 in which he talked of how important the Quaker habit of silent devotion still was in his life. The GD also emphasised the importance of silent focus on the end in view, so the Quaker way was something Mary Briggs would have been able to appreciate; although I'm not sure from the sources I found that she went so far as to join the Society of Friends. Nor could I find any evidence that she was a Fabian - at least, not from sources available on google.

Howard's answer to the problems of Christian belief in the era beyond Darwin and Lyall was to attempt to do what one reviewer called a "retranslation" of parts of the Bible he thought could still be relevant in an increasingly science-based and materialist age. His book The Voice of the Spirit was published in four volumes in 1898. The 4th volume presented Howard's modernisations of the Gospel of St Matthew and the Letter of St Paul to the Galatians; translated from the Greek. In a long preface, Howard spoke particularly to scientists, urging them not to limit their imagination to what they could see or prove, to accept that Man was Spirit as well as Body and that the Spirit was a Force of nature which was governed by laws which could be used if understood. Like many authors either in the GD or known to members of the GD, Howard was sure that Man was on the threshold of some great revelation, that the "final Unveiling" of Jesus' Truth was near at hand. He quotes St John's Gospel (the most gnostic of the four) and Plato in his Preface and I thought I could detect some theosophy in his argument though he wasn't a member of the Theosophical Society as far as I know.

Perhaps the arguments of people like Percival Lowell that there was intelligent life on Mars added to Howard's feeling of being on the threshold of something. He used his electrical engineering knowledge in an article for Anglo-Saxon review in which he speculated on what sort of message intelligent Martians might send to Earth and how they might send it. Geometry, and radio waves were his answer.

I wonder if Howard introduced Mary Briggs to John Ruskin? I haven't discovered any GD members so far (May 2014) who knew the grand old man of art criticism and I'm afraid that it's not likely that Mary did. By the time Mary and Howard met Ruskin was in poor health, living a retired life at his house in Coniston. He died there in January 1900, a few months before Mary and Howard Swan were married. Their marriage led to a further opening up of both their lives though they both had to leave a great deal behind as well, including Mary's involvement in the GD. They were still in England on the day of the 1901 census but I think it can't have been very long after that day that they went to America; they might even have been and returned already. Howard certainly got some higher qualifications in the United States, and Mary would have broaden her outlook; though as I mentioned above when talking about the education she is likely to have been given, her life as a married woman was dictated by her husband's work and the places he was employed in. Of course, she may not ever have thought of it in those terms. On the contrary, she may have seen her marriage as liberating, especially if she had always wanted to travel. Once married, travel she got, in full measure.

Howard and Mary went to the USA so that Howard could do postgraduate study at Harvard and at Berkeley universities. He studied language and linguistics, rather than electrical engineering. It may have been at this time that he got his qualification in teaching English as a second language; and when he first began to learn Esperanto - which I should think he found fascinating, as a recently constructed language. When Howard had completed his studies to his satisfaction, he and Mary spent a short time back in England before going by sea from Southampton via Vancouver BC to Japan. It's not clear whether Howard had a job to go to before they set sail, but once in Japan, he became a professor at the University of Tokyo. Part of his job there may have been preparing the book published as Thesaurus of Everyday English in 1903, one of the earliest aids to learning English for Japanese-speaking people; he worked on this with Senkichi Katsumata. Howard also wrote a travel book, covering the long voyage to Japan and some tales of his and Mary's life there: Flashes From the Far East was published in 1902 in America but probably not in the UK. Subtitled 'book one' it was meant to be the first part of a series, but I haven't found any evidence that any sequels were published.

The job at Tokyo university seems to have been a temporary contract. After about two years in Japan, Mary and Howard went on to China. If Mary had wanted to see what life was like on the edge, China was a good place to go. As in Japan, Mary would have found herself in a situation that mirrored her family life in the 1890s - ideas ancient and modern jostling for position, co-existing uneasily. However, while Howard could still associate Japan with Gilbert and Sullivan (in his travel book he calls Japan 'Mikado land'), as the Qing dynasty staggered towards its end, China was an increasingly unpredictable and lawless place to live. Howard got a job for six months in Suchow/Soochow - now Suzhou - the trading city in the delta of the Yangtse River. After six months there, he and Mary moved on again, when Howard was offered a job for six months at a college in Taiyuan-fu, Shanxi province, setting up an English language course. He and Mary must have known Taiyuan-fu's recent history; I'm not sure whether they were brave or foolhardy, being willing to move there. In the 1890s Taiyuan-fu was a centre of baptist missionary work in China. In July 1900 the city's governor took advantage of the breakdown of law and order resulting from Boxer rebellion to do his best to eliminate the missionaries - 45 were murdered in Taiyuan-fu on his orders. In 1901 once the authority of the Qing dynasty government had been restored, compensation was levied on the whole province as a punishment. Some of the money was used to found the Shanxi Imperial University, which may have been where Howard was employed; although there was also a Western College in the city. Both institutions were headed by a baptist minister, Rev Timothy Richard.

After the end of the job in Taiyuan-fu, Mary and Howard went to Peking. Howard had heard rumours of a job being available at the university there, and on 21 September 1904 he called on the very influential British diplomat Ernest Satow to put himself forward for the post. Making a note in his diary about the interview, Satow was not overly enthusiastic: he wrote that Howard had been "Very full of his way of doing it"; but he had decided that Howard was a good person to recommend for the job, and had asked Howard to call back a few days later to pick up a letter of recommendation. The episode resulted in Howard being appointed a professor at the Imperial College of Languages in Peking; a job he held until early 1906.

Control of Peking, of course, had been a main target of the Boxer rebellion forces. European residents of Peking and a large number of Chinese converts to Christianity had been besieged for 55 days in the foreign quarter of the City in 1900 by forces taking part in the Boxer rebellion. The siege had been lifted not by the imperial army but by a force of western troops. The rebellion had eventually fizzled out but foreign residents of China were still not very safe - the Qing dynasty had given tacit support to rebel attempts to rid the country of their presence.

It was possible that while Mary and Howard were living in Peking Mary met (or met again) GD member Vyvyan Dent; though whether GD members knew each other outside GD rituals and meetings is always difficult to tell and tends to depend on the individuals involved. Vyvyan Dent had been born in Shanghai. He worked for the Imperial Maritime Customs department and was stationed in Peking in the early 1900s though I haven't been able to ascertain exactly when he was there. As an old China hand (he had been born there) and a collector of Chinese Buddhist artefacts, he would have been a good guide for Howard and Mary to the districts of Peking outside the foreign enclaves, if they had wanted to visit them.

Though teaching at the Imperial College of Languages was probably in English, Howard had already picked up enough Chinese to read Confucius and to read and try to translate Laotzu - his work with those classical Chinese philosophers was part of his calling-card when meeting with Ernest Satow. From classical Chinese, Howard duly moved on, to take an interest in Chinese dialects. And after his American training in the building-blocks of language, he was developing a method of transliterating the characters of Chinese language writing into the western alphabet.

How did Mary manage? - having been married for four years by the end of 1904, she had lived with her husband briefly in England, on the east and the west coasts of the United States, in Japan and in Tokyo. Living in her mother's household until her marriage, she perhaps lacked experience in the decision-making of running her own household, and those years of continually packing up and moving on were not an ideal way to learn. Her households in the Far East probably had more servants than she had ever had to deal with before - salaries going a lot further in Japan and China - but they were servants whose command of English may have been as slight as Mary's command of Japanese and Chinese.

Mary can scarcely have had Howard's ability to learn foreign languages - very few people are blessed that way - but she will have needed to pick up enough Chinese to get by, even if all she could manage was giving orders to the servants. And - with her husband either studying or working - how did she spend her days? The end of 1904 may have been a difficult period for her, after the news had reached her of her brother Frank's death: she must have felt particularly cut adrift as she mourned him.

On the other hand, maybe she enjoyed every minute.

By having moved on from San Francisco by 18 April 1906 Mary and Howard missed being caught in the San Francisco earthquake. However, they had friends in the town about whom they were very worried as the extent of the devastation became clear. They had a photograph of themselves taken in Peking by the Japanese photographer S Yamamoto, and sent it to their friends the Nash family - Mr, Mrs, and their daughters Fredericka and Carolyn - to say how glad they were to hear that the Nashes were all still alive. The photograph shows Mary and Howard in the company of several men in Chinese dress; perhaps some of Howard's colleagues at the College, or Mary's household servants.

Shortly after the photograph was taken, Mary and Howard were on the road again - back to the USA, though not to San Francisco. In June 1906, a profile of Howard appeared in the Los Angeles Sunday Times, as a newcomer to the town. Howard doesn't actually seem to have had a job to go to when he and Mary arrived - he had told the newspaper that he was intending to stay in Los Angeles for about a year, campaigning for a reform of language teaching. Howard quickly made contact with James Main Dixon of the University of Southern California, who arranged for him to deliver a series of lectures on Esperanto. Los Angeles had an active Esperantist Society and by the autumn, the YMCA had been persuaded to set up a course for beginners in Esperanto, which Howard taught during the academic year 1906-1907. He also taught French, English as a second language, and a specialist class for language teachers who wanted to use the Gouin method.

It was during the time that she and Howard were moving from China back to California that Mary became pregnant. Her only child, a daughter, was born in Los Angeles in December 1906, and given the modern and significant name of Radia.

In the years 1901 to 1907, Mary Swan became one of the most widely-travelled members of the GD. It's such a pity she didn't write up her experiences; but I suppose she never thought to do so. Her world travels ended in 1908. She and Howard were back in England early that year, when an advert for Howard's Gouin school in London - which had been going throughout Howard's long absence - advertised him as a teacher not just of languages, but of psychology, phonetics and teaching method. Family concerns may have played a part in the decision to return home. Howard's mother Emily Swan may never have felt particularly settled in Yorkshire: after her husband's death she had moved south again and by the early 1900s she was living in north London. Over the next few years, however, Emily's mental state had declined to the point where she needed professional care. On their return from China, Howard and Mary set up home in Ilford, near where Mary's mother and sister both lived. A place was found for Emily Swan at the Quaker mental hospital The Retreat in York; where she died in January 1909. Mary herself may have been ill by 1908 - another reason to return to England. Perhaps she had not recovered well after Radia's birth - she was 37 when her daughter was born. She died on 30 October 1909 at Lausanne, Switzerland, at the age of 39.

Information on Howard Swan and Radia Mary Swan after Mary's death has been hard to come by. Most of what there is has been found for me by Genevieve Kang. Howard did at least one more, small, piece of language work, writing a preface to Fannie Ball Perrin's The Method of the Whole Series (a book about the teaching of English grammar) in 1911. I think it must have been in connection with Fannie Ball Perrin's book that he was in St Louis Missouri in April 1910 - he appears on its list of residents on the day of the 13th United States census.

Perhaps feeling that as a widower he was unable to take proper care of his daughter, Howard allowed Radia to be brought up by a couple in Cincinnati; though she kept her original surname and he was living near her while she was at school in Cincinnati. He died in Hamilton Ohio in 1919; Radia was living and teaching in Hamilton in 1930. Radia had the kind of education that Mary Briggs could only have dreamed of: a university degree and a masters in fine art and literature. Like two of her female relations, she had considerable talent as an artist - works by her can be seen on the web and are in a number of American galleries. She kept her painting as a leisure-time pursuit and then a retirement interest, however; she was a career teacher. She married Erwin Pfingstag in 1933 but they don't seem to have had any children. Radia kept in touch all her life with her first cousins in Australia, the children of Charles Tennant Briggs.

BASIC SOURCES I USED for all Golden Dawn members.

Membership of the Golden Dawn: The Golden Dawn Companion by R A Gilbert. Northampton: The Aquarian Press 1986. Between pages 125 and 175, Gilbert lists the names, initiation dates and addresses of all those people who became members of the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn or its many daughter Orders between 1888 and 1914. The list is based on the Golden Dawn's administrative records and its Members' Roll - the large piece of parchment on which all new members signed their name at their initiation. All this information had been inherited by Gilbert but it's now in the Freemasons' Library at the United Grand Lodge of England building on Great Queen Street Covent Garden. Please note, though, that the records of the Amen-Ra Temple in Edinburgh were destroyed in 1900/01. As far as I know, the records of the Horus Temple at Bradford have not survived either.

Family history: freebmd; ancestry.co.uk (census and probate); findmypast.co.uk; familysearch; Burke's Peerage and Baronetage; Burke's Landed Gentry; Armorial Families; thepeerage.com; and a wide variety of family trees on the web.

Famous-people sources: mostly about men, of course, but very useful even for the female members of GD. Oxford Dictionary of National Biography. Who Was Who. Times Digital Archive.

Useful source for business and legal information: London Gazette and its Scottish counterpart Edinburgh Gazette. Now easy to find (with the right search information) on the web.

Catalogues: British Library; Freemasons' Library.

Wikipedia; Google; Google Books - my three best resources. I also used other web pages, but with some caution, as - from the historian's point of view - they vary in quality a great deal.

SOURCES FOR MARY BRIGGS SWAN

THOMAS BRIGGS (MANCHESTER) LIMITED

London Gazette 12 March 1872 p1416 patents number 2971 held under the Patent Law Amendment Act 1852.

London Gazette 11 October 1878 p5524 patent number 3508.

The firm advertised regularly in Bradshaws Railway Manual Shareholders Guide... at least from its 1881 issue. You can see some of them at www.mocavo.com/Bradshaws-Railway-Manual-Shareholders-Guide-and-Official-Directory/416543/698, though they were difficult to date.

THOMAS BRIGGS THE FIRST AS A POLITICAL CAMPAIGNER

Works by him in the British Library catalogue:

1868 edition of 2 papers by Thomas Briggs. First is: Proposal for an Indian Policy under the New Reform Parliament... Second is: The Development of the Dorman Wealth on (sic) the British Colonies...; this paper was read at the NAPSS annual congress 6 October 1868 and then published in London for NAPSS by W W Head.

1868 a second copy of the Proposal For an Indian Policy.... It was originally a paper read by Thomas Briggs at the meeting of the East India Association at Caxton Hall Westminster on 1 February 1868.

1869 Paper on the Relations of the Colonies to the Mother Country... Read at the NAPSS by Thomas Briggs and published by NAPSS.

1874 The Peacemaker: Free Trade, Free Labour, Free Thought; or Direct Taxation the True Principle of Economy. By Thomas Briggs.

1875 entitled Poverty, Taxation and the Remedy but apparently a reissue of the 1874 volume. This time published by W Reeves. There were two subsequent editions of this paper, published in 1882 and 1884.

East India Association: see www.open.ac.uk

Henry George:

At www.wealthandwant.com what looks like verbatim coverage of a speech given by Henry George at a meeting on financial reform in Britain, held at Liverpool Rotunda and published in

The Standard of 10 August 1889. The website quotes it from Kenneth C Wenzler's An Anthology of Henry George's Thought: University of Rochester Press 1997 p26.

At www.econlib.org, the Library of Economics and Liberty, what seems to be extracts from memoirs of Henry George 1839-1897. Published New York: Doubleday, Page and Co 1905. In Chapter 29, p28 and p28 note 39.

The Financial Reform Association which GD member James W S Callie worked for:

On the website nzetc.victoria.ac.nz, reproductions of their The Pamphlet Collection of Sir Robert Stout; Volume 14.

Thomas Briggs the first gets a brief mention on wikipedia's page on William Ewart Gladstone.

Profile/obituary of Thomas Briggs the first, sent to me by Genevieve Kang: Pall Mall Gazette 25 April 1892.

THOMAS BRIGGS THE FIRST'S CHILDREN

Rev JAMES BRIGGS 1830-1874

Marriage notice and death notice, both sent to me by Genevieve Kang:

Herald 18 June 1859. Sarah Ann Ellis was the daughter of Samuel Ellis of Barr Hill House, Pendleton Bucks.

Manchester Courier and Lancashire General Advertiser 28 September 1874.

James Briggs married Sarah Annie Ellis, daughter of Samuel Ellis and Jane Irlam. Her sister Mary Jane Ellis married his brother Thomas Briggs junior.

James and Sarah Ann's daughter EMMA IRLAM BRIGGS (1897-1950) became an artist, usually known as Irlam Briggs. Information again from Genevieve Kang: see

<http://www.bbc.co.uk/arts/yourpaintings/artists/emma-irlam-briggs>

Genevieve Kang knows of one painting by her, owned during his lifetime by Robert Ferguson Miller but bequeathed back to Irlam Briggs at his death in 1937. There are also images online of Emma's painting of her sister Agnes playing the violin.

THOMAS BRIGGS THE SECOND with information about the family firm. Sent to me by Genevieve Kang.

Manchester Courier 14 July 1894, obituary of Thomas Briggs JP who had died on 6 July 1894.

Details of his will published in Dundee Evening Telegraph 8 October 1894. He left over £166,000, a very big sum in those days; and was unusually generous to his daughters with it.

Genevieve Kang's interest in the Briggs family came through Thomas Briggs the second. I quote an email from Genevieve, October 2014: "My interest is through the marriage of Robert Ferguson Miller to Amy Briggs, the oldest child of Thomas Briggs junior...Robert Ferguson Miller... belongs to a branch of my Ferguson family tree, [and] was an accountant in Salford. Although he died in 1937 without leaving any children, R F Miller & Co, Chartered Accountants operated using his name until 2005.

He married Amy Briggs on 6 December 1883 at St John's Church Higher Broughton Manchester, Robert Ferguson Miller, eldest son of the late Joseph Miller, Newcastle on Tyne, to Amy, eldest daughter of Thomas Briggs, Hazeldock, Broughton Park, Manchester."

MARY'S MOTHER SARAH JANE BREAKELL

I wasn't very successful finding this family on the census; due, I think, to the number of ways you can mis-hear or mis-spell that surname.

At www.lan-opc.org.uk, the Lancashire Online Parish Registers Project: baptism record for Maria Abigail Breakell (1837). I couldn't find any baptism records for Sarah Jane or for any of her other siblings.

Sarah Jane's father: a brief death notice sent to me by Genevieve Kang, from Manchester Courier 11 March 1848.

MARY BRIGGS IN THE GOLDEN DAWN

The Magicians of the Golden Dawn: A Documentary History of a Magical Order 1887-1923 by Ellic Howe. London: Routledge and Kegan Paul 1972 p181-182.

Women of the Golden Dawn: Rebels and Priestesses by Mary K Greer. Rochester Vermont: Park Street Press 1995: p195-98.

Yeats and Women edited by Deirdre Toomey. 2nd edition Macmillan Press Ltd 1997. Chapter 3: "The Music of Heaven", by Warwick Gould, about Dorothea Butler Hunter, was based on Dorothea's reminiscences of her time in the GD.

The Letters of W B Yeats which is a selection, not the full set; edited by Allan Wade. London: Rupert Hart-Davis 1954. There were no letters from Yeats to Mary Briggs in this volume but she was mentioned in letters to Dorothea Hunter: p264-65, p293-94, p296, p300.

Collected Letters of W B Yeats Volume II 1896-1900 is the full set of those that still exist. Editors Warwick Gould, John Kelly and Deirdre Toomey. 2001: Yeats Annual volume 14: p51 note 4 and p109 note 1 about Mary Briggs' notebook; p151; p665.

More generally on Yeats and the GD: Yeats's Golden Dawn by George Mills Harper. Northampton: The Aquarian Press 1974.

THE SWANS AND JOHN RUSKIN

For general information on Ruskin, there's a detailed page on wikipedia.

Genevieve Kang found a long and detailed obituary of Howard's father Henry, in the Sheffield Independent of 30 March 1889. There are some very personal details in it and an emphasis on Howard's rush from London to the dying man's bedside; so the obituary is probably based on information from Howard.

Preliminary Catalogue of the St George's Museum, Walkley Sheffield.. by Howard Swan "A. S. Tel Eng" and John Ruskin. Sheffield: W D Spalding and Co 1888.

The Life of John Ruskin volume 2 covering 1860-1900 by Edward Tyas Cook. London: George Allen and Co 1912 p350 footnote 2.

The St George's Museum at Walkley still exists. It's now run by the Corporation of Sheffield: see www.ruskinatwalkley.org. The information on the website is taken from Ruskin at Sheffield by Janet Barnes, published Sheffield: Arts Department 1985.

HOWARD'S SISTER AND BROTHER again with information found by Genevieve Kang:

A handwritten note of Godfrey Swan's time as a freemason from the records of Stope Lodge of Gardner, in Worcester county Massachusetts. Godfrey Swan was initiated into the lodge on 21 March 1911. He was working as an engineer. Date of birth 28 January 1862 in Highgate UK. He died 13 June 1913.

Incoming passenger lists show that Godfrey first arrived in the US in 1887.

Incoming passenger lists: Mabel Swan born 1860 arrived in the US in July 1912. Passenger details show that she was unmarried and living in London where she was working as a teacher.

There's very little else on either of them and it's reasonable to assume that neither ever married.

HOWARD SWAN'S VARIOUS CAREERS

CITY AND GUILDS OF LONDON INSTITUTE

See www.britannica.com article on chemist Henry Edward Armstrong (1848-1937) who taught there from 1879 to 1884. Armstrong was a close colleague of GD member Julian L Baker.

British Library catalogue has no works by Mary Briggs. Here's a selection of some of Howard's.

The 1899 works, all published London: Samuel Baxter.

- The Great Battle: War News from the Chronicles
- Alice's Puppy Dog
- Dreyfus and the Army. A tragi-comedy
- Paul and Joseph. Or God and Mammon in the Transvaal...An unfinished drama.
- The Man from the Clouds...A Fairy Story
- South Africa Up to Date. The Manifesto of Peace: The Letter of Paul to the Trekkers. The author of this is S J P Kruger President of the South African Republic. Howard is named as a contributing author
- The Sad Story of Jack and His House, and Old Age Pensions. In verse.

And the popular series of phrase books, which are original works, not translations of Gouin:

Travellers' Colloquial.... volumes are all published in London by David Nut. Italian 1892. French 1897 and later editions. German 1897 and later editions. Spanish just the one edition 1903, perhaps it was a bit soon for Spain.

HOWARD SWAN AND ELECTRICAL ENGINEERING

Earliest evidence of Howard's involvement in the electric supply industry is an advert spotted by Genevieve Kang; probably sent to the Sheffield Daily Telegraph of 6 January 1886 by Howard and giving his (obviously temporary) address as the Wharncliffe Hotel, Sheffield: "Of 15,000 Lamps in the Inventions Exhibition, 12,000 were supplied to the Commissioners by The Edison and Swan United Electric Light Company, 57 Holburn Viaduct E.C".

Telegraphic Journal and Electrical Review volume 20 1887 ?p474 and Electrical Engineer 1888 both refer to an article by Howard: Artistic Electric Lighting.

At digital-library.theiet.org there are back-copies of the journal Electrical Engineer, the journal of the Institution of Electrical Engineering. Howard Swan was its editor at least during the 1890s and there were also two other mentions of him:

- Electrical Engineer volume 18 number 78 1889: 147-60 article Remarks on Mr Kenelly's Paper "On Certain Phenomena Connected with Imperfect Earth in Telegraph Circuits". Howard was amongst many members commenting on this paper.

- Electrical Engineer volume 19 number 89 1890: 594-606 article The Working Efficiency of Secondary Cells. Again Howard was one of many members commenting on this article.

Electrical Distribution, its Theory and Practice. This is a 2-volume work. Part 1 is by Martin Hamilton Kilgour only. Part 2 is by Howard Swan and C H W Biggs. London: Biggs and Co 1893.

Telephone Magazine: An Illustrated Monthly Mag volume 1 1893 p266: lecture by Howard Swan: The Series Method as Applied to the Technical Professions. Given 22 February [1893] at the City [and] Guilds Institute Old Students' Association.

Practical Electrical Engineering: A Complete Treatise... Volume 1. Main author is William Worby Beaumont. Other contributors include M H Kilgour, C H W Biggs and Howard Swan. London: Biggs and Co 1894.

Anglo-Saxon Review volume 9 issue of June 1901 p108-09 article by Howard: Signalling to Mars. Managed to see the article at www.forgottenbooks.org though the grammar was scrambled and there were mis-spellings throughout

HIS EYE EXPERIMENTS, following on from his father's interest in photography and vision. These were the scientific work by Howard most mentioned in other publications:

Scientific Corroboration of Theosophy by A Marques. London: Theosophical Publishing Society 1908. On p91 a reference to a work by Howard published Electrical Engineer in 1897 in which he reported on experiments to find out what goes on inside the eye when people are listening to words and music.

The experiments also got a mention in Musical News volume 13 1897 p579.

Electrical Engineer volume 21 1898 also mentioned "some experiments of Mr Howard Swan on the interrelation of thought and light waves" and said that his conclusions had since been verified by work done independently in the USA.

The Theosophic Messenger volume 13 1912 published by the American Theosophical Society. On p666 (!!)) the conclusions are described as: "thoughts cause light-forms to be created in the eye. Tesla mentions the same fact".

LANGUAGE TEACHING and the GOUIN SYSTEM, which is still in use, see its English-language website at //gouinseries.com

Its methods are criticised in Modern Language Teaching by Charles Hart Handschin. Yonkers: World Book Co 1940 p62-64.

A modern reference to Gouin:

Britain and Scandinavia in the Modern Language Teaching series volume 4. A P R Howatt and Richard C Smith. Routledge 2013: px.

The Art of Teaching and Studying Languages first English language edition. Translated by Howard Swan and Victor Betis. London: G Philip and Son 1892: particularly pxiv.

Aspects of Education: Journal of the Institute of Education, University of Hull volumes 23-26 1980 p4 confirming that Howard's edition of Gouin's book was the first in English.

Bernard Shaw: The Diaries 1885-1897 in 2 volumes, annotated and edited by Stanley Weintraub. University Park Pennsylvania: Pennsylvania State Univ Press 1986. Volume 1 p496 in a note; Volume 2 p816.

Howard's visit to Stead: Maiden Tribute: A Life of W T Stead. Article by Grace Eckley in Journal of the Society of Psychological Research number 895 2009 p199. The result was article by Stead: How to Learn a Language in Six Months, published Review of Reviews volume 5 1892 p511.

British Books volume 8/ 61 1894: earliest advert I found for the Central School of Foreign Tongues. Directors Victor Bétis and Howard Swan; address Howard House Arundel Street, Strand London WC.

The Academy and Literature volume 50 1896 p370 names Victor Bétis as director of the Normal School of Languages based in Boston Mass.

The Literary World volume 53 1896 p518.

Review of Reviews volume 13 1896 p515 earliest advert I saw for Howard Swan's translation of Gouin's Facts of Life language-learning series.

British books volumes 11-12/64-65 1896 in the Publishers' Circular section: Swan and Betis were suing a publisher for infringement of copyright.

Journal of Education and School World volume 29 1897.

Report of the British and Foreign School Society volumes 94-96 1899 p97.

The Education Outlook volumes 53-54 1900 p455 review of The Facts of Life Part 1: A Text-Book for the Methodical Study of the German Vocabulary.

Journal of Education volume 22 1900 adverts on p411, p579 and p718

The Practical Study of Languages by Henry Sweet. H Holt and Co 1906 p86.

HOWARD'S STUDY IN THE USA

Journal of Education volume 30 1908 p530 a revised advert for Howard's Swan's Central School, now at 1 Albemarle Street. Gives an impressive list of Howard's credentials.

THEN MARY AND HOWARD GO TO JAPAN

Found via www.worldcat.org but the British Library doesn't have a copy, so I haven't been able to read it: Flashes from the Far East: Book 1 to Mikado Land by Howard Swan. Tokyo: Hakubunkan 1902. The only knowledge I have of what was in the book comes from the newspaper website, trove.nla.gov.au which has a one-paragraph review of it from the Brisbane Courier 27 September 1902 p13.

Thesaurus of Everyday English for Japanese-language speakers. Howard and Senkichiro Katsumata as co-authors. Tokyo: ABC Publishing House 1903.

Sir Ernest Satow's Peking Diary Volume II 1906-04 by Satow, Ian Ruxton and Ian C Ruxton. Morrisville North Carolina: Lulu Press 2006. P112 diary entry for 21 September [1904].

At www.mocavo.com there is a reproduction of pages from a publication issued by the American Women's League and the People's University. From the web page I couldn't work out what the publication was, nor what date it was; but Howard and Fannie Ball Perrin are both listed on the same page in it, with details of their past and current employment. Although I couldn't find a date, I believe that it's from the period 1908 to 1912, partly because of information on Fannie Ball Perrin I found at phdtree.org: an abstract of the PhD dissertation for the University of St Louis Missouri 1997 by Laura Kelley Fisher entitled Historical Documentation of Teaching Careers: A Legacy that Strengthens the Teaching Profession. Fannie Ball Perrin was one of the 4 subjects of this PhD. She taught at Principia Upper School St Louis Missouri from 1898 to 1912.

MARY AND HOWARD IN CHINA

Sir Ernest Satow's Peking Diary Volume II 1906-04 by Satow, Ian Ruxton and Ian C Ruxton. Morrisville North Carolina: Lulu Press 2006. P113 diary entry for 27 [September 1904].

American Anthropologist volume 7 1905 p741 article by Howard: A Systematic Arrangement for Recording Dialects.

American Review of Reviews volume 37 1908 p213 article by Howard: China and the Language Question.

The photograph: at www.worldcat.org, as now in the library of the California Historical Society in San Francisco as catalogue number 82544600; dated "[ca 1900]". Of course, the date's out by six years; the photograph has to be from later than the day of earthquake. I haven't actually seen the photograph! It's only available to readers in the library.

HOWARD AND MARY IN LOS ANGELES

October 2014: I knew nothing about this time spent by Mary in LA until I was contacted by Genevieve Kang. The newspaper extracts below were all found by her using Pro Quest.

LA Sunday Times 17 June 1906 p8 in their "Among Men of Action" column.

Los Angeles Times 29 July 1906.

Los Angeles Times 8 September 1906.

Los Angeles Times 11 September 1906.

Los Angeles Times 29 January 1907.

HOWARD SWAN AS A QUAKER:

The Voice of the Spirit: Literary Passages from the Bible Rewritten, Idea for Idea, in Modern Style by Howard Swan, as Principal of the Central School of Foreign Tongues. London: Sampson, Low, Marston and Co 1898. The British Library only has the 4th of 4 volumes which make up the total work. On piii the 4 books in order are:

1 = Afflicted - Job

The Spirit Uplifts - Joel

Songs of Beloved - Psalms LXIX and XXII

2 = Spirit is Safety - Isaiah; subdivided into Distress; and Comfort

3 = Uplifting is Strength - Ezekiel

Song of Solomon

4 = The Glad Message according to Matthew; which when you reach the title page, includes A Spiritual History with an Inner Meaning, by John of Patmos; originally in Greek and published in Athens

Letter of Paul to the Galatians

Notes on the Greek Text.

The Academy volume 53 1898 p500 has a scathing reference to The Voice of the Spirit, as "a retranslation" of the Book of Job from the Quaker point of view.

Via archive.org to The Friend: A Religious and Literary Journal volume LXXIII published Philadelphia 1900. On p20 there's a reprint of an article by Swan originally in the London Friend: Silence in Our Meetings.

Friends' Intelligencer volume 74 1917 published by the (American) Society of Friends: p541 Howard Swan is listed as present at a Quaker meeting in Cincinnati.

HOWARD IN THE FABIAN SOCIETY

Fabian News volumes 10-17 originally 1900-07 republished 1971 p26 "Howard Swan has married Mary Briggs". I'm not quite sure whether to read this as meaning Mary too is a Fabian Society member.

DEATHS OF EMILY SWAN AND MARY BRIGGS SWAN

The Annual Monitor for 1910: Obituary of Members of the Society of Friends of Great Britain and Ireland covering period 1 October 1908 to 30 September 1909. London: Headley Brothers 1909 for the Society: p173.

RADIA AND HOWARD AFTER MARY'S DEATH

Details of Radia's life were found by Genevieve Kang; the source isn't given but the piece has the air of being an obituary from a paper published where Radia died, in the town Montgomery, in Hamilton county Ohio. The date isn't given either but must be after 1995. In an interesting departure from the views of both her birth parents, Radia was an active member of the Presbyterian church in Montgomery; she was not a Quaker or a Church of England equivalent.

That Radia was always in touch with some at least of the children of Charles Tennant Briggs: emails to Genevieve Kang October 2014 from members of the Block family.

Genevieve Kang found an index of death registrations for 1919 in Hamilton Ohio. They included one for a Howard Swan who died on 27 July 1919 at Hamilton.

MARY BRIGGS' SIBLINGS

JOHN FREDERICK BRIGGS

At www.euchems.eu paper by Anna Simmons of the Open University read at 6th International Conference on the History of Chemistry: Working in a Transitional Territory? Chemical Consultants in the UK 1870-1914. I think the publication is called Neighbours and Territories: The Evolving Identity of Chemistry pp555-563. The article is mostly statistics and tables but on p562 John Frederick Briggs 1871-1963 is cited as an example of a typical career.

At pubs.rsc.org, Proceedings of the Chemical Society of London volume 9 no 119 issued 9 February 1893: list of certificates being read: John Frederick Briggs is c/o Messrs Parry and Co of Madras; next in the list is Julian L Baker at his home address.

Proceedings of the Chemical Society volume 9 number 124 1893 p117 rpt of a mtg of the Chem Soc w Dr Armstrong in the chair; held 4 May 1893: a list of those elected fellows of the Society at that meeting began with John Frederick Briggs and Julian L Baker.

Madras Tercentenary Commemorative Volume published 1994 p270 firm founded as Chase and Parry. The 'parry' is Thomas Parry a son of Edward Parry of Leighton Hall near Welshpool. Thomas Parry arrived in Madras in 1788 and set up an import/export business which later moved into industrial production. In 1803 Thomas Parry bought the land in city of Madras (Chennai) now known as Parry's Corner.

Chemical News and Journal of Industrial Science issued 1918 p141 report of the meeting of the Society of Public Analysts held 6 March 1918. John Frederick Briggs was in a list of people whose Certificates had been recently been approved by the Society.

Probate Registry 1963: John Frederick Briggs died in June 1963 and left personal effects to the value of £118205/0/11.

MAGGIE and SYDNEY GEORGE STARLING

British Library: works by S G Starling as sole author and with co-authors

1904 Preliminary Practical Maths. Starling and Frederick Charles Clarke as co-authors. E A Arnold in Arnold's School Series. Another edition 1910.

1912 Electricity and Magnetism: For Advanced Students. Starling as sole author. Longmans.

Later editions from 1916, 1920, 1924 reprinted 1925, 1929, 1932, 1937; 1943. And some daughter publications, also with Longmans Green and Co:

1920 Electricity and Magnetism. Another ed 1943.

1931 Electricity and Magnetism for Higher School Certificate and Intermediate Students. Another edition "1949 [1951]".

1919 A Textbook of Physics: For the Use of Students of Science and Engineering.

John Duncan and Starling as joint authors. Macmillan and Co. Later editions 1922, 1939, 1948, 1950, 1963. And a series of rewrites:

1933 A Textbook of Physics Parts III and IV: Light and Sound. 2nd revised edition.

1948 A Textbook of Physics Part V: Magnetism and Electricity. 2nd completely revised edition.

1950 A Textbook of Physics Part IV: Sound. Revised edition.

1921 An Introduction to Technical Electricity. Starling as sole author. Macmillan's Life and Work Series.

1922 Science in the Service of Man. Electricity etc. Starling as sole author. Longmans. 2nd edition 1949 revised by H J Grey.

1922 Electricity. Starling as sole author. Longmans.

1923 Elementary Electricity. Starling as sole author. Longmans.

1935 The Mechanical Properties of Matter. Starling as sole author. Macmillan and Co.

1937 A renamed and revised version of Electricity and Magnetism, this time For Degree Students. Further editions of this: 1945, 7th edition 1948, and 8th edition 1953 revised by Starling with A J Woodall 1949 Electricity in the Service of Man. Starling as sole author. Longmans.

1950 Physics. Starling and A J Woodall as co-authors. Longmans Green and Co.

Starling also held a couple of patents.

At www.google.com/patents/US1377032 patent application US1377032-A filed December 1918 by inventors Sydney George Starling of Forest Gate and Arthur Joseph Hughes of London. The patent was for a new design of aneroid barometer. Further details on this website. Once granted, the patent assigned to Henry Hughes and Son Ltd.

At patentimages, details can be seen of another patent applied for jointly by Sydney George Starling and A J Hughes this time in 1919: US 1307935.

On the strength of all these textbooks, Sydney and Maggie were able to retire comfortably to Chislehurst. Maggie died in December 1950, Sydney in 1955. They had two children.

FRANK COBDEN BRIGGS

Found on the web October 2014 by Genevieve Kang: Institution of Electrical Engineers Membership Record Book: Frank Cobden Briggs' election as an Associate in March 1894 is on p279; with details of his current employment. The entry is signed by one of the Institutions's senior members: the name looks like "Alec Siemens".

Via archive.org to Journal of the Institution of Electrical Engineers volume 23 1894 p8 where he was in a list, presumably of current members.

Via archive.org to Journal of the Institution of Electrical Engineers volume 32 1902-03 p8 report of the meeting of the Institution held 4 December 1902: Frank Cobden Briggs was one of those elected Associate members at that meeting.

CHARLES TENNANT BRIGGS

At search.ancestry.com.au, the sets of electoral rolls indicate that Charles moved around a lot between the earliest issues and his death. His earliest appearance on an electoral roll in Australia that I could see was 1916 in Perth WA. He was in Victoria by 1924, but still moving regularly until the last listing, in 1954 in Flinders VI.

Journal of the Junior Institution of Engineers of London volume 29 1919 p181 Charles T Briggs is listed c/o Messrs Charles Atkins and Co Ltd of Adelaide SA.

He's listed in the Transactions of the Institution of Engineers Australia volumes 1-2 1921.

There's a biography but I couldn't find a copy either at the British Library or on Amazon.co.uk. A Biography of Charles Tennant Briggs 1877-1954: Coal Machine Power by Phillip Block 1912. Block was a descendant of C T Briggs' daughter Phyllis.

These sources were sent by Genevieve Kang using the newspaper archive at <http://trove.nla.gov.au/>

Retirement notice: The Argus 13 September 1944.

Death of C T Briggs at Mornington: The Argus 24 July 1954.

Coverage of the funeral: The Argus 26 July 1954.

14 May 2014

25 October 2014 incorporating the family history research of Genevieve Kang of Sydney NSW.

Amandragora@attglobal.net

Find the web pages of Roger Wright and Sally Davis, including my list of people initiated into the Order of the Golden Dawn between 1888 and 1901, at:

http://pws.prserv.net/Roger\_Wright/

***

William Thomas Percy BROOKS who was initiated into the Golden Dawn in May 1899. Unfortunately when he was transcribing all the members' details from the GD's own list, R A Gilbert couldn't read William's motto, so we don't know what it was.

Very short biography as he's one of my failures - I've hardly found out anything about him. He's probably the baby who was registered as William Thomas P Brooks at Norwich registry office in the autumn of 1874. On the day of the 1881 census, that baby (now aged 6) was living with his parents in a house on Church Street in Heigham, Norwich. Both his parents came from East Anglia: his father Thomas had been born in Norwich, his mother Jane had been born in Cambridgeshire. Thomas Brooks, ran his own business making fertiliser. His wife Jane was probably not asked how she spent her time or whether she earned any money. It's possible that she worked in her husband's business; but more likely that she organised the household, did the shopping and cooking, looked after William when he wasn't at school and gave orders to the one general servant that she and Thomas thought they could afford to help her with the heavy work. William seems to have been an only child.

That's all I know for sure!

WHO DID HE KNOW IN THE GOLDEN DAWN? I haven't a clue! Except that there may be a connection through his father's involvement in chemistry, to some of the other chemists/alchemists in GD. But then again, there may not.

I couldn't identify William for certain on the censuses from 1891 to 1911. Google led me to the website at www.yasni.co.uk/victor+biddlecombe, which had baptism records for the church at Heigham Norwich, but I couldn't find William's baptism amongst them. None of the other sources produced anything I was sure was the right man.

BASIC SOURCES I USED for all Golden Dawn members.

Membership of the Golden Dawn: The Golden Dawn Companion by R A Gilbert. Northampton: The Aquarian Press 1986. Between pages 125 and 175, Gilbert lists the names, initiation dates and addresses of all those people who became members of the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn or its many daughter Orders between 1888 and 1914. The list is based on the Golden Dawn's administrative records and its Members' Roll - the large piece of parchment on which all new members signed their name at their initiation. All this information had been inherited by Gilbert but it's now in the Freemasons' Library at the United Grand Lodge of England building on Great Queen Street Covent Garden.

Family history: freebmd; ancestry.co.uk (census and probate); findmypast.co.uk; familysearch.

Famous-people sources: mostly about men, of course, but very useful even for the female members of GD. Oxford Dictionary of National Biography. Who Was Who. Times Digital Archive.

Catalogues: British Library; Freemasons' Library.

Wikipedia; Google; Google Books - my three best resources. I also used other web pages, but with some caution, as - from the historian's point of view - they vary in quality a great deal.

23 April 2012

AMandragora@attglobal.net

BROOKS, WILLIAM THOMAS PERCY

motto unreadable on the roll

I May 1899

27 Dec 2011 tried searching on full name and got one response only:

www.yasni.co.uk/victor+biddlecombe. Led to a transcription of baptism records f church of Heigham Norwich w DOB 25 Feb 1878. Cldn't find the baptism ref'd to but on the strength of it tried freebmd and got b regn: William Thomas P Brooks r Norwich Oct-Dec 1874.

1881 census, unnumb house on Church Street, Heigham, Norwich head Thomas Brooks, m, 33, chemical manure manufr, b Norwich wife Jane, 41, no occup/source of inc gvn, b Hardwich Cambs child William T P aged 6, b Norwich

+ 1 genl serv.

Cldn't find the boy b 1874 on 1891, 1901 or 1911 censuses. On 1901 found another William Thomas P Brooks but he was born c 1899.

Mrs Mary Catherine BROWN was initiated into the Golden Dawn in April 1894 and chose the motto 'Pax'. She remained a member for 18 months or so, resigning in December 1895.

WHO DID SHE KNOW IN THE GOLDEN DAWN? I start with this, because I only came across two clues about who Mary Catherine Brown was: the address she gave when invited to join the Golden Dawn; and some details of membership of the Theosophical Society (the TS) of a woman with that name, and I always assume that TS members with the same name as a GD member are the same person, because they are the same person so often.

In April 1894 Mary Catherine Brown was living at 11 Marlborough Crescent in Bedford Park, the housing estate most closely associated with the architect Norman Shaw and then very recently built, convenient for travel into London but with relatively low rents. Several other GD members also lived in or very near to the estate: John Todhunter, Henrietta and Henry Marriott Paget, W B Yeats and Florence Farr. It's a reasonably safe bet that Mary Catherine Brown had got to know one of them since she had arrived in the area; but I don't know which one.

I thought that knowing Mary Catherine's address would be a help when I tried to find out more about her; but it wasn't. Her TS membership details give 5 different addresses for her in the 10 years she was a member, starting in Harrow and ending in Godalming with none of them being in Bedford Park - she was a lady who kept moving on. And I couldn't identify her for certain on the censuses in 1891, 1901 or 1911: there are just too many Mary Catherine Browns, and none of them were living in any of the right areas to be the woman I was after.

One thing I can say about Mary Catherine from her TS membership is that she knew at least one senior member there. In order to join the TS you had to be recommended by people who were already members. Mary Catherine was recommended by G R S Mead, TS general secretary and editor of its magazine Lucifer. The TS was divided into lodges; most members joined the one that met nearest their home. Mary Catherine joined Blavatsky Lodge, which met at the TS headquarters near Regent's Park and had many members who had known Helena Petrovna Blavatsky personally; but later moved to the West London lodge.

That's all I know about her. She is one of my failures.

BASIC SOURCES I USED for all Golden Dawn members.

Membership of the Golden Dawn: The Golden Dawn Companion by R A Gilbert. Northampton: The Aquarian Press 1986. Between pages 125 and 175, Gilbert lists the names, initiation dates and addresses of all those people who became members of the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn or its many daughter Orders between 1888 and 1914. The list is based on the Golden Dawn's administrative records and its Members' Roll - the large piece of parchment on which all new members signed their name at their initiation. All this information had been inherited by Gilbert but it's now in the Freemasons' Library at the United Grand Lodge of England building on Great Queen Street Covent Garden.

Family history: freebmd; ancestry.co.uk (census and probate); findmypast.co.uk; familysearch; Burke's Peerage and Baronetage; Burke's Landed Gentry; Armorial Families;

thepeerage.com; and a wide variety of family trees on the web.

Famous-people sources: mostly about men, of course, but very useful even for the female members of GD. Oxford Dictionary of National Biography. Who Was Who. Times Digital Archive.

Catalogues: British Library; Freemasons' Library.

Wikipedia; Google; Google Books - my three best resources. I also used other web pages, but with some caution, as - from the historian's point of view - they vary in quality a great deal.

23 April 2012

AMandragora@attglobal.net

Count Franz Otto BUBNA was initiated into the Golden Dawn in December 1889, when he took the Latin motto 'Nunquam dormio'. By March 1892, however, his membership was described in the GD's records as "in abeyance".

I was only able to find this man on two censuses - 1891 and 1901 - and I think of him as a bird of passage, living in the UK for a short time only.

Count Franz Otto Bubna was a member of the Austrian nobility by birth, born during the 1840s. When he joined the GD he gave 55 Egerton Gardens as his address and was still giving it as his address in 1892. But on the night of the 1891 census he was staying at the Brunswick Hotel at 51 Jermyn Street Piccadilly, and by 1901 he, his wife Bertha and their son Egon had moved out of London to Upton Towers, in Upton St Mary near Slough. Their staff at Upton Towers was a large one. The Count had his own valet - a male servant who helped with his employer's wardrobe and personal appearance; and Countess Bertha had the woman's equivalent, a lady's maid. Only the wealthiest could afford to employ servants of this kind. In addition to those two personal servants, the household had a cook, a parlour maid, two housemaids and two maids to help in the kitchen. Living in this kind of style in the country required a carriage and horses, for the lady of the house to make her social calls in, so the Count employed a coachman. However, he did not employ a butler or a footman - rather a strange omission, I think. I suppose one of the housemaids answered the door when the bell rang.

Count Franz Bubna had moved to England to work in the City. In 1891 he told the census official he was a shipping agent; in 1901 he was still doing that kind of work but had also started dealing in shares. His office in 1902 was at 76 Palmerston Buildings on Bishopsgate Street. He was a well-known figure amongst the Austro-Hungarian population in London. He attended dinners organised by the Association of Foreign Consuls. At a dinner organised by Austrians living in London in 1893, Count Franz Bubna was second on its guest-list, immediately after the imperial Consul-General. And in 1895 he was serving on the committee of the Austro-Hungarian Chamber of Commerce in London. He was also enjoying the kind of leisure pursuits where you meet the English upper-classes, attending the Brookfield Stud sale (of racehorses) in 1895.

However, Count Franz Bubna's character had a more enquiring and reflective side and he joined the Theosophical Society in London in October 1889. Those wanting to join the TS had to be recommended by two people who were members already. Unfortunately, Count Franz Bubna's records at the TS don't say who his sponsors were. However, Countess Bertha also joined the TS, in March 1890; her two sponsors were her husband, and future GD member Frederick Leigh Gardner. Gardner worked in the City, so that might be how he and Bubna first got to know each other.

During their first years in the TS, Count Franz and Bertha were members of its Blavatsky Lodge, where Helena Petrovna Blavatsky herself held forth. There may have been conflict between the Count Franz and Blavatsky: A P Sinnett says that the Count was a psychic who was "in touch with his Master Mahatma Morya", a channel of communication that Blavatsky liked to keep to herself. Either because Blavatsky disapproved of Count Franz's claims; or because the Bubnas felt that Blavatsky Lodge after Blavatsky's death (in the spring of 1891) would never be the same, by 1892 they had joined the London Lodge. They were made welcome there and became members of its inner group, with A P and Patience Sinnett, the Arundales and others. London Lodge held itself aloof from the TS as a whole: it did not send in lists of members and subscriptions paid, and these administrative records have now been lost. Consequently it's not possible to say whether the Bubnas were members of London Lodge during the years in which a bitter argument was fought in the mid-1890s after someone else - William Quan Judge - claimed to be in touch with the Mahatmas. The Count did take up paying his subscription to the TS again when the dispute was settled with the defeat of Judge's followers. He continued to pay it until 1900; but by 1901 he (though not his wife) had joined the Society for Psychical Research, which had investigated some of the spiritualist claims made by Blavatsky and declared them fraudulent, to the fury of Blavatsky and her followers.

Count Franz Bubna and Countess Bertha were not on the census for 1911. A note on their record at the TS indicates that they had left the UK by 1903 and I presume they had moved back to Austria. I don't know when the Count died.

Relatively few members of the GD are described at all in someone else's writings, but Count Franz Bubna is one of them. In June 1895, the Count called on Henry Olcott (the surviving founder of the TS) during one of Olcott's short stays in London. Writing up the social call in his diary, Olcott described the Count as "tall and handsome", so I'd say that the Count had those features that the Victorians admired in a man: a moustache, possibly even a beard, long sideburns, and a very upright almost military bearing. Olcott was sufficiently impressed with Count Bubna to suggest (though apparently not to the man's face) that they had both known each other in previous lives. This was the only mention of Count Franz Bubna in Old Diary Leaves so in their current lives at least, the meeting didn't lead to a lasting friendship.

BASIC SOURCES I USED for all Golden Dawn members.

Membership of the Golden Dawn: The Golden Dawn Companion by R A Gilbert. Northampton: The Aquarian Press 1986. Between pages 125 and 175, Gilbert lists the names, initiation dates and addresses of all those people who became members of the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn or its many daughter Orders between 1888 and 1914. The list is based on the Golden Dawn's administrative records and its Members' Roll - the large piece of parchment on which all new members signed their name at their initiation. All this information had been inherited by Gilbert but it's now in the Freemasons' Library at the United Grand Lodge of England building on Great Queen Street Covent Garden.

Family history: freebmd; ancestry.co.uk (census and probate); findmypast.co.uk; familysearch; Burke's Peerage and Baronetage; Burke's Landed Gentry; Armorial Families; thepeerage.com; and a wide variety of family trees on the web.

Famous-people sources: mostly about men, of course, but very useful even for the female members of GD. Oxford Dictionary of National Biography. Who Was Who. Times Digital Archive.

Catalogues: British Library; Freemasons' Library.

Wikipedia; Google; Google Books - my three best resources. I also used other web pages, but with some caution, as - from the historian's point of view - they vary in quality a great deal.

Count Franz Otto Bubna as a prominent member of London's Austro-Hungarian community: Times Digital Archive.

Theosophical Society: Theosophical Society Members' Books 1888-1900, held at the TS headquarters building in Gloucester Place W1.

Olcott's impression of the Count: Old Diary Leaves: The True History of the Theosophical Society by Henry Steel Olcott. 5th Series published Madras: Theosophical Publishing House 1932 but according to a note on p331 prepared for publication by Olcott in 1903. The Count's call was covered pp328-34, during Olcott's tour of Spain, France and England in the summer of 1895. The call was paid on 20 June.

Autobiography of Alfred Percy Sinnett: unedited version published Theosophical History Centre Gloucester Place 1986 and now available online. It's based on the diaries of Alfred Percy and Patience Sinnett: pp43-44.

Proceedings of the Society for Psychical Research volume XV 1900-01 p490 shows Count

Francis (sic) Bubna as a full member, at Upton Towers Slough. He's not in the list of members in volume XI 1895.

26 May 2017

Find the web pages of Roger Wright and Sally Davis, including my list of people initiated into the Order of the Golden Dawn between 1888 and 1901, at:

www.wrightanddavis.co.uk

***

Katherine Julia Buckman was initiated into the Order of the Golden Dawn at its Isis-Urania temple in London, on 25 June 1896, taking the Latin motto 'Hic habitat felicitas'. She resigned from the Order less than a year later, in April 1897.

Once again I begin a biography of a woman member of the GD with a moan about the almost complete lack of sources for her life. In fact, the lack of sources is true of most of the men who joined the GD, as well; but I feel it more with the women - having to make guesses about what their lives were like from the few hints that are available, mostly gathered from information on the men in their lives. However, I must say that in Katherine Julia's case, the men in her life were a very interesting bunch.

THE BUCKMANS AND THE BAKERS

Although I lack one important piece of evidence, I believe that GD members Katherine Julia Buckman and Julian Levett Baker were related. Katherine Julia certainly was, and Julian Levett Baker probably was, a descendant of John Buckman and his wife Mary, who lived in Cheltenham in the late 18th and early 19th-centuries. John had his own shoemaking business in the town. John and Mary had at least three sons. Katherine Julia was the daughter of John and Mary's son James. Julian Levett was a grandson of John Bishop Buckman of Cheltenham; unfortunately the missing piece of evidence is definite proof that John Bishop Buckman was one of John and Mary Buckman's other sons. Though if he was not a son, he was closely related and knew James Buckman's son Sydney well enough to appoint him an executor of his Will. Assuming my guess about John Bishop Buckman is correct, Katherine Julia Buckman was the first cousin of John Bishop Buckman's daughter Bessie, who was Julian Levett Baker's mother; falling between the two of them in age - about 16 years younger than Bessie and 10 years older than Julian.

I have found a bit of evidence that Katherine Julia might also be related to GD member Charles Chase Parr (initiated 1892); but the relationship must be quite distant, based on marriages in the mid-18th century, and I haven't checked it out.

JAMES BUCKMAN

Katherine Julia's father James (1814-84) had a working life which embodied the change in the 19th century approach to science research: the professionalisation of work previously the preserve of the leisured, moneyed classes. It seems that none of John Buckman's sons followed him into the shoe-making business. James started out training as a pharmacist in Cheltenham. He then spent several years in London in the 1830s studying medicine, but never practised and probably returned to Cheltenham not fully qualified. On the day of the 1841 census he was in business, as a pharmacist, in Peterville Street Cheltenham, employing one trainee and earning enough to employ one household servant as well. Even by this stage, however, his main interest was the study of the the area around Cheltenham: field-walking and digging, collecting and identifying plants and specimens of the local rocks. A series of publications beginning in the late 1830s led to his being elected a fellow of several national scientific societies including the Geological Society (as early as 1842) and the Linnean Society (1850).

The financial troubles of others led to a change of direction for James. He had agreed to act as guarantor for the ironmongery business of his brother Edwin and Edwin's business partner Benjamin Norman; so when the business went bankrupt in 1844, James too lost a lot of money. Inevitably, his own business suffered from the lack of investment, and James decided that he would look for work that reflected his leisure interests, rather than continue to struggle as a pharmacist. Paid work in the sciences was still rather rare, but more and more institutions were being founded that needed secretaries, curators and teacher/lecturers to run them on behalf of their management committees. After a couple of years in Birmingham working at the Birmingham Philosophical Association, he was appointed in 1848 to the post of professor of geology, botany and zoology at the newly-founded Royal Agricultural College in Cirencester, where to start with, he was encouraged and funded to do the kind of research that he had been doing for nothing.

It was James Buckman's research on identifying species, particularly grasses, that led him to become embroiled in the greatest scientific debate of his day. His work on grasses was funded from 1857 by the British Association for the Advancement of Science (BAAS). He also corresponded with Charles Darwin about his work, which supported the arguments Darwin put forward in On the Origin of Species and was mentioned in the book. The meeting of the BAAS at Oxford in 1860 is best known for the argument between T H Huxley and bishop Wilberforce over Darwin's theory of evolution by natural selection. But the day before that famous set-to, Buckman had presented some results that had caused a controversy of their own. He read a paper which suggested that grasses could hybridise - a conclusion which challenged the Church of England's teaching that God's Creation was unchanging and unchangeable.

The paper inflamed an ongoing struggle at the Royal Agricultural College as its Principal, Rev John Constable, fought with most of his staff for control of the syllabus. Rev Constable regarded Buckman's research as not only heretical, but immoral, and the suggestion that grasses could hybridise only served to make him more certain of the rightness of his position - that teaching along those lines should not be allowed in the College. The majority of the teaching staff opposed this conservative attitude, but the Principal gained the upper hand as the controversy over Darwin's book raged during the next two years. So that several professors, including James Buckman, duly resigned from the College in July 1862. They took with them quite a lot of the students but the field was clear for Rev Constable to replace them with men more amenable to Church of England teaching; and to destroy completely James Buckman's experimental garden.

Katherine Julia Buckman was born the year after her father's resignation, into an atmosphere of scientific uproar in the nation and financial uncertainty in the family. However, James and his family were rescued, and their futures put on a secure footing, through the support and generosity of his wife's family.

James Buckman's married life was tragic: he was married twice and both his wives died after only a few years of marriage, as a result of childbirth as so many Victorian women did. James' first marriage, early in 1852, was to Louisa Elizabeth (born 1826), daughter of William Dunn and his wife Elizabeth née Hammond. William Dunn worked in an office in Worcester. James and Louisa's son Conrad was born a year later in Cirencester; but both Conrad and Louisa died a few weeks later at Dawlish in Devon, where perhaps they had been taken because they were both so weak.

In 1858 James Buckman married again. His second wife was Julia, daughter of John Savory and his wife Martha, née Hames. James Buckman may have first met the Savory family when doing his unfinished medical training in London in the 1830s - John Savory was a pharmacist and a doctor, a member of the Apothecaries' Hall. On the day of the 1851 census, John and Martha were living above their pharmacy shop with their children Thomas (22), Charles (21) and Julia (17) - but it was a big shop, at 143 New Bond Street in the fashionable area of Mayfair. John Savory's two sons and eight other young men worked as assistants in the shop; and the household employed a very long list of servants with an unusual number of men in it - most of them, I should imagine, working for the pharmacy business. There was a porter, an errand boy, a coachman, a footman, a page and a groom; plus a cook, a ladies' maid, two housemaids and a kitchenmaid. This was a very wealthy family: male servants, and ladies' maids, didn't come cheap.

James and Julia Buckman had five children in the seven years after their marriage: Sydney Savory born 1860; Ada Hames born 1861; Katherine Julia born in the spring of 1863; Minnie Georgina born 1864; and Percy Warner James born late in 1865. On census day 1861 James, Julia and Sydney were at home in their house in Dollar Street Cirencester where Julia was coping with a rather more modest staff than she would have been used to in her parents' house - just the three servants, all women. Sydney was less than a year old, Ada would be born within two months. After James had resigned from his post at the Royal Agricultural College, he and Julia tried at first to stay on in Cirencester, James giving private tuition to ex-students of the College. They did remain for a year or two, and Katherine Julia was born there. Their situation was untenable in the long term, however, and in the autumn of 1863 the family moved to Bradford Abbas near Sherborne in Dorset. John Savory had bought a farm there for his son-in-law, to give him income, and the security of not having to find employment working for someone else where it was likely that the same troubles that had dogged him at the College would probably revisit him.

John Savory's idea was to expand on the private teaching that James was already doing, by buying land where he could continue his botanical experiments and use them as the basis for his lessons, without interference from those who opposed James' results. And the idea did work to a certain extent. There was never any shortage of families willing to pay for their sons to be educated in the latest agricultural methods by James Buckman: there were always more applicants than would fit into the farmhouse. James was able to continue his botanical and geological studies, and his horticultural experiments resulted in a new, improved variety of parsnip which is still for sale now. He resumed his walking and collecting and was a founder member of what is now the Dorset Natural History and Archaeological Society. However, he had to do all this as a widower again. Julia Buckman died in 1865, either at her last child's birth, or a few days afterwards.

It looks from the census evidence as though, after Julia died, the decision was taken to break up the family to relieve James Buckman of the care of his children. On the day of the 1871 census Katherine Julia, her sisters Ada and Minnie, and her brother Percy were all living with John and Martha Savory at 22 Sussex Place Marylebone. John Savory had handed the pharmacy business on to his son Charles and to William Robert Barker who was probably an ex-apprentice. He and Martha were still very comfortably off - six female servants were employed to help Martha (now 63) with her young grandchildren; and one male servant probably worked directly for John Savory, who was still in practice as a GP. Sydney was probably at school: both he and (later) Percy went to Sherborne School.

John Savory was 71 on the day of the 1871 census. He died in October 1871 while on holiday in Sussex. His son Charles survived him by less than three years, dying in 1874. Katherine Julia and her siblings went through another period of upheaval. The Savory family ended any active involvement in the pharmacy business and William Robert Barker took it over. And Martha Savory chose to leave London after her husband died. She went to live at Little Oat Hall House in Burgess Hill Sussex. She took her grand-daughters Ada and Minnie with her and was still - even in her widowhood - able to pay a housekeeper, two ladies' maids, a housemaid, a kitchenmaid, a footman and a coachman, as well as a bailiff to run the farm that supplied the house. Katherine Julia probably went with her grandmother and sisters immediately after John Savory's death. By 1881, though, she was living in Dorset - probably for the first time since her infancy - and keeping house for her father: she and eldest brother Sydney were both at home at the farm in Bradford Abbas on the day of the 1881 census, with James Buckman and Thomas Dickinson, one of his pupils who perhaps couldn't get home for the Easter holidays. Katherine Julia was running the household - which was usually a lot bigger - with four servants. And Percy was at Sherborne School.

I have not been able to find out anything at all about any education Katherine Julia might have had. If John and Martha Savory had opted for a governess to educate their three grand-daughters at home, no such servant was being employed by them on the census days of 1871 or 1881. It's possible that the grand-daughters went to school; but they were not at school on the day of the 1871 census, or on the day of the 1881 census. I give evidence below that suggests Katherine Julia had had the religious education given to all middle-class girls. In most cases I'd expect that, but Katherine Julia's case is a bit different and I'd really like to know whether James Buckman's experiments in botany had caused him to have any religious doubts. However, in the 19th century it was still largely true that even if men doubted, their women were not expected to follow suit. Did James Buckman allow Katherine Julia to take any part or even to observe his work with parsnips or to go with him on trips in search of Dorset's geological and archaeological heritage? Historical work on James Buckman concentrates on his career as a naturalist and hardly mentions his family at all. I haven't found anything in the sources for his life which says what he believed or what he allowed his daughters to learn; and in any case, the decisions about his daughters' education may have been left to John and Martha Savory. Result: Katherine Julia's education - like the education of most women who joined the GD - is a complete mystery.

At the beginning of the 1880s, Katherine Julia's life so far had been characterised by death and dislocation and this pattern continued. James Buckman died in November 1884, and none of his children lived at the farm afterwards. Four months later, in March 1885, Martha Savory died. There's evidence to suggest she did leave at least her grand-daughters Ada and Minnie, and presumably Katherine Julia as well, some money; but again, none of her grandchildren lived at the house in Burgess Hill afterwards. Katherine Julia's sisters Ada and Minnie were living near Andover on census day 1891, at St Vincent Lodge Upper Clatford; and between them, they had enough income to afford a maid - most likely a housemaid - and a general servant. The two of them seem to have been particularly close; with Katherine Julia possibly playing an 'odd-sister-out' in their relationship. I believe neither of them married - Minnie definitely didn't - and that they lived together until Ada's death, which happened before 1901, I believe, though I haven't found any proof of that.

Katherine Julia was not living with her sisters on census day in 1891. She was keeping house for her younger brother Percy, who had trained at the Royal Academy schools as an artist and etcher. Brother and sister were living modestly, without servants, in a flat in Colville House, on Colville Square in Bayswater. Percy's career had either recently taken, or was about to take, a most exciting turn - he'd been recruited by the Egypt Exploration Fund (EEF) as an artist/illustrator. On census day 1891 he may have just returned from his first winter in Egypt. He was definitely there, with the EEF, for the 1891/92 digging season, working at Deir-el-Bahri, with Howard Carter amongst others; before being sent to Beni Hasan to take over copying the wall-paintings there from Marcus Worsley Blackden, who had left the camp mid-season, after disputes with Percy Newberry, who was leading the dig.

Having a brother return from exotic Egypt, laden down with illustrations of ancient tombs, must surely have caught Katherine Julia's imagination. Work by Percy was shown in the Egypt Exploration Fund's 1893 exhibition of recent work in Egypt, and I'm sure she went to see them, to fly the flag as his sister as they were some of the first paintings by Percy that had been exhibited in public. Perhaps the friends Percy made on these trips with the EEF talked to Katherine Julia about their work there and about ancient Egypt as a society where people used magic every day. Perhaps she invited her cousin Julian Baker and his schoolfriend Cecil Jones - both had trained as analytical chemists but they also shared an interest in alchemy - to hear these travellers' tales. Blackden may have been one of those travellers - he was initiated into the GD two months after Katherine Julia and his sister Ada (born 1872) became a member later. However, Katherine Julia had other contacts in the kind of social circles where the artistic, scientific and academic worlds came together. Her first-cousin Edwin, son of Edwin the bankrupted ironmonger, became an artist and printer and also taught art to Queen Alexandra and her daughters for several years. When Edwin and his wife Annie were in England - which they often were not - they lived in west London; as did Edwin's father Edwin, still alive in the early 1890s. The artist Edwin's younger brother Harry became a wood engraver; though he didn't live in London. Katherine Julia's elder brother Sydney was his father's heir in terms of James' work in geology and palaeontology. He earned a living by writing fiction under the professional name James Corin, while preparing the series of publications on the geology of the Cotswolds and Jurassic coast for which he is best known now. Sydney and his wife Maude were living in the Cotswolds in the 1880s and 1890s but Sydney was often in town for meetings of the Geological Society and Palaeontological Society. Though visits by Sydney to London won't have been an unadulterated pleasure for him or his relations: his palaeontological work was quite as controversial as his father's on grasses had been. Both its high standards of accuracy and its conclusions brought him into conflict with the scientific societies that had elected him a member.

Katherine Julia probably continued to keep house for her brother Percy until 1894 but in that year - the same year Julian Baker joined the GD - Percy acquired a different kind of housekeeper by marrying Caroline Bent. When Katherine Julia was initiated into the GD in her turn, two years afterwards, she was living at 20 St Charles Square, off Ladbroke Grove in Notting Hill. It is most likely that she was living with Percy and Caroline and their children. Though she might have been living in her own flat, most people still thought that was not something a respectable unmarried woman really did while she had relatives around to take her in, and in any case, Katherine Julia may not have been able to afford that level of independence. If she was living with her brother and sister-in-law, all parties may have been seeing the arrangement as a permanent one, given that she was now in her 30s and not likely to marry; and not having responsibility for running the household any longer should have freed up Katherine Julia's time for other pursuits - like being a member of the GD.

Or helping with the translation from French of a notorious book on the life of Jesus, part learned treatise on the origins of the works of the New Testament, part biography, but more like a novel than either of those genres. Early in 1898, aged 35, she married the book's main translator, William George Hutchison, a man ten years her junior.

William George Hutchison had been born in Scotland although his mother, Rosa, was from Devon. His father, Thomas Hutchison, was in business as a silk mercer and draper, and the family lived in Kirkcaldy. William George was born in Kirkcaldy around 1874, the second of four children. Neither he nor his elder brother Montague went into their father's business. Instead, they moved to London in the early 1890s. William Hutchison embarked on a career as a translator and editor, mostly working for The Walter Scott Publishing Company Limited and specialising, at least to begin with, in translating from French the works of Ernest Renan (1823-92), the political philosopher and expert on semitic languages and civilization. Renan had been brought up in Brittany as a Roman Catholic but had abandoned his faith for a scientific rationalism. His series of seven books grouped under one heading as The Origins of Christianity were all controversial but his Vie de Jésus outraged many conservatives. Published in 1863 (the year of Katherine Julia's birth) Vie de Jésus rapidly became hugely popular with those who were too aware of modern developments in science and textual criticism to continue with the religious beliefs they had been brought up with. But it offended others on a number of counts. To devout Christians, even the idea that Jesus could be the subject of a biography was heretical, as it reduced him to the level of any human being instead of a man set apart from all humanity as the only Son of God. The biography also denied Jesus' miracles. Jews were offended by Renan's portrayal of Jesus as a Jew who had to purge himself of all Jewishness before he could carry out his mission.

William Hutchison chose to begin his work of translation with the third book in Renan's set of seven: Antichrist (originally published in 1873) was published in 1892. Then he seems to have spent five years translating Vie de Jésus and must have met Katherine Julia Buckman during this time. When the book was finally published, his "chief thanks" went to her for her help which had been "as constant as it was valuable" during what he seems to have found a demanding and difficult process. There had been an English translation of the first edition of Vie de Jésus as early as 1863; and quite a few since. William Hutchison opted to translate the 13th edition, which contained Renan's later reflections on his subject matter. As part of the work of translation, the quotes used by Renan were collated with the Revised Version of the English bible; and I guess that it was this work that Katherine Julia contributed to the final product, which was published in 1897 and included a long Preface by William Hutchison on the context in which the original work had been written.

Katherine Julia's collation work on Vie de Jésus was probably done in 1896 and 1897. As she carried out this exacting task, she might have spent time reflecting that whereas books like On the Origin of Species and Vie de Jésus put into words the doubts that many people had about their faith in a rationalist age, some people still had no religious doubts at all, and that there were more monks and nuns in Britain than at any time since the reign of Henry VIII. In the middle of St Charles Square stood the new buildings of a Carmelite monastery, founded as an offshoot of a French order as late as 1878.

At the beginning of 1897, a deadline may have been looming which made Katherine Julia feel she must choose between her collation work and further involvement in the GD. Perhaps she and William Hutchison were engaged by this time; even if they weren't, quite yet, she was not going to let him down by saying she had other commitments, especially as the process of producing the book was proving so wearing. William Hutchison was having arguments with the publishers over exactly how much of Renan's original text to include. Many English-language editions of Vie de Jésus had left out the scholarly analysis and textual criticism with which Renan had introduced the main text. William Hutchison wanted to keep them in, in this new translation, but his bosses at The Walter Scott Publishing Company wouldn't have it. Katherine Julia may have felt that without her support, the translation would never even make it to the publishers. In addition, William Hutchison was never a member of the GD himself. Perhaps he disliked and resented Katherine Julia's involvement in an organisation about which she could tell him nothing.

For whatever reason, Katherine Julia left the GD after only a few months as a member, and it was clear that this was the result of careful thought and a clear-cut decision. Unlike many initiates, who just stopped going to the rituals and doing the study-work without telling anyone, Katherine Julia sent in a letter of resignation. If the myths and magic of ancient Egypt did inspire and intrigue her, it's a pity she didn't hang on a bit longer in the Order. She might then have had the chance to become a member of Florence Farr's Sphere Group which Florence founded specifically to study Egyptian symbolism and methods of invocation.

Perhaps it was Katherine Julia who persuaded William Hutchison to bow to the inevitable, because his The Life of Jesus was published with his own long preface in it but with Renan's original introduction cut. Hutchison worked on one more of Renan's seven-volume set for The Walter Scott Publishing Company: Marcus Aurelius, published 1903. But when it came to publishing his translation of another of Renan's seven, The Apostles, he put his foot down about Renan's chapter of textual analysis of the original documents, and insisted it be included with no cuts. The Apostles was published by Watts and Co for the Rationalist Press Association Ltd, a publishing company founded with the express purpose of getting the works of agnosticism and atheism to the wider public. In another departure from the approach of The Walter Scott Publishing Company, The Apostles was printed on cheap paper so that it could be sold at a low price and reach a wide public. Perhaps this was what William Hutchison had wanted for his The Life of Jesus.

In the years between 1898 and 1905 William Hutchison edited and prepared other translations and compilations (particularly of British poetry) for The Walter Scott Publishing Company; he wrote introductions to other works for them; and had books commissioned by other publishers as well, building up a reputation, particularly as a translator from the French. However, Katherine Julia wasn't thanked for her contributions to any of the other works by William Hutchison that I looked at. The Life of Jesus was published late in 1897 and - with the work finally done and some money coming in from its sales - Katherine Julia and William Hutchison were married. Household management and children duly followed and took up Katherine Julia's time. On the day of the 1901 census, William and Katherine Julia Hutchison were living in Hammersmith, at 5 Melrose Gardens, with their daughter Corinna (born 1899) and son Keith born just a month before census day. A month-nurse was a member of the household on census day but would be leaving soon. In general, Katherine Julia was managing with one general servant to help her. A second son, Laurence, was born in 1902 and sometime before 1905, Katherine Julia's sister Minnie came to live with the family. This was probably because Minnie was in poor health, no longer able to live alone: she died in December 1905, and left Katherine Julia her farm, Sandpits, at Bledlow in Buckinghamshire.

1904 to 1907 were years of very great difficulty and distress for Katherine Julia, certainly emotionally, perhaps financially and legally. Whatever religious beliefs she had must have been tried to the utmost. It's likely she was having to nurse her sister Minnie. Her brother Sydney's troubles with the Palaeontological Society came to a head in 1907 when the Society refused to publish his latest work on the Jurassic - it was published in the end but these disputes take their toll and his health was suffering. However, by far the most intractable problem for Katherine Julia during those years was the mental health of her husband. An increasing mental instability was perhaps reflected in or possibly even exacerbated by the kind of books he was working on in the early 1900s. In 1904 he wrote an introduction for The Walter Scott Publishing Company's new edition of James Anthony Froude's The Nemesis of Faith, a novel (originally 1849) about a priest's crisis of belief. Then he was asked to prepare a new, abridged edition of Tracts for the Times, originally published between 1833 and 1841 by members of the high-church Oxford Movement, to argue their case for a very conservative view of Christian religion. Bishop Wilberforce of the 1860 argument over On the Origin of Species was an Oxford movement member. William Hutchison's selection was published in 1906 and was the last work in which he was involved that was published in his lifetime.

Mental illness is still a taboo subject: we like to think it doesn't happen, or wouldn't happen to us. In Edwardian England, a toxic mixture of Christian morality and Darwinian evolutionary theories made its occurrence so shaming, some families locked away their mentally ill relations and pretended they had died. Katherine Julia first tried a different approach - the family moved to the farm at Bledlow, presumably in the hope that William Hutchison's health would improve in peaceful rural surroundings. Bledlow was near Thame, where Katherine Julia's brother Sydney and his family had moved in 1904. Living nearby, it would be easier for Katherine Julia to call on Sydney and Maude's help, now she was left having to cope with erratic behaviour - perhaps even violent behaviour - on her husband's part, as well as care for her children, who were not yet of school age. The move didn't work, however, and the decision was made to remove him from the family home to the City of London Mental Hospital at Dartford, which took fee-paying patients as well as people detained under the mental health acts. William Hutchison died at the hospital in May 1907, in his early 30s.

This is a bit speculative, but I think Katherine Julia felt the shame of mental illness in the family, though probably more on her children's account than on her own - the Darwinian idea of inherited characteristics had made people aware that the tendency to mental illness could run in families. She may also have wanted a fresh start after several years of traumatic events and the mourning of those who had died before you might have supposed they would. The difficulties Katherine Julia had faced as the wife, and then the widow, of a man who was mentally ill, may have influenced her brother Sydney to step right outside his normal sphere of subject-matter to write Mating, Marriage and the Status of Woman, published in 1910.

On the day of the 1911 census Katherine Julia and her children were at 2 Spenser Road Harpenden. Rents would be cheaper in Harpenden than in London, and the suburban setting better for her children's health; but Harpenden was also a place that none of the Buckmans had lived in or near before. Marian Lois Durnford, a teacher, was a member of the household on that day. Katherine Julia, filling in the census form as head of the household, described Miss Durnford as a visitor, but she may have been boarding with them during term-time - she was much younger than Katherine Julia and wasn't likely to have been a friend. Katherine Julia's income, from her own inheritance and perhaps from her dead husband's books, was enough for her to employ one servant to help her, but she might have been grateful - with the children all now at school - for a bit more from a lodger.

At least Katherine Julia didn't have to face mourning sons killed or lost in battle - Keith and Laurence Hutchison were born too late to fight in World War 1. Two of Katherine Julia's children did inherit something from their father; but it was not mental illness, it was writing and book-production skills. I believe Corinna went to university and graduated from Durham, taking advantage of opportunities Katherine Julia had never had. Corinna donated to the British Library a manuscript which contained some leaves of music probably written in the late 14th or early 15th century. It's believed that she had inherited it from her grandfather James Buckman, who had found it while doing antiquarian or possibly even archaeological work in the Augustinian abbey at Cirencester. Later Corinna followed in Katherine Julia's footsteps by helping prepare a book whose main author was a man in the family: her brother Keith thanked her for her proof reading of his Labour in Politics, published by the Labour Publishing Company in 1925. I haven't been able to find out anything more about Corinna's life. It would be nice to think of her as working as a proof reader; but I think I would have found out more about her, if she had. I've also found very little information on Laurence Hutchison except that he may have been a member of the Royal Aero Club; and might have moved to Australia. Keith Hutchison followed his father by becoming a writer and editor: he worked in London for the New York Herald Tribune and as financial editor of the magazine The Nation.

By the late 1920s Katherine Julia had moved back to London, to 35 Lancaster Road (now Lancaster Grove) in Belsize Park. Percy, Caroline and their family were living in south London: since 1898, Percy had been teaching art at Goldsmiths' College. In the early 1920s he was helping the art historian George Charles Williamson prepare The Art of the Miniature Painter; published in 1926 it was for several generations the standard work on the subject. Sydney, despite the opposition that his work on fossils provoked amongst other scientists, had doggedly continued his research, and he had - for the first time in his life - was even being paid to do work on specimens by the Canadian Geological Survey.

Katherine Julia Hutchison died on 23 August 1928. Her distant cousin, solicitor Ernest Jeffrey Charles Savory, was one of her executors. Her two brothers and her three children survived her. Sydney's conclusions about the Jurassic have been vindicated by subsequent research.

BASIC SOURCES I USED for all Golden Dawn members.

Membership of the Golden Dawn: The Golden Dawn Companion by R A Gilbert. Northampton: The Aquarian Press 1986. Between pages 125 and 175, Gilbert lists the names, initiation dates and addresses of all those people who became members of the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn or its many daughter Orders between 1888 and 1914. The list is based on the Golden Dawn's administrative records and its Members' Roll - the large piece of parchment on which all new members signed their name at their initiation. All this information had been inherited by Gilbert but it's now in the Freemasons' Library at the United Grand Lodge of England building on Great Queen Street Covent Garden. Please note, though, that the records of the Amen-Ra Temple in Edinburgh were destroyed in 1900/01. As far as I know, the records of the Horus Temple at Bradford have not survived either.

Family history: freebmd; ancestry.co.uk (census and probate); findmypast.co.uk; familysearch; Burke's Peerage and Baronetage; Burke's Landed Gentry; Armorial Families; thepeerage.com; and a wide variety of family trees on the web.

Famous-people sources: mostly about men, of course, but very useful even for the female members of GD. Oxford Dictionary of National Biography. Who Was Who. Times Digital Archive.

Useful source for business and legal information: London Gazette and its Scottish counterpart Edinburgh Gazette. Now easy to find (with the right search information) on the web.

Catalogues: British Library; Freemasons' Library.

Wikipedia; Google; Google Books - my three best resources. I also used other web pages, but with some caution, as - from the historian's point of view - they vary in quality a great deal.

SOURCES FOR KATHERINE JULIA BUCKMAN HUTCHISON

KATHERINE JULIA BUCKMAN AND JULIAN LEVETT BAKER ARE RELATED

The common ancestors are John and Mary Buckman who may be the people referred to at freepages.genealogy.rootsweb.ancestry.com/~wragg44/leigh/leighvol4.htm, a list of marriages that took place at Leigh Gloucester between 1754 and 1807. They include the marriage of a John Buckman of the parish of Deerhurst, to Mary Bishop of Leigh parish. By licence 11 August 1795. Witnesses: Ann Trinder, William Freeman.

KATHERINE JULIA BUCKMAN'S RELATIONSHIP TO JULIAN LEVETT BAKER

Julian Levett Baker's mother BESSIE HELEN BUCKMAN was the daughter of John Bishop Buckman and his wife Albinia: at www.swansea.gov.uk, items at Swansea Record Office, their access number D/D Z 97/15 a lease dated 30 November 1864. The parties to it are (1) Thomas Rees of Swansea, wine and spirit merchant; John Bishop Buckman of the Assembly Rooms Cheltenham "gentleman"; and Bessie Helen Buckman spinster daughter of John Bishop Buckman. (2) George Nott of Swansea market gdnr.

John Bishop Buckman lived in Cheltenham where he was lessee of the assembly rooms:

British Spas from 1815 to the Present: A Social History by Phyllis May Hembry, Leonard W Cowle, Evelyn R Cowle. London: Athlone 1997: p200.

At www.cheltenham4u.co.uk there's the 1858-59 edition of Slater's Commercial Directory of Cheltenham showing John Bishop Buckman as the lessee of 392 High Street, assembly and club rooms.

PO Directory of Gloucestershire issue of 1863 p238 shows John Bishop Buckman of the High Street as insurance agent for Scottish Amicable Life, as well as being lessee of the Assembly Rooms; and on p239, under the heading "Spas", as proprietor of the North Pittville Spa. On p226 the list of Cheltenham residents by surname has him as lessee of the Assembly Rooms, at 392 High Street.

KATHERINE'S FATHER JAMES BUCKMAN

Oxford DNB volume 8 p538 on James Buckman 1814-84, naturalist and agriculturalist. ODNB is now online at www.oxforddnb.com. <http://www.oxforddnb.com/WHAT'S> Geology and Religion: A History of Harmony and Hostility editor Martina Kölbl-Ebert. Published by The Geological Society in 2009 as their Geological Society Special Publication 310. One of the articles in the Evolution section 245-56: James Buckman (1841 to 1884): The Scientific Career of an English Darwinian Thwarted by Religious Prejudice. By H S Torrens, whose sources include a manuscript autobiography by Katherine Julia's elder brother Sidney Savory Buckman, written 1928; and papers held by Peter Buckman (b 1918) and Olive Buckman his sister (b 1919).

BANKRUPTCY OF JAMES BUCKMAN'S BROTHER EDWIN

London Gazette p3505, I couldn't quite see the date but it was 1844: legal notice of impending bankruptcy proceedings against Benjamin Norman and Edwin Buckman of Cheltenham, ironmongers. A hearing due 4 November following a bankruptcy order against them issued 1 June 1844.

On the Origin of Species by Charles Darwin. First edition London: John Murray 1859. 2nd edition 1860; into its 4th 1866, still in print, of course. See the text at darwin-online.org.uk. Wikipedia gives the exact date of publication as 24 November 1859.

LOUISA ELIZABETH DUNN

Her baptism: familysearch England-EASy GS film 350598.

The marriage: familysearch England-ODM GS film number 0376937 to 939

JOHN AND MARTHA SAVORY and JULIA SAVORY - it's amazing what you can piece together from Ancestry's census and probate records!

JAMES' SONS AT SHERBORNE SCHOOL

Via archive.org to The Sherborne Register 1823-92; compiled Harry H House published for the school 1893: p171.

KATHERINE'S BROTHERS

SYDNEY SAVORY BUCKMAN 1860-1929

See catalogues of the British Library and the British Museum of Natural History for lists of his works on geology and palaeontology, particularly his seven-volumes on ammonites. The volume that so offended the Palaeontological Society was: A Monograph of the Ammonites of the Inferior Oolite Series published by the Society in 1907.

American Journal of Science volume 18/218 1929 p96: an obituary.

Some modern assessments:

Milestones in Geology: Reviews to Celebrate 150 Volumes of the Journal of the Geological Society edited by Michael John Le Bas. Geological Society 1995 as Geological Society Memoir Number 16. Article by J H Calloman of University College London pp127-150: Time From Fossils: S S Buckman and Jurassic High-Resolution Geochronology. Most of the article is serious geology but there is some biographical information. This is the source for Sydney as a novelist with the writing name of James Corin. However, the only work I found in the British Library catalogue under that name is Mating, Marriage and the Status of Woman. London and Felling-on-Tyne: Walter Scott Publishing Company Ltd 1910. Google didn't come up with any novels by James Corin either. It might just mean that Sydney's fiction works were published in instalments in magazines rather than as books. However, I'm a bit uncomfortable about this.

Comparative Planetology, Geological Education and History of Geology by Wang Hongzhen 1997 p205-206 S S Buckman 1860-1929.

As well as his palaeontological and geological books and - possibly - works of fiction, there are a couple of other kinds of books by Sydney in the British Library: Arcadian Life by S S Buckman Fellow of the Geological Society. London: Chapman and Hall 1891. It's a fictional account of a walking holiday in a rural Arcadia; with illustrations by his brother Percy.

Sydney's wife Maude Mary Holland:

At tribalpages.com information on the Holland family including births and deaths.

Via google to A History of the Family of Holland of Mobberley by Edgar Swinton Holland.

PERCY BUCKMAN 1865-1948

Dictionary of British Artists 1880-1940: p84.

At www.artfact.com in 2013 I saw reproductions of some works by him: Goring Church; Valley of the Kings; 2 nudes.

Percy's work for the Egypt Exploration Fund:

Nature: International Journal of Science volume 48 1893 pxix and p159.

Times 15 July 1893 p7: exhibition of recent work in Egypt, organised by the EEF.

Beni Hasan published by the Egypt Exploration Fund 1893 authors Newberry, Griffith, Fraser.

Site report Beni Hasan: Zoological and Other Details published 1900 by the Archaeological Survey of Egypt. Authors: Howard Carter, Marcus Worsley Blackden, Percy Brown, Percy Buckman, Percy Edward Newberry.

American Journal of Archaeology volume 8 1893 p583.

Archaeological Survey of Egypt editor F L Griffith. Zoological work and other facsmiles by Percy appear in Part IV: "Seventh Memoir Beni Hasan". Published EEF 1900.

The Rock Tombs of Deir el Gebrawi Part I 1902: the plates are Percy Buckman's work.

Percy Buckman's later career:

Studio International volume 73 1918 pxi staff list Goldsmiths' College.

lists staff at Goldsmiths' College School of Art. Percy Buckman teaches life drawing and painting.

Works by Percy in exhibitions of the Society of Miniature Painters are mentioned in the Times: 16 May 1930 p14; 16 May 1933 p12; and 12 May 1936 p14, in which his work catalogue number 200 was singled out for special praise.

THE ART OF THE MINIATURE PAINTER in which Percy Buckman was co-author with the collector and art historian George Charles Williamson.

Times 21 May 1926 p12: next week's publications.

The Art of the Miniature Painter by George Charles Williamson with Percy Buckman. London: Chapman and Hall 1926.

Times 18 February 1953 p10 in the obituary of miniature painter Nellie M Hepburn Edmunds, Williamson and Buckman is mentioned as the standard work on the subject of miniatures.

George Charles Williamson: there's a wikisource listing his (many) contributions to the 1911 edition of Encyclopaedia Britannica and to the 1913 edition of the Catholic Encyclopaedia.

Who Was Who volume IV 1941-50 p 1243. Just noting that he also wrote books of advice for antique collectors and so probably knew GD member Herbert Slater.

Some modern works which mention Percy:

Saluki: The Desert Hound and the English Travelers who brought it to the West. Brian P Duggan and Terence Clark 2009. P55 on Beni Hassan.

Howard Carter: The Path to Tutankhamun by T G H James. London: Kegan Paul 1992 p46-47. And one which doesn't:

Flinders Petrie: A Life in Archaeology by Margaret S Drower. University of Wisconsin Press 1st edition 1985; 2nd edition 1995. Percy Buckman isn't in the index so I guess he and Flinders Petrie never met.

KATHERINE JULIA'S COUSIN THE ARTIST EDWIN BUCKMAN

At www.allposters.co.uk you could buy (as at 3 April 2014) prints of works by him, with titles such as A Match at Football (rugby not football); The Flower Market Covent Garden. None were dated.

Via genesunited to Gloucester Citizen and other papers in that area issue of 16 October 1930 - an obituary of Edwin Buckman.

And again via genesunitied to Gloucester Journal of 22 November 1930 Edwin's wife's name is Annie MacDonald Buckman.

KATHERINE JULIA AND THE GD

Cauda Pavonis was the newsletter/journal of the Hermetic Text Society. At www.alchemywebsite.com/cauda.html there is a list of articles pubd in it, beginning 1982 but it's no longer being published unfortunately. When it was published it was issued by the Dept of English, Washington State Univ at Pullman. In volumes 11-16 1992 pp7-12, article by Sharon E Cogdill on Florence Farr's Sphere Group. Cogdill lists the group's "mortal" members - there were others, of course, from the universe beyond sight; Katherine Julia was not amongst them.

Florence's article Egyptian Magic was published in Collectanea Hermetica volume VIII 1896, not under her own name but using the short-form of her GD motto - SSDD; editor of the series was William Wynn Westcott.

A compendium of Florence's writings on magic has now been published by the Golden Dawn Research Trust as volume 1 in its The GD Legacy series: The Magical Writings of Florence Farr edited and with a foreword by the Trust's Darcy Küntz. 2012.

Marcus Worsley Blackden did publish some short works on the Egyptian mysteries but not until years after Katherine Julia had left the GD:

An article in Occult Review volume 5 number 6 June 1907 p305: The Wisdom of the Mysteries in Egypt.

A short pamphlet: Ritual of the Mystery of the Judgement of the Soul in which Marcus Worsley Blackden published his translations of selected pieces of the Book of the Dead, put together to form a modern ritual. London: Rosicrucian Society of England 1914.

WILLIAM GEORGE HUTCHISON

Works in the British Library catalogue:

1892 Renan's Antichrist. As translator and editor. The Walter Scott Publishing Company Ltd as The Scott Library volume 108.

1897 Life of Jesus by Ernest Renan. As translator and writing the Introduction. The Walter Scott Publishing Co Ltd. Katherine Julia is thanked on pvii of the preface but is not a co-author.

1898 Lyra Nicotiana: Poems and Verses Concerning Tobacco. As editor. The Walter Scott Publishing Co Ltd

1900 Home in War Time. Poems by Sydney Dobell 1824-74. As compiler and editor. Vigo Cabinet Series number 2.

1902 The Cynic's Breviary. Maxims and Anecdotes from Nicolas de Chamfort (?1740-94). As compiler and translator. London: Elkin Mathews.

1903 Poor Robin's Almanack: Selected Verses, and a Calendar of British Poets. As author of the Preface but not as compiler. Orinda Booklets Extra Series number 6.

1903 Marcus Aurelius by Ernest Renan. As translator and writer of the introduction. The Walter Scott Publishing Co Ltd. With a second edition 1904.

1904 Songs of the Vine; With a Medley for Malt-Worms. As the editor and compiler.

London: A H Bullen.

1905 The Apostles...by Ernest Renan. As translator. London: Watts and Co.

1905 Words of a Believer originally by Hugues Félicité Robert de la Mennais. As translator.

London: S C Brown, Langham and Co

1905 Sir John Suckling: Ballads and Other Poems. Sir Charles Sedley: Lyrics. John Wilmot Earl of Rochester: Poems and Songs. As author of the preface. Pembroke Booklets number 4.

1906 Tacitus and Other Roman Studies. By Marie Louis Antoine Gaston Boissier. As translator. London: A Constable and Co.

1906 The Oxford Movement. Being a Selection from Tracts for the Times. As editor and writer of the introduction. London and Felling-on-Tyne: The Walter Scott Pubg Co Ltd.

Listed in the BL catalogue under FROUDE:

1904 The Nemesis of Faith by James Anthony Froude. As author of a new introduction. The Walter Scott Publishing Co Ltd. The Scott Library volume 121.

Apparently not published in Hutchison's lifetime:

1970 The Poetry of the Celtic Races, and Other Studies As translator and author of the introduction and notes. London: Kennikat Press.

ERNEST RENAN

See a thorough biography on wikipedia.

A modern reference to Renan's work and Hutchison's translation, in The Historical Jesus and the Literary Imagination 1860-1920 by Jennifer Stevens. Liverpool: Liverpool University Press 2010 p75 in a section headed 19th Century Lives of Jesus: footnote 29 and footnote 39.

RATIONALIST PRESS ASSOCIATION

A brief page on it, based on the RPA's annual reports, is at humanistheritage.org.uk, the website of the British Humanist Association.

Blasphemy Depot: A Hundred Years of the Rationalist Press Assoc Bill Cooke. Published by the RPA 2003 gives details of how, when and by whom it was founded. William Hutchison was not in the index and he wasn't listed as a founder member.

CITY OF LONDON MENTAL HOSPITAL

Wikipedia on Stone House, previously the City of London Lunatic Asylum; at Stone near Dartford.

Via www.nationalarchives.gov.uk/hospitalrecords to further information.

KATHERINE JULIA HUTCHISON'S CHILDREN

All of them are named in Cassell's Little Folks volume 75 1911 p394 in the middle of a big list, possibly of current readers.

CORINNA

I searched freebmd for a marriage registration for her but couldn't find one 1925-35.

For information on the manuscript with music in it see www.diamm.ac.uk the Digital Image Archive of Medieval Music. British Library additional Ms item GB-Lbl Add.39255(N).

Searching for her on google, I got very little response. I did get a link to Durham University calendars 1918-19 and 1921-22 but when I got the calendars on the web and did a search, nothing was found.

KEITH

Labour in Politics by Keith B Hutchison. Labour Publishing Co 1925: in the preface p5 he thanks his sister Corinna Hutchison for her proof reading. So Corinna hadn't married by 1925.

Familysearch had 3 records of him arriving at Ellis Island: 1925; 1937; 1944. Eventually he must have taken US citizenship. Familysearch had US social security number 061-12-0461 for him, and a date and place of death: 15 July 1987 at 661 Heritage Village, New Haven Connecticut. Described as a retired writer and editor.

Collected Letters of Robinson Jeffers by Robinson Jeffers, James Karman and Una Jeffers. Keith Hutchison was a correspondent of Jeffers: brief details of him on p733.

LAURENCE

Using google, the only response I got was at ancestry.com.au so perhaps he emigrated. It was a GB Royal Aero Club aviator's certificate issued to him at some date between 1910 and 1950.

26 May 2014

Amandragora@attglobal.net

Find the web pages of Roger Wright and Sally Davis, including my list of people initiated into the Order of the Golden Dawn between 1888 and 1901, at:

http://pws.prserv.net/Roger\_Wright/

***

Percy William Bullock was initiated into the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn at its Isis-Urania temple in London in September 1890. He chose the Latin motto 'Levavi oculos'. He was well-versed in the occult already, and worked through the GD's study programme for initiates quickly. He was initiated into its inner, 2nd Order on 3 July 1892. For over ten years he was one of the GD's most committed and hard-working members. He also married another GD member.

Pamela Carden was initiated into the GD at its Isis-Urania temple on 22 March 1892. Her father and her mother were both members already. Pamela chose the Hebrew motto 'Shemeber'. She too completed the GD's study programme very quickly and was initiated into the inner, 2nd Order on 20 June 1893.

Percy William Bullock and Pamela Carden were married in 1894.

THE BULLOCK FAMILY

Percy William Bullock was the son of a man who owned a ladies' outfitters in central London. Percy William's father, Francis, was born in Abingdon on the border of Oxfordshire and Berkshire. In the 1850s he did an apprenticeship in a draper's shop in Leighton Buzzard and then went to work in Henry P King's draper's shop at 139-140 High Street Southwark - a big business by 1850s' standards, where Francis was one of 14 employees - before setting up in business for himself in the mid-1860s at 72 Edgware Road, a short distance from Marble Arch. Francis Bullock married a woman called Annie Elizabeth; but I can't find any record of the marriage. Annie Elizabeth was a Londoner, possibly born in Whitechapel. Her original surname might have been Straughan; but I couldn't find any evidence to prove that. I don't really know anything about Percy William's family on his mother's side.

Once married, Annie Elizabeth spent the best part of 15 years being pregnant. Percy William, born in 1867, was Annie Elizabeth's and Francis' eldest surviving son; but two boys may have been born before him and died as infants. Percy William had one older sister, Clara Annie; and at least seven, possibly nine, younger siblings: Ethel Mary (born 1870); Mary or possibly Mary Ann (born just before census day 1871); Fanny Maud (born 1872); Nellie Florence (born 1873); Horace Straughan (born 1874); Eva Agnes (born 1875); Minnie Daisy (born 1876); and Albert Edward (born 1879).

The Bullock children were born in time to benefit from the 1870 Education Act, and it's likely that they were all educated at schools run by the London School Board. Percy William's sister Ethel Mary later worked for the LSB as a teacher of deaf children. In 1881, Francis Bullock employed five assistants, including two young women; but by 1891 Annie Elizabeth and Clara were working in the shop and only one person outside the family was employed in it. It might have been the long hours of shop-work and the uncertain income; it might have been a wish to educate some at least of their children out of the commercial classes (a very Victorian desire); but none of Francis and Annie Elizabeth's sons went into the family business. Horace emigrated to New South Wales (probably in the 1880s) and I don't know what work he did there. Albert Edward trained as an architect (which you did on the job at that time). And Percy William went to work as a clerk in a solicitor's office.

Percy William will have left school aged 14 or 15 - in 1881 or 1882. I don't know where he worked in his first few years out of school. He might have been worked for Ashurst Morris Crisp and Co, whose managing clerk William Capel Slaughter and newly qualified solicitor employee William May left in 1889 to found the legal firm Slaughter and May. Slaughter and May specialised then, as they do now, in company law and finance. Percy William Bullock was definitely working for them in 1893, and was still doing so in 1902. His place of work will have been Slaughter and May's original offices at 18 Austin Friars in the City of London.

PERCY WILLIAM IN THE TS AND THE GD

Outside his working hours, Percy William was heavily involved in the occult in the early 1890s and probably in the 1880s (I don't have so much information about the 1880s). He was a member not only of the Golden Dawn but also of the Theosophical Society (TS): his application to the TS is dated 1891 but the impression I've got from my research is that he had been interested in western occultism for several years by then. He could have begun his voyage of discovery, for example, by reading Helena Petrovna Blavatsky's Isis Unveiled, which was published in 1877; it dealt with the relationship between religion and contemporary science. He could have found out more about Christian esotericism in 1884, by reading articles on the subject published in the spiritualist weekly Light by Anna Bonus Kingsford, who founded the Hermetic Society as an offshoot of the TS in that year. This might have encouraged him to read Kingsford's The Perfect Way; or the Finding of Christ, which was an account of a series of visions she had experienced. He definitely did read Kingsford's 1885 publication, The Virgin of the World as one source for the talk he gave on hermetic philosophy in 1892.

The Hermetic Society only met between 1884 and 1886. I don't think it's very likely that Percy William was a member - what little records exist of it suggests that the members were above his social milieu; and even if I'm wrong and he had been a member, he couldn't have got to meetings of the Society very often - they were held on weekdays during working hours. However, an interest in Dr Kingsford and her works will have led him to the TS in the end; where he would have met G R S Mead, whose research into the supposed works of Hermes Trismegistus was published as Thrice-Greatest Hermes in 1906. He would also have met William Wynn Westcott, who was a senior member of the TS and already an experienced occultist. In the mid-1880s Westcott was working on his translation of the Hebrew esoteric text Sephir Yetzirah. It was published in 1887 as The Book of Creation and in a talk on hermetic philosophy in 1892 (see below for more on that), Percy William mentioned Sephir Yetzirah; he didn't specifically say he'd read Westcott's translation but I imagine he had.

Percy William will also have got to know Frederick Leigh Gardner at the TS; they shared an interest in alchemy. It's most likely to have been William Wynn Westcott who put Percy William and Frederick Leigh Gardner in touch with his alchemist acquaintance the Rev William Alexander Ayton; both men knew Ayton before the GD was founded. From the late 1880s at least until 1905 if not longer, Ayton was sending manuscript copies of the many alchemical texts he possessed, for Percy William and Gardner to copy and return. Ayton and Gardner corresponded regularly from 1889 to 1905 and Gardner and his wife stayed with the Aytons several times. No letters sent between Percy William and Ayton survive but there definitely was a correspondence, though it seems that Percy William didn't go and stay with the Aytons. How friendly Percy William and Gardner were is not clear to me; I haven't found any evidence - for example - that the two of them worked on Ayton's manuscripts, or alchemical experiments together.

It was probably so that he could study in peace and have somewhere to copy the manuscripts he had borrowed, that Percy William moved out of his family home and took lodgings nearby, at Miss Inglis's boarding-house at 22 Upper George Street Bryanston Square, in the late 1880s; though his absence will also have freed up valuable space at 72 Edgware Road where the family and Francis Bullock's unmarried employees were all cramped in above the shop.

The Hermetic Society closed after Anna Bonus Kingsford died in 1888 and all its members had to seek western occultism elsewhere. I'm sure many of them joined the GD as Percy William did. Percy William also became a regular at the TS's Friday evening discussion group where you could hear talks on a wide range of theosophical and occult subjects. In due course, the discussion group became a TS lodge in its own right - Adelphi Lodge. William Wynn Westcott lectured regularly at the discussion group; and Jabez Johnson and Oswald Murray were both members of Adelphi Lodge in the early 1890s and later joined the GD, possibly recommended to Mathers and Westcott by Percy William. In 1893, Percy William, William Wynn Westcott and GD member Frederick Leigh Gardner attempted to revive the Hermetic Society under the wing of the TS. However, the Esoteric Section lasted only 18 months, rather overtaken by the power struggle that consumed the TS in 1894-95.

Percy William was a very busy man in the early 1890s, heavily involved with both the TS and the GD; though I'm sure that he saw them not as rivals for his time, but as two sides of the same occult coin: at the TS you talked about or listened to occult theory; at the GD you put occultism into practice as magic.

During 1891-92, when he was doing the study necessary to get into the GD's inner, 2nd Order, Percy William was also working on a series of talks for the TS. He gave his talk on hermetic philosophy twice, in March 1892 at the TS's Friday discussion group, and in December 1892 at the TS's Brixton Lodge. In this talk, which was aimed at people who knew a little but not a lot about the subject, Percy William kept it simple and based his argument on named texts that his audience might have heard of: the Smaragdine (or Emerald) Tablet - particularly the French 19th-century occultist Eliphas Levi's work on it; The Divine Pymander of Hermes Mercurius Trismegistus; and Sephir Yetzirah. As he reached the end of his talk, Percy William departed slightly from the academic and rather earnest tone that was typical of talks at the TS and gave one of the few glimpses I've found in all my GD researches, into the true feelings of any of its members - about the world he lived in, and his employment in the City of London, financial and legal centre of the British Empire: he described the majority of people he saw as "callous" and as existing in a state of "oblivion about things spiritual". He hoped, though, that the oblivion was just a phase, to be replaced in due course by "a clearer and more universal illumination".

His hope was quite misplaced.

Between his two talks on hermetic philosophy, in April 1892, Percy William also lectured at the discussion group on Electricity and Occultism. In February 1893 he gave a talk to the discussion group on Egyptian Belief Theosophically Considered. His choice of subject was influenced by Helena Petrovna Blavatsky's Isis Unveiled, regarded as a text-book of theosophical belief by TS members. Percy William had been working on the ideas in that book with Herbert Coryn, a leading member of Brixton TS Lodge who was also in the GD. Later in 1893 Percy William gave one final talk, Occultism past and Present, also at the discussion group. The hermetic philosophy and Egyptian belief talks were later published in the TS's compendium volume, Theosophical Siftings, together with Percy William's essay On Gems (1893). The last item that Percy William worked on in this period of intense study was the introduction to Westcott's edition of a copy The Chaldaean Oracles of Zoroaster (owned by GD member Marcus Worsley Blackden) which was published in 1895. However, the most sustained piece of work he did at this time was a translation of Cicero's Somnium Scipionis (part of the sixth book of Cicero's De Re Publica), which had interested occultists for many centuries because it was about astrology and astronomy. The translation was published in late 1894, in Collectanea Hermetica volume 5 as The Vision of Scipio Considered as a Fragment of the Mysteries; Percy William appearing as Levavi Oculos rather than under his real name, as its translator and as author of an essay on its occult importance.

The Collectanea Hermetica series is eight volumes (I think) published during the 1890s, edited by William Wynn Westcott and containing many contributions by GD members. As Westcott was a senior member of the TS, most of the eight volumes were reviewed in Lucifer, the TS's main magazine during the early 1890s. However, in Lucifer's review of Somnium Scipionis both Percy William and - by implication - Westcott, fared badly at an anonymous reviewer's hands. The problem the reviewer found was not with the translation: he (I'm sure it was a he for reasons I'll state in a minute) thought that was "creditably" done. It was Percy William's essay that he didn't like - the attempt to connect the Somnium to the ancient mysteries failed to convince him. He also criticised Percy William's understanding of the classical world, saying (for example) that he didn't know enough about the Stoic tradition to write about it with authority. And that's why I'm sure the reviewer was a man, and from a particular social group as well: in the 19th century, with very few exceptions, only boys of the professional and upper classes received the kind of education that was based on the classics - Latin, Greek, ancient civilization. Percy William's attempt to translate an item from the classics had exposed the limitations of his local school board education. The reviewer might also have felt that those who had not had a classical education should not muscle in on the ground of those who had, and if they dared, then woe betide them. The reviewer's picking out of an error in attribution, however, brought Westcott into the sphere of his criticism: he thought Westcott should have spotted it and corrected it (Westcott was another man unlikely to have had a classical education).

Lucifer's review must have been tough to swallow. A second unenthusiastic review, this time in the occult magazine The Unknown World, might have been a little easier to bear because it was almost certainly by A E Waite, whose magazine The Unknown World was. Percy William will have known that Waite had no time for Mathers or Westcott or any of their works. However, two such reviews perhaps encouraged Percy William to feel that in translating occult works he was getting out of his depth. His introduction to The Chaldaean Oracles was his last published work as far as I can see; and he also gave no more talks at the TS. He did, however, continue to work on the alchemical texts the Rev Ayton was lending him; though probably not at quite the same level of commitment.

Percy William's willingness to volunteer, and his ability to think 'organisation and method' in the midst of all the occultism, meant that at the same time as he was doing all that occult study he was also spending time helping run both the TS and the GD. In 1892 he was honorary secretary to the TS's Blavatsky Lodge. In the first half of that year he was sub-cancellarius of the GD; being promoted to cancellarius by August of that year. As cancellarius he was in charge of the GD's move from Thavies Inn to Clipstone Street; a process that took from August to October 1892. He continued in-post - doing things like reminding members to pay their annual subscriptions - until March 1896.

For some of his period as cancellarius, Percy William was also honorary secretary of the Ananda Lodge, part of the TS's Esoteric Section. This was founded at a meeting in November 1893 and was intended to meet on one Sunday afternoon each month for work on strictly Indian texts and disciplines, including meditation and probably yoga. At the outset it had eight members, all men. Percy William and William Wynn Westcott were two of the eight and the only ones to be GD members as well. In July 1894 Frederick Leigh Gardner became a member at about the same time he was initiated into the GD, but that was bad timing: in the next few months the controversy over the claims of William Quan Judge began to engulf the TS and attendance at Ananda Lodge's meetings declined. Percy William went to his last Ananda Lodge meeting in September 1894, and the Lodge was disbanded in November 1895.

Ellic Howe reports in The Alchemist of the Golden Dawn that Percy William was amongst those who didn't really want Annie Besant to run the TS. Those who took this attitude were no doubt aware that Besant preferred Hinduism to Buddhism as a basis for western theosophy and was likely to take the TS in that direction; however, they may also not have cared for Besant's style of management. For whatever reason, Percy William and the Cardens too had all resigned from the TS by 1896. Percy William's spell as the GD's sub-imperator (March to December 1896) was also the last administrative job he did for the GD until the crisis of spring 1900.

There are a couple of reasons why Percy William might have curtailed his work for the GD in December 1896. One was the ejecting of Annie Horniman from the GD by Samuel Liddell Mathers, for reasons more to do with money than with magic. But another was the changes in his life that were being brought about by his marriage to Pamela Carden.

The very latest that Percy William Bullock could have encountered members of the Carden family was during March 1891, when Alexander James Carden and his wife Anne Rule Carden had their initiations into the GD. I think it's just as likely that Percy William met them earlier than that: Alexander James was the first to join the TS officially, in November 1891; but the sponsors of his application were W R Old and Alice Gordon, both long-standing friends of Helena Petrovna Blavatsky, so the whole family could have been moving in theosophical circles for years before. Alexander James' wife Anne Rule Carden joined the TS in 1892; and their elder daughter Pamela joined in 1893, the only one of their children to do so. By the time of her application to the TS, Alexander James and Anne Rule Carden were members of the GD and Pamela had been in the GD for a year (again, the only one of their children to be initiated), so all three of the Cardens knew Percy William Bullock very well.

The Cardens have their own biography in my set, with Pamela's early life (what I know of it) included there. Here I'll just say that, like the Bullocks, the Cardens came from a business background, though a very different business background. Alexander James' father was Sir Robert Walter Carden, stockbroker and banker. When I first started investigating the Cardens I assumed that all Sir Robert's descendants were very wealthy. Now I'm not so sure, but Alexander James had enough income from investments and dividends to be able to choose not to follow any profession. He and his wife and their children lived rather modest lifestyles, on the whole, and in the first two decades of the 20th century Percy William may have had a larger annual income than some of his in-laws.

When Pamela Carden applied to be a member of the TS, Percy William Bullock was one of her sponsors; so they were at least very friendly by then, and may already have been engaged to be married. They married in June 1894 and began their life together at 62 Oakley Square, near Euston Station, a house taken on a short lease by Percy William on behalf of the GD, which used some of the rooms for its meetings and rituals. By 1898, however, Percy William and Pamela had moved 69 Thornton Avenue in the new estate of Bedford Park. Several GD members lived in Bedford Park but by 1890s standards it was quite a long way out of town - it was in Chiswick, West London - and it wasn't so easy for Percy William to drop into the GD offices on the way home from work, as he had often done when living off the Euston Road. You could have many more rooms for much less rent in Bedford Park, however, and the air was better, less polluted by the smoke of coal fires and industry - a health factor that Victorians set much store by and something that may particularly have weighed with the Bullocks and the Cardens as I've got the impression (perhaps a mistaken one) that Pamela Bullock's health may have been such as to worry her family. There are letters from Pamela to Frederick Leigh Gardner, for example, from 1897 and possibly 1898, in which she mentions being so ill as to be in bed and in "the depths of invalid misery" when he called on the Bullocks one day; and another mentioning that she was hoping to make up some cures from a copy of Culpeper's Herbal that she'd recently bought. With the spells of illness went periods of depression, when she thought of herself as "no use to anyone, but only a burden". The quotes come from a letter in which Pamela was obliged to refuse Gardner's invitation to undertake some magic with him. Pamela was flattered that Gardner had asked her, amongst all the GD members who were more experienced than she; it must have been a continual frustration for her to have to refuse chances like this because of her ill-health.

Although Pamela smoked, so knowing what we know now, we might think she contributed to her own health problems. Percy William smoked as well, a habit that Samuel Liddell Mathers found a bit difficult to cope with (not being a smoker himself) when Pamela and Percy William were staying with him and Mina Mathers in Paris in September 1895. Annie Horniman was visiting Mina and Samuel Liddell at the same time and she was a chain-smoker - poor Mathers!

It's hard to know, now, exactly who was friends with whom amongst the GD members outside the GD meetings; but in the Warburg Institute collection there are letters to Gardner from William Wynn Westcott indicating that their families knew each other well; one from Helen Rand inviting the Gardners to Sunday lunch with her and her husband; and one from Pamela Bullock, dated 3 February 1896, accepting Gardner's invitation to her and Percy William to have dinner at Gardner's house and meet Gardner's wife. Mrs Gardner was never a GD member, so this dinner party moved the relationships between Frederick and the Rands and the Bullocks out of magic and into the ordinary social world.

Gardner ran an informal book buying service, specialising in occult works, and quite a few GD members used this service. Letters in the Warburg Institute show Westcott and William Sutherland Hunter regularly buying books through him. In 1897 Pamela Bullock asked Gardner to find her a copy of Culpeper's Herbal and both she and Percy William were delighted with the one he got for them. In her thank you letter Pamela makes it clear that she's intending to make some of its herbal remedies. Medical herbalism is a very old form of alchemy but in deciding she would try it out, Pamela was going well beyond what the GD expected of its members; as far as I know, the GD never studied medical herbalism, either in theory or in practice. Perhaps she was hoping that herbal remedies would cure her ills when ordinary doctors seemed unable to.

PERCY WILLIAM TRAINS AS A SOLICITOR

I don't know enough about the law during the 1890s to be sure when and under what circumstances Percy William was allowed by his employers to change jobs from being a clerk like many others, to being an articled clerk, training to qualify as a solicitor. Whether it was policy at Slaughter and May to promote their better clerks like this; or whether the influence of Pamela Bullock's family was brought to bear, I can't say. Either way, it was an opportunity Percy William did not turn down. A need to study for professional exams would certainly help explain why he dropped out of the TS and cut back on his work for the GD in the mid-1890s. Percy William described himself as an articled clerk to the 1901 census official, and took his final exams late in 1903. It was probably this serious commitment of time and effort that he was thinking of when, in a letter to Annie Horniman in mid-December 1900, he wrote "I can do no work for a long time to come" (he means magical work, of course).

THE SPLITS IN THE GD

In the late 1890s Samuel Liddell Mathers' behaviour as one of the GD's rulers became more and more dictatorial. Despite Percy William's need to concentrate on his legal studies, he and to a lesser extent Pamela were senior figures in the GD and could not help but be dragged in to deal with the consequences of Mathers' increasingly arbitrary and paranoid behaviour. In December 1896, both Percy William and Pamela signed a petition to try to get Mathers to rescind his expulsion of Annie Horniman from the GD; but both of them submitted - with most of the other people who signed it - when Mathers reminded them of their magical vows and ordered them to obey him. As Mathers hadn't bothered to tell Westcott he'd expelled Annie, it was left to Percy William and Pamela to do so. These days it seems to be understood by all GD historians that it was Mathers who, early in 1897, told Westcott's employers that he was a prominent member of a secret society. They ordered Westcott to resign from all his official positions in the GD and of course Westcott had to do what they demanded. Percy William and Pamela were amongst those GD members who wrote to or visited Westcott to say how very sorry they were that he felt he had to limit his involvement in the GD from now on. Whether they realised Mathers' part in the affair we don't know. It all seems to have hit Pamela particularly hard: writing to Frederick Leigh Gardner in May 1897, Westcott mentioned that Pamela was considering resigning from the GD herself. However, there may have been another reason why Pamela Bullock should have been feeling like that: her father, Alexander James Carden, was possibly very ill by this time - he died on 23 July 1897.

Between 1897 and 1900, Percy William and Pamela continued to be friends with Westcott and did their best to stay on good terms with the Mathers; though it looks like they stopped visiting them in Paris. I doubt if Samuel Liddell Mathers was at all grateful but in 1897, Percy William organised a whip-round of GD members to help him and Mina through a difficult time financially. Pamela thought better of her wish to resign from the GD, and in the reallocation of administrative tasks made necessary by Westcott's resignation (he had quietly got through a lot of the GD's membership and exam work in the years between 1888 and 1897) she agreed to take responsibility for organising meetings and collecting annual subscriptions. She continued to do that job through the series of shocks that hit the GD between 1900 and 1903.

In February 1900 three years of upheaval within the GD began when a group of its most senior members held a meeting to discuss the possibility - spelled out by Samuel Liddell Mathers in a letter to Florence Farr - that the documents on which the GD based its legitimacy as an occult order were fakes. Percy William was at that meeting, and he became secretary to the committee set up as a result of it, to discover whether what Mathers had told Florence Farr was true. The obvious person to interview on the matter was William Wynn Westcott; and Percy William was the second person to attempt to get some kind of statement out of him. He - like W B Yeats before him - failed to get Westcott to say anything definitive, and during the rest of 1900 the committee began to act on the assumption that Mathers had been telling the truth, and to move towards a future in which the GD would operate without either Westcott or Mathers. Pamela was not a member of the committee and in any case, after there will have been several months in which she will have been in mourning and so not around to help: at the end of July 1900 her younger brother Alexander died of enteric fever in South Africa.

In 1901 Percy William acted as the GD committee's secretary in two incidents that have become well-known in GD history: Aleister Crowley's attempt to take possession of the 2nd Order's headquarters in Blythe Road Hammersmith, on Mathers' behalf; and the seeing off of two dubious Americans who later came back to haunt the GD as Mr and Mrs Horos. In April it was Percy William who struck Crowley's name from where Crowley had written it on the list of 2nd Order members; and who informed Crowley that the committee did not recognise his initiation into the 2nd Order by Mathers. These assertions of the committee's right to rule were a big step on the road to leaving Mathers behind. And in December Percy William was the third GD member to encounter Mr and Mrs Horos in London. He met Mr Horos rather than Mrs - she was too stout to climb the stairs! Percy William did allow Mr Horos to attempt to spin a yarn for him, but realised that his visitor must be the male half of a couple he'd been warned about by GD member Robert Nisbet some months before. He told Mr Horos that he and his wife's dubious reputation had preceded them from Paris (where they had talked their way into Mathers' confidence) and, "To cut a long story short he [Mr Horos] retired discomfited".

In the summer of 1901, Pamela's brother Robert Walter had married Ethel Johns. I hope that Percy William and Pamela had brought their respective brothers together, because Robert Walter Carden and Albert Edward Bullock had things in common: they had both trained as architects, and they were both interested in the history of art and architecture, both publishing books on the subject in the years before World War 1. Though the specific art they studied reflected their very different backgrounds: Albert Edward focused on English sculpture and wood-carving and one of his books was an early account of the work of Grinling Gibbons; unlike Robert Walter and Ethel he couldn't spend several years in Italy translating Italian art books.

Robert Walter and Ethel Carden had only been married a few weeks when Percy William's father died. Percy William's mother Annie Elizabeth had died in 1896 and on the day of the 1901 census only Clara, Ethel and Albert were still living above the shop with Francis Bullock. Clara described herself as a milliner's assistant which I'm supposing meant that she was helping her father run the business. Percy William's sisters Mary and Eva were married by this time and Minnie may have been; as far as I can tell, Nellie never married and I don't know where she was living in 1901. As his father's executor, Percy William's main task was to close down the drapery business - Clara got married as soon as her period of mourning was over, and no one else was willing, let alone experienced enough, to take the shop on. The winding-up of his father's affairs occupied Percy William during the early part of 1902 and was probably the reason why he didn't act as Chief Adept at the GD's Whitsun ritual - he'd been specially invited to take that role but wasn't able to get to the ceremony. In 1903, Francis Bullock's ladies' outfitters was being run, at its old address, by Pettit and Co.

Percy William had managed to find time to attend the 2nd Order's annual meeting on 3 May 1902. At that meeting a public acknowledgement of the GD having moved on from Mathers and Westcott was made when its members voted to hand decision-making to three 'chiefs' - Percy William, Robert Felkin and John Brodie-Innes - for the next 12 months. All three stood for re-election in June 1903 but none got enough votes to serve; and that year's annual meeting ended with A E Waite taking charge of the 2nd Order. This opened up the biggest breach yet within the GD, which ended with it dividing into two daughter orders, Waite's Independent and Rectified Order (or Rite) and Felkin's Stella Matutina.

Such a vote of 'no confidence' in his, Felkin's and Brodie-Innes' actions during their one year in office caused Percy William to send in his resignation from the GD: he was a man who could take it on the chin when he had to and in any case, he had his legal studies to focus on. Pamela, however, did play an active part in the break-up of the GD. She was one of fourteen 2nd Order members who signed Waite's manifesto (dated 24 July 1903) for what became the Independent and Rectified Order/Rite (known in shorthand as the RR et EC). She probably attended the new order's inauguration on 7 November 1903. R A Gilbert has described the RR et AC as leaning more than the GD had ever done towards freemasonry, while still allowing women a role. Percy William was one of eight ex-GD 2nd Order members who joined the RR et AC during its first year. He never played a big role in it, though, opting instead to pursue his interest in alchemy alone when he had time. At least up until 1905, he was still borrowing manuscripts from Rev Ayton and the two men were still in touch on a regular basis - so much so that Ayton wanted Percy William and Frederick Leigh Gardner to act as executors of his Will (though when he died in 1909, someone else was his executor).

Pamela was probably a member of the RR et AC until Waite closed it down in 1914. In 1913 she introduced her friend Lucy Waterfield as a prospective member: it seems that Lucy had been living with the Bullocks, at least some of the time and at least since 1911, perhaps keeping Pamela company. Pamela and Percy William did not have any children. Pamela's mother Anne had been living with Pamela's younger sister Rowena since Alexander James Carden's death; they seem to have spent quite a lot of time abroad perhaps visiting Robert James and Ethel in Italy.

I haven't been able to find out whether Pamela and Percy William were members of magical orders in the 1920s; the membership records for those orders seem to have been lost. In the early 1920s Pamela, at least, was still pursuing her interest in the mystical side of the occult, and in 1923 she wrote a short play, An Advent Mystery. She had kept up with occult contacts she had made in the 1890s: John M Watkins of Watkins' Bookshop (known to many GD members in the 1890s though never a member himself) published her play for her, using the women-run Women's Printing Society of 31 Brick Street W1 to print it, perhaps on Pamela's instructions. Having read the play, I have no real idea what to make of it - but then I make no secret of the fact that I'm no occultist. The main characters are biblical: Mary mother of Jesus; Martha as her sister; and their mother Anne. However, Mary is married not to the biblical Joseph but to Phildeus. Phildeus - the love of God - can only be seen by those whose Souls have reached a certain level of awareness that - as Pamela says in her foreword - the love of God is all around. The play is not a straightforward update of the biblical Mary and Martha; nor of the Annunciation. It's an allegory of the Soul's journey towards Love, full of symbolism which is spelled out very carefully in the stage directions as well as clear in the text. Its plot, such as it is, is Martha's journey from sisterly jealousy and resentment to the same level of awareness of the Love of God that Mary shows from the beginning.

Just a thought: in the play's first scene, Mary and Phildeus have been married for several months but their marriage has not been consummated. Consummation has to wait until Mary is ready; and takes place in between acts 1 and 2. Pamela makes clear that the consummation is as much spiritual as sexual; which almost made me wonder whether Percy William and Pamela had agreed on a marriage without a sexual relationship, like Samuel Liddell Mathers and Mina Bergson are thought to have done. But that's just my wild imagination and I daresay the Bullocks were childless because it didn't happen, not because they wanted to be. If Pamela had wanted children but never had any, she must have found writing the long scene in Act 2 in which Mary looks forward to the birth of her son rather difficult.

One aspect of An Advent Mystery that interested me as a researcher of the GD is that a lot of the text is laid out as poetry not dialogue and it's clear from Pamela's stage instructions that some of it was to be sung or possibly chanted. It sounds as though Pamela was thinking of the method of performance - for example of poetry by W B Yeats - that GD member Florence Farr developed in the 1900s where the words were not actually sung, but were definitely more chanted than spoken, and in which she accompanied herself on a lyre made for her by Arnold Dolmetsch. Two other women in the GD also had a go at this kind of almost-musical method of recitation, so Pamela could have been quite familiar with the idea, at least.

In a paragraph before the Foreword, Pamela says that some music had been composed for the play, which would be published with the text if public interest justified it; which it apparently didn't, because I haven't found any copies of a words-plus-music edition of An Advent Mystery. Pamela didn't give the name of the composer; perhaps she had written the music herself.

Here is a song/chant from the end of the play (Pamela's capitals):

Holy Mystic Numbers, Numbers One to Ten,
Breathing out from Unity, breathing back again.
ONE is the Beginning, ONE the utter end,
ONE is Peace and Harmony, ONE is Love and God.

When we broke the crystal ONENESS
Into countless jagged shards
We drowned the shrinking spirit in diversity and drea.
ONE is the Beginning, ONE the utter end,
ONE is Peace and Holiness, ONE is Love and God.

From ONE to ten the stream flows out,
Then turns again to ONE;
But slow the second journey is and sluggish flows the stream.
ONE is the Beginning, ONE the utter end,
ONE is Peace and Harmony, ONE is Love and God.

We are many,
We are ONE
ONE is many.
Many, ONE.

'Holy Mystic Numbers' isn't, actually, a very good illustration of what I mean, but I found An Advent Mystery antiquated, in style and in concept. By the time An Advent Mystery was published, we'd had The Waste Land, Ulysses and Jacob's Room (all 1922) and early work by e e cummings (1923). Not that any of those sold in huge numbers, and perhaps Pamela had never heard of any of them; but they did help fire the starting-gun for modernist literature. Pamela's dancing flowers and fairies (bringing gifts for Mary's son-to-be) and the use of 'nay' and 'tis' do seem very Victorian to me. However, An Advent Mystery did show that Pamela's interest in Christian mysticism continued beyond any definite involvement in occult societies. Not just Christian mysticism, either: at the start of the book are two short quotes, a couple of verses by Hafez or Hafiz; and an aphorism by Jalaluddin-Rumi, both translations from the Persian - an interest Pamela had probably inherited from her father (see my biography of the Cardens for a bit more on that).

PERCY WILLIAM AS A SOLICITOR

In December 1903, Percy William took and passed his final law exams and qualified to practice as a solicitor. Early the following year, he resigned from Slaughter and May and set up his own business, Bullock and Co. From 1904 to 1919 the company worked from offices 65 London Wall in the City, and in the early years at least it also had bases at Bedford Park and in Bournemouth. In 1919 it moved to 7 Stone Buildings in Lincoln's Inn. Because of some misfortunes which I'll deal with below, I know that until around 1925 Bullock and Co did well, earning Percy William between £400 and £500 per year. Percy William became known for his excellent financial dealings on his clients' behalf. The company was able to fund Percy William's and Pamela's move to 90 Sunningfields Road, an 11-roomed semi-detached villa in the north London suburb of Hendon. They were also able to employ more servants. On the day of the 1901 census, still living in Bedford Park, Percy William and Pamela were employing the one live-in servant considered to be the basic requirement of middle-class-ness. By 1911 they employed a cook and one housemaid.

Bullock and Co may have specialised in patent applications - though I don't want to read too much into the patent applications I found via google, as patents are well-represented on the web while the other elements a solicitor might specialise in are not. Patents were certainly not the only thing Percy William did as a solicitor: I've also found evidence of him doing mortgage deals and conveyancing - typical solicitor stuff. Did members of the GD use him as their solicitor? He was liked and trusted by most of the Order's members who knew him (for a notable exception, read on a little way). Unfortunately, though, it's been difficult to find any evidence. I have only one piece of evidence, in fact, and it might be a special case.

Late in 1910, the racing paper The Looking Glass involved itself in occult matters by printing an article on Aleister Crowley's Rites of Eleusis, which had recently been staged in London. Ex-GD member George Cecil Jones was the last member of the GD to still be friendly with Crowley and do magic with him. Jones took exception to something that was said in the article, which - he thought - implied that the friendship was a criminal one, that (though the word was not used) it was homosexual. Jones went to Percy William for advice about whether he could sue the paper for libel.

Percy William and George Cecil Jones had kept up their friendship in the years since they had ceased to be active members of the GD. Jones shared Percy William's interest in alchemy, although he was much more knowledgeable, especially on the practical side - he was a trained chemist. After a couple of decades spent working for other people, Jones had set up in business as a chemical analyst and I think it's likely that Percy William was the business' solicitor. But even if he was not, Jones might have chosen to consult Percy William on the question of whether he had grounds to sue, given the people he might have to call as witnesses in a trial - such a trial might turn out to be a rather occult affair. I'd love to know what advice Percy William gave Jones when Jones consulted him. In his place, I would have suggested that Jones grit his teeth and try to ignore it - after all, The Looking Glass was not a paper likely to be read by many people who knew him, and the offending paragraph was quite discreet really, with no names mentioned. But a solicitor can only advise. If the client insists on carrying on with legal action that's likely to end in embarrassment or worse, the solicitor must do his best for him or her despite their reservations. Jones insisted on going ahead and Percy William's first step will have been to take the advice of a barrister on the likelihood of winning the case; perhaps hoping the barrister might talk Jones out of going further. Either the advice favoured Jones' case; or Jones was too determined for his own good; because the case did go to court, in April 1911, generating plenty of publicity, with names, and being covered in detail by the Times amongst other papers.

Although Crowley was the other person supposedly libelled in the paragraph Jones found so offensive, he didn't sue; and he didn't appear in the Jones v The Looking Glass case as a witness. In his Confessions Crowley suggests that Jones hadn't wanted to ask him to give evidence, in case he made things worse; though it might equally well have been Percy William who had advised against letting Crowley say anything in court. Jones and his advisors called on Samuel Liddell Mathers and Edward William Berridge as more trustworthy witnesses to the nature of the friendship he had with Crowley; and both men did give evidence. Writing about the trial, Crowley described Percy William as a "mild mystic addicted to alchemy". Though Crowley did not intend it that way, he makes Percy William sound like a very nice person; but perhaps Crowley was right when he also suggested that such a person was not at all suited to giving legal advice in such a difficult case. Crowley blamed both Percy William and Jones for their choice of barrister, saying that a more experienced man was needed to argue Jones' case than the newly-qualified Mr Simmons who had represented him. I'm sure Percy William hired the best man he could, but Crowley was ignoring the fact that as a self-employed married man with a family, Jones' financial means were limited.

The outcome of the trial was farcical but I don't think what happened was the fault of any lack of effort on Percy William's part. After two days of evidence and cross-examination, the jury gave a most peculiar verdict that suggested they did think Jones and Crowley were in a homosexual relationship; but that they still thought Jones had been libelled. As to whether it damaged Jones' reputation; or the friendship with Percy William, I can't say. I hope that Percy William didn't have to handle too many cases as awkward and public as that one; and that if Jones had been a regular client of Bullock and Co, that he continued to be so.

As I mentioned just above, all went well for Bullock and Co until the mid-1920s. In the early 1920s Percy William got together with George Handley, a garage owner and inventor based in Palmer's Green (at that time on the very edge of north London). I found several patents registered in both the UK and the USA in their joint names and although I don't fully understand how the patented machinery worked, it all involved different types of rotary pumps. One of the patents was for a pump for a refrigerator; but most were for pumps in vehicles, including one which (according to my scientific advisor Roger Wright) sounds like an early attempt at getting fuel injection to work, thus dispensing with the need for a carburettor. In his partnership with George Handley, Percy William provided the finance and the legal expertise, while Handley was the technical expert. The combination worked well and earned both parties money; and Percy William began to look around for other inventions he could invest in. Unfortunately, he was a bit too keen, and got involved with someone who had - to put it mildly - a chequered past, money-wise.

Percy William met Robert Brownlow of Hendon Scientific Laboratories in 1925. Brownlow called himself a chemical engineer and inventor, and he probably was those things, but... Anyway, he persuaded Percy William to fund some inventions he was working on. Percy William raised £15,000 from various sources including his own money, and set up a company, Scientific Research Limited, with him and Brownlow as its share-holders (each owning at least 100 shares) and its two directors. The company rented premises at Brent Green in Hendon and kitted them out as laboratory in which Brownlow could work on his ideas. There was one in particular, apparently, coyly described by the Times as “a new proprietary article of universal utility” - I suppose we’ll never know what it was.

As 1925 turned into 1926, Brownlow was asking for ever more money, so in the autumn of 1926 he and Percy William advertised for more investors, offering a wage and a directorship in return for their money. Emil Schwarz was amongst those who answered the advert; but very shortly after handing over his cash, he began to smell a rat and went to the police. Why Percy William had not smelt one already I do not know. I think he was in dereliction of his duty as a solicitor in not checking up on Brownlow. Perhaps he was too excited about Brownlow’s inventions to act properly; perhaps he thought he needn’t be so stringent in his checks as usual, as he was the major investor. Goodness knows - the whole thing is very out of character for Percy William. Bankruptcy is a rather public process - finding out whether someone has gone bankrupt is not difficult. It didn’t take Schwarz and the police long to discover that Brownlow was an undischarged bankrupt; I presume it was Schwarz who informed Percy William of the fact, in November 1926. There are restrictions on what any undischarged bankrupt can do, financially. One of them was that he was not allowed to act as the director of any company; and yet in December 1926, Scientific Research Ltd was set up with Percy William, and Brownlow, as its two directors. Brownlow resigned as a director only a few weeks later; but then Percy William compounded the mess he was getting into, by appointing someone to take Brownlow’s place who did not own the requisite 100 shares in the company. All this was breaking the law - what was Percy William doing?

Brownlow was sent for trial in January 1927, charged with breaking the rules covering the actions of undischarged bankrupts. Charges of fraud were considered, but dropped. I haven’t been able to find out whether he was found guilty, but in the initial hearing it was revealed that he’d been bankrupt three times before - so he really couldn’t say he didn’t know the rules.

Scientific Research Ltd Brownlow went bankrupt, owing £3408, and Percy William seems to have been left by Brownlow to deal with the creditors. As early as June 1926 Percy William been so involved raising money for Scientific Research Ltd that Bullock and Co had been suffering because he wasn’t doing any legal work; and in October 1927 he’d been obliged to take a job as a manager at someone else’s solicitor’s firm - a step that pushed him back 20 years into his own past. In January 1928 the Board of Trade called in a firm of accountants to act as official trustees of Bullock and Co. Percy William was declared personally bankrupt, with claims against him totalling £7836. The Law Society revoked his licence to practice and he had to go to court to get it back.

In May 1928 the bankruptcy court decided to allow Percy William to practice law again, as in general he’d had (I quote the Times’ report on this, perhaps based on the Judge’s actual words) “an honest and good business record”. By November 1928 Bullock and Co were back at work, doing the conveyancing in the sale of a shop in south London. I don’t think that Percy William ever recovered financially though; I wonder, too, whether a lot of his former clients stayed away from a man who'd come such a financial and legal cropper. One client who did not stay away was GD member Julian Levett Baker, a professional chemist who shared Percy William's interest in alchemy. Julian and Percy William were joint executors of the Will of Julian's mother, who died in 1932.

Percy had only been back in business a few months when on 30 September 1929, Pamela died, aged only 58 and about 20 years before any of her siblings died (apart from Alexander). Her mother Anne had lived until 1924 so Pamela only survived her by five years. Perhaps Pamela's days were shortened by the financial traumas of 1925 to 1928; though I do stand by my belief that her health may never have been very good. She seems not to have been able to do anything to prevent her husband getting so far out of his financial depth; and may even have been persuaded to invest Carden family money in Brownlow's schemes.

Percy William and Pamela were childless and I do see Percy William's last few years as rather lonely. He carried on working - he had no choice, really, having lost all his savings. He died in September 1940. I hope that in this last decade of his life, Percy William stuck by the sentiments he had expressed at the end of his 1892 talk on hermetic philosophy. He had said: "Hermetic philosophy is...a union of the reason and the religious instinct" offering "a key to unlock the mysteries of being and is a testimony to the eternal aspiration of man to become united with the Divine". I hope that he still believed in the truth of that, and that his belief helped him rise above what I think must have been some bleak last years, both personally and when he looked at what was happening in the wider world.

BASIC SOURCES I USED for all Golden Dawn members.

Membership of the Golden Dawn: The Golden Dawn Companion by R A Gilbert. Northampton: The Aquarian Press 1986. Between pages 125 and 175, Gilbert lists the names, initiation dates and addresses of all those people who became members of the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn or its many daughter Orders between 1888 and 1914. The list is based on the Golden Dawn's administrative records and its Members' Roll - the large piece of parchment on which all new members signed their name at their initiation. All this information had been inherited by Gilbert but it's now in the Freemasons' Library at the United Grand Lodge of England building on Great Queen Street Covent Garden. Please note, though, that the records of the Amen-Ra Temple in Edinburgh were destroyed in 1900/01. As far as I know, the records of the Horus Temple at Bradford have not survived either.

Family history: freebmd; ancestry.co.uk (census and probate); findmypast.co.uk; familysearch; Burke's Peerage and Baronetage; Burke's Landed Gentry; Armorial Families; thepeerage.com; and a wide variety of family trees on the web.

Famous-people sources: mostly about men, of course, but very useful even for the female members of GD. Oxford Dictionary of National Biography. Who Was Who. Times Digital Archive.

Catalogues: British Library; Freemasons' Library.

Wikipedia; Google; Google Books - my three best resources. I also used other web pages, but with some caution, as - from the historian's point of view - they vary in quality a great deal.

SOURCES FOR PERCY WILLIAM BULLOCK AND PAMELA CARDEN BULLOCK

For Francis Bullock's business at 72 Edgware Road: Post Office Directories.

PERCY WILLIAM'S ADDRESS IN 1893

R A Gilbert's The Golden Dawn Scrapbook: The Rise and Fall of a Magical Order, published 1997 York Beach Maine: Samuel Weiser Inc. On p45 there's part of letter from Percy Bullock 1893 giving the address 22 Upper George St, Bryanston Square, requesting the GD's yearly sub of 10 shillings per person. PO Directory 1893 street directory section p693 for Miss Inglis.

DEATH OF FRANCIS BULLOCK

Probate Registry volume for 1902: Francis Bullock of 72 Edgware Road died 25 July 1901. Probate granted London 30 January 1902 to Percy William Bullock "articled clerk". Personal effects £2732/10/6.

London Gazette 28 February 1902 p1814 notice issued 25 February 1902 by Slaughter and May of 18 Austin Friars, solicitors for Percy William Bullock, executor of the Will of Francis Bullock of 72 Edgware Road, "Draper", who had died 25 July 1901. All Francis Bullock's creditors were to contact Slaughter and May by 10 April 1902.

PO Directory 1903 street directory section p378 Pettit and Co, ladies' outfitters, now at 72 Edgware Road.

PUBLICATIONS BY ALBERT EDWARD seen on Amazon.com

- 1908 Some Sculptural Works of Nicholas Stone Statuary 1586-1647
- 1914 Grinling Gibbons and his Compeers
- 1917 English Architectural Decoration
- 1920 Westminster Abbey and St Margaret's Church

PERCY WILLIAM AND PAMELA'S HOUSE IN HENDON

90 Sunningfields Road Hendon.

Website www.thepeerage.com which is based on information in Burke's Peerage 107th edition, gives it a name: The Staithe.

The Estates Gazette volume 159 1952 p560 had an advert for the one remaining flat in 90 Sunningfields Road. House described as double-fronted, semi-detached.

PERCY WILLIAM AS A LEGAL CLERK

That Percy was employed by solicitors Slaughter and May: Warburg Institute Gerald Yorke Collection catalogue number NS73 includes a note from Percy to Frederick Leigh Gardner, dated 14 November 1893 and written on Slaughter and May's headed notepaper.

Post Office London Directory 1900 law directory p2624 Slaughter and May's offices are at 18 Austinfriars.

Dictionary of Business Biography Volume V p187 for details of Sir William Capel Slaughter and Slaughter and May. Born 1857 son of Secretary of the London Stock Exchange's share and loan department.

Seen 16 February 2010 www.slaughterandmay.com now work from offices at 1 Bunhill Row: international lawyers specialising in mergers, acquisitions and corporate finance. Founded by William Capel Slaughter and William May in 1889 after they had qualified doing their training together, at Ashurst Morris Crisp and Co.

PERCY WILLIAM AS A SOLICITOR

Law Lists don't have his name in them until 1905.

The Weekly Notes of the Incorporated Council of Law Reporting for England and Wales, volume 38 1903 p319 in a list of people taking the solicitor's Final Exam on 2 and 3 November 1903: Percy William Bullock.

Law List 1905 p396 London solicitors: Bullock with date January 1904 and 2 addresses - 65 London Wall and Turnham Green.

Times Thursday 11 July 1907 p16 Partnerships and Investments Section: advert from Bullock and Co of London Wall, on behalf of clients wanting to mortgage a property for £550; the property is in the City and has leasehold tenants in it.

Law List 1907 p413 London solicitors: Bullock at 65 London Wall and Bournemouth.

Law List 1908 p413 London solicitors: Bullock at 65 London Wall only.

Law Journal Reports New Series volume 80 part 7 1911 p88 refers to Percy William Bullock acting as solicitor in p89 Curtis v Beaney in the Probate, Divorce and Admiralty Division.

BULLOCK GETS INVOLVED IN JONES V THE LOOKING GLASS The Confessions of Aleister Crowley: an Autohagiography editors John Symonds and Kenneth Grant. London, Boston Mass, Henley: RKP 1979: p635, 641-42, 759.

Coverage of Jones v The Looking Glass from Times 27 April 1911; you can now download this as a pdf file.

Law List 1920 p483 London solicitors: Bullock and Co is now at 7 Stone Buildings Lincoln's Inn.

PERCY WILLIAM AND GEORGE HANDLEY some patents from 1920s

Official Gazette of the US Patent Office volume 299 1922 p134 patent on a rotary pump with ejector. The holders of the patent were George Handley of Palmer's Green London with half of the patent assigned to Percy William Bullock. Note filed 23 November 1920.

At www.patentmaps.com a series of references to patents applied for by George Handley and PWB:

- ref GB 147283 and GB 147280 applications for patent 16 April 1919; patent granted 16 July 1920. For a mount for a pump
- ref GB 159258 application for patent 13 November 1919; patent granted 14 February 1921. It's f a rotary pump discharge outlet
- ref GB 171860 application for patent 8 October 1920; patent granted 1 December 1921
- ref GB 187115 patent granted 19 October 1920; an endless chain machine

At this website I also saw one patent held by George Handley alone; and several held by George Handley and J B Carr from 1943-45.

At the US equivalent, www.freepatentsonline.com patents held by George Handley and Percy William Bullock presumably on the same inventions as the UK patent website:

- US Patent Number 1335577 30 March 1920; rotary pump
- US Patent Number 1353745 21 September 1920; rotary pump for pumping liquids
- US Patent Number 1418921 6 June 1922; rotary pump with ejector

Refrigerating World volume 55 1920 p24 has exactly the same description of the item as that in US Patent Number 1353745 so it's probably the same invention: Serial Number 333022 filed 24 October 1919.

Seen April 2013 at website www.alladdress.co.uk a garage called George Handley is still in operation in Palmer's Green: car body repairs on a site behind the ex-Woolworths.

PERCY WILLIAM AND ROBERT BROWNLOW

The Times had no mention of Brownlow in 1923, 1926, 1928 and the item below is the only one for 1927, so I don't know very much about his previous three bankruptcies.

Times Sat 22 January 1927 p9 Industrial Chemist Sent for Trial: report covered the appearance of Robert Brownlow at Bow St police court "yesterday". The third bankruptcy (1923) was mentioned in this report. Brownlow pleaded not guilty and was sent for trial. There was no more coverage of the case in the Times.

Chemist and Druggist volume 106 1927 p122 also had a report on Brownlow's Bow St appearance and gave a few more details about his past ventures.

PERCY WILLIAM'S PERSONAL BANKRUPTCY

Times Wednesday 1 February 1928 p24 Legal Notices: an announcement dated 30 January 1928 by the Board of Trade that it had appointed an official trustee for Percy William Bullock as he was bankrupt.

Times Thursday 17 May 1928 p5 A Solicitor's Discharge: barrister Mr Warrington acted for Percy William Bullock.

Times Monday 26 November 1928 p28 Property Page: Bullock and Co acting as solicitors in the sale by auction of 8 Spring Gardens. The auctioneers are Hiller, Parker May and Rowden who specialise in shops.

BANKRUPTCY OF SCIENTIFIC RESEARCH LTD

The Chemical Age volume 19 1928 p586 issue of 22 December 1928. Under the heading "Winding-up", a statement from the official receiver in the winding-up of Scientific Research Ltd of Brent Green Works Hendon: a statement of the firm's liabilities had been submitted by directors Robert Brownlow and Percy William Bullock on 11 October 1928.

Chemical Trade Journal and Chemical Engineer volume 83 1929 p552 also covers the winding-up of Scientific Research Ltd and gives a few more details.

PERCY WILLIAM'S DEATH

Law Times volume 190 1940 p158 a very short note recording the death of Percy William Bullock, solicitor, on ?14 (I couldn't read the number clearly) September 1940.

Last appear of Bullock and Co is in Law List for 1940 p482 London solicitors - still at 7 Stone Buildings Lincoln's Inn. Firm is not in the Law List for 1941.

PERCY WILLIAM BULLOCK AND THE OCCULT

ISIS UNVEILED

Biography of Anna Bonus Kingsford and her founding of the Hermetic Society by Samuel Hopgood Hart. My copy was printed in 2013 by Kessinger Publishing but originally it was the Biographical Preface to a much longer work, Hart's Credo of Christendom and other Addresses and Essays on Esoteric Christianity. Via the web it looks like the full book was published in 1930. On p5 Hart states that Helena Petrovna Blavatsky's Isis Unveiled was regarded by all TS members as the TS's "chief text-book". For example: as she had not mentioned reincarnation in the book, reincarnation was not a doctrine put forward by the TS, at least during the early 1880s.

ANNA BONUS KINGSFORD

Biography of Anna Bonus Kingsford and her founding of the Hermetic Society by Samuel Hopgood Hart. I got my copy in 2013 from Kessinger Pubg but originally it was only the Biographical Preface to Hart's Credo of Christendom and other Addresses and Essays on Esoteric Christianity published in 1930. The Biography: footnote on p2 says that many of Kingsford's talks at the Hermetic Society were also published in the journal Light. In the book Hart describes his search for Kingsford's papers, and his eventual conclusion (p70) that Maitland had destroyed virtually all of them, on finishing his biography of Kingsford. So no list of the members of the Hermetic Society is extant. Hart reproduces an invitation to the 1884 series of talks at the Society on p29: the talks would be on Thursdays at 5pm. On p29 Hart describes the inauguration of the Society on 9 May 1884; some scant details of where it took place, and who was there. Because of Kingsford's illness (p47) no sessions of the Society were scheduled for 1887 and in fact it never met after 1886. Kingsford died (p52) on 22 February [1888].

Re the journal Light: Janet Oppenheim's The Other World: Spiritualism and Psychical Research in England 1850-1914. London Cambridge: Cambridge University Press 1985. It was founded (p42) by Edmund Dawson Rogers, founder-member of the British National Association of Spiritualists; and also of the Society for Psychical Research. (P46) Light was founded as a weekly spiritualist newspaper in January 1881. It still exists, though now as a quarterly.

Website www.answers.com says both Samuel Liddell Mathers and William Wynn Westcott gave lectures at the Hermetic Society; website does not give a source for this information. No talks by either of them are mentioned in Hart's book, which I'm a bit worried by, but Hart is concentrating on Kingsford, he doesn't even cover talks at the Society by Maitland.

Influential publications by Anna Bonus Kingsford; from the British Library catalogue:

The Perfect Way; or the Finding of Christ. London: Field and Tuer 1882; revised and enlarged edition 1887. And several later editions including one published in 1890.

The Hermetic Works: The Virgin of the World. This was a translation, not an original work, with an essay, introduction and notes by Dr (sic) Anna Kingsford and E Maitland. London: G Redway 1885.

Dreams and Dream Stories, edited by Edward Maitland. London: G Redway 1888

The biography referred to by Hart is: Anna Kingsford, her life, letters, diary and work. By Edward Maitland. London: G Redway 1896.

There is one modern biography: Red Cactus: the life of Anna Kingsford by Alan Pert. Watson's Bay NSW 2006. Pert is highly critical of Maitland's work, suggesting that Maitland was going out of his way to play down Kingsford's role in her own life, and to exaggerate Maitland's own.

GRS MEAD's work on hermeticism: Thrice-Greatest Hermes. London and Benares: Theosophical Publishing Society 1906.

MANUSCRIPT LOANS

The Alchemist of the Golden Dawn: Letters of the Revd William Alexander Ayton to Frederick Leigh Gardner and Others 1886-1905 edited and with an introduction by Ellic Howe. Aquarian Press 1985. The letters used for the book were all written by William Alexander Ayton to Frederick Leigh Gardner; Howe didn't find any letters from Ayton to Percy William. During the 20th century the letters to Frederick Leigh Gardner made their way into the occult collection of Gerald Yorke which is now in the Warburg Institute, University of London.

PERCY WILLIAM IN THE THEOSOPHICAL SOCIETY

Just noting that the TS only began keeping systematic records in the late 1880s, when it had already been in existence for nearly a decade. Theosophical Society Membership Register January 1889-September 1891 p97 immediately after Annie Besant, the application of Percy W Bullock. No application date (this usually indicates someone who's been a member for some time). Subscriptions paid 1892-94 only. Addresses during membership:

22 Upper George Street Bryanston Square

62 Oakley Square Hampstead Road

Branch = Adelphi

THE TS'S ANANDA LODGE IN ITS EASTERN SCHOOL OF THEOSOPHY

The information on Ananda Lodge was kept by its president, William Wynn Westcott, and has found its way into the Freemasons' Library. It includes:

- FML's call number GD 7/4/5 Westcott's set of Lodge rules, prepared by Percy William as its Secretary.
- FML's call number GD 7/4/6 the Lodge Minute book covering its monthly meetings during the whole period of the Lodge's existence - 19 November 1893 to 3 November 1895. The Lodge had eight members including three who were in the GD: Westcott, Bullock, and Frederick Leigh Gardner who didn't join until July 1894. Westcott's record-keeping had got very desultory by early 1895; very few of the members were coming regularly to the meetings by that time; and I think that in practical terms the Lodge was non-functioning by the end of 1894.

The reference to Percy William's lack of enthusiasm for Annie Besant as leader of the TS comes from The Alchemist of the Golden Dawn p74.

Theosophical Siftings volumes 4-5 1892-95 published by the Theosophical Publishing Society, Adelphi London. These volumes bring together recently published talks and pamphlets. This volume contains these works by Percy William Bullock, given as talks and then published as pamphlets:

- * Hermetic Philosophy
- * Egyptian Belief Theosophically Considered
- * Occultism Past and Present.

My quotations from the talk on Hermetic Philosophy are from the original pamphlet published London: Theosophical Publishing Society 1892 p15.

May 2013: Wikipedia had articles on the Smaragdine Tablet, with Isaac Newton's translation; on the Divine Pymander; and on Sephir Yetzirah though wikipedia's editors were calling for input from an expert on the Kabbalah. At www.sacred-texts.com I also found full texts in English of The Divine Pymander of Hermes Mercurius Trismegistus - the 1650 translation by John Everard; and Westcott's 1887 translation of Sephir Yetzirah as The Book of Creation. Websites www.theosophical.ca and www.alchemylab.com also had translations of The Divine Pymander.

The dates the above talks were given on; and Percy William's administrative work for the TS, appear in:

Lucifer: A Theosophical Magazine volumes

- * X March-August 1892
- * XI September 1892-February 1893
- * XIII September 1893-February 1894

THE REVIEWS OF PERCY WILLIAM'S SOMNIUM SCIPIONIS

Lucifer: A Theosophical Magazine volume XV September 1894 to February 1895; edited by Annie Besant and G R S Mead. Volume XV number 189 issue of 15 January 1895 p426 review of Collectanea Hermetica volume 5

The Unknown World covering Alchemy, Magic, Divination, Rosicrucianism, Witchcraft, Astrology, Mysticism. Volume 1 no 6 issued 15 January 1895 p283.

Wikipedia on the publication correctly called De Re Publica written by Cicero 54-51BC.

SOME WORKS IN THE FREEMASONS' LIBRARY

NB: there is nothing by Percy William in the British Library catalogue.

The Freemasons' Library has two items by him and none about him:

* Somnium Scipionis translated into English and with an essay by LO (ie Levavi Oculos, Percy William's GD motto). Theosophical Publishing Society 1894

* M W Blackden's copy of The Chaldaean Oracles of Zoroaster edited and revised by Sapere Aude (one of Westcott's GD mottoes) with an introduction by LO (Bullock). Theosophical Publishing Society 1895.

Via google books:

Egyptian Belief Theosophically Considered by P W Bullock and Herbert Coryn. Published 1893 as a TS pamphlet.

PERCY WILLIAM AND PAMELA CARDEN BULLOCK IN THE GD:

Because Percy William did so much administrative work for the GD, a lot of material by him is now in the Freemasons' Library Golden Dawn collection. A letter and the notes of a meeting are the sources for Percy William's encounter with Mr Horos:

- FML call number GD 2/4/3, unsigned but in Westcott's handwriting. Dated 15 June 1900, it's a record of a meeting between the writer and GD member Robert Baird Brash Nisbet, who'd been living in Paris for a couple of years. He was a member of the GD's Ahathoor Temple there, and was a long-time friend of Samuel Liddell Mathers; but he'd got very worried (as well he might) about Mathers' recent behaviour.

- FML call number GD 2/4/4/2, a handwritten letter by Percy William to Annie Horniman, with an extra paragraph added by Pamela on the end. The letter is dated 10 December 1900.

THE BULLOCKS AND FREDERICK LEIGH GARDNER:

Warburg Institute Gerald Yorke Collection catalogue number NS73 - letters mostly to but occasionally copies of letters from, Gardner, covering the mid-1890s to the mid-1920s. Including a set from Pamela Bullock, sent between 1896 and 1897; and one from Westcott to Gardner also mentioning that Pamela had been ill, in such a way as to make me wonder whether he was Pamela's doctor. Also letters from Helen Rand to Gardner 28 February 1897; from Westcott to Gardner, 17 March 1897; from Helen Rand to Gardner 1 April 1897; and from Ada Waters to Gardner 8 May 1897.

Nicholas Culpeper (1616-54) botanist, pharmacist and political radical: see wikipedia, www.sciencemuseum.org etc. His The English Physician was published in 1652, in English (not Latin); given the title by which it's now known, Complete Herbal for the edition of 1653.

More easily accessible sources:

The Magicians of the GD: A Documentary History of a Magical Order 1887-1923 by Ellic Howe. London: Routledge and Kegan Paul 1972. His sources had all been published already; see his pxxiii for a list of them. When his manuscript was finished he was given access to documents kept by A E Waite, mostly from the late 1890s and later; he made some alterations based on them.

R A Gilbert The Golden Dawn Companion.

The Golden Dawn Scrapbook: the Rise and Fall of a Magical Order by R A Gilbert published 1997 York Beach Maine: Samuel Weister Inc.

THE HOROS FRAUDSTERS

The trial of Theodore and Laura Horos, real names Frank Dutton Jackson and Editha Loleta Jackson, received huge coverage in the papers. Even the Times succumbed and carried detailed reports on the committal hearings and the Old Bailey trial. You can read the blow-by-blow account in the Times starting on Friday 27 September 1901 and ending on Saturday 21 December 1901. Mr Horos was found guilty of rape and Mrs Horos of aiding and abetting; they both got penal servitude. Mention of Mathers and the GD was made by Mrs Horos during the committal hearing, report published in the Times of Friday 22 November 1901 p13. The Horoses were professional fraudsters. They had been allowed in to Athathoor Temple in Paris by Mathers despite the fact that they were never GD members. He'd also lent them GD rituals to copy - rituals they never returned.

PAMELA and PERCY JOIN WAITE'S IND AND RECT RITE

A E Waite: A Magician of Many Parts by R A Gilbert published Wellingborough Northants 1987. P178 Appendix C lists the original members of the RR et AC.

LUCY WATERFIELD, WHO APPLIES TO JOIN INDEPENDENT AND RECTIFIED ORDER/RITE

Freemasons' Library GD database. records that a Miss Lucy Waterfield applied to join A E Waite's Independent and Rectified Rite on 4 September 1913. She gave as her address: c/o P W Bullock, 90 Sunningfields Road Hendon. The information in FML's GD database is all from original sources now in the FML's collection; but exactly which records the information was taken from is not in the database, for reasons of space.

R A Gilbert's GD Companion.

Lucy Waterfield, from the census and freebmd. I don't think she's a relation of either Percy William or Pamela. She was born in 1877, the youngest child of Henry Waterfield and his first wife, Katherine Jane née Wood. Her mother died in 1882. In 1885 her father got married again, to Mary Augusta Shee. Henry Waterfield worked in the financial department of the India Office.

By 1901 he had been knighted. He and Mary Augusta retired to Bournemouth, where Henry died on 5 July 1913 - only a couple of months before Lucy considered joining the RR et AC.

PAMELA'S PLAY

An Advent Mystery. [A Play] by Pamela Bullock. London: John M Watkins of 21 Cecil Court 1923. The last page, p52, has a British Library date-stamp on it "12 Dec 23" so Watkins published the play in time for Christmas.

AUTHORS OF THE TRANSLATIONS FROM PERSIAN see wikipedia though there's very little more detail on Hafiz.

1 = Hafiz. Pamela must mean Khwajeh Shams al-Din Muhammed Hafez-e Shirazi, 14th century Persian mystic.

2 = Jalaluddin. Wikipedia has a long article on Jalal ad-Din Muhammed Balkhi, also known as Jalaladdin Rumi or just Rumi. 1207-1273, poet and Sufi mystic, his work is seen as one of the pinnacles of writing in Persian.

For more on Florence Farr's chant-plus-lyre see Florence Farr: Bernard Shaw's 'New Woman' by Josephine Johnson. Gerrard's Cross: Colin Smythe 1975.

11 August 2015

Email me at

Find the web pages of Roger Wright and Sally Davis, including my list of people initiated into the Order of the Golden Dawn between 1888 and 1901, at:

www.wrightanddavis.co.uk

***

Emily BURNETT who was initiated into the Golden Dawn between July and October 1888 and chose the Latin motto 'Meus conscia sponsus'. Her GD records show that she never took her membership of the GD any further, and she was probably never meant to. She was a special case, as you will see below.

I'll take the question of WHO SHE KNEW IN THE GOLDEN DAWN first in Emily's case, as it is very easy to answer and is the crux of why she was a GD member: she was the sister-in-law of William Wynn Westcott. A note on her GD records (which in 1888 were being kept by Westcott) says "copyist". I think Westcott was trying to put some work Emily's way by employing her to make copies of the occult texts initiates would have to study. It was unthinkable that someone who had not been sworn to silence about the texts' contents should be allowed to carry out such work; so Emily underwent the initiation ceremony.

Emily Burnett was born on 24 November 1839, the third child of Edmund Crawford Burnett and his wife Charlotte. She was baptised in St Pancras Old Church and lived in its parish, Somers Town, until she was in her forties, in streets crammed between Euston, St Pancras and King's Cross stations and increasingly blighted by railway sidings and the dirty steam of coal-fired trains.

Emily's baptism record describes Edmund Burnett as a clerk to a printing firm and he seems to have continued to do that kind of work, probably with the same firm, all his working life. On the day of the 1841 census, as well as the family, the Burnett household also included

Daniel Robertson, a Scotsman who worked as a printer, possibly with the same firm; he was still living with the family in 1861. In due course, Emily's only brother, Crawford Burnett, served an apprenticeship and became a printer/compositor.

Edmund and Charlotte Burnett had one more child, Louisa (born in 1843) before Emily's mother died, in 1846. In 1848 Edmund - a widower with several young children - got married again, to Susan Prior. I think that the family was feeling the financial pinch at this time in a way it would not do again for many years. On the day of the 1851 census, the Burnett family was one of two households living at 15 Charrington Street Somers Town; they didn't share a house this way again until the late 1880s. Crawford was still serving his apprenticeship, so he was not being paid a full wage yet. Although Edmund and Charlotte's eldest daughter, also called Charlotte, told the census official she was working, her income may not have been something the family could count on each week - the census describes her as a "pianofortist", which seems to have meant teaching rather than performing, with her income depending on how many pupils she had at any time. Emily, like her younger sister Louisa, was described by the census official as "school at home"; meaning that both daughters were getting a better education than most children at that time, but they were not helping the family budget. There was another child expected too: Eliza Burnett was born at the end of 1851, Edmund's fifth child and Susan's only one.

In 1853, Edmund was widowed for the second time when Susan died; he did not marry again. Crawford left home to marry, in 1854, and I can't find Louisa on the 1861 census so I don't know whether she was still living at home, but the remaining members of the household settled into a pattern that remained essentially the same for the next decade. In 1861 Edmund, Charlotte, Emily, Eliza and their lodger Daniel Robertson were still all living together. Mr Robertson had now retired, Charlotte was still giving piano lessons, but it seems the household finances were now less straitened and they had decided they could manage without renting out any of the house at 15 Charrington Street.

Emily was now 21. The census official did not fill in any occupation or source of income for her. It's possible he did not ask her whether she was working; but seeing he did ask Charlotte, or Charlotte (proud of her contribution to the family budget) volunteered the information, this doesn't seem very likely. It's more likely that Emily was acting in place of a mother to Eliza (now 9) and running the household, probably with Charlotte's help but without being able to employ a servant. Not for Emily any chance to follow her brother into the printing industry, even if she had wanted to do so. The printing trade was men-only and in any case, if there was no wife and mother, one of the daughters had to take charge of the shopping, cooking and cleaning in any Victorian lower-middle-class family; either helping and giving orders to the servant (if they could afford one) or doing the work herself; and in this family it was Emily, elected - perhaps - merely because she did not play the piano well.

Eliza Burnett married William Wynn Westcott early in 1873. And I believe that by 1881 Daniel Robertson had returned to Scotland. On the day of the 1881 census the Burnett household had moved to 11 Oakley Square Marylebone and was down to three members: Edmund, still working as a printer's clerk; Charlotte, still giving piano lessons; and Emily, still with no source of income mentioned by the census official. But at some time between 1881 and 1891, probably before 1888, a big change occurred in their circumstances. Edmund Burnett retired. This was unusual in the days before entitlement to pensions. Most people worked until they dropped. Perhaps Edmund Burnett's health (he was in his mid-70s) made it impossible for him to do his work any longer and his employer found the money for a pension for him. For whatever reason, he retired. He and his daughters moved house again, but this time they chose to go right away from Somers Town, to the suburb of Upper Holloway, where houses were modern and had gardens and there was less noise and air pollution. They were following in the footsteps of many middle-class families but in particular of their own family. On the day of the 1891 census Edmund, Charlotte and Emily were living at 150 Tufnell Park Road, within a short walk of both Emily's married sisters.

The move to Upper Holloway may have involved Emily filling the gap in wages caused by her father's retirement. For the first time in her life, she told the 1891 census official that she was doing paid work. She said she was a dress-maker. Perhaps she had done sewing work all along, when she had time to spare from her housekeeping duties, but had just never bothered to say so when the census official came as it wasn't a regular income. However, dress-making was a rotten trade, in Victorian England as in the globalised modern world: unregulated and exploitative. And this is where William Westcott comes in, with his need for a copyist for the Golden Dawn. In the years around the founding of the GD he was helping Samuel Mathers by paying his rent; I think he was trying to do something similar to help Emily by giving her an income or an alternative one. However, Westcott's kindly idea doesn't seem to have worked out. My own researches on the GD administration papers for the 1890s indicate that most new initiates preferred to make their own copies of the material they were given to study. Certainly, in 1891 Emily only told the census official about the sewing work she was doing; she never told any census official that she was earning money as a copyist.

Edmund Burnett died in 1896 and it may have been at that point that Charlotte and Emily Burnett moved again, though they only went round the corner, to 16 Huddleston Road Upper Holloway, off the main road. Again they were helping to pay the rent by letting part of the house to another family. Charlotte was still teaching piano, but Emily said she told the census official that she wasn't doing any paid work, she had a private income. Perhaps her father had been able to leave her money enough for her to give up the sewing (or copying).

Emily's sister Charlotte - with whom she had lived all her life - died in 1905. However, even without the income from Charlotte's lessons, in 1911 Emily was still living at 16 Huddleston Road, still with that private income. Both her married sisters were still within walking distance and Emily may have been making trips to stay with relatives who were now living on the south coast. The artistic talent which Emily's sister Charlotte had showed had resurfaced in some family members in the next two generations. Crawford Burnett's son became a glass decorator while his son (also called Crawford), another of Emily's nephews and one of her nieces all inherited Charlotte Burnett's musical abilities. All three probably had their first music lessons with Charlotte and if this was so, Emily would have got to know them all well. However, it seems as though she had an especially close relationship with her niece Amy Louisa Reeves.

Emily Burnett's younger sister Louisa had married Robert Reeves in 1867. I should imagine the Burnetts thought he was a good catch as a husband: he worked in a bank, which in those days meant a modest but predictable income and very little chance of losing your job. Louisa and Robert had four children including Amy Louisa, born in 1872. Their son Herbert Wynn Reeves (surely a god-son of William Wynn Westcott) became a professional violinist and in 1891 Amy Louisa told the census official that she too was studying music and teaching it. However, she did not become a professional musician; she married Lawrence Waddell in 1895. Waddell was in the Indian Army Medical Corps so Amy Louisa's early married life was spent in Calcutta; but by 1911 her husband had retired and the family was living at a house they called The Kite's Nest, at 8 St Helen's Park Road Hastings. When Emily made her Will, she named Amy Louisa Waddell as her executor. I haven't seen the Will but in such a close family I would expect it to leave what Emily had to leave either to Amy Louisa herself, or to her three children, Gladys, Frank and Clara. And there was more to leave than I'd expected: personal effects worth £725 or so - would they include Charlotte's piano? Emily Burnett died on 9 November 1915.

BASIC SOURCES I USED for all Golden Dawn members.

Membership of the Golden Dawn: The Golden Dawn Companion by R A Gilbert. Northampton: The Aquarian Press 1986. Between pages 125 and 175, Gilbert lists the names, initiation dates and addresses of all those people who became members of the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn or its many daughter Orders between 1888 and 1914. The list is based on the Golden Dawn's administrative records and its Members' Roll - the large piece of parchment on which all new members signed their name at their initiation. All this information had been inherited by Gilbert but it's now in the Freemasons' Library at the United Grand Lodge of England building on Great Queen Street Covent Garden.

Family history: freebmd; ancestry.co.uk (census, probate, baptism record); findmypast.co.uk; familysearch; Burke's Peerage and Baronetage; Burke's Landed Gentry; Armorial Families; thepeerage.com; and a wide variety of family trees on the web.

Famous-people sources: mostly about men, of course, but very useful even for the female members of GD. Oxford Dictionary of National Biography. Who Was Who. Times Digital Archive.

Catalogues: British Library; Freemasons' Library.

Wikipedia; Google; Google Books - my three best resources. I also used other web pages, but with some caution, as - from the historian's point of view - they vary in quality a great deal.

14 May 2012

AMandragora@attglobal.net

Miss Harriet BUTLER who was initiated into the Golden Dawn on 24 April 1895 and took the Latin motto 'A posse ad esse'. In July 1896, she was initiated into the GD's 2nd Order - the inner order where you started actually to do magic rather than just reading and learning occult texts. On the day of her first initiation she was living at 47 Chelsea Gardens, Chelsea Bridge Road London.

Abject failure with this woman: couldn't identify her for certain via any of my sources. I can only say that in 1903 she was one of the group led by A E Waite that founded the Order of the Morgen Rothe, with its inner Independent and Rectified Order, at a meeting on 24 July 1903.

SOURCES I TRIED: ancestry.co.uk (census and probate); findmypast.co.uk; familysearch. Without having some clue as to her age there was no real point in trying freebmd for a year of birth. Google, Google books, British Library catalogue in case she was a writer - didn't find anything likely on any of them. I gave up.

13 August 2012

AMandragora@attglobal.net

Marian Harriett Caldecott who was initiated into the Golden Dawn at its Isis-Urania temple in September 1892 and took the Latin motto 'Ad sidera sursum'. Her address at that time was 56 Addison Mansions West Kensington. She doesn't seem to have been a very active member, and her membership was described as "in abeyance" by June 1895.

I thought for a long time about how to present the information I'd found, about Marian Caldecott's life, because there was so little of it. In the end, I decided to take Marian as an example of what you're up against when you try to trace the lives of the majority of people who have lived.

I find the people of the Golden Dawn a fascinating group. But except in a very few cases their lives have not been thought of as important enough for their stories to be kept. Most people have not been. It's bad enough with the men of the GD but it's even worse with the women and Marian Caldecott is typical: I could find plenty of information on the web and elsewhere about the men in her life; but almost nothing about Marian herself. What to do, in such a case? Well, the reaction of most historians of the GD has been to look again at the members that are well-known and leave the others untouched, as too difficult and obscure to follow up. Before the arrival of the WWW, that was definitely the sane choice. However, the web is here now, and I'm taking a different option: I've studied what's known about the significant others in Marian's life and hoped to spot Marian in the background.

Marian's family, the Brinds.

A website for the Brind family was not quite as helpful as I had hoped but it did show that the family had been living in London at least since the 17th century; and that several of its members had worked as goldsmiths or silversmiths and been members of the Goldsmiths' Company. The practical artistic skills seem to have given out in the family by the late 18th century but an interest in art and a connection with the Goldsmiths' Company continued.

Charles Brind was born around 1788 and is thus of an age to be Marian's grandfather but I think it's more likely that he was her great-uncle. When Charles Brind died in 1848 he named Marian's father as his executor though I haven't seen the Will so I don't know if he was also one of the beneficiaries. It seems to have been Charles Brind that started the family wine and spirits shipping business, which during the 19th century operated from various addresses around Bishopsgate in the City of London and which was still going in 1913. He was a member of the Goldsmiths' Company and served one year as its Master, the most senior elected officer. He collected paintings, particularly works by 17th century Dutch artists such as van Ruysdael, Wynants, Steen and members of the Maas (sometimes spelled Maes) family. However Marian's father, as executor, sold some at least of these in the years after Charles' death, and gave two more to the National Gallery, so there may not have been very many left in the family for Marian to see as she grew up.

Marian's father

Frederick William Brind (known as William) was born, probably in London, around 1824. If Charles Brind was Frederick William's father, he was not living with Frederick William's mother Ann on the day of the 1841 census. Ann Brind and her children were living in Islington. Besides Frederick William Ann had two other sons, Edward and Charles, and one daughter, Susan. Even if Ann was a widow by this time, she seems to have been comfortably-off: she employed one servant. All three of Ann's sons went into the family wine and spirits business. Frederick William was working in it by 1851, probably by 1849 when he continued the family tradition by accepting an invitation to become a member of the Goldsmiths' Company. To the various census officials he spoke to between 1851 and 1891 he described himself as a wine merchant, but in fact he was involved in a number of business ventures.

The biggest, and the one that gave him most trouble, was the Patent Woollen Cloth Company, whose main line of business was making felt carpets but which also produced table cloths, curtains, and cloth for upholstery and industrial cleaning. It seems to have been a pretty big firm. It operated two mills, the Elmwood Mills at Camp Road Leeds and one in Borough Road south London. It had a large warehouse in Cheapside and offices at 8 Love Lane Aldermanbury in the City of London. It sent examples of its products to the Paris Universal Exhibition of 1868 so perhaps it sold them overseas as well as in the UK. The firm was founded in 1845 and had rather a chequered history, going bankrupt twice. Exactly when Frederick William Brind got involved, I'm not sure. I don't think it was in the early years because his name doesn't appear in legal notices and adverts from the 1840s, but it was before 1859, when he was granted a patent for some particular improvements to sewing machines. He was still involved with the company over 30 years later, when he was one of the people who attended a meeting in 1893 which put it into voluntary liquidation. I wasn't clear from the information I found about this process whether he was a director, just a shareholder, or a creditor; I suspect he was all three. He was one of the three men chosen to oversee the liquidation process. The company survived this second bankruptcy, moving into new areas of production by starting to make making heavy-duty felt for use in the construction industry.

One thing led to another, no doubt. In 1869 Frederick William Brind was approached by the British Imperial Insurance Corporation of Manchester which was about to open a London office in Old Broad Street, very near premises of Brinds the wine merchants; he agreed to join a group of men who would oversee the workings of the new branch. I presume buying or being given shares in the Corporation would have been part of the deal. He may also have owned shares in the Midland Railway.

Marian

On the day of the 1841 census, Charles Brind had been living in the household of a Mrs Elliott, in the new north London suburb of Stamford Hill. In 1848 Frederick William Brind married Mrs Elliott's daughter Mary Ann. Their elder daughter Marian Harriet was born in 1850. On the day of the 1851 census Frederick William, Mary Ann and Marian were living at 52 Stamford Hill with a cook, a housemaid and a nursemaid - a large staff for such a young couple. A second daughter, Amy Alice, was born in 1852, but the family was broken up in 1854 when Mary Ann Brind died. Frederick William's mother Ann, and his younger brother Charles, had already moved out of London to Sydenham, and in the wake of his wife's death, left a widower with two small children, Frederick William moved to the south London suburbs too.

In 1861 Frederick William Brind married Julia Mary McRae in her local church in Upper Holloway, north London. Reading between the lines of the few sources I've found, I've come to think that - although this was no wicked step-mother relationship - Julia Mary and her two step-daughters wasn't particularly close. During their years without a mother, a bond had been forged between Marian and Amy that would have been beyond Julia Mary's ability to break even if she had wanted to do so. It lasted until Amy's death: possibly not even excepting the period of Marian's marriage (I don't have any evidence for where Amy was living then) they always lived together. The day of the 1861 census came three weeks after this second marriage and found the larger family shaking-down together at Weldon Lodge, Lawrie Park Beckenham: Frederick William, Julia Mary, Frederick William's mother Ann, Marian and Amy; a cook, nurse (perhaps for Ann, who was 70 now, rather than the two girls) and housemaid. Frederick William and Julia Mary had three children: Walter, who died aged only a few weeks, in 1863, within a few weeks of Ann Brind's death; Frank (born 1866) and Julia Margaret (born 1869). The family moved, firstly to 2 Annandale Bromley, where they were living by 1871; and then, around 1879, further out of London again, to Chelsfield near Orpington, where they leased Chelsfield Lodge.

Dependent on the censuses for my information on Marian's youth, I haven't been able to come by much information on her education. I can say that on the days of the censuses in 1861 and 1871, the Brind family was not employing a live-in governess. Of course, censuses come 10 years apart so they might have employed one for nearly a decade without my being able to tell; but it's just as likely that Marian was sent to a boarding school for a while - two or three years seems to have been typical - but I haven't found any details of exactly how and where she was educated. From what little I have been able to find out about her, it looks as though she did not take part in any of the campaigns to broaden and deepen the education of women, so perhaps she was usually content with the education she had received. Free from governesses (if she had any) or finished with school (if she was sent to one) Marian spent her teens and twenties living the life led by the middle-class women of Britain, still residing with her family, helping in the home and doing the social round and either caring for ailing parents, and/or waiting to be married.

She did marry. It was while the Brinds were living at Chelsfield that they met Randolph Caldecott.

Marian and Randolph

There's plenty of information on the web about Marian's husband Randolph Caldecott, and many websites have good reproductions of his art works. In this account of Marian's life I will summarise the best biographical source I found, at the website of the Randolph Caldecott Society UK - www.randolphcaldecott.org.uk and let me say here how much I'm indebted to that website for details of Marian. The Society says that Randolph was born in 1846 in Chester. He had one drawing published as early as 1861 and was getting his work published regularly in a variety of magazines by the late 1860s but he didn't give up his job in a bank, to work full-time as an artist, until 1872. As part of this big change in his life, he also moved to London, the centre of the book illustration world in the UK. He was best known in his life-time and is most appreciated now for the series of children's books he illustrated for the printer Edmund Evans - two books each year from 1877 until his death; though he also illustrated travel books; continued to have work published in The Graphic and other magazines; and exhibited some paintings at the Royal Academy. He moved in artistic circles in London, and knew Dante Gabriel Rossetti, George du Maurier, Millais and Leighton (Randolph did some work on Leighton's spectacular house in Kensington).

It seems from a talk given by a local historian to the Randolph Caldecott Society that Marian Brind and Randolph Caldecott are not likely to have met before 1879. Their romance must have moved very swiftly, then; and there must have been no problems on either side with the finances, at least, of a marriage. For they were married, in Chelsfield Church where Frederick William was a church warden, on 18 March 1880.

How much the Brind family knew about Randolph Caldecott before Marian married him is an interesting question; because Randolph and Marian's married life was dictated as much by Randolph's health as by his work. That's not to say that he wasn't as physically active as the next man - perhaps more so...BUT he'd had rheumatic fever during his childhood and this had left him with a weak heart and a tendency to bouts of stomach trouble. Although he kept 24 Holland Street in Kensington as a studio, by the mid-1870s Randolph had realised that living in London made his health problems worse and had rented a house at Kemsing in Kent where he recover after time spent in the pollution of the city. After their marriage, he and Marian spent time each year in both the properties. They spent the winters around the Mediterranean, in accordance with what was the typical advice given by doctors to people whose health was problematic and who could afford to leave the British climate behind them. The French resort of Mentone was one place they stayed. In the new year of 1886 they made what turned out to be a disastrous decision, to go to the United States, combining a lecture tour with a few months in Florida, already known for its mild winters. They had a particularly rough Atlantic crossing; and when they reached Florida they found it in the grip of unseasonably cold wet weather. Randolph got ill, and died of heart failure on 13 February 1886, aged only 39.

After Randolph

Randolph had a high opinion of his wife's capabilities - and why not? she came from a family of business-people - he made Marian the sole executor of his Will. I assume she was also its main beneficiary (I haven't read the Will) but if she was, she inherited less money than you would think, leading me to suppose that Randolph's illustration work had been paid by the picture, and didn't involve his having copyright over any of the publications he illustrated. However, she was well-enough off not to have to return to her family unless she chose to; and she did not choose to. If Amy hadn't been already living with Marian and Randolph during their married life she went to live with Marian in her widow-hood. They were living in the flat in Addison Mansions that Marian told the GD was her current address by the day of the 1891 census. By 1901 they had moved, to 30 Hampden House in Green Street Westminster, but by 1911 they were no longer living in London.

Between 1891 and 1893 the lease of Chelsfield Lodge ran out and Frederick William Brind, Julia Mary and Julia Margaret moved to St Leonard's-on-Sea in Sussex. As the journey from St Leonard's-on-Sea to London was not an easy one, I think this was the point at which Frederick William retired from the wine merchants' business (and perhaps from all his other business ventures). He certainly thought of himself as retired by the time of the 1901 census. The business continued, at least until 1913 with Marian's first-cousin Ernest Walter Brind in charge. Frederick William, Julia Mary and Julia Margaret had moved to 13 Maze Hill, St Leonard's-on-Sea, Sussex by 1901. They were still living there when Frederick William died in 1908.

Frank Brind had not wanted to join the family firm and - rather unusually for the times - his parents had allowed him to have his way, and to work as an architect instead. In 1891 he was learning his trade in London, working for the architects William West Neve and Ernest Newton, who had both been pupils of Richard Norman Shaw. This was a job that Frank might have been offered through Randolph Caldecott's good offices as they were just the kind of artistic people he knew but the Brinds probably didn't. Frank's career in architecture never had time to develop, though: like Randolph, his health was poor, and he died in 1898 aged 32.

When they left London, Marian and Amy did not join the rest of their family in Sussex, either to live with them or live near them. They went to Kent, settling in Tunbridge Wells where they lived together until Amy died in 1931. At first they lived at Balmoral House, 51-53 London Road (there's now a block of flats on the site); later they moved a few streets to 2 Vale Road. Marian still owned 2 Vale Road at her death, but she died in Lonsdale House nursing home, on 12 June 1932. Following Amy's death she had made a Will (or a new Will) in which she seems to have snubbed her half-sister Julia Margaret by not leaving her anything, though she left sums of money to people called Brind who were not nearly so closely related. Julia Margaret had not married and she might have been glad of some. Most of Marian's money went to two charities: the Elizabeth Garrett Anderson hospital for women; and Miss Sheppard's Annuitants' Homes, of 27 Ossington Street London.

What to make of Marian Brind Caldecott? It's all too easy to define her with a set of negatives: she had no children, she never worked, she was left a widow after only six years of marriage. You can make a bit more of her than that, though. I think she inherited the Brind feeling for the arts and could have seen her destiny - once she had met Randolph Caldecott - as supporting him as a Victorian wife was expected to do as he continued to work as a self-employed man and in the face of uncertain health. If she had any artistic talent herself, she never developed it.

What social circles did Marian move in, in the years when she was still living in London after Randolph had died? She was not involved with spiritualism, at least not to the extent of being a member of any of the societies devoted to it. And she was not a member of the Theosophical Society. These were two groups of London-based people amongst whom you were likely to meet people who were members of the Golden Dawn. However, I imagine that she was still seeing Randolph's artist friends, and they too were a good way of coming across the GD; though I'm not going to hazard a guess as to who exactly it was she knew. Having been initiated, Marian did start to work through the programme of learning required by the GD if you were going to take your membership seriously. She reached the level referred to as 4=7 (you started as 1=10 and went up the numbers on the left, down the ones on the right, as you progressed in your occult education). And then never went any further. Why? Family troubles and obligations may have overtaken her: it was and is part of being a woman to have your time at the disposal of others. And there may have been other reasons. Several devout Christians did find the GD a little too pagan for their liking, and dropped out, and Marian may have been one of them. But there was also the question of the education Marian had most likely had - it did not equip you for the intellectual study that new initiates were expected to follow. Initiates were also supposed to be examined on what they had learned. It was a very daunting prospect, especially for narrowly- and shallowly-educated women. Another negative about Marian, then - she dropped out.

I think that the two charities Marian benefited in her will do indicate that she was aware of the disadvantages under which women laboured in late 19th century England (and still do). The Elizabeth Garrett Anderson was a hospital founded by women for women, to counter the prejudices of the medical profession about women as patients and as practitioners. And the Miss Sheppard's charity addressed the results of the education of women for a life of continued dependence on the incomes of other people for the means to live, in a society where a large percentage of them would not marry or do paid work. The ageing, unmarried spinster, or widow, trying to keep up middle-class appearances on a tiny and falling income was a stereotype of the Victorian period. Though they had to go through the humiliation of applying for help, and being interviewed by its committee, Miss Sheppard's charity gave some of these women a roof over their head and some dignity. Perhaps Marian thought, of both the undertakings she chose to leave money to, 'there but for the grace of God...' Whatever feelings of sympathy and common cause with other women she had, or with the down-trodden generally, though, Marian didn't go as far as to campaign for change. She can scarcely have ignored the battle for women's votes, but she played no prominent part in it either as suffragist or suffragette. Nor did she get involved, as far as I can see, in any of the other campaigns that increasingly brought women into the public domain in the late 19th century, though these were many and varied and surely some must have aroused her sympathy and interest.

So what did Marian do with her life? Especially after her husband died so young? Of course, you didn't have to do anything much with your life if you were a woman with a reasonable income in the late 19th century; you could stick to the social round defined by church and afternoon teas, with a little gentle foreign travel if you fancied and could afford it; and no one would criticise you for it, they were more likely to criticise you if you departed from it. But it's just occurred to me, as I struggle to put together a good summing-up paragraph for Marian Caldecott, that she could have been active from morning until night for all her life, being a support to her friends and relatives or doing good in her parish or down her street, and now we would not know it. Minutes of parish committees get to clutter up cupboards and are thrown away; house clearers put appointment books and account books into the skip instead of into the local record office; and lifetimes of quiet, non-world-shaking experience are lost to history. Particularly the lives of women. Which brings me back to where I started with this biography.

Pictures of Marian

It looks as though no photographs of Marian Brind or Marian Caldecott have survived: the Randolph Caldecott Society has certainly not found any. However, members of the Society have identified two pictures of Marian amongst Randolph's book illustrations, though neither are portraits as such, as she is not centre-stage in either. There are reproductions of both of them on the page dedicated to Marian at www.randolphcaldecott.org.uk. The first is in Randolph's travel book Breton Folk, in the illustration facing p96 and called The Gavotte. Marian is shown on the right of the picture, watching the dancers. The second is in the book The People which is full of sketches of people Randolph knew from Chelsfield. A sketch-book annotated by Randolph indicates that the character illustrated in the book and called Mlle Marie, is Marian. Her home in Chelsfield is in the background of this picture.

BASIC SOURCES I USED for all Golden Dawn members.

Membership of the Golden Dawn: The Golden Dawn Companion by R A Gilbert. Northampton: The Aquarian Press 1986. Between pages 125 and 175, Gilbert lists the names, initiation dates and addresses of all those people who became members of the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn or its many daughter Orders between 1888 and 1914. The list is based on the Golden Dawn's administrative records and its Members' Roll - the large piece of parchment on which all new members signed their name at their initiation. All this information had been inherited by Gilbert but it's now in the Freemasons' Library at the United Grand Lodge of England building on Great Queen Street Covent Garden.

Family history: freebmd; ancestry.co.uk (census and probate); findmypast.co.uk; familysearch; Burke's Peerage and Baronetage; Burke's Landed Gentry; Armorial Families; thepeerage.com; and a wide variety of family trees on the web.

Famous-people sources: mostly about men, of course, but very useful even for the female members of GD. Oxford Dictionary of National Biography. Who Was Who. Times Digital Archive.

Catalogues: British Library; Freemasons' Library.

Wikipedia; Google; Google Books - my three best resources. I also used other web pages, but with some caution, as - from the historian's point of view - they vary in quality a great deal.

Source for Marian Caldecott:

For the Brind family:

Brind family history website www.brind.tv/html/brind2.html. Men in the Brind family who were goldsmiths or silversmiths and in the Goldsmiths' Company begin with William Brind who was given the freedom of the Company in 1654. Walter Brind b 1763 served as its Prime Warden in 1820. NB there's no mention on this website of Charles Brind who died in 1848; or of Marian's father Frederick Williwmm Brind. There was mention of a family history compiled by General Sir John Brind published in March 1936 and described on the website as "thorough". I haven't been able to track down a copy of this work; it was probably a privately printed work for family members only.

Information on Charles Brind found via www.nationalarchives.gov.uk in the Guildhall Library catalogue. The Guildhall has the records of the company now known as Sun Assurance. As Sun Fire Office, it insured Charles Brind of 14 Devonshire Street Bishopsgate, wine merchant. Guildhall Mss 11936/478.

The Goldsmiths' Company is on the web. I couldn't find any information there about any of the Brind family but at www.thegoldsmiths.co.uk/membership-governance there was general information about membership of the Company. The membership is comprised of 1550 freemen and 285 liverymen. It is governed by a Court of Assistants, with committees and a permanent staff.

Charles Brind's art collection:

A Catalogue Raisonné of the Works of David Tenniers by John Smith published 1831 p382 number 467 A Landscape; and number 468, a Hilly Landscape; are both owned by Charles Brind.

A Catalogue Raisonné of the Works of John Wynants by John Smith published 1835 p247 number 66 is Sportsman and Travellers, now owned by Charles Brind.

The Mirror of Literature, Amusement and Instruction 1837 p322 report on the day in 1837 when the new queen Victoria gave an audience at the Guildhall. Charles Brind lent a painting for the occasion. P323 Charles Brind's address at that time was Devonshire Street Bishopsgate.

Jacob van Ruisdael: A Complete Catalogue of his Paintings by Seymour Slive published 2001 p135 notes on Ruisdael's Two Water Mills and an Open Sluice; bought by Charles Brind Antwerp 1838 sold at Christie's 19-20 May [1840].

Literary Gazette and Journal of the Belles Lettres... 1840 p380 report on an art exhibition organised by the British Institution; Charles Brind was amongst those lending pictures for it.

The Art Journal volume 21 1840 issue of June [1840] p94 more coverage of the art exhibition at the British Institution p95 mentions a picture by Ruysdael, catalogue number 49, loaned by Charles Brind.

A Catalogue Raisonné of the Works of Jan Steen volume 9 1842 by John Smith published p503 number 77 is Card Players; owned in 1831 by N Baillie but now (that's 1842) owned by Charles Brind Esq. Charles Brind also owns number 78, A Twelfth Night's Scene.

Dictionary of Painters and Engravers by Michael Bryan published 1849 p427 has notes on several of the Maas or Maes family. In the section on Nicholas Maas or Maes b 1632, a note that Charles Brind owned a painting by him called The Milk Maid.

Gentleman's Magazine volume 185 1849 p102 death notices from January [1849] includes that of Charles Brind who'd died on 12 November [1848] at Stamford Hill; aged 60.

The Pharmaceutical Journal volume VIII no 6 issue of 1 December 1848 p253 discussing an outbreak of cholera which so far at least had not turned into an epidemic. One of the few casualties amongst the middle-classes had been Charles Brind, who'd died of it on 12

November [1848] “after twenty-two hours illness”, at Stamford Hill. Brind described as “late Prime Warden or Master of the Goldsmith’s (sic) Co”.

House of Commons Papers 1845 section on Minutes of the Trustees of the National Gallery. P22 at the meeting of April 1845 the trustees considered a letter from Frederick William Brind offering the National Gallery two pictures, one by Fuseli and one by Breughel, previously owned by “the late Mr Charles Brind”. The Trustees decided that they would take the paintings, but on condition that Brind should understand that - with wall space at the NG now so short - they reserved the right to offer the paintings to other art galleries.

The Athenaeum no 1124 issue of 12 May [1849] p497 a reference to Dutch pictures owned by Charles Brind which were currently on show (before sale) at Christie and Manson.

MARIAN’S FATHER FREDERICK WILLIAM BRIND

Uppingham School Roll 1824-1884 published 1885 has Frederick Brind’s name on it.

Illustrated London News volume 4 issue of 16 March 1844 p176 an advert for the Patent Woollen Cloth Co as if it had only just been founded.

Law Journal 1845 p4 notices about bankruptcies included proceedings against George Jackson of Hertford, trading as the Patent Woollen Cloth Co of Love Lane, “woollen cloth manufacturers”. No one called Brind is on the list of the firm’s creditors.

Strakers’ Annual Mercantile Ship and Insur Register 1862 p22 in the wine shippers and merchants list: C Brind and Co of 14 Devonshire Street; and F W Brind and Co of 9 Throgmorton Street. It’s not clear to me whether these are two separate businesses; or whether - after Charles Brind’s death - they are one business now but with two premises.

A List of Wardens, Assistants and Livery of the Worshipful Co of Goldsmiths London issued 1907; p20 Frederick Brind admitted to the Goldsmiths’ Company in 1849; address at publication is 13 Maze Hill, St Leonard’s-on-Sea. On p38 Ernest Walter Brind admitted to Goldsmiths’ Company in 1900; at 6 Gresham House Old Broad Street. Seen at the website of the Allen Co Public Library (Indiana) Genealogical Section.

The Critic volume 10 1851 p423 adverts: including one for the Patent Woollen Cloth Co of 8 Love Lane Aldermanbury. The company manufactures Royal Victoria brand felt carpeting; printed and embossed table cloths; curtains; and cloth for use in upholstery. They were made at two locations: at Borough Road London; and Leeds. The company’s warehouses were at 8 Love Lane, Wood Street.

The Economist issue of 1 May 1852 p500 another advert for the Patent Woollen Cloth Co but listing other items that it manufactures including felt for cleaning plate glass, steel, marble and tortoiseshell. The address at Leeds is Elmwood Mills. The Company has warehouses at 8 Love Lane Cheapside.

While scanning googlebooks I saw several other similar adverts for the Patent Woollen Cloth Co from early 1850s; but none from later - which may just be the result of googlebooks’ scanning processes not having done the later era yet.

Reports of Cases in Chancery volume 16 1852 p338 has a case involving the Patent Woollen Cloth Co’s shares, with a man called James Hay involved.

Chronological Ind of Patents Applied for and Patents Granted issue of 1859 p128 lists application number 2024 made by Frederick William Brind of 14 Devonshire Street Bishopsgate. The device was nothing to do with being a wine merchant; it was for “improvements in sewing-machines”.

Chronological Index of Patents Applied for and Patents Granted issue of 1860 p195 application number 2019. The applicant is Edward Smith, described as “gentleman” but also as of the Patent Woollen Cloth Co of Love Lane. His invention is for "An improved mode of manufacturing carpets". Date of application: 31 Aug 1853.

The Monthly (Alphabetical) Record of Births, Deaths and Marriages 1861: p246 on 12 March 1861 at St John's U Holloway, Frederick William Brind of Weldon Lodge Sydenham to Julia Mary 3rd dtr of John McRae of Park Road Upper Holloway.

Catalogue of the British Section, Paris Universal Exhibition 1868. Group III: Carpets, Tapestry etc p104 the exhibitors include the Patent Woollen Cloth Co of "Leeds", which exhibited wool carpets etc.

The Railway News volume 12, issue of 21 Aug 1869 p181 financial news items: announcement that the British Imperial Insurance Corporation of Manchester had just opened a branch in London. The branch would be governed by a local committee. All members of it were given, including Frederick William Brind Esq of F W Brind and Co of Old Broad Street.

Journals of the House of Lords volumes 107-108 published 1875 p171 has Frederick Brind's name in it in the margin, apparently against an Order concerning the Midland Railway.

Capital and Labour vol 2 1875 in a report of a tour of industrial sites in Yorkshire; one of the places visited by the group (I couldn't see who they were) was the Patent Woollen Cloth Co works, described as in the charge of "(Messrs T E Clarke)".

Kelly's Dir of Leather Trades 1880 p548 the Patent Woollen Cloth Co's mill is at Elmwood Mill, Camp Road Leeds.

London Gazette 11 July 1893 p3982 legal notices, section on bankruptcies of companies. Notice re the Patent Woollen Cloth Co of 8 Love Lane Aldermanbury. An Extraordinary General Meeting of the company at that address on 14 June 1893 had agreed to put the company into voluntary liquidation. Three men were chosen to be its liquidators:

Henry Phillips Whisson of 8 Conduit Street, as chairman of the company being liquidated

Frederick William Brind of 1 The Lawn, St Leonard's-on-Sea, "Gentleman" and George Walter Knox of 16 Finsbury Circus, chartered accountant.

The liquidators would register a new company, to be called The Patent Woollen Cloth Co Ltd. It's not clear to me from this notice whether Frederick Brind is a creditor, a shareholder and director; or all three. I suspect he's all three.

Empire Review volume 7 1904 p269 advert from The Patent Woollen Cloth Co Ltd for its "pure wool in the form of sheets which show considerable elasticity even after subjection to severe pressure"; it was already being used on railway bridges.

The Builder 1905 p279 reported that the journal had been sent samples of "impregnated felt" by the Patent Woollen Cloth Co "of Leeds"; for use in the building industry.

Chelsfield:<http://www.randolphcaldecott.org>

Via www.randolphcaldecott.org.uk again, the text of a talk to the Randolph Caldecott Society given by Geoffrey Copus on 19 September 1996. The talk was entitled Randolph Caldecott: the Chelsfield Connection. Copus seems to live in Chelsfield and explains to his audience that he's a local historian, not an expert on Caldecott. He says Caldecott moved to Kemsing, about 7 miles from Chelsfield, in 1879. He couldn't find out how Caldecott and Marian met, but Caldecott married Marian Brind in Chelsfield Church on 18 March 1880. The Brind family were living at Chelsfield Lodge at the time, having moved there in the late 1870s; by 1879 Frederick William Brind was a church warden. Chelsfield Lodge was still there in 1928. Copus searched the local Record Office but couldn't find the lease of the Lodge by the Brind family though he did know that the Brinds leased Chelsfield Lodge from the freeholder, Thomas Waring of Woodlands. Copus searched for a photograph of Marian, to illustrate his lecture with, but couldn't find one in his local sources.

Marian's half-brother Frank Brind:

Wikipedia on the architects William West Neve and Ernest Newton, both pupils/assistants of Richard Norman Shaw who then went into business together in 1877 at 4 Chilworth Street; from 1878 at 5 Bloomsbury Square. In 1893 William West Neve and Frank Brind (described on this web page as "a relative of the client") were working on designs for remodelling Chelsfield Church. The designs are now in the archives of the archbishopric of Canterbury. According to Geoffrey Copus, the alternations to the church were never carried out.

Marian's cousin Ernest Walter Brind:

A List of Wardens, Assistants and Livery of the Worshipful Company of Goldsmiths London issued 1907; p20 Frederick William Brind admitted to the Goldsmiths' Company in 1849; address at publication was 13 Maze Hill, St Leonard's-on-Sea. On p38 Ernest Walter Brind was admitted to Goldsmiths' Company in 1900; at 6 Gresham House Old Broad Street. Seen at website Allen Co Public Library (Indiana) Genealogical Section.

For Marian's husband Randolph:

The most detailed account of his life was at the website of the Randolph Caldecott Society UK at www.randolphcaldecott.org.uk. The website also had a page on Marian, where I found the details of the two illustrations by Randolph in which she appears. Randolph Caldecott's web page on Wikipedia didn't add much to the Society web page's information and read as if it had been based on it.

Plenty of Randolph Caldecott's illustrations can be seen on the web.

30 July 2012

AMandragora@attglobal.net

James William Stewart Callie was initiated into the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn in September 1892, taking the motto 'Expertus metuit'. Over the next three years he did the reading required of members who wanted to progress further; and was initiated into the GD's inner, 2nd Order in February 1896 - only members of the 2nd Order were allowed to do any magic.

A WORD OF WARNING BEFORE I START: this is my biography of a member of the Golden Dawn's Horus Temple at Bradford. The Horus Temple had two groups of people in it: one group who actually lived in Bradford or the surrounding villages, and a second group who lived in Liverpool and Birkenhead. I'm fairly sure that people in the two groups knew each other through the Theosophical Society. This person was one of the Liverpool/Birkenhead group. Anyway, I could have done a much better job of this person's biography if I lived in the Liverpool area myself and could look at local archives.

The surname 'Callie' is a very rare one. I couldn't find much information about the name or people who had the name on the web, but it does seem to be Scottish and both James Callie's parents told successive census officials that they had been born in Scotland. It's a pity they weren't a bit more specific, but via familysearch and the web I found evidence that there were people called Callie living in the town of Kirkcudbright (in what is now the county of Dumfries and Galloway) in the early 19th-century; the significance of that being that Kirkcudbright had a regular steamship service to Liverpool. A boy called James was born to John Callie and his wife Janet, in Kirkcudbright, in 1818 and this may be the GD member's father.

James Callie's father - I'll call him James senior - moved with his wife from Scotland to Liverpool and went into business there as a joiner and builder. Exactly when this happened I haven't been able to establish for certain, but it must have been by 1852 when James Callie senior's oldest child, Albert, was born, in Liverpool. James William Stewart Callie was James senior and Jane's youngest child, born in Liverpool in 1857.

The city of Liverpool was expanding rapidly all through the mid-19th century and a building firm must have had plenty of work. Unfortunately, I couldn't find the Callie family anywhere in the UK on the censuses of 1861 and 1871, but on the day of the 1881 census, they were living at 226 Netherfield Road in the Everton district of Liverpool. They had moved there within the previous year, from 8 Roscommon Street. James Callie senior's firm was employing 18 men on that day. I'm not sure whether the 18 includes his sons John, and James, but John was by this time his father's partner in the business and the GD's James was working as a joiner, presumably for the family firm. The firm's name was Callie and Son, not sonS, meaning that the GD's James was an employee not a partner. There was a good reason for this: in 1870 the firm had got into financial trouble and in 1881 James Callie senior and John Callie were still struggling with the consequences. Money had been tight for years - in 1876 James Callie senior was struck off the list of the Amalgamated Society of Carpenters and Joiners because he was in arrears with his membership fees. James junior - only a child when the trouble started - was being kept out of the mess.

Callie and Son, of 11-19 Sheridan Street Liverpool, was declared bankrupt on 6 August 1870. As it was not a limited company, creditors were entitled to seize the owners' personal assets (if they had any of course!) to pay off the money they were owed. Henry Bolland, of accountants Gibson and Bolland, was appointed by the Liverpool courts to deal with the creditors; and he was still trying to sort the situation out 13 years later! It wasn't until March 1883 that a Court agreed with Bolland that he had taken the bankruptcy proceedings as far as he could, and Callie and Son was finally freed from the need to pay any more to its creditors.

At some point between 1881 and 1891, the GD's James Callie left the family firm to take up a very different kind of job - a middle-class kind of job, in that it didn't involve hard physical labour and took place mostly in offices and meeting-halls. At least up until 1911 - and I would suppose, until he retired or died - he never worked as a joiner again. I can't understand how the change happened, though it could have been a consequence of his marriage. James William Stewart Callie married Catherine Emma Lancaster in 1883. Although Catherine Emma had worked as a school-teacher until her marriage, her father, John Lancaster, didn't need to work for a living. He told the 1881 census official that his income came from dividends - that is, investments. The family was living in the middle-class Liverpool suburb of West Derby, at 20 Marmaduke Street on the day of the 1881 census. This is pure speculation but I wonder if the GD's James Callie got his new job through John Lancaster's contacts.

All I can say for certain about the GD's James Callie during the 1880s is that he and Catherine Emma had four, possibly five, children during those years. Harold Stewart Callie was born in 1884 and Jean Stewart Callie in 1886. A first daughter, Ellen, may have been born to them in 1885 but I can't find Ellen on any census, so if she is their daughter she must have died in her infancy - though on the other hand there doesn't seem to be a death registration for her, so that's a mystery. James and Catherine Emma and their children were living in the West Derby district for most of the 1880s but by 1889 they had moved across the Mersey to the new housing estates of Birkenhead, where they continued to live until at least 1911. The death of James Callie's mother, Jane, in 1886 may have provided an impetus for the change. James and Catherine Emma's son James Lancaster Callie was born in Birkenhead in 1889.

I think James Callie made his change of career several years before my first evidence of it; because it was not usual, in the 19th-century, to appoint as secretary to an important national organisation someone from outside it; promotion from within was the norm. However, I can only say for certain that on the day of the 1891 census, James William Callie described his current employment as "Secretary to Financial Reform Association". Which makes him one of the few members of the Golden Dawn who gives any indication of being involved in contemporary politics.

The Financial Reform Association was founded in April 1848. Although there were branches in other major cities, the FRA's headquarters was in Liverpool. According to a document published in 1852, the FRA's aims were economical government; abolition of customs and excise duties and their replacement by direct taxation; and freedom of trade. One modern history describes what it was aiming for as taxation of real property - that is, land; and moving the tax burden from necessities to luxuries. In British Society 1680-1880: Dynamism, Containment and Change, Richard Price describes the FRA as "the most extreme free traders" and says that the FRA's emphasis on free trade was based on the Evangelical concept of self-help, and a fear of organised labour. However, I found that the modern histories tended to overlook the fact that the FRA also campaigned for more and better housing for the working-class.

In 1891 the Times said that a prominent FRA member had described the FRA as "a Gladstonian Association", emphasising its links with the Liberal Party. However it was not William Ewart Gladstone who was involved with the FRA - at least, not on a daily basis - but his brother Richard Gladstone (1805-75), who worked for the family firm in Liverpool. Richard Gladstone was quite fanatical in his pursuit of the idea of free trade and became the FRA's first president.

In an era without even radio let alone TV, publishing was a very important part of getting your message out to the people. It was part of James Callie's job as FRA Secretary to edit and prepare for publication the FRA's yearly almanac and its magazine The Financial Reformer. The FRA had always published small pamphlets arguing its case on specific issues, and James Callie was required to edit these and see them through the process of printing, publicising and selling them. Increasingly, though, he was also expected to write them, particularly the kind of pamphlet - needed quickly, while the issue was still fresh in the public mind - which was a reply and a challenge to a pamphlet published by somebody else.

The passing of the very un-free trade McKinley Tariff Act in the United States in 1890 may have given the FRA renewed energy, because the consequences of the Act fell heavily on Britain's cotton and woollen industries. (See my biography of GD member Jeremiah Leech Atherton for its impact on one Bradford family.) The GD's James Callie's first entry into the world of argument-by-pamphlet may have been a result of the FRA deciding to up its game. Callie's first pamphlet was issued in 1892, the nine-page Criticisms..., replying to a pamphlet entitled, "Is the Present Low Price of Agricultural Produce Beneficial to the Prosperity of the Nation?"

James Callie was sometimes under pressure at times to get publications printed and distributed for particular occasions: in May 1892, the Times mentioned that the FRA had sent a circular to every MP, ready for the debate on the Budget (the Conservative Party was in power at the time).

For most of the 19th-century, politics had been a question of Conservative or Liberal but by the 1890s there were new players in the field; the organised labour movements which Price says the FRA was so afraid of; and socialism. In 1895, the FRA asked James Callie to produce a series of articles for the Liverpool Post and Echo, countering a pamphlet called (with deliberate irony) Merrie England, published in 1893 by the socialist journalist Robert Blatchford. Callie's articles were published in pamphlet form in 1895 as John Smith's Reply to Merrie England. In 1901 the FRA required James Callie to produce a leaflet called Better homes for the People of Liverpool.

1906 was a General Election year and as part of the FRA's campaigning on behalf of the Liberal Party cause, James Callie was asked to write another set of articles for a local newspaper, this time for the Liverpool Post and Mercury. These were turned into a booklet, at 94 pages the longest work Callie had yet produced: Socialism is not the best remedy - an interesting reflection of the FRA's anxieties about the politics of that year. After over a decade of rule by the Conservatives, in 1906 Asquith's Liberal Party had a landslide victory. Sensing that the time was ripe, the FRA got James Callie to write a leaflet for the Liberal Party, on financial reform.

By the late 1890s James Callie had sufficiently impressed his FRA employers to be entrusted with representing the organisation at meetings; and even with the task of lecturing on its aims. In 1897 he read a paper called The Social and Economic Effects of Disarmament, at a meeting of the Liverpool and District Bankers' Institute. The lecture was later published by the Peace Society. In October 1901 he may have given another talk, this time on Famines and the Famine; he was certainly at the meeting at which this paper was read but the snippet I found wasn't clear as to whose talk it was; he may just have been in the audience. In 1905 he attended the annual meeting of the National Liberal Federation; with a General Election likely to happen soon, this was an important occasion for free traders so I am pleased the FRA wanted James Callie to be their representative at it. And in the midst of the turbulent year 1910 he wrote for the FRA a statement (presumably of its arguments, I haven't actually read the statement myself) which appeared in the magazine The Public: A Journal of Democracy.

I find it interesting that James Callie should lecture on disarmament in a decade in which the arms race began which culminated in World War 1. He was - of course - giving the talk on behalf the FRA, but I believe that the subject was one he felt strongly about: in 1892 he had joined the Theosophical Society, whose teachings contained the idea that all humanity was one. Each new member had to be sponsored into the TS by two people who were already members. James Callie's sponsors Robert Baird and Joseph Gardner, both of whom were initiated into the Golden Dawn later.

Baird and Gardner were actively recruiting new members as the TS underwent a rapid expansion in the early 1890s, with lodges being set up all over England. The Liverpool Lodge met every Thursday in those years, at 62 Dale Street. The lodge had a study group, which wrestled with Helena Petrovna Blavatsky's monumental The Secret Doctrine (which even most theosophists found all-but-impenetrable). There was also a lecture programme. Most of the talks were given by local members but speakers from the TS headquarters in London regularly took in Liverpool on lecture tours of the north of England; usually before travelling on to Bradford. Each lodge was run by elected officers and a committee. In 1893 James Callie was elected Liverpool lodge's vice-president. During that year he gave one of the talks - on Palmistry. So many new members had been recruited that the Lodge had had to find a bigger room to hold its meetings; they were now being held at Crossley Buildings, 18 South Castle Street. There was also a new class on Sunday evenings, to study The Key To Theosophy.

I'm sure James Callie would have stayed a committed member of the TS, but the TS was torn in two in the years 1894-96, by a dispute that showed how far from the ideal of a united humanity some members of the organisation were. I won't go into what the dispute appeared to be about; what it was actually about was who would lead the TS now that Helena Petrovna Blavatsky was dead. James Callie's membership record shows that he was a member of the committee formed in Liverpool to support the American James Q Judge against his opponents in TS headquarters (it was based in London) as led by Annie Besant. When Judge was censured by the TS hierarchy, many English theosophists left the TS including all the members of his supporting committee. James Callie paid his last subscription to the TS in 1894. However, he may have kept up informal links with those who stayed in the TS, because the TS lodge in Liverpool was a very tight-knit group and seem to have been friends as well as TS members. The theosophists in Liverpool also had close ties with theosophists in Bradford; again based as much on friendship as membership; and that's how the GD's Horus Temple in Bradford came to have so many Liverpool-based initiates. The GD also had its disputes but not until 1901 did any of them go as far as splitting the Order apart. In the late 1890s, James Callie may have thought of it as an orderly refuge after the TS, where he could study the occult in such peace as his busy working and home life gave him.

In 1894, James and Catherine Emma's youngest son, Douglas, was born; they had one more child, Doris, born in 1899. At some point in the early 1890s, James Callie senior came to live with them. He died in 1896, aged 78. By 1901 James and Catherine Emma's children were growing up: James junior was working and was living elsewhere. Harold was working and Jean had also left school; both of them were still living at home. The Callies didn't have any live-in servants so it's likely that Jean - who was not listed as having a paid job in 1901 - was helping her mother with the housework. The family had moved to Wallasey. By 1911 Harold also had left home, Douglas had started work, and James and Catherine Emma had moved again, to New Brighton. Shortly after 1911 census day, Jean married Sydney Francis; Harold married Lilian Gillies in 1913.

James Callie's life had pursued more or less the same track since 1891 but the first World War made a big difference to it: all the modern works I consulted when I was researching the Financial Reform Association said that it doesn't seem to have operated after World War 1 was over; and I certainly couldn't find any reference to the FRA after about 1914 when looking for references to it on the web (though I realise that, as at 2012, google didn't cover that period as well as it covered the 19th-century). Certainly, the 1920s were not a decade in which many people wanted to espouse the free trade cause; times were too uncertain. I suppose that the FRA was wound up - in which case, what happened to James Callie? He was 60 in 1917 so he may have just retired; if the FRA had been able to fund a pension. Or he may have found another job until he could retire. With a lack of sources for the 1920s, I can't say for sure.

The World War affected James and Catherine Emma in a more direct way: I found evidence that their son James Lancaster Callie was - inevitably - called up, probably in 1916. In 1911 he was working as a chauffeur - that is, he was driving and maintaining someone's car for a living. The War Office decided that men with this kind of experience were what they needed in the fledgling Royal Flying Corps, so in 1917 James Lancaster Callie was transferred to the RFC probably as a mechanic but possibly as a pilot.

I would have thought that Douglas Callie might have been called up too; but I couldn't find any evidence that he was, so perhaps he worked in a protected profession. Douglas Callie married Marjorie Massey in 1924. I couldn't find a marriage registration for Doris Callie - or any reference to her via the web - so I guess she remained at home caring for her aging parents.

James William Stewart Callie died shortly after the second World War broke out, in 1940, aged 82.

--

BASIC SOURCES I USED for all Golden Dawn members.

Membership of the Golden Dawn: The Golden Dawn Companion by R A Gilbert. Northampton: The Aquarian Press 1986. Between pages 125 and 175, Gilbert lists the names, initiation dates and addresses of all those people who became members of the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn or its many daughter Orders between 1888 and 1914. The list is based on the Golden Dawn's administrative records and its Members' Roll - the large piece of parchment on which all new members signed their name at their initiation. All this information had been inherited by Gilbert but it's now in the Freemasons' Library at the United Grand Lodge of England building on Great Queen Street Covent Garden. Please note, though, that the records of the Amen-Ra Temple in Edinburgh were destroyed in 1900/01. The records of the Horus Temple at Bradford have not survived beyond 1896 either, but there's a history of the TS in Bradford on the web (though originally written in 1941) at www.ts-bradford.org.uk/theosoc/btshisto.htm in which a lot of the same people who joined the GD are mentioned; though no one who lived in Liverpool is. After surviving some difficult times in the 1890s, Bradford TS still seems to be going strong (as at December 2012). In April 2012 the History page was updated with the names of all the members at least up to 1941.

The members of the GD at its Horus Temple were rather a bolshy lot, and needed a lot of careful management!

Family history: freebmd; ancestry.co.uk (census and probate); findmypast.co.uk; familysearch; Burke's Peerage and Baronetage; Burke's Landed Gentry; Armorial Families; thepeerage.com; and a wide variety of family trees on the web.

Famous-people sources: mostly about men, of course, but very useful even for the female members of GD. Oxford Dictionary of National Biography. Who Was Who. Times Digital Archive.

Catalogues: British Library; Freemasons' Library.

Wikipedia; Google; Google Books - my three best resources. I also used other web pages, but with some caution, as - from the historian's point of view - they vary in quality a great deal.

SOURCES FOR JAMES WILLIAM STEWART CALLIE

At www.old-kirkcudbright.net reprinting of an article orig in the Kirkcudbrightshire Advertiser on 17 and 24 June 1921: Galloway 100 Years Ago, by James Affleck.

J W S CALLIE'S FATHER IS A BUILDER WHO WENT BANKRUPT

Via the web to A Green and Co's Directory for Liverpool and Birkenhead issue of 1870 in the Private House section p36 a James Callie of 8 Roscommon Street is the only Callie listed.

London Gazette <http://www.london-gazette.co.uk> 9 August 1870: two notices of bankruptcy proceedings in Liverpool County Court against James Callie and John Callie, joiners and builders of 11-19 Sheridan Street Liverpool, trading as Callie and Son. Both men were officially declared bankrupt on 6 August 1870 and ordered to produce a financial statement at a hearing to be held on 23 August 1870.

Proceedings against Callie and Son were recorded in the London Gazettes of: 6 October 1871; 17 October 1871; 11 May 1875; 29 September 1882; and 20 March 1883.

The 17th Annual Report of the Amalgamated Society of Carpenters and Joiners covering December 1875 to December 1876. P245 James Callie in a list of members struck off f being in arrears w payts. Google books also has other annual reports issued by the Society; no one called Callie is mentioned in any of them.

Proof that Callie and Sons continued in business after the bankruptcy: The Furniture Gazette issue of 1892 p162 has a reference to J Callie of 8 Roscommon Street Liverpool, still working as a joiner.

THE FINANCIAL REFORM ASSOCIATION

The FRA held annual conferences and representatives of it went to the meetings of the National Association for the Promotion of Social Science. There were a great many references to it and its works both in contemporary sources and in modern financial/social histories of the 19th century.

Blackwood's Magazine volume 66 1849 p667 says the one of the FRA's aims was to lower taxation.

The Eclectic Review volume 3 1852 couldn't see the page number on google's snippet: a reference to an FRA based in Edinburgh.

Report on Taxation, Direct and Indirect published by J R Williams and Co of Liverpool 1860. This is an early FRA publication, giving its history so far and its aims, which are:

- economical govt
- abolition of customs and excise duties and their replacement by direct taxation
- "perfect freedom of trade".

Membership for one year cost 5/- so it wasn't a working-class organisation. The current hierarchy was:

President                      Robertson Gladstone

Vice-Presidents              Charles Holland; Lawrence Heyworth; Charles Robertson; Francis Boulton; James Reddecliffe Jeffery.

Treasurer                      Edmund Knowles Muspratt

Secretary                      C E Macqueen                      Collector                      W L Smith

The FRA was governed - and its employees hired - by a 16-man council. Its office was currently at 46 Church Street Liverpool.

By James Callie's time, the FRA had moved to new offices; but they were still in the centre of Liverpool.

Hansard's Parliamentary Debates 1864 p265 covering the Select Committee on Taxation: a quote from estimates of current tax revenue calculated by the FRA.

A contemporary history which looks at the FRA and the arguments put out against its ideas, is

The History of England from the Year 1830-1874 in 3 volumes all published 1874; by William Nassau Molesworth MA; pp144-146.

The Radical Programme by Joseph Chamberlain 1885 quotes some FRA publications, for example, on the question of reducing government spending.

Times Thursday 22 October 1891 p10 called the FRA "a Gladstonian Association" in a report on a Liberal Unionist conference held the previous day in the Co-operative Hall Sunderland. The man who gave that description wasn't named by the Times; he was answering questions from the floor.

Times Mon 16 May 1892 p6b mentioned the FRA leaflet that had been sent to all MP's. The leaflet pointed out that despite what the government had been saying, it had actually presided over a period of tax INCREASES.

My modern references to the FRA:

An Economic History of England 1870-1939 by William Ashworth 1972. In a footnote on p232, Ashworth mentions an FRA jubilee volume published in 1898 to celebrate 50 years since its founding. In the main text on p232 Ashworth describes the FRA as being a pre-World War 1 organisation.

British Society 1680-1880: Dynamism, Containment and Change by Richard Price. Cambridge University Press 1999. On p90 in chapter called The Ambiguities of Free Trade Price gives specific dates for the existence of the FRA: formed 1848, lasted until 1914. It advocated the abolition of import duty on the grounds that it distorted trade and encouraged tax evasion. Further on in same chapter, on p109, Price describes the FRA as “the most extreme free traders”. On p141 in the chapter The Reach of the State: Taxation, Price says that the FRA extended its arguments in favour of a complete abolition of tariffs, away from commodities into the labour market, thereby rendering impossible (Price says) any “meaningful connection with the organised labour movement”. It’s Price who makes the connection between free trade and “evangelical economics” ie the self-help concept.

The Social Sources of Financial Power by Leonard Seabrooke 2006. On p57 in the chapter: The Financial Reform Nexus in England, Seabrooke says that as well as its narrowly-economic aims the FRA also campaigned for more access to credit for the poor; and housing reform to address the problems of over-crowding.

A series of the FRA’s publications was reissued in 2008 as Tracts of the Financial Reform Association.

For a short while from 1862 the FRA issued a monthly magazine called The Exchange.

On the web I found the Financial Reform Almanack issues of 1880 and other years, all published in Liverpool. I also noticed a pamphlet The Case for Free Trade: 1910 Election Supplement of the Financial Reform Almanack and Year Book.

The Labour Annual issue of 1971 edited by Joseph Edwards p136 mentions a different magazine issued by the FRA, the Financial Reformer described as published only “irregularly”. When the the Financial Reformer was published, its editor was J W S Callie.

CALLIE’S PAMPHLETS ON POLITICAL ISSUES, now in the British Library catalogue

1892 Criticism by Mr J W S Callie...on the Pamphlet; “Is the Present Low Price of Agricultural Produce Beneficial to the Prosperity of the Nation?”. Also in this pamphlet was a reply to the FRA’s criticisms by the original pamphlet’s author, P H Andrew. 9 pages.

1895 John Smith’s Reply to “Merrie England”. A note in the British Library catalogue says taht the pamphlet Merrie England, to which ‘John Smith’ is replying, was written by Robert Blatchford under his pseudonym Nunquam. Callie’s own pamphlet was published by Liverpool Post and Liverpool Echo office. There’s more on the career of Robert Blatchford in wikipedia. Merrie England was published in 1893 after originally appearing as a series of articles in The Clarion, a weekly for working people, founded and edited by Blatchford.

Other pamphlets written by James Callie but not in the BL catalogue:

The Reformer’s Year Book published originally in 1901 then published again in 1972 by The Harvester Press. On p114 Callie is described as the editor of a leaflet Better homes for the People of Liverpool available from 18 Hackins Hey Liverpool Socialism is not the best remedy published 1907 but originally a series of articles in the Liverpool Post and Mercury during 1906. In July 2102 I found a copy of this on the web available for download.

The Public: A Journal of Democracy volume 13 1910 has the statement by James Callie as Secretary of the FRA.

CALLIE'S OTHER WORK FOR THE FRA

The Herald of Peace and International Arbitration published 1897 by the Peace Society. On p152 a report that Callie had read a paper at a meeting of the Liverpool and District Bankers' Institute on 1 November: The Social and Economic Effects of Disarmament.

Speeches and Papers on Industrial Questions 1891 and 1902 editor Romesh Chunder Dutt. Elm Press 1902. On p51 there's a reference to a speech given in Liverpool 18 October 1901: Famines and the Famine. Callie's name is mentioned but I couldn't see from the snippet whether he delivered it or was just amongst the audience for it.

Proceedings in Connection with the Annual Meeting of the National Liberal Federation 1905 p46 Callie's name is in a list, presumably of those who attended the meeting: he was there as representative of the FRA.

In Land and Liberty: Monthly Journal for Land Value Taxation and Free Trade published by the United Committee for the Taxation of Land Values 1939 p41 seems to be a reminiscence either including or actually by Callie. But it says that he was first appointed Secretary of Liverpool FRA "early in 1865", which cannot possibly be true, perhaps it's a typing error.

JAMES CALLIE IN THE THEOSOPHICAL SOCIETY

Theosophical Society Membership Register September 1891-January 1893 p155 entry for J W S Callie. Application dated 13 October 1892. Subscription paid 1892-94. Handwritten note says "Judge Society 27/4/96". Address during the time he was a member: 11 Massey Park Liscard Birkenhead. Member of Liverpool Lodge. Sponsors: R B B Nisbet and J K Gardner.

Lucifer: A Theosophical Magazine Volume XII covers March-August 1893, sole editor is Annie Besant. Published by the Theosophical Publishing Society of 7 Duke Street Adelphi. Volume VII no 67 issued 15 March 1893 p78 news section included an item on Liverpool Lodge sent in by its assistant secretary, Gustave E Sigley. The lodge met on Thursdays at 62 Dale Street. The study group was still working on The Secret Doctrine, with some discussion of Letters that Have Helped Me. Volume XII no 69 issued 15 May 1893 p253 news section had a report on Liverpool Lodge's annual mtg had been held at the Nisbets' house on 1 May [1893]. Officers for the coming year included: J W S Callie as vice-president; treasurer W Ranstead; secretary J Hill; librarian T Duncan. Lodge council members included Mrs Nisbet; Mrs Gillison; and Mr Sandham. All the people I've named were initiated into the Golden Dawn.

Lucifer: A Theosophical Magazine Volume XIII covering September 1893 to February 1894 with Annie Besant as sole editor. Volume XIII no 73 issued 15 September 1893 p71 item on Liverpool Lodge sent in by J Hill as its honorary secretary. Forthcoming lectures would include, on 5 October [1893], one by J W S Callie on Palmistry.

WORLD WAR 1

London Gazette 9 June 1917 p5715 lists issued by War Office on 9 June 1917 includes one of cadets to be made temporary 2nd Lieutenants as of 17 May 1917 in the Royal Flying Corps. James Lancaster Callie is one of those cadets.

Via nationalarchives.org I got to a reference to there being some records of him dated 1918-19, at the Royal Botanic Gardens at Kew. But I couldn't see the details on the web.

7 February 2013

AMandragora@attglobal.net

John McNaught Campbell was initiated into the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn at its Amen-Ra temple in Edinburgh, on 21 January 1895. John Gibson of Edinburgh was initiated during the same ceremony but I imagine this was a coincidence and the two men hadn't met before that evening. John Campbell chose the Latin motto 'Sequor'. He doesn't seem to have done a great deal towards following up his initiation.

This is one of my short biographies. They mostly cover GD members who lived in Bradford, Liverpool and Edinburgh. I've done what I can with those people, using the web and sources in London. I'm sure there's far more information on them out there, but it will be in record offices, the local papers...I'd need to be on the spot to look at them, and I've had to admit that life's too short!

Sally Davis

March 2016

This is what I have found on JOHN McNAUGHT CAMPBELL.

IN THE GD

Each GD temple kept its own records. I haven't come across any mention of John in the GD collections I have access to in the Freemasons' Library and the Warburg Institute.

ANY OTHER ESOTERIC INTERESTS?

Yes, John Campbell was an active and important freemason. He confined his freemasonry activities to Scotland, which is a pity from my point of view: the Scottish freemasons keep their own records, which I don't have access to.

The one English lodge John was a member of was Quatuor Coronati 2076, founded as a forum for the study of the history, mythology and symbolism of freemasonry. It always met in London but had a world-wide reach through its journal, Ars Quatuor Coronati, which was sent out to a large number of corresponding members. John was one of those, joining the list of them in March 1889 and remaining on it at least until 1900. All members of Quatuor Coronati 2076 had their freemasonry credentials listed in the journal and these show the extent of John's involvement in Scottish freemasonry. He was a member of two lodges and one chapter and had served as WM of one lodge and PZ of the chapter. He had held various posts freemasonry in the city of Glasgow and the county of Lanarkshire and had served on the Supreme Committee of Scotland, as its Scribe.

It's almost certainly through freemasonry that he came to know members of the GD and be recommended for initiation. So senior a freemason was an important recruit to the GD, even if he didn't stay for long.

Sources for the lodges and chapter John was a member of: Ars Quatuor Coronati 2076 volume VIII 1895; endpapers list p20 gives the numbers - lodges 0 and 408 and chapter 69 - but not the names. I went on the web to find out more and give the details below but with caution, as lodges have often had their numbers changed or re-allocated.

At www.standrew518.co.uk/address/view\_all.php there's a list of Masonic Lodges in Scotland. Lodge Mother Kilwinning Ayrshire is lodge number 0, founded as far back as 1598 and still in existence with (apparently) its original number. It acted as de facto grand lodge of Scotland until 1736 when the official one was founded. It has its own website at www.mk0.com.

Lodge Clyde 408 was founded in 1860; it still exists and is based in Glasgow.

At www.supremegrandchapterofscotland.co.uk I found a list of all Scottish chapters. However, 69, Kelvin Chapter, seems not to have been founded until 1918, long after AQC says John was a member.

Source for Quatuor Coronati 2076.

Ars Quatuor Coronati 2076 Volume II 1889 unnumbered pages at end of volume [p9].

AQC2076 volume VIII 1895; endpapers list p20 shows J M Campbell still on the list; and gives details of his posts in Scottish freemasonry:

- past Pr GJW, Glasgow
- past PG Tr (RA) Lower Ward Lanarkshire
- Grand Bible Bearer (Craft) and Member of the Grand Committee
- Grand Representative Dakota
- Grand Scribe N and Member of the Supreme Committee (RA) Scotland
- Grand Representative of Grand Chapter of Maryland.

The AQC2076 Volume XIII 1900 endpapers p21. John was probably a corresponding member for far longer than this, but I haven't checked volumes any later than 1900.

ANY OBITUARIES/BIOGRAPHIES?

I didn't find any. There ought to be some in the magazines listed in the 'work/profession' section.

BIRTH/YOUTH/FAMILY BACKGROUND

John McNaught Campbell was the eldest child of Thomas McKell Campbell and his wife Jane, née McNaught, who married in Glasgow in 1849. He had one younger brother, Thomas; and a younger sister, Margaret. Thomas McKell Campbell ran a wine merchants' business in Glasgow.

Sources:

Thomas McKell Campbell and Jane McNaught seem to have got married twice. There are two records of their marriage at Familysearch: Scotland-ODM GS file number 1042982 for 1 June 1849 in the Gorbals; and Scotland-ODM GS file number 1041057 for 12 May 1849 at Eastwood, Renfrew. Most peculiar!

Census 1871.

EDUCATION

I haven't been able to find out where John McNaught Campbell went to school. I don't think he went to university - he went into the kind of work that (in the 19th century) you learned on the job.

WORK/PROFESSION

John McNaught Campbell trained as a surveyor and was already working as one by 1871. However, he didn't stay as one for very long. He was a keen naturalist and had been elected a member of the Natural History Society Glasgow in 1870. His hobby, and the contacts he made through it, led to his being appointed (probably in 1876) as assistant to the dynamic and persuasive James Paton, curator of the Kelvingrove House Museum. He and Paton were at that time the only employees apart from the maintenance and cleaning staff. John supervised the natural history and anthropological collections while Paton concentrated on the City's art works. John remained as an employee of what became the City of Glasgow Museum and Art Gallery until he retired. Particularly in the early part of his career, the subjects that fell within his remit were so varied that he became a member of a wide range of specialist societies: the Royal Scottish Geographical Society; the Zoological Society; the Folklore Society; and the Royal Physical Society of Edinburgh. He and James Paton were founding members of the Museums' Association - a society for professionals in the field. They were in-post during two Glasgow International Exhibitions, in 1888 and 1901, which involved royal visits. Money from the 1888 exhibition was spent on purpose-built buildings in which to house the city's collections.

The number of staff employed in the museums and galleries had increased to 60 by 1909 and the two original curatorial employees' duties and job titles had grown accordingly. In 1883 John was still assistant curator but by 1894 he'd been promoted to curator. By 1908 he was curator of ethnography and antiquities with at least one specialist working for him - Peter McNair, the curator of natural history.

I haven't been able to find out whether John retired from work at all; or whether he continued to work until his death. The source below about the retirement party might actually refer to John; but it could equally well refer to his boss James Paton.

Sources:

For John McNaught Campbell's training and work as a surveyor: census 1871.

For the former Kelvingrove House Museum: www.glasgowlife.org.uk/museums:

Campbell's boss James Paton:

See www.theglasgowstory.com for a portrait and some information on his work in Glasgow.

Via www.glasgowwestaddress.co.uk, to Paton's entry in the Index of Glasgow Men issued 1909.

John McNaught Campbell at the Kelvingrove House Museum:

Nether Lochaber: the Natural History, Legends and Folk-lore of the West Highland by Rev Alexander Stewart, FSA Scotland. Edinburgh: William Paterson 1883. On p387 Rev Stewart mentions a trip he made to Glasgow in January 1878. He spent two hours one morning going round the Kelvingrove Museum with Paton and John, whom Stewart described as "of course, a Highlander" - a reference to John's membership of the clan Campbell.

Seen on the web: Zoologist: A Monthly Journal of Natural History issue of 1894.

Seen on the web: Minerva: Jahrbuch der gelehrten welt volume 18 1908, in English.
Proceedings of Royal Philosophical Society of Glasgow volume 38 1907 p264.

The Book of Arran editor James Alexander Balfour. Archaeology volume 2: History and Folklore, by William Mackay MacKenzie. Illustrations p130 credits John with having photographed the three cremation urns from the Kelvingrove Museum collection. Series published by the Arran Society of Glasgow 1910, 1914, so I imagine Balfour and MacKenzie were acquaintances of John.

Membership of societies:

Transactions, Natural History Society of Glasgow 1900 p309.

Royal Scottish Geographical Society, Report of Council volume 4 number 2 covering 1887-88 p675.

Scottish Geographical Magazine volume 4 1888 published by the Royal Scottish Geographical Soc p676.

Folklore Records: Relics of Popular Antiquities Part 2 published London: Folklore Society; in journal form between 1878 and 1882: p16 in a list of officers and members of the Society.

Seen on the web: Science-Gossip issue 257 1886 p112 in which I think John is listed as the President of a local natural history society, most likely the Natural History Society of Glasgow.

Proceedings of the Royal Physical Society of Edinburgh volume 10 1891 p14, p397.

History of the Berwickshire Naturalists' Club volume 14 1894 pv.

Report of the Proceedings...Museums Association volume 5 1894 p145: an article by John, as a Fellow of the Zoological Society.

The two Glasgow International Exhibitions:

Times Friday 6 April 1888 p13a: the Prince and Princess of Wales would open the exhibition.

Times Thursday 23 August 1888 p4a a report on Queen Victoria's state visit to the exhibition, during which she had opened the Corporation's new buildings.

Times Fri 26 April 1901 p7a: this time the Duke and Duchess of Fife would open the exhibition.

For those who aren't au fait with Queen Victoria's descendants, see wikipedia on the Duchess of Fife - Princess Louise, eldest daughter of King Edward VII and Queen Alexandra. Louise had married the 6th Earl of Fife in 1889; two days after the wedding, Queen Victoria made her husband a duke.

John at a retirement party, probably that of James Paton but possibly his own: English Mechanic and World of Science volume 100 1915 p115.

ANY PUBLICATIONS?

I only came across the one mentioned in the 'work' section above:

Report of the Proceedings...Museums Association volume 5 1894 p145 has a report by John of the Association's first meeting.

I'm sure there must be more, in the journals of some of the societies he was a member of, not online as yet.

ANY PUBLIC LIFE/EVIDENCE FOR LEISURE TIME? Bearing in mind, of course, that most leisure activities leave no trace behind them.

See the 'membership of societies' section above: John McNaught Campbell had the kind of job where it's hard to tell between work and leisure. Freemasonry would also have taken up a lot of his spare time.

ADDRESSES

1881 district of West End Park Glasgow.

1891 in the Assistant Curator's house in the grounds of Kelvingrove Museum Glasgow. I presume he will have continued to live here at least until he retired.

Sources: census 1881, 1891. I couldn't identify him on the 1901 census.

FAMILY

By 1881 John McNaught Campbell had married Jeannie. Their daughter, another Jeanie, was aged three. The younger Jeannie was not in their household on census day 1891. She might have been away at school; I didn't look for her in case I got her forename wrong (Jean/Jane/Jeanie). She might have died young. In 1891 a cousin of John's was living with John and Jeanie, Bessie MacFarlane, born in Glasgow around 1871.

Sources: census 1881, 1891. I couldn't identify John and his family on the 1901 census.

DEATH

I haven't been able to discover when John McNaught Campbell died. Ancestry now has Scottish probate records on it but he doesn't seem to have been listed there under his full name. There were rather a lot of 'john campbell's so I didn't look through them.

DESCENDANTS?

Not sure.

BASIC SOURCES I USED for all Golden Dawn members.

Membership of the Golden Dawn: The Golden Dawn Companion by R A Gilbert. Northampton: The Aquarian Press 1986. Between pages 125 and 175, Gilbert lists the names, initiation dates and addresses of all those people who became members of the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn or its many daughter Orders between 1888 and 1914. The list is based on the Golden Dawn's administrative records and its Members' Roll - the large piece of parchment on which all new members signed their name at their initiation. All this information had been inherited by Gilbert but it's now in the Freemasons' Library at the United Grand Lodge of England building on Great Queen Street Covent Garden. Please note, though, that the records of the Amen-Ra Temple in Edinburgh were destroyed in 1900/01. I have recently (July 2014) discovered that some records of the Horus Temple at Bradford have survived, though most have not; however those that have survived are not yet accessible to the public.

For the history of the GD during the 1890s I usually use Ellic Howe's The Magicians of the Golden Dawn: A Documentary History of a Magical Order 1887-1923. Published Routledge and Kegan Paul 1972. Foreword by Gerald Yorke. Howe is a historian of printing rather than of magic; he also makes no claims to be a magician himself, or even an occultist. He has no axe to grind.

Family history: freebmd; ancestry.co.uk (census and probate); findmypast.co.uk; familysearch; Burke's Peerage and Baronetage; Burke's Landed Gentry; Armorial Families; thepeerage.com; and a wide variety of family trees on the web.

Famous-people sources: mostly about men, of course, but very useful even for the female members of GD. Oxford Dictionary of National Biography. Who Was Who. Times Digital Archive.

Useful source for business and legal information: London Gazette and its Scottish counterpart Edinburgh Gazette. Now easy to find (with the right search information) on the web.

Catalogues: British Library; Freemasons' Library.

Wikipedia; Google; Google Books - my three best resources. I also used other web pages, but with some caution, as - from the historian's point of view - they vary in quality a great deal.

Find the web pages of Roger Wright and Sally Davis, including my list of people initiated into the Order of the Golden Dawn between 1888 and 1901, at:

www.wrightanddavis.co.uk

***

Alexander James Carden was initiated into the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn at its Isis-Urania temple in London, in March 1891, choosing the Latin motto 'Fide'. His wife Anne Rule Carden was initiated in the same month; she opted for a motto in Italian - 'Amore'. Both did the study, and passed the necessary exams, required of initiates if they wanted to join the GD's inner, 2nd Order, and were initiated into it in March 1893. Then, however, things seem to have gone rather wrong: Alexander James Carden's membership of the Order was in abeyance by June 1894; and his wife's name was removed from the Roll of GD members, though the date of the removal isn't clear.

In March 1892 the Cardens' elder daughter Pamela Carden was initiated into the GD, also at the Isis-Urania temple, taking the Hebrew motto 'Shemeber'. She was initiated into its 2nd Order in June 1893 and remained a GD member until 1903 when she helped found one of the GD's daughter orders.

When the three Cardens became members of the GD they were all living at 32 Leinster Square in Bayswater, west London. Pamela moved away in 1894 when she married another GD member, Percy William Bullock.

Alexander James Carden came from a background of law, finance and news. His grandfather, a barrister, married a daughter of John Walter, the founder of the Times newspaper; their descendants inherited shares in the newspaper. Alexander James' uncle, George Frederick Carden (1798-1874) also became a barrister. He was the main driving force behind the founding of Kensal Green Cemetery which opened for business in burials in 1833.

Alexander James' father, Robert Walter Carden (1801-88) spent a few years in the army before setting up in business in the City of London as a stock-broker. In 1855 he was one of the founders of the City Bank, which had branches in London and its suburbs. He also was a director of the Royal Exchange Bank and the Canada Company. He was a member of the Cutlers' Company and served as its Master three times. He was a City of London alderman; and served as Lord Mayor of London in 1857-58. He was elected an MP twice, for different constituencies. As a Conservative, and an Evangelical christian who funded schools for very poor children (before the passing of the 1870 Education Act, this would be) and even taught in them, he was rather an outsider in the City of London. He seems to have moved more in charity than in financial circles, and was a friend of the great supporter of causes, Angela Burdett-Coutts. He also gained royal and governmental recognition, being knighted in 1851 and made a baronet in 1887.

In 1827 Robert Walter Carden married Pamela, daughter of William Smith Andrews, a doctor who lived in Richmond. They had seven daughters, and three sons; though only five of their children survived into adulthood. Alexander James was the youngest son, born in 1839.

Alexander James Carden's childhood was a privileged one, though as the family were Evangelicals there was likely to have been a touch of the hair-shirt about it. Robert Walter Carden's main residence was at 64 Wimpole Street in Marylebone, but he and Pamela also had a country house, Mole Lodge at West Moulsey in Surrey, where the rest of the family would probably spend the summer while Robert Walter stayed on at Wimpole Street making the money that made this style of life possible. On the day of the 1841 census the family was not at either of those addresses - probably travelling abroad. In 1851, however, Robert Walter and Pamela were both at home in Wimpole Street with their eldest son, Frederick Walter; their daughter Edith; a butler, a footman and four women servants. I couldn't find Alexander James anywhere in the UK on the day of the 1851 census; I suppose he had been sent abroad to school (I'm not sure where but Germany or France were likely destinations).

On the day of the 1861 census, Robert Walter and Pamela were at 64 Wimpole Street again, and again Edith was with them; also at home on that day was their other surviving daughter Clara; and Alexander James, now 21. Although there was money - or at least expenditure - in the family, all three sons were gainfully employed in 1861. Frederick Walter had joined the army; second son Robert was a Church of England vicar; and Alexander James told the census official that he was a stockbroker. I presume that means he was working for the family firm, in its offices at 3 Threadneedle Street in the City. The bank and the stock-broking firm must have been doing well - or needed to be assumed to be doing well - because the Cardens had increased the number of servants they employed to seven: butler, footman, cook, lady's maid, two housemaids and a kitchen-maid.

Alexander James Carden got married in 1863. He never told any subsequent census that he was doing any paid work; in fact he made a point of telling the official that he did not need to follow a profession. He and his family lived modestly, at least when compared to his parents, and to eldest brother Frederick Walter. He is not on the list of people attending the funeral of Robert Walter Carden in 1888. These pieces of information may not be connected, but I believe they are. I think Alexander James was seen by his family to have made a bit of a mis-alliance when he married Anne Rule Clements, the daughter of a Deptford butcher.

John Thomas Clements, of the butcher's shop, Deptford Broadway, married Jane Major, from another Deptford family, in 1840. Anne Rule Clements, born in October or November 1841, was their only child as far as I have been able to discover. Anne was given rather an odd second name, often mis-spelled 'Raile'. I think she was named for a Jane Rule who was living with John Thomas and Jane Clements on the day of the 1841 census. Relationships between members of the household are not given in 1841; but Jane Rule was of an age to be the grandmother of John Thomas or of Jane.

Jane Rule died in 1844; and Jane Clements in 1845 at the age of 26. Anne doesn't seem ever to have lived with her father again; and I haven't been able to find out anything at all about the relations or friends she did grow up with. From 1845 to the day of her marriage, her life is a complete mystery to me.

About the marriage of Anne Rule Clements to Alexander James Carden: I checked to see if he had committed the ultimate middle-class crime of marrying one of the servants. I looked to see if Anne was actually employed in the Carden household: but she wasn't, at least, not in 1861. Of course, she could have been a servant somewhere else! But I don't think it's likely. The Clement family were skilled working-class and small-business people. John Thomas doesn't seem to have had any close relations but I was able to find Jane Clements' brother George Henry Major, who was a gas-fitter. George Henry's elder son was in the navy for a while before joining the coastguard service; the younger son was apprenticed to John Thomas as a butcher. They were respectable people, with a reputation to keep up in their own communities; unless times were very hard indeed their daughters didn't go working as servants. But what Anne Rule Clements did do, where she lived and with whom, how or if she was educated and how she met the son of a banker/stockbroker, I can't imagine.

Alexander James Carden and Anne Rule Clements were married at the old St Pancras parish church near King's Cross station, on 12 April 1863. I found that much information on website familysearch, but the names of both parents are missing from its database and familysearch does not normally leave these details out. The lack could just be some rather sloppy record-keeping by the verger at old St Pancras, not making the proper entries in the marriage registration book. But it could also mean that neither set of parents were present. Both the newly-weds were over 21 and did not, in theory, need their parents' consent. However...

Even if they did feel that their son had married beneath him, Robert Walter and Pamela did not leave Alexander James without any money at all, and some contact between the two families was kept up as well. Alexander James and Anne seem to have had an income that meant they could live comfortably without his having to work. On the day of the 1881 census their income was enough to pay three women servants: a cook, a nurse and a housemaid. Until the late 1880s they seem to have resisted the more lively but more expensive option of living in London, and spent most of their time in north Kent - perhaps that was where Anne Rule Carden had grown up. They spent the early 1870s living in France.

Alexander James and Anne Rule Carden had seven children: James William (1864); George Frederick, named after his uncle (1868); Pamela, named after her grandmother (1871); Henry (1872); Robert Walter, named after his grandfather (1875); Alexander (1877); and Rowena, named after her aunt-by-marriage, Frederick Walter's wife (1880).

Though I doubt if it impinged much on her, Anne's father married for a second time in 1865; Anne may hardly have known him or his bride. John Thomas Clements married Elizabeth Brown, a middle-aged woman who lived locally. George Henry Major had died in 1863, and John Thomas and Elizabeth took in two of his children, Edwin and Alice. John Thomas trained Edwin as a butcher; Alice was also involved with the butcher's business and she and her husband Charles Deacon eventually inherited it.

Two deaths in the Carden family also occurred during the sequence and may have brought the survivors closer together. Robert Walter and Pamela's second son Robert Augustus died aged 36 in 1873. Pamela Carden (senior) survived this latest death of a child by just over a year, dying in 1874.

A difference to Alexander James and Anne's income may have been made in 1880 when Robert Walter Carden's bank became a limited company. If their incomes were increased the Cardens were grateful for it because their children needed educating and despite the 1870

Education Act, the middle-classes were still expected, and preferred, to pay to have their children educated (with much more spent on the boys than on the girls). On the day of the 1881 census, Alexander James and Anne were living at 14 Bunch Road Northfleet in Kent. Pamela (now 10), Robert Walter, Alexander and Rowena were all at home but the older boys were boarding at schools in nearby Gravesend: Henry at a school with only a handful of young boy pupils - a prep school perhaps - and James and George Frederick at James Mallinson's school at Park Place, a much bigger establishment with more than 50 teenage pupils and three teachers. Three sets of school fees weighed fairly heavily on the Cardens' income, I should imagine. Later Alexander - though not, apparently, the other boys - was sent to Haileybury School for a couple of years.

After his wife's death, Robert Walter Carden (senior) had continued to live in the family house in Wimpole Street, with his unmarried daughter Edith and a staff which was still large but rather less in number than in previous decades. There was an air of fin-de-siècle about the baronetcy he was awarded in 1887 and he died a few months later, on 1 January 1888. Quite what happened to the bank I'm not sure, because as I've made clear in the biography so far, none of Robert Walter Carden's sons had been working at the bank since Alexander James had left it, probably in the early 1860s. Alexander James doesn't seem to have become involved in its management after his father's death, even though he was the only son with any City experience at all. Frederick Walter, as the eldest son, might have felt he had a right to succeed his father as its leader, but he would have needed someone to tell him what to do - possibly the George Mayor who was co-executor with him of Robert Walter Carden's Will and who had probably been Robert Walter's business partner as his address in the Probate Register is 3 Threadneedle Street, the headquarters of the bank. A long-term solution to the bank's future was not arrived at for ten years and in the meantime something extraordinary happened to the personal effects at least of Robert Walter Carden: originally assessed for probate at over £100,000-worth; they were re-valued a year later at only £24000 or so. Where did the rest of it go? If it was a modern Will I'd suppose it had all been carefully slithered away into a series of off-shore accounts.

By 1891, Alexander and Anne Rule Carden had moved to London. I assume money or income inherited under Robert Walter Carden's Will had put living in the capital within their means, but they may also have seen a period spent in the capital city of the British Empire as an investment: they had several sons and two daughters to establish and needed to widen their social circle.

Alexander James and Anne Carden, and their children, spent a period around 1870 living in France, and their children Pamela and Henry were both born there. Pamela Carden was born on 20 March 1871 at the village of St Servan on the north coast of Brittany, close to St Malo. Brittany was definitely off the beaten track for British people choosing to live abroad; but for that very reason it will have been within Alexander James' financial means. The Cardens may only have returned to England when the time came to send their sons to school; but they were back by 1880 when Pamela's sister Rowena was born, and didn't live abroad as a family again. Pamela may have been able to speak French and even a smattering of Breton, but in all other respects her education - like that of most female middle-class members of the GD - is something I can only speculate about. Census officials wrote 'scholar' in the correct part of the census form to cover children of the correct age but it's a word without any helpful information in it, it seems to cover every form of education from Eton to a charity school to a day-governess. The right of middle-class girls to receive the same education as middle-class boys was the subject of various campaigns by the time of Pamela Carden's childhood but I have only found one GD member, and two GD members' sister, who (for instance) attended university. There was a bias against it in parents, backed up by pronouncements by physicians about its dangers: a fear that too much education might make women unmarriageable. The prejudice was especially strong amongst Evangelicals, who were taught the ideology of 'separate spheres' - he for the world, she for the home. I shall assume Pamela Carden's parents felt the usual bias.

Pamela was not at a boarding-school on the day of the 1881 census; nor were her parents employing a live-in governess to teach her. It's possible that she did have a day-governess - that is, one who didn't live with the family; or that she was sent away to school for a couple of years, later in the 1880s. Neither of those options would show up on the census. Another that wouldn't is Alexander James and Anne teaching her themselves - he theosophy, she household-management on a limited budget. One thing Pamela does seem to have been taught somewhere by someone is to apply herself to study. I think the occult texts and exams demanded of GD members wanting to get into its 2nd Order defeated quite a few women initiates whose education had not prepared them for that kind of systematic effort. Pamela, on the other hand, did all the necessary study in 15 months - a considerable achievement, even if she had help from her parents and the man she was to marry.

Having given Pamela all the education they thought was suitable for a girl of her social class, Alexander James and Anne will have overseen her move into the adult world by introducing her to their friends and acquaintances. Pamela was probably the only one of the Carden's children to be on the social circuit in the late 1880s and early 1890s: some at least of Pamela's brothers were training for professions; professions that they then seem not to have followed - saved from the daily grind by the Carden family's money, I suppose. Pamela's eldest brother James claimed even at his death to be a Church of England vicar, but never seems to have held any CofE post. George Frederick may have inherited money from his uncle, the Kensal Green Cemetery George Frederick; I did find one reference to his following his uncle into the law as well but if he did, he didn't practice because his name never comes up on my usual law sources. Henry was living in the USA by 1894. Robert Walter trained as an architectural surveyor but then went to Italy to study art. Anyway, while her brothers were dabbling in the professions, Pamela was being taken about by her parents to the social gatherings they regularly attended. Some of the circles in which they moved were quite radical: Jane Anna Davies, wife of the journalist and lapsed CofE vicar Charles Maurice Davies, was a friend of theirs. Jane Anna and Charles Maurice had been very dedicated believers in spiritualism in the 1860s and 1870s and had tried to set up a Christian-spiritualist church; both had rather lost their faith in the existence of a spirit world by the 1880s. Jane Anna was a good, though reluctant, spiritualist medium. Which leads us to the Golden Dawn and the Theosophical Society.

I've done quite a lot of research into the TS through its membership registers and it's quite clear that it was a great recruiting centre for the GD, especially in the early 1890s. William Wynn Westcott, a senior member of the TS, invited quite a few TS members with an interest in the western esoteric tradition, to join his new Order of the Golden Dawn; and then they began to invite their friends. The Cardens buck this trend however: all three joined the GD first and the TS a few months later, so it's not so clear to me, who thought they were suitable initiates for the GD - especially Alexander James Carden as he was the first to join each.

Alexander James Carden joined the TS formally in November 1891; Anne in June 1892; and Pamela in September 1893. But I've suggested in my biography of Percy William Bullock that they may have been involved with the TS for some years before - my investigation of the TS's membership registers showed me that the TS only began to keep membership details in a systematic way in the late 1880s by which time it had been going in England for over a decade. When Alexander James applied to join, he was sponsored by W R Old, and Alice Gordon (Alice later joined the GD), two people who had known Helena Petrovna Blavatsky for many years. I'm assuming that Alexander James had known Old at least for several years - Alice Gordon perhaps not so long as she had only recently come to live in England after several decades spent in India with her husband. Anne's application was sponsored by her husband; and Pamela's by Percy William Bullock and F Hills.

It's possible that Alexander James Carden began to move in theosophical circles as a result of an interest in, and study of, Sufism - the mystical aspect of Islam. That is, if he is the writer just identified as "AJC", who had three articles published in the TS's main magazine, Lucifer: A Sufi's Mystical Apologue, and Commentary by Sadi of Shiraz both published in 1888; and A Vision Produced by Music, published in 1889. Some support for thinking that the writer 'AJC' is Alexander James comes from his daughter Pamela's play, An Advent Mystery, published in 1923. She prints two quotes, both translations from Persian, one by Hafiz and one by Jalaluddin, better known as Rumi. Persian mystical poetry seems to have been an interest Alexander James and Pamela shared.

If AJC is Alexander James Carden, then he had departed radically from the Evangelical Christianity he had been brought up in, to the extent of looking at some interesting alternatives to it - even if it was only study and he never even considered becoming a convert. The works of Sa'adi were known in translation in the 19th-century - Ralph Waldo Emerson read them and that may have been how 'AJC' came across them. However, as I'm not sure of the identification, I won't comment any more except to say that IF the three articles were by Alexander James Carden they are his only published works. There was nothing in the British Library catalogue by him, for example - and neither Anne Carden nor Pamela Carden had any articles published in a theosophical magazine, nor any larger theosophical work catalogued in its own right by the BL. None of the Cardens wrote anything about magic, as far as I can see.

Some members of the GD recommended a large number of their friends as suitable initiates but - apart from each other - the Carden family only brought one person into the GD: their friend Jane Anna Davies. Both Alexander James and Pamela, however, were willing to offer their time to the GD by taking on some of the administration of the Order. Alexander James took over from Percy William Bullock as Isis-Urania temple's cancellarius in mid-1892 and did the job - which involved organising meetings amongst other things - until March 1894. Pamela did the same job for Isis-Urania from 1896 to 1898.

1894 was a year of changes in the Carden family. Three of Alexander James and Anne's children got married. On 2 June, Pamela Carden married GD and TS member Percy William Bullock. I cover the rest of her life in Percy Bullock's biography. A couple of weeks later James Carden married Cornelia Charlotte Turner. And later in the year - but in Cook County Illinois, with none of his family present - Henry Carden married Winina Tronson. However, I speculate that Alexander James' resignation as cancellarius in March of that year indicated the beginning of something sadder. Only three months after he stepped down as cancellarius, his membership was noted down by William Wynn Westcott as in abeyance - a wording that I've come to see as an indication of crisis in the member's life. And in the autumn of 1895, Alexander James, Anne and Pamela all resigned from the TS as well; though this decision may have been dictated as much by the TS's inner turmoil at that time, as by trouble in the Carden family.

If you want to skip straight to the rest of Pamela Bullock's life you need to go to the Bullock biographies by following the link HERE.

I think that Alexander James began to be ill in 1894. It's fairly speculative on my part to suggest he was ill at all, so I shan't try to put a name to the illness I'm not even completely sure he suffered. I can say that either financial considerations, or a wish to be near good medical advice, meant that the Cardens didn't leave Britain in search of a warmer climate - often a treatment recommended to those who could afford it, by doctors who saw the end coming and could do nothing but try to delay it. They stayed living at 32 Leinster Square.

Although there's no date to identify when Anne Carden dropped out of the GD, she wasn't involved at all in the events surrounding the resignation of William Wynn Westcott, early in 1897; so it had happened by then. It's clear that Anne found some of the requirements of practical magic difficult: a letter from Samuel Liddell Mathers, written in 1896 but referring to events several years earlier, describes her as having a "want of self-control" when attempting to summon spirits, putting herself at risk of invoking negative energies rather than positive. Jane Anna Davies - who I guess was Anne's friend in particular though she knew all the Cardens - had left the GD quite soon after being initiated; perhaps it was harder for Anne to go on without her, and if I'm right about her husband being ill after 1894, she now had nursing, and family burdens she hadn't had to shoulder falling on her; and worry.

In 1895 Alexander James (if he was able) and Anne attended another wedding: their second son George Frederick married Katherine Mannix. This was the last family event before Alexander James Carden died, at 32 Leinster Square, on 23 July 1897.

The merger, in 1898, of the bank founded by Robert Walter Carden (senior) with the London City and Midland Bank might have affected Anne Carden if her husband had had shares in his father's firm. I would suppose that he did have some, and that the income from the dividends was an important part of the family's income. If Alexander James had been a shareholder in City Bank, Anne would have been allocated shares in the merged bank to replace them. The merged bank was called London City and Midland Bank, later renamed as just the 'Midland Bank'. Whether Alexander James also had shares in the Times I don't know. Whatever the extent of her income as a widow, Anne was able to continue to live at 32 Leinster Square at least until 1900. In 1900, however, another death struck the family.

I haven't been able to find out what if any profession Alexander James and Anne's youngest son, Alexander, was pursuing in the 1890s. Whatever he was doing, when the Boer War broke out, he gave it up to volunteer. He went to South Africa as a Private in the London City Imperial Volunteers. In July 1900 he died, not gloriously in military action, but squalidly, of enteric fever, in the camp at Germiston. He is buried in the Primrose Cemetery there, with a headstone the Cardens had made for his grave.

On the day of the 1901 census, Anne and Rowena - the only child Anne still had living at home - were not in England. I imagine they were travelling, probably in Europe but perhaps in South Africa, arranging for that headstone. They must have returned shortly after census day, however, to be at the wedding of Anne's son Robert Walter (the younger) to Ethel May Johns that spring. Anne did not return to live in 32 Leinster Square; she and Rowena moved into to a more modest house, 29 Sinclair Gardens, in Shepherd's Bush. Inflation may have eaten into Anne Carden's income during her long widowhood but in 1911 she was still able to employ two servants - she did not specify what tasks her servants did, when she completed the census form, but I'd say Anne had a cook and a housemaid - the same two servants that her daughter Pamela Bullock was employing on census day 1911.

I believe Anne and Rowena continued to be live in Sinclair Gardens until the 1920s, but by the time Anne died they had moved out of London. Anne Rule Carden died on 6 July 1924 at Rowan Wood, her house in Southwell Road, South Benfleet Essex.

A BIT MORE ON ALEXANDER JAMES AND ANNE'S CHILDREN, PAMELA BULLOCK'S SIBLINGS

JAMES is the eldest, ordained as a Church of England priest but apparently never in charge of a parish. On 19 June 1894 he married Cornelia Charlotte daughter of Cornelius Turner. Their only child, Cornelia, was born in South Africa in 1895 - what James and family were doing there I have yet to discover. By 1901 they were back in England and were - according to the census form, living off private means. On the day of the 1901 census, they were living in Truro. They were not on the 1911 census, probably living abroad again. I know nothing of James, really, between census day 1901 and 6 January 1946 when he died at 36 Niagara Avenue Ealing west London. His wife Cornelia died in 1941. His daughter Cornelia was living with him at the time of his death; she died unmarried in 1954.

GEORGE FREDERICK was named after his Kensal Green cemetery-founding uncle and may have inherited money from him - the uncle died a bachelor. I can't find any evidence that the younger George Frederick ever followed a profession; he and his wife must have had other financial means. I didn't find them on the 1901 or 1911 censuses so I guess they were living abroad. Katherine Carden died in 1935 and George Frederick in 1952; they had no children.

PAMELA married Percy William Bullock so see his biography for her. She and Percy William had no children.

HENRY was married twice, each time in the USA to American women. He and his first wife Winina had one daughter, Florence, born in 1895. Winina died in 1918 and the following year Henry married Mildred Kedge. He died in 1948 in New Orleans. In 1924, Florence married Francisco Rabia Muñoz, an officer in the Mexican army.

ROBERT WALTER was working as a self-employed architect's surveyor on the day of the census in 1901. On that day he was a boarder at Martha Shepherd's lodging house at 141 Millbrook Road, Shirley Southampton, presumably while he was working on a contract. Three months later her married Ethel May Johns, whose father, Lemuel Johns, lived in New Zealand. Although their elder son, Derick, was born in Southampton, they then went to live in Italy for several years. Their younger son Ronald was born in San Remo and I think they must also have spent time living in Genoa. During this period abroad, Ethel May kept a journal - which I saw for sale in May 2013 on the web - and Robert Walter worked on these books:

Ornamental Details of the Italian Renaissance; by George A T Middleton and R W Carden.
London: B T Batsford 1900

The City of Genoa by R W Carden. Methuen and Co 1908

The Life of Giorgio Vasari by R W Carden. Warner 1910

Michelangelo, by R W Carden; a book of translations of the artist's letters and other papers.
London: Constable 1913.

And published much later:

North Italian Painting of the Quattrocento; Robert Walter's translation of the Italian original by Adolfo Venturi. Pegasus Press 1930

In 1908 Robert Walter and his family returned to England. By 1911 they were living near Anne and Rowena Carden, at 16 Brook Green Hammersmith. Robert Walter died in 1943.

ROWENA lived with her mother until Anne's death. Then - it would appear - she went travelling. I have no idea how she might have met him, but in 1927, she married Daniel Hall, a businessman without any English ancestors, despite his surname. His father, Moritz Hall, was born in Cracow; he went to east Africa as a Protestant missionary in the 1860s and married a woman generally known as Katarina, a member of the Ethiopian aristocracy. They had a large family; the actor Peter Ustinov was descended from Magdalena, their eldest daughter. Moritz and Katarina left Ethiopia in the late 1860s and eventually settled in Jaffa, where Moritz ran various businesses which his sons carried on after his death. Daniel Hall was born in Jaffa in 1870. When Rowena married him, he was a widower, with businesses based in Ethiopia; but at the time of his death, in 1943, they were living in Famagusta, Cyprus - probably driven out of Ethiopia when the Italians invaded it. Though Daniel actually died in Tanganyika - what is now Tanzania. Rowena died in 1967.

One last comment: despite having seven children, Alexander James and Anne have relatively few descendants. George Frederick, Pamela and Rowena all had no children. James and Henry had one daughter each and James's died unmarried. I don't know how to find out whether Henry's daughter had children. Robert Walter's sons both married; their children are the only descendants of Alexander James and Anne that I know about.

BASIC SOURCES I USED for all Golden Dawn members.

Membership of the Golden Dawn: The Golden Dawn Companion by R A Gilbert.
Northampton: The Aquarian Press 1986. Between pages 125 and 175, Gilbert lists the names, initiation dates and addresses of all those people who became members of the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn or its many daughter Orders between 1888 and 1914.
The list is based on the Golden Dawn's administrative records and its Members' Roll - the large piece of parchment on which all new members signed their name at their initiation. All this information had been inherited by Gilbert but it's now in the Freemasons' Library at the United Grand Lodge of England building on Great Queen Street Covent Garden. Please note, though, that the records of the Amen-Ra Temple in Edinburgh were destroyed in 1900/01. As far as I know, the records of the Horus Temple at Bradford have not survived either.

Family history: freebmd; ancestry.co.uk (census and probate); findmypast.co.uk; familysearch; Burke's Peerage and Baronetage; Burke's Landed Gentry; Armorial Families; thepeerage.com; and a wide variety of family trees on the web.

Famous-people sources: mostly about men, of course, but very useful even for the female members of GD. Oxford Dictionary of National Biography. Who Was Who. Times Digital Archive.

Catalogues: British Library; Freemasons' Library.

Wikipedia; Google; Google Books - my three best resources. I also used other web pages, but with some caution, as - from the historian's point of view - they vary in quality a great deal.

SOURCES FOR THE CARDENS

In May 2013 I came across a blog for Carden family history: //cardenhistory.blogspot.co.uk

I used www.thepeerage.com which in turn uses Burke's Peerage and Baronetage 107th edition 2003.

Alexander James' uncle GEORGE FREDERICK CARDEN 1798-1874: see www.kensalgreen.co.uk for information on his part in the founding of the cemetery. <http://www.londongardensonline.org.uk>

London Gazette 26 January 1875 legal notice issued 20 January 1875 by Shum, Crossman and Crossman of 3 King's Road Bedford Row, solicitors for the Administrators of the estate of George Frederick Carden who'd died 18 November 1884. G F Carden had two houses: 2 Sussex Gardens; and The Grove Hendon. He was unmarried.

Alexander James' father ROBERT WALTER CARDEN

The best account I found is at www.london-city-history.org.uk/biography, which is based on an obituary in City Press 21 January 1888 which summed him up as "frosty but kindly".

Oxford Dictionary of National Biography volume 10 p20 had a bit more on his family background but also used the City Press obituary as its main source.

Wikipedia has a short page on him with a bit more about what happened to the bank after he was dead.

Times Friday 27 January 1888 p6 had a short report on the funeral, but no obituary, presumably because the Carden family didn't want one published. It also didn't print any details of the main provisions of his Will - it would usually do so for a Will leaving so much money.

CURIOUS CAREERS OF PAMELA'S BROTHERS

Among the sources I checked for sightings of them were Crockford's Clerical Directory 1900 and Hart's Annual Army List 1900 p803 for the active list; and p832 for the retired list. Also Oxford and Cambridge lists of graduates; Who Was Who, Boase's obituaries.

Details of the death of Alexander Carden in 1900 from www.haileybury.com/ the site's section on honours by ex-pupils.

PAMELA'S FULL DATE OF BIRTH AND DATE OF MARRIAGE FROM

General and Heraldic Dictionary of the Peerage and Baronetage of the British Empire
Burke's Peerage Ltd 1914 p339.

ROBERT WALTER CARDEN'S PUBLICATIONS details from the British Library catalogue.

Ethel Carden's diary seen May 2013 at www.worthpoint.com: Journal of an English Lady in Italy 1904 by Ethel May Carden, née Johns.

ROWENA's exotic in-laws: via google to portal.svt.ntnu.no, Proceedings of the 16th International Conference of Ethiopian Studies, held in Trondheim 2009. Article in English by Toby Berger Holtz: The Hall Family and Ethiopia: A Century of Involvement.

Mention of a previous marriage - apparently in 1902 - for Daniel Hall: The Foreign Politics of Lag Iyasu 1915/16 by Wolbert G C Smid. I searched freebmd and familysearch but couldn't find evidence of it.

Times Saturday 26 April 1943 p1a death notices: Daniel Hall, normally of Famagusta Cyprus had died on 6 April 1943 at Tanga Hospital, Tanganyika, aged 72; "dearly loved husband of Rowena (née Carden)".

Cyprus in World War II: Politics and Conflict in the Eastern Mediterranean by Anastasia Yianghou. London/NY: I B Tauris and Co Ltd 2010. In section 3.1: Cyprus was not invaded during World War II.

ALEXANDER, ANN AND PAMELA BUT NO OTHER OF THEIR CHILD ARE IN THE THEOSOPHICAL SOCIETY

Theosophical Society Membership Register September 1891-January 1893 p35 entry for "Alex J Carden". Application dated 24 November 1891; sponsors W R Old and Alice Gordon. Subscriptions paid 1891-95 then "Resigned 8/10/95". Address 32 Leinster Square Bayswater. Member of Blavatsky Lodge. On p107 entry for "Annie R Carden". Application 10 June 1892; sponsor A J Carden. Subscription paid 1892-94 then "Resigned 11/10/95". Address 32 Leinster Square Bayswater. Branch = Adelphi Lodge.

Theosophical Society Membership Register June 1893 to March 1895 p34 the entry for Pamela Carden. Application 4 September 1893; sponsors P W Bullock and F Hills. Subscription paid 1893, 1894 then "Lapsed". Address 32 Leinster Square Bayswater. Branch = Adelphi Lodge.

ARTICLES BY 'AJC' WHO COULD BE ALEXANDER JAMES
CARDEN <http://www.companydirectorcheck.com>

Just noting that I haven't read these in Lucifer. I found the article titles and supposed author via www.austheos.org.au/indices/LUCIFER; a very useful resource when I was studying the GD members who were in the TS as well:

Lucifer: A Theosophical Magazine

|                  |           |                              |
|------------------|-----------|------------------------------|
| volumer for 1888 | July p390 | A Sufi's Mystical Apologue   |
|                  | July p391 | Commentary by Sadi of Shiraz |
| volume for 1889  | Jan p405  | A Vision Produced by Music.  |

CARDENS IN THE GOLDEN DAWN

The Magicians of the GD: A Documentary History of a Magical Order 1887-1923 by Ellic Howe. London: Routledge and Kegan Paul 1972. His sources had all been published already; see his pxxiii for a list of them. When his Ms was finished he was given access to documents kept by A E Waite, mostly from the late 1890s and later; he made some alterations based on them. P98 and p100 where Howe mentions Alexander James and Anne attending a talk by William Wynn Westcott; also there were Florence Farr, Cecilia Macrae, Edward Berridge and Minnie Langridge. The meeting was at 3pm on 25 July 1893 and Howe makes the point that people who worked office hours couldn't attend meetings like this. Westcott was in full-time employment but he was a Coroner; if he wasn't actually holding an inquest his time was to a certain extent his own to organise.

The Golden Dawn Scrapbook: the Rise and Fall of a Magical Order R A Gilber 1997 York Beach Maine: Samuel Weister Inc. Alexander James doesn't figure at all in this volume but the quote about Anne Carden's problems with invocations was on p135: Mathers mentioned them in a letter 8 January 1896 to Annie Horniman.

R A Gilbert The Golden Dawn Companion p32 for Alexander James' period as Isis-Urania cancellarius; and for Pamela's period doing the same job.

PAMELA POST 1894 - SEE PERCY BULLOCK

***

17 May 2013

AMandragora@attglobal.net

Agnes Cathcart was initiated into the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn at is Amen-Ra temple in Edinburgh. She chose the Latin motto 'Veritas vincit'. It was a busy night at Amen-Ra - Robert William Felkin, his wife Mary Jane Felkin, and Dr George Kerr were all initiated in the same ritual. I'm sure that Agnes knew the Felkins, at least. She also had two first cousins who were members of the GD at its Isis-Urania temple in London.

Agnes was a keen GD member over the next few years. She studied the texts provided for new initiates, and did the exams that were necessary to reach a point where she could do some practical magic; and was initiated into the GD's inner, 2nd Order in June 1896. That second initiation took place in Edinburgh but shortly afterwards, Agnes and her husband started spending the winters in Bath so she began to attend rituals at the Isis-Urania temple as well. I don't think she joined either of the GD's daughter orders when they were founded after 1903, but in 1906 she was still keeping up with the friendships she'd made in the Order.

This is one of my short biographies. They mostly cover GD members who lived in Bradford, Liverpool and Edinburgh. There was a lot of information on Agnes Cathcart, even using only the web and sources in London. There will be more in Scotland but it will be in record offices, the local papers...I'd need to be on the spot to look at it, and I've had to admit that life's too short!

Sally Davis

February 2016

This is what I've found out about AGNES BAXTER CATHCART

IN THE GD

Letters from Agnes to Frederick Leigh Gardner survive in the Warburg Institute. The earliest is dated December 1896 and was forwarded from her home in Scotland to where Agnes was staying in Bath. Samuel Liddell Mathers had just banished Annie Horniman from the GD. Gardner was organising a petition asking for Annie to be reinstated. Agnes was happy to sign the petition and also took the opportunity to return some study documents she had borrowed. After that, three years went by before she and Gardner made contact again. A lot had happened in the GD though I'm not sure that Agnes was aware that Gardner himself had been forced to resign in 1897 - if she'd known I'm sure she would have sympathised with him over it. She wrote to him in November 1899 from her country home in Fifeshire, in gloomy mood. There were other reasons for that (see the Descendants section below) but she was also finding her occult studies difficult, and missing the people she knew through the GD. At Pitcairnie, she said, "We are here quite isolated from Amen-Ra" where she could at least have heard the latest GD news.

In April 1901, Agnes wrote to Gardner twice within a few days, lamenting again that she was "so little in town". This time she had received recent news of trouble in the GD and was wanting to find out what was rumour and what was true. She also mentioned her fears for the young British soldiers presently in South Africa (she won't have been aware that the Boer War was actually drawing to a close). Agnes' final letter, written in August 1901, explained that the Amen-Ra temple was "pretty much broken up". Agnes was wanting to join a specifically Rosicrucian group and wondering if Mathers' Ahathoor temple in Paris was still functioning.

Agnes' letters to Gardner have a rather desponding tone. I think it was because rumours that the GD might be on its last legs made her fear for the friendships she had made through being a member. She needn't have worried though. One of those friends was Annie Horniman, who was not one to cast people aside lightly. Annie went to stay with Agnes at her country home in April 1901; and as late as 1906 and with very little time at her disposal, she'd paid a call on Agnes during a visit to Edinburgh with the Irish National Theatre Society. As Agnes was spending winters in England from the mid-1890s, they probably met on many other occasions.

As Agnes was interested in Rosicrucian ideas and rituals, she would have found conversations with Isabel de Steiger rewarding. Perhaps a friendship developed, though evidence for one is lacking. Isabel lived in Edinburgh during the 1890s, was a member of Amen-ra temple and the TS at the time; and thought of the GD as a specifically Rosicrucian order. However, Isabel left Edinburgh in 1900 and I'm not sure that the other GD members in the city were quite so interested in the subject. Hence Agnes' search for a Rosicrucian group elsewhere.

I expect that Gardner was aware that Agnes knew GD members John William and Frances Brodie-Innes in Edinburgh. It's curious, though, that she doesn't mention her first cousins Florence Kennedy and Cecilia Macrae. They were both committed members of the GD in the 1890s. Though they may have been the source of the news that was reaching Agnes in Scotland about the GD in London, around 1900.

Sources:

Warburg Institute: letters to Frederick Leigh Gardner. Gerald Yorke Collection, folder catalogued NS73.

Collected Letters of W B Yeats Volume IV 1905-1907. Editors John Kelly and Ronald Schuchard. Published Oxford University Press 2005: p429 and p430 footnote 9.

ANY OTHER ESOTERIC INTERESTS?

Yes, Agnes was a member of the Theosophical Society for longer than she was in the GD. She made her application to join in July 1892. At that time, applications had to be sponsored by two people who were members already. John William and Frances Brodie-Innes were Agnes' sponsors. They had founded the TS's Edinburgh group, and it met in their house. John William was also a member of the GD - he'd been initiated in London in 1890. He was a founding member of its Amen-Ra temple, which had many members drawn from the TS in Edinburgh, including the Robert and Mary Jane Felkin. I'm sure it was through John and Frances Brodie-Innes, rather than through her cousins Florence and Cecilia, that Agnes found out about the GD's existence.

If Agnes was worried about the GD's internal troubles, I can't imagine what she made of the series of very divisive disputes that rocked the TS in the 1890s and 1900s. She continued to pay her TS subscription and to go to meetings in Edinburgh and London, until 1907, the year her husband died. She sent in a letter of resignation in March 1909.

Agnes was one of those GD members who used Frederick Leigh Gardner's informal book-buying service. In 1901 she told Gardner that was reading A E Waite's biography of Louis de St Martin, the 18th-century French freemason; perhaps she had bought it through him. She was asking Gardner if he still had any copies of Annie Besant's "little handbooks". I imagine that even after she had ceased to be an active member of the GD and the TS, her book-buying and reading continued; although there are no later letters from her in the Gerald Yorke Collection, they may just not have survived.

Sources:

Theosophical Society Membership Register September 1891-January 1893 p122 entry for Mrs Agnes Cathcart. There's a note on the entry that she sent in a letter of resignation dated 1 March 1909 though her last annual subscription had been paid two years' before.

Warburg Institute: letters to Frederick Leigh Gardner. Gerald Yorke Collection, folder catalogued NS73.

See Waite's book on St Martin via archive.org. It's The Life of Louis Claude de St Martin and Agnes was reading it hot off the press: it was published in London by Philip Welby, in 1901.

The Theosophical Publishing Society printed a large number of works by Annie Besant in 1900 and 1901, early efforts in what later became called the Adyar Pamphlets:

in 1900 Avataras: Four Lectures in 1901 Esoteric Christianity; or the Lesser Mysteries

Death and After

Ancient Ideals in Modern Life

Thought Power: Its Control and Cultivation and Light from the East, a choice of Buddhist texts for which Annie Besant wrote the foreword.

I don't think they were available at bookshops. Most readers bought them through the TS but perhaps Agnes preferred to ask her friend Frederick Gardner for them.

ANY OBITUARIES/BIOGRAPHIES?

No.

BIRTH/YOUTH/FAMILY BACKGROUND

Agnes Cathcart was a member of the Scottish social elite, with family in the landed gentry, the professions and in business.

THE LAINGS AND THE BAXTERS

The GD's Agnes Cathcart, Cecilia Macrae and Florence Kennedy were all members of the Laing family. They were grand-daughters of Samuel Laing of Papdale, Kirkwall in Orkney, who made a fortune from kelp production in the 1820s only to lose it to expensive political campaigns and changing Treasury rules during the early 1830s. After selling his land, Samuel Laing of Papdale left Orkney and embarked on a second career as a traveller and writer on Norway; and translator of Norse sagas. Agnes was the daughter of Samuel Laing of Papdale's daughter Elizabeth Dorothy and was named after Samuel Laing of Papdale's wife Agnes, née Kelly. Cecilia and Florence were daughters of his son, the better known Samuel Laing MP, government financial advisor and writer of popular books on science.

Elizabeth Dorothy Laing, after a period travelling around Europe with her father, married Henry Baxter of Idvies in 1834. Henry Baxter was born in 1799, the son of John Baxter, a banker and businessman. He was related to the Baxters of Dundee who owned Baxter Brothers, the largest linen-manufacturing firm in the world for much of the 19th century; though he was not involved in the firm himself. After graduating from Edinburgh University, he qualified as an advocate in 1828 and also represented Forfar at the Church of Scotland General Assembly.

Elizabeth Dorothy Laing and Henry Baxter were married in two separate ceremonies in March 1834, one in Edinburgh and one at Kirkwall. They had two children, Agnes (born 10 March 1835) and a second daughter, Mary (born March 1837) before Henry Baxter died, of some kind of seizure, in August 1837.

Elizabeth Baxter was a very wealthy widow - she had £600 a year as her jointure plus £300 for Agnes and Mary, administered by trustees. While her daughters were very young, Elizabeth rented a house at Bangholm Bower; but when its lease expired in 1844 she moved to Edinburgh so her daughters could go to school. By 1847 she was living at 30 Saxe Coburg Place with her father and daughters. They were all there on the day of the 1851 census, with four servants; and Agnes was probably married from that address. Her sister Mary married Arthur Charles Pretymann in 1858. In 1868, the estate at Idvies was sold.

Sources:

Some information on the Laings of Orkney: see www.aboutorkney.com

For the Laing family and Samuel Laing of Papdale:

The Autobiography of Samuel Laing of Papdale 1780-1868 edited and with supplementary information by R P Fereday. Bellavista Publications 2000. The Autobiography section p51, pp153-176 which includes Elizabeth's marriage, Henry Baxter's sudden death, and Agnes' marriage. Samuel describes Agnes when a child as "bold, firm and impetuous". Samuel Laing of Papdale had a severe stroke in 1864; and died at his daughter's house in Edinburgh in 1868.

For Samuel Laing of Papdale's political involvement on Orkney during the 1820s, see R P Fereday's article on it, at www.ssns.org.uk.

There's plenty of information on the Baxter family of Dundee on the web. See wikipedia and wiki articles on William Edward Baxter 1825-1890; his son George Washington Baxter 1st and last Baronet 1853-1926. And Sir David Baxter, first (and last) Baronet 1793-1872.

On Henry Baxter:

The Autobiography of Samuel Laing of Papdale 1780-1868 edited and with supplementary information by R P Fereday. Bellavista Publications 2000: p195 footnote 220 for Henry Baxter's dates; and p196 footnote 226 for the sale of the Idvies estate to John Clerk Brodie.

The Faculty of Advocates in Scotland 1532-1943 published 1944 by the Faculty: p11.

Acts of the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland p1031.

Via www.genesreunited.co.uk to an item in Perry Bankrupt Gazette of 28 July 1838 notice issued by 13 July 1838 mentioning Henry Baxter is dead.

The Court of Session Garland by James Maidment, which seems to be a stud book for racehorses. Published 1839 p7: Henry Baxter as owner of a chestnut colt.

Familysearch Scotland-ODM GS film number 1066694; and Scotland-ODM GS film number 990505 for the two weddings of Henry Baxter to Elizabeth Dorothy Laing.

At www.genesreunited.co.uk a marriage announcement from the Perth Courier 3 April 1834.

Familysearch Scotland-VR GS film number 1066691: birth of Agnes Baxter 10 March 1835 in Edinburgh. Parents Henry Baxter and Elizabeth Dorothy née Laing. Via www.genesreunited.co.uk to the Perthshire Courier of 19 March 1835: a birth announcement for her, "on 10th inst" [10 March 1835] though without her name.

Marriage of Agnes' sister Mary: via archive.spectator.co.uk to the issue of 30 October 1858: marriage announcements on p20 include: on 26 [October 1858] at Idvies, Mary Baxter to Arthur Charles Pretymen, grandson of the bishop of Winchester, youngest son of Rev G T Pretymen Chancellor of Lincoln (I think that means the diocese of Lincoln).

I tried to find information on the death of Elizabeth Dorothy Baxter; but there was no entry for her in the probate registries of Scotland or England. Ancestry's probate registry entries for Scotland begin in 1876; and Elizabeth is on the census for 1871 but not that of 1881. I cautiously conclude she probably died between 1871 and 1875.

EDUCATION

Elizabeth Laing had never been to school. Her grandfather had taught her to read and write himself but she had no accomplishments other than the ability to speak some French and German, which she had learned on their travels in Europe. Samuel Laing of Papdale says that Agnes went to school in Edinburgh from the age of 9. However, which school she attended and what she learned there are a mystery as Samuel doesn't mention it.

Source:

The Autobiography of Samuel Laing of Papdale 1780-1868 edited and with supplementary information by R P Fereday. Bellavista Publications 2000: p51, p169.

WORK/PROFESSION

None.

ANY PUBLICATIONS?

None.

ANY PUBLIC LIFE/EVIDENCE FOR LEISURE TIME? Bearing in mind, of course, that most leisure activities leave no trace behind them.

None other than her esoteric interests.

ADDRESSES

Birth to 1837: Edinburgh and Idvies estate.

From her father's death until 1844: Bangholm Bower.

Aged 9 until her marriage: 30 Saxe Coburg Place Edinburgh; and the Idvies estate.

From 1857: Pitcairnie estate near Newburgh in Fifeshire and - possibly - a house in Edinburgh (though Agnes never mentions one).

December 1896 to January 1897 and thereafter most winters: Brook Street in the Walcot district of Bath.

April 1901: Seaton House St Andrews - they were probably there for the golf.

August 1901: Pitcairnie.

At death: Pitcairnie.

THE CATHCART FAMILY

The important person in Agnes' husband's family was her father-in-law, Taylor Cathcart. After working as manager of the Cunningham family's Grandvale Plantation in Jamaica, in 1823 he married Frances Marcy, a member of another family of land- and slave-owners on the island. He owned a few slaves himself, at Brustrode Farm. In 1833 Taylor Cathcart inherited an estate at Pitcairnie, near Newburgh in Fifeshire. He and Frances had a large family. Robert, born in Glasgow in 1833, was the second son, but his elder brother died in 1850 and so Robert inherited Pitcairnie when his father died in 1857.

Sources for the Cathcart family:

Some exhaustive family history details were compiled when the family claimed compensation for the loss of their slaves after the ending of the slave trade. See www.ucl.ac.uk, their Legacies of British Slave Ownership pages. Taylor Cathcart's Will shows that in addition to land, the Cathcarts owned railway and other shares.

Death of Taylor Cathcart's eldest son James: Glasgow Herald 23 December 1850: death announcement.

A Genealogical and Heraldic Dictionary of the Landed Gentry volume 3 1853 pp60-61 shows the descent of the family up to Taylor Cathcart.

Biographical Dictionary of Eminent Men of Fife 1866 editor Matthew Forster Connolly: p110.

Familysearch Scotland-ODM GS film number 1040169 for the birth of Robert Cathcart on 20 February 1833 son of Taylor Cathcart and wife Francis (sic); baptised Newburgh August 1833. A 2nd baptism record for him: Scotland-ODM GS film number 1042982: in the Gorbals March 1833.

AGNES' HUSBAND ROBERT CATHCART

Not expecting to inherit the family estate, Robert Cathcart had originally joined the army. He fought with the 74th Highlanders in the Kaffir War in 1852; but I think was then called home, as his father's heir after his elder brother's death. He managed the Pitcairnie estate well once he had succeeded to it in 1857, a few months after he and Agnes were married. He bred Clydesdales; he worked as a magistrate; he was Vice-Lieutenant for the County of Fifeshire. He was a keen golfer and was elected the Captain of the Royal and Ancient Golf Club of St Andrews as early as 1857, keeping the position until his death. And he was an enthusiastic gardener, a founder and first president of the Scottish Auricula and Primula Society.

Sources:

Pitcairnie Estate:

See www.pitcairnie.co.uk, the house still exists though it only has 100 acres attached to it now, much less than it must have had in Agnes' time. The house earns its keep through holiday lets. The estate belonged to the Leslie family until the 17th century when the house was built. It was bought by the Cathcarts in the mid-18th century and the family continued as owners of the estate until the 1960s.

Via www.genesreunited.com to St Andrews Citizen of 8 July 1899: an item mentioning family portraits owned by Mr Cathcart of Pitcairnie [Robert], including one by Sir Joshua Reynolds. (See Cathcart v Cathcart below; he might be having to sell them.)

A History of the Works of Sir Joshua Reynolds PRA by Algernon Graves, William Vine Cronin and Sir Edward R P Edgcumbe published 1901 uses what looks like Reynolds' appointments diary. Beware portraits of Earl and Countess Cathcart, also by Reynolds; but in add to those on p1531 a MR Cathcart is mentioned as having a sitting (just the one, apparently); and on p1555 Mr Cathcart's sitting was February 1761.

Sources for Robert Cathcart:

Cambridge History of the British Empire by Eric Anderson Walker 1963 pp342 et seq for an official account of the Kaffir War 1850-53.

The 74th Highlanders have a wiki page with coverage of their involvement in Kaffir War September 1851 at www.nam.ac.uk: Kroomie Forest.

Journal of the Royal Agricultural Society of England volume 25 1864 p xv lists R Cathcart of Pitcairnie as a member. Just noting that his eldest son, James Taylor Cathcart became a member in his turn: RAS Journal issue of 1907 pcviii.

The Clydesdale Stud Book 1885 p620 lists Robert Cathcart as the breeder of particular named animals; and p701 as on its list of accredited breeders.

Proceedings of the Royal Horticultural Society of London volume 1 p233 Robert Cathcart of Pitcairnie's election as a fellow at the meeting of 26 June 1860.

At www.thescottishauriculaandprimulasociety.com has some information on the founding of the society, originally published in the Edinburgh Evening News 14 February 1887. He was elected its first president and was still in post at its 4th exhibition in 1890.

Journal of Horticulture and Practical Gardening volume 16 1888 p202 an article on the gardens at Pitcairnie.

Robert Cathcart's death:

Highland Light Infantry Chronicle issue covering January 1905 to October 1907 p95 printing an announcement originally in the Glasgow Evening News of 21 May 1907 but issued at St Andrews: Robert Cathcart had died at his house (that's Seaton House) in St Andrews "last night". Who Was Who volume 1 1897-1915 p91.

On Seaton House in St Andrews:

At www.bw-scoreshotel.co.uk it's part of a Best Western hotel now. Built in 1864 for John Buddo; architect was George Rae.

At www.todaysgolfer.co.uk report 2 July 2012 mentions it being next door to the St Salvator Boys' School built 1880. With a photograph.

AGNES AND ROBERT'S FAMILY

Agnes Baxter and Robert Cathcart were married on 26 November 1856. Samuel Laing of Papdale considered that Agnes had made a good enough choice; though there's that about his wording that suggests he thought she might have done better. He assessed the value of the estate at Pitcairnie as about equal to that of Idvies - about £60,000 - and Agnes had taken to the marriage a dowry of £30,000 (add a nought? - at least one nought - to get a feel of today's equivalent values) so the Cathcarts would be very comfortably off. In Samuel Laing of Papdale's Autobiography there's no mention of the Cathcarts in his exhaustive account of his friends and extended family. That's not to say that the two families didn't know each other at all; just that they were not close friends and weren't related.

In terms of Victorian expectations of the wife of a landowner, Agnes did her duty, providing Pitcairnie with an heir, and two spares. She and Robert had three sons, all of whom were given the name of the grandfather on the Cathcart side: James Taylor Cathcart born 1858; William Taylor Cathcart born 1859; and Alan (or Allen) Taylor Cathcart born 1861.

On census day in 1871 and again in 1881, the Cathcarts were at Pitcairnie. In 1871 they employed a cook, a housemaid, a kitchenmaid and a maid who waited at table. Agnes and Robert were there on their own, as it was term-time: all three of their sons were staying with their grandmother Elizabeth Baxter at 4 Osborne Terrace, while they were at school in Edinburgh. Later in the 1870s the boys went away to England, to Marlborough College.

By 1881 William had gone to India. On census day that year James and Alan were at home, though, and the Cathcarts also had Robert's mother Frances, his unmarried sister (another Frances) and his aunt Mary Hunter living with them. To cope with this larger household, Agnes and Robert were employing a sewing maid, a laundry maid, a dairymaid and a footman in addition to a cook/housekeeper, housemaid and kitchenmaid.

By 1891, James Taylor Cathcart had married. After beginning to train as a barrister and then changing his mind, he had begun to help run the Pitcairnie estate; which meant that Agnes and Robert had more freedom to get away. It was perhaps at this time that they began to rent Seaton House, very convenient for the golf course at St Andrews. On census day 1891, however, they were staying at a boarding house in Brook Street, in the Walcot district of Bath. They were in Bath again over December 1896/January 1897; again on census day 1901, in another lodging house on Brook Street; and perhaps spent a month or two there most winters until Robert's death. Certainly they were in England enough for Agnes to transfer her GD membership from Edinburgh to the Isis-Urania temple in London.

Though they may have moved south in the spring of 1891 for a warmer climate, Agnes and Robert may also have decided to go where they were not well known, to hide from the consequences of James Taylor Cathcart's marriage (in 1887) to the heiress Mary Unwin of Wootton Hall in Staffordshire. Agnes may also have been grateful for the distractions offered by her occult reading and her involvement in the TS and GD; as the disaster of James' marriage was played out in public.

The bride fled after only a couple of months and wouldn't come back. In 1888 the groom cornered her in a hotel in Ashbourne in Derbyshire, and tried to force her to return; and in February 1891 he had her incarcerated at The Priory lunatic asylum at Roehampton, under the 1890 Lunacy Act. Questions were asked about that in the House of Commons. The hearing of the case by the Lunacy Commissioners in June 1891 was covered by newspapers as far afield as New Zealand; and I read the outcome of it in the New York Times. The couple tried twice to get divorced through the courts, but were refused. Eventually (in 1899) James was divorced by Act of Parliament, a very expensive procedure. If Agnes' letters to Frederick Leigh Gardner in the 1890s have a desponding and weary tone, you can hardly blame her. She will have hoped, I daresay, that the divorce would finally end the long and embarrassing saga; but litigation between James and Mary was still going on in 1902.

Sources:

Agnes' marriage:

The Autobiography of Samuel Laing of Papdale 1780-1868 edited and with supplementary information by R P Fereday. Bellavista Publications 2000. The Autobiography section p176.

Familysearch Scotland-ODM GS film number 6035516: marriage of Robert Cathcart to Agnes Baxter 26 Nov 1856 at Kirkden Angus.

Familysearch Scotland-ODM GS film number 6035516 for the births of their three sons:

- James Taylor Cathcart on 2 March 1858 at Newburgh, parents Robert Cathcart and Agnes née Baxter. NB that there's a spelling mistake on this one: CathcUrt instead of CathcArt.
- William Taylor Cathcart on 26 May 1859 at Newburgh.
- Alan Taylor Cathcart on 12 May 1861 at Newburgh.

James' marriage to Mary Unwin, including the Cathcart Lunacy Case:

Seen via google at hansard.millbanksystems.com: Hansard's Parliamentary Debates volume 351 House of Commons proceedings 6 March 1891 pp433-34, p648: question asked by Dr Fitzgerald MP for Longford South, about the seizure of Mary Cathcart of Wootton Hall Staffs.

A summary of the Cathcart Lunacy Hearing, which may have been the first such enquiry under the new Act, in The Law Reports and Cases in Lunacy volume 2 1896 p690.

Times Saturday 14 March 1891 p4 coverage of court hearing following a request by James Taylor Cathcart to have his wife Mary arrested for paying a man to paste placards denouncing him, on walls near his home in Fifeshire.

The lunacy hearing figured in the Times from Monday 11 May 1891 to 24 July 1891 though I couldn't find any coverage of the Commissioner's decision. See the outcome - that Mary Cathcart was sane and should be set free - at query.nytimes.com of 24 July 1891 quoting a report from a correspondent in London 23 July [1891].

Seen via www.genesreunited.com, in the Dundee Advertizer of 14 December 1892: the Court of Appeal was now hearing Mary Cathcart's challenge to a legal directive ordering her to pay 2/3 of the costs of the Lunacy Commission Enquiry.

Times Tue 14 March 1899 p9 brief note, with no details: the Cathcart Divorce Bill got its 3rd reading.

Times Fri 28 April 1899 p6 the Cathcart Divorce Bill got the Royal Assent.

Times Thurs 29 June 1899 p10 the divorce was re-heard at Edinburgh Court of Sessions after Mary had appealed against it and been allowed to amend her defence. Judgement was reserved.

Perhaps the Cathcarts were only divorced in England by the parliamentary Act:

Scottish Law Reporter volume 36 1900 p338-339 report on divorce case Cathcart v Cathcart, heard 18 January 1900. The petitioner was James Taylor Cathcart of Pitcairnie Fife, claiming desertion by his wife Mary.

Via www.genesreunited.co.uk to Edinburgh Evening News 12 December 1902: report on the continuing litigation between James and Mary Cathcart.

DEATH

Robert Cathcart died in May 1907 at his house in St Andrews. Agnes died at Pitcairnie in December 1913.

Sources:

Robert - Who Was Who volume 1 1897-1915 p91.

Agnes - Probate Registry for Scotland 1914. James Taylor Cathcart was her executor.

DESCENDANTS? AND WHAT (IF ANYTHING) HAPPENED NEXT.

I haven't found evidence of any grand-children being born to Agnes and Robert Cathcart.

JAMES TAYLOR CATHCART inherited Pitcairnie on Robert Cathcart's death although he had been running it or helping run it for some years by then.

Marlborough College Register 1843-1904 p257. After leaving Marlborough College James had gone to Christ Church Oxford; graduating BA 1880.

London Gazette 24 March 1885 p1315 in list of army promotions: James was promoted to Major in the 1st Fife Shire Regiment, as of 25 March 1885.

London Gazette 15 August 1890 p4438 James and one other man were appointed deputy Lord Lieutenants of the county of Fife.

Aberdeen Angus Herd Book volume 22 1898, issued by the Aberdeen Angus Cattle Society; p611 has James as a member.

Probate Registry Scotland: James Taylor Cathcart died at Pitcairnie 1 May 1935. There's also an entry for him in the Probate Registry of England. Confirmation of his English property granted London 24 October [1935] to William Taylor Cathcart.

A sad footnote to the life of Mary Unwin Cathcart:

See Law Reporter volume 87 1903 p750: another examination of Mary Unwin Cathcart's mental state, took place in May 1902 to judge whether she was fit to continue to act as executor of her mother's Will. The decision was that she was incapable of so doing, and the Official Solicitor's office took charge of her financial and legal affairs.

WILLIAM TAYLOR CATHCART went to work in India. I don't think he married:

Thacker's Directory of Bengal 1881 p962 William is in it, as assistant manager at the Silcoorie tea plantation at Silchar in the Cachar district of East Bengal.

Thacker's Directory of India 1885 p1067; and on p331-35 some information about his employer and the plantation on which he worked, in the Directory's list of tea plantations and plantation-owning firms in India. At this stage the Silcoorie tea gardens were owned by Jardine Skinner and Co who were also its agents at their offices in Calcutta. Silcoorie was the biggest of the firm's plantations in the Cachar district. E F Skinner was the district superintendent, working with three assistants, William Taylor Cathcart being 2nd of the three.

The tea-growing industry in India then entered a period of rapid growth and change; from which William benefited.

Thacker's Directory of India 1888 p1177 had William as having succeeded E F Skinner as manager of the Silcoorie plantations in Cachar district.

Thacker's Directory of India 1901 p1704: William's original employer had been taken over by Cachar and Dooars Ltd. William had kept his job, though it had changed and I think he had had to move; he was manager of Cachar and Dooars Ltd's estates in the Cachar district, with two assistants and an engineer working for him.

Thacker's Directory of India 1910 Part 2 p59. William had moved again and I'm not sure whether his second employer had been taken over or whether he'd been head-hunted by a rival firm. He was now manager of the Consolidated Tea and Lands Company's Amrail Division, based at the railway station at Satgaon, Sylhet. On p152-53 of the list of tea plantations in India: as its name suggests, Consolidated is a big firm, with many sub-divisions answering to an HQ in Khadimnagar. William was the Amrail Division's divisional manager, with four managers working for him. Consolidated had agents in Calcutta, Glasgow and London.

India Office List 1911 p55 lists all the current members of the Legislative Council of East Bengal and Assam, whose permanent president was the lieutenant-governor of Bengal. There were two groups of members: those who had been nominated to their post (mostly British) and those who had been elected (mostly Indian, although William was one of the elected ones).

1911 was a very good time to be a member of that kind of government body because this was the year the new king George V and queen Mary made their official visit to India. William might have been asked to attend the great Delhi durbar held during their stay.

The King and Queen in India by Sir Stanley Reed. London: Bennett Coleman 1912. William and the other members of the legislative council are listed on p338. And see meerutup.tripod.com the visit was from 2 December 1911 to 10 January 1912.

The royal visit probably explains why William Taylor Cathcart was awarded the CIE:

India Office and Burma List 1928 p156 begins a list of all those who have been awarded the Companion of the Order of the Indian Empire - CIE - since the Order was founded in 1880. On p158 William's name is with a number of men, British and Indian, who received the Order on 12 December 1911.

Thacker's Directory of India 1914 Part 2 p66 was the last time William was listed in Thacker's as an British resident of India. He was still in the same job as when listed in 1910.

This must be him, I suppose, returning to Europe to fight in the first World War: London

Gazette 17 October 1916 p9967 a man called William Taylor Cathcart, described as "late lieutenant in the Surma Valley Light Horse" had been made a temporary Major, as of 18 October 1916.

As James Taylor Cathcart doesn't seem to have had any children, I think William must have inherited Pitcairnie when James died.

Probate Registry England 1940; entry for William Taylor Cathcart of Pitcairnie Newburgh who had died on 2 May 1940. Confirmation of his English property granted London 24 July [1940] to Philip George Moncrieff Skene and John Christopher Laidlay.

Via findmypast I saw a reference to a Probate Registry Bengal entry for him, as well; 1942.

At findagrave.com, William was buried at Newburgh Cemetery.

Who Was Who volume 3 1929-40: p231. William is the only brother who is listed in Who's Who.

ALAN TAYLOR CATHCART

On his census entry for 1901, Alan described himself as a retired tea planter. Unlike William, Alan went to Ceylon.

Dundee Courier 20 October 1906 has a reference to Alan Taylor Cathcart as living in Ceylon in 1883.

Alan married Isabella Ginevra Galton, a grand-child of banker J H Galton who had bought Hadzor House, near Droitwich in 1821. She was related to the evolutionary biologist Francis Galton; to Charles Darwin; and to the Wedgewoods. I haven't been able to find out when and where Alan and Isabella were married, but the marriage was being prepared for in 1893:

Cases Decided in the Court of Session issue of 1948 (though I think the case is much earlier) pp457-59. This was a snippet so I couldn't see what kind of court case it was; but there was a reference to a pre-nuptial agreement dated 1893 between Alan Taylor Cathcart and Isabella Ginevra or Geneva Galton or Cathcart.

On the day of the 1901 census, Alan and Isabella were living in Martley Worcestershire. They had no children - or at least, none were living with them on that day. I couldn't find them on the 1911 census but they were probably living in Scotland then.

Via www.genesreunited.co.uk to Edinburgh Evening News of 20 June 1905: mention of a legal case in which Alan and Isabella were suing solicitor Charles Thomas Arnold for damages. The Cathcarts' address at that time was 15 Coates Crescent Edinburgh. And via genesreunited to Derby Daily Telegraph of 21 June 1905: coverage of the same case reported that Alan and Isabella were suing Mr Arnold for £1000 each.

Alan does seem to have been very litigious:

Via www.genesreunited.co.uk to Dundee Courier of 17 February 1920: a report that Alan Taylor Cathcart was bringing a case against two trustees - presumably trustees of a fund he benefited from. The trust must be connected in some way to Alan's grandfather Henry Baxter, because the two trustees in question are Edward A Baxter of Dundee and George Washington Baxter of Inverighty, both businessmen and both (see Henry Baxter above) members of the Baxter family of Dundee. Agnes might have been a beneficiary of the trust fund while she was alive.

I couldn't find any entries for either Alan or Isabella in the Probate Registries Scotland (which goes to 1936 only) or in England. If Alan was still alive in 1940 he will have inherited Pitcairnie from his older brother William.

BASIC SOURCES I USED for all Golden Dawn members.

Membership of the Golden Dawn: The Golden Dawn Companion by R A Gilbert. Northampton: The Aquarian Press 1986. Between pages 125 and 175, Gilbert lists the names, initiation dates and addresses of all those people who became members of the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn or its many daughter Orders between 1888 and 1914. The list is based on the Golden Dawn's administrative records and its Members' Roll - the large piece of parchment on which all new members signed their name at their initiation. All this information had been inherited by Gilbert but it's now in the Freemasons' Library at the United Grand Lodge of England building on Great Queen Street Covent Garden. Please note, though, that the records of the Amen-Ra Temple in Edinburgh were destroyed in 1900/01. I have recently (July 2014) discovered that some records of the Horus Temple at Bradford have survived, though most have not; however those that have survived are not yet accessible to the public.

For the history of the GD during the 1890s I usually use Ellic Howe's The Magicians of the Golden Dawn: A Documentary History of a Magical Order 1887-1923. Published Routledge and Kegan Paul 1972. Foreword by Gerald Yorke. Howe is a historian of printing rather than of magic; he also makes no claims to be a magician himself, or even an occultist. He has no axe to grind.

Family history: freebmd; ancestry.co.uk (census and probate); findmypast.co.uk; familysearch; Burke's Peerage and Baronetage; Burke's Landed Gentry; Armorial Families; thepeerage.com; and a wide variety of family trees on the web.

Famous-people sources: mostly about men, of course, but very useful even for the female members of GD. Oxford Dictionary of National Biography. Who Was Who. Times Digital Archive.

Useful source for business and legal information: London Gazette and its Scottish counterpart Edinburgh Gazette. Now easy to find (with the right search information) on the web.

Catalogues: British Library; Freemasons' Library.

Wikipedia; Google; Google Books - my three best resources. I also used other web pages, but with some caution, as - from the historian's point of view - they vary in quality a great deal.

Find the web pages of Roger Wright and Sally Davis, including my list of people initiated into the Order of the Golden Dawn between 1888 and 1901, at:

www.wrightanddavis.co.uk

***

Mrs Emmeline Alice CLARK who was initiated into the Golden Dawn at the Horus Temple Bradford in September 1895. She chose the Latin motto 'Vade' and was one of a group of members of Horus Temple who actually lived in Liverpool, not Bradford: 40 Claremont Road Smithdown Road.

I tried looking for Emmeline Clark on the censuses of 1891 and 1901, feeling quite hopeful of finding her because of her relatively uncommon forename. But there was no one of that name living in Liverpool on either census. Just in case the census official had spelled Emmeline's surname wrongly, I checked under Clarke but still couldn't identify her.

I can answer the question WHO DID SHE KNOW IN THE GOLDEN DAWN however, because I found Emmeline in the Members' Register of the Theosophical Society (TS), which she joined in November 1894 giving them the same address as she subsequently gave the GD. She paid her subscription to the TS in 1894 and 1895 but then seems to have let her membership lapse. On her record at the TS was a note to indicate that she had sided against the eventual winners of a dispute within the TS in the aftermath of Blavatsky's death. And/or she had just moved away. As a member, however briefly, of the TS in Liverpool she will have met these people who were members of both TS in Liverpool and GD in Bradford: the Nisbets, John Hill, William Ranstead and Isabel de Steiger.

BASIC SOURCES I USED for all Golden Dawn members.

Membership of the Golden Dawn: The Golden Dawn Companion by R A Gilbert. Northampton: The Aquarian Press 1986. Between pages 125 and 175, Gilbert lists the names, initiation dates and addresses of all those people who became members of the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn or its many daughter Orders between 1888 and 1914. The list is based on the Golden Dawn's administrative records and its Members' Roll - the large piece of parchment on which all new members signed their name at their initiation. All this information had been inherited by Gilbert but it's now in the Freemasons' Library at the United Grand Lodge of England building on Great Queen Street Covent Garden.

Family history: freebmd; ancestry.co.uk (census and probate); findmypast.co.uk; familysearch; Burke's Peerage and Baronetage; Burke's Landed Gentry; Armorial Families; thepeerage.com; and a wide variety of family trees on the web.

Famous-people sources: mostly about men, of course, but very useful even for the female members of GD. Oxford Dictionary of National Biography. Who Was Who. Times Digital Archive.

Catalogues: British Library; Freemasons' Library.

Wikipedia; Google; Google Books - my three best resources. I also used other web pages, but with some caution, as - from the historian's point of view - they vary in quality a great deal.

27 April 2012

AMandragora@attglobal.net

I am putting Golden Dawn members Joseph Clayton, Fanny Clayton and Eliza Craven in a file together.

Joseph Clayton was the second person to become a member of the Order of the Golden Dawn at its Horus Temple in Bradford; only Thomas Pattinson got there before him and I'm sure it was Pattinson that invited him in. This was in May 1888. Joseph did choose a motto - 'Tollere velum' - but his membership may only have been nominal and he was never initiated into the Second Order where you actually tried doing practical magic. In March 1893 his daughter Fanny Clayton (I shall call her Fanny Isabel) was initiated at the Horus Temple. She chose the motto 'orare' and was a more committed member than her father, being initiated into the inner, Second Order, probably in March 1896. In September 1895, Eliza Craven joined the Horus Temple, taking the motto 'Semper eadem' but never making much progress in the study required to reach the Second Order. Eliza and Fanny Isabel were sharing a house in 1901.

A WORD OF WARNING BEFORE I START: these are my biographies of members of the Golden Dawn who lived in Bradford and Liverpool. I could have done a much better job of it if I lived in Lancashire or Yorkshire myself and could look at local archives.

A further caveat about Joseph Clayton. Looking in the Freemasons' Library catalogue, and on the web, I came across books written in the early 20th century by a Joseph Clayton. This writer is NOT the GD's Joseph Clayton, he's a much younger man.

THE CLAYTON and CRAVEN FAMILIES

I've been able to draw on some very well-researched family history websites for some of my GD members, but not for the Claytons or for the Cravens. From the mid-19th century censuses I have gained the impression that both families had been living in the West Riding of Yorkshire for many years, possibly for centuries. There was a village called Clayton to the west of the town of Bradford; it's now a Bradford suburb. I make the tentative suggestion that Joseph Clayton could trace his family back to that village. It's harder to figure out where the Cravens originated and I don't have enough information for a good guess.

The families didn't help me much: too many Janes; too many Ellens; too many Josephs; too many Elizas; too many surnames!

When he was getting married for the first time, Joseph Clayton said his father was a man called William Clayton who lived in Bradford where he was a dealer in glass and chinaware. As yet there are relatively few directories on the web. If I'd lived near Bradford I could have looked through many more. However, I did find one published in 1837 and now transcribed onto a family history website, which listed a Thomas Clayton as a dealer in earthenware, at Providence Street Bradford. No one called William Clayton was listed in the directory but perhaps Thomas Clayton and William Clayton were brothers or cousins, working in the same business, with Thomas as the senior partner.

William Clayton was married to a woman called Jane; I haven't been able to find details of their marriage so I don't know what Jane's original surname was. Perhaps they weren't married. I daresay they were, but with the Claytons I'm no longer sure. If a marriage took place, it took place in the mid-1820s because Joseph had four older sisters - Sarah and Mary (who may or may not have been twins), Jane and Isabella. Joseph Clayton gave information to every census official between 1861 and 1911 consistent with his having been born in 1837. He had one younger brother, William, who died in childhood.

Joseph's father had died before 1841, probably in 1838 shortly after his younger son was born. Joseph's mother Jane took over the business, and was running it with the help of her two eldest daughters in 1841. In 1845 she got married again, to Martin Beanland, whose family had a building and joinery business in Bradford. The Beanlands were another family who had been living in the district for a long time: one family history website I found traced them back to the 16th century. In 1851 Martin and Jane Beanland and Jane's younger children Jane, Isabella and Joseph, were all living at 144 Westgate in the centre of Bradford; from which both his business and her's were probably being run. Joseph had left school and was employed as a plane maker, probably by his step-father's firm. My science, technology and IT advisor Roger Wright says that planes were still being made in the 1850 in the same way they had been for thousands of years: the maker built a long, rectangular wooden box and chiseled a groove in it, into which a piece of iron was inserted which had the planing surface on it. This old method was about to be swept away by the invention (by the American Leonard Bailey) of the cast-iron plane that is still in use for ordinary joinery today; but in the 1850s the skills of the wooden box plane maker continued to be in demand. I don't think Joseph Clayton actually hung around to find his plane-making skills being superceded by new technology: in the autumn of 1851, Martin Beanland died and although the firm continued in business for at least another 20 years, probably employing several other members of the Claytons' extended family, sometime between 1851 and 1858, Joseph left it and Bradford too, to work as a teacher.

I think that Joseph Clayton had been educated at a National School; on the grounds that if he had not been, he wouldn't have found work in one later. The National Schools were run by the National School for Promoting Religious Education (the NSPRE), which had been founded in 1811 to build and run a school for the children of the poor in each parish in England and Wales. Although the NSPRE received some funding from central government, the rest had to be found from the individual parish. Costs were kept down by employing very few paid teachers and using selected older children to teach the younger ones (without pay): the 'monitor' system. The NSPRE was closely associated with the Church of England and all pupils had to attend church on Sundays. I haven't read that staff had to do so too but I think it's a reasonable assumption that this was required of them: so Joseph Clayton must have been a parish-church goer at this point in his life. Teachers learned their trade by doing an apprenticeship - work in class plus study at home. I think Joseph's apprentice-job must have been in Aigburth, then a separate village but now a suburb of Liverpool south of Sefton Park; because that was where he married Louisa Shelcott in the spring of 1858.

I cannot find Louisa Shelcott on any census before 1861; but her marriage registration at St Michael-in-the-Hamlet Aigburth says that she was the daughter of a master mariner, so perhaps that's not surprising. Louisa was several years older than her husband but I've found in my researches into the members of the Golden Dawn that that's not so surprising either.

Joseph and Louisa Clayton left Aigburth shortly after their marriage and moved to Northampton: perhaps they had married on the strength of his apprenticeship being over and his having been offered a job in the National School there. Their son William Charles Edward Clayton was born there in 1859 and on the day of the 1861 census all three were living as boarders in Maple Street Northampton, in the household of Elizabeth Shepherd whose daughter Sarah was also a teacher, probably at the same school as Joseph. Louisa was pregnant on census day: daughter Cora was born in the summer; but Louisa died either at or shortly after the birth.

The dangers of childbirth and the days immediately after it meant that it was not especially unusual, in the 1860s, for a man to be left a widower with very young children. Within a few months Joseph Clayton left Northampton for the village of Thorpe Hesley, north of Sheffield - I imagine that he left his two children with his mother or one of his sisters, and this was the nearest job he could get to them. Infants in this situation were very vulnerable, and Joseph's son William died early in 1862. Three or four months later, Joseph married Jane Arkell.

The only thing I've been able to find out about Jane Arkell is that on the day of her marriage she already had one child, a daughter called Ellen. Ellen Roberts. On censuses later in the century, Jane Clayton was fairly (but not entirely) consistent about having been born in Liverpool; and having been born around 1840. In the 'Sources for the Claytons' section below I give a blow-by-blow account of my search for Jane Arkell and/or Jane Roberts for those readers who might be interested. Here I'll just say that my cautious conclusion is that IF her surname at birth was Arkell, she had not been married before when she married Joseph Clayton; and that she had given her daughter Ellen her father's surname. IF her surname at birth was Roberts, she must have been a widow when she married Joseph Clayton; but I can't find evidence of a first marriage for her, to a man called Arkell.

Joseph Clayton and Jane Arkell married in Newington: there's another puzzle. Newington was the registration district for London's South Bank, in the 1860s; if either or both of them lived there, it must have been for a short time only. Just long enough to get married? If so, where did they meet? Perhaps Liverpool, several years before? Who knows.

Joseph and Jane married in London but never lived there. They set up home in Thorpe Hesley, Jane adding her daughter Ellen to the family and taking on the care of Joseph's daughter Cora (who was still less than a year old). Fanny Isabel Clayton was born at Thorpe Hesley a year later, the first child of Joseph and Jane. In between Fanny Isabel's birth and that of her next sister, another Ellen (as if there was not enough confusion about names already) the family moved to Liverpool, I suppose so that Joseph Clayton could take up another teaching appointment, perhaps one with rather higher pay. Joseph and Jane's daughter Jenny was born in Liverpool in 1867; and then they had no more children until the mid-1870s - at least, none that survived.

At some point between 1867 and 1871, Joseph Clayton returned to Bradford and took over the family china and glassware business. Thereby hangs another confused tale.

Because of a blip in Ancestry's census coverage of Bradford in 1861, I can't tell where Joseph's mother Jane Beanland was living; nor whether she was still running the family business that year - I suppose she must have been, but I can't confirm it. I was able to read that Jane Beanland, her daughter Isabella and her grandson James Clayton were all living together on the day of the 1861 census, and that all the rest of the family were living elsewhere. Jane Beanland's grandson James Clayton, was born in Bradford in 1854: he was Isabella's son but she wasn't married yet. It wasn't until 1865 that she married John Walton, a stuff packer at a woollen mill. He was six years younger than Isabella, too young to have been James' father, but he adopted him and James became James Clayton Walton. By 1871 James was working as a joiner-cum-office boy, probably for the building firm run by the Beanlands. Where this is leading is that Isabella's getting married would have meant that her mother wouldn't have been able to count quite so much on her help in housekeeping and running the china and glassware business, so it was probably at that point that Jane Beanland began to think of handing the business on. By 1871 she had retired, and gone to live with Isabella, John Walton and James, in Horton.

I get a strong impression that Joseph Clayton did not particularly want to get involved in the family firm. And of course, although it had been a part of his childhood, he had never gained any experience in managing it by the day. Now, though, it seems he was the only child left; so he gave up teaching and returned to Bradford to pick up the burden. How long he carried it for is not clear from what he told the census officials between 1871 and 1911: in 1871 he certainly said that he was a "shopman" dealing in china and glass; but in 1881 he said his shop was selling stationery; in 1891 he told the official he was a confectioner, and an accountant - did this mean he was doing accounts for other people?; but in 1901 he was back to describing himself as a dealer in chinaware; and in 1911 he said he was retired from business as a dealer in china and glass. Did he do or sell all those things? At the same time? If he was a confectioner, who was making the sweets? The one thing that was more or less consistent about Joseph's livelihood in this long period was the business' general location - always on Manchester Road Bradford though not necessarily at the same address.

The births and deaths of several more children punctuated the lives of Joseph and Jane in the 1870s and 1880s. Their daughter Jenny died in 1873, aged 6. Then two sons were born to them - Robert in 1876; and Harold in 1878 (he died in 1881). Oswald was born in 1881 and Joseph and Jane's last child, Hilda, in 1883. By the day of the 1881 census, Jane Beanland had come to live with Joseph and Jane and all their children and step-children. Ellen Roberts, Cora, Fanny Isabel and Ellen Clayton had all left school and all but Cora were both working, bringing money home. Ellen Roberts was serving in a pub. Ellen Clayton had gone to work in a woollen mill; the only one of Joseph's children who did so. I'll explain what Fanny Isabel was doing below. Cora was not doing any paid work; as the eldest daughter (step-daughter in Jane Clayton's case, of course) she was probably helping with the housekeeping and cooking necessary to feed and clothe such a large household. Jane Beanland may have needed special care by this time, too. This appearance on the 1881 census is the last information I have about Cora Clayton: after this, she disappears - I can't find a marriage or a death registration for her and she doesn't figure in any later census.

Fanny Isabel Clayton was following her father, by training to be a teacher. Perhaps he encouraged her to do this; at the very least he must have seen that the Education Act of 1870 would lead to more job opportunities for the right kind of woman, alternatives to the physical labour of the factory and the drudgery of domestic service. The Act was being rolled out throughout England, but gradually, and Fanny Isabel's training probably didn't differ very much from her father's for the same job: training colleges for teachers were still very much in the future. If Fanny Isabel's training did follow the usual pattern, it will have begun before she left school, by her being chosen as an older pupil to help teach the younger ones. On leaving school, which she may have done at the age of 12 (in 1875) Fanny Isabel will have needed Joseph Clayton to sign forms for her, committing her to four years as an apprentice on a small wage. At the end of the four years, most - but not all - apprentices were offered a job. Fanny Isabel definitely got work at the end of her apprenticeship, though I don't know which School Board it was with; I haven't been able to find out anything about her employer or employers. I assume it was the Bradford school board at this stage in her life; I think that's a reasonable guess.

What and who Fanny Isabel will have taught was governed by the ideologies and stereotypes of the era. Women teachers taught the infants and the older girls; they did not teach the older boys. They were paid less at every level than a man. Expectations of them and their female pupils were low, and based on the assumption that working-class girls would work in the home, either as a married woman in their husband's home or as a paid servant in someone else's, in either case doing the same tasks; so that - particularly in years immediately after the 1870 Act - the curriculum for girls concentrated on very basic literacy, sewing and laundry skills. Even domestic economy and practical lessons in cookery didn't come in until later in Fanny Isabel's career; technical skills were not taught at all; and nothing much was expected of girls in the way of arithmetic. Essentially, if a woman teacher couldn't teach sewing, she was not likely to keep her job. I'd like to think that Fanny Isabel had a higher opinion of her pupils' abilities than that; but she would not have been allowed to make anything of it.

As the 1880s progressed, though Joseph and Jane Clayton did have the one last child, the large household of 1881 did begin to break up. Jane Beanland died early in 1884 at the age of 84. Ellen Roberts married Bowker Kay in 1888; by 1891 they were owners of the Coffee Tavern in Market Street Cleckheaton. And by 1891 Fanny Isabel was living with her aunt.

In 1856 Fanny Isabel's aunt Jane Clayton (Joseph's youngest sister) had a daughter who was registered as Sarah Clayton. The following year, Jane married Joseph Waring. Joseph and Jane Waring had no children, which leads me to suppose that Joseph Waring was not Sarah's biological father. However, like John Walton, he was happy enough to act as a father to Sarah in all other respects and was probably quite as devastated as Jane was when Sarah died, in 1869, aged 13. The Warings ran a grocery business in Little Horton from the 1860s to the 1880s. In addition, at least around 1870, Joseph also did carpentry work and employed one man to help him; perhaps he worked as a sub-contractor for the Beanland joinery and building firm and that was how Jane Clayton had met him. By 1881, Joseph Waring was no longer doing the carpentry and perhaps that made money a bit tight for him and Jane: on the day of the 1881 census they were renting out some rooms above the shop.

I haven't been able to find out when Fanny Isabel Clayton first went to live with aunt Jane Waring but I imagine she moved in during 1889, the year Joseph Waring died. Jane Waring carried on with the grocery business, which - like Joseph Clayton's business - always been on Manchester Road, so Fanny Isabel hadn't moved very far from home. However, I think it was a move that benefited both parties: Jane Waring had a young niece to cheer her loneliness and give some help in the shop perhaps; and Fanny Isabel might have had - probably for the first time - space of her own and a bit of peace and quiet in which to work. Fanny Isabel probably continued to live with her aunt until Jane Waring died in 1896 and so was there when she joined the Order of the Golden Dawn (I wonder what her aunt made of it). Fanny Isabel never returned to live with her parents. Instead - she had been a professional woman for many years now - she rented a house which she shared with a colleague - Eliza Craven.

Quite how Joseph Clayton found the time and energy for his intellectual pursuits, in the midst of such a busy household, I can't imagine; but he was a Biblical scholar, and a theosophist. Going through the Theosophical Society (TS) Membership Registers, I found evidence to show that he joined the TS during the early 1880s, when it was in its infancy and Helena Petrovna Blavatsky was still living in India. He was a keen-eyed reader of the TS's members' magazine The Vahan, and in March 1893 a letter from him was published in it which started quite a debate about how a passage in Romans VII should be understood, particularly the word 'atonement', which according to one of those who got involved in the argument, only occurs that once in the whole New Testament. Joseph's had written in to report that he had noticed a tendency in recent articles in The Vahan to write of the word as meaning at-one-ment - being together or coming together. In the face of much criticism from several respondents who disagreed with him at great length and with many classical and other references, Joseph stuck to his guns that it should be translated as something more like expiation - making amends. I mention this exchange of opinions (in which even the editor found himself obliged to defend his own position) because one of the others who took part in it was also a Golden Dawn member, one much better educated than Joseph Clayton and boy! Did he let him know it. I will not name this other GD member; he is one of only three GD members that I really do dislike. My sympathies are all with Joseph Clayton, who probably would have loved a university education but never had the chance of one. Instead, he had done his best to educate himself. 1893 was the last year that Joseph Clayton paid his membership fee to the TS. It would have been a sad thing if these supporters of 'at-one-ment' had driven him away.

Fanny Isabel, and her much younger brother Robert, were the two children of Joseph Clayton who shared his philosophical tastes. They, and Robert's wife Ada, were long-serving members of the the Theosophical Society in Bradford, though Ada didn't join until after she married (in 1900). The TS was active in Bradford in the early 1890s, and again from about 1902, but Fanny Isabel's membership record shows that she joined the TS in the early 1880s, perhaps at the same time as her father, and when the only places where TS members met to discuss theosophy and hear talks on the subject were in London. The TS had been founded to study the western occult tradition. It wasn't until Helena Petrovna Blavatsky went to India in the late 1870s that its teachings and discussions became influenced by Asian philosophy, particularly Buddhism. I've painted a pretty grim description of what Fanny Isabel would have spent her working days teaching. Her own abilities and interests raced far ahead of the intellectual level expected both of girl pupils and their women teachers. Surely her involvement in the TS and the GD must have stemmed, at least partly, from a desire to give her brain a challenge, a proper work-out. By the time she joined the GD she had been teaching hemming and stain-removal for nearly 20 years. Being in the TS and the GD covered all the options in the early 1890s - Asian thought at the TS, the western occult authors and rituals at the GD - and many of those initiated into the GD were also members of the TS in Bradford, including Fanny Isabel; they were a close-knit group. Fanny Isabel worked very hard and consistently at the reading required by the GD of those who wanted initiation into its inner (Second) Order, and reached that level in three years (some GD members took twice as long). At the same time, she and Joseph were members of Athene Lodge, with other GD members like Bogdan Edwards, Eliza Pattinson and Joe Dunckley. Athene Lodge split off from Bradford Lodge in the mid-1890s but the two lodges got back together in 1902, reforming the Bradford TS lodge, which still exists today. So close were the GD and the TS in Bradford that the impetus for this getting-back-together may have been the splitting-up into various daughter orders of the GD, in the years 1901-03. Fanny Isabel and Joseph Clayton were not members of either of the GD's two main daughter orders. CJoseph Clayton doesn't seem to have joined the reformed Bradford TS Lodge either, but Fanny Isabel did so. Robert and Ada Clayton joined it a few years later and were very committed members for the next 30 years, both serving as president and Ada running its Ladies' Sewing Circle (formed in 1914).

A daughter lodge of Bradford, Minerva TS Lodge, was founded in 1917 by Fanny Isabel and another ex-GD member, Edward Jonathan Dunn; though its other prime movers - Eliza Pattinson's daughter and Edward Jonathan Dunn's wife - had never been GD members. Miss Pattinson was Minerva Lodge's secretary from 1917 until her death; and then Fanny Isabel took over the role, probably until her own death.

Joseph and Jane Clayton were still living on Manchester Road on the day of the 1901 census but their household was much smaller: their daughter Ellen had married in 1895 and their son Robert - now a printer/compositor - in 1900. Oswald and Hilda were still living at home, but they were working: Oswald was a plumber and Hilda worked in a bakery. Fanny Isabel was living at 141 Grafton Street Little Horton, with Eliza Craven.

I know very little about Eliza Craven. In 1901, sharing a house with Fanny Isabel, Miss Craven told the census official that she was 34 and had been born in Kirkstall (just north of Leeds). The only birth registration I could find which came near to fitting that information was for an Eliza A Craven early in 1866; not quite right for the age she gave, but taking a year or two off your age is a common enough habit. The registration didn't get me very far: I couldn't spot a convincing Eliza Craven born in Kirkstall early 1860s-ish on any census between 1871 and 1901. There were just too many Eliza Cravens: like Clayton, it's a common surname in Yorkshire and half the female Cravens seemed to be called Eliza. I looked for the GD's Eliza Craven in the West Riding but also in Liverpool, because when she was initiated into the Order of the Golden Dawn she gave an address in the Gillington district of Liverpool.

Where did Fanny Isabel Clayton and Eliza Craven meet? If Eliza had been born in Leeds but had grown up in Liverpool they could have known each other from their childhoods. They could have met later, through the Golden Dawn. But they could have got to know each other only after Eliza Craven moved to take up a job in Bradford. How long they lived together I don't know. I can't find Eliza Craven on the 1911 census. She may just have been travelling during the Easter holidays, of course. I don't think she had married. It's possible she might have died: on freebmd I saw several death registrations that might have been her, between 1901 and 1910.

By the day of the 1911 census, Joseph Clayton had retired. None of his children had ever had anything much to do with the china and glassware business. On the contrary - Joseph seems to have gone out of his way to ensure they did other work. So I suppose it just got wound up, or sold to someone new. After four or so decades of living on Manchester Road, Joseph and Jane moved to Tichborne Road, presumably as part of Joseph's retirement. Hilda was the only child still living at home in 1911. Oswald had moved out; I think he married in 1905.

Fanny Isabel had moved to Baildon by 1911 and was living at 28 East Parade. She was there on her own on census day. She had been promoted: she was a head teacher now and may have been earning as much as £100 a year. And she might have been beginning to look forward to retiring, with a pension (she was 60 in 1923 but I'm not certain of official retirement ages at that period).

Joseph Clayton died early in 1912. Daughter Hilda married in 1913. Jane Clayton died at the end of the horrible year 1917.

I hope Fanny Isabel enjoyed her retirement. She certainly kept up her interest in theosophy to the end. She died in 1934.

Fanny Isabel Clayton never married. Was this by choice? Difficult to tell. The prevailing ideologies expected all women to marry; marriage and motherhood were seen in Fanny Isabel's lifetime as not only a woman's true destiny, but also as her duty to the Empire. But that all women should marry was quite impossible in England in the late 19th century, with so many young single men emigrating, dying in the armed forces, or simply not wishing to take on the economic burden of wife and family. Most likely, Fanny Isabel didn't get married because nobody asked her. However, there were other reasons why a woman might opt to remain single.

BASIC SOURCES I USED for all Golden Dawn members.

Membership of the Golden Dawn: The Golden Dawn Companion by R A Gilbert. Northampton: The Aquarian Press 1986. Between pages 125 and 175, Gilbert lists the names, initiation dates and addresses of all those people who became members of the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn or its many daughter Orders between 1888 and 1914. The list is based on the Golden Dawn's administrative records and its Members' Roll - the large piece of parchment on which all new members signed their name at their initiation. All this information had been inherited by Gilbert but it's now in the Freemasons' Library at the United Grand Lodge of England building on Great Queen Street Covent Garden. Please note, though, that the records of the Amen-Ra Temple in Edinburgh were destroyed in 1900/01. The records of the Horus Temple at Bradford have not survived beyond 1896 either, but there's a history of the TS in Bradford on the web (though originally written in 1941) at www.ts-bradford.org.uk/theosoc/btshisto.htm in which a lot of the same people who joined the GD are mentioned. In April 2012 the History page was updated with the names of all the members at least up to 1941.

The members of the GD at its Horus Temple were rather a bolshy lot, and needed a lot of careful management!

Family history: freebmd; ancestry.co.uk (census and probate); findmypast.co.uk; familysearch; Burke's Peerage and Baronetage; Burke's Landed Gentry; Armorial Families; thepeerage.com; and a wide variety of family trees and family histories on the web.

Famous-people sources: mostly about men, of course, but very useful even for the female members of GD. Oxford Dictionary of National Biography. Who Was Who. Times Digital Archive.

Catalogues: British Library; Freemasons' Library.

Wikipedia; Google; Google Books - my three best resources. I also used other web pages, but with some caution, as - from the historian's point of view - they vary in quality a great deal.

SOURCES FOR JOSEPH and FANNY ISABEL CLAYTON and ELIZA CRAVEN

CLAYTON/BEANLAND/WARING IN BRADFORD I have had v little luck w this.

Baines's Directory and Gazetteer of Bradford published in 1822, transcribed at www.genuki.org.uk. It covers the surrounding villages as well as the town of Bradford, and has several businesses run by people called Clayton and people called Beanland.

CLAYTON GLASS AND CHINA

My only directory reference was in History, Gazetteer and Directory of the West Riding of Yorkshire, published by William White in 1837: p454 Bradford directory under china, glass and earthenware. There's no reference to such a business run by a William Clayton. The death of a Thomas Clayton was registered in Bradford Yorkshire, quarter April-June 1838; perhaps it was that Thomas Clayton.

WILLIAM CLAYTON, Joseph's father, Fanny Isabel's grandfather:

Even on familysearch I couldn't find a marriage of a William Clayton to a woman called Jane in the mid-1820s; not even looking outside Bradford. I may be wrong in assuming William Clayton was dead by 1841; but he must have been dead by the summer of 1845. These 3 death registrations are possibly him; the age at death was not included in the registration until 1868:

death William Clayton registered Bradford Yorkshire Oct-Dec 1837

death William Clayton registered Bradford Yorkshire Apr-June 1838

death William Clayton registered Bradford Yorkshire Oct-Dec 1838

JOSEPH CLAYTON'S SISTERS Sarah Mary Jane and Isabella. Sarah and Mary are never part of any household with Joseph after 1841; I guess they marry.

WILLIAM CLAYTON, Joseph's younger brother who doesn't appear on any census after 1841:

I found two possible birth registrations in Bradford Yorkshire: 1 in Apr-June 1839; and 1 in April-June 1840. A death registration for a William Clayton registered Bradford Yorkshire

Jan-Mar 1842 is probably the correct one.

BEANLAND

About the Beanlands: at www.tribalpages.com there was a very well researched and presented, exhaustively-detailed list of people called Beanland, all descended from one particular man. Some people in the list were living at Bingley in 1597/1620. HOWEVER I couldn't see anyone called Martin Beanland in this list, so he may not be related to this branch of the family.

Evidence that Martin Beanland's business continued after he died in 1851: The British Architect volume 2 1874 p264 it's a google snippet so I couldn't see the name of the building which was the subject of the article but it's a prestigious one, at Manningham Park, and includes an assembly room, lecture rooms, a library etc. The architects were Messrs Lockwood and M[I couldn't read the rest] of Bradford. Amongst the contractors working on the building were Messrs Beanland, joiners of Bradford.

Death of Martin Beanland was registered Bradford Yorkshire Oct-Dec 1851. Via familysearch England EAS-y 1849274: a very brief burial record for Martin Beanland: he was buried on 14 October 1851, in Bradford, the record didn't say exactly where.

JOSEPH CLAYTON AS A PLANE MAKER

Wikipedia on planes has pictures of ancient ones looking very modern - the design hasn't changed much! Wikipedia on Leonard Bailey: born 1825 in New Hampshire; died 1905 in New York City. In the mid-1860s he came up with a series of inventions including a cast-iron hand plane. Later his designs were bought by Stanley Rule and Level of Connecticut, now known as Stanley Works, who still make them.

Website www.davistownmuseum.org was founded by H G Skip Brack partly as a museum of tools in history. He dates Bailey's series of inventions as beginning c 1858 and says that the first ever plane with a cast-iron body was made as early as 1827. The museum is in Bar Harbor Maine. Website has some good pictures.

JOSEPH AS A TEACHER: the National School for Promoting Religious Education (NSPRE).

See wikipedia on NSPRE for the general principles on which it worked. I got further details of how it worked by the day from www.barnes113.karoo.net/History/bromley\_national\_school.htm which has an account of Bromley's NSPRE, apparently based on its records and including useful stuff like how many teachers were employed at any time, and how much they were paid.

JOSEPH CLAYTON'S FIRST MARRIAGE

LOUISA SHELCOFF is born in 1834: Lancashire On-Line Parish Project (see below for more information on this) gives the names of Louisa's parents as Simon and Maria.

Lancashire On-Line Parish Project at www.lan-

opc.uk/Liverpool/Aigburth/StMichael/marriages\_1855-60.html

On 10 April 1858 at St Michael in the Hamlet, Aigburth Lancs: marriage of Joseph Clayton to Louisa Shelcott. Source: LDS film 2147881.

JOSEPH CLAYTON'S SECOND MARRIAGE

I have to say that it's very perverse that Joseph Clayton should marry two successive women with rare surnames, and that I shouldn't be able to find anything much out about either of them!

FANNY'S MOTHER, THE MYSTERIOUS JANE ARKELL OR POSS ROBERTS.

Arkell is a very unusual surname: only about 15 people in England had it in the mid-19th century. And I still cldn't find her. I've search everywhere for her.

She was fairly consistent about being born in Liverpool c 1840. Birth registrations for girls with surname Arkell: in the years 1839 to 1841 there's only 1 registration for a child called Jane: a Jane Elizabeth, registered Tynemouth. Jane Clayton never says she is Jane Elizabeth to any census official and her death registration is just Jane. There are no registrations at all for anyone called Arkell in Liverpool or West Derby (the main suburb of Liverpool). There are very few births at all with this is a rare surname, most of those that there are, are in the Cotswolds. A 1840 birth registration in Cirencester for an unnamed female could be her I suppose.

Birth registrations as Jane Roberts c 1840: there are some in Liverpool and/or West Derby in the period 1839-41. Most such are registered in Wales, with some in London. There was one in Bradford quarter Jan-Mar 1840 but Jane Clayton is only described as being born in Bradford once, and I think that was just a muddle on the census official's part..

There are too many women called Jane Roberts to find her easily but no one called Jane Roberts married anyone called Arkell in the period 1857-1860; if Jane was born c 1840 they can't have married much earlier.

1841 census re Jane Arkell: there are nine infant girls with that name in the UK, all in England. None is said to have been born in Liverpool. The only one born c 1840 was born in Oxfordshire where there is at least one family with that surname. Ditto 1851, still couldn't see anyone called Arkell answering the description Jane Clayton gave on later censuses.

AND ABOUT JANE ARKELL'S DAUGHTER ELLEN FROM A PREVIOUS RELATIONSHIP: information about Ellen on the censuses was consistent about her having the surname Roberts, and being born in Liverpool in 1860. There is this registration: Ellen Roberts Liverpool quarter Jan-Mar 1860. I couldn't find this child, or a mother Jane Roberts or Jane Arkell on the 1861 census. There's a birth registration for an Ellen Arkell, Pancras quarter July-Sep 1860, but perverse though it seems, I don't think this is her. I've found a marriage registration which is probably her, as Ellen Roberts. Cautious conclusion: Ellen Roberts was the illegitimate daughter of a young woman called Jane Arkell; and was given her father's surname.

FANNY ISABEL and ELIZA AS TEACHERS - SOME GENERAL INFORMATION ON ## WOMEN TEACHERS AND WHAT THEY TAUGHT DURING FANNY AND ELIZA'S LIVES

Using findmypast, I searched the records of the Teachers' Registration Council, set up as part of the Education Act of 1899 but was abandoned as teachers refused to cooperate with it. A second attempt to get a TRC going began in 1912 with registration from 1914. This effort got more cooperation, but as an historical resource it's still pretty poor: firstly, registration was voluntary; secondly neither the Board of Education nor any local authorities referred to the registration list when deciding who to promote. Inevitably, registration was patchy. No one called Fanny Isabel Clayton or Eliza Craven registered with the TRC between 1902 and 1948.

London's Women Teachers: Gender, Class and Feminism 1870-1930 by Dina M Copelman. London and New York: Routledge 1996. Of course, not all of this will have applied in Bradford.

On what the typical woman teacher would be teaching, and what the elementary school girl pupils would be learning: History of Education volume 17 no 1: a special issue on Women and Schooling, published March 1988. London, New York, Philadelphia: Taylor and Francis. Edited by Roy Lowe. Pp71-82 The Education and Employment of Working-Class Girls 1870-1914, by Pamela Horn.

FANNY AND JOSEPH IN THE THEOSOPHICAL SOCIETY

Membership details from the Theosophical Society Membership Registers which are housed at the TS headquarters in England, Gloucester Place London W1.

For an account of the involvement of Fanny Isabel, Robert and Ada in the Bradford TS Lodge after 1902, see the website in the Bradford Sources above.

JOSEPH CLAYTON IN THE VAHAN which was the magazine for members of the TS European section.

The Vahan volume II no 8 issued 1 March 1893 p1 has Joseph Clayton's letter to the editor; and a note from the editor acknowledging the point Joseph had made.

The Vahan volume II no 9 issued 1 April 1893 pp1-2 had the replies I've referred to above. Unlike Joseph Clayton who gave his full name, the people who wrote in criticising him only gave their initials: JC and JWBI.

The Vahan volume II no 10 issued 1 May 1893 p1 has Joseph Clayton reply, focusing particularly on the comments made by JWBI.

There was no more follow up in any future issue of The Vahan.

28 December 2012

AMandragora@attglobal.net

Thomas Walker Coffin was initiated into the Golden Dawn very early on, in June 1888, taking as his motto the Latin phrase 'Per angusta ad augusta'. At the time of his initiation he was living at 22 Upper Park Road in the Haverstock Hill part of Hampstead, north London. By the end of the following year he had tendered his resignation.

Thomas Walker Coffin was born in 1840 in the Devonport district of Plymouth in Devon. My knowledge of his early life is a bit sketchy. It's particularly annoying that I couldn't find him living at home with his parents on any census, but other evidence I've found has made me confident that he was the son of another Thomas W Coffin and his wife Elizabeth. The elder Thomas Coffin worked for the Post Office, possibly spending time as the postmaster in Stoke Damerel, on the outskirts of Plymouth; but definitely also doing at least two tours of duty as the postmaster of Malta. I can't find the family on the census in 1841 so I guess they were in Malta at that time and the younger Thomas Walker spent some of his childhood abroad. However, he was sent home to go to school - on the 1851 census, now aged 10, the GD's he was a boarder at a small school in Tiverton.

The younger Thomas Walker Coffin (the future GD member) will have left school in his mid-teens. In 1862 he was working for the navy as a civilian clerk, based at the dockyards at Devonport; in 1864 he was listed as working there again, in its Victualling and Transport department. He doesn't appear on the 1861 census and I've found some evidence that makes me wonder if he was already working for the navy and had been sent to do a tour of foreign duty, either in Hong Kong or in China. In 1864 he gave a talk called 'The Chinese: Sketches of their History and Customs'; the imperial British were very arrogant about their understanding of the rest of the world, but I can't believe Thomas Coffin would have attempted that talk without actually having observed, or even met, some Chinese people in their home environment. However, I haven't found any direct evidence that he spent time in the Far East.

Thomas Walker Coffin senior was a devoutly religious man, a stalwart of the British and Foreign Bible Society for thirty years. When living in Plymouth during the 1850s and 1860s he was secretary of the Society's Devonport and Stonehouse branch; back on Malta in the 1870s and 1880s, he collected donations to the Society from wealthy English residents. The young Thomas Coffin inherited this serious Christianity, becoming a member of the Royal Naval Scripture Readers' Society which held its meetings in the Temperance Hall in Devonport. However, he had other interests - he learned photography; he made scientific studies of the weather; he went to meetings of the Plymouth Institution (that's where he gave the talk on the Chinese); he became a freemason (more of that later); and he served in the 12th Devonshire Artillery, a local volunteer militia, reaching the level of captain in 1869 but rising no further before his resignation in 1879.

Early in 1868 Thomas Walker Coffin married Mary Augusta Tause, in Plymouth. On the day of the 1871 census, he and his wife (who is always called Maria on the census, not Mary) and their two eldest children Ernest and Ethel, were living in Stoke Damerel. Maria's brother Hector was boarding with them and two servants were employed, a cook and a housemaid. So far, then, Thomas Walker Coffin's life had followed a rather conservative pattern, and there didn't seem to be any particular reason why it should not continue on the course already laid down until he retired or died. But in the early 1870s he departed from it radically, to qualify as a surgeon. Perhaps he was inspired by the work of his brother Richard James Coffin, who - though younger than Thomas - qualified as a doctor earlier than he. I cannot find out where Thomas Coffin studied; I've been hampered in my web-based searches by Lucretia Mott's family (she was the daughter of a Thomas Coffin) many of whom were doctors. I couldn't spot the Devon-based Thomas Walker Coffin amongst them. By the mid-1860s some universities, but not all, were publishing the results of their students' medical exams; Thomas Walker Coffin's name didn't come up on any of these bulletins via the web. So I am rather at a loss to explain how and where he qualified; perhaps he did so in the manner that was already rather old-fashioned, by working an apprenticeship with a practitioner. Nor do I know how the family managed for money during this time; surely Thomas couldn't have continued to work as a clerk while he studied medicine.

In another departure from what might have been expected, the family moved to London, perhaps so that he could study and do the necessary work in a hospital. They did not return once he had become eligible to practice. The move was made around 1874, between the birth of Hugh (who died in 1873 aged only a few months) and of Thomas and Maria's last children, the twins Algernon and Claud (born in 1875 in Fulham).

Thomas Walker Coffin had qualified as a surgeon by August 1877 and been received as a member of the Royal College of Surgeons by 1879. From 1879 to 1903 he was listed on the General Medical Council's register of doctors and surgeons in practice. He seems to have been based in the new suburb of Clapton, just north of Hackney, around the time he qualified, in 1877; and then moved to Marylebone. For a while he was in a business partnership with John May Andrew, as surgeons, apothecaries, accoucheurs (doctors who advised on childbirth) and general practitioners. The practice was based at two addresses, 140 Haverstock Hill; and 81 Queen's Crescent Marylebone, Thomas Coffin's home address on the day of the 1881 census. However, the partnership only lasted until October 1884 and after it was officially ended, Thomas Coffin worked alone. Why did the partnership with Dr Andrew last such a short time? Perhaps Dr Coffin wanted to concentrate on general practice and surgery. That's how he's described in later censuses; no mention is made in them of the midwife or pharmacy work although that may just be an over-simplification by the census officials. But perhaps Dr Coffin was not good at money, to his partner's annoyance. Perhaps he could not find enough patients, in a very competitive profession. Or maybe he just over-reached himself, trying to impress future patients by employing too many servants, for example: in 1881 a cook, housemaid and a nurse; in 1891 a cook-cum-housekeeper, a parlourmaid and a housemaid. Somehow or other, Thomas Walker Coffin lost control of his budget and was declared personally bankrupt in 1895. The official notice of the bankruptcy appeared in the Edinburgh Gazette, but not the London one where it might have been more useful to those he owed money, but would also have been more embarrassing. Perhaps because his patients and would-be patients didn't know about it, he was able to continue in medical practice after this financial disaster, but seems to have retired in or shortly after 1903, when all his children were off his hands; in that year, he and Maria, and Thomas' mother, moved to 31 Maldon Crescent Haverstock Hill. Though by as late as 1906 he was still active as a volunteer fireman in London.

In London, Thomas Walker Coffin's leisure activities reflected his new career. He joined the Obstetrical Society in 1879 and the Linnean Society in 1883, focusing on the zoological side of its interest in species classification. It's likely that, in due course, he became acquainted with Sydney Turner Klein who was elected to the Linnean Society in 1887. Klein was initiated into the GD, but long after Coffin had come and gone. Thomas Coffin had much closer links with the Golden Dawn through north London medicine and freemasonry, both of which would have brought him into contact with William Woodman and William Wynn Westcott.

Thomas Walker Coffin had accepted an invitation to become a freemason during the first phase of his life, being initiated into the Plymouth's Lodge of Sincerity, number 189, where the most senior figure was the important local landowner the 4th Earl of Edgcombe. By 1870 Thomas Coffin was climbing the ladder towards doing a year as the lodge's master, though I haven't found out whether he actually served his year before he moved away. When he moved to London, he would have been able to use his status as a freemason as an introduction to freemasonry circles in the city. He could also have met William Westcott in medical circles as early as 1881, when Coffin was living in Marylebone and Westcott was working as deputy coroner for that part of north London. Woodman and Westcott were both active freemasons, and Woodman was another man with family in Devon; so I think they were THE PEOPLE COFFIN KNEW IN THE GOLDEN DAWN because - by the late 1880s - Thomas Walker Coffin had become a member of Societas Rosicruciana in Anglia (SRIA). As its name suggests, SRIA was a group of freemasons who were particularly interested in the legend and rituals of Christian Rosenkreuz. In the 1880s William Woodman was SRIA's Supreme Magus and Westcott its secretary; Samuel Mathers also attended its meetings from time to time, though he was never a member. Westcott and Mathers invited several members of SRIA to join the Golden Dawn in its first few months; the early date of his initiation makes me think that Thomas Walker Coffin was one of them. At that time Thomas Coffin was working his way up the ranks in the SRIA's London group, known as its Metropolitan College. He reached the top and served as its Celebrant (the most senior official) in the year from April 1892 to April 1893; though he seems to have let his membership lapse by 1898, probably because - with his financial troubles - he couldn't afford to pay his yearly subscription.

On the day of the 1881 census the Coffin household included a young assistant surgeon who was presumably employed by the Andrew-Coffin partnership. I should imagine Thomas Walker Coffin hoped that, eventually, one of his sons would join him in the business and in 1891 that seemed destined to be Ernest Coffin, who was doing his medical training. However, the best-laid plans went quite arigh, and Ernest doesn't seem ever to have practised medicine and may never even have qualified. Instead he became an artist; there are a few examples of his work on the web, particularly a pencil drawing of the interior of St Bartholomew's church. He married a woman called Almeida Roberts who may have been an actress. Neither Algernon nor Claud practised medicine. I can't find Claud on any census after 1891 so I don't know what he did for a living. Algernon continued the family commitment to active Christianity by becoming a baptist minister. And Ethel married Hubert Royse (later Russell-Royse) who worked in a bank.

Thomas Walker Coffin's mother Elizabeth lived with him and Maria after he retired. It might have been a coming-home for her, moving to London in her widowhood - she had been born in Southwark. She died in 1908 aged 90. Thomas only lived 18 months longer, dying in 1910.

BASIC SOURCES I USED for all Golden Dawn members.

Membership of the Golden Dawn: The Golden Dawn Companion by R A Gilbert. Northampton: The Aquarian Press 1986. Between pages 125 and 175, Gilbert lists the names, initiation dates and addresses of all those people who became members of the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn or its many daughter Orders between 1888 and 1914. The list is based on the Golden Dawn's administrative records and its Members' Roll - the large piece of parchment on which all new members signed their name at their initiation. All this information had been inherited by Gilbert but it's now in the Freemasons' Library at the United Grand Lodge of England building on Great Queen Street Covent Garden.

Family history: freebmd; ancestry.co.uk (census, probate and GMC records); findmypast.co.uk; familysearch; Burke's Peerage and Baronetage; Burke's Landed Gentry; Armorial Families; thepeerage.com; and a wide variety of family trees on the web. There was also an entry for Thomas Walker Coffin and his children at genforum.genealogy.com/coffin/messages/2686/html; and more or less the same information on familysearch.org.

Famous-people sources: mostly about men, of course, but very useful even for the female members of GD. Oxford Dictionary of National Biography. Who Was Who. Times Digital Archive.

Catalogues: British Library; Freemasons' Library.

Wikipedia; Google; Google Books - my three best resources. I also used other web pages, but with some caution, as - from the historian's point of view - they vary in quality a great deal.

SOURCES FOR THOMAS WALKER COFFIN:

Thomas Walker Coffin senior:

British and Foreign Bible Society annual reports from the period 1850 to 1880.

Dietrichson and Hannay's Royal Almanack 1868 p91 in the section on The British Colonies: T W Coffin as postmaster in Malta.

The Royal Kalendar...for England, Scotland, Ireland and the Colonies 1879 p498 lists T W Coffin as postmaster in Malta.

Thomas Walker Coffin junior, the GD member:

As a naval clerk:

Navy List 1862, Googlebooks' snippet didn't show the page number. A list of clerks working at HM Dockyards all over the world included T W Coffin, currently based at Devonport.

Navy List 1864 p247 list of clerks working at the Victualling and Transport departments included T W Coffin currently based at Devonport. NB that as at 24 May 2012 these 2 navy lists were the only ones on Googlebooks that had his name in; I think putting the navy lists onto google is an ongoing project.

His leisure time:

Photographic News for Amateur Photographers volume 3 1860 p12 issue of 9 September 1860 has a list of current members of the Stereoscopic Exchange Club; it includes T W Coffin jnr with address c/o the Post Office Devonport. The editor of Photographic News... at that time was the chemist William Crookes who was a member of the Golden Dawn though not at the same time as T W Coffin was.

The British Flag issue of 1 September 1862 p71 had a report on the meeting of the Royal Naval Scripture Readers' Society held on 17 January at the Temperance Hall, Devonport. T

W Coffin made a short speech in front of several senior naval officers and Sir Thomas S Pasley, baronet, who was chairing the meeting. Rather brave of him, I think.

Annual Report and Transactions of the Plymouth Institution volume 1 1864 p8 in a list of recent events: T W Coffin jnr had given a talk on 19 January entitled The Chinese: Sketches of their History and Customs.

Journal of the Royal Institution of Cornwall issue 14 part 2 1873 p177 mentions a report in the Western Morning News (published in Plymouth) of a lecture by T W Coffin at the Plymouth Institution on 1 March: British Storms.

Freemasons' Magazine and Masonic Mirror issue of 30 July 1870 p93 covered the dedication ceremony of Tiverton's new masonic hall, held on Monday 21 July; T W Coffin was there as junior warden of lodge 189.

In medicine:

For a general summing-up of the rise of the medical profession during the 19th-century, see chapter 1 of Shattered Nerves: Doctors, Patients, and Depression in Victorian England by Janet Oppenheim. New York and Oxford: Oxford University Press 1991.

GMC records (see Ancestry) and Calendar of the Royal College of Surgeons 1875.

London Gazette 24 Oct 1884 p4606 notices dissolving business partnerships included one of the dissolving by mutual consent of the partnership John May Andrew and Thomas Walker Coffin. Partnership dissolved as of 29 September 1884; document signed by both partners, and witnessed on 21 October 1884.

Edinburgh Gazette of 17 July 1896 p6996 list of people recently declared bankrupt included Thomas Walker Coffin on 22 Upper Park Road Haverstock Hill "surgeon".

The Linnean Society:

Zoological Journal of the Linnean Society volume 17 1884 p7 Thomas Walker Coffin is in a list of people who'd been elected as members at the Society's latest mtg.

Linnean Society's database of members held at their offices in Burlington House Piccadilly: Thomas Walker Coffin was elected a Fellow of the LS on 19 April 1883; he'd been nominated by R Bentley, T S Cobbold and H C Rose and declared his main interest to be zoology. Other memberships held by him: FRCS.

Proceedings of the Linnean Society 123rd session November 1910-June 1911 p12 death of T W Coffin is in a list of fellows who'd died since the last anniversary of the Society; the list was announced at the LS meeting of 24 May 1911. There was no obituary of Coffin in the volume.

Obstetrical Society: Transactions of the Obstetrical Society 1879.

SRIA: Transactions of Societas Rosicruciana Metropolitan College, particularly volume for 1892-93 p1 which shows that, having worked his way up SRIA's metropolitan college's official hierarchy, at its obligatory meeting of 21 April 1892 Coffin became the Celebrant for 1892-93. However, the Transactions of 1898-99 p3 minutes of the meeting of 14 July 1898 show that the membership of someone called Coffin - I presume that it's Thomas Walker - was declared lapsed after he had failed to pay his annual subscription or go to any meetings for three years on the trot.

As a volunteer fireman: Insurance Year Book: Fire and Marine volume 34 1906 p B-6 a list of items in a particular fire depot ends by naming Thomas Walker Coffin as the chief volunteer fireman; I couldn't see where this depot was on Googlebooks' snippet.

24 May 2012

AMandragora@attglobal.net

Edith Grace Collett was initiated into the Golden Dawn at its Amen-Ra temple in Edinburgh on 8 June 1896, taking the Latin motto 'Caritas nunquam excidit'. She did not give the GD any address at which they could contact her; and when she moved to England she did not continue her membership of the GD at its Isis-Urania temple in London.

She had more important demands on her time and effort: when she was invited to join the GD she was in the process of qualifying as a doctor. In terms of the women who were in the GD, she was a rare bird indeed.

May 2014: I've been able to update this biography with more details of the sanatorium where Edith Grace was working between 1901 and 1903. I was emailed by a researcher saying: did I know that Emily Carr had been a patient at East Anglia Sanatorium? I had never heard of Emily Carr, who turned out to be an artist renowned in her native Canada but virtually unknown here - hopefully that will change following the exhibition of her work due this autumn at Dulwich Art Gallery. It turned out that Emily Carr was never Edith Grace's patient, but despite that disappointment I've been able to add a lot more detail about Edith Grace's working life in what was probably her first important post. Many many thanks to the researcher, who prefers to remain anonymous.

Edith Grace's family

The family history website www.collettfamilyhistory.net is a collaboration between many people with the surname Collett (originally Colet). They trace their ancestry back to 1360 in Suffolk, branching out into Buckinghamshire; and to 1485 in Gloucestershire. According to this exhaustive website, Edith Grace was a descendent of the Suffolk Colletts. Her grandparents on the Collett side were Cornelius Collett and his wife Amelia. Cornelius Collett was probably dead by the day of the 1841 census, because Amelia Collett was head of the household, living in North Lane, Beverley, Yorkshire with three of her four sons: Charles and Samuel described incorrectly as both aged 15; and Daniel aged 12. The youngest, Trusson, was not at home. He was probably at school but I couldn't find him, probably because of his odd forename, mis-spelled several times in subsequent censuses.

None of the Collett boys went to university, there was probably not money in the family for that expense. Samuel doesn't seem to have worked at anything; Daniel became an engineer; and Trusson worked in the offices of a London wine merchant. Charles joined the Madras Civil Service, arriving in India in April 1845 and spent about ten years working as a tax collector with the Madras magistrates' service, being posted to Malabar and Calicut (now Kozhikode). In the 1850s he began to study law, intending to qualify as a barrister. He took two periods of leave in England, in 1856 and 1859, to do the bar exams and the social side of qualification, and was called to the bar of Lincoln's Inn during his second period of leave, in January 1861. He had already spent periods standing in as a judge for people on leave, and in March 1866 he was promoted to the Madras high court as one of four judges serving under one senior judge.

In 1869 Charles Collett was living at 2 Harrington's Road, in the Chetput district of Madras (largely occupied by European residents and businesses) and was earning 3750 rupees per year. This is important information because it was in 1869 that his daughter Edith Grace was born, on 18 July. Her baptism record survives, though without the details of which church the service took place in (probably the Cathedral); it gives her parents as Charles Collett and his wife Dahliah, née Phillips.

The baptism record has been put online at familysearch. I have hunted high and low, in Indian records and UK ones, for the record of Charles Collett's marriage to Dahliah Phillips and not been able to find it. The best I can do is suppose that he married the daughter of another English resident of Madras, and look for people called Phillips. The highest-ranking and longest-serving candidate is Henry Dominic Phillips, who went to India in 1829 and who by the 1860s was the most senior paid official in the whole of the Madras civil service. There are two other possible candidates, another judge and an army officer, but they had both spent less time in that part of India and may not have been old enough to have daughters of marriage-able age.

Nor can I find any record of the death of Edith Grace's mother. She must have died, probably in India, between Edith Grace's baptism and 1871, because by the day of the 1871 census Charles Collett was in England, staying at a lodging house on Piccadilly, and describing himself as not married. He had retired from the Madras Civil Service and was back in England for good. Charles' mother Amelia Collett and his brother Samuel had moved south and were living at Clare Lodge, Spring Grove Isleworth by 1871, according to the Collett family history website. I'm suggesting that Charles Collett came back to England partly to leave Edith Grace with her grandmother, at least as a temporary measure.

In 1872 Charles Collett married Lucy Ellen Daniels. They had five children, half-siblings for Edith Grace: Phyllis, Margaret and Charles, all born in London; and Laura and Arthur, born after the family moved to Torquay. I say 'the family' but I do wonder whether Edith Grace ever lived with them: all those involved with the situation may have thought it preferable for her to stay with her grandmother. She was not living with her father, on the census day of 1881. She was at school; one of the few GD members whose schooling I have any direct evidence of. Edith Grace was one of four boarders at the school on that day; perhaps most of the pupils were day-girls; or had gone home for the holidays (the habit of holding the census during the Easter vacation has been a real curse on my research work - everybody goes away!) The school was a small one, contained in one house in the St Andrew's district of Bristol and was run by Mary Robe, a local woman, and Elizabeth Crampton, who'd been born in Ireland. They both described themselves as school-mistresses so I guess they took most of the lessons between them; but they employed Phébé Trouzel (or possibly Touzel), a Frenchwoman, to teach French.

I've tried to discover a bit more about Miss Robe and Miss Crampton's school - especially what was taught there - but I haven't had any luck except to find that it was still going in 1901, having moved to Frenchay on the outskirts of Bristol. This argues that generations of parents were satisfied with what it taught; but when it came to what girls were taught, 19th century parents tended to be satisfied with very little. And of course I don't know how long Edith Grace stayed at Miss Robe's school; or whether she went on to another school elsewhere; or whether she studied on her own or was lucky enough to find a man willing to teach her (it would have had to be a man, I think). I would really like to know, because by the late 1880s, Edith Grace had persuaded Glasgow and Edinburgh universities to take her on to study medicine. Where did she learn enough science to do it? She would have had to persuade her father to allow it, as well, particularly as she was very young to be taking such a big step, a step that most parents would have viewed as lowering the chances that she would marry. She was only 20 when she began her studies.

Edith Grace passed her final medical exams in 1892, one of five women out of 106 students in total who took the exams that year and 56 who passed them. By passing these exams the five were automatically licensed by the Royal College of Surgeons, Edinburgh and the Royal College of Physicians, Edinburgh; and could practice medicine. On 27 October 1892, Edith Grace went through the final hoop in the process of preparing to start work, by registering with the General Medical Council (GMC). She was now ready for a job. IF she could get one. If you were a woman doctor, qualifying was often just the start of your problems. (Perhaps I should say here that registration with the GMC is permission to work; it's not an indication that you are working.)

Charles Collett had died while Edith Grace was an undergraduate, on 28 January 1891, at his home at Highclere, Warberry Hill, Torquay. Lucy Ellen was his sole executor. He left a tidy sum, eventually assessed as £25036. I haven't seen the Will (copies are quite expensive) but I'm rather supposing that Edith Grace did inherit some kind of income from her father; otherwise she might not have been able to finish her studies. Money was not the issue, I think, in her decision to become a doctor.

When Edith Grace registered with the GMC in 1892 she was living at 27 Comiston Road in the Morningside district of Edinburgh. She was still living in Edinburgh in 1896 when she joined the GD there. Once more, I have to guess what she was doing in these years, but it's a good bet, I think, that she was gaining practical experience; probably unpaid but valuable just the same. Perhaps she even got as far as setting herself up as a general practitioner; but I have to say that I haven't found any evidence of it. Five or six members of the GD in Edinburgh were medical practitioners, and it's very likely that Edith Grace was acquainted with some, if not all, of them. However, when she joined the Theosophical Society in August 1894 her application was sponsored by Dr Robert Felkin and his wife Mary, so it was mostly likely to be the Felkins who recommended her for GD membership. Edith Grace may have been one of Robert Felkin's students: from 1886 to 1896 he taught tropical medicine at the University of Edinburgh medical school.

I daresay Edith Grace realised quite soon after her GD initiation that to follow up her initiation properly she would have to dedicate more time to it than she was willing to. She opted to stick with the TS, continuing to pay her yearly subscriptions, at least, until 1899 when the TS in Scotland lost contact with her. She had moved to England, because she had got a job.

The job had come through Jane Harriett Walker. She and Edith Grace had either been fellow students at Edinburgh for one year, or just missed each other, because in 1890 Jane Walker gone to Brussels to qualify rather than stay and get her qualifications in Scotland. After a visit to the Nordrach Sanatorium in the Black Forest in 1892, where the new 'fresh-air' treatment for tuberculosis was being pioneered, Dr Walker had returned to England determined to set up the first such sanatorium to operate in the UK. She had started small, in a building converted for the purpose, in Downham Market, in 1896, and spent the next three years raising money and searching for a suitable site on which to build. The East Anglia Sanatorium Company was founded in 1899 to run the new hospital, which opened in January 1901 on a site in the village of Nayland-with-Wissington, in Suffolk. Dr Walker was its medical superintendent, but spent most of her time working in London. She was already known for an active policy of employing women - in 1903 the driver of the sanatorium's horse and cart was the only man on the staff - and I think this where Edith Grace Collett came in, either as someone Walker knew personally, or as someone with family in the district, who recommended her; or both.

On the day of the 1901 census, two months after it had opened, the East Anglian sanatorium already had 15 patients and a large staff: a matron, a gardener, three nurses, a cook, and seven domestic servants. Described by the census official as the head of this household was Edith G Collett, house surgeon.

From 24 June to 10 August 1901 Edith Grace would have found herself treating the writer George Gissing, who had been recommended to go to Dr Walker by a mutual friend, after not recovering well from a severe cold he'd had in the spring. Dr Walker had diagnosed emphysema, rather than TB, but she had sent him to the sanatorium anyway. Something very similar happened to the Canadian artist Emily Carr early in 1903: although there was no question of her having TB - she knew herself that all she needed was a period of rest - Dr Walker sent her to the sanatorium anyway and Carr remained there for over a year. The notes and sketches she made at the time were published after her death, giving an account of what life was like in the sanatorium just after Edith Grace had left it. Carr's biographical writings are not always an accurate representation of what actually happened, apparently, but her descriptions of the treatment regime followed by the sanatorium's TB patients are confirmed by other evidence I've read.

It's clear from Carr's book that the sanatorium stuck closely to the Nordrach system of fresh air and lots of food. The Nordrach treatment focused on fresh air day and night whatever the weather; eating well in order to regain weight lost because of the illness; and exercise for those judged fit enough. Carr arrived in January 1903, but all doors and windows in the sanatorium were still open, blowing snow into her room. Treatment was based on a weekly schedule, agreed for the next seven days during a Saturday morning round of the wards, led by Dr Walker with the resident doctor and the senior nurse in tow. All the patients were weighed and the TB sufferers were expected to weigh more than they had the previous Saturday. After the ward round, all the TB patients who were able to get about went in turn to the consulting room for further assessment. The TB patients were fed enormous meals. Carr describes watching at mealtimes as the resident doctor and senior nurse stood over patients who hadn't gained weight, making sure they cleared their plates. As regards exercise, the Nordrach system divided patients into three groups which Carr calls 'down' - she was 'down' in her first three months of bed-rest; 'semi', those who were allowed to get up and sit outdoors and do some gentle exercise; and 'up', those who were getting well, and who were expected to do a lot of walking and were the only patients allowed to go to the local village.

It was not Edith Grace's job to assess prospective patients. Although she had probably never intended to live at the sanatorium, Dr Walker still undertook all first examinations of prospective patients, and these took place at her rooms in Harley Street. Dr Walker was also the only person allowed to decide when a patient could leave. However, Dr Walker worked in London all the week, going down to the sanatorium on Friday evening and returning to London late on Sunday. To assist her she had a matron who took charge of the domestic arrangements, one trained nurse and a number of untrained nurses, most of whom were ex-patients. An extra trained nurse was hired when Dr Walker felt one was necessary to care for a patient in their last few weeks of life. Edith Grace carried considerable responsibility, therefore, overseeing treatment of the patients from Sunday evening to Friday afternoon with a limited number of experienced helpers.

Edith Grace was not expected to play an active part in the management of the limited company which owned the sanatorium. This was done by a board of directors with Dr Walker as managing director. She may have been glad not to have that responsibility in what was almost certainly her first job at such a senior level; but it did mean she did not have a great deal of say in decisions about the sanatorium's future. Emily Carr's descriptions of the doctor she calls "Dr Bottle" - that is, Dr Walker - are borne out by all the other evidence I've read: she was a strong and dominating personality, she had drive and confidence and energy; but she can't have been easy to work for. It's not clear, for example, how much say the resident doctor had in decisions on patients' treatment. Carr believes Edith Grace's successor in the job had very little say. As a patient, Carr could only observe the relationship between the doctors from the outside; but I have a feeling she was right and that might have been one reason why Edith Grace might choose to leave the sanatorium after gaining two years' experience; another might have been that Edith Grace had decided she didn't want to specialise in TB or in a sanatorium environment.

Edith Grace had left the East Anglian Sanatorium by the beginning of 1903, when she was listed in the GMC register as living at a house called Marcina, on Down View Road in Worthing. I haven't found any evidence of her working in another hospital so I suppose she was now in general practice. However if she was, she didn't do go about it in the way I would have expected, always staying in the same place once her practice had been established. Quite the contrary, she seems to have moved quite a few times and spent periods out of the UK altogether - for example, for a couple of years around 1911. I haven't been able to find out where she went. Was she working? Did she return to India? - she can hardly have remembered it, having left when she was two, but goodness knows there was need enough for doctors there. Or did she set up in practice in a town in Europe with a number of British residents?

By 1914 she was back in England, living in Sidmouth, in a house called San Michele on Salcombe Hill. From there she played her part in an exchange of opinions published in the British Medical Journal, showing herself to be keeping right up to date with new techniques in her profession. Sticking her neck right out on a subject which is still quite controversial, she said that she was in favour of the use of Freudian psychoanalysis. She did qualify this view by saying that they must be properly trained (her letter reads as though she was not trained in psychoanalysis herself) and that the technique should be used only when the experts deemed it appropriate. However (I think with some amusement) she noted that its more fervent supporters were actually putting doctors off its use: she said that they "appear to discern sex from A to Z in almost any given problem". One of Freud's acquaintances in England sent copies of the whole correspondence to Freud to read; so Freud did actually get to hear of Edith Grace Collett.

According to the GMC Registers Edith Grace was living in Sidmouth between 1914 and 1919. I can't quite square this with evidence I came across by accident in December 2015 indicates that she was working in the Midlands, probably from 1912 to 1916. A job for a resident medical officer at the Ransom Sanatorium near Mansfield had been advertised in January 1912 at £160 per year in salary, plus board and lodging and all washing. Applicants had to be female, so I take it that the successful applicant would be working on the women's wards. Edith Grace Collett resigned from such a post, at that sanatorium, at the end of 1916; so I assume she was the successful applicant.

The Ransom Sanatorium had been founded in 1902 by the Nottingham and Nottinghamshire Association for the Prevention of Consumption. It was taken over by Nottinghamshire County Council in 1910 and the post advertised in January 1912 was probably part of this process. There were other changes too: after taking only private patients in its early years, the sanatorium started to take patients paid for by the new National Insurance scheme as well (or possibly instead). And the name of the sanatorium was changed, to honour William Bramwell Ransom (1861-1909), physician at the Nottingham General Hospital and a pioneer of the Koch treatment for TB.

Her work at the Ransom Sanatorium might have given a Edith Grace a second chance to have come across someone who was very famous later; though he was never a patient, only a visitor at the most (if visitors were even allowed), and at the time he was only a teacher called 'Bert' with literary aspirations. In 1911 (though I don't know about later) a young woman called Hilda Shaw was a patient at the Ransom Sanatorium, a friend of Louie Burrows and Louie's then-fiancé D H Lawrence.

Edith Grace resigned from her job at the Ransom Sanatorium at the end of 1916. This was a very serious time to be doing such a thing - the end of the year of the Somme - and I don't suppose she made the decision lightly. Why she left, where she went, and what she did afterwards I don't know, but she was no longer giving Sidmouth as her address by 1923 - the GMC listings have only a 'care of' address, that of her bank. She had gone abroad again and this time she didn't come back. She died on 23 September 1927, in Susa, a town in northern Italy.

BASIC SOURCES I USED for all Golden Dawn members.

Membership of the Golden Dawn: The Golden Dawn Companion by R A Gilbert. Northampton: The Aquarian Press 1986. Between pages 125 and 175, Gilbert lists the names, initiation dates and addresses of all those people who became members of the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn or its many daughter Orders between 1888 and 1914. The list is based on the Golden Dawn's administrative records and its Members' Roll - the large piece of parchment on which all new members signed their name at their initiation. All this information had been inherited by Gilbert but it's now in the Freemasons' Library at the United Grand Lodge of England building on Great Queen Street Covent Garden.

Family history: freebmd; ancestry.co.uk (census and probate); findmypast.co.uk; familysearch; Burke's Peerage and Baronetage; Burke's Landed Gentry; Armorial Families; thepeerage.com; and a wide variety of family trees on the web.

Famous-people sources: mostly about men, of course, but very useful even for the female members of GD. Oxford Dictionary of National Biography. Who Was Who. Times Digital Archive.

Catalogues: British Library; Freemasons' Library.

Wikipedia; Google; Google Books - my three best resources. I also used other web pages, but with some caution, as - from the historian's point of view - they vary in quality a great deal.

SOURCES FOR EDITH GRACE COLLETT:

THE COLLETT FAMILY

The Collett family website at www.collettfamilyhistory.net is thorough but isn't aware of a first marriage for Edith Grace's father Charles. Its coverage of his second marriage, and the children of that second marriage, peters out a bit after about 1890.

Edith Grace's father CHARLES COLLETT

India Office and Burma Office List 1845 p10 Madras Civil Service. Madras Almanac and Compendium of Intelligence 1846 p134.

Madras Almanac... 1847 p132 Madras Civil Service list.

Madras Almanac... 1851 p132 Madras Civil Service list.

All the Madras Almanac... published in the 1850s have lists of European births, marriages and deaths but I couldn't find a marriage of either Charles Collett or a D Phillips. With its issue for 1862 the Madras Almanac... became the Asylum Press Almanac and gave up publishing birth/marriage/death data alas! The section on the Madras Civil Service contains biographies of its senior personnel to date. Both the men called Phillips are still in the Madras Civil Service.

Asylum Press Almanac 1862 continuing the career details of Charles Collett, starting from the job at Malabar:

19 Feb 1855 acting sub-judge at Calicut

April 1855 sub collector and joint magistrate, Malabar

Aug 1856 acting deputy collector of sea customs Madras but he'd gone home for a period of leave in Europe, departing 29 July 1856.

Oct 1857 acting deputy collector of sea customs Madras

June 1858 additional sub-collector and joint magistrate Bellary

March 1859 another period of leave in Europe, from which he didn't return until

April 1861 collector of sea customs Madras. 1861 was on the organising committee based at Madras for the London Exhibition of 1862

Aug 1861 commissioner for assessment of income tax

Aug 1861 sub-judge at Calicut

Just noting that there are 5 men called Phillips in the list of European residents in the presidency. Indian Army and Civil Service List 1863 Madras Civil Service list p236.

London Gazette issued 6 March 1866 p1647.

Indian Army and Civil Service List July 1866 Madras Civil Service: p272, P280.

Asylum Press Almanac for Madras 1869 issue: P83, P87, P107-09.

Indian Army and Civil Service List July 1871 p253 which is the last time Charles Collett is listed in any Indian directory.

Thacker's Indian Directory 1885 p1075 just to confirm he wasn't there.

Charles Collett had several books published:

The Malayalam Reader: A Series of Original Papers, published by the Church Mission Press in 1856. As compiler.

Charles Collett's other publications are all his own work:

1869 A Treatise on the Law of Injunctions

1882 The Law of Specific Relief in India. In the book The Malavikagnimitra: A Sanskrit Play pubd 1891 p121 there is an advert for Collett's The Law of Specific Relief, confirming that he has retired.

1886 A Manual on the Law of Torts.

THE MARRIAGE OF EDITH GRACE'S PARENTS; AND HER BIRTH

Madras Marriages 1698-1948 at the British Library India Office Collection in which I couldn't find anything.

India List for 1869 there were 3 quite high-ranking men called Phillips in the Madras presidency including H D Phillips the highest-ranking civil servant in the presidency; a judge currently based at Chingleput; and a lieutenant-colonel in the Madras army.

Baptism record for Edith Grace, via familysearch: Edith Grace Collett was baptised in Madras on 19 September 1869; she'd been born 18 July 1869. Her parents were Charles Collett and Dahliah (sic) née Phillips.

A supplement to the website www.collettfamilyhistory.net dated Feb 2012 says that Samuel Collette, still unmarried was living with his mother Amelia at Clare Lodge, Spring Grove Isleworth by 1871. I searched diligently for them on the 1871 census in case Edith Grace was with them, but I don't think they were in the UK on that day.

List of Shareholders in the Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada, published October 1875 p33.

EDITH GRACE AS A DOCTOR

For a general summing-up of the rise of the medical profession during the 19th-century, see chapter 1 of Shattered Nerves: Doctors, Patients, and Depression in Victorian England by Janet Oppenheim. New York and Oxford: Oxford University Press 1991.

Glasgow Medical Journal volume 32 1889 p134.

British Medical Journal issue of 12 November 1892 p1088

General Medical Council Registers: Edith Collett was first registered with the GMC on 27 October 1892, giving 27 Comiston Road Morningside Edinburgh as her address: Licensed by the Royal College of Physicians at Edinburgh 1892; Licensed by the Royal College of Surgeons at Edinburgh 1892; Licensed by the Faculty of Physical Surgery Glasgow 1892.

Robert Felkin at Edinburgh University: his obituary in British Medical Journal issue of 12 February 1927 p309.

East Anglian Sanatorium

See www.pastscape.org.uk for some local detail. The sanatorium at Nayland-with-Wissington was opened in 1901. It was purpose built to an Arts and Crafts design by Smith and Brewer. It's now listed, but has been turned into eight houses.

Good information on it in www.nationalarchives.gov.uk hospital records database but beware it being known by a number of different names, which confused me when I was researching it.

Via Access2Archives further information on what exactly is held at the Record Office at Bury St Edmunds:

ID 507/1 is records of the limited company covering 1899-1904

ID 507/2 is committee records and minute books BUT ONLY from 1940s

ID 507/3 is staff records BUT ONLY nursing and administration, AND ONLY 1905-19. The web-page has a summary of the history of the sanatorium including the opening date, 22 January 1901.

The Contemporary Medical Archives Centre at the Wellcome Institute says that Walker's diaries from 1896-97 are amongst the archives at Suffolk Record Office.

On George Gissing at the East Anglia Sanatorium:

The Gissing Journal volume XXIX number 2 issued April 1993 and found July 2012 on the web, has an article pp1-10 by Martha S Vogeler in its series People Gissing Knew: Dr Jane Walker.

On Emily Carr at the East Anglia Sanatorium:

Emily Carr by Doris Shadbolt. Vancouver and Toronto: Douglas and McIntyre 1990: p21-23; pp28-30 and its Chronology pp219-222.

Emily's own take on her time at the East Anglia sanatorium:

Pause: A Sketch Book by Emily Carr. Toronto: Clarke Irwin and Co Ltd 1953 passim. This sketchbook only mentions two doctors, "Dr Bottle" - that is, Jane Walker - and the resident doctor, whom Carr calls "Dr McNair". From the details Carr gives of Dr McNair, she wasn't Edith Grace Collett.

From my anonymous researcher of Emily Carr's time at the East Anglia Sanatorium, some follow up if you're interested in finding out more about Carr's work:

A web copy of the manuscript sketchbook that was the basis for Carr's book Pause, containing more sketches than in the published version:

http://www.museevirtuel-virtualmuseum.ca/sgc-cms/expositions-exhibitions/emily\_carr/en/search/index.php

Try limiting the search by institutional collection and tick McMichael Canadian Collection.

Carr and others in Cornwall:

Women Artists in Cornwall exhibition catalogue by Catherine Wallace, 1996. Wallace is an expert on the art of the Newlyn School. Copies of this book are very hard to find so try the website cornishmuse.blogspot.co.uk.

Carr's later brush with theosophy:

Canadian painting in the 1930s exhibition catalogue by Charles C Hill. Ottawa: National Gallery of Canada 1975.

The Logic of Ecstasy: Canadian Mystical Painting 1920-1940 by Ann Davis. Toronto and London: University of Toronto Press c 1992.

Defiant Spirits: The Modernist Revolution of the Group of Seven by Ross King, a Canadian historian who lives in the UK; editor, David Staines. Kleinburg Ontario: McMichael Canadian Art Collection and Vancouver BC: Douglas and McIntyre 2011.

Edith Grace on Freud:

Www.bmj.com/cgi/reprint shows the content of British Medical Journal Volume 1 no 2771, issued 7 February 1914: p341.

At www.pep-weg.org, the Psychoanalytic Electronic Publishing site, there's the text of a letter from Ernest Jones to Sigmund Freud dated 6 February 1914 about the letter to the BMJ by Mercier that had started off the exchange; and enclosing copies of all the replies it had elicited, including Collett's. Jones tells Freud that Mercier has a French father, but still manages to be paranoid about "everything from the continent" and obsessed with "English clean-mindedness". Jones notes that all the replies which he encloses with his letter do favour the use of psychoanalysis in Britain.

THEOSOPHICAL SOCIETY MEMBERSHIP

Theosophical Society: Membership Register for June 1893-March 1895, held at the TS headquarters building on Gloucester Place in London.

Edith Grace's employer at the East Anglia Sanatorium, Dr Jane Harriett Walker:

The Hospital Gazette and Student's Journal 1885 list of doctors recently licensed to practice after qualifying in medicine at King and Queen's College of Physicians at Dublin. Walker was licensed to practice both medicine and midwifery.

Edinburgh Medical Journal volume 35 part 1 1890 which confirms that she and Edith Grace were both studying medicine at Edinburgh in the same academic year. Walker qualified as LRCS at Edinburgh.

General Medical Council Registers in which Walker never gave the East Anglia Sanatorium as her address.

The Gissing Journal vol XXIX no 2 April 1993 found on the web, has an article pp1-10 by Martha S Vogeler in its series People Gissing Knew: Dr Jane Walker.

Dr Jane Walker and Her Hospital by Anna and Michael Smith. Printed The Lavenham Press Suffolk. No printed publication date but in the copy at the British Library a pencil note “[1999]” is written on the title page. This booklet includes reproductions of some of Emily Carr’s sketches, with the people identified by their correct names. The resident doctor Carr calls “Dr McNair” is named as Eleanor Soltau, not Edith Grace Collett.

The Collected Letters of George Gissing: 1900-02 by Gissing, Paul F Mattheisen and Arthur C Young 1990. Fnp203

Tubercle: the Journal of the British TB Association volume 20 1938 p137, an obituary.

ELEANOR SOLTAU

I couldn’t find anything much about her, at least on the web, just hints at a fascinating and far-flung life as a medical missionary and daughter of missionaries. Some sources of what little information I did find:

History of the Korea Mission: Presbyterian Church USA 1884-1934 by Harry Andrew Rhodes and Arch Campbell. Chosen Mission Presbyterian Church USA 1934: p669.

Via archive.org to Through the Serbian Campaign: the Great Retreat of the Serbian Army by Gordon Gordon-Smith. London: Hutchinson and Co 1916: pp264-66.

At www.cmf.org.uk the web pages of the Christian Medical Fellowship: article in its series Looking Back - Working Visionaries. From 1997, the reminiscences of medical missionary Henry Backhouse originally published in the magazine Among All Nations number 3 spring 1998.

At www2.wheaton.edu/bgc/archives, Billy Graham Center. Introduction to the Center’s collection Papers of Roy W Gustafson.

Via web to graceandpeacepc.org the website of the Presbyterian Church in America: a review dated May 2013 of The Desert Rat, biography of Annette Adams by Aileen Coleman. And the book itself p32.

Via google to Christian Herald volume 104 1981 p7.

Eleanor Soltau is buried next to Jane Walker in the graveyard of the church at Wissington. Source for this: photo of the two graves, taken by the anonymous researcher.

RANSOM SANATORIUM

Burdett’s Hospitals and Charities issued 1918 p862.

At www.nottinghamhospitalhistory.co.uk re William Bramwell Ransom 1861-1909. He died of TB himself. The British Medical Journal has an obituary: issue of 18 December 1909 pp405-06.

Chemist and Druggist volume 76 1910 p871 for the Sanatorium’s change of name.

<http://www.28dayslater.co.uk>

The job advert that Collett probably answered: it’s in the British Medical Journal issue of 27 January 1912 pp109-110 and in The Lancet 1912 p206.

Local Government Board Annual Report volume 43 1915 issued by HMSO plxvi-lxvii: a brief history and some current statistics of the Sanatorium.

Via archive.org to a National Insurance Acts. Handbook for the Use of Approved Societies revised to August 1915 and issued HMSO 1915.

The Medical Officer volume XVI July-December 1916. Published by Macmillan Ltd; London; 36-38 Whitefriars St EC. P428 issue of 18 November 1916: announcement of Dr Collett's resignation. Her replacement, Dr Ethel Dukes, was going to earn a great deal more than she had.

The connection with D H Lawrence:

At mss-cat.nottingham.ac.uk, the catalogue of the university's D H Lawrence collection has two letters from a woman called Hilda, to Louie Burrows although its clear from the text that she knows DHL as well. Letters La B 195 and La B 196. Neither letter has a full date on it but the archive assigns them to 9-12 February 1911; and between 16 April and 18 May 1911. Of course, the letter writer signs herself only as 'Hilda'. That she is Hilda Shaw is also a deduction by the cataloguers and there's no indication in the letters as to how Hilda, Louie and DHL knew each other. I rather hoped I'd get some clue as to how, from this book:

Louie: Her Remarkable East Midlands Life by Jon Turner. Dave Dover Reprint of Loughborough 2010. Unfortunately, Hilda was never mentioned in it. However, see pp8-45: Louie and DHL met while training to be teachers at Ilkeston Pupil Teacher Centre in 1905. They got engaged in December 1910 but DHL broke it off on Louie's 24th birthday, in February 1912.

29 January 201

Find the web pages of Roger Wright and Sally Davis, including my list of people initiated into the Order of the Golden Dawn between 1888 and 1901, at:

<http://www.wrightanddavis.co.uk>

***

John COLLINSON was initiated into the Golden Dawn as one of its earliest members, in March 1888, taking the Latin motto 'Servabo fidem'. A note on his GD papers says "resigned" but doesn't give a date for his resignation.

At the time of his initiation John Collinson was living in the suburbs on the northern outskirts of London, at 5 Lightfoot Road Hornsey, but he was not a native Londoner. To several census officials down the years, he said he had been born in York. He gave an age to the officials that equates with his having been born in 1834 or 1835, making him one of the GD's oldest initiates.

I couldn't identify him for certain on the censuses of 1841 or 1851 so I don't know who his parents were.

I think John Collinson must have had an education that was rather better than the majority of his contemporaries because he was able to take advantage of a new career, only open to those who were literate; and to undertake in his spare time a study only possible if you had been taught, or had taught yourself, Latin. By 1861 he was working as a clerk for the Great Northern Railway. The Ancestry.co.uk website now (June 2012) has some records of employees of railway companies but unfortunately these don't include the Great Northern Railway so I haven't been able to get the full details of John Collinson's career. He stayed working for the company at least until 1891, probably until his retirement; and so he worked for the railways through the period of their most massive expansion and played his own small part in the huge changes they brought about in the British landscape and society. I am going to assume that he spent his whole working life in GNR's employment.

In this paragraph I condense Wikipedia's detailed article on the Great Northern Railway. GNR was created by an Act of Parliament in 1846 with an original brief to link London with York, with spurs to several other important towns near its main line. Construction began in 1846 with the London and the Yorkshire ends of the original line. As early as 1851 the GNR began to broaden its original remit, with a line to Manchester via Retford and from 1860 it was one of the partners in the East Coast Joint Stock Company which extended the main line from York to Edinburgh. The 1860s also saw the beginning of GNR's involvement in suburban railways around London, working out from Farringdon and eventually threading throughout the northern Home Counties; in 1870s the Company concentrated on branch lines connecting to its main line.

John Collinson probably got in on the ground floor of GNR's expansion (in both railway track and the need for office staff) and perhaps started in the company's offices at York railway station, but he later in the Company's relentless expansion he moved south. In July 1850 GNR opened a spur line from the main line to Nottingham and I think Collinson spent some years working in Nottingham, where - in 1856 - he married Julia Hall Reeve. Their eldest child, Nina, was born in Newark in 1856 (within six months of her parents' wedding) but by the time her brother Abraham was born, in 1860, the family had moved to London. On the day of the 1861 census they were living in Islington. The nearest Great Northern Railway station to Islington at that time was King's Cross, which had opened in 1852, and John Collinson was probably working there in 1861 although he might later have moved to Seven Sisters Road station, opened in 1861 and renamed Finsbury Park in 1868. If he was ambitious and wanted promotion, however, he would more likely have stayed at King's Cross.

In the next decade John and Julia had three more children: Leonard (born 1863); Grace (born 1867); and Rosalind (born 1870). By 1871 they had moved out to Hornsey where, in 1873, their last child, Ernest, was born. The Collinsons had moved to 5 Lightfoot Road Hornsey by 1881, and they were still at that address ten years later. By 1881 Abraham had left home and Leonard was working, in the same office as his father. Leonard was still living at home in 1881 (though he'd left by 1891), so that if family finances had been tight for the past few years they were easing a bit; though John and Julia never employed any servants who lived in. In due course, Ernest also the Great Northern Railway, and Grace and Rosalind left home.

Outwardly, then, John Collinson was living the typical life of a Victorian clerk and family man. However, his horizons were rather broader than that. He was a freemason and in his leisure time, pursued the more esoteric side of freemasonry. If he had been born later he might have gone to university and become an academic, but even in his own time he was known amongst his circle of acquaintances for his work on late-medieval hermetic books and manuscripts (written in often-obscure Latin), especially those of Cornelius Agrippa (Heinrich Cornelius Agrippa von Nettesheim, 1486-1535). These studies led to his being recruited into the Societas Rosicruciana in Anglia (SRIA)'s Metropolitan College (based in London) at some time during the 1880s. Even if they did not recruit him themselves, John Collinson would have met William Woodman and William Wynn Westcott at the first SRIA meeting he attended and they were WHO HE KNEW IN THE GOLDEN DAWN. Samuel Mathers also went to SRIA meetings regularly in the late 1880s although he was not a full member. SRIA colleges were organised like freemasons' lodges, with a hierarchy of offices in which you served for one year at a time until reaching the highest point and spent a final year leading the rituals and chairing the meetings. Once a member of SRIA, John Collinson climbed this hierarchy and would have been due to spend his year as its Magister Templi from April 1889 to April 1890. However, at the last minute he declined to serve, on the grounds that (according to that year's Transactions written up by Westcott as the Metropolitan College's secretary) "his energies were being devoted to another purpose". The Transactions never give any clue as to what this other purpose was. Perhaps John Collinson just found that attending SRIA meetings and outings just took too much time away from his occult readings. Unfortunately, the purpose was not to prepare any of his research for publication: I've searched the catalogues of the British Library and the Freemasons' Library but neither have any work by him - at least, not under his proper name. It does seem a shame that, if his work was good enough to be valued by his SRIA colleagues, none of it got into print.

It was almost certainly John Collinson's knowledge of late medieval/Renaissance occult works that led to his being invited to join the Golden Dawn. However, he does seem to have stuck with his decision of 1889, to be less active in the SRIA, and after that year he did not attend so many of its meetings. I suggest he was never very active in the GD either, except as an advisor on (for example) astrology, which Cornelius Agrippa had written about - which might have been all that Westcott and Mathers expected of him.

John Collinson, after a working lifetime apparently with the same employer, was able to retire, with a pension and possibly even some shares in the Company; and I think he did so in or around 1896. Up until 1897 he was at least nominally a member of SRIA, but in 1900 he was struck off the list of its members on a rule (which I think Westcott also applied to the GD) which declared that you had forfeited your membership if you had not been to any meetings or paid your yearly subscription for three years. It doesn't seem to have bothered him; he never told the SRIA that he had retired; and he never rejoined. By 1901 he and Julia and daughter Nina had moved to the Isle of Wight and were living at Delphi Cliff House, Culver Road, Shanklin. I hope John Collinson's enjoyment of his retirement was not interrupted too much by his son Ernest going to court to divorce his wife Rosetta for adultery with one Charles Cox, in 1904. I was amazed myself when this information came up via google (in June 2012) because divorcing and being divorced were so scandalous and so expensive at that time that most miserably-married people preferred to suffer. Knowing that his son's marital problems were being aired in court where any member of the public could go in and hear them can't have been easy experience for this man who was born before Victoria came to the throne; but the divorce didn't cause a breach between father and son: Ernest was named executor when John Collinson wrote his Will.

John Collinson died, at Delphi Cliff House, on 23 May 1906.

**

BASIC SOURCES I USED for all Golden Dawn members.

Membership of the Golden Dawn: The Golden Dawn Companion by R A Gilbert. Northampton: The Aquarian Press 1986. Between pages 125 and 175, Gilbert lists the names, initiation dates and addresses of all those people who became members of the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn or its many daughter Orders between 1888 and 1914. The list is based on the Golden Dawn's administrative records and its Members' Roll - the large piece of parchment on which all new members signed their name at their initiation. All this information had been inherited by Gilbert but it's now in the Freemasons' Library at the United Grand Lodge of England building on Great Queen Street Covent Garden.

Family history: freebmd; ancestry.co.uk (census and probate); findmypast.co.uk; familysearch; Burke's Peerage and Baronetage; Burke's Landed Gentry; Armorial Families; thepeerage.com; and a wide variety of family trees on the web.

Famous-people sources: mostly about men, of course, but very useful even for the female members of GD. Oxford Dictionary of National Biography. Who Was Who. Times Digital Archive.

Catalogues: British Library; Freemasons' Library.

Wikipedia; Google; Google Books - my three best resources. I also used other web pages, but with some caution, as - from the historian's point of view - they vary in quality a great deal.

On Societas Rosicruciana in Anglia, whose published Transactions begin with those of 1888-89.

Transactions of Societas Rosicruciana Metropolitan College for the period 1888 to 1901: P9, minutes of the meeting of 10 Jan 1889 which Collinson attended. A typical meeting would be organised around a paper read by one of the members, followed by discussion of the issues raised. At this particular meeting, Edward Macbean (also a GD member) read a paper on A E Waite's book The Real History of the Rosicrucians, which had caused such offence to the SRIA that its members considered suing him. Collinson took a part in the discussion, saying that he thought Macbean's paper was "a fair criticism" of Waite's "strictures on Christian Rosenkreuz". Westcott's minutes describe Collinson as very learned on the hermetical works of late middle ages and Renaissance, especially those of Cornelius Agrippa whose works were a very important part of SRIA's rituals and research.

I also looked at History of the Societas Rosicruciana in Anglia by the MW Supreme Magus Dr William Wynn Westcott. Privately printed London 1900.

On Cornelius Agrippa: wikipedia, but there's information rather more relevant to the Golden Dawn at www.renaissanceastrology.com/agrippa.html (seen 4 June 2012). He wrote on astrology, geomancy and talismans. This website considers these works by Cornelius

Agrippa as particularly relevant:

1530 De Incertitudine et Vanitate Scientiarum et Artium ie The Vanity and Uncertainty of the Arts and Sciences

1532 but written 1509: De Nobilitate et Praecellentia Foemini Sexus ie Of the Nobility of the Female Sex and the Superiority of Women over Men ((no wonder he cldn't get it pubd!!))

4 June 2012

AMandragora@attglobal.net

William Godwin Coombs was initiated into the Golden Dawn in June 1890, choosing the German motto 'Mehr licht'. There's no evidence in the GD papers to suggest that he was a very active initiate; and a note on them says that he resigned in January 1894. At the time of his initiation, Coombs was living at Wyke House Isleworth; about which, more information below.

William Godwin Coombs was born around 1833. The surname is a common one in the Dorset/Somerset/Wiltshire area. William's middle name, too, has a Wessex ring to it; though Godwin father of King Harold is thought to have been from Sussex. In the mid-19th century censuses the clan Coombs encompassed everyone from members of the landed gentry, living at Haddon House in Axminster, to agricultural labourers. William Coombs' father Thomas occupied a half-way status within it: he was a farmer, living in Felton House, just outside Winford in Somerset, near where Lulsgate airport is now. William's mother Eliza, née Elliott, had been born as far away as Huddersfield but Eliza's mother, Harriet (or Harriett - the censuses don't agree), who lived with the family when William was growing up, was also from Somerset, she'd been born in Nailsea, now part of Bristol. Felton House is a stone-built farmhouse in an L-shape, possibly late 17th century but with 19th century additions including a three-storey bay. You can see it at www.imagesofengland.org.uk. It is Grade II listed now. The Coombs family no longer lives in it; it has been turned into three flats. In William Coombs' youth the household was a modest one, with only two servants - a man to work on the land, and a woman to help with housework.

William Coombs was the second of three sons and was not going to inherit his father's farm. Instead, he studied medicine at St Andrew's University, graduating in 1856. The General Medical Council (GMC), which licenses doctors to practice medicine in the UK, was not founded until 1859. Before that date, licenses to practice medicine in England were issued by the Society of Apothecaries. William Coombs was given his licence by the Society in 1856 and he also became a member of the Royal College of Surgeons, England, in that year, which qualified him to work as a midwife.

Despite the amount of information on 19th century doctors and hospitals, on the web and elsewhere, I have had quite a lot of trouble piecing together William Coombs' working life as a doctor because - in a very un-Victorian manner - he changed jobs frequently. He also spent several periods out of the UK, working perhaps, or just travelling; I haven't been able to find out anything about these times in his life. Here's the best list of his jobs that I can devise, from a variety of sources (see the Sources section for more details):

- house surgeon, Birmingham Lying-in Hospital
- assistant medical officer Devon County Asylum. Several medical journals announced his appointment to this post in November 1862.
- house surgeon, Torquay Infirmary and Dispensary
- assistant medical officer Dorset County Asylum

Coombs could have held the two Devon-based appointments at the same time, I suppose; or even the two asylum posts in adjoining counties. His entry in a medical directory published in 1877 reads as though he had held all of those posts by 1877; but gives his current address as the family home at Felton House Winford, as if he was not employed at all at the moment.

- assistant medical officer, Fisherton House Salisbury. Coombs was employed there by 1881 and was still working there in 1883; but he seems to have left the job by 1887
- Wyke House at Isleworth, definitely from 1891 to 1903, possibly starting earlier and leaving later.

William Coombs was still registered with the GMC until 1915, giving the address at which he died - 13 Scott Ellis Gardens, St John's Wood north London, but I rather think he may have retired in 1903, when he was 70.

Even as scant a list as the one I've been able to compile does show that William Godwin Coombs was fairly typical of the GD members, very many of whom were able to take advantage of the new kinds of work that resulted from the huge expansion of government and in the number of charitable institutions in the latter stages of the 19th century.

I'm assuming that the job at the Birmingham Lying-in Hospital was William Godwin Coombs' first professional appointment and that he started work there soon after qualifying. The hospital changed its name in 1870 so I think he had moved on by then. The hospital had opened in 1842 in the Islington area of the town. It was run by a charity, and as well as the hospital there was a dispensary which treated children.

Coombs' post at the Torquay Infirmary may have been very similar, in terms of daily routine and the kind of cases taken; though I haven't been able to find out quite so much about the services the Infirmary offered. It too was run by a charity, as most hospitals were at this time, though unlike the Birmingham Lying-in Hospital it had its own, purpose-built premises, opened in 1851 on a site in Union Street, Torquay. The building is still there, though it has been turned into flats and renamed Castle Chambers. You can see it at www.geograph.org.uk/photo/1842628. The Infirmary's first house surgeon, the marvellously-named William Wilking Stabb, retired in 1859; so this is a possible date for William Godwin Coombs being offered the job.

The Madhouse Act of 1828 began the professionalisation of the treatment of the mentally ill, by requiring most asylums to have a weekly visit from a qualified doctor; and asylums with more than 100 inmates to have a resident medical officer. William Godwin Coombs' next change of employer took advantage of the expansion of employment begun by the 1828 Act. One of the only firm dates I have about William Coombs' career is his appointment as assistant medical officer to the Devon County asylum in 1862 and I'm wondering if he held that and the Infirmary post together. Medical officers employed by Poor Law Boards did not at this stage have to have any specialist knowledge; because there was no way in which to get that knowledge, except by learning on the job: treatment of the mentally ill was hardly covered at all in most medical training courses. By this time, William Godwin Coombs was an experienced physician, and that was enough for the local Poor Law Board.

In 1845 two acts of Parliament, the Lunacy Act and the County Asylums Act, began a new era for the care of the mentally ill poor: one of more provision and more regulation. For the first time, under the two acts, Poor Law boards were required to house those diagnosed as suffering mental illness in purpose-built asylums; to assess new inmates quickly and treat them humanely; and to have these processes monitored by inspectors employed by a new government office, the Lunacy Commissioners. There were still enormous difficulties to be faced - the lack of understanding of mental illness (that's still true, of course); where and how to house those deemed incurable; what to do with the violent and the criminally insane; and how to do all these things while keeping rates down. Nevertheless, the acts represented a big step on the road away from viewing the mentally ill as possessed by the Devil and treating them as less than human.

The county of Devon had no Poor Law board asylum until it was ordered to have one by the 1845 Act. However, the board then did the job thoroughly, financing an asylum capable of holding 800 inmates and standing in its own grounds, on a site at Exminster, just outside Exeter. It was designed by the architect Charles Fowler and his complex of buildings still exists, redeveloped as housing and renamed Devington Park. There are many pictures of Devington Park on the web, some even taken from the air, so that you can see the scale of it, and the interesting layout. Fowler's design had a cube-shaped administrative building in the curve of a semi-circle of wards, with six wings jutting out in a fan-shape from the semi-circle. When William Godwin Coombs was appointed, his immediate boss was George James Byrne, who may have been an administrator rather than a physician, as he is not in the GMC Registers - an indication of the Poor Law board's priorities, perhaps, in providing this new facility while not antagonising the rate-payers with ever-larger bills. Was this a problem between Coombs and his employers, I wonder?

Unlike Devon, the Poor Law authorities in Dorset had been operating an asylum since the 1820s, at Forston outside Dorchester where new wings had been added to an old manor house. William Coombs' boss in Dorset was a qualified doctor and surgeon, Joseph Gustavus Symes. He had held the post of medical superintendent to the asylum at least since 1848, although he may also have been in private practice at the same time, which might be why he wanted an assistant. However, a second asylum building was opened at Charminster, in 1864; Symes' address in 1879 was Charminster not Forston, so Coombs may have been needed to work in the original buildings. Symes seems only to have retired in 1887 or 1888 so he was in post all the years - whichever they were - that Coombs was employed at this particular asylum.

Perhaps it was the lack of possibilities for promotion that encouraged William Godwin Coombs to take a new job; or perhaps he liked a challenge. His next job was at Fisherton House in Salisbury, Wiltshire, run by the Finch family and by the 1850s it was the biggest privately-run asylum in England, with 700 beds. Although it was run as a private concern, Fisherton House took patients sent there by Poor Law boards from all over England. From 1850 until 1870 it was also the place that the criminally insane ended up. By the time Coombs took up his post, Broadmoor had been finished and the criminally insane were being sent there; but I still get an impression of Fisherton House as a place full of Poor Law boards' hopeless cases. It must have been grim.

What would the typical tasks of an assistant medical officer in an asylum consist of? The mere existence of the 1845 acts indicates that mental illness was beginning the long trail from manacles to care. The 1844 Report had investigated two asylums which were run on very different lines from the norm - those at Lincoln and at Hanwell - and had used them as a template of 'best practice'. Hanwell Asylum had particularly impressed the researchers. Its governor chose to employ more staff, and better-educated and better trained staff than any other asylum; but clawed back some of its higher wages bill by using some inmates to do work in the asylum; inmates willing and able to cooperate in this way were rewarded with beer and tea. And both asylums regarded physical restraint of individuals as a last resort, not as a normal part of the asylum's routine.

But how far might Coombs have been able to apply these new ideas? The bedrock of his job was the early assessment and diagnosis of new inmates that the 1845 Lunacy Act insisted on; and he must have become an expert in detecting the typical signs of mental illness. This he will have had to do on the job, as mental illness as a specialism was in its infancy. In addition, all the publicly-funded asylums Coombs worked in had so many inmates and so few medically-qualified staff that I can't believe he will have been able to do a great deal to help any one patient. And with so many people in close confinement, medical officers may have spent just as much time being concerned with symptoms of epidemics as they did looking for symptoms of psychosis. In any case, Poor Law Boards expected their Medical Officers to do administrative work as well as their medical tasks and these took up so much time that very little was left over for carrying out rehabilitation or research. James Crichton Browne was Medical Officer at Wakefield Asylum from 1866 to 1876 and letters that he sent to Charles Darwin during those years continually bemoan the hours he spent every day writing reports and collecting statistics for his Poor Law Board employers and central government departments. Crichton Browne wanted to do research on his patients. Coombs may just have wanted to help them be better, but with admin taking up so much time, and the numbers of inmates overwhelming the possibility of cures, he may have despaired of ever making any real difference; because his next job was in a very different setting.

Wyke House as William Coombs knew it was the brainchild of Robert Gardiner Hill, whose work in the Poor Law asylum at Lincoln had attracted the notice of the 1844 Lunacy Report researchers. Gardiner Hill was one of the most vocal of those who advocated the abandonment of the use of physical restraints in the control of people with mental illness; and at Lincoln he had been able to demonstrate that it could be done without mayhem resulting. He also favoured small institutions, as being more likely to achieve cures, and it was perhaps this preference that made him give up his job with the Poor Law board and go into private medicine. Wyke House, in Sion Lane Isleworth, had been licensed for operation as a private asylum since the 1840s but in 1859 Dr Gardiner Hill and his partner Dr Edmund Sparshall Willett bought it and its sister-asylum Inverness House at Brentford, presumably with the intention of carrying out Gardiner Hill's favoured regime in full. However, such innovations in a private asylum couldn't be paid for by the rates.

As early as 1884, Wyke House had been described as an asylum "for Nervous Invalids of the Upper and Middle Classes". Conditions for the patients throw those of the average Poor Law asylum into unflattering relief: they were allowed baths and showers, they were encouraged to go out into the extensive grounds, either on foot or by carriage; they could help in the gardens, play tennis, visit the farm; while inside there was a billiard table as well as the usual padded cells. Under Gardiner Hill and Willett these comforts continued and following the attempt in 1858 by the Bulwer family to incarcerate Rosina Bulwer Lytton at Inverness House they were widely talked of in the press and thus came to the attention of people who never otherwise would have heard about them - possibly including William Coombs, who had only just qualified when the scandal happened. Gardiner Hill and Willett advertised for potential patients in magazines likely to be read by the leisured and moneyed upper classes - the Ecclesiastical Gazette and The Athenaeum, for example. And as even the upper classes had the problem of what to do with their mentally ill, some of them sent their relations to Wyke House.

Robert Gardiner Hill died in 1878 and Willett became sole proprietor of Inverness House and Wyke House. William Coombs may have got the job at Wyke House through the St Andrew's University connection - Willett also studied medicine there although he was several years Coombs' senior. But Coombs may also have sought the job out as an admirer of Gardiner Hill's ideas. Though Gardiner Hill's work at Lincoln asylum had been in the 1830s, a lecture on it had been published in 1857, just after Coombs had passed his medical exams; and Gardiner Hill had published a book, essentially a justification of his methods, in 1870 - Lunacy, its Past and Present.

At no time between 1861 and 1891 was I able to catch William Coombs on the census in any of the medical posts he held and thus see him on the job. But he appears as a member of staff at Wyke House in the 1891 census. On that day Wyke House had 16 male patients. They included ex army and navy officers, a clergyman, a barrister and a surgeon; and their ages ranged from late 30s to 70s, with most being over 60. There were also 10 women patients; no profession was given for any of them nor any source of income with which to pay the fees; most were in their 60s so they were rather older than the male patients. I couldn't help wondering, given these high average ages, whether the most common mental problem at Wyke House was dementia rather than any classic form of mental illness. I noted that none of the patients were identified on the census form by their full name; only their initials appear on it.

For the small number of patients, Wyke House had a large number of staff and I'm sure William Coombs appreciated the change from staff to patient ratios in a Poor Law asylum. All staff lived on the premises. The 16 male patients had seven male attendants to care for them; the 10 women patients had eight attendants, all women. All attendants lived as part of the household; with Dr Willetts as its head, still living on the premises with his family. Supervising the attendants were William Coombs as resident medical superintendent; and Harriett Edwards as resident lady superintendent. Harriett Edwards was not registered with the General Medical Council so she was not a doctor. Her qualifications, if any, and her experience, were of course not written on the census form. I would suppose she had been trained as a nurse and that at Wyke House she acted as a matron. I suppose, also, that William Coombs was senior to her in the Wyke House hierarchy and that she reported to him. Wyke House also had a large domestic staff - a butler, a cook, two housemaids, a dairymaid, a kitchen-maid and a scullery maid. Surely the Claridges of 19th century mental institutions!

From William Coombs' time as an employee at Wyke House comes my one glimpse of the medical officer of an asylum at work. Maud Mary Roth was sent to Wyke House by the Lunacy Commissioners in November 1898 and William Coombs carried out the required assessment of her mental condition. (Did Willett ever carry out the assessments? If he did, wouldn't that represent a conflict of interest?) Coombs' report described symptoms which included delusions and hallucinations, and as a result of this evidence, Mrs Roth was kept at Wyke House continually from 1898 to 1919. Comfortable the asylum may have been, but she still doesn't seem to have been allowed to leave; and her case wasn't reassessed until 1920.

William Coombs was employed at Wyke House between 1891 to 1903 and possibly longer. I think it was the longest period he spent in any one job. By 1901 Dr Willett had retired and moved to Eastbourne. William Coombs is not on the 1901 census so I haven't been able to discover whether anyone was appointed to replace Dr Willett, or whether Coombs became head doctor at Wyke House himself. He doesn't seem to have bought Wyke House from Dr Willett; I suppose that in due course, it was sold to someone else. Perhaps Coombs retired at the time of the sale. He moved to 13 Scott Ellis Gardens, in St John's Wood north London.

So that's William Godwin Coombs' career as a doctor. But where did it bring him into contact with members of the Golden Dawn? I haven't really got an answer to that question. As far as I can tell, Coombs wasn't a freemason; and so he wasn't a member of Societas Rosicruciana in Anglia or lodge Quatuor Coronati number 2076, which were used by William Westcott as recruiting grounds for GD initiates, especially in the GD's early years. Nor does Coombs seem to have been in the Theosophical Society - a second very common route into the GD. He never published anything, or gave any public lectures, either on his work or anything else, that might have drawn the attention of GD members to him. And he doesn't seem to have been related to any of them. The only suggestion I can make is that it was through his work that he met some GD members, some of its doctor members, or its scientists - William Crookes was initiated into the GD in the same month as Coombs. That's just a bit of speculation though.

William Godwin Coombs continued to be registered with the General Medical Council until 1915. He died, at his home in Scott Ellis Gardens, on the 20 June 1919. He had never married.

BASIC SOURCES I USED for all Golden Dawn members.

Membership of the Golden Dawn: The Golden Dawn Companion by R A Gilbert. Northampton: The Aquarian Press 1986. Between pages 125 and 175, Gilbert lists the names, initiation dates and addresses of all those people who became members of the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn or its many daughter Orders between 1888 and 1914. The list is based on the Golden Dawn's administrative records and its Members' Roll - the large piece of parchment on which all new members signed their name at their initiation. All this information had been inherited by Gilbert but it's now in the Freemasons' Library at the United Grand Lodge of England building on Great Queen Street Covent Garden.

Family history: freebmd; ancestry.co.uk (census and probate); findmypast.co.uk; familysearch; Burke's Peerage and Baronetage; Burke's Landed Gentry; Armorial Families; thepeerage.com; and a wide variety of family trees on the web.

Famous-people sources: mostly about men, of course, but very useful even for the female members of GD. Oxford Dictionary of National Biography. Who Was Who. Times Digital Archive.

Catalogues: British Library; Freemasons' Library.

Wikipedia; Google; Google Books - my three best resources. I also used other web pages, but with some caution, as - from the historian's point of view - they vary in quality a great deal.

Sources specific to William Godwin Coombs:

For a general summing-up of the rise of the medical profession during the 19th-century, see chapter 1 of Shattered Nerves: Doctors, Patients, and Depression in Victorian England by Janet Oppenheim. New York and Oxford: Oxford University Press 1991. The chapter also covers the changes that took place as part of that process in how and where doctors were educated; and talks about the legislation that was passed that affected how and where they could practice. It makes the point several times that doctors working with the mentally ill, especially those working in Poor Law financed asylums, were regarded as second-class citizen doctors even by other doctors.

General Medical Council Registers, available via Ancestry.co.uk. The GMC started life in 1859 and that's the date of its first Register. Coombs does not appear in the Registers before the issue of 1867.

Association Medical Journal published by the Provincial Medical and Surgical Association; issue of 1855 p1153 William Godwin Coombs became a member of the Royal College of Surgeons England 21 December 1855.

Association Medical Journal issue of 1856 p198 William Godwin Coombs of Winford Somerset had been admitted to the Apothecaries' Hall on 28 February 1856.

Medical Times and Gazette issue of 1 November 1862 p477 William Godwin Coombs MD University of St Andrews MRCS England had been appointed Assistant Medical Officer to the Devon County Lunatic Asylum at Exminster, where his immediate boss would be George James Byrne. Coombs' current address was given as Haddon House Axminster.

Transactions St Andrew's Medical Graduates Association volume 2 1869 pviii William Godwin Coombs was in its current list of senior members; current address Felton House Winford Somerset.

Medical Bibliography for 1877 p404 entry for William Godwin Coombs, whose current address is Felton House, Winford Bristol. It wasn't clear to me from Googlebooks' snippet exactly how the information was collected; so I'm assuming it was collected from the doctors themselves. Coombs' entry described him as "late assistant" Medical Officer at Dorset Co Lunatic Asylum and at Devon County Lunatic Asylum. Other posts he had held were resident surgeon Birmingham Lying-In Hospital and house Surgeon Torquay Infirmary and Dispensary. No dates were given for any of these posts.

For the 1844 Report of the Metropolitan Commissioners in Lunacy; and the two Acts of 1845: //studymore.org.uk, run by Andrew Roberts, lecturer in sociology at Middlesex University. A very good, thorough site, based on and with long extracts from original sources; though I did find a couple of its links were no longer working.

Birmingham Lying-in Hospital

Good local history website //billdargue.jimdo.com/placenames-gazetteer-a-to-y/places-i/islington, is a History of Birmingham Places and Placenames, compiled by William Dargue. The district called Islington, self-consciously named for Islington north London, was built c 1780 on land belonging to the Church of England and held by rector of Birmingham. The lying-in hospital opened in 1842 in a converted house next to the Islington Glassworks. It changed its name in 1870 to Birmingham and Midland Free Hospital for Sick Children.

At www.ncbi.nlm.nih.gov.uk I found a reference to an item in Provincial Medical and Surgical Journal ((I think that's its correct name)) volume 9 no 3 issue of January 1845, giving the full title of the hospital as Birmingham Lying-in Hosp and Dispensary for the Diseases of Women and Children. Via google, a reference to the British Medical Journal (BMJ) issue 21 1907 saying that the hospital was run as a charity. At website www.bhamb14.co.uk/index\_files/LOVEDAYSTREETMATERNITYHOSPITAL.htm a note that the original address of the lying-in hosp was St Mary's Square; then it moved to Broad Street; it moved to Loveday Street 1906. When it first opened, there were 13 beds and only married women could use them.

Torquay Infirmary (originally known as Torbay Infirmary)

At www.devonheritage.org there's a contemporary picture of the infirmary, from Devon County Council's collection. Purpose-built and standing in its own grounds behind a gate, the infirmary opened 1851. At www.geograph.org.uk/photo/1842628 there's a modern photo of it, now converted to flats and known as Castle Chambers; Union Street Torquay.

The //genuki.cs.ncl.ac.uk/DEV/Tormoham/Kelly1856.html website is compiled by Terry Leaman from Kelly's 1856 Directory for Devonshire. The infirmary is in Tor Moham parish and is called TorBAY infirmary at this stage; it's definitely the same place, the address is Union Street. The house surgeon at this date is William W Stabb.

A couple of items on the career of Dr Stabb:

The Lancet volume 1 1853 p561 medical news: a list of members of the Royal College of Surgeons England who have recently been licensed by the College to practice as midwives includes William Wilking Stabb, described as of "Ilfracombe", at least at this date.

Medical Times and Gazette issue of 16 July 1859 p73 has a short item on the retirement of William Wilking Stabb from the post of house surgeon at Torbay (sic) Infirmary and Dispensary, which are run by a board of governors. The job of house surgeon was thus available in 1859.

Devon County Asylum to which Coombs was appointed assist Medical Officer in 1862; and he's no longer working there by 1877. Wikipedia on Exminster says that the asylum opened in July 1845. It was built on a hill overlooking the estuary and Exminster at this stage is a village outside Exeter. The asylum had 800 beds and was built with six arms radiating from a central administration block. It closed in the 1980s; the site was redevelopd as housing and is now known as Devington Park.

The GMC does not having anyone called George James Byrne registered with them in the 1860s and 1870s.

Dorset County Asylum

It was built 1827-32 in the village of Forston near Dorchester, incorporating an old manor house. All the inmates were paupers, that is they had been sent there by the Dorset Poor Law authorities and were being paid for by its ratepayers. The 1844 Lunacy Report listed Dorset asylum amongst those existing asylums which never used physical restraints on patients. A second hospital building was opened at Charminster in 1864 and from that date the two sites were both in use. In 1881 the MO was Joseph Gustavus Symes.

On the web I found a series of Annual Reports of the Dorset County Asylum; the earliest of these was published 1865, the latest in 1886, with these years missing from sequence: 1866-72, 1875, 1877, 1882-83. A Thomas Coombs is listed as an author on the Annual Reports of 1881 and 1884-86 but not earlier or later. Assuming the Annual Report of 1884 to be typical, I looked at the contents and found that Thomas Coombs was working at the Asylum as a clerk - that is, clerk to the Poor Law Board. His contribution to the Annual Report was to prepare the statistics and the accounts. I tried to find him on 1881 census, to see if he might be William Godwin Coombs' elder brother, but I couldn't identify him.

A bit more on Dr Symes:

Gentleman's Magazine volume 190 1851 p424 Joseph Gustavus Symes is described as a surgeon based in Devizes; the son of Rear-Admiral Joseph Symes of Crewkerne.

The Lancet volume 2 p348 issue of 6 October 1848 Symes is now Medical Superintendent of Dorset County Asylum; address Forston House Dorchester.

London Gazette 24 May 1887 p2876 legal notice following the death of John Fox. One of his executors is Joseph Gustavus Symes of Dorset County Lunatic Asylum at Charminster.

Calendar of the Royal College of Surgeons England issue of 1888 p223 has J Gustavus Symes with an address in Weymouth.

Fisherton House

Its archives are now at Chippenham in the Wiltshire and Swindon History Centre. A blog at website //history/wiltshire.gov.uk has a query dated 9 July 2011 from someone chasing a relation who'd died as an inmate at Fisherton House. The reply to the query says Fisherton House and Laverstock House were 2 asylums in Salisbury both owned and run by the Finch family. Laverstock House opened in 1754, Fisherton House in 1813 originally for 75 patients. It always took in paupers, from all over England, including London; and in the 1850s it was the largest private mental hospital in England, with 700 beds. From 1850 until 1870 and the building of Broadmoor, it took the criminally insane. Its name was changed to Old Manor Hospital in 1920.

There's a chapter on the life and career of James Crichton Browne (later Sir James Crichton-Browne) in Shattered Nerves: Doctors, Patients and Depression in Victorian England by Janet Oppenheim. New York and Oxford: Oxford University Press 1991. Although depression and its treatment is the core of the book, it's also very good on 19-century understanding of mental illness in general, and on the struggles of doctors to establish themselves as the experts on it, despite the plentiful evidence that they knew not that much more than their patients.

Wyke House asylum

Local history evidence found via google shows Wyke House had been a private residence in 18th cent; and a school in the 1820s. Local history website www.brentfordtw8 item on Inverness House Brentford put on website by Jim Lawes on 2 February 2005 says that shares in Inverness House as a limited company were issued by a Dr Costello in 1846 but in 1850 he was replaced in the company by doctors Bascombe and John Gregory. In 1859 Wyke House was licensed to R Gardiner Hill and E Willett. In 1867 the assistant medical officer at Wyke House was George Mickley; he had left the job by 1881. Wyke House seems still to have been registered as a mental nursing home in 1959.

In Medico-Chirurgical Review and Journal of Practical Medicine volume 41 1844 issue of 1 July p296 an article - not a straight-forward advert - on Wyke House refers to it as recently set up by Dr Costello as a model of modern treatment: "Wyke House Asylum for Nervous Invalids of the Upper and Middle Classes". Article describes middle-classes and upper-classes as lagging behind poorer patients (ie those who have to go to a Poor Law asylum) as regards treatment for mental problems. At Wyke House, treatment "embraces all the modern improvement - baths, douches, padded rooms, chair and carriage outings etc"; patients were allowed outside, there were gardens, a farm, tennis, skittles, walks; and billiards inside.

The case of Rosina Bulwer Lytton. There's plenty on the web about it; try Wikipedia. She also wrote about the incident herself, in two books. She was certified insane by a doctor on the orders of her estranged husband, Edward Bulwer Lytton, after she had heckled him at a political meeting. She was sent to Inverness House in June 1858 but the public outcry about what had happened to her was so great that the family gave in and she was allowed to leave the following month. At the height of the tumult, Robert Gardiner Hill had to issue a statement assuring the public that she was not being kept under restraint. The circumstances of Rosina being an upper-class woman definitely contributed to the outrage of the public.

Medical Times and Gazette Advertiser volume II no 531 issue of 1 September 1860 on its back page, an advert for Wyke House where it is described as "a Private Establishment for the care and recovery of Ladies and Gentlemen mentally afflicted". Applications were to be sent either to R Gardiner Hill "late resident proprietor" but now of Eastgate House Lincoln and 8 Hinde Street Manchester Square; or to Dr E S Willett MD at Wyke House. The advert describes both men as proprietors of the establishment. Similar adverts appeared in Ecclesiastical Gazette 1859 p251; The Athenaeum 1860 p730; London and Provincial Medical Directory 1860 p836; Rapport du Comité Consultatif International Financial Conference League of Nations 1861 p671.

Times 20 November 1920 p6 report on a Lunacy Inquiry involving Mrs Maud Mary Roth, of independent means, who was in court to hear the evidence as to her own mental state; and she was considered to be sufficiently compos mentis to give evidence as well. The 1920 Inquiry heard that in November 1898 she had been sent to Wyke House on the orders of the Lunacy Commissioners. She had remained there until the September previous to the current Inquiry, when she had been moved to a similar institution in Hastings. It came out in the 1920 evidence that the current proprietor of Wyke House asylum was Dr Findlay Murchison. In 1898, Dr Coombs had given evidence as acting Medical Officer at Wyke House; he was asked to describe Mrs Roth's symptoms.

13 June 2012

AMandragora@attglobal.net

Augustus Montague COOPER who was initiated into the Golden Dawn in May 1891 and took the motto 'Cassiel'. At the time of his initiation he was living at 11 Upper Spring Street, near Portman Square London. In 1903, as a result of an update of GD's administration, he was assumed to have resigned.

This young man is one of the most elusive of all the GD members and I've found out virtually nothing about him or his family.

I had one piece of luck: on the day of the 1891 census, Augustus Cooper had been living at the address he gave the GD. The house was divided into three, and Augustus Cooper was a member of the third household on the census list, presumably the one on the top floor, headed by Mary Gotts, or possibly Notts, an unmarried woman. Augustus Cooper said he was married. A Marion Cooper, a married woman, was the third member of Mary Gotts' household and I suppose the two Coopers were married to each other. I say 'I suppose' because I could not find a registration of their marriage in England and Wales, at least not between 1886 and 1891 and it could hardly have taken place any earlier. They must have married outside England and Wales.

Augustus Cooper told the census official that he was 28 and that he had been born in Bangalore.

When asked his occupation, Augustus Cooper's reply was such as to cause the census official to write down "professor of music" on the form. That might mean that Augustus taught music in a conservatoire, but he seemed to me to be rather young to have been given such a post. I think it is more likely that he was a professional musician; but I haven't had much luck, on the web or in the Times, finding any evidence of this.

I attempted to find Augustus Montague Cooper a family, based on his having been born to English people living in India, in the Madras presidency, around 1863-64. I couldn't find a baptism notice in the Madras Presidency files in the British Library India Office collection; though I wasn't sure I was expecting to, as Bangalore was outside the full jurisdiction of the British government, being in the domains of the ruling family of Mysore. By looking at the army and other directories for India in the second half of the 19th century I did find two possible fathers for him.

The first of them shares the GD member's name, in full: Augustus Montague Cooper, born in 1820 to a family from Lewes in Sussex. This man had gone to Tonbridge School before joining the army in 1838 and being sent to India as an officer in the 52nd Madras Native Infantry. In 1846 he married Elizabeth Borthwick, a daughter of another army officer. This Augustus Montague Cooper was obliged to cut short his military career through injury or illness in 1852 and seems to have returned to England. He died in 1892 in Brighton.

It might seem a bit strange for me to say that I don't think a man who even had the same name is the GD member's father. My main reason for deciding that he wasn't was that he was no longer living in India when the GD member was born there. I prefer my second candidate.

He is William Wright Gilbert Cooper, born 1823 into a family that had been of the Nottinghamshire landed gentry but had had to sell their estate. William W G Cooper went to Westminster School, and then Oxford University before becoming a vicar. From 1845 to 1855 he acted as a curate at St Mary's Dover but then he took a job with the East India Company and spent the next 20 years or so in a series of posts in the Madras presidency including two spells as chaplain at Bangalore. In 1877 he returned to England and was appointed vicar of Burwash in Sussex. He retired in 1887. I couldn't find a death registration for him in England and Wales; he was probably still alive in 1891.

There are two problems with Rev William W G Cooper as father of Augustus Montague Cooper. The first is that I can't tie him down to being in Bangalore in 1863/1864 when Augustus Montague Cooper was born there. And the second is, I can't find father and son on the census together. Of course, I didn't actually have many opportunities to find them in the same household. But the one time William W G Cooper appears on a census between 1861 and 1901, Augustus Montague Cooper is not living at the same address. On the day of the 1881 census, William W G Cooper was living at the vicarage in Burwash with his wife Catharine, daughter Edith (aged 22), three domestic staff and two visitors. Augustus Montague Cooper was not living anywhere in the UK.

And I couldn't find any information about Marion, either.

How did Augustus Montague Cooper meet someone or several someones who were in the GD? Especially if he spent so little time in England in his life. Well, he was too young to be a freemason, I don't think he took that route. And though I didn't find his name in the Theosophical Society's membership books (I may just have missed it) someone called Montague Cooper (not Augustus) is listed in the first volume of Theosophical Society's members' journal The Vahan. The TS seems to me to be a more likely way in; though his work as a musician may also have brought him into contact with people who turned out to be members. Without knowing more about him, it's impossible to tell.

It was clear from the 1891 census entry that 11 Upper Spring Street was a lodging house. It is in the nature of lodging houses that no one stays very long and I'm sure the Coopers were soon on the move. I haven't been able to find out where they went - abroad, possibly, as neither of them appears on the censuses of 1901 or 1911.

Very much a bird of passage!

BASIC SOURCES I USED for all Golden Dawn members.

Membership of the Golden Dawn: The Golden Dawn Companion by R A Gilbert. Northampton: The Aquarian Press 1986. Between pages 125 and 175, Gilbert lists the names, initiation dates and addresses of all those people who became members of the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn or its many daughter Orders between 1888 and 1914. The list is based on the Golden Dawn's administrative records and its Members' Roll - the large piece of parchment on which all new members signed their name at their initiation. All this information had been inherited by Gilbert but it's now in the Freemasons' Library at the United Grand Lodge of England building on Great Queen Street Covent Garden.

Family history: freebmd; ancestry.co.uk (census and probate); findmypast.co.uk; familysearch; Burke's Peerage and Baronetage; Burke's Landed Gentry; Armorial Families; thepeerage.com; and a wide variety of family trees on the web.

Famous-people sources: mostly about men, of course, but very useful even for the female members of GD. Oxford Dictionary of National Biography. Who Was Who. Times Digital Archive.

Catalogues: British Library; Freemasons' Library.

Wikipedia; Google; Google Books - my three best resources. I also used other web pages, but with some caution, as - from the historian's point of view - they vary in quality a great deal.

Membership of the Theosophical Society: TS membership books, held at the TS headquarters building on Gloucester Place in London.

Data for possible father number 1: Augustus Montague Cooper.

The Town Book of Lewes 1702-1837 published by the Sussex Record Society 1973 p77 a Robert Chester Cooper described as owning The Castle Yard in Lewes.

County Genealogies: Pedigrees of the Families in the County of Sussex by William Berry. Published 1830. P377 re the Cooper family of Icklesham. Augustus Montague Cooper was born 2 March 1820 at Adur Lodge; son of Robert Chester Cooper of Lewes and his wife Caroline daughter of George Shum. He was their second son and his baptism was registered in Old Shoreham Church.

Register of Tonbridge School 1826-1910 editor H A Steed, published 1911. I couldn't see the page number on the snippet: Augustus Montague Cooper son of Robert Chester Cooper was a pupil at the school 1830-31. Born 1820. He joined the 52nd Madras Native Infantry in 1838, retiring from the army in 1855 with the rank of captain. There was no entry in this book for anyone with that name who might have been a son of the 1820 Augustus Montague Cooper.

Annual Register vol 87 1846 p216 Lieutenant Augustus M Cooper of the 32nd Madras Native Infantry had married Elizabeth daughter of the late Major-General Borthwick of the Royal Artillery. The marriage had taken place at St James Colchester; p215 I couldn't read the exact date but it was April 1845.

Indian News and Chronicle of Eastern Affairs 1852 p281 news section on the Madras military establishment. Augustus Montague Cooper was in a short list of people who had been "invalided". At the time this happened, Cooper was a Captain in the 52nd Madras Native Infantry.

The last army list in which Augustus Montague Cooper appears is the India Register 1855 p103 and he's no longer on the list of active officers in the the 52nd Madras Native Infantry; he's on p108, in the invalid establishment list where he's described as "on furlough". Just confirming his army career details: joined 1838 as a lieutenant; was made captain 17 September 1850; and was invalided out 30 November 1852.

India Register 1856 doesn't have Augustus Montague Cooper anywhere in it, either as military personnel or as a civilian.

A likely death registration for him: Augustus Montague Cooper registered Brighton July-September 1892.

Data for possible father number 2: William Wright (army sources say WrightE) Gilbert Cooper.

Family history website at //spuddybike.org.uk/familyhistory/madras/priests/detail/priest\_3041.html is a list of Church of England personnel who served in the Madras presidency. I couldn't find any indication on the website for the source of the information but it is laid out as if it was originally published in Crockford's Clerical Directory. The details: William Wright (sic) Gilbert Cooper. Born 1823, no date of death known but assumed to be post-1887. Magdalen Oxford BA 1845 MA 1853. Curate of St Mary's Dover 1845-55, then went to work for the East India Company in the Madras Presidency: Trichinopoly 1855-58; Mysore 1858-65; Black Town ((Madras)) 1865-66; Bangalore twice 1866-69 and 1871-73; Ootacamund 1869-71; chaplain to bishop of Madras 1873-75; St Thomas Mount 1875-77. He then returned to the UK and was appointed vicar of Burwash Sussex; he kept that job from 1877 to 1887.

William Wright Gilber Cooper is somewhere in The Record of Old Westminster: Biographical list...[of pupils] to 1927 Volume 1 published by Westminster School 1928; I couldn't see the page number or any further details from the googlebooks' snippet.

Confirmation of much of the spuddybike website's information, from India Office library reference works:

Papers of the House of Commons 1859 (that is, in the wake of the Indian Mutiny when the British Government was preparing to take over the East India Company) p155 is p3 of a set of papers describing Troops at Stations in India; William Wright (sic) Gilbert Cooper is at Mysore; p154/p2 in a list of assistant chaplains currently working in the Madras diocese, compiled 1 October 1857.

Indian Army and Civil Service List for Jan 1867 p279 Rev W W G Cooper MA is a chaplain based at Bangalore.

The Army Lists all have Wright spelled with an E - Wrighte. Army List 1870 p507 gives the current personnel in the Madras ecclesiastical establishment: Rev W W G Cooper is in its list of senior chaplains; appointed 1855; currently based at Ootacamund

Indian Army and Civil Service List for 1871 p261 says the Rev W W G Cooper is now back at Bangalore.

India Army and Civil Service List 1874 and again 1875 both on p261 the Rev W W G Cooper is now chaplain to the bishop, the Rt Rev F Gell.

India List 1877 p131 the Rev W W G Cooper is now second from the top of the list of senior chaplains in the diocese of Madras; he's now based at St Thomas' Mount and Palaveram.

India List Jan 1878 p131 the Rev W W G Cooper has now reached the top of the list of senior chaplains diocese of Madras; but he's on leave at the moment.

India List 1881 p131 the Rev W W G Cooper is now on the retired list, with date 19 July 1879.

India List for Jan 1891 Rev W W G Cooper is still on the list of retired officers.

One website suggesting that the family is from Nottinghamshire:

Website www.thurgartonhistory.co.uk about Thurgarton village in Notts quotes from a letter by Lt Cecil Gilbert-Cooper (sic) who visited it in 1869. Lt Gilbert-Cooper was a member of the family that had owned the village's Priory estate from 1538 to 1820. The letter was to Rev William W G Cooper. However, the website does describe Cecil Gilbert-Cooper as Rev William W G Cooper's son, which I don't think can be right, he's too old; they might be brothers.

17 June 2012

AMandragora@attglobal.net

George Cope Cope was initiated into the Golden Dawn at its Isis-Urania temple in London on 18 June 1895. He chose the Latin motto 'Pax nobis ille'. His address while he was a member was 14 Pembridge Square London. He didn't ever take his initiation any further.

George Cope was a member of the Irish landed gentry, a member of the Cope family of county Armagh. His father, John Alexander Mainley Pinniger had married Georgina Garland in 1848. Georgina's mother, Anna, was the daughter of Nicholas Archdall Cope of Drumilly. When Anna Cope Garland died in May 1867 John and Georgina Pinniger inherited her estate at Drumilly on condition that they change their surname to Cope, which they did in August of that year.

John Alexander Mainley Pinniger (later Cope) was a solicitor, originally working for a firm in Gray's Inn but later as a partner in Messrs Cope, Rose and Pearson of 26 St George Street Westminster. He was the personal legal advisor to the Sackville-West family who owned Knole House in Kent, and his other clients included members of the Tyzack banking family. He also acted as solicitor to the pioneer of international communication by telegraph, John Watkins Brett - something of an onerous task, it seems, as Brett's cable-laying companies seemed to have had more than their share of financial crises. However, through his involvement with Brett, John Pinniger, later Cope, got to know the directors of the various companies Brett founded to lay cables across the UK, under the Mediterranean and across the Atlantic to Canada; the directors included several men whose children became members of the Golden Dawn. The Pinniger family also knew John Lettsom Elliot and his family. John Lettsom Elliot managed the Elliot brewery in Pimlico. Perhaps John Pinniger was the brewery's solicitor; or the families may just have been friendly. John Lettsom Elliot's grandson, Hugh Elliot, was a member of the Golden Dawn.

John Pinniger, later Cope, and Georgina had three daughters, and four sons of whom George was the youngest, baptised as George Cope Pinniger on 29 July 1855 in the church at Parkstone near Bournemouth. I can't find the family on the 1861 census, I suppose they were visiting relatives in Ireland. I can't find George on the 1871 census either, but his family were in their house at 4 Cambridge Square in the triangle between Edgeware Road and Hyde Park, in one of the best-served households of any GD member. John A M Cope employed a butler, a footman and a lady's maid; as well as a governess for George's sisters, a cook, a nurse, two housemaids and a kitchen maid. Victorian servants may have been badly paid on the whole, especially the female ones, but this was still serious expenditure on the part of George's parents.

I don't know where the boy now known as George Cope Cope went to school, but in 1873 he followed his elder brothers Edgar and Frederick to Pembroke College Cambridge; the fourth brother, Arthur, didn't go to university but joined his father's firm and qualified as a solicitor. George graduated in 1877, and - again like brother Edgar - qualified as a barrister in 1879, becoming a member of the Inner Temple. He had offices at 12 King's Bench Walk in the Inner Temple precinct and earned his living at the Surrey court sessions for many years but I do question his commitment to his profession. He didn't rise through the legal hierarchy, never became a King's Counsel (they earn the highest fees) or a judge; never took on the kind of case that was reported in the Press; and may have all but retired while still quite young.

In November 1871 John A M Cope was appointed a JP for the county of Armagh, so he had to spend some weeks of each year carrying out his duties as a magistrate there, but the family home was still in London, at 14 Pembridge Square, north of Notting Hill Gate, where John Cope died in 1892. Although George Cope gave his mother's home as his address when he joined the GD, he wasn't actually living there by then. According to a memoir by the social reformer Emmeline Pethick-Lawrence, he was living in a block of flats in Somerset Terrace Euston Road with a friend, John Greenhalgh, who was on a long leave from his job as a judge in Burma. Two of their neighbours in the block of flats were Emmeline Pethick (not married to Lawrence yet) and her friend Mary Neal. Emmeline and Mary both did voluntary work at the West London Mission in Marylebone, and after getting to know them, George Cope started to volunteer there too, at the children's club they ran. Emmeline Pethick-Lawrence's memoir is written with a great deal of hindsight, in the mid-1930s. She describes the George Cope she knew in the mid-1890s as wanting to "to turn to the simple life as a change" having got bored, as she had done, with the social round. Emmeline describes how George's "Irish wit and irrepressible gaiety" and his "leadership against all restriction and restraint" made him very popular with the children; and says that if ever there was trouble at the girls' club, George Cope Cope was likely to have caused it. I'm not sure, from this account, how far Emmeline approved of George Cope's anarchic behaviour but she couldn't help but admire an "innate sense of harmony and beauty" that she felt that he had.

This sense of beauty must have been challenged by the things George Cope learned at the West London Mission about the lives of the children who spent their leisure hours there. Through Emmeline Pethick and Mary Neal he met other men and women with strong views on the social issues of the day. In 1897 he sent his first letters to the Times, querying a recent decision made by the military hierarchy in India to close its lock hospitals, where prostitutes had been imprisoned while being treated for venereal diseases given them by their soldier clients. George was only asking whether there was any actual evidence for the argument being put forward by the military, that the lock hospital system didn't work. However, his letter seems to have hit an exposed nerve amongst the members of the committee which had taken the decision, two of whom wrote to the Times vigorously defending the committee's choice but in the process making it fairly clear that they had not gathered any evidence as to whether lock hospitals worked before the decision was made. The correspondence ended with George Cope pointing out that, without any data on the subject, the opponents of the decision that had been taken were finding it very difficult to argue their case. In this, George Cope was not just thinking about the situation in India, I'm sure: the Contagious Diseases Acts, under which the lock hospital system operated, also applied in the UK, in military and non-military situations, and were being bitterly attacked by women campaigners as enshrining the sexual double-standard and treating the ill like criminals.

George Cope's initiation into the GD happened around the time he met Emmeline Pethick and Mary Neal, and was another attempt to break out into new territory with his life outside his work as a barrister. Hugh Elliot was a member of the same barristers' chambers as Cope at 12 King's Walk in the Inner Temple - he'd probably joined that chambers because Elliots knew the Copes. He was initiated into the GD a few months before George Cope and almost certainly was the man who recommended Cope as a suitable initiate. However, the GD didn't work for George Cope; unlike Elliot, he gave it up shortly after being initiated. With John Greenhalgh, he continued to try out the simple life. On the day of the 1901 census, they were sharing a cottage (on holiday, I think, as both are described as "visitors" and there is no head of household) at 65 Broadmoor, Wotton, Dorking, surrounded by households headed by either a gardener, an agricultural labourer, or a gamekeeper. And he continued his involvement in social issues to the extent of dipping a toe in local politics. In 1902 he stood in a bye-election at St Pancras Board of Guardians, as a Liberal candidate, against Edith Mary Rendel. Unfortunately his decision to stand caused consternation and division in his own party. The members had no problem with him declaring that he would campaign against the interference of central government in local decision-making. However, a lot of them really didn't like his decision to make arguing against compulsory vaccination an important feature of his campaign speeches. And a further group would have preferred a woman candidate, if they could have found one; some even wrote to Miss Rendel saying how much they hoped she would win. She did win, and I can't find any evidence that George Cope stood as a political candidate any other time. However, his involvement in social issues continued and he kept the friends he had made in campaigning circles. When Margaret Macdonald, of the Women's Industrial Council, died in 1911 he was on the committee of friends and colleagues that worked to set up a suitable memorial to her work as a collector of statistics on women's employment and working conditions.

John Greenhalgh's long leave seems to have turned into a decision to take early retirement and remain in England. He organised holidays for working people; and acted as advisor to tenants' associations. He and George Cope continued to share flats, probably for nearly a decade - in 1897 they were living at 20 Endsleigh Terrace, Duke's Road - but in 1906 George Cope got married, at the age of 51. His bride was a widow of nearly his own age, Maria Catherine Christian. Born Maria Catherine Pittar, she was the daughter of Sir Thomas Pittar, a civil servant in the Board of Customs department. In 1882 she had married Richard Christian, who was a lawyer and perhaps known to George Cope from those days, but he had died aged only 41 in 1895; they had had no children.

I haven't been able to find out very much about George Cope after his marriage. I presume he continued to work as a barrister, but the Probate Registry records for him and his wife show that they were comfortably off and he may have retired from legal work. He and Maria Catherine set up house as a married couple at 2 Harley Gardens London SW10, in the district between the Brompton and Fulham Roads. They also kept the house called Darnhills, at Radlett in Hertfordshire, where Maria Catherine had lived before they had married, although on the day of the 1911 census, they were visiting Maria Catherine's in-laws from her first marriage.

Maria Catherine died in February 1921 leaving George Cope a childless widower.

In 1927 a new series of letters from George Cope to the Times began to appear, one or two a year, beginning with a set on the Oxford v Cambridge university match, hying back to the 1870s when he had been a Cambridge undergraduate. There's no evidence that he played in the Cambridge team so he must have watched, noting down the batting and bowling statistics, which he had kept ever since. In 1928 he sent in letters about the Jesus College rowing team of 1877, and in 1929 he commented on a recent article in the Times which had listed some members of that team who were now judges in the High Court. In 1929 he changed subjects from sport to politics, commenting rather dourly on the poor arithmetical sense displayed by those who had panicked when early counting in the General Election which had taken place on 30 May 1929 had showed the Labour Party in the lead. The final result was a hung parliament.

According to Emmeline Pethick-Lawrence, George Cope pursued the harmony and beauty she saw in him by writing poetry. I'm sorry to say I haven't been able to find any published poetry by him; perhaps he just showed his verses to his friends. However, in his last ever letter to the Times, he contributed his own theory as to the meaning of the enigmatic last two lines of Keats' Ode to a Grecian Urn:

Beauty is truth, truth beauty, that is all
Ye know on earth, and all ye need to know.'

I took the text of Ode from Oxford Book of English Verse, 1919 edition, edited by Arthur Quiller-Couch, which is now on the web.

The letter on Keat's Ode appeared in the Times on 29 August 1930. George Cope Cope died on 28 February 1931 and was buried at Radlett.

BASIC SOURCES I USED for all Golden Dawn members.

Membership of the Golden Dawn: The Golden Dawn Companion by R A Gilbert. Northampton: The Aquarian Press 1986. Between pages 125 and 175, Gilbert lists the names, initiation dates and addresses of all those people who became members of the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn or its many daughter Orders between 1888 and 1914. The list is based on the Golden Dawn's administrative records and its Members' Roll - the large piece of parchment on which all new members signed their name at their initiation. All this information had been inherited by Gilbert but it's now in the Freemasons' Library at the United Grand Lodge of England building on Great Queen Street Covent Garden.

Family history: freebmd; ancestry.co.uk (census and probate); findmypast.co.uk; familysearch; Burke's Peerage and Baronetage; Burke's Landed Gentry; Armorial Families; thepeerage.com; and a wide variety of family trees on the web.

Famous-people sources: mostly about men, of course, but very useful even for the female members of GD. Oxford Dictionary of National Biography. Who Was Who. Times Digital Archive.

Catalogues: British Library; Freemasons' Library.

Wikipedia; Google; Google Books - my three best resources. I also used other web pages, but with some caution, as - from the historian's point of view - they vary in quality a great deal.

Sources for George Cope Cope:

The Pinniger/Cope connection:

Website www.igp-web.com/igparchives/ire/armagh/cemeteries/loughgall.txt, part of the Ireland Genealogy Project for details of Anna Garland Cope.

London Gazette 16 Aug 1867 p4548 and Edinburgh Gazette 20 Aug 1867 p956 for the change of surname from Pinniger to Cope and also details of the descent of Georgina Pinniger from Anna Garland Cope.

Armagh, City of Light and Learning by Joe Hynes and Maureen Campbell, published 1997 by Cottage Publications of Donaghadee Northern Ireland. P38 says that the association of the Cope family with the city of Armagh goes back to Anthony Cope of Hanwell Oxfordshire who was created 1st baronet in 1611. He had bought the two manors of Derrycreevy and Drumilly, which were inherited by his sons Richard and Anthony.

Armorial Families: A Directory of Gentlemen of Coat-Armour Volume 1, published 1929, edited by Arthur C Fox-Davies. P428: George Cope Cope, born 1855; married 1906 Maria Catherine, daughter of Thomas John Pittar and widow of Richard Christian of Radlett Hertfordshire. Currently (that is, 1929) living at 2 Harley Gardens SW10.

At //henlyfamilytreeguide.com is a note of the baptism of John Alexander Mainley Pinniger, on 20 Sep 1824 in Chippenham Wiltshire; his parents are Broome Pinniger and wife Martha.

John A M Pinniger as a solicitor:

Via www.nationalarchives.gov.uk to document lists for the East Sussex Record Office and the London Metropolitan Archive. For the life of John Watkins Brett go to //atlantic-cable.com, the website of the History of the Atlantic Cable and Undersea Communications; a very detailed biography by Steven Roberts.

His involvement in a firm proposing to lay a cable from New South Wales to London: Sydney Morning Herald of 22 May 1857 p2 and 30 Oct 1857 p4.

The Spectator volume 45 1872 on p831, a group of legal notices includes one issued by J A Mainley Cope on behalf of Messrs Cope, Rose and Pearson, solicitors, of 26 St George Street Westminster.

The Economist 1874 p150, a page of legal notices has one issued by J A Mainley Cope on behalf of Messrs Cope, Rose and Pearson solicitors of 26 St George Street Westminster.

The Pinniger/Cope family's connection with the Elliots

Lettsom: His Life, Times, Friends and Descendants by James Johnston Abraham. Published London: William Heinemann Medical Books Ltd 1933. On p475 reference to a letter from George Cope Cope to the Times on 16 October 1926 in which he mentioned knowing John Lettsom Elliot very well when he was younger. John Lettsom Elliot was Hugh Elliot's grandfather. I have to say that on 9 November 2013 I looked for Cope's letter in the Times Digital Archive and couldn't find it; a bit puzzled about that.

George Cope's professional life:

Alumni Cantabrigiensis 1752-1900 Part 2 Volume 2 p132 George Cope Cope who went to Pembroke College in 1873. Born 12 July 1855 at Parkstone Dorset. Graduated with a BA 1877. Began study at the Inner Temple May 1876; called to the bar 1879. Barrister on the Surrey sessions "for some years".

Times Saturday 14 June 1879 p5c Legal Education: a list of men who had recently passed the bar exams included George Cope Cope of the Inner Temple.

Times 18 Nov 1879 p11f a list of men called to the bar (that is, qualifying to practice law) included George Cope Cope BA Cambridge, of the Inner Temple.

Men at the Bar: A Biographical Hand-List of the Members of the Various Inns of Court by Joseph Foster, published 1885. P99 has Edgar Broome Cope, called to bar January 1875 eldest son of John Alexander Mainley Cope of Drummilly (sic), Loughall. Now (1885) at the high court in Lahore. Also p99 George Cope BA Pembroke College Cambridge, called to the bar 17 November 1879, fourth son of J A M Cope; born 12 July 1855.

I only looked at one Law List: 1895 p52 in the list of Counsel (that is, barristers): George Cope Cope Inner Temple, working on the Surrey sessions and with offices at 12 King's Bench Walk.

George Cope's obituary in Times 3 March 1931 speaks also of his brother Frederick L Cope p132, also a graduate of Pembroke College. Frederick Cope was ordained a Church of England priest and held various livings in the Durham area before being sent to the Falkland Islands in 1906, dying on the islands in 1910. The Times obituary drew on Burke's Landed Gentry's Irish Supplement for its information on George Cope Cope's family: his father John Alexander M Pinniger married Georgina Cope of Drummilly county Armagh and took the surname Cope, by royal licence, on 10 August 1857. There was no mention in the obituary of George Cope's involvement with the West London Mission or of his having any knowledge of the Contagious Diseases Acts and their effects.

My Part in a Changing World by Emmeline Pethick-Lawrence though if you want to look at this book at the British Library, be aware that the BL has got her surname wrong, spelling it PethWick. Published London: Victor Gollancz 1938 pp112-113.

The lock hospital dispute:

Times 17 Aug 1897 p6, letter dated 16 Aug 1897 from George C Cope: The Health of the Army in India, though it wasn't the start of the correspondence on this subject, Cope himself was replying to a letter published in Times on 12 Aug [1897] written by someone calling himself only

Two replies both Times Sat 21 Aug 1897 p13, from Major General Richard Dashwood; and a man calling himself 'Senior', though he does describe himself as an Indian Army officer.

Cope replied to Dashwood and 'Senior'; in Times Tue 24 Aug 1897 p6. And also on that day the Times published a letter from Colonel A G Wymen querying something alleged by 'Senior' in his letter.

Another letter from Cope in Times Tue 31 Aug 1897 p8

And a reply from Dashwood, now not bothering to conceal his annoyance; published in Times Wed 1 Sep 1897 p2

The correspondence ended with a final letter from Cope published Times Tue 7 Sep 1897 p9 saying that Dashwood had ignored his two requests for details of any research that had been done on the efficiency of voluntary lock hospitals. Cope therefore concludes that no such research has been done. If any such research has been done, Dashwood and those who agree with his point of view are not aware of it.

George Cope's foray into politics:

Times Monday 10 March 1902 p14 The Vaccination Question in St Pancras: a report on the bye-election campaign in No 7 Ward, Borough of St Pancras Board of Guardians, caused by the death of Edith Gresham. George Cope of 20 Endsleigh Terrace, described as a barrister, was standing as a Liberal, with an endorsement from the South St Pancras Liberal and Radical Association. However, the Times noted that not all Liberals were that enthusiastic about him as he was making it plain he was standing on a platform of being against compulsory vaccination. He was also taking a stand against the "undue" interference by central government in local government affairs. A lot of local Liberals had said since his candidacy was agreed, that if they'd known he was against compulsory vaccination, they wouldn't have supported him as a candidate. Standing against him was Edith Mary Rendel. Some Liberals had come out as preferring a woman Poor Law Board representative, because if Cope was elected, the number of women on the Board would be reduced (the Times noted that it was already at a pretty low level). One Liberal had written to Rendel apologising that he had promised to vote for Cope when he would actually rather she won, as he believed that much Poor Law work was best carried out by women.

NB there was no further comment on the bye-election in the Times, and searching on 'George Cope' I didn't find an article on the result of the bye-election, either. However, the sources below make it clear that Rendel won it:

Report of Proceedings of the International Congress for the Welfare and Protection...of Children; held at the Guildhall (City of London) May 1906. Via googlebooks, saw the copy now in the Reese Library, University of California. A list of those who attended included "Miss E Rendel (St Pancras)".

Report of Proceedings of the National Conference on Infantile (sic) Mortality held Caxton Hall Westminster, March 1908. Miss E M "Rendell" represented St Pancras Board of Guardians at the conference.

Via its page to the University of Birmingham Research Archive. Rendel's name had come up in a PhD thesis 1991 by Kenneth H Brill, Department of Social Policy and Social Work, which referred to Rendel running a day nursery in St Pancras. I couldn't see any dates connection with this, but I think that she must have been doing it before she stood as a Poor Law Board candidate, and that it was what her reputation was based on in the bye-election.

George Cope's friend John Greenhalgh:

Saturday Review volume 97; I couldn't see the year from googlebooks' snippet. On p277 a letter from John H Greenhalgh: A Seaside Hotel for Working People.

Practical Housing published 1908 by Garden City Press. On pvii a list, not in alphabetical order, all male, all either MP's or representatives of housing groups; perhaps subscribers, or attenders at a conference? The list includes John H Greenhalgh as representative of Hampstead Tenants Ltd. On pxxi his name comes up again, again in a list, probably of committee members this time, as a secretary is named.

Town Planning Conference held in London 10-15 October 1910, its Transactions volume 1, published 1911 by the Royal Institute of British Architects. I couldn't see the page number on google's snippet but the list was very similar to that in Practical Housing and again Greenhalgh is representing Hampstead Tenants Ltd.

Margaret Macdonald:

Times Mon 18 Dec 1911 p10 The Margaret Macdonald Memorial. A report of a meeting of her friends and acquaintances, held on 13 November [1911], at which they tried to decide on a suitable memorial to her. Three ideas were considered:

Option One was a sculpture

But a lot of people at the meeting felt that a practical project would be a more fitting way to commemorate her.

Option Two was donating more money to the Baby Clinic already set up and working as a memorial to Margaret's friend Mary Middleton.

Option Three was particularly preferred by people who knew her in Leicester. They suggested raising money to pay for a new ward at Leicester Children's Hospital.

At the end of the meeting, the issue was still undecided but while everyone was still making up their minds, the Appeal had been launched. George C Cope was on the Memorial Executive Committee; his name was 6th on the list of signatures to the Appeal letter. Another member of it was T Fisher Unwin, founder of Stanley Unwin the publishing firm.

Some further information on Margaret MacDonald:

Home Industries of Women in London, Report of an Inquiry by the Investigation Committee of the Women's Industrial Council (Great Britain) 1908 and published by the Council. The authors were Margaret MacDonald and B L Hutchins.

On the Women's Industrial Council from Women's Library website at //calmarchive.londonmet.ac.uk, which begins by saying that as at 2006, no archive of the WIC's papers is known to them. The website manages a small paragraph on the WIC just the same: it was founded in 1894 and still operative in 1917. Its function was collecting data to argue for lessening women's working hours; improving their working conditions; and recruiting more inspectors for factories where they worked. Members of the WIC gave evidence to Parliamentary committees several times. Leading members of the WIC were: Clementine Black; Margaret Bondfield; Margaret MacDonald; B L Hutchins; Catherine Webb. It had a jnl: The Women's Indl News.

George Cope's father-in-law:

Re Thomas Pittar: Chemist and Druggist volume 101 1924 p123 has an obituary of Sir Thomas J Pittar KCB CMG, who had died on 20 July. He was a former chairman of the Board of Customs, having worked in that department all his career, working his way up from a clerk.

George Cope's sporting letters to the Times. There are none before 1927.

Times Friday 1 July 1927 p17 letter from George C Cope at 2 Harley Gardens SW10, referring to the Times's coverage of the recent Oxford v Cambridge university cricket match (which now had quite a long tradition behind it). Cope remembered a match in 1877 in which F M Buckland's performance was particularly notable. His reminiscences received a reply, published in Times Thursday 7 July 1927 p12 from F M Buckland's son, F E Buckland, making a small correction to Cope's figures of the 1877 match, by saying his father had been 117 not out, not 114 not out as Cope's letter had said.

Times Monday 23 July 1928 p10 letter from George C Cope, 2 Harley Gardens; with more statistics on Oxford v Cambridge university cricket.

Times Sat 29 December 1928 p4 letter from George C Cope at 2 Harley Gardens, again about the Cambridge University cricket team of the late 1870s, linking the prominence of men from Jesus College in it, to the brilliance of the College's contemporary rowing team. This got a response published in the Times on Thursday 31 January 1929 p5 from a Steve Fairbairn, who was an undergraduate at Jesus College in the early 1880s; written from the Golf Hotel, St Jean de Luz.

Times Saturday 16 March 1929 p13 letter dated 14 March [1929] from George Cope Cope at 2 Harley Gardens, referring to a recent Times article on the Boat Race; in which Times had noted the number of team members from 70 years before who were now gracing the High Court. George Cope Cope added some more names.

Times Monday 3 June 1929 p12 letter from George Cope Cope, undated but same address, in which he criticises the number of people panicking at the amount of votes the Labour Party had got in early counting. Cope says that the arithmetic of the panickers "is not apparently that taught in schools".

Times Tuesday 3 March 1931 p1 death notices include one for George Cope Cope of 2 Harley Gardens SW10. He'd died on 28 February [1931]. The only family details are that he was the 4th son of J A M Cope of Drummilly county Armagh. The funeral would be at Aldenham Church Radlett.

Probate Registry: George Cope Cope of 2 Harley Gardens Middlesex had died on 28 February 1931 at 5 Collingham Gardens Middlesex. Probate granted London 14 April 1931 to Harold Burn Hopgood, solicitor; and Arthur Vere Rolleston Woods. Personal effects: £20593/9/1.

Sources I checked for any poetry published by George Cope:

Mid-Victorian Poetry 1860-79: An Annotated Biobibliography by Catherine W Reilly p108.

Late Victorian Poetry 1880-99: An Annotated Biobibliography by Catherine W Reilly; no entry p106 for Cope.

And Oxford Companion to 20th Century Poetry in England ed Ian Hamilton. Oxford: OUP 1994 p99 the only Cope is Wendy.

His letter on Keats' Ode to a Grecian Urn appeared in the Times Fri 29 Aug 1930 p8 and was the last letter by him to appear in the paper.

--

9 November 2013

AMandragora@attglobal.net

Golden Dawn members Sidney Coryn and Herbert Coryn were brothers. Their sister-in-law Jessie Horne (Sidney's wife's sister) also joined the GD but I believe she did not stay long. I was going to put all three of them in the same file, but I had so much to say on Herbert alone that they're now in separate files.

Dr Herbert Alfred William Coryn, Sidney's elder brother, was the last of the three to become a member, being initiated in August 1893; the GD's administrative records say that he resigned, but don't give a date (I suggest one below). All three were committed theosophists.

Three years later: update September 2016. Having fixed Herbert Coryn in my mind as a convinced theosophist, I was very surprised indeed, a few weeks ago, to find his name in a list of members of a Mark Masonry lodge. I've added a short section on Herbert Coryn as a freemason.

In March 2013 I keyed 'Herbert Coryn' into google. Amongst the list of responses were two photographs of Herbert.

THE CORIN FAMILY

The Corin family came from the far west of Cornwall. There's a thorough and well laid-out family history website at //hectordavie.Ch/Corin/Corin\_L.html, which shows that the Corins ran shops and other small businesses; and that the two names 'William John' were traditional in the family. Herbert and Sidney's father grandfather William John Corin, was born in 1813 and married (in 1837) Jane Glasson, the daughter of a man who ran a shop selling groceries, china and earthenware. Herbert and Sidney's father, also William John Corin (with an 'I' at this stage) was their eldest child, born in 1838.

William John Corin born in 1838 qualified as a doctor, almost certainly by the traditional method of being apprenticed to a general practitioner. In 1860, after serving his apprenticeship, William John Corin was issued with a licence to practice by the Society of Apothecaries. In 1871 William John Corin had an apprentice of his own, but by the 1870s, university teaching, exams and letters after your name had replaced learning on the job, so that William John's eldest son qualified as a doctor in a very different way. In 1861 William

John Corin (born 1838) married Mary Jenkin, whose father is thought by the hectordavie website to have been a mine owner. They married at the baptist chapel in Redruth and had the large family typical of mid-Victorian England (actually it wasn't as large as some of that period): Ida born 1862; Herbert born 1863; Sidney born 1865; Edgar born 1866; Frances born 1868; and three other children who died as infants. I note that William John and Mary Corin did not call any of their sons 'William John'. This was not their only break with the past.

In the late 1860s William John and Mary were living at Gwennap, a village between Redruth and Penryn, and the hectordavie website suggests that William John may have worked as a doctor at his father-in-law's mine for a few years. However, by 1871 they had moved to Church Street Liskeard and William John Corin was in business as a GP in the town. On the day of the 1871 census William John and Mary's household was a large one, including an assistant doctor and the apprentice in addition to the children; and a cook and one housemaid.

The normal practice for a GP is to stay in one place, in the same practice, for life; but at some time in the 1870s (the hectordavie website says 1876) William John Corin moved his family to London, setting up in practice as a surgeon (rather than a doctor) in Brixton. And it seems to have been as part of the move to London that he changed the spelling of his surname to CorYn with a 'y', a spelling used from then on by all his children. On the day of the 1881 census the Coryns were living at 68 Acre Lane Stockwell; William John and Mary, and other members of the family, continued to live in the Brixton/Stockwell area until the 1900s. Herbert by this time was studying medicine at University College London; perhaps it was to open up new educational opportunities for their children that William John and Mary had taken the big decision to leave Cornwall. There was more work available in London, too: Ida and Sidney had left school and had both found work. Ida was a governess. The 1870 Education Act was being rolled out gradually in London so she could have been teaching in a school; but at this stage she could also have been employed by a family to teach its daughters and young sons at home, going to their house each day while still living with her parents. Sidney was a clerk in a business (no more details as to where, but possibly in the City). Edgar and Frances were still at school. William John's unmarried sister-in-law Sarah Perkins was living with them; so too was a cousin from Cornwall, Frederick Abbott, while he studied medicine; and the Coryns employed two servants, probably a cook and a general maid though their daily tasks were not specified.

I am presuming that - seeing they married in a Baptist chapel - both William John and Mary Corin were from Baptist families. However, their children Herbert, Sidney and Frances all became very active theosophists, Herbert and Frances even making theosophy their life's work. You could - people did - attempt to combine Christianity with theosophy, but the main sources of theosophical ideas are eastern. The involvement of Herbert, Sidney and Frances does argue a moving away from the old Christian certainties; which was typical of people of their generation, the generation that grew up (as it were) with Darwin.

HERBERT ALFRED WILLIAM CORYN

Herbert was licensed to practice medicine by the Society of Apothecaries in 1888 and became a member of the Royal College of Surgeons in 1889. However, it's been difficult to find out whether he ever worked as a doctor in England, as he was never registered with the General Medical Council (GMC). You didn't have to be, if all you were intending to do was go into general practice, but the GMC records have been my best source for the qualifications and working lives of the Golden Dawn's doctors. Herbert's obituary says that he worked for a few years in his father's practice in south London. I'm sure he didn't shirk his duties there but already the main thrust of his time and effort was concentrated not on medicine but on the study of theosophy. According to a talk given in 1998, Herbert had been an agnostic until he came across a copy of A P Sinnett's The Occult World (which he must only have found several years after it had been published). Reading the book caused him to undergo an almost instantaneous conversion to all that it was arguing. However, he didn't seek out Alfred Sinnett; he went straight to the top, and got an introduction to Helen Petrovna Blavatsky. He became a member of the Theosophical Society on 7 February 1889.

Herbert didn't see spirituality and medicine as occupying completely separate areas of his life. Like many other GD members, particularly its doctor-members, he had an interest in the power of the mind to affect the health of the body. The connection between morality and health is something that the 21st century finds harder to appreciate, but it was an important feature of health campaigning in the 19th. In 1886, while still an undergraduate, Herbert had attracted wider notice when his essay, The Moral and Physical Advantages of Total Abstinence, had won a prize at the National Temperance Society and been published by the Society as a pamphlet. The importance of total abstinence for physical and mental health was something he continued to believe in. In the early 1890s he wrote an article on subject specially for teetotallers in the Theosophical Society - Theosophy and the Alcohol Question - to help them argue their case against the TS's alcohol-drinking members; in Herbert's view, drinking alcohol hindered the development of the Soul.

The importance of the Theosophical Society as a recruiting ground for the Golden Dawn can't be overstated. Here I'll just say that the Coryns were some of the TS's most active members in the late 1880s and early 1890s, a period when the TS had a great influx of new members: they helped found several new lodges, they put forward their friends for membership, they wrote articles, they gave talks on theosophical philosophy, they attended conferences and Herbert got elected to committees. Sidney gave more lectures; Herbert did more writing. Sidney and Herbert were also willing - as few theosophists were willing - to take theosophy to the public at large, by giving lectures to non-theosophist audiences and writing about it in the papers (usually correcting mis-assumptions about what it was). Herbert, Frances and Sidney all joined the Theosophical Society together, in 1889 and by 1890, Herbert was being seen as one of the TS's young stars-in-the-making, being welcomed into the inner circle (of about 12 people) who were taught personally by Helena Petrovna Blavatsky. He was also a member of the TS's (rather short-lived) Esoteric Section, again something presided over by Blavatsky personally. The Esoteric Section was the only part of the TS that studied the western occult tradition. I've never found a list of its members but I'm sure that William Wynn Westcott was one of them - it was just the sort of group he would be a member of. As Westcott was one of the Golden Dawn's founders, it was only a very short walk from the one group to the other, and I think several of the TS's Esoteric Section made it. They included Percy Bullock, with whom Herbert worked on the pamphlet Egyptian Belief Theosophically Considered, published in 1893.

It was through Herbert Coryn's privileged position in the TS that the existence of what should have been a third volume of Blavatsky's The Secret Doctrine became known many years after she had died. Herbert told a friend about seeing the manuscript of it on Blavatsky's desk one day. (Not everybody in the TS was allowed to go into Blavatsky's study.) The third volume was left out of the book as published, and by the time Herbert talked of having seen the preparation work for it, the papers had already disappeared.

Another member of Blavatsky's select group - who were often referred to in the TS as her disciples - was the engineer Frederick J Dick, who came to Blavatsky's notice despite living and working in Dublin. He and Herbert struck up a friendship that lasted the rest of their lives; involved them working together as editors and producers of several theosophical journals; and culminated some time before 1920 (I can't find an exact date) in Frederick marrying Herbert's sister Frances.

In the years after Blavatsky's death in 1891, a struggle broke out for control of the Theosophical Society, between the English Annie Besant, favoured candidate of the TS's co-founder, Colonel Olcott; and the American William Quan Judge. Although other issues were involved, the debate focused on Judge's claims that since Blavatsky's death, her Mahatmas had started communicating with him; claims that offended the many TS members. The TS split in two: the TS's worldwide headquarters in England supported Besant and attempted to impose sanctions on Judge; but the American TS declared itself independent, and most lodges in Europe tended to favour Judge. In England, very many individual members resigned as the dispute raged, and most never returned; a lot of the lodges founded in the early 1890s - the period of TS's greatest expansion - shut down for lack of members.

The reason I've given these details of the power struggle in the TS is that the Coryn family all supported Judge. Though Frances didn't take any active part in the increasingly bitter debate, Sidney and Herbert were vocal champions of Judge's rights to communicate with Blavatsky's Mahatmas and to continue in his posts (to which he had been elected) in the TS in the USA and Europe. They criticised publically (that is, publically within theosophy) the attitude towards him taken by the TS worldwide's hierarchy. Herbert and B Keightley (A Keightley's brother, I think) wrote to the TS worldwide's magazine Lucifer making out Judge's case and demanding that their letters be published in full; I imagine Herbert was annoyed to find the editor, G R S Mead, refusing to do this or make a response in Lucifer, preferring to answer their criticisms in The Vahan, the TS European Section's in-house magazine which was of course much less widely-read.

Herbert, Frances and Sidney all resigned from the TS worldwide in 1895 over its handling of the Judge affair, though Frances seems to have had second thoughts, and rejoined, a few years later. I can think of several reasons why they might have decided that they didn't want to be members any longer: but the one that seems to have mattered most to Herbert was the way the dispute exposed the inability of theosophists to rise above their all-too-human failings to seek out common ground. The divisions in theosophy went right to the top: according to Alice Leighton Cleather, she herself, Herbert, and Dr Archibald Keightley were "a minority of three" amongst Blavatsky's old inner group who "declined to follow Mrs Besant's lead" (though Keightley, in the end, decided not to resign). I presume some of Herbert's friendships came to an end over it all and I suggest that he decided to have nothing further to do with the Golden Dawn when he discovered that William Wynn Westcott was amongst senior members of the TS in England who condemned Judge's claims and actions.

Herbert and Sidney were still members of the TS's European Section at least up until its tumultuous annual conference of July 1895, when Judge was called upon to make his case to its members which of course included the TS worldwide hierarchy. Herbert was re-elected to the TS European Section's governing committee; and so was William Wynn Westcott; but newly elected members included some of Mrs Besant's strongest supporters so the odds at the end of the conference were stacked against Judge. Judge's supporters did force the TS worldwide to elect a committee to look at the need for changes to its constitution, and Herbert was elected to that; but I can't find, from Lucifer or any other theosophical magazine, any evidence of revisions to the existing constitution; and over the next year or so Herbert must gradually have realised that Mrs Besant and her supporters had no desire to make any changes.

Earlier in 1895, theosophical lodges in the United States, formerly part of TS worldwide and ruled from London, had held a conference of their own and had shown where their loyalties lay by voting to split from the TS worldwide under Judge's leadership. Judge died in 1896 but the split in the TS was not healed. Instead, a new player rose to prominence in the USA, Katherine Tingley. In 1896 she led a group of American theosophists on a world lecture tour, spreading the word of theosophy as universal brotherhood, and asking for money to set up a theosophical community on land she and her backers were negotiating to buy at Point Loma, just outside San Diego in California. Herbert Coryn attended two public meetings during the part of Tingley's tour that covered England - one in Liverpool and one in London where he gave a farewell address to the group. Although I haven't been able to find any information on how the tour was organised, I'm fairly sure Herbert Coryn was actively involved in the arrangements.

Universal brotherhood was what Herbert Coryn had wanted and expected from theosophy. I think that during the next couple of years he waited - probably anxiously - to see whether it would establish itself in England. He also found a possible alternative.

FREEMASONRY

I first came across Herbert Coryn as a freemason while I was researching GD member Webster Glynes. It's very clear from my researches that very few theosophists were freemasons; and vice versa. I had not expected to find Coryn in an 1898 list of current members of Bon Accord Mark Masonry Lodge; not only Coryn, but also his friends in theosophy Archibald Keightley and Basil Crump. You cannot be a Mark Mason unless you already are a member of a craft lodge; all three of them were noted down as members of craft lodge 452.

Craft lodge 452 was the Frederick Lodge of Unity, founded in 1838 and based at Croydon's freemasons' hall at 105 High Street. A list of members from 1883 didn't have Herbert Coryn or his friends in it. It did have in it two men who subsequently joined the GD - Webster Glynes, who was one of the earliest members (1888); and Harold John Levett, who was initiated in 1895. 1883 is much too early for Herbert Coryn and his friends and I haven't found any later publications from Frederick Lodge of Unity 452 to confirm the date they joined it. However, I think that they never thought of freemasonry as an option until the schism in world theosophy, and so were initiated as freemasons between 1895 and 1897, perhaps on the recommendation of Glynes or Levett; though Herbert Coryn at least had plenty of friends in Croydon, almost certainly including other members of 452.

In the mid to late-1890s two men linked Frederick Lodge of Unity 452 and Bon Accord Mark Masonry Lodge, as long-serving members of both: Charles M Ohren of Lower Sydenham, one of two brothers very active in south London freemasonry at the time; and Webster Glynes, who may have resigned from Bon Accord at around the time that Herbert Coryn joined it. Bon Accord lodge prided itself on its status as the first Mark Masonry lodge in England, founded in 1851. It met in the West End, at the Criterion Restaurant in Piccadilly; but in the 1890s its members tended to be City businessmen, including Glynnes who was a solicitor with offices near the Tower of London. There's no doubt about when Herbert Coryn joined this lodge: a lodge history has him and Archibald Keightley being 'advanced' as new members in December 1897. It's not clear when Basil Crump was 'advanced', but his name too is on a list of lodge members as at September 1898.

AMERICA

Even while they were preparing to become Mark Master masons in Bon Accord lodge, it must have been obvious to Herbert Coryn, Archibald Keightley and Basil Crump that Universal Brotherhood was not taking root in England. Early in 1898 what I think was a decisive event for all three of them occurred in the USA: Katherine Tingley was elected leader-for-life of the TS in the United States, and a new constitution was adopted which put universal brotherhood at the centre of theosophical life there. Very soon after this, the TS's European Section held its annual conference in London. Herbert Coryn had stayed as a member of the European Section despite all the trouble, and he was in a position of some influence there. As chairman of the committee which had prepared the list of conference resolutions, he master-minded the adoption by the TS European Section of the constitution just agreed in the USA. It included statement that William Quan Judge and Katherine Tingley - not Colonel Olcott and Mrs Besant - were Blavatsky's true heirs in theosophy. A few months later - having burned his theosophical boats in London - Herbert Coryn emigrated to the United States. Keightley and Crump made the same choice.

Herbert Coryn landed at New York in July 1898. His name had gone before him, courtesy of his friend Basil Crump and his article 'Mind as a Disease Producer', which had been published in the English journal National Review in February 1898. In this article, Herbert put the same arguments that had appeared in his earlier TS pamphlet 'Theosophy and the Alcohol Question'; this time, though, they were aimed at a wider audience. His emphasis on the connection between states of mind and illness in the liver and heart caught the attention of some American newspapers. It became Herbert's most widely-known piece of writing, being reviewed in a variety of medical and other journals in America and Britain.

Herbert had gone to the USA to take up a new appointment, as physician-in-chief to the TS's International Brotherhood League, based at the American TS's headquarters at 144 Madison Avenue, New York City. However, he'd only been there a month or two when he was called upon to lead a charitable effort in time of war. War had been declared between the USA and Cuba and Katherine Tingley was leading a voluntary effort by TS members to give medical care and other aid to the US troops at Camp Wikoff, where there was an outbreak of fever. She needed doctors. Herbert was immediately put in charge of all the TS efforts in Cuba. While the volunteers were preparing to leave, he gave them lessons in first aid. When they arrived at Camp Wikoff, Herbert, Mrs Tingley and the volunteers set up a field hospital, and then Herbert did the diagnoses and prescribing while the other volunteers did the nursing and orderly-work. With only 60 beds the TS hospital was soon over-run. Mrs Tingley organised the raising of enough money to charter a ship to take as many cases as could travel, back to the US mainland for treatment there; but the field hospital continued in operation for several months.

In 1900 the American TS moved its headquarters from New York to Point Loma. Herbert was offered a job as resident doctor there. He spent the rest of his life at Point Loma and became a US citizen in 1911.

As well as his work as a general practitioner at Point Loma, Herbert probably was also employed at the hotel-cum-sanatorium founded by Dr Lorin Wood, another member of the community's medical staff. There will have been other demands on Herbert's time as well: as was typical of this kind of planned community, manual labour was seen as a philosophical discipline and everybody was expected to do some on a daily basis; time spent doing physical work was even in the time-table of Point Loma's school. Although Point Loma had never been intended to be completely self-sufficient, the community had a farm and orchards and also kept bees. Point Loma residents did their own plumbing and carpentry, baking and pottery-making; they sold pottery, batik cloth and school uniforms, and ran printing and photography businesses. Besides the Raja Yoga school there was a music school (the Isis Conservatory) and a school of antiquities. Golden Dawn member William A Dunn arrived at Point Loma in 1902 and in 1904 became head of the Isis Conservatory. Frederick J Dick and his first wife Annie reached Point Loma in 1905; Frederick became a teacher at the school of antiquities.

The Point Loma community produced two magazines. The more widely-distributed was the Theosophical Path, to which Herbert sometimes contributed; for example in 1918, with an article he called Evolution and Involution: A Study in Biology. He also edited The New Way, which Katherine Tingley founded in 1911 to bring the message of universal brotherhood to prisons and hospitals.

Life at Point Loma wasn't all work. It had a theatre; in 1923, Herbert played Socrates in a pageant-cum-symposium put on there.

Herbert also played his part in the defence of theosophy against attacks from outside. In 1901, opposition to the Point Loma community amongst Christian ministers working in the San Diego area was stirred up by an evening of talks given by Colonel Olcott. In August 1901, most of them (the Unitarian minister refused to join them) signed a letter to the local paper making complaints about the Point Loma community. The theosophists challenged the Christian ministers to debate the matter in public, and Herbert was chosen by Point Loma's governing council to be one of those who spoke for them. The debates went on for several weeks and attracted so much local interest that the Fisher Opera House was hired for to stage them. I don't know what the outcome of all this debate was; probably nobody changed their minds. And despite some people in San Diego regarding their theosophist neighbours with alarm, Point Loma's residents were not shunned by the town: two sources I looked at said that Herbert Coryn became a freemason, belonging to a lodge in San Diego.

In due course (I can't find an exact date) Herbert became a member of the committee that ran Point Loma. By the 1920s, the number of theosophists who had known Blavatsky personally was rapidly decreasing and Herbert, Frederick Dick and Frances (now Mrs Dick and also living at Point Loma) had a kind-of mystique about them amongst the other residents.

Herbert Coryn died on 7 November 1927, at the Burlingame Hospital in San Diego, of complications following a bout of pneumonia. He had never married. At his funeral a poem in his praise was read out. It had been composed by Kenneth Vennor Morris, the Welsh poet and fantasy writer, who had arrived at Point Loma in 1908. Kenneth and his brother Ronald had known Herbert in south London in the 1890s, when they had all been members of the TS. Ronald (but not Kenneth) had become a member of the Golden Dawn.

FRANCES CORYN AFTER 1895

As I mentioned above, Frances Coryn reassessed her decision to resign from the TS worldwide and by 1906 she was not only a member again but working at its headquarters at 19 Avenue Road St John's Wood, as "Assistant Superintendent" (I'm inclined to think this was a voluntary, not a paid, post). In June 1906, she made a trip to the USA; I presume this was to visit her brothers, so that she will have spent time at Point Loma. She must have been impressed by life there, because some years later (I haven't been able to find out exactly when) she moved there for good. By 1920 she had married Frederick J Dick. Frederick Dick died in 1927. I think Frances Dick was still living at Point Loma when Herbert Coryn died in 1928; but I don't know what happened to her after that.

--

BASIC SOURCES I USED for all Golden Dawn members.

Membership of the Golden Dawn: The Golden Dawn Companion by R A Gilbert. Northampton: The Aquarian Press 1986. Between pages 125 and 175, Gilbert lists the names, initiation dates and addresses of all those people who became members of the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn or its many daughter Orders between 1888 and 1914. The list is based on the Golden Dawn's administrative records and its Members' Roll - the large piece of parchment on which all new members signed their name at their initiation. All this information had been inherited by Gilbert but it's now in the Freemasons' Library at the United Grand Lodge of England building on Great Queen Street Covent Garden. Please note, though, that the records of the Amen-Ra Temple in Edinburgh were destroyed in 1900/01. As far as I know, the records of the Horus Temple at Bradford have not survived either.

Family history: freebmd; ancestry.co.uk (census and probate); findmypast.co.uk; familysearch; Burke's Peerage and Baronetage; Burke's Landed Gentry; Armorial Families; thepeerage.com; and a wide variety of family trees on the web.

Famous-people sources: mostly about men, of course, but very useful even for the female members of GD. Oxford Dictionary of National Biography. Who Was Who. Times Digital Archive.

Catalogues: British Library; Freemasons' Library.

Wikipedia; Google; Google Books - my three best resources. I also used other web pages, but with some caution, as - from the historian's point of view - they vary in quality a great deal.

--

SOURCES FOR THE CORYN BROTHERS AND JESSIE HORNE

CORYN brothers: HERBERT and SIDNEY

//hectordavie.Ch/Corin/Corin\_L.html gives a history of the Corin family, which originated in Cornwall. The spelling CorYn seems to have applied to their father only, and only when he moved from Cornwall to London. This website has a good lay-out of the family tree, very easy to follow. Forenames 'William John' occur very often in the family. Herbert's grandfather also had the names William John; he was born in 1813 died in 1895 in Lambeth, presumably living with his son and grandchildren. In October 1837 he had married Jane Glasson from Hayle, whose father was a grocer and dealer in china and earthenware. They had at least 6 children. Herbert, Frances and Sidney's father William John CorIn later CorYn, is their eldest, born 1838.

WILLIAM JOHN CORIN/CORYN as a GP/SURGEON

General Medical Council registers have his name in them only twice, only in Cornwall, and only as CorIn. The first time was 1867: address Rosehill, Gwennap, Cornwall; MRCS 1860; Licensed by the Society of Apothecaries 5 December 1860. The second time was in 1871 still at the Gwennap address. Herbert Coryn was never registered with the GMC though (see below) he was registered in the USA.

The herbertdavie website says that William John Corin/Coryn had moved to London by 1876; and that while living in Cornwall he had been active in local politics, as a Liberal Party member.

HERBERT AS A DOCTOR

Medical Times and Gazette volume 2 1882 p168 snippet showing Herbert at Charing Cross Hospital. I presume he was doing part of his training there.

Documents of the Senate of the State of New York volume 13 1901 p110 Herbert in a list of registered physicians.

Directory of Physicians and Surgeons...Holding Certificates Issued under the Medical Practice Acts of the State of California issue of 1926 p204 Herbert as MRCS 1889 and Licensed by the Society of Apothecaries 1888.

HERBERT EMIGRATES TO THE USA:

From www.findmypast's outgoing passenger lists: Dr H Coryn travelled to New York from London on the Wilson-Hill Line's Victoria, setting out on 29 June 1898.

OBITUARY in Point Loma's magazine:

The Theosophical Path volume XXXIV January-June 1928. Published Point Loma California: New Century Corporation. Pp87-89 with a photograph and the full text of Kenneth Vennor Morris' memorial poem.

KENNETH MORRIS IS RONALD VENNOR MORRIS' BROTHER:

Lloyd Alexander, Evangeline Walton Ensley and Kenneth Morris: A Primary and Secondary Bibliography by Kenneth J Zahorski, Robert H Boyer. In the Masters of Science Fiction and Fantasy series. Boston Massachusetts: G K Hall and Co 1981. P163 Kenneth Vennor Morris was a teacher at Point Loma's Raja Yoga College. P169 he had arrived at Point Loma in 1908; and p175 left it to return to Wales in January 1930.

HERBERT'S EDITING WORK ON THEOSOPHICAL JOURNALS

All the journals seem to have been rather short-lived affairs; and several times two probably ailing publications amalgamated and chose a new name. I've put together this list from details in the British Library catalogue and via google:

1 = The Irish Theosophist. BL has volume 1 number 1 to volume 5 number 12: 1892-97.

2 = Theosophic Isis. Only two volumes of this were ever published, in 1896 and 1897, and it seems to have been the idea and work of Herbert and Sidney Coryn. Although predominantly a theosophical magazine it also had articles by and about Golden Dawn members. At www.austheos.org, the website of the Theosophical Society Australia there are useful lists of articles published in theosophical magazines back to the 1880s, with their authors' names if known, and some attempts to identify authors using a writing name or just initials. I got the list below from the austheos site:

|           |      |  |
|-----------|------|--|
| Volume 1  | 1896 | January Introductory editorial, by HerbertArticle by GD founder Samuel Liddell Mathers   |
| April     |      | Obituary of William Quan Judge, by SidneyKeep open the door, by HerbertOn the study of The Secret Doctrine, by Herbert   |
| May       |      | Finding the Self Part I, by Herbert  |
| July      |      | The Light of a new day, by Herbert; which I think must be Finding the Self   |
| Part II   |      |  |
| September |      | Finding the Self Part III, by Herbert  |
| November  |      | Occultism in Medicine Part I, by Herbert   |
| December  |      | Occultism in Medicine Part II, by Herbert  |
| Volume 2  | 1897 | January Occultism in Medicine Part III, by HerbertOur opportunity, by SidneySome Persian Hymns, by F Coryn who I presume is FrancesReview by 'P' of SSDD's Egyptian Magic. |

SSDD is the short form of the GD motto of Florence Farr.

3 = The Grail. BL has volume 1 numbers 1-5: all 1897. Numbers 1-3 were edited by Herbert; 4 and 5 were edited by Basil Crump.

4 = The Internationalist which the BL describes as an amalgamation of the earlier journals the Irish Theosophist and The Grail. BL has volume 1 numbers 1-6: 1897-98. The editors of all six issues are Herbert; and G W Russell, the poet AE.

5 = The Crusader. A Supplement to 'Ourselves'. This may not be a journal in itself, but a special issue of the journal The People's Theosophic Monthly issued in 1897. I think Herbert was the editor of this magazine issue but when I requested it at the British Library (March 2013) it didn't appear so I suppose it has been lost. 'Crusaders' was what Katherine Tingley and her 1896 group called themselves on their world tour; so I suppose the magazine was written to support her work. But of course, I haven't seen it so that's just a guess.

6 = The International Theosophist. BL has volume 1 number 1 to volume 6 number 9: 1898-

1904. The editors were Herbert, and Frederick J Dick.

7 = International Theosophical Journal Devoted to the Brotherhood of Humanity. 1905. Herbert as co-editor with his brother Sidney, who by this time was also living in California.

SOME WORKS BY HERBERT IN Theosophical Siftings, which were collections of pamphlets, talks etc on theosophical themes already published elsewhere. Published: Theosophical Publishing Society, Adelphi, London.

Theosophical Siftings volumes 1-2 1888-90. There's one work by Herbert in these volumes, one of two items originally published in the same pamphlet: Universal Brotherhood by Alexander Fullerton, originally read to a TS meeting in New York; The Scientific Basis of Occultism by Herbert Coryn.

Theosophical Siftings volumes 5-7 1892-95 has several works by Herbert:

1 = What is Prana?

2 = An Hour in Borderland Occultism. Originally published as pamphlet by the Theosophical Publishing Society in 1894. 'Borderland' was a spiritualist/theosophical magazine edited by W T Stead.

3 = Theosophy and the Alcohol Question. In which Herbert puts the argument that consciousness is inevitably influenced by "bodily states". He sees p2 alcohol as a "narcotic to every vital function". It's never a stimulant and it shouldn't ever be called one. On p11 he ends by stating that consuming alcohol hinders the growth of the Soul.

4 = Devachan also known as 'Heavenworld' (the English translation of the Sanskrit word); originally published in Lucifer volume XV:

ARTICLES BY HERBERT CORYN IN LUCIFER, the magazine of TS worldwide

Lucifer: A Theosophical Magazine volume X March-August 1892, editor Annie Besant. In Volume X number 55 issue of 15 March 1892 pp35-42 article by Herbert Coryn as FTS and MRCS: The Eternal Cell. Herbert argued that understanding The Secret Doctrine was easier if you had some knowledge of current theories of Biology, which - he said - "get constantly nearer the teachings of Occultism". He gave a quick survey of current methods of species classification. A nice example of how Herbert saw the physical body he was trained to heal, and theosophy, as linked.

Lucifer: A Theosophical Magazine Volume XI number 63 issued 15 November 1892 pp243-45 an article by Herbert: The Light of Haeckelianism, in which he discussed the esoteric works of Professor Ernst Haeckel, normally a biologist but also a writer on Monism.

Lucifer: A Theosophical Magazine Volume XV September 1894-February 1895 joint editors Annie Besant and G R S Mead. Herbert Coryn's series Heavenworld (an English translation of the Sanskrit word Devachan) appeared in this volume in three parts:

Part I in volume XV number 87 issued 15 November 1894 pp230-41 Heavenworld - an introduction to Herbert's ideas.

Part II in volume XV number 88 issued 15 December 1894 pp291-96 Heavenworld - what happened to the ego and soul after death.

Part III in volume XV number 89 issued 15 January 1895 pp365-71 Heavenworld as not so much a place, more a state of being without suffering.

'Heavenworld' was the last article Herbert had published in Lucifer.

THEOSOPHICAL PAMPHLETS AND ARTICLES

Universal Brotherhood by Alexander Fullerton and Herbert Coryn. Pamphlet published 1889. Later published in Theosophical Siftings volumes 1-2 see above.

Man, His Origin and Evolution 189[?] by Herbert Coryn and George Spencer.

Egyptian Belief Theosophically Considered by P W Bullock and Herbert Coryn 1893.

Devachan, or The Heavenworld: the series originally published in three parts in Lucifer now issued together as a pamphlet. The pamphlet version was also included in Theosophical Siftings volumes 5-7.

Two articles in Universal Brotherhood, the new name chosen for the magazine previously published as Theosophy. It was published at Point Loma and edited by Katherine Tingley. A full text of Universal Brotherhood volume 13 numbers 7-12 is on the web at www.scribd.com but when I tried to read it, I kept getting interrupted by adverts.

1 = Volume 12 number 8 issue of November 1897: Mind and Ego

2 = Volume 13 number 6 issue of September 1898: Then and Now

The New Century volume 2 issue of 6 June 1899 article by Herbert: The Cuban Colony.

Mislaid Mysteries paper read by Herbert Coryn at the Fisher Opera House San Diego on 24 August 1901; copy now in the Harry Houdini Collection, US Library of Congress. Mislaid Mysteries was still being used by the TS in the late 1920s: in the magazine The Theosophical Path January-June 1927 p103 there's a list of pamphlets introducing theosophy, called as a group The Path. Number 3 of the group is Herbert's Mislaid Mysteries.

Contributions by Herbert to The Theosophical Path, published at Point Loma:

- * volume January 1917-February 1918 p148 article by Herbert: Evolution and Involution: A Study in Biology
- * volume January-June 1924 p93 article by Herbert: New Religious Conceptions, the Need of the Age; originally a speech delivered on 2 Dec 192[?] at Point Loma.

AN ARTICLE PUBLISHED POSTHUMOUSLY FROM NOTES TAKEN BY HERBERT

At www.theosophy-nw.org an article: Rebirth of the Mysteries by W T S Thackara. At the bottom is a link to another article, The Teacher and Disciple of Old, with Herbert Coryn listed as the author though it's clear from elsewhere in the text that the words are NOT his, he was merely writing down what was being said by Katherine Tingley, in July 1902. The notes were not published until after both Herbert and Katherine Tingley were dead. It was included in Lucifer: the Light-Bringer a volume celebrating the life of Helena Petrovna Blavatsky published at Point Loma May-June 1931: pp130-31.

HERBERT'S PUBLICATIONS ON MEDICAL MATTERS

The Moral and Physical Advantages of Total Abstinence, the prize-winning essay. Published by the National Temperance Society, 1886.

Herbert's article in the National Review February 1898: Mind as a Disease Producer. The National Review ran from 1883 to 1950 and was published in London by W Allen. The publishers regularly put adverts in the Times for the next edition, with lists of the articles it would contain, so Herbert's article got a mention in the Times of 1 February 1898 p6: forthcoming publications, with the shortened title 'Mind and Disease'. The article was referred to in a number of periodicals including Review of Reviews and the World's Work volume 17 1898 p380; Journal of Practical Medicine volume 10 p490; Practical Druggist and Pharmaceutical Review of Reviews volumes 5-8 1900; and in The Speaker volume 17 1898 p176 where the reviewer remarked "the medical men are becoming our moralists". It was mentioned in several US newspapers and in the American magazine American Monthly Review of Reviews volume 17 1898. Herbert's assertion that the liver and the heart were affected by states of mind was quoted in almost all of the publications I've listed.

HOW HERBERT CORYN DISCOVERED THEOSOPHY

At www.theosophy-nw.org I found an article: Rebirth of the Mysteries by W T S Thackara, originally a talk given at the Theosophical Library Center on 7 November 1997, then published in Sunrise magazine: published Theosophical Press April/May 1998. In the talk, Thackara said that Herbert Coryn had been "an agnostic" until coming across a copy of The Occult World. Unfortunately Thackara doesn't give any clue as to his sources for this very personal account of Herbert's discovery of theosophy.

BL catalogue:

The Occult World is NOT by HPB, it's by Alfred Percy Sinnett. First ed London: Trübner and Co 1881. 3rd ed 1883.

THE CORYN FAMILY AS ACTIVE MEMBERS OF THE THEOSOPHICAL SOCIETY OF UK; until they sided with Judge in 1894-95. Members' payment of the yearly subscription only began to be noted down in the Registers in 1891.

Theosophical Society Membership Register January 1889-September 1891 3 applications for membership on p 100:

1 = Frances Jane Coryn of 159 Acre Lane Brixton. Application dated 16 March 1889. Member of the TS's Brixton lodge. Subscriptions paid 1892-95.

2 = Herbert Coryn, also of 159 Acre Lane Brixton. No date of application, so I've assumed he applied on the same day as Frances. Member of TS's Brixton Lodge. President of the Philalethean Lodge. Subscriptions paid 1892-95. Handwritten note: "W Q Judge".

3 = Sidney G P Coryn of 21 Sudborne Road Acre Lane Brixton. No date of application but I'm assuming it was the same day as Frances and Herbert. Member of TS's Croydon Lodge. Subscriptions paid 1891-95. First address crossed out and substituted with Lawn House, Ramsden Head Billericay. Handwritten note: "Judge".

Once they were members Frances, Herbert and Sidney sponsored the membership applications of a very large number of new TS members, many of whom went on to be initiated into the Golden Dawn; but all those details will be in my file on the TS and the GD.

The Theosophical Congress held by the TS at the Parliament of Religions which was part of the World's Fair held in Chicago Illinois on 15-17 September [1893]. Report of Proceedings and Documents. Published TS American Section headquarters, 144 Madison Avenue New York 1893. On p10 there's a list of TS members who were in the Congress' advisory council. They include Sidney Coryn; and Herbert Coryn, both in the group of members in the TS in England. It's not clear from the text of the Report whether the members of the advisory council actually attended the Parliament of Religions, or just advised on suitable subjects for lectures and debates. Neither Herbert nor Sidney is mentioned in the Report's account of the speeches; so I guess that neither of them spoke at the event, if they did attend it.

HELENA PETROVNA BLAVATSKY'S INNER CIRCLE

At www.newworldencyclopedia.org, section on Helena Petrovna Blavatsky. Blavatsky created her Inner Circle in August 1890. The names of the Inner Circle are given as: Constance Wachtmeister; Isabel Cooper-Oakley; Emily Kislingbury; Laura Cooper; Annie Besant; Alice Cleather; Archibald Keightley; Herbert Coryn; Claude Wright; G R S Mead; E T Sturdy; and Walter Old. The website's footnote 8 gives the source of the names as Theosophy and Mysticism for Joyceans by Jorn Barger seen on the web April 2001. Obviously, Barger's work is not the ultimate source for these names and I note that Frederick J Dick is not amongst the names he gives.

The Secret Doctrine volume 1 in the edition edited by Boris de Zirkoff and published 1993. De Zirkoff's Historical Introduction pp70-71 describes Herbert as "a personal pupil of H.P.B. in the London days". This is the source for the existence of a putative third volume of The Secret Doctrine; seen by Herbert around the time Blavatsky was working on the book. Later, at Point Loma, Herbert mentioned the third volume to Point Loma resident Geoffrey A Baborka (for Baborka, see Greenwalt below).

HERBERT AS THEOSOPHICAL ACTIVIST, SHOWN IN LUCIFER

Lucifer: A Theosophical Magazine Volume IV March-August 1889, edited by Helena Petrovna Blavatsky. Published by Theosophical Publishing Society at 7 Duke St Adelphi. In Volume IV issue of 15 April 1889 p240 Herbert Coryn writing in as Secretary of the TS's Lecturing Staff, calling for TS members to help this work in one of 2 ways. Firstly by letting him know of literary and debating societies that might want a talk or debate about theosophy; and secondly by volunteering to give such talks or get involved in such debates. He was trying to compile a list of willing speakers. Volume IV issue of 15 June 1889 p284 a second such request from Herbert Coryn, which reads as though he'd had very few responses to his first request. He was urging people to get in touch soon, so that he could have a list of speakers ready for the autumn lecture and evening-class season.

Lucifer: A Theosophical Magazine Volume VII September 1890 to February 1891, edited by Blavatsky and Annie Besant. London: Theosophical Publishing Society. In Volume VII issue of 15 September 1890 p81 Herbert mentions a series of letters in the Midland Evening News in August and September 1890 in which he'd crossed swords with a Mr McIlwraith, author of Theosophy Critically Examined. In Volume VII issue of 15 November 1890 p256 Herbert asked readers of Lucifer to scrutinise the newspapers for coverage of theosophy and send him any articles they found, at 153 Acre Lane Brixton. This idea, of challenging misrepresentation of theosophy in the press, and of writing articles introducing theosophy to the newspaper-reading public, was later taken up by TS member Agnes, Baroness de Pallandt, who also became a member of the Golden Dawn. In Vol VII issue of 15 December 1890: on p332 in the news section, a list of TS libraries includes the Philalethean Library, run by Herbert Coryn at 153 Acre Lane.

Lucifer: A Theosophical Magazine Volume XI September 1892- February 1893, sole editor Annie Besant. Published London: Theosophical Publishing Society. On p80 in the news section, there would be a series of talks by Annie Besant, James Pryse and Herbert Coryn at the Peckham and Dulwich Radical Club, at Rye Lane; part of the TS's efforts to reach more working-class people.

Lucifer: A Theosophical Magazine Volume XIV covers March-August 1894; edited by Annie Besant. Volume XIV number 82 issued 15 June 1894 p 347 news section; on 30 May [1894] S G P Coryn gave a lecture on theosophy at a meeting at Streatham high school; Herbert chaired the meeting and the hall was "quite full". On p521 list of officers elected at TS worldwide's Convention (held 12-13 July 1894 in London) to serve on the TS European Section for the coming year: General Secretary - G R S Mead; Treasurer - O F S Cuffe; H Coryn MRCS was elected to its ruling committee.

HERBERT AND THE DISPUTE ABOUT THE STATUS OF WILLIAM QUAN JUDGE

Lucifer: A Theosophical Magazine Vol XV covers September 1894-February 1895 joint editors Annie Besant and G R S Mead. This volume is dominated by the Judge dispute and can be seen as the mouthpiece of the supporters of Besant and Olcott at TS worldwide. As part of the coverage of the reactions of TS member lodges to the Judge affair, on p341 a response from Herbert Coryn as president of Brixton Lodge, written 30 November 1894, arguing that there was NOT a case against Judge, despite the articles that had appeared in the Westminster Gazette in November as Isis Very Much Unveiled. The refusal of G R S Mead to address in Lucifer the issues raised by Herbert and B Keightley in their letters is on p434. Beginning on p459 issue of 15 Feb 1895 there was a long article by Annie Besant saying that she'd drawn up a statement of the position of the TS hierarchy on the Judge question: which was that they were against the claims he was making. Colonel Olcott, A P Sinnett and William Wynn Westcott had all signed the statement.

Just to make clear why it is the TS European Section that is the focus of the struggle between Annie Besant and W Q Judge: Judge had only recently been elected president-for-life of the TS European section, giving him an excellent power base in theosophy in addition to his American home.

Lucifer: A Theosophical Magazine volume XVI March-August 1895; editors Annie Besant and G R S Mead and again dominated by the Judge dispute. Volume XVI number 92 issue of 15 March 1895 p79 uncredited report noting that both Brixton and Croydon lodges had issued statements supporting Judge's position. (Herbert Coryn is president of Brixton Lodge and Sidney Coryn is president of Croydon Lodge.) Volume XVI number 94 issue of 15 June 1895 p270 uncredited item almost certainly by Annie Besant, saying that "two or three London and suburban lodges" were "bitterly hostile to me" and that Croydon Lodge was no longer letting its members know of forthcoming events at TS headquarters. Volume XVI number 95 issue of 15 July 1895 p358 report on what had happened at the 5th annual convention of TS's European Section on 4 July [1895] at the Portman Rooms Baker St. In the midst of very noisy debate, elections to the TS European Section's official posts for the coming year did go ahead: William Wynn Westcott was re-elected to its executive committee and A P Sinnett and G R S Mead were elected to it for the first time - known supporters of Annie Besant and Colonel Olcott. On p360 TS worldwide agrees to set up a committee to consider possible changes to the constitution.

KATHERINE TINGLEY'S 1896 TOUR OF BRITAIN

At www.scribd.com, Theosophy volume XI number 2 May-Dec 1896 pp130-31 gives an account of the short tour of England taken by Mrs Tingley's Crusaders' group in the summer of 1896. The group arrived from New York on 21 June 1896 and spent three weeks in Britain. Their first public meeting was organised by members of Liverpool TS lodge and took place on the evening of Tuesday 23 June 1896; Archibald Keightley and Herbert Coryn travelled from London to take part in it. The Crusaders spent a couple of days in Bradford and then returned to London. On Friday 3 July 1896 there was another public meeting for them, at Queen's Hall Regent Street. Herbert Coryn delivered a farewell address to the Crusaders during the meeting. The Crusaders then went on a tour of other English cities and Scotland before going on to Europe.

FLIRTATION WITH FREEMASONRY

By-Laws of the Frederick Lodge of Unity 452 printed Jeffrey of Tufton Street Croydon 1883. Inside the leaflet, a pull-out page lists the lodge's current members. There's a very short history of the lodge.

BON ACCORD MARK MASONS LODGE

By-laws of the Regulation of the London "Bon Accord" Mark Masons Lodge which NB has no number. 2nd edition London: 1898. Just noting that in the list of members as at September 1898, Herbert Coryn's craft lodge is numbered '453'. I'm sure this is just a type-setting error: Keightley and Crump are listed as of 452 and 452 is one of the lodges nearest to where the Coryn family lived.

HERBERT AND POINT LOMA

A hostile account of Katherine Tingley from Alice Leighton Cleather, who supported Tingley in the late 1890s but then fell out with her and left the TS. Found at //blavatskyarchives.com where it had been put together from two memoirs written by Cleather:

H P Blavatsky: Her Life and Work for Humanity published 1922 pp121-124 and H P Blavatsky as I Knew Her published 1923 p30.

Cleather accuses Tingley of being a manipulative and power-mad opportunist with virtually no knowledge of theosophy, using the work and deep understanding of theosophy of people like Herbert Coryn to achieve a reputation for wisdom that she did not deserve. So there!

My account of life at Point Loma is based on three modern works:

The Point Loma Community in California 1897-1942: A Theosophical Experiment. By Emmett A Greenwalt 1955: Berkeley and Los Angeles: University of California Press. The book uses contemporary records from the Point Loma community, the local papers; accounts by people who had lived at Point Loma; and local government sources.

On p144 Geoffrey A Baborka (to whom Herbert told the tale of the supposed third volume of The Secret Doctrine) is described as "a scholar mechanic" living at Point Loma and working for its publishing business; he got the printing press to do Sanskrit linotype. Baborka was an author as well: he wrote Gods and Heroes of the Bhagavad Gita.

The Dawn of the New Cycle: Point Loma Theosophists and American Culture. Knoxville: University of Tennessee Press. W Michael Ashcraft 2002. This book has more than Greenwalt's volume about the life of Katherine Tingley.

Talbot Mundy, Philosopher of Adventure: A Critical Biography by Brian Taves. P120 the TS at Point Loma put on a pageant-cum-symposium at the Isis Theater San Diego in November 1923; Herbert played Socrates.

FRANCES CORYN

Via familysearch: Frances Jane Coryn arrived at New York on 23 June 1906 on the SS Etruria, from Liverpool.

The magazine Century Path: A Magazine Devoted to the Brotherhood of Humanity volume 10 part 1 1906 p57 issue of 9 December 1906: people currently in post at the TS worldwide headquarters, at 19 Avenue Road St John's Wood include Mrs Edith Clayton; directress Miss Ada Robinson; Superintendent Miss Beatrice Taylor; Assistant Superintendent Miss Frances Coryn.

Theosophical Path volume 34 1928 obituary of Herbert Coryn says that Herbert was survived by his brother Edgar, who was still living in England; and by "a sister, Mrs Frances Dick, of Point Loma".

Confirmation of Frances's marriage (though no date, unfortunately): Collected Writings of Helena Petrovna Blavatsky, volume 9 editor Boris de Zirkoff published 1962 by the Philosophical Research Society. Via google, a snippet from p411 says "Dr Coryn's sister, Frances, married Professor Fred J Dick (1856-1927) also one of the direct pupils of H.P.B. in the London days and an active worker in the Dublin Lodge of the T.S. in Ireland and later at Point Loma".

A bit on Frederick J Dick from //theosophy.ph/encyclo/index.php?title=Dick\_Frederick\_J; website maintained by the Theosophical Publishing House of Manila, Philippines. He's 1856-1927. Born Dublin. Worked as a civil engineer. Joined the TS worldwide in 1888; was one of Blavatsky's "personal students". Later was Secretary of the TS's Dublin Lodge. Involved with many members of the Irish literary movement through his friendship with George Russell (the poet AE) and W B Yeats. Moved to Point Loma 1905 with wife Annie. Taught in the school there and was member of Tingley's ruling cabinet there. Unfortunately this website has no mention of Frances; or the date when Annie died.

Ancient Astronomy in Egypt and its Significance by Frederick J Dick issued by the School of Antiquity at Point Loma in 1916.

On familysearch, I couldn't find any entry for the marriage of Frances Coryn to Frederick Dick. But it did have 1920 census data for the San Diego 7th Precinct: residents included Frances Dick, and her husband Frederick J Dick.

The Theosophical Path volume 33 number 1 issued July 1927. On p97 a reproduction of an article originally in the San Diego Union Friday 27 May 1927: F J Dick had died suddenly on Wednesday 25 May 1927, aged 71. A short biography said that Frederick's first wife, Annie, had died in 1904. The following year he had moved to Point Loma where he taught maths at the Theosophical University, ran its meteorological station, helped edit Theosophical Path and was a member of the cabinet that ran the Point Loma community. He had married Frances Coryn in 1914. Frances would continue to live at Point Loma. On p98 again from the San Diego Union of Saturday 28 May 1927 a short report of Dick's funeral. On p99 a list of people who spoke at the funeral included Katharine Tingley and Dr Herbert Coryn.

Familysearch didn't have a death registration for Frances Dick.

--

Find the web pages of Roger Wright and Sally Davis, including my list of people initiated into the Order of the Golden Dawn between 1888 and 1901, at:

www.wrightanddavis.co.uk

***

Two Coryn brothers, Herbert and Sidney, became members of the Order of the Golden Dawn; and so, for a time, did Sidney's sister-in-law Jessie Horne. Sidney Glasson Pearce Coryn was the first of the three to become a member of the Golden Dawn. He was initiated at its Isis-Urania temple in London on 22 September 1891 and took the Latin motto 'veritas praevaleat'. At that time he was living at 21 Sudbourne Road Brixton. Any member who actually wanted to try some practical magic had to become a member of the GD's inner, 2nd Order. To be initiated into that, you needed to have completed an exacting and wide-ranging study of the occult. Not everybody managed that, but Sidney did so, being initiated into the 2nd Order on 12 January 1893. However, he resigned from the GD in May 1895.

At the risk of boring people who have arrived at this biography of Sidney having read the biography of Herbert: THE CORIN FAMILY

The Corin family came from the far west of Cornwall. There's a thorough and well laid-out family history website at //hectordavie.Ch/Corin/Corin\_L.html, which shows that the Corins ran shops and other small businesses; and that the two names 'William John' were traditional in the family. Herbert and Sidney's father grandfather William John Corin, was born in 1813 and married (in 1837) Jane Glasson, the daughter of a man who ran a shop selling groceries, china and earthenware. Herbert and Sidney's father, also William John Corin (with an 'I' at this stage) was their eldest child, born in 1838.

William John Corin born in 1838 qualified as a doctor, almost certainly by the traditional method of being apprenticed to a general practitioner. In 1860, after serving his apprenticeship, William John Corin was issued with a licence to practice by the Society of Apothecaries. In 1871 William John Corin had an apprentice of his own, but by the 1870s, university teaching, exams and letters after your name had replaced learning on the job, so that William John's eldest son qualified as a doctor in a very different way. In 1861 William John Corin (born 1838) married Mary Jenkin, whose father is thought by the hectordavie website to have been a mine owner. They married at the baptist chapel in Redruth and had the large family typical of mid-Victorian England (actually it wasn't as large as some of that period): Ida born 1862; Herbert born 1863; Sidney born 1865; Edgar born 1866; Frances born 1868; and three other children who died as infants. I note that William John and Mary Corin did not call any of their sons 'William John'. This was not their only break with the past.

In the late 1860s William John and Mary were living at Gwennap, a village between Redruth and Penryn, and the hectordavie website suggests that William John may have worked as a doctor at his father-in-law's mine for a few years. However, by 1871 they had moved to Church Street Liskeard and William John Corin was in business as a GP in the town. On the day of the 1871 census William John and Mary's household was a large one, including an assistant doctor and the apprentice in addition to the children; and a cook and one housemaid.

The normal practice for a GP is to stay in one place, in the same practice, for life; but at some time in the 1870s (the hectordavie website says 1876) William John Corin moved his family to London, setting up in practice as a surgeon (rather than a doctor) in Brixton. And it seems to have been as part of the move to London that he changed the spelling of his surname to CorYn with a 'y', a spelling used from then on by all his children. On the day of the 1881 census the Coryns were living at 68 Acre Lane Stockwell; William John and Mary, and other members of the family, continued to live in the Brixton/Stockwell area until the 1900s. Herbert by this time was studying medicine at University College London; perhaps it was to open up new educational opportunities for their children that William John and Mary had taken the big decision to leave Cornwall. There was more work available in London, too: Ida and Sidney had left school and had both found work. Ida was a governess. The Public Elementary Education Act of 1870 was being rolled out gradually in London so she could have been teaching in a school; but at this stage she could also have been employed by a family to teach its daughters and young sons at home, going to their house each day while still living with her parents. Sidney was a clerk in a business (no more details as to where, but possibly in the City). Edgar and Frances were still at school. William John's unmarried sister-in-law Sarah Perkins was living with them; so too was a cousin from Cornwall, Frederick Abbott, while he studied medicine; and the Coryns employed two servants, probably a cook and a general maid though their daily tasks were not specified.

I am presuming that - seeing they married in a Baptist chapel - both William John and Mary Corin were from Baptist families. However, their children Herbert, Sidney and Frances all became very active theosophists, Herbert and Frances even making theosophy their life's work. You could - people did - attempt to combine Christianity with theosophy, but the main sources of theosophical ideas are eastern. The involvement of Herbert, Sidney and Frances does argue a moving away from the old Christian certainties; which was typical of people of their generation, the generation that grew up (as it were) with Darwin.

SIDNEY CORYN

The information on the 1881 census shows that Sidney had already left school but unlike Herbert, who was studying medicine, he was working, as a clerk in the office of a business. The 1881 census official didn't write down any more details than that and perhaps it doesn't matter particularly because Sidney didn't stay in that job for very long. In 1891 he told that year's census official that he was a "foreign correspondent". This suggests to me that he was working for a newspaper; but I haven't been able to find out whether that's correct, or which one it was. His subsequent career does suggest he wasn't exaggerating in 1891; but I can't give more details of his early career except to say that he may have spent a few months based in Liverpool around 1891; he definitely continued visited the city from time to time during the 1890s though I'm not clear whether this was for work or to see the friends he'd made at Liverpool TS Lodge; perhaps it was a bit of both.

My next certain information about Sidney's working life comes from the late 1890s. At that time he was working in the London offices of Canadian Railways. He was acting as a publicist, not only for the railways but for Canada as a whole. Canadian Pacific's rail service to British Columbia had begun in 1887 and was opening up the plains and the Pacific coast to colonisation. The Canadian government wanted to encourage the right kind of people to settle in Canada. As part of this effort, Sidney was required to supply information and statistics for newspaper articles on Canada. He also gave several talks as part of a series on Canada organised at the South Place Institute in Finsbury. He used the latest technology to illustrate these talks - lantern slides and even "cinematograph" - and for one on the native American population of Canada he worked with someone identified only as "W. Williams" but who might have been the GD member based in Bradford but known to members of TS's Liverpool Lodge. Some of the talks were published around 1900 in the 'British Empire' series. At this time, Sidney was also acting as honorary secretary to the Royal Society of Canada.

It seems odd, then, that when Sidney emigrated, he went to the United States; but I guess you go where the work is.

The 1890s were a very busy decade for Sidney Coryn; beginning in 1888 when he married Agnes Sophia Horne. Agnes was the daughter of a woman who kept a dress and hat shop in Stockwell, and had worked as a pottery designer before her marriage. Agnes' sister Jessie Louisa Horne became a GD member in 1891, though Agnes was never in the GD herself. Sidney and Agnes had the small family that was becoming more common amongst the middle-classes though nobody seems to have been talking about the means used to achieve it: Frederick Sidney was born in 1892; and Marjorie Stella was born in 1894. So at the time Sidney was being initiated into the Golden Dawn and studying for its 2nd Order, he also had new family responsibilities. He was also very busy at the Theosophical Society, which he, brother Herbert and sister Frances all joined in 1889. Herbert was a regular at meetings of the TS's Esoteric Section, which stepped outside the main thrust of the TS by studying western occult texts. William Wynn Westcott, one of the Golden Dawn's three founders, was a senior member of the TS and almost certainly in its Esoteric Section (though I've never found a list of the Esoteric Section's members so this is just a guess). I have less evidence for Sidney being involved with the Esoteric Section; but even if he didn't attend the meetings he could hear of them from Herbert and read the recommended texts.

For a few years in the early 1890s both Herbert and Sidney Coryn were serious and committed members of the TS, in south London and elsewhere, with the involvement of each brother reflecting his own personality. Herbert became a member of Helena Petrovna Blavatsky's inner group; he wrote articles on theosophy; he edited a number of theosophical magazines; and was a committee man. Although Sidney did do some work editing theosophical magazines, he usually did so in cooperation with Herbert and I think of him as the younger brother being co-opted by his older brother but not really wanting to do in his spare time something he spent all the working day doing. Sidney also wrote fewer articles than Herbert; I think he preferred to write pamphlets, which didn't have the deadlines of pieces of work destined for a magazine. He gave talks - which Herbert rarely did. And he didn't do so much committee work; of course, with a family and an office job, Sidney left that to Herbert, who was single, and worked in their father's medical practice.

Sidney, Herbert and Frances recruited an astonishing number of new members to the TS; I sometimes wonder whether they went round button-holing people in the street. The connections between the TS and the Golden Dawn are so close that I'm going to be dealing with them in a separate file.

Sidney's writings in the early 1890s were inspired by Blavatsky's Isis Unveiled. At the time he was a member of both the TS and the GD, he was also preparing his booklet The Zodiac. In it he discussed the symbolism of each astrological sign; the importance of the then Pole Star to the Egyptians and the fact that the star we see at the north pole is not the one they saw; and the zodiac's connection with the great cycles of Hindu mythology.

In another pamphlet, The Language of Symbols, Sidney - whose parents were both Baptists - discussed the use of symbol to express belief, concluding that without it, religions die.

Even after he had left the TS, the GD, and Britain, Sidney's interest in the religion and astronomical knowledge of ancient Egypt continued, and in 1913 his The Faith of Ancient Egypt was published by the Theosophical Publishing Company in New York. He was certainly still in touch with his old friend Frederick Dick, who published his own book on astronomy in ancient Egypt in 1916; by this time (I think - I haven't been able to find a date for it) Frederick Dick was married to Sidney's sister Frances.

Sidney also wrote an article on Alchemy, which appeared in Lucifer, the magazine of the TS worldwide, in 1890. But after that, he preferred to talk: on the Kabbalah (1892 at Brixton Lodge where his sister-in-law Jessie Horne was the secretary); and on The Magic of Numbers (1892) and Paracelsus (1893). The last two talks were given at Adelphi Lodge, whose lecture-programme was the most orientated towards the western occult of all the London-based TS lodges; probably because it was organised by Percy William Bullock, member of the TS's Esoteric Section and of the Golden Dawn.

Originally Sidney had been a member of the TS's Brixton Lodge, but by the early 1890s he had moved out of the district. In 1892 he was one of the group that founded the Croydon Lodge; he became its first president, with William A Dunn (who became a member of the Golden Dawn) as its secretary. He was still in close touch with the members of Liverpool Lodge and often attended their meetings when he was in town.

Early in 1894, an effort was made by the TS worldwide to bring theosophy to a wider audience. As part of this initiative, in May 1894, Sidney and brother Herbert Coryn borrowed a room at Streatham High School, and Sidney delivered a more general talk on theosophy while Herbert chaired the subsequent discussion. As part of this attempt by the TS to reach the un-converted, Sidney and Herbert Kitchin (a TS member based in Leeds) tried to organise a group of TS members to write articles introducing theosophy, to be sent to the newspapers. I couldn't find out how successful this scheme was, because by the time Sidney and Herbert Kitchin were trying to set it up, the TS was beginning to be engulfed in the dispute about William Quan Judge.

I've explained in my file on Herbert Coryn that all three of the Coryns, and Jessie Horne as well, were firm supporters of William Quan Judge, the American president-for-life of the TS's European Section; and against the attempt to oust him being made by the TS worldwide led by Annie Besant and Colonel Olcott. I won't go into the reasons for the struggle here, except to say that by early 1895, the opposing factions were at such loggerheads that an anonymous writer (almost certainly Annie Besant but she wasn't going to admit it) could complain in Lucifer that “two or three London and suburban lodges” (again almost certainly Brixton Lodge and Croydon Lodge) were “bitterly hostile to me”, and that Croydon Lodge was no longer letting its members know of forthcoming events at the TS’s headquarters in Avenue Road St John’s Wood where Annie Besant held sway. The dispute reached a head at the TS European Section’s annual conference held in England in July 1895 where Besant and Olcott found themselves facing what seems like an orchestrated campaign to unseat them from their positions in the European Section, which they held as the senior figures in the TS worldwide, the two organisations being very close and both run from the headquarters building in London. If there was such a campaign, Sidney and Herbert Coryn were likely to have been amongst the leaders of it. Firstly, members of Bow Lodge declared that Olcott had no right to chair a European Section meeting. Having ruled Bow Lodge’s argument unconstitutional, Olcott then found Sidney Coryn putting forward a resolution that challenged the “de jure existence of the Society” (I think the TS worldwide is the ‘Society’ that’s meant). Olcott ruled Sidney’s argument out of order, but his ruling was so “hotly challenged” that he had to let it go to a vote. Sidney lost the vote 39:14 and probably decided there and then to resign from the TS worldwide; Herbert and Frances resigned as well though Herbert stayed on as an influential member of the TS European Section until 1898. The fact that GD founder-member William Wynn Westcott had backed Besant and Olcott against the supporters of Judge, is what probably caused Sidney to leave the GD as well.

William Quan Judge died in 1896. Sidney wrote an obituary for Theosophic Isis, a journal mostly written and edited by him and Herbert. That same year a new star began to rise in the theosophical firmament in America, in the shape of Katherine Tingley. When Mrs Tingley and a group of her supporters organised a world lecture tour, Sidney and Herbert supported her cry of ‘universal brotherhood’ with articles in Theosophic Isis, where they gave Mrs Tingley’s group publicity denied them in the TS’s journals. Once Mrs Tingley’s world tour had ended, early in 1897, Theosophic Isis ceased publication; perhaps because it was just too much hard work for the brothers, with all their other commitments; but possibly because its purpose had been to give Judge’s cause and Mrs Tingley’s group publicity denied it in journals run by the TS in England. As well as promoting the cause of ‘universal brotherhood’, Mrs Tingley’s tour had been raising money for the theosophical community she was in the process of founding at Point Loma, just outside San Diego California. In 1898, Mrs Tingley succeed Judge as president-for-life of the TS in America, and her idea of ‘universal brotherhood’ was adopted as its creed. These events seem to have made up Herbert’s mind: in 1898 he emigrated to take up a job with the American TS and in 1901 he went to live at Point Loma.

Though there’s plenty of evidence for Sidney as a supporter of William Quan Judge, there’s rather less for him as a supporter of Katherine Tingley. He never lived at Point Loma, but he was a married man, he did not have only himself to consider. Sidney’s wife Agnes is rather a shadowy figure in the lives of the Coryns: I’ve found out almost nothing about her except that she was not as committed a theosophist as they were and possibly not a theosophist at all. Agnes did join the TS in February 1893, and - with Sidney - sponsored a woman they knew as a new member later that year; but I can’t find any of the evidence of the activism that I’ve found for Sidney, Herbert and even Frances. I do wonder if Agnes just joined the TS out of curiosity about what her husband and in-laws were so committed to; or from an understanding that - in the Coryn family - she would have no social life at all if she didn’t get involved with theosophy. I think she would not have wanted to live as a member of a theosophical community; so although Sidney visited Point Loma at least once and probably regularly, he didn’t settle there. And I also think that Agnes didn’t really want to go to America.

Sidney Coryn emigrated to the USA in 1902 and had arrived in California by May of that year; his family either went with him or followed soon after. I haven't been able to discover whether Sidney had a job to go to when he left England, but by 1908 he was working for the San Francisco literary and political weekly, the Argonaut (usually known as the San Francisco Argonaut) and he probably continued as an employee there until he died, eventually becoming associate editor. If Sidney was employed by the San Francisco Argonaut by 1906, he and his family will have been living somewhere in the city on Wednesday 18 April, the day of the famous San Francisco earthquake, which was followed by several days of fierce fires. The Coryns may have been amongst the 300,000 people made homeless by the destruction of nearly all of the city; and would have been able to watch as a new, modern city rose in the years after, literally out of the ashes. They won't have seen the Golden Gate bridge, however; that was built after their time.

1908 is the earliest year for which I have confirmation that Sidney was employed by the San Francisco Argonaut. By 1911, articles by Sidney were appearing in it and being quoted by newspapers in other parts of the USA. These will have needed to take a Republican view on events, as the San Francisco Argonaut had been founded to support the Republican cause. One that Sidney wrote in 1909 on what the San Francisco Argonaut saw as the problem of Japanese immigrants in the Bay Area, is the most widely-cited article I've found by Sidney. It takes a pessimistic view of the future of California if this immigrant population is not curbed, concluding that it was likely that their success as businessmen was going to force white people into taking the low-paid jobs the Japanese had been allowed into America to do; and could have been written with only a few changes by a supporter of UKIP.

By 1912 Sidney was writing the San Francisco Argonaut's literary review column. A review that Sidney wrote early in 1914 is perhaps an indication of his reading tastes. It's also a timely reminder to me that an interest in the occult is no guarantee of radical views in other areas of life - until I started researching the members of the Golden Dawn I was inclined to think otherwise. It puts me in mind of Aleister Crowley's assessment of the members of the Golden Dawn as nonentities, not giants; and of Maud Gonne's assessment of them as too middle-class for her taste. (Never mind - they both made up for the deficiency in their own lives.) In a review of works that I think must be by the poet Richard le Gallienne, another English immigrant to the USA, Sidney accuses the author of being "no better than he should be" apparently as a result of reading too much of what Sidney thought of as modern literature - he mentioned George Bernard Shaw particularly - and not enough great literature from the 18th century. Sidney declared that this bias in Mr Le Gallienne's reading had led le Gallienne to view anyone allowing "his or her thoughts to wander, even inadvertently, from the sex problem" as "a traitor to his or her age and country".

Those who emigrated did so in full knowledge that they might never see their parents again (unless they had gone too) before they died, and not even be able to attend their funerals. William John Corin/Coryn died in 1910; and Mary Corin/Coryn in 1915.

Sidney never lost his interest in theosophy, astronomy and astrology and he was probably a member of the American TS. Even while Herbert was in the US and Sidney was still in London, the brothers had collaborated on another theosophical magazine, The Crusader, named for Mrs Tingley's lecturing group from the 1896-97 world tour; this ran from 1900 to 1904. At the same time they were also co-editors of the Theosophical Chronicle, which turned into the International Theosophical Chronicle in 1905 when Frederick John Dick joined them as another editor, probably after he too had emigrated to Point Loma. In the next few years Sidney worked on the survey of ancient Egyptian religion that I've considered above. But that was his last published work on theosophy because in 1917 the first World War arrived in the USA and engulfed Sidney's family.

Unlike Herbert Coryn, Sidney had not become an American citizen. And despite having lived in the USA for 15 years, his children Frederick Sidney and Marjorie Stella still felt English. Frederick Sidney had been working as a printer in San Francisco but I think he must have received call-up papers anyway at some time during 1916 because as a second lieutenant with the 2nd Battalion Wiltshire Regiment he had been sent to Belgium by 1917. In 1917 the 2nd Battalion were at Passchendaele (officially the 3rd Battle of Ypres) and then on the the Messines Ridge. At 1918 they were at St Quentin before being moved in May to Bligny where they were attacked by German forces on 29 May 1918 in the action called the Battle of Champagne; they were surrounded and had to retreat on 7 June. At some point in 1918 - probably during the battle of Champagne - the Wiltshire Regiment got gassed, and though he did not die (apparently few men did die immediately from poison gas), Frederick Sidney suffered from its effects for the rest of his life.

Sidney's daughter Marjorie Stella also went to war. She went to France as a volunteer nurse, probably as a member of the American Red Cross because she doesn't seem to have tended wounded British soldiers, but wounded French and possibly American ones. She and Florence Billings and probably all the members of their nursing unit were all awarded the Croix de Guerre in 1918 for their work just behind the front line at Chalons-sur-Marne (now called Chalons-en-Champagne).

Back in San Francisco, Sidney became the San Francisco Argonaut's war correspondent. His articles gained him something of a reputation in California as The Man who Understood the War, and he was asked to give lectures on various aspects of the war and its aftermath, at Stanford University and other venues, some of which were published and made him more widely known (for a time) than he had been in the USA at large. It was in this guise that he was approached in 1918 by Stanton Coblentz, a law student bored by the law, who was looking for somewhere to publish his writing. From Coblentz's memoirs of his career as a New York journalist I have a description of Sidney, who was now 53: Coblentz saw "a courtly, bespectacled elderly man with a bookish look and a fatherly smile". Not your typical magician. Or was he? It depends, I suppose, on whether you want your magicians à la Crowley or as they probably mostly are!

The latest article by Sidney in the San Francisco Argonaut was one published in 1919 where he seems to have combined his earlier lit-crit role with the more political articles he'd been writing during the war. In it, Sidney seems to have suggested H G Wells had Bolshevik sympathies: spoken like a true US Republican?

One source I found seemed to be suggesting that Agnes Coryn had gone with Marjorie Stella to Europe in 1917, to nurse the wounded. However, I think this particular source has confused mother and daughter: there's a photograph on the website, apparently of the woman being referred to, which is of someone too young to be Agnes. It's rather more likely that Agnes remained in the United States with her husband - by 1921 they were living at Post Street - and was with him on 15 November 1921 when Sidney died, at Auburn California. However, with both her children still in Europe, Agnes had returned to England by November 1922. I do wonder if only Sidney had really taken to living in the United States because Agnes, Frederick Sidney and Marjorie Stella all spent the rest of their lives in Europe.

I don't know when Frederick Sidney left the army but he went back to England not the USA. The gas attack sustained by the Wiltshire Regiment in 1917 had probably affected his lungs; he may not have been able to work and he will have needed care and treatment. My evidence for his poor health after World War 1 is the date of his death: he died in 1936 aged only 45. I can't find any evidence that he ever married.

Marjorie Stella never married either. Using the French she had acquired while nursing, she worked during the 1920s as a translator for two of the first World War Reparation Committees, both based in Paris. Particularly after Sidney's death, Marjorie Stella may have been the family's major bread-winner; Agnes - as was typical of a middle-class woman of her generation - never did paid work after her marriage. In 1930 Marjorie Stella felt secure enough financially to leave her translating job and embark on a new career as a writer (in English) publishing biographies and some novels between 1932 and 1954. The most successful of these was The Marriage of Josephine (1945): it was translated into several languages and is the book with most responses if you key Marjorie Stella's name into google. The latest published works by Marjorie Stella Coryn that I've been able to find references to were two series in the 1960s English girls' paper, Princess: Royal Daughters, and Daughters of Adventure. The Corin family website says that Agnes and Marjorie Stella lived in France until around 1937 when they returned to England. Agnes died in 1951 and Marjorie Stella in 1968, both of them in England.

As neither Frederick Sidney nor Marjorie Stella ever had children, Sidney Coryn has no descendants.

A SHORT ACCOUNT OF SIDNEY'S SISTER IDA AND BROTHER EDGAR

IDA was the only member of the Corin/Coryn siblings NOT to join the Theosophical Society. I found information to show that she was a student at London University during the mid-1880s. She was a teacher before her marriage. In 1895 Ida married Roland von der Heyde (who despite his name was English, born in Lambeth) and moved with him to run a fruit farm at Billericay in Essex. She had no children of her own but seems to have had the care of some of her husband's nieces and nephews, at least some of the time. At some point after census day 1911 (I don't know exactly when) Ida and Roland emigrated to run a farm in New Zealand. Ida died in New Zealand in 1925.

EDGAR did join the TS, though he was never involved in its activities to the extent that Herbert, Sidney and Frances were. He married another TS member - Catherine Edith Allen (known as Edith) - in 1893. Edgar went into partnership with Ida and Roland in the fruit-growing business, and he and Edith moved to Essex. They had four children, the only grandchildren of William John and Mary Corin/Coryn. Edith had been born in Canada, and records on Ancestry and findmypast show Edgar at least, going to and from Canada several times before the first World War; and crossing into the USA, perhaps to visit Sidney and Herbert. However, he died in England in 1939. Edith died in 1941. I don't know what happened to the fruit-growing business when the von der Heydes emigrated but it doesn't seem to have been inherited by Edgar and Edith's sons.

--

BASIC SOURCES I USED for all Golden Dawn members.

Membership of the Golden Dawn: The Golden Dawn Companion by R A Gilbert. Northampton: The Aquarian Press 1986. Between pages 125 and 175, Gilbert lists the names, initiation dates and addresses of all those people who became members of the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn or its many daughter Orders between 1888 and 1914. The list is based on the Golden Dawn's administrative records and its Members' Roll - the large piece of parchment on which all new members signed their name at their initiation. All this information had been inherited by Gilbert but it's now in the Freemasons' Library at the United Grand Lodge of England building on Great Queen Street Covent Garden. Please note, though, that the records of the Amen-Ra Temple in Edinburgh were destroyed in 1900/01. As far as I know, the records of the Horus Temple at Bradford have not survived either.

Family history: freebmd; ancestry.co.uk (census and probate); findmypast.co.uk; familysearch; Burke's Peerage and Baronetage; Burke's Landed Gentry; Armorial Families; thepeerage.com; and a wide variety of family trees on the web.

Famous-people sources: mostly about men, of course, but very useful even for the female members of GD. Oxford Dictionary of National Biography. Who Was Who. Times Digital Archive.

Catalogues: British Library; Freemasons' Library.

Wikipedia; Google; Google Books - my three best resources. I also used other web pages, but with some caution, as - from the historian's point of view - they vary in quality a great deal.

SOURCES FOR SIDNEY CORYN

ONE ITEM SHEDDING SOME LIGHT ON HIS GD INTERESTS:

Freemasons' Library Golden Dawn collection GBR GD2/2/8a Receipts for items borrowed from William Wynn Westcott during the period 1891-1892. On 18 April 1892 Sidney borrowed some lectures, some information on the tarot, the General Guidance for the Soul and some rituals.

HISTORY OF THE CORIN/CORYN FAMILY OF CORNWALL

The Corin/Coryn family has a good family history website at //herbert/davie.ch/corin/Corin\_L.html which you can also reach via Ancestry. It's easier to follow than most, being carefully laid out. It gave me lots of indications of where to start - for example, with information on the lives of Sidney Coryn's children; and on some of Sidney's publications.

In addition I've used the usual freebmd, ancestry and familysearch sites.

1906 SAN FRANCISCO EARTHQUAKE from wikipedia; also the information that the Golden Gate Bridge is later.

AGNES SOPHIA HORNE CORYN

Theosophical Society Membership Register September 1891 to January 1893 (though actually covering to May 1893): Agnes Coryn, date of application February 1893.

IDA CORYN VON DER HEYDE

University of London: the Historical Record 1836-1912 published for the University of London Press in London by Hodder and Stoughton 1912. Ida Mary Coryn is in this somewhere, with a reference to 1886 presumably her date of graduation. I couldn't see more from google's snippet and when I uploaded the book, my search for her came back with 'no finds'. 7 March 2013 had that a lot lately, wonder if it's my laptop.

EDGAR IS IN THE TS

Theosophical Society Membership Register January 1889-September 1891: new member Edgar Coryn, application dated June 1891, membership sponsors Sidney and Frances Coryn. TS Membership Register September 1891-January 1893: new member Edith Allen, application dated February 1893.

It's the herbertdavie website that says Edgar's wife had been born in Canada. At www.mifarmgs.org Edgar Coryn arriving by ship 1913 at Grimsby Ontario. This website doesn't say whether his wife and child were were him. Also saw references to Edgar travelling to and within North America when looking on Ancestry for his records at the Probate Registry; though I didn't follow them up for more precise dates.

SIDNEY CORYN'S WORKING LIFE

He's not in SCOOP!, a database of 19th and 20th-century journalists held at the British Library. However, neither are some other GD members who definitely worked as journalists - database clearly not exhaustive.

A reference in The Theosophist October 1890-April 1891, p61 has Sidney as a member of the TS's Liverpool Lodge rather than any London one. It was this that made me wonder whether Sidney had been working in Liverpool around 1891. The friendships he made with Liverpool-based TS members were important for Golden Dawn recruitment in the next few years. By Lucifer's editions of 1892 he was back as a member of Croydon Lodge.

Via news.google.com to Daily Mail and Empire issue of 19 April 1899 p12 article: The Prospects of Anglo-Canadian Trade for the future. This article describes Sidney Coryn as working in the offices of the Canadian Railway, and mentions particularly his work publicising Canada with lectures illustrated by "lantern views and the cinematograph".

For details of Canadian Pacific Railway and its importance in the opening up of Canada's interior: see the very detailed page in wikipedia.

Via ebooks to British America by Arthur Penrhyn Stanley. New York: Funk and Wagnalls Co. London: Kegan Paul, Trench, Trübner and Co 1900. Sidney Coryn is a contributor to this book, as as Honorary Secretary of the Royal Society of Canada. At www.electriccanadian.com the contents of the book can be downloaded. The Preface by William Sheo Wring of the South Place Institute Finsbury EC says all the pieces published in the volume were originally given between 1895 and 1898 as talks, part of a Sunday afternoon lecture course. Sidney Coryn contributed two lectures which were all his own work:

British North America: Manitoba

British North America: the North-West Territories of Canada.

And with someone only identified as W Williams, Sidney had been co-author of:

The Canadian Aborigines. Using statistics from the Hudson Bay Co etc.

The British Empire Series volume 5 published New York: Funk and Wagnalls, and London: Kegan Paul, Trench, Trübner and Co 1902 p263 the first page of an article by Sidney: The Railways of Canada.

IN CALIFORNIA HE WORKS FOR THE SAN FRANCISCO ARGONAUT

Wikipedia on The Argonaut, better known as the The San Francisco Argonaut. It's NOT a newspaper, it's a literary journal, published 1877-1956 and again since 1991. Founded and originally run by Frank M Pixley. It regularly published work by Gertrude Atherton, Yda Addis and Ambrose Bierce and was an important publication within California with a great deal of political influence, solidly Republican. On google I saw some compendium volumes issued by the Argonaut, eg one on China and the Chinese published in 1907, author apparently Charles William Wason. On google I found The San Francisco Argonaut 1877-1907 by James Richard Wotherspoon 1962. I tried to investigate further but the British Library doesn't have a copy of it.

My earliest reference to Sidney working for the San Francisco Argonaut is in magazine Current Opinion volume 44 1908 p641.

Just noting that at least in 1915 Sidney is NOT the journal's editor and I think he never was the senior man. Via the web to full text of The Argonaut volume LXXVI 1 January to 30 June 1915 at the website of the San Francisco Public Library. The volume was so big my laptop couldn't load it all but I did see the first page of the 1 January 1915 issue. The editor of that issue was Alfred Holman. Unlike most literary journals it's a weekly and laid out like a newspaper.

Via news.google.com/newspapers to the Berkeley Daily Gazette issue of 9 April 1919: an announcement that Sidney would give a talk on The League of Nations, at the monthly meeting of the Goodfellows Club. The article described Sidney as "war correspondent of the San Francisco Argonaut where his articles have attracted wide attention." Apparently the articles had shown "unfailing optimism" about the war's outcome and as a result of writing them, Sidney had gained a reputation as an interpreter of war strategy.

My San Francisco: A Wayward Biography by Gertrude Atherton. Published Indianapolis and New York: the Bobbs-Merrill Co. No publication date but the British Library stamp says "29 JUN 49". There's one mention of Sidney in the book: on p76 in the chapter San Francisco

Bookstores. Atherton mentions a building on Grant Avenue which had to be rebuilt after the fire (she means the fires that followed the 1906 earthquake). The rebuilt building had a lecture room on its 4th floor and Sidney gave an "important series" of talks there "dealing with the campaigns of World War 1". Atherton describes Sidney as "associated editor of the San Francisco Argonaut" at the time of the talks; and also as the father of "that brilliant young author, Marjorie Coryn". There's no mention of any other person called Coryn in the book. Gertrude Atherton had good reason to be grateful to the San Francisco Argonaut as (p71) it was the first magazine to publish any of her work. She started writing at age 22, to relieve the boredom of her married life in rural California. And Atherton also saved me the trouble of searching all over to identify Stanton Coblenz: (pp116-117) p116 Stanton Coblenz was doing the San Francisco Argonaut's book review between 1917 and 1920, at the outset of his writing career.

--

I found work by Sidney that had appeared in San Francisco Argonaut being used in New Zealand newspapers: at paperspast.natlib.govt.nz

(Wellington?) Evening Post volume LXXXIII issue 106 4 May 1912 p13 quoted an article by Sidney on the Three Musketeers.

(Wellington?) Evening Post volume XXXXVII issued 14 February 1914 p13 it's the Bookman column is the source for Sidney's attack on the work of Le Gallienne. I hope I have identified the man correctly: Richard Le Gallienne 1866-1947 (see wikipedia) seems the only person of that name whose dates are right: author, poet, journalist, member of the Rhymers' Club (so he will have known Yeats) contributor to The Yellow Book (1890s). Emigrated to the USA in 1897.

(Wellington?) Evening Post no volume number, issued 17 March 1917 p4 a long article on current state of World War 1 quotes an article by Sidney from the San Francisco Argonaut discussing possible peace negotiations and arguing that Germany could give a lot up - eg Alsace/Lorraine - and still come out of the war at a profit.

At www.fold3.com there were also quotes from work by Sidney in 2 issues of The Atlanta Constitution, those of: 12 March 1911; and 11 Oct 1913.

Just found via google: in the San Francisco Argonaut of 21 February 1919 an article by Sidney: Mr Wells' Bolshevism. He means H G Wells, of course.

SIDNEY'S ARTICLE ON THE JAPANESE IN CALIFORNIA was published in Annals of the American Academy of Political and Social Science volume 34 number 2, September 1909: pp42-48: The Japanese Problem in California.

The first later use of this article was as early as 1921 when it appeared (or a précis of it did) in a special American supplement in the Times on Monday 4 July 1921: p27 et seq.

It has been referred to in several more recent works:

1975 Prejudice War and the Constitution by Jacobus Ten Broek, Edward Norton Barnhart and Floyd W Mason p340

1982 Bitter Harvest: A History of California Farmworkers 1870-1941 by Cletus E Daniel; p282

1995 Laws Harsh as Tigers which is actually about Chinese immigrants not Japanese ones; by Lucy E Salyer

SOME OF SIDNEY'S WORLD WAR 1 TALKS

Serbia and Human Freedom: An Address Delivered at the Palace Hotel June 28. Via google to New York Public Library volume 22 1918 p491, probably in a list of recent acquisitions. A note says that Sidney's lecture was published by the Serbian Information Bureau as a 16-page pamphlet with a map by Serbian Information Bureau. The date of the lecture (as opposed to the date of its being published) isn't clear to me: the lecture may have been given in 1916 rather than 1918. The pamphlet isn't in the British Library and I couldn't find the text on the web.

Daughters of the American Revolution Magazine volume 53 1919 p312 mentioned a talk given by Sidney on Is the World Safe for Democracy?

Annual Report of the President [of Stanford Univ that is] Stanford University 1918 p120 (Sidney had given a lecture at the University on The Cause of the War). Sidney was described as associate editor of the San Francisco Argonaut.

STANTON COBLENTZ

Adventures of a Freelancer by Stanton A Coblentz, Jeffrey M Elliott and Scott Alan Burgess 1993: pp33-34 with the quote about what Sidney looked like to a young man in 1918.

A LATER OCCULT WORK

The Faith of Ancient Egypt by Sidney G P Coryn. Published 1913 by the Theosophical Publishing Co of 25 West 45th Street New York; it also has an English copyright dated 1913. It's not in the British Library but via archive.org/stream I was able to download from the copy now in the New York Public Library. As I'm not an occultist I just noted down the contents table:

- Records of the Ages
- Egyptian Science Unequaled Today
- The Rosetta Stone
- Eternal Life, the faith of Egypt
- The Cycles and Gods of the Cycles
- Initiation
- Entering into Heaven - the fields of Aanru

SIDNEY AS EDITOR AND WRITER, THEOSOPHY

PUBLICATIONS

The Zodiac variously described as being written by Sidney on his own, and by Sidney with Lafcadio Hearn. Pamphlet published by the Theosophical Publishing Society 1893.

Theosophic Isis is edited by Herbert who also does most of the writing, though there are 2 items by Sidney:

- 1896 volume 1 April p81      Obituary of W Q Judge
- 1897 volume 2 January p387      Our Opportunity the 1897 January issue also had (p380) Some Persian Hymns by F Coryn, probably Frances Coryn.

SOME ARTICLES BY SIDNEY IN THEOSOPHICAL SIFTINGS

Theosophical Siftings volumes 5-7 1892-95 has a reprint of Sidney or Sidney and Lafcadio Hearn's pamphlet The Zodiac. Also in this volume is an item by Sidney that I haven't found anywhere else: The Language of Symbols.

Sidney has only three items in the British Library catalogue: all as editor, 2 jointly with brother Herbert:

- 1900-04      The Crusader. A Supplement to 'Ourselves' volumes 1-4.
- 1900-04      The Theosophical Chronicle first 5 volumes 1900-04; Herbert and Sidney as co-editors
- 1905          The International Theosophical Chronicle as one of several editors.

SIDNEY AS ACTIVIST: LUCIFER

Lucifer: A Theosophical Magazine Volume VII September 1890 to February 1891, editors Helena Petrovna Blavatsky and Annie Besant. Published London: Theosophical Publishing Society of 7 Duke Street Adelphi. Volume VII issue of 15 October 1890, article by Sidney Coryn: Alchemy.

Lucifer: A Theosophical Magazine Volume XI September 1892- February 1893, editor Annie Besant. Published London: Theosophical Publishing Society 7 Duke Street Adelphi. P170 issue of 15 November 1892 in the news section: very short report on events at Brixton Lodge sent in by its secretary Jessie Horne. Recent talks had included one given by Sidney Coryn on The Kabbalah, on 16 September 1892. Volume XI no 64 issued 15 December 1892 p342 in the news section: Sidney Coryn had been elected president of the TS's Croydon Lodge. Volume XI no 65 issued 15 January 1893 p431 in the news section: recent lectures at Adelphi Lodge had included one by Sidney Coryn on The Magic of Numbers. Volume XI no 66 issued 15 February 1893 p517 in the news section: report on Liverpool Lodge said that TS member Williams of Bradford Lodge; and S Coryn had attended recent meetings of the Lodge.

Lucifer: A Theosophical Magazine Vol XIII covering September 1893 to February 1894, editor Annie Besant. Volume XIII no 74 issued 15 October 1893 p165 forthcoming lectures at Adelphi Lodge would include one by Sidney Coryn on Paracelsus, due 4 December [1893]. Volume XIII no 78 issued 15 February 1894 in the very short news section p522: S Coryn and Herbert Kitchin were trying to start a scheme whereby theosophists would send articles introducing theosophy to the weekly papers. Anyone with a suitable article should send it to S G P Coryn at Lawn House, Ramsden Heath Essex; or to Kitchin (his contact address is in Leeds).

Lucifer: A Theosophical Magazine covers March-August 1894, editor Annie Besant. Volume XIV no 82 issued 15 June 1894 p 347 news section; on 30 May [1894] S G P Coryn gave a lecture on theosophy at a meeting at Streatham high school; H Coryn chaired the meeting and the hall had been "quite full".

Lucifer: A Theosophical Magazine Volume XV covers September 1894-February 1895, joint editors Annie Besant and G R S Mead. This volume is dominated by the Judge dispute. Long article by Besant (p459) in the issue of 15 Feb 1895 saying that she had drawn up a statement of the position of the TS hierarchy on the Judge question: which was that they were against the claims he was making. Olcott, Sinnett and WWW had all signed the statement.

Lucifer: A Theosophical Magazine volume XVI March-August 1895, joint editors Annie Besant and G R S Mead. again dominated by the Judge dispute. Volume XVI 15 March 1895 p79 an uncredited report on the Judge dispute said that both Brixton and Croydon lodges had issued statements supporting Judge. Volume XVI no 94 15 June 1895 p270 uncredited but almost certainly written by Besant, an item saying that “two or three London and suburban lodges” were “bitterly hostile to me” and that Croydon Lodge was not letting its members know of forthcoming events at the TS’s English headquarters.

Volume XVI no 95 15 July 1895 p358: a report on what had happened at the 5th annual convention of TS’s European Section, which had been held on 4 July [1895] at the Portman Rooms Baker St, London. The large number of delegates had made life difficult for those in charge. Members of Bow Lodge had challenged Olcott’s right to take the chair; their challenge was ruled unconstitutional. Then meeting considered a resolution put before the convention by “Mr Coryn” (Sidney) that challenged the “de jure existence of the Society”; that too was ruled out of order but the ruling was “hotly challenged”, so much so that it went to a vote where Coryn lost 39:14. Elections to official posts for the coming year then went ahead; A P Sinnett and G R S Mead were elected to the TS European Section’s executive committee for the first time; and William Wynn Westcott was re-elected to it. The convention agreed to form a committee to look at changes to the TS worldwide’s constitution - something Judge’s supporters were demanding - but all the names put forward to be elected to this committee were put forward by members of Blavatsky Lodge which was dominated by Besant and Mead. The members of this new committee were listed on p360; they included “Dr Coryn” (Herbert), “Firth” (Oliver, of Bradford, a GD member in the past); “Jevons” (Rowland, of Liverpool Lodge); Annie Besant and others.

AN ARTICLE AND A TALK BY SIDNEY PUBLISHED IN THE USA; the talk dates his arrival in California:

Universal Brotherhood Path volume XVII April 1902 an article by Sidney: A New Study of Our Growth and Possibilities. This was a google snippet and I couldn’t see page numbers.

Via the web to the Los Angeles Herald volume XXIX no 217 issue of 6 May 1902 p3 a report written 5 May 1902 by the paper’s correspondent in San Diego: Growth of Character: Sydney (sic) Coryn addresses theosophists. Report is on a talk given by Sidney at the Universal Brotherhood and Theosophical Society in San Diego. It has the sub-title “Selfishness the one crime in the world”. Sidney is described by the reporter as a “Student of Late Mme (sic) Blavatsky”.

CROWLEY AND MAUD GONNE ON THE GOLDEN DAWN. Both disparagements are mentioned, and Gonno’s is quoted, in Richard Kaczynski’s biography of Aleister Crowley: Perdurabo. Revised and expanded edition published by North Atlantic Books of Berkeley California 2010: p60. Gonno’s quote is from her: A Servant of the Queen: Reminiscences published London: Victor Gollancz 1938 p248; I’ve actually seen this book referred to as extremely cavalier with the facts, but in this instance I hope you can trust Maud to have remembered her opinion of the Golden Dawn’s magicians accurately enough.

FREDERICK SIDNEY CORYN

It’s the Corin family history website that mentions that Frederick Sidney Coryn was gassed in the first World War. No source is given for the information - it may have been known in the family - but it may also have come from this book: The 2nd Battalion, Wiltshire Regiment (99th): a Record of their Fighting in the Great War 1914-18 by W Scott Shepherd. Printed by Gale and Polden 1927. On p162 2nd Lt Coryn is one member of the Regiment “who was gassed” but I couldn’t read where from the snippet I saw on google. I couldn’t see the date of the incident either except that it was in 1918. Shepherd says also (p162) that having pushed the front line forward 1000 yards the Wiltshire Regiment was relieved by the 9th Welsh Regiment “that night” and had “a few days’ rest”.

Website www.thewardrobe.org.uk is the Home of the Infantry Regiments of Berkshire and Wiltshire. According to this website this is what the 2nd Battalion were doing in 1917:

Jan-Mar at Arras

9-11 April getting bad losses taking part in an attack on the Hindenburg Line then to Ypres

31 July first day of 3rd Battle of Ypres (Passchendaele)

late Aug relieves the Aus troops on Messines Ridge

Aug-Nov on Messines Ridge doing some raiding

Nov moved to the Gebluvelt area. There till end 1917.

And 1918:

Jan relieving French troops S of St Quentin

March attacked at St Quentin by German forces and surrounded; heavy losses and Wilts Regiment had to be reformed as a result

April Ypres again

May-Aug at Bligny. Came under heavy attack from German forces 29 May; again they were surrounded; they had to retreat 7 June 1918

Aug at Loos

Sep-Nov moving from Neuve Chapelle to Haussy; at Haussy quite a few deaths from friendly fire on day of armistice 11 November 1918: they were at Eth.

Looking for an action in 1918 in which both the Wiltshire Regiment and the 9th Welsh Regiment were involved: at www.oucs.ox.ac.uk/ww1lit/db I found an account written by a man who had fought at the Battle of Champagne 27 May to 19 June 1918. This is the most likely candidate for the attack in which 2nd Lt Coryn was gassed.

The gas used will have been mustard gas: wikipedia on Chemical Weapons in WW1: mustard gas, called Vesicant by the Germans, 1st used by them in July 1917 at the 3rd Battle of Ypres. The stuff was loaded onto a shell. After the shell had exploded the stuff stayed in the ground for up to months depending on the weather, and could cause injury all that time. Relatively few people died in the immediate aftermath of being gassed; it was used to cause injury and disablement, and to demoralise. Damage from the gas was not confined to inhaling it: you could get blisters; sore eyes up to blindness; vomiting; internal and external bleeding; damage to bronchial tubes.

MARJORIE STELLA CORYN 1894-1968

From the wikipedia World War 1 timeline, trying to date the account of Marjorie Stella’s wartime work as described in the Paul Horguelin website which I’ve reproduced in the original French below:

6 April 1917 USA declares war on Germany
25 June 1917 first US troops arrive in France
7 Dec 1917 USA declares war on Austria-Hungary.

Extract from jcverdier.museum.online.fr/la\_distribution\_des\_radio-techna.htm which is a website on the life of the French radio pioneer Paul Horguelin, founder (1930) of Paul Horguelin et Cie. From 1916-19 Horguelin was working as an engineer at the Institut Agricole de Beauvais while building and experimenting with radios in his spare time. He was called up aged 19 and during his national service, worked on telephone communications for the French army. This is the extract, which I believe has confused Marjorie Stella and Agnes Sophia Coryn - it seems to be saying that Marjorie was Agnes' writing name. It's Marjorie Stella whose dates are 1894-1968.

Agnès Sydney Coryn (1894-1968), mieux connue sous son nom de plume de Marjorie Coryn (ou encore "Gipsy" pour les intimes) est une femme de lettre d'origine anglaise auteur de nombreux romans historiques entre les 2 guerres ("Le Chevalier d'Éon", "Le mariage de Joséphine" pour les plus connus). En 1917, alors qu'elle est établie à San Francisco, les États-Unis entrent en guerre. Elle se porte volontaire en même temps que sa mère pour rejoindre le front en Europe. Elle est alors affectée à l'accueil des permissionnaires à la gare de Châlons (en qualité d'infirmière) et fait rapidement connaissance avec Paul Horguelin, tout juste 18 ans, qui ne tarde pas à lui faire la cour. Agnès Coryn est bientôt reçue à Nuisement et devient une intime de la famille. La guerre finie "Gipsy" quitte la France pour s'installer en Angleterre. Elle garde cependant des contacts étroits avec Paul Horguelin durant toute sa vie.

The Paul Horguelin website mentions that he also knew Florence Billings, another holder of the croix de guerre. To asteria.fivecolleges.edu, the website of the Five Colleges Archives and manuscript Collections, which has Florence Billings' papers. Billings was born into a wealthy family in Hatfield Massachusetts in 1879; they family moved to Redlands California in 1893 but Florence spent most of the years before World War 1 in Europe and was in Europe when the war broke out. War work. When the USA joined the war she returned to America to join the American Red Cross. As a member of the US Red Cross she served in a canteen and did relief work just behind the front line at Chalons-sur-Marne; she was awarded a croix de guerre for this work. Later, she knew Atatürk and was involved in post-World War 1 Turkey as a translator. I'm supposing that Florence Billings and Marjorie Stella Coryn were working in the same hospital/canteen in 1917-18.

The Supplement to Who's Who volumes 3-4 published in the USA 1942 p129 Marjorie Stella Coryn. Born Billericay 8 May 1895. Unmarried. Served in a French army canteen and hospital 1917-18. Croix de Guerre France 1918. Reparation Committee translation bureau Paris 1921-25. Turkish Reparation Committee Paris 1924-30. Then a list of publications see below for my list.

Just noting that I found the names of two English women who'd been awarded the croix de guerre. They were both nurses: Millicent Sylvia Armstrong who got it specifically for rescuing wounded soldiers while under fire; and Dorothy Feilding. According to the www.ranker.com website, there are 40 British holders of the croix de guerre. I couldn't find Marjorie's name among those listed at the website and I'm sure whether Marjorie counts as British for these purposes. Other holders included the actor James Stewart.

Marjorie Stella Coryn's publications:

In the British Library Catalogue; all works published London

- 1932 The Chevalier d'Éon 1728-1810. Thornton Butterworth.
- 1933 Black Mastiff [A biography of Bertrand de Guesclin]. Arthur Barker.
- 1934 The Acquirer. [A biography of William the Conqueror.] Arthur Barker.
- 1934 The Black Prince 133-1376. Arthur Barker.
- 1936 House of Orleans. Arthur Barker.
- 1937 Knave of Hearts; being the Romantic Adventures of Count de Lauzun a gentleman of Gascony. Thornton Butterworth.
- 1938 Marie-Antoinette and Axel de Fersen. Arthur Barker. W the Marr of Josephine, the title that came up most on the web.
- 1944 Ridiculous Dictator. [A novel]. Constable and Co.
- 1945 The Marriage of Josephine. Hodder and Stoughton. Easily the m responses on the web; and sevl transl
- 1947 A Swarm of Bees. [A novel.]. Hodder and Stoughton.
- 1947 Power Instead. Hodder and Stoughton.
- 1950 Sorrow by Day: a royal love story of no importance. Hodder and Stoughton

Not all Marjorie Stella's books are in the British Library. Via google I also found these:

- 1943 The Incorruptible
- 1947 Alone among Men
- 1951 Sorrow. Though this might be a shortened title of 'Sorrow by Day'
- 1954 Enchanters of Men

Some later work in 1960s girls' comic Princess: Royal Daughters; and Daughters of Adventure; both illustrated by John Millar Watt. I found this information at womenincomics.wikia.com/wiki/Marjorie-Coryn but that website was quoting Masters of Fun and Thrills: The British Comic Artists volume 1 by Norman Wright and David Ashford. Published by Norman Wright 2008; p112.

17 March 2013

AMandragora@attglobal.net

Maud CRACKNELL was initiated into the Golden Dawn at its Amen-Ra temple in Edinburgh on 23 November 1896, taking the Latin motto 'Tempus omnia revelat'. Later she joined the Isis-Urania temple in London and was initiated into the 2nd Order there, on 10 October 1898. In 1900 she played a small but important role in the fracas known as 'the battle of Blythe Road'. Maud was still a member of the GD when it finally split up into several daughter orders, in 1903.

At the time of her original initiation, Maud Cracknell was living at 20 Dublin Street Edinburgh. She was a Londoner by birth, however, the daughter of Charles Cracknell and his wife Sarah Elizabeth. Charles Cracknell was a pharmacist. While I was searching for Maud's family on the census I noticed the greatest concentration of people called Cracknell was in Essex and East Anglia but Charles had been born in Southwark. His pharmacy shop and business was at 106 Edgeware Road in 1847 and had probably been there for several years already. Later, the family business moved, firstly to 217 Edgeware Road and then to 17 Craven Road in Bayswater. A second shop was opened as well in the new suburb of east Acton.

Charles and Sarah Elizabeth had a large family, beginning with five daughters: Sarah Emily (born 1850); Elizabeth (born 1852); Mary Louisa (born 1854); Susannah (born 1856); and then Maud herself, born in 1858. Then followed twin boys: Henry Watts and Herbert, born 1859; a sixth and last daughter, Alice Lucy (born 1860); and two more boys, Ralph (born 1863); and finally William (born 1866).

On the day of the 1861 census, Charles and Sarah Elizabeth were living near his pharmacy at 107 Junction Terrace and seven of the children that had been born to them so far were at home. Also in the household were three young men who worked in the pharmacy, a cook, a housemaid and two nursemaids. However, three-year-old Maud was away from home visiting Robert and Emy Henderson in Lambeth.

Charles and Sarah Elizabeth Cracknell moved to Knoyle House, Castlebar Road Ealing in time for Ralph and William to be born there. Sarah Elizabeth died there in 1867 aged only 41, worn out, I should think, by having borne ten children in sixteen years. Maud was nine.

All the Cracknell girls were a little too old for their education to have been dictated by the 1870 Education Act. Though Henry Watts and Herbert had been sent away to school in Maidenhead, the presence of a governess in the household on the day of the 1871 census suggests that Susannah, Maud and Alice - all declared still to be in full-time education - were being educated at home. The governess, Annie Wranger, was English; that is, she was not the kind of top-drawer (and very expensive) foreign-born governess that the wealthy tended to employ to teach their daughters to speak French and possibly German too with the correct accent. Miss Wranger was probably teaching the younger boys as well, though they were young enough to go to an 1870 Act school for a few years. The education Maud Cracknell is likely to have got under those circumstances was focused on bible study, sewing, and social skills. The older daughters would have been doing the social round and ordering the house's three servants - a cook, housemaid and nurse.

Charles Cracknell died, at Knoyle House, in May 1880. I have opted not to pay to see a copy of his Will and I can't decide just from the doings of his daughters in the years after he died whether Charles left them any income at all, let alone enough to live on comfortably. On the day of the 1881 census Henry, Elizabeth, Susannah, Herbert, Alice and Ralph at least were still living at Knoyle House but I do think that financial belts had had to be tightened: Elizabeth was working as a daily governess (that is, working in someone's household, not in a school, but not living in that household), and the household was down to one servant while Susannah and Alice - declared by the census official to have no occupation or income - were probably doing the cooking and shopping. I think it's most likely that Maud was still living at Knoyle House too but once again on census day, she was not at home with the rest of the family. She was staying with Henry and Frances Birch in Norwood. Henry Birch was the owner of a pharmacy and had, perhaps, been one of Charles Cracknell's apprentices. Mr Birch employed an assistant, and - with a cook and a housemaid - the Birch household had more servants than the Cracknells.

It's not clear to me exactly when the Cracknells left Knoyle House but by 1891 the old household of siblings was breaking up. Sarah Emily had married in 1874 - I think she was the only one of his children to do so before Charles Cracknell died. Alice had also married. Herbert Cracknell finished his apprenticeship and took over running the family pharmacy; he married Augusta Mary Ford in 1890. Ralph Cracknell went to work in the United States. I can find nothing out after 1871 about Maud's elder sisters Elizabeth and Susannah but on the day of the 1891 census the household of siblings was down to four members - Henry Watts, William E, Mary Louisa and Maud - and they were all living as lodgers in the household of Philip and Amelia Moon in Hampstead. This was the last sighting I had of William E Cracknell; I don't know what happened to him after 1891. But the household was broken up further in 1895 when Henry Watts Cracknell married Annie Letitia Collins.

Maud Cracknell, at 33, seems to have taken the breaking-up of the household as a liberation. She set about correcting, as far as she was able, a lack she seems to have felt in that domestic, governess-led education. She spent the academic year 1893/94 as a student at St Andrew's University. Maybe that one year was all she could afford at the time, but she returned to the university in 1896 to do its summer session. As a result of that one year and few months, Maud Cracknell became one of the best educated women members of the Golden Dawn. Doesn't that say a lot about the education of women in general at the time? She also, during 1896, spent some months living in Edinburgh and met some GD members.

Back in London in March 1895, Maud also joined the Theosophical Society. The sponsors of her application were Elsie Goring and Lilian (or Lillian - the sources don't agree) Lloyd, both very active TS members, involved in a lot of its social work activities. Maud joined Blavatsky Lodge, which met at the TS headquarters in Regent's Park and had a very busy programme of lectures and discussion groups. She will have met the TS's most prominent figures there (Annie Besant, the Keightley family); and several people who had been in the GD, though of course she wouldn't have known them as such. Maud continued as a TS member until November 1899; I think she found the GD's emphasis on the western esoteric tradition more to her taste.

If people have discovered the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn through an interest in magic, there's probably one thing they know about Maud Cracknell: she was the 2nd Order member who refused to let Aleister Crowley into its rooms at 36 Blythe Road in April 1900, precipitating the series of events referred to as the Battle of Blythe Road. The most detailed descriptions of this incident that are in the public domain are based on Crowley's account of the affair. I'm sure it can't be trusted as a true description of what went on; there are other sources for parts of what happened that contradict it. However, I'm not going to pursue that line. Instead I will now look at what happened from Maud Cracknell's point of view.

Maud had been appointed assistant secretary to the 2nd Order, to help Dorothea Hunter with its administration (Dorothea was busy with two small children). It had been Maud that Crowley had written to a few weeks before, requesting some manuscripts available only to 2nd Order members. Maud must have replied that, to be allowed read those manuscripts, he must apply to Dorothea as her superior officer. Crowley did so, and received a letter from Dorothea on behalf of the GD's 2nd Order, saying that they were not prepared to recognise Crowley as a member. On Saturday 6 April 1900 Crowley went round to 36 Blythe Road, where the 2nd Order rented some rooms for its rituals. He found Maud Cracknell there, who told him that no one could go into the 2nd Order's rooms without the consent of the GD's ruling Committee. Crowley asked Maud if she had a key to the vault and it seems that Maud deliberately misled him: she said hadn't got one, she was too new a member to expect to have one. If this was a dig at Crowley, who was an even newer member if he was a member at all, Crowley's own account doesn't mention that he noticed. Instead he pressed on with his questions about access, and asked her if she could get into the vault in any case. Maud said no, she couldn't. She suggested that if he wanted to gain permission to enter the vault he should approach one of three Committee members to take the matter up with them: Florence Farr, Marcus Worsley Blackden or (probably) Edmund Hunter. And Crowley left.

Maud being at 36 Blythe Road when Crowley turned up was not a coincidence: Maud was living there and on the day of the 1901 census she was still living there, with the GD's landlord Charles Wilkinson, Charles' wife Annie and their two sons Edgar and Frank, but keeping a separate household of one in the rooms rented by the GD's 2nd Order. Was she there as a security guard? Kind-of. The Committee had set itself up to rule the Isis-Urania temple, in opposition to the rule of Samuel Mathers, and they were expecting trouble. But she was also there because it was useful to have a 2nd Order member on the premises to take in parcels - and to let members in to the vault.

As soon as Crowley was gone Maud sat down and wrote a letter to the third person whose name she'd suggested to Crowley, warning him or her to expect a visit from Crowley in which he would be demanding to be treated as a 2nd Order member. The name of the person Maud wrote to isn't known for sure but Ellic Howe thinks it was most likely to be Edmund Hunter, who lived quite nearby and was certainly involved later in the sequence of events. The letter shows that Maud had used her relatively lowly status in the 2nd Order to be rid of Crowley and buy a bit of time. She told him she "had never had a private key" and Crowley swallowed the inference she was making. But the letter shows that she she did have A key - surely it would be pointless her living on the premises if she didn't. In the letter she said she had felt uncomfortable about leading Crowley astray. However, she had stuck to her instructions: Crowley did not have the Committee's permission to enter the 2nd Order rooms, so she was not going to let him in.

I hope that Maud never found out that, in reward for these prevarications, Crowley was to describe her as "an ancient Sapphic Crack, unlikely to be filled". Though it was written in a letter to a follower, Crowley's spiteful jibe has nevertheless made it into the public domain and has become the second thing most people know about Maud Cracknell. If she DID hear of it, and it hurt at all, she could have reflected that it's just the sort of thing men do say about a woman who has said no to them.

Of course, Maud had correctly judged that the matter wouldn't end there. Crowley went to Paris, was initiated into the 2nd Order by Mathers and returned as Mathers' champion, intending to take over the Isis-Urania temple on Mathers' behalf. On Tuesday 17 April, he made a second visit to 36 Blythe Road with Elaine Simpson, who was a 2nd Order member whose loyalties lay with Mathers. Mr Wilkinson wasn't in - presumably, Crowley waited until he was out - and Crowley and Elaine Simpson went upstairs. Once again, he found Maud Cracknell there, and duly suspended her from the GD. Maud offered no resistance when Elaine Simpson used her key to get into the 2nd Order rooms, but went out to get some back-up by sending a telegram to Edmund Hunter, to come at once. Either Maud or Edmund Hunter also summoned Florence Farr, as the GD's Chief Adept in England.

Edmund Hunter reached Blythe Road before Florence Farr and returned to the 2nd Order rooms with Maud. Crowley told Maud to leave, but Hunter took her part, saying that she didn't have to go on Crowley's orders. However, Hunter was confused himself about whether Crowley had any right to be in the rooms, and the situation wasn't made any better when Florence Farr arrived because she hadn't got any papers with her to show who was the legal tenant. Crowley was left in possession of the 2nd Order rooms for a day or two and I presume Maud went to stay with friends or relatives. However on Thursday 19 April Edmund Hunter was able to go round to 36 Blythe Road again to speak to Mr Wilkinson, who confirmed that Florence Farr was his tenant, as she paid the rent.

Florence Farr and Edmund Hunter seem to have decided that Maud Cracknell had endured enough unpleasantness by now. Perhaps, as Crowley's attitude had been threatening, they also agreed that - next time he called - he should meet an all-male reception committee. Because it was W B Yeats who went upstairs with Hunter to oversee the installation of a new set of locks on the doors to the 2nd Order rooms. And when Crowley turned up, it was those two who met him at street level and told him he had no authority to enter. It was Mr Wilkinson who summoned a policeman. Hunter's report to the 2nd Order Committee doesn't mention it, but there was some sort of fracas, in which he knocked Crowley down, but Crowley did then leave peacefully. Just in case he tried to stage a come-back, W B Yeats stayed in the 2nd Order rooms until 25 April, but at some point after that date, Maud was able to return to them and she was not bothered by any more such trouble.

Maud Cracknell continued to be a member of the Golden Dawn through the traumatic years 1901-03, though she did not play a large part in all the debates and arguments about who was to be in charge, and what kind of organisation it should be. However when - finally - the GD split into two, she was obliged to make a choice, which daughter order to go with. She chose to become a member of A E Waite's new order, which was intending to move away from the magical tradition as represented by Samuel Mathers. It's possible that with Mathers living in Paris and coming to London less and less often, Maud may know him slightly, if at all, and thus did not have the conflict of loyalties longer-serving GD members were suffering from. Maud must have attended a the meeting at which Waite's group compiled the new order's manifesto (on 24 July 1903) as she was one of those who signed it. However, at the first formal meeting of the Independent and Rectified Order RR et AC (usually referred to as the Independent Rite or Order) she was not named as one of its officers.

How active a member of the Independent and Rectified Rite (IRR) Maud was I do not know. She moved to Worthing. Of course it was easy enough to come up to London from Sussex for the IRR's meetings, but Worthing became her home, probably by 1911 when on the day of the census, she was staying with sisters Margaret and Mellona Heale at a house in the town. Later Maud lived with her sister Mary Louisa Cracknell in Christchurch Road Worthing. Mary Louisa died in 1928, but Maud herself lived on until she was 92, becoming one of the last GD members to die. She died in 1950 and was buried in the same grave as Mary Louisa in Worthing's Broadwater Cemetery.

MAUD CRACKNELL'S SIBLINGS

Despite searching the censuses and b/m/d registrations I can't find out what happened to Maud's sisters Elizabeth and Susannah, and her brother William.

Although Maud joined the GD through contacts in Edinburgh she might have already unwittingly known GD members living in London, through her family's interest in modern arts and crafts. Maud's father had been a member of the Art Union of London where, for a small yearly subscription, you were entitled to receive an engraving of a famous work of art, and to have your name in a draw, the winner of which was bought an original modern art work. This willingness to fund modern art continued through Maud's sister Sarah Emily.

Sarah Emily Cracknell married Edward Penton in 1874. Her husband was the proprietor of the large shoe and boot making firm, Edward Penton and Sons Limited, which was based in Mortimer Street London W1. The connection between the two families was reinforced later, when Maud and Sarah Emily's brother Henry Watts Cracknell joined the firm as its accountant. The Pentons had artist friends: on the day of the 1901 census, although her husband was away from home, Sarah Emily had visitors, amongst them Caroline Gotch, artist wife of Thomas Cooper Gotch, and their daughter Phyllis. T C Gotch himself was staying a few streets away at the Arts Club, 40 Dover Street. I can't tell from accounts of T C Gotch's life how long he and Caroline had known the Pentons, and how well they knew them; but T C and Caroline had been at Heatherley Art School in the 1870s with Henry Marriott Paget and Henrietta Farr, Florence Farr's sister. Henry Marriott and Henrietta had later married; and were long-serving GD members.

The Pentons were wealthy: they lived at 9 Cavendish Square, just off Oxford Street, and could afford to commission works of art. I think that it was Sarah Emily's son (another Edward) and her daughter-in-law Eleanor who asked T C Gotch to draw their children. In 1907 the art journal The Studio showed a photograph of a triptych called Stephen and Two Attendant Figures, with the attendants on side panels framing a picture of a child's head. The triptych was shown "By permission of Mrs Penton". The little boy in the central panel is her son Denys Stephen Penton. In 1913 T C Gotch did another drawing of one of the Penton boys, this time of Christopher.

On the day of the 1871 census, twins Henry Watts Cracknell and Herbert Cracknell were at the same small boarding school in Maidenhead. Later, however, their educational paths diverged. Henry Watts was sent to University College School in Hampstead, and then trained as an accountant. At least by 1901, if not long before, he was working for his brother-in-law Edward Penton. He had married Annie Letitia Collins in 1895. Annie Letitia had been a widow with two children, Charles and Nora. Henry Watts adopted Charles and Nora, and had one daughter of his own - Ursula. Henry seems to have preferred Hampstead to Ealing; and it would have been easier, on the new tube system, for him to get to Edward Penton and Son's premises from Hampstead. I have said above that he and Maud were living in that area in 1891. On the day of the 1901 census, Henry and his family were living at 40 Belsize Road Hampstead. By 1911 they had moved to 2 Netherhall Gardens; and when Henry died in 1932 they were living at 48 Greencroft Gardens.

Herbert Cracknell, meanwhile, trained to follow his and Maud's father into the family's pharmacy business; and by 1886 he was listed in the Registers of Pharmaceutical Chemists. It was under his leadership that the pharmacy also began selling photographic equipment. Herbert also moved it to new premises in the Paddington area and took on a second shop in Messaline Avenue in the new suburbs between Acton and Kensal Green. He married Augusta Ford, whom he knew from Ealing, in 1890. The family business is still listed in the latest Quarterly Journal of Pharmacy and Pharmacology that I could find on the web: the issue for 1939.

Ralph Cracknell had begun his working life as so many young men did in the 1870s, as a clerk for a firm in the City. However, by the late 1880s he had given that up for journalism. I think, perhaps, that he couldn't get a job as a reporter in England; though he might just have wanted to travel - because I can't find any evidence of his having worked for an English newspaper. In 1888 or 1889 he moved to Boston Massachusetts and worked for various papers there, particularly the Boston Globe, as a sports reporter, covering the new sports of lawn tennis and golf, and - cricket! And playing cricket too, in various ad hoc teams around Boston. On a very different note, Ralph became involved in the movement originally called the Bellamy Clubs, but later changed to the Nationalist Clubs. These clubs were founded to bring about in contemporary America the ideas put forward in the Utopian novel Looking Backward, written by newspaper proprietor Edward Bellamy and published in 1888. The book, and the clubs, promulgated a type of Christian socialism, involving the nationalisation of all American industry, full employment and retirement at 45. The Bellamy Club of Boston was the first to be founded, in December 1888; some of its members were also members of the Theosophical Society. The movement never took any real hold on American society (as one might expect) and folded around 1896.

He doesn't seem to have married. He died in Boston in 1913, aged 53.

BASIC SOURCES I USED for all Golden Dawn members.

Membership of the Golden Dawn: The Golden Dawn Companion by R A Gilbert. Northampton: The Aquarian Press 1986. Between pages 125 and 175, Gilbert lists the names, initiation dates and addresses of all those people who became members of the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn or its many daughter Orders between 1888 and 1914. The list is based on the Golden Dawn's administrative records and its Members' Roll - the large piece of parchment on which all new members signed their name at their initiation. All this information had been inherited by Gilbert but it's now in the Freemasons' Library at the United Grand Lodge of England building on Great Queen Street Covent Garden.

Family history: freebmd; ancestry.co.uk (census and probate); findmypast.co.uk; familysearch; Burke's Peerage and Baronetage; Burke's Landed Gentry; Armorial Families; thepeerage.com; and a wide variety of family trees on the web.

Famous-people sources: mostly about men, of course, but very useful even for the female members of GD. Oxford Dictionary of National Biography. Who Was Who. Times Digital Archive.

Catalogues: British Library; Freemasons' Library.

Wikipedia; Google; Google Books - my three best resources. I also used other web pages, but with some caution, as - from the historian's point of view - they vary in quality a great deal.

SOURCES FOR MAUD CRACKNELL:

St Andrew's University: Matriculation Roll of the University of St Andrew's 1747-1897, published 1905, edited by James M Anderson. Maud is listed on p305 and on p316. Further information on matriculation in general: pxxiii and pxxv.

Theosophical Society: TS Membership Registers 1889-1901 held at the TS Library at its headquarters, 50 Gloucester Place London.

About Elsie Goring: Theosophical Review volume 36 1905 and volume 40 1907 have articles by her.

Lillian or Lilian Lloyd: a modern source The Divine Feminine: Theosophy and Feminism by Joy Dixon. Baltimore and London: The Johns Hopkins University Press 2001. There's a reference on p133 to Lloyd having founded the TS's Match Girls' Club, active during the 1890s in East London.

Both of them played imp roles at the TS European Section congress of 1907: see Transactions of the 2nd Congress of the European Sections of the Theosophical Society published by the TS's European Section 1907. P7 it took place from Saturday 8 July [1907] to p10 Monday 10 July [1907] p7 at the Empress Rooms in Kensington, and 600 people attended. P12 in the section Meetings of Departments there is a report of a meeting of Department F which dealt with Administration, Propaganda and Methods. Elsie Goring was unable to attend this meeting so in her absence, Fraulein von Sivers explained a scheme being set up by a group of TS members to explore the connections between modern science and the works of Blavatsky. Miss Goring was an important member of this new group. On P12 there's a report of the meeting of Department E - Art, at which Lillian (sic and I think this is the correct spelling) Lloyd read a paper: The Modern Symbolist Movement.

Via www.worthing.gov.uk's Burial Register Search: Maud Cracknell is buried in Broadwater Cemetery, South Farm Road Worthing: Section C22, Row 3, Grave number 2 - the same grave as Mary Louisa.

Maud's father Charles Cracknell the pharmacist

Annual Report of the Art Union of London, volumes 11-12 1847. Seen via googlebooks: p54 alphabetical list, probably of subscribers but I couldn't see from the snippet. Includes C Cracknell of 106 Edgware Road. Via website www.victorianlondon.org/entertainment: entry for the Art Union of London. Established 1836, existed for 75 years; at 444 West Strand. Founded with the intention of encouraging new art and design. A yearly sub of 1 guinea would entitle the subscriber to receive an engraving to that value of a well-known painting. Their name would also go into a draw, done every April. The winner of the draw would be bought an art work of value anything from £10 to £200. By 1867 the Art Union had spent £10000 buying art works.

The Spectator volume 20 1847 p956 Charles Cracknell of 106 Edgeware Road is mentioned but I can't see in what connection from the snippet.

The Economist volume 8 part 2 1850 p1090 Charles Cracknell with address 107 Junction Terrace. NB I'm inclined to think that 107 Edgeware Road and 107 Junction Terrace are actually the same house.

Proceedings of the British Pharmaceutical Conference 1869 pvii in a list of members: C Cracknell of 107 Edgeware Road. P2 he appears again in a list of men elected since its last meeting. From the snippet I'm not quite sure what it is these men have been elected to: perhaps it is the British Pharmaceutical Society.

ABOUT THE BATTLE OF BLYTHE ROAD

I used Ellic Howe's The Magicians of the Golden Dawn as the basis for my account. Routledge and Kegan Paul 1972. Pages 219-232. Howe's main source (see p205) is a typescript in the Gerald Yorke Collection of Crowley's The Book of the Operation of the Sacred Magic of Abramelin the Mage. However, Howe did use other sources. He doesn't say where the letter to Maud wrote to the unnamed GD member is but I suppose it was in the Private Collection and is now at the FML. The reference to Maud as a lesbian is on p207. Another account of what happened on Tuesday 17 April 1900 is by Edmund Hunter; I'm not quite sure where Howe found the account - presumably it too was in Gerald Yorke's papers.

Gerald Yorke's occult library and other papers are now at the Warburg Institute Library, University of London.

Other accounts of the battle:

A short one is the web at www.tomegatherion.co.uk/gd.htm seen June 2012. Crowley's diary for the period (seen June 2012) is at www.beyondweird.com/crowley/crowleys\_diary.htm. Darcy Kuntz of the Golden Dawn Trust has written a book on it: The Battle of Blythe Road: A Golden Dawn Affair, Golden Dawn Studies Series number 14, published August 1987.

For Yeats' part, see W B Yeats, A Life: Volume 1: The Apprentice Mage by R F Foster. Oxford and New York: Oxford University Press 1998: pp231-32.

The Independent and Rectified Rite

About the different paths taken by Waite, and by Robert Felkin, after the break-up of the Golden Dawn: Ellic Howe op cit p255.

A E Waite: A Magician of Many Parts by R A Gilbert. Wellingborough: Crucible Press 1987.

Appendix C p178-79 has the full wording of the declaration arrived at by those at a meeting held on 24 July 1903. It announces their intention of founding a new order along freemasonry lines but with the intention of including women as members and holders of office. The signatories were (in the order they appear in the book and presumably on the original announcement): William Ayton; Marcus Worsley Blackden; A E Waite; Helen Rand; Harriet Butler; Pamela Bullock; Julian Baker; Helen Fulham Hughes; Kate E Broomhead; Isabelle de Steiger; Maud Cracknell; and Ada Blackden. P180 reproduces its constitution, formulated at a meeting on 7 November 1903; there are no signatures attached to it so it's not possible to know whether Maud Cracknell was there. The new order would meet four times a year, on the first Saturday of January, April, July and September. On 1 July 2012 I found the full text of the book on the web at www.scribd.com/doc/78917542/A-E-Waite-a-Magician-of-Many-Parts-R-A-Gilbert; it's available for download.

Maud Cracknell's siblings: Sarah Emily Penton.

Kelly's Directory of the Leather Trades issued 1880 p14 couldn't see the whole of it from google's snippet but it was a large and coloured (that is, more expensive) advert for Edward Penton and Son, established 1833.

Kelly's Directory of London 1895 has Edward Penton and Son at 1-3 Mortimer Street W1; manufacturer of sewn boots and shoes, and of dancing pumps and shoes.

Journal of the Royal Agricultural Society of England volume 81 1920 p154 advert from Edward Penton and Son for leather leggings for agricultural workers. The firm's address is now 1-11 Mortimer Street.

Journal of the Royal Society of Arts (RSA) volume 74 1926 p418 short obituary of Mr Edward Penton (Sarah Cracknell's husband) who had died at home in Cavendish Square on 5 March [1926] aged 80. The obituary describes him (I think, wrongly, I think he's the son of the founder) as founder of the firm of Edward Penton and Son, now of Mortimer St and Newman St. He was made a Fellow of the RSA in 1897. He had retired from active involvement in the firm by the outbreak of World War 1, but took up the reins again so that his son could concentrate on his job as Superintendent of the Boot Section, Royal Army Clothing Department.

//lat.bookmaps.org/g/e/gen\_30.html has a list of footwear, rubbers, leather goods etc issued by Edward Penton and Son Ltd 1932-33. Also a centenary list dated 1832-1932.

Sarah Emily Penton's son is Sir Edward Penton KBE:

Journal of the Royal Central Asian Society volume 24 no 1 1937 inside front page: a list of current officers. Sir Edward Penton KBE is the Society's current honorary secretary.

Website www.greywall.demon.co.uk/genealogy/WynnHall/tim.html is a family tree of the descendents of the Rev Timothy Kenrick 1759-1804 of Wynn Hall, Ruabon, Denbighshire. A daughter of his married into the Sharpe family and one of her daughters married into the Courtauld family. Eleanor Sharpe 1878-1951 married 1902 (Sarah Emily's son) Edward Penton (later made KBE) 1875-1967, born 9 Cavendish Square London W1; they had a large family, there are lots of descendants.

The Studio: an Illustrated Magazine of Fine and Applied Art volume 42 no 175 issue of 15 October 1907 p55 in the Studio Talk column: a reproduction of a triptych by T C Gotch called Stephen and Two Attendant Figures, shown "By permission of Mrs Penton". The triptych was an elaboration of an original which was just the picture of a child's head, exhibited by T C Gotch "last year". The triptych has the child's head in the middle panel with two angel-like creatures, one on either side. The item in The Studio describes the triptych as a triumph by T C Gotch in difficult art of combining one central panel with two side panels to make a whole.

Henry Watts Cracknell:

Alphabetical and Chronological Register of University College School 1831-91, published by the College in 1892. Henry W Cracknell appears on p92 with "73-76" which seems rather too late to denote his years at the school. He's in a list alphabetical by surname; Herbert Cracknell is not in the list.

Herbert Cracknell and the family pharmacy:

Registers of Pharmaceutical Chemists 1886 p7 has him in it.

Druggists' Circular and Chemical Gazette volume 43 1898 p214 Herbert is in a list of honorary local secretaries; but I couldn't see what they were secretaries of.

Photographic Dealer and D&P (sic and I don't know what it stands for - Druggist and Pharmacy?) Trade Review volume 16 1904 p153 lists Herbert Cracknell at 17 Craven Road and 2 Messaline Avenue Acton.

Pharmaceutical Journal 1904 p729 has Herbert Cracknell with business addresses Craven Road Paddington and Messaline Avenue Acton: "pharmaceutical chemist".

Yearbook of Pharmacy 1925 p326 Herbert's still being listed.

Quarterly Journal of Pharmacy and Pharmacology 1939 p831 he's still listed.

Ralph Cracknell:

Physical Education volume 1 1892 p7 contents list, I suppose for this issue; the list includes a book review or (more likely) an article by Ralph: Cricket as Played in America.

The Bookseller and Newsman volume 10 1893 p6 has short report on a farewell dinner given by the local guild of newspaper reporters for Ralph as he was abt to return to England after 4 years working for various newspapers in and around Boston. Perhaps he was hoping that, now he had some experience, a job on an English newspaper would be forthcoming; it wasn't, and he seems to have returned to the USA.

Outing (I think this is an American journal) volume 28 1896 p154 describes Ralph as a "phenomenal cricket-player".

American Lawn Tennis volume 1 published by the US Lawn Tennis Association 1898 p131 Ralph is a member of the Association. Wikipedia's article on the Association gives the date of its founding as 1881.

American Review of Reviews volume 48 1913 p166 a notice of Ralph's death, which had occurred on 24 June [1913]; he was 53. He's described as "journalist and authority on golf matters".

The Nationalist: A Monthly Magazine volume 1 1968 p19 in an article covering the early years of the Bellamy Club; Ralph was elected its first Secretary.

At www.cricketchive.com/Archive/Players/78/78732/78732.html, the Cricket Archive players' section includes Ralph Cracknell. Born 27 May 1863; died 24 June 1913 Boston Mass. This is where I found the reference to his working for the Boston Globe; no dates were given for his time there. The database says that Ralph played for several cricket teams in the Boston area between 1890 and 1894.

Cricket in America 1700-2000 by P David Sentance 2006 p63 says Ralph was known especially as a bowler.

1 July 2012

AMandragora@attglobal.net

When R A Gilbert was looking at the Golden Dawn Members' Roll preparing the list of members for his book The Golden Dawn Companion, several people's handwriting - squeezed into the small space available - gave him trouble. He decided that one member who joined the GD in 1900 was named Archibald Cameron Cresswell Keppel. I spent quite a lot of time searching for this person and coming up with nothing and eventually, in desperation, I tried arranging his names in a different order. I can now say that man's correct name was Keppel Archibald Cameron Creswell. He was initiated into the GD's Isis-Urania Temple on 29 November 1900 and took the Latin motto 'Sic itur ad astra'. Unlike with Archibald Cameron Cresswell Keppel, the web had plenty of information on Keppel Archibald Cameron Creswell. In his profession, although not particularly in this country, he turned out to be very well-known indeed. I have leaned very heavily in this short account of his life on R W Hamilton's Keppel Archibald Cameron Creswell 1879-1974, published by the British Academy in 1975. However, Hamilton had not done a great deal of work on his subject's early life.

In 1878 Keppel Creswell, from a Nottinghamshire family but working in the City of London, married Margaret Henderson, the daughter of a solicitor. Keppel Archibald Cameron Creswell, their elder child, was born in London in 1879 and named after his father though he was always known as Archie.

In 1881 Archie's father was working as an underwriter. Until 1892 he was employed at Baring Brothers and Company's bank, in their insurance department, but in the wake of the run on Barings and the firm's near-bankruptcy in 1890-91, he left, and went into partnership with his brother, Alfred Augustus Creswell, who was already in business as an insurance broker with offices at 28 Cornhill. The new firm was called A A Creswell and Company and it was still in business in the 1920s. Alfred Augustus Creswell was already a member of Lloyds Register, which listed firms which insured shipping. Keppel Creswell joined the Register around 1905.

The Creswells had moved into 12 Regent's Park Road in north London by 1881 and Archie's parents were still living there in 1911; in my researches on the GD members I've discovered that living so long in one house was rare amongst them. The family was a small one - Archie's only sibling was Margery, born in 1881. They were the only household at the address but the household was a modest one. In 1881 the Creswells employed one general servant and a nurse; in 1901 their only employee was a housemaid - meaning, I think, that Archie's mother did a great deal of the housework herself helped, as she grew older, by Margery.

Margaret Creswell was a Roman Catholic. However, Archie was given a Church of England-based education and - according to people who knew him later in life - did not have any strong religious views. Archie was at Westminster School from 1891-96. There he showed an aptitude for maths, especially geometry; though he also won prizes for English. On leaving school he studied the new subject of electrical engineering at the City and Guilds Technical College at Finsbury and worked for several years for Siemens before changing career to become a clerk at the Bank of England, where he was in 1901, still living at home. By 1914 he was working, again as a clerk, for the Deutsche Bank in its London office.

Archie became a member of the Golden Dawn at a time during a difficult period for the Order - it was not a good time to begin your studies in magic with the GD. A very junior member and aged only 21 when he was initiated, Archie took no part in the debates that were tearing the GD apart. On the other hand, he wasn't listed as a member of any of the daughter Orders that were set up in 1903. He did continue to investigate ancient Egyptian magic, but on his own, and published one article comparing Egyptian magical texts with the Kabbalah, in Occult Review.

R W Hamilton suggests that the foundations of Archie's interest in Islamic architecture were laid while he was a child: for his 12th birthday he was given a book with pictures of Middle Eastern buildings in it; and he also won a copy of George Rawlinson's The Seventh Great Oriental Monarchy. Archie himself later attributed his passion for eastern culture to Rawlinson's monumental work. He had several other interests: he was a good photographer; he was a fitness freak; and he was interested in the Kabbalah - finding his way into the GD as a result of it and also writing his first published work: A Comparison of the Hebrew Sephiroth with the Paut Neteru of Egypt, which appeared in Occult Review in 1912. However, by 1914 his interest in Islamic architecture was becoming his main focus. He had read Flinders Petrie's Methods and Aims in Archaeology (published 1904), a reference work for those doing survey work on ancient buildings, which (amongst other things) promoted the use of photographs to record architectural detail. He had started out on one of his life's works - the compiling of a bibliography of all the existing works on Islamic architecture. And in May of that year he had applied for a job with the Archaeological Survey of India.

World War I prevented his job application from being taken up but sent his working life in a completely new direction. He doesn't seem to have been one of those who volunteered to fight in 1914 or 1915, but he was called up in April 1916, after the first conscription acts became law and - no doubt due to his technical training - made a Lieutenant in the fledgling Royal Flying Corps. By 1918 he had been promoted to Captain. There's some debate about exactly when he arrived in Egypt but all sources agree he was there by 1918. In the wake of the Armistice, Great Britain was handed Palestine to rule and Archie was given the job of Inspector of Monuments, Occupied Enemy Territory and asked to survey all the ancient monuments of Syria and Palestine. The survey occupied 1919 and 1920 and formed the basis for his academic career. Demobbed from the air force by 1922, he didn't return to England, he stayed in Egypt and invented the academic discipline of the study of Islamic architecture.

In the course of the next 50 years or so Archie Creswell wrote many books on Islamic architecture, both academic tomes and guides for the interested tourist or art historian. However, the work on which his reputation rests is his Early Muslim Architecture, which he got King Fu'ad I of Egypt to fund, and which appeared in several exhaustive volumes between 1932 and 1940. His particular interest was the architecture built by members of the (Muslim) Fatimid dynasty which ruled Egypt from 969 to 1171; there are many splendid examples in Cairo.

In 1931 Archie was again called on by King Fu'ad, this time to establish a programme of study at the King Fu'ad University of Cairo. Although Archie did not have a university degree he was still the best qualified, by practical experience, to head this programme and he was appointed the university's first professor of Islamic and Archaeology, a post he held until 1951 when he seems to have been sacked, or stormed off, for reasons that are still not clear. A hiatus followed, during which time (I think it was during this period) Archie spent some time at Princeton University, before being appointed to another professorship in Egypt in 1956, this time at the American University. 1956, of course, was the year of the Suez Crisis, during which anyone with English connections had a hard time in Egypt. Archie was all prepared to leave the country until he found he would not be allowed to take his books with him. The American University in Cairo stepped in to offer a home for the books, and Archie stayed on in Egypt. By this time he had been living outside the UK for over 30 years, and from some of accounts of his work, particularly those that have been written by Arabic scholars, I get the impression of a man forgetting that time had moved on: a man always impeccably dressed in a suit in the manner of a colonial official; hostile to Jews and to the policy of allowing West Indians into Britain (mind you, he wasn't alone in having those attitudes); a man bellowing at the staff in restaurants when the food wasn't good enough.

His work has also been criticised, for concentrating too much on the mathematical and design aspects of architecture and not considering the social and economic reasons why a building might have been designed like it was. His emphasis on chronology is now thought to be a rather limiting approach. And as he did not learn to read Arabic he was unable to study some original texts. I do feel that some of these criticisms are rather harsh - after all, the man was inventing an entire new academic subject. And all modern scholars seem to agree that Archie's body of work will be the classic texts on their subject for some time to come.

Riding out the difficult times of Suez, Archie Creswell continued to live and work in Egypt until his failing health finally required him to have more nursing care. He returned to England in 1973 and died in Twyford Abbey Nursing Home in Acton, west London, on 8 April 1974.

BASIC SOURCES I USED for all Golden Dawn members.

Membership of the Golden Dawn: The Golden Dawn Companion by R A Gilbert. Northampton: The Aquarian Press 1986. Between pages 125 and 175, Gilbert lists the names, initiation dates and addresses of all those people who became members of the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn or its many daughter Orders between 1888 and 1914. The list is based on the Golden Dawn's administrative records and its Members' Roll - the large piece of parchment on which all new members signed their name at their initiation. All this information had been inherited by Gilbert but it's now in the Freemasons' Library at the United Grand Lodge of England building on Great Queen Street Covent Garden.

Family history: freebmd; ancestry.co.uk (census and probate); findmypast.co.uk; familysearch; Burke's Peerage and Baronetage; Burke's Landed Gentry; Armorial Families; thepeerage.com; and a wide variety of family trees on the web.

Famous-people sources: mostly about men, of course, but very useful even for the female members of GD. Oxford Dictionary of National Biography. Who Was Who. Times Digital Archive.

Catalogues: British Library; Freemasons' Library.

Wikipedia; Google; Google Books - my three best resources. I also used other web pages, but with some caution, as - from the historian's point of view - they vary in quality a great deal.

Archie Creswell's father KEPPEL CRESWELL

Seen via the Times Digital Archive: Times Monday 1 February 1892 p11b in The Money Market column: a reference to Keppel Creswell, describing him as "late manager of Messrs Baring Brothers and Co's insurance department". Creswell had now gone into partnership with his brother A A Creswell of 28 Cornhill. A A Creswell was an insurance broker. The partnership would be known as A A Creswell and Co.

Some information from Wikipedia on the run on Baring Brothers: Wikipedia says that the bank had got over-exposed in the 1880s to debt incurred by the governments of Uruguay and Argentina. In 1890 there was a financial crisis in Argentina during which its government fell and the nation nearly defaulted. What's often referred to as the Panic of 1890 and which involved the run on Barings began during November 1890; the bank had to be rescued by a consortium led by the Bank of England. The bank was turned into a limited company; the Baring brothers lost their partnerships and their personal fortunes. The Bank did pay its debts - it took 10 years - but has never been the same since.

Lloyd's Register of British and Foreign Shipping volume 2 1898 p769 list of annual subscribers includes Alfred Augustus Creswell of A A Creswell and Co, with "Date of election 1879".

Lloyd's Register of Shipping volume 2 1912 p986 has Keppel Creswell of A A Creswell and Co listed (which he wasn't in 1898), with a date of election I couldn't quite read on Google's snippet; it might have been 1905.

The Post Magazine and Insurance Monitor volume 87 no 1 p28 issue of 2 January 1926, A A Creswell was still in exist then.

ARCHIE CRESWELL AND THE OCCULT

This is the only item I found. At www.austheos.org.au/indices/OCCREV.HTM there's an index to articles published in Occult Review between 1905 and 1948; I searched to mid-1927 and found only one by Archie Creswell. Occult Review volume 16 1912, issue of December p49: Creswell's A Comparison of the Hebrew Sephiroth with the Paut Neteru of Egypt.

ARCHIE CRESWELL AS A HISTORIAN OF ARCHITECTURE

The Isma'ilis: their History and Doctrines by Farhad Daftary 1992 p254 which describes Archie as "the leading modern authority on the Fatimid monuments". And a note from Wikipedia on what that means: the Fatimid Period refers to Egypt 969 to the death of the last Fatimid caliph in September 1171, so that it includes the early Crusades, Saladdin etc.

Modernism in the Middle East eds Sandy Isenstadt and Kishwar Rizvi 2008, p10.

Times Sat 13 April 1974 p24a death notices: K A C Creswell had d "on 8th April, 1974" at Twyford Abbey Nursing Home. And the obituary on p14f.

Who Was Who 1971-80 p183.

Bibliography of the Architecture, Arts and Crafts of Islam AUTHOR. It gives a more personal account of Archie Creswell, who it describes as a small man, always impeccably dressed no matter what the circumstances or temperatures. He could not abide any form of cruelty: the author relates a tale of Archie's determination to make the Cairo police arrest a man who was beating a donkey, leaping from his car and dislocating all the traffic. However it also says of him "To his last day, Creswell was unaware of the demise of the British Empire". CBE 1955. Fellow British Academy. Gold medal Royal Asiatic Society. Knighted 1970.

Whose Pharaohs? By Donald M Reid 2003 p17.

My main source:

Muqarnas: An Annual on Islamic Art and Architecture Volume 8 is called K A C Creswell and His Legacy. Editor Prof Oleg Grabar of Harvard University. Published Leiden: E J Brill 1991

p128-133 biography of Creswell by R W Hamilton. Plus an editorial on the impact and legacy of Creswell p3 by Grabar as editor of this issue. Grabar praises Archie for being the first scholar to see how much the quality of the photographs taken mattered in this kind of survey work. Grabar first met Archie in 1953. He describes him as "feisty, opinionated, at times prejudiced". His personality was such a strong one that it tends to come out even in the supposed neutrality of scholarly publications. However, he could be very kind to young scholars. Grabar actually sees Archie as quite a vulnerable character, and a very passionate one. P2 Archie's emphasis on linear chronology now seen as a methodological flaw. However, the work that he did has still not been rendered obsolete by anything done since.

--

A note on the book by Rawlinson that Archie won as a school prize: George Rawlinson 1812-1902, Camden Professor of Ancient History, Oxford University 1861-89. The Seventh Great Oriental Monarchy covers the Sassanian (also known as Sassanid) empire; published 1875, the last in a set on the ancient history of the Middle East. Just in case Archie read the others, the first 5 in the set were published between 1862 and 1867; the 6th covers the Parthian empire, published 1873. A footnote from Wikipedia: the Sassanid empire was the last pre-Islamic empire in the Middle East, 224-651AD, succeeding the Parthian Empire and of course it wasn't in the Roman empire.

Cairo University and the Making of Modern Egypt by Donald Malcolm Reid 2002 p41 in a section noting that World War 1 "brought into the open the ties between orientalism and imperialism". Creswell ended up in Egypt through his work with the Royal Flying Corps. He was University of Cairo Professor of Islamic Architecture from 1931 to 1951. Malcolm records that Creswell's "contempt for Egyptian nationalism and his uncompromising imperialism were legendary".

In a Sea of Knowledge: British Arabists of the 20th Century by Leslie J McLoughlin 2002 p62 describes Creswell as a very good example of an Arabist who fell by chance into this field of expertise. He was in France in 1916 with the newly-founded Royal Flying Corps and was transferred to Palestine in 1918.

However Architectural History vol 50 2007 p207 the article 'C R Ashbee's Jerusalem' says Creswell had begun to study Muslim architecture in 1910. He was posted to Egypt in 1916 with the Royal Flying Corps. Both these books can't be right

ARCHIE CRESWELL AS A PHOTOGRAPHER

Maadi 1904-1962: Society and History in a Cairo Suburb by Samir W Raafat. Published Cairo: The Palm Press 1994. P36 describes Creswell as a friend of one of Maadi's most prominent residents, Mrs Henriette Devonshire. Creswell let her use photographs he had taken of the Maadi district to illustrate her book Rambles in Cairo. The book contained very detailed descriptions of Cairo's Islamic buildings and a chronology of Islamic buildings in the city. P35 Henriette Devonshire was the wife of p36 barrister p35 Robert Devonshire 1870-1921; she was née Vulliamy, born in France, 1860-1949. She organised and led tours by horse and carriage of Islamic Cairo, showing tourists the Fatimid monuments; all tours began at 2.30pm at the Continental Savoy Hotel. P11 Maadi was a suburb of Cairo, p13 to the west of the railway line p18 developed by the Delta Land and Investment Company in years after 1905. A lot of European residents lived there.

Muqarnas: An Annual on Islamic Art and Architecture Volume 8 is called K A C Creswell and His Legacy. Editor Prof Oleg Grabar of Harvard University. Published Leiden: E J Brill 1991

P117 article on Archie's library by Gloria Karnouk, who was its librarian at the time when this volume was being written. Karnouk says that Archie was influenced to make use of photography when doing field excavations by Flinders Petrie's Methods and Aims in Archaeology, published 1904. In his Will Archie left all his photographs to the Library - about 1000 of them, but with no index!

Archie met Flinders Petrie:

Flinders Petrie: A Life in Archaeology by Margaret S Drower. University of Wisconsin Press 1st edition 1985; this is from 2nd edition 1995. P348 their first meeting was in Cairo in late 1919 when Flinders Petrie and wife Hilda arrived for the digging season. Flinders Petrie was 86 but still going strong. Creswell met the Petries through mutual friends the Sobhy family. Drower describes Creswell as an "eccentric and delightful personality".

Archie's publications: the British Library has quite a few by him but these are the ones I saw mentioned most often in discussions of his work:

1932, 1940 Early Muslim Architecture in 2 volumes Oxford: Clarendon Press.

Part 1: the Umayyads 622-675

Part 2: the early Abbasids 751-905

1958 A Short Account of Early Muslim Art Penguin Books; further editions 1968, 1989

1959 The Muslim Architecture of Egypt in 2 volumes Oxford: Clarendon Press.

Vol 1: Ikshids and Fatimids 939-1171

Vol 2: Ayyubids and early Bahrite Mamluks 1171-1326

1973 Bibliography of the Architecture, Arts and Crafts of Islam. Cairo: American University in Cairo Press.

And there are these as well:

1922 A Provisional Bibliography of Painting in Muhammadan Art. London: Reiach.

1924 A Provisional Bibliography of the Moslem Architecture of Syria and Palestine.

1926 The Evolution of the Minaret focusing on its history in Egypt. London: Burlington Magazine.

1952 Fortification in Islam Before AD1250. Reprinted from Proceedings of the British Academy volume 38.

1953 Problems in Islamic Art. New York: Art Bulletin.

14 July 2012

AMandragora@attglobal.net

A WORD OF WARNING BEFORE I START: this is my biography of a member of the Golden Dawn's Horus Temple at Bradford. The Horus Temple had two groups of people in it: one group who actually lived in Bradford or the surrounding villages, and a second group who lived in Liverpool and Birkenhead. This person was one of the Liverpool/Birkenhead group. Exactly what the connection between the two groups of people was I'm not sure - it's probably that they were all in the Theosophical Society. Anyway, I could have done a much better job of this person's biography if I lived in the Liverpool area myself and could look at local archives.

Herbert Crooke was initiated into the Golden Dawn's Horus Temple in September 1894; at that time he was living at 67 Lord Street Liverpool. He chose the Latin motto 'Pax et caritas'. As the records of the Horus Temple have been lost, it isn't possible for me to know how keen a member he was, but from records at the GD headquarters in London it seems he didn't pursue his initiation very far. I shall show in this biography that Herbert found that his main interests lay elsewhere.

HERBERT'S FAMILY

Crooke is an unusual surname (the spelling without the 'e' is much more common) but I've still found it difficult to identify Herbert's parents on the 19th century censuses, so I don't know much about them. John Whitehead Crooke and Ann Eliza Monk were both born in Lancashire in the 1830s; John W in Burnley, Ann Eliza in Preston. I haven't been able to identify either of them or their families for certain on the censuses of 1841 and 1851; though on the day of the 1861 census - after John W had left home - his widowed mother Hannah was running a post office and ironmonger's shop in Clifton Street, Lytham St Anne's. Herbert Crooke and his mother were staying with Hannah that day; John W seems to have been out of the country.

John W Crooke and Ann Eliza Monk married each other in 1859 and Herbert was born in 1860, the eldest of their five children. On the day of the 1871 census John W, Ann Eliza and their family were living in Fulwood Lancashire. John W told the census official that he was working as a "cashier"; there are no details of his employer on the census form but the skills he had made him very employable - he could have been working for a bank, a cooperative society, in local government or for a business big enough to have a special department for cash transactions (like paying the work-force).

Herbert's working life indicates he had a good education. I don't know how he got it but he was just young enough to have benefited from the 1870 Education Act. If that hadn't been rolled out in the Lytham area when Herbert was of school age, the most likely alternative would have been a Church of England school run by the National Society for Promoting Religious Education. He would have left such a school at age 14 or so and by 1881 he had found work and left Liverpool. On the day of the 1881 census he was working as an engine fitter in Hull, and boarding with Martha Kelwick at 10 Thomas Street Drypool.

My assumption that Herbert Crooke had a good education is based on the next phase of his life, which I do find a bit baffling: at some point between 1881 and 1891 he returned to Lancashire and got an office job with an insurance company. It's a rare jump - engine fitting to office job. Perhaps there was something about his experience as an engine fitter with a railway company that gave him skills suited to an insurance company in an era when the business of insurance seems to have been expanding faster than the number of people experienced in the work. Perhaps Herbert Crooke had developed skills in assessing claims. Or possibly in man management, because on the day of the 1891 census he described his occupation as "manager" - he wasn't just a clerk, he managed clerks. It was a very senior position for a man just over 30 to fill.

Herbert Crooke had married Mary Allen in Preston in 1886. There are so many women called Mary Allen in the census that I haven't been able to identify Herbert's wife prior to her marriage, to discover where she grew up and whether she worked before her marriage. She and Herbert had three children, all boys: another Herbert; Norman Whitehead Crooke (born 1889); and Sidney Egerton Crooke (born 1893 and probably the godson of a GD member mentioned in the next paragraph). Herbert was born around 1886, but not in England; Mary Crooke was from Glasgow and perhaps returned to her family for the birth of her first child. Norman and Sidney were born in the Liverpool area. On the day of the 1891 census Herbert, Mary, the two elder boys and Mary's widowed mother (also called Mary) were living at 7 Windsor Road, North Meols Southport. It was in these circumstances - married with a young family and working in an insurance office probably in central Liverpool - that Herbert Crooke discovered the Theosophical Society (TS).

Herbert Crooke applied to become a member of the TS in August 1893. At that time, you had to find two members to sponsor your application and both Herbert's sponsors were members of the GD as well as the TS: Sidney Coryn; and Joseph K Gardner, who was a local man. Sidney Coryn was from London but was working in Liverpool around 1891 and kept in contact with his Liverpool acquaintances after he returned to the capital. He was from a family very actively involved in theosophy, and had studied with Helena Petrovna Blavatsky in person at the TS's worldwide headquarters in Regent's Park. He and Herbert Crooke became good friends, sharing an interest in one particular facet of theosophy which did not necessarily concern all TS members - the idea that theosophy made all men (and women) brothers under the skin.

Herbert Crooke joined the TS's Liverpool Lodge, where Joseph Gardner was based (theosophically speaking) and where he probably knew many of the members already. However, at the end of 1893 he and Mary moved to Southport, where Herbert was soon busy helping to found a new lodge. He became its first secretary in 1894. Both lodges had very committed members and organised a busy programme of talks and study sessions; Southport Lodge even produced its own magazine, called Aura, at one stage. However, most of the members of both lodges took the side of the American William Quan Judge, in the struggle for power in the TS that broke out around 1894; against Annie Besant, who also claimed the right to lead the TS after the death of Helena Petrovna Blavatsky. Although Besant's claim was endorsed by Colonel Olcott, who had helped Blavatsky found the TS, support for Judge was so strong in Liverpool that it was there that the committee was founded to orchestrate Judge's campaign in England. And when Judge lost the debate, and was censured by senior figures in the TS worldwide - that happened in July 1894 - most of the members of the Liverpool and Southport lodges resigned from the TS, including Herbert Crooke.

Although Herbert Crooke no longer wanted to be a member of the TS worldwide, he had managed to keep hold of his belief in the principles of theosophy throughout the power struggle (which got very nasty and very public in 1895). For a couple of years, all the theosophists in his position had nowhere to go (though I'm sure they kept up their friendships with like-minded ex-TS members). However, only a couple of months after Judge's death (which took place in April 1896) a new leader, Katherine Tingley, began to rise to power in the TS in America, calling on theosophists to band together under the banner 'universal brotherhood'. In June 1896, Mrs Tingley and a group of followers began a world tour. They arrived at Southampton on Sunday 21 June 1896 and passing through London, made Liverpool their first important stop. Herbert Crooke and Joseph Gardner were amongst those who met Mrs Tingley and her 'Crusaders' at Lime Street station in Liverpool. The following day there was an informal meeting between Mrs Tingley's group and Liverpool-based theosophists in the afternoon, and then an event in the evening called a "Brotherhood Supper", with poor people invited in to sit down with the theosophists to a meal. Herbert Crooke may not have been able to get time off work to attend the afternoon meeting but he was definitely at the Brotherhood Supper and wrote up an account of it afterwards. On the evening of Tuesday 23 June 1896 there was a public meeting at the Picton Lecture Hall. Sidney Coryn's brother Herbert came from London to attend it, with Archibald Keightley (who had also questioned Annie Besant's right to succeed Blavatsky though he did stay a member of the TS worldwide). During the meeting Herbert Crooke presented Mrs Tingley with a Union Jack, on behalf of those English theosophists who wished her well. The following day, the Crusaders left Liverpool for Bradford; but for Herbert Crooke those two days had been a life-changing, life-enhancing event. He committed himself to Katherine Tingley's vision of the future of theosophy and became the secretary of her Universal Brotherhood and Theosophical Society in England, an (unpaid) post he held until the mid-1920s.

At the end of her lecture tour of the world, Mrs Tingley returned to America and began the work of building the universal brotherhood community at Point Loma. In February 1897 Herbert also went on a tour (not such a grand one), acting as Mrs Tingley's agent by visiting the Universal Brotherhood groups that had been set up in Paris and England by theosophists wanting to support her. At this time, he was described as "always ready to address meetings anywhere" about universal brotherhood, and he was still giving talks on theosophy in 1918.

As far as I know, no records of the UB/TS in England have survived, but it must have been based on the groups Herbert visited in 1897; and it had been set up formally by 1900, possibly in 1898 when its sister organisation was founded in the USA. As well as keeping the membership records, Herbert Crooke organised a New Year's meeting of all members based in or near London - rather like the GD's Whitsun meeting, I should imagine - which was held even in wartime from 1900 to 1922 and probably for a few more years than that. He sent regular reports to Mrs Tingley of how the UB/TS in England was doing and, though he never lived there, he went to visit her theosophical community at Point Loma California at least twice. The first visit that I know of was under extraordinary circumstances. In June 1915 Herbert Crooke represented the UB/TS in England at Mrs Tingley's Parliament of Peace and Universal Brotherhood; the only foreign delegate from any of the countries involved in the first World War (there were some delegates from neutral European countries). He probably met Mrs Tingley in Europe whenever she visited it on a lecture tour: for example, when she and others from Point Loma attended the Theosophical Peace Congress held in Sweden in 1913.

In partnership with Sidney Coryn and others, Herbert Crooke edited The Crusader (1897-99) and the Theosophical Chronicle (1900-05), magazines which tried to bring universal brotherhood to a wider audience. He also contributed a few articles to Point Loma's journal, The Theosophical Path, which Mrs Tingley edited.

Herbert Crooke continued as secretary of the UB/TS in England into the 1920s and was even given a kind of promotion, the job changing its name to 'director' in his later years. However, he had retired from the post by October 1927 when he met Mrs Tingley in London at the end of her latest lecture tour and accompanied her back to Point Loma. Two years later, Mrs Tingley died, in Europe, during another lecture tour and I imagine Herbert felt the loss very deeply. Of course, I don't know how much Herbert knew about it, but the community at Point Loma declined very rapidly in the early 1930s, many people leaving it once Mrs Tingley was no longer there to lead and inspire them. I imagine the UB/TS in the UK declined as well though I do not know when it eventually folded (as far as I know it doesn't exist any longer).

Herbert Crooke might be committed to universal brotherhood but he had a family to support and had to work. His working life followed a pattern more associated with the 20th century than with the 19th, with the complete change of career I've already mentioned, from skilled labourer to office worker; and also with several changes of employer. I think his hard work and enthusiasm got him noticed by more than just Katherine Tingley. By 1901, Herbert had moved to Bristol - where one of the Universal Brotherhood groups had been set up in 1897 - and was working for Rock Life Assurance Company as supervisor of their Bristol office. I don't have any information about which firm or firms he was employed by before this date, but perhaps he had been working for Rock Life in Liverpool and the move to Bristol involved a promotion. Rock Life was a very old-established firm - it had been founded in 1806. If Herbert Crooke worked for Rock Life in Liverpool, he wasn't in the firm's head office - that was in London, at 15 New Bridge Street, Liverpool had a branch office only, which at least in 1870 was in Baltic Buildings, Red Cross Street. In 1904, Herbert changed employer again, when he was appointed by British Law Fire Insurance Company to be secretary of their South Midlands district, which covered some of the Home Counties and Oxfordshire. The new job was based at the firm's head office, at 5 Lothbury Bank in the City of London; so the Crookes moved to west London and on the day of the 1911 census were settled at 84 Goldsmith Avenue, in the newly-developed area of Acton. By this time Herbert's name-sake son Herbert had left home - I can't find him after the 1901 census so he may have gone abroad. Norman and Sidney were still at home. Norman had graduated from London University and was working as an estimating clerk - that sounds like a City of London job to me although Norman's employer wasn't named on the census form. And Sidney was working as a jig and tool draughtsman. I note that Herbert's wife Mary was a hard worker too, and the family was still being careful with its money, even now there were three wage-earners in it: at no time up to 1911 did Mary Crooke employ a live-in servant.

The trauma of the first World War affected the Crooke family directly: both Norman and Sidney went into the forces and Norman was killed. Norman must have been one of the young men who volunteered as soon as war was declared (4 August 1914) and by the end of the year he was dead. Knowing that gives a poignancy to Herbert's determination to go to the Peace Parliament despite all the difficulties and dangers of travel in wartime (though the US was not in the war as yet). The last year of the war may have brought anxiety of a different kind, as British Law Fire Insurance Company was taken over, by London Assurance, with all the uncertainties that being bought out brings. Having had three different employers, he may not have had much of a pension - I wonder what he did about that? He may not have been able to retire.

Herbert Crooke died in 1931. The death was registered in Liverpool. Maybe he was living there, able to retire after all. Many years later, a theosophical magazine described him as "strong-souled"; I think he would have liked to be remembered that way.

A WORD ABOUT SIDNEY EGERTON CROOKE

It looks as though Sidney Crooke was doing an apprenticeship in 1911. By 1914 he had qualified and was a member of the Institute of Mechanical Engineers. Though he certainly served in some capacity during World War 1 I don't think he was sent to the Front, his skills were too important for him to be wasted that way. By 1927, he was working for Crossley Motors of Manchester. The firm held the rights to a gas-fuelled internal combustion engine - the sort used by Leyland buses - and made buses, cars and military vehicles. He continued to work for the firm until 1951 and was involved in developing several modifications to engines which the firm had patented.

BASIC SOURCES I USED for all Golden Dawn members.

Membership of the Golden Dawn: The Golden Dawn Companion by R A Gilbert. Northampton: The Aquarian Press 1986. Between pages 125 and 175, Gilbert lists the names, initiation dates and addresses of all those people who became members of the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn or its many daughter Orders between 1888 and 1914. The list is based on the Golden Dawn's administrative records and its Members' Roll - the large piece of parchment on which all new members signed their name at their initiation. All this information had been inherited by Gilbert but it's now in the Freemasons' Library at the United Grand Lodge of England building on Great Queen Street Covent Garden. Please note, though, that the records of the Amen-Ra Temple in Edinburgh were destroyed in 1900/01. The records of the Horus Temple at Bradford have not survived beyond 1896 either, but there's a history of the TS in Bradford on the web (though originally written in 1941) at www.ts-bradford.org.uk/theosoc/btshisto.htm in which a lot of the same people who joined the GD are mentioned. After surviving some difficult times in the 1890s, Bradford TS still seems to be going strong (as at December 2012). In April 2012 the History page was updated with the names of all the members at least up to 1941.

The members of the GD at its Horus Temple were rather a bolshy lot, and needed a lot of careful management!

Family history: freebmd; ancestry.co.uk (census and probate); findmypast.co.uk; familysearch; Burke's Peerage and Baronetage; Burke's Landed Gentry; Armorial Families; thepeerage.com; and a wide variety of family trees on the web.

Famous-people sources: mostly about men, of course, but very useful even for the female members of GD. Oxford Dictionary of National Biography. Who Was Who. Times Digital Archive.

Catalogues: British Library; Freemasons' Library.

Wikipedia; Google; Google Books - my three best resources. I also used other web pages, but with some caution, as - from the historian's point of view - they vary in quality a great deal.

SOURCES FOR HERBERT CROOKE

HE'S A THEOSOPHIST, JUDGE THEN TINGLEY

Theosophical Society Membership Register June 1893 to March 1895 p29 entry for Herbert Crooke. Application dated 25 August 1893. Sponsors Sidney Coryn and J K Gardner. Yearly subscription paid 1893-95. Handwritten note: "W Q Judge". Addresses during his time as a member:

67 Lord Street Liverpool

19 Windsor Road Southport

Main lodge: Southport (J K Gardner was also a member of Southport Lodge). There's no evidence that Mary Crooke was ever a member of the TS.

Lucifer: A Theosophical Magazine Volume XIV covers March-August 1894, editor Annie Besant. Published by Theosophical Publishing Society of 7 Duke Street Adelphi London WC. Volume XIV number 79 issued 15 March 1894; p82 news section, item on Southport Lodge. Its new Secretary was Herbert Crooke of 19 Windsor Road. The lodge had begun issuing its own journal, called Aura.

British Library catalogue - nothing as author; but as co-editor:

1897-99 volumes 1-3 of Ourselves. Editors were Sidney Coryn, Herbert Crooke, Frederick John Dick and Katherine Tingley.

1900-04 The Theosophical Chronicle volumes 1-5, with Sidney Coryn as editor-in-chief but Crooke, Dick and Tingley also listed.

1905 then discontinued: International Theosophical Chronicle, editors Sidney Coryn and Herbert Crooke.

UNIVERSAL BROTHERHOOD

Website www.scribd.com had put online the US theosophical magazine Theosophy. In volume XI number 1 April 1896 p28: the announcement of the death of William Quan Judge, on 21 March [1896]. He had been the journal's editor.

At www.scribd.com, Theosophy volume XI number 2 May-Dec 1896. On pp130-34 there's an account (written on 4 July 1896) of the first few days spent by Katherine Tingley's Crusaders' group in England after their arrival at Southampton on 21 June 1896.

<http://www.theosociety.org/pasadena> Via the web to The Labour Annual: the Reformers' Yearbook volume 3 1897 p121 describes Herbert Crooke as a "home crusader" and as "always ready to address meetings anywhere". Which he certainly does: www.scribd.com has also put online Point Loma's journal The Theosophical Path. In volume XII number 1 January-April 1897 p30 gives a description of Herbert's recent tour. He'd "spent the first week of February [1897] in Paris" before going to Portsmouth, Brighton, Market Lavington, Clifton, Manchester, Chesterfield, Baildon and Scarborough; where he spoke to recently-formed Universal Brotherhood groups.

Also at website www.scribd.com, the magazine Universal Brotherhood (which I think may be the previous name of The Theosophical Path; or a continuation of the magazine Theosophy, with a new name). In volume XIII number 1 January-April 1898 pp226-228 an article by Herbert Crooke: A Chinese Fable. He says he'd first come across the story in a children's book.

Via web to snippet from the International Directory of Booksellers and Bibliophile's Manual issued by Dodd, Mead and Co 1910. On p479 Herbert Crooke is described as Honorary Director of the Universal Brotherhood and Theosophical Society. There was an address on the snippet - 18 Bartlett's Buildings London - but because it was a snippet I'm not sure whether it's to do with Crooke, or another entry on the same page.

Via googlebooks to The Theosophical Path Jan-June 1922 p197-98 pubn of an article orig in Du and pubd 27 Aug 1913 in Nieuwe Arnhemsche Courant. Article was a visit to Arnhem by Tingley and the Raja-Yoga orchestra flwng the 20th World Peace Congress wh had tkn pl at The Hague. Tingley and R-Y orchestra had come to the Peace Congress from the Theosl Peace Congress in Sweden. I couldn't find anything which listed the people who attended the Theosophical Peace Congress.

At www.scribd.com, The Theosophical Path I couldn't see the volume number but it's covering July-December 1915. On p80 Herbert Crooke at the Parliament of Peace and Universal Brotherhood p79 which took place 22-25 June 1915 at Point Loma in its Aryan Memorial Temple and at Tingley's house. The only other people from Europe who were present were delegates from Holland and Sweden.

At ww.scribd.com, The Theosophical Path volume XIV number 2 Feb 1918 p1 list of contents includes a short article by Herbert Crooke: The Rise and Fall of Dogma, part of a larger series (not all written by him) called Theosophical Manual XVI. Herbert's article is on pp192-93 and strikes a note that I've noticed very often in theosophical journals - Herbert states his belief that dogma is on the decline and looks forward to the "Light of a New Day" full of “Ancient Wisdom”.

At www.scribd.com, The Theosophical Path volume XV number 1 covers July-December 1918; I think I couldn't find the page number but there was a reference in this volume to Herbert Crooke's Talks on Theosophy.

At www.scribd.com, The Theosophical Path. I couldn't find the first page of this volume so I don't know the volume and issue number but it's covering January-June 1922. On p154 is part of a letter written by Herbert Crooke to Katherine Tingley on 1 January 1922; the latest in a long correspondence. Herbert is described as “for many years Director of the Universal Brotherhood and TS in England”. In his letter he's reporting on the 22nd New Year ceremony for London-based members of the UB/TS in England. The first such ceremony had been held in December 1900 and they'd been held every year since, even during World War 1.

Via googlebooks to The Theosophical Path volume 32 January-June 1927. On p92 there's mention of Herbert Crooke as now retired from his post as “Director of the Universal Brotherhood and TS in England”. On p101 there's a description of the return of Katherine Tingley to San Diego after a lecture tour in Europe which ended with a date at the Wigmore Hall on 31 October 1926. Accompanying her were on her return to the US was (inter alia) Herbert Crooke.

Via the web to Theosophical Forum volume 26 1948 p36 where Herbert Crooke is described as “strong-souled”.

FOR MORE ON POINT LOMA

HERBERT CROOKE'S WORKING LIFE

Insurance Directory and Year Book 1901 p90 H Crooke is in a list of senior officials of insurance companies: “Sup't Rock Life” Bristol Agency.

At www.aim25.ac.uk, website of archives within the M25: Rock Life Assur Company operated from 1806 to 1942. Its headquarters were at 14 New Bridge Street (later renumbered as 15 New Bridge St). By 1912 it had a number of subsidiaries, eg in Canada. Its records are now at the London Metropolitan Archive.

At www.britishonlinearchives.co.uk is a transcription of Gore's Directory for Liverpool and its Environs issue of 1870; on p5 Rock Life Assurance Co is at Baltic Buildings, Red Cross St.

The Bankers' Magazine volume 77 1904 p507 announcement by the British Law Fire Insur Co of Herbert Crooke's appointment. The same information is published in Post Magazine and Insurance Monitor issue of 13 February 1904 p118.

At www.aim25.ac.uk, website of archives within M25: British Law Fire Insurance Co Ltd existed 1888-1955 though in 1918 it was bought by London Assurance who in their turn were bought much later by Sun Alliance. The headquarters of British Law Fire Insurance Co was at 5 Lothbury Bank London EC. It did everything except life assurance. Its records have since been deposited by Sun Alliance at the Guildhall Business Library.

HERBERT CROOKE junior

He didn't die or get married between 1901 and 1910. The two military/World War 1 sites below did not list him as among the dead (though of course he might have been badly injured).

NORMAN WHITEHEAD CROOKE

University of London Calendar 1910 p505 in a list alphabetical by surname, I'm assuming its of this year's graduates: Crooke, Norman Whitehead

Ahttp://www.genesreunited.co.ukt www.military-genealogy.com information that Norman Whitehead Crooke was killed during World War 1. Confirmed at www.genesreunited.co.uk with a bit more detail: he died in 1914 and he was in the army.

SIDNEY EGERTON CROOKE

Via booksnow1.scholarsportal.info to a list of members issued 2 March 1914 by the Institute of Mechanical Engineers: includes Sidney E Crooke. So does another list from 1922 seen via archive.org/stream.

London Gazette Supplement issued 1 January 1919. On p24 there's the middle of a very long list and with no details at the top of the page to make clear what list it is. It might be a list of men recently demobbed, I suppose: Sidney Egerton Crooke, described as "Lt (A/Maj) SEC D/286th (W Lancs)" Brigade, "RFA, TF". (I transcribed this carefully as I've very little idea what it means.)

Via www.nationalarchives.gov.uk/a2a/ to the records of the Invicta Bridge and Engineerin Co Ltd. I don't quite understand the connection between the two firms but the records include details of S E Crooke's appointment as assistant works manager at Crossley Motors, in 1927; and as works manager 1929. There's also a list of assignments of patents involving him, and Crossley Motors Ltd and Crossley Marine Engines Ltd covering 1937-51. The file is 80/104/1/75-CRO-1 held at the British Motor Industry Heritage Trust at Banbury Road Gaydon near Coventry.

At www.patentmaps.com Sidney E Crooke is the assignee in 5 patents all involving improvements to ignition-type oil engines: Crossley Motors 1927; 1928; 1937; 1940; 1942.

Crossley Motors has a website: www.crossley-motors.org.uk Originally Crossley Brothers and founded 1867 by Francis Crossley (1839-97) and (Sir) William Crossley (1844-1911). In 1869 they bought the rights to a German-invented gas-fuelled internal combustion engine as used eg by Leyland buses. The firm became a limited company in 1881 and changed its name to Crossley Motors Ltd in 1904. It made cars until 1938; buses 1926-58; and military vehicles 1914-45. When the business was founded its address was Great Marlborough Street Manchester, though it moved to Openshaw in 1882 and moved again much later.

1 April 2013

AMandragora@attglobal.net

Frederick Joseph William Crowe was initiated into the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn in August 1893; and chose the Latin motto 'Virtute non verbis'. Herbert Coryn was probably initiated as part of the same ritual though I don't think the two men knew each other before that evening and they didn't have much in common. One thing they did have in common, though, was that they never really followed up the initiation - they decided that the GD, with its focus on the western magical tradition, was not for them.

This is one of my short biographies and in Frederick Crowe's case I'm focusing very much on his professional life. I've found a lot of information on it and it definitely gives a flavour of the man. As with all the subjects of my short biographies, there will be more information on him out there, but it will be in county record offices, the local papers in Wells, Torquay and Chichester...I'd need to be on the spot to look at them, and I've had to admit that life's too short!

Sally Davis

March 2016

This is what I have found on FREDERICK JOSEPH WILLIAM CROWE, who was known as Fred to his friends.

IN THE GD

Not much information, I'm afraid!

ANY OTHER ESOTERIC INTERESTS?

Heavens yes! Frederick Crowe was an active and very knowledgeable freemason and he was almost certainly offered the chance of GD initiation by his equally active freemason acquaintance, William Wynn Westcott, one of the GD's founders.

I've decided that I won't go into the details of Frederick's life in freemasonry here: he was a member of so many lodges, chapters, other orders and other types of freemasonry; and held so many senior positions in freemasonry both local and national; that it would just turn into a list. I shall instead refer those who are interested in the full details to the Freemason's Library catalogue. Find it at <http://www.freemasonrylondon.museum> and follow 'search the collections'. Search for Frederick and you'll see a photograph of him come up in the responses: the full list of everything he was involved in, is in its catalogue entry, together with some of the more interesting pieces of freemasons' regalia that belonged to Frederick and are now at the Library. Below, I'm just going to pick out a few important stops along the way and list his freemasonry publications, which got him so widely known amongst freemasons both in the UK and abroad.

Crowe's first initiation into freemasonry came while he was still quite young. In 1887 he joined Ashburton Lodge number 2189. The following year he joined the Royal Arch Masonry Pleiades Chapter number 710, which was based in Totnes. I've mentioned William Wynn Westcott already as an acquaintance Frederick made through freemasonry. I'll just add here, two freemasons Frederick knew in Devon, because they helped him in the initial stages of his career as a writer:

William Eliot Thomas (1866-1929) of Jordan Lodge 1402 in Torquay worked for the Western Morning News. Crowe wrote reports on musical events in Devon for the WMN. For more on W E Thomas, see my biography. He was initiated into the GD in 1898.

and

William James Hughan (1841-1911) was a very senior mason and historian of freemasonry. By 1891 had retired from his work managing a cloth warehouse in Truro and was living in Torquay, but Frederick had met him a couple of years earlier. Frederick's profile of Hughan, which appeared in The Freemason magazine in 1888, is his earliest published work on freemasonry. Hughan repaid the compliment by writing introductions to Crowe's first set of books on freemasonry. Hughan was a founder member of Quatuor Coronati 2076 - for more on that lodge, see below.

When Frederick moved to Torquay himself, he joined Jordan Lodge 1402, but also the much older lodge St John's number 328.

The other lodge that I'm going to mention here is Quatuor Coronati 2076, which was founded in 1886 as a forum for the study of the history and rituals of freemasonry. Its founders wanted to reach as many interested freemasons as possible, so the lodge had a two-tier membership: correspondents; and full members. QC2076's corresponding members lived all over the world; they received its magazine, Ars Quatuor Coronati, and were entitled to attend its meetings if they were in London. Frederick joined as a corresponding member in November 1888. More importantly, in October 1888 he made a Will leaving to QC2076 his papers on freemasonry and a collection of autographs of well-known freemasons. They are now part of the collection at the Freemasons' Library. He had also begun to collect masonic certificates almost as soon as he had become a freemason. By 1913 he had over 1700, a collection the United Grand Lodge of England thought so important that in that year, they spent £2000 acquiring it.

Meetings of QC2076 always featured a talk and subsequent discussion; talks were then printed in the magazine to reach the lodge's wider public. In 1893 and 1894 Frederick went to London to give three of these talks, based on pieces that he had collected: on Hungarian lodge medals; on Hungarian lodge jewels; and a more general one, on Continental Jewels and Medals. The offer of an initiation into the GD was made around this time: although not one of its founders, William Wynn Westcott was a senior member of QC2076. In November 1895, a conversazione evening held by QC2076 featured some of Frederick's memorabilia.

Becoming a full member of QC2076 was not a privilege given to many, as the number of full members at any time was restricted; but at some point between 1895 and 1900, Frederick had that privilege, which conferred voting rights and the opportunity to act as one of the lodge's officials. Now living much nearer to London, Frederick made his way up the hierarchy of lodge officialdom in the early 1900s, and served as the lodge's WM for the 12 months from November 1909 to November 1910. Each summer, QC2076 organised a weekend away for its members: in 1910 they all went to Chichester, a visit largely organised by Frederick. On the Sunday morning, they went to hear the Cathedral service, with Frederick playing the organ and conducting the choir as usual.

See the Freemasonry Publications section below for the many articles by Frederick that were published in Ars Quatuor Coronati; they cover the period 1890 to 1914.

Frederick served as Grand Organist at different times in the county of Devon; for Mark Masonry in England; for the Supreme Grand Chapter of England; and for the United Grand Lodge of England.

For Frederick's many publications on freemasonry, see the Work/Profession sections below.

Sources for this section on Frederick and freemasonry:

History of Jordan Lodge number 1402 Torquay 1872-1922 by Stanley H N Lane. Printed Torquay 1923.

The History of St John's Lodge number 328 Torquay of Antient, Free and Accepted Masons by John Chapman, a PM of the lodge. Printed by J S Virtue and Co Ltd of City Road London. No printed date but "1894" is written by hand on the front page.

Ars Quatuor Coronati... printed in London for the Lodge and edited by a lodge member. Please note that I didn't do a full sweep, I looked at these volumes:

- 1 1886-88; its p1 has a list of the lodge's founders including Hughan and Gould; but not including any GD members
- 7 1894
- 8 1895
- 13 1900
- 23 1910
- 25 1912.

On the collection of masonic certificates: see the details attached to Frederick's photo in the Freemasons' Library. Though there isn't a list of all 1700 of them there.

ANY OBITUARIES/BIOGRAPHIES?

There were obituaries of Frederick in The Times and Who Was Who; but not in DNB or ODNB. There's not as much detail in the obituaries that do exist as I would like. Particularly, there's a lack of firm dates - I do like there to be dates.

BIRTH/YOUTH/FAMILY BACKGROUND

I've seen three different dates for Frederick's year of birth, but they're not far apart: 1862 to 1864. Registrations at freebmd don't really solve the problem. I give my favourite candidate in the 'sources' section below, but here I'll leave the exact date open. His census responses are fairly consistent about where he was born: in Somerset, somewhere between Weston-super-Mare and Bridgwater.

I also can't find Frederick on a census with his parents; so I have no idea who they were or exactly where they lived; or whether he had any brothers and sisters. The future course of Frederick's life was dictated by an event that took place when he was seven - he was chosen as one of the boy choristers at Wells Cathedral - so on the day of the 1871 census he had already left home. He was living in Wells, at 77 High Street, with his unmarried aunts, Eliza and Lucy Crowe. Eliza ran a tobacconist's shop and an umbrella-making business; and Lucy kept house for her sister and nephew.

Lucy Crowe had left the household, or was away, on the day of the 1881 census; and Eliza Crowe had moved her home and businesses to 1 Market Street. Frederick Crowe was still living with his aunt, and was still involved with music at the cathedral. Although they don't seem to have been in the UK in 1871, by 1881 a couple who became friends of Fred had moved to Wells: Robert Mills and his wife Elizabeth. On the day of the 1881 census, Robert was running his own monumental masonry business; but he was also working as a singer, most probably in the cathedral choir. In the next 15 years Robert Mills added to his surname, to become Robert Watkin-Mills, gave up his business, and made a career for himself as a baritone, specialising in oratorio. He and Elizabeth moved to London but Fred kept in touch with them for many years: Elizabeth was initiated into the GD in 1898, probably because Fred recommended her; and Robert was visiting Fred on the day of the 1901 census while Elizabeth and their niece (another Elizabeth Mills) were staying elsewhere in Torquay.

Sources: freebmd; census 1871, 1881, 1901 and see also the Education section below and my biography of Elizabeth Watkin-Mills.

EDUCATION

On the day of the 1871 census Frederick, like all the choristers, was a pupil at the Wells Cathedral Grammar School. By 1881 he had left the choir but was employed as the cathedral's assistant organist. He was studying music - probably including composition and arrangement - with the chief organist Charles Williams Lavington; and was (again probably) getting his first experience as a conductor of music in a church.

The references that I found to Frederick's career in music say that he spent two periods studying singing: in London; and then in Milan where he had lessons with the opera singer and teacher Vittorio Carpi. None of my sources are able to say when this important period of study took place but the late 1870s or early 1880s seems more likely than later dates. Robert Watkin-Mills had studied singing in Milan, probably in the early 1870s: perhaps it was Robert who suggested Fred should do the same.

Sources for Frederick's education:

For the cathedral grammar school:

Frederick's schooling at Wells Cathedral grammar school is confirmed by details supplied with a photograph of him, to freemasons' lodge Quatuor Coronati 2076's archive, now in the Freemasons' Library. I'm not sure where the information originally came from: Frederick himself, probably.

The earliest reference I could find to Frederick's musical education was an article on in The Musical Times volume 46 January-December 1905. Published London: Novello and Co Ltd;

New York: Novello, Ewer and Co. In its issue of 1 February 1905: Chichester Cathedral pp81-88, written by its reporter "Dotted Crotchet" who had been to Chichester and interviewed several of the administrative staff as well as Frederick. I suppose this must be the source for the information which all later references are using, for example The Succession of Organists of the Chapel Royal by Watkins Shaw. Clarendon Press 1991 p81.

I couldn't find much information on Charles Williams Lavington but Wikipedia has comprehensive list of organists and assistant organists at Wells Cathedral. Lavington was born in 1819. He only ever worked at Wells Cathedral: as assistant organist from 1842 to 1859, then as senior organist until his death in 1895.

I could find even less information on the baritone Vittorio Carpi: he isn't very well known in the UK, which suggests he never sang here.

At www.marstonrecords.com: Carpi is mentioned in passing as the teacher of the soprano Luisa Garibaldi (born 1878).

Werner's Magazine volume 17 1895 p149 and p708, noting that Carpi had come to the end of a teaching contract at the Chicago Conservatory.

WORK/PROFESSION (1) Organist, conductor, composer

Frederick left Wells Cathedral in 1882 for a job as organist and choirmaster of the parish church at Ashburton in Devon. At the end of his time at Ashburton his Magnificat and Nunc Dimittis in E Flat was published in London and New York by Novello and Co: the first item in a long association between Frederick and Novello's.

In 1890 Frederick moved on to a similar job at a more prominent church - St Mary Magdalene Torquay. Perhaps his friends amongst the Torquay freemasons had helped him get the job.

The job was considered a lucky one: three holders of the post had gone on to jobs in cathedrals, and in due course, Frederick became the fourth.

During his time at St Mary Magdalene Frederick worked with local clergymen on a series of works for use by parish churches; all published by Weekes and Co of London. Two were single carols in Weekes' Carols for Christmastide series, but two were on a much bigger scale: full choral services, one for Easter and one for harvest thanksgiving. They both comprised a set of hymns interspersed with recitatives; with the clergymen choosing the Biblical texts and writing the words of the hymns, and Frederick setting it all to music. Both were on a fairly large scale, requiring soloists as well as a choir. Frederick also did the first of two adaptations for parish choirs of works by Dvorak: an anthem for Lent, published by Novello's as number 742 in its Octavo Anthems collection. And lastly, from this period comes the only non-church work by Frederick that was ever published: a duet for violin and piano from 1892.

Frederick remained at St Mary Magdalene until the dean and chapter of Chichester Cathedral offered him the post of organist and choirmaster. It was a big step up in his career, obviously, but there were other reasons why Frederick might have been looking for a new job. He started work at the cathedral on Trinity Sunday 1902. He worked for there until he retired, due to ill-health, in 1921. During his years in Chichester he hugely expanded the range and amount of music done in the cathedral and played a very active role in the musical life of the city and of the cathedrals of Wessex:

?paid:

- as instructor in music at Bishop Otter College and conductor of its women's choir
- as music teacher at Chichester Girls' High School and Chichester School and as extensions of his main job:

- as instigator of the Southern Cathedrals' Festival
- as founder of the Chichester Cathedral Oratorio Society and Chichester Cathedral Orchestral Society.

One of the first tasks that faced Frederick when he took up his post at Chichester Cathedral was the need to overhaul the cathedral's main organ, built originally by Renatus Harris in 1677-78 and much restored and moved about the building since then. The firm appointed to do the work was one whose work Frederick recommended to his new employers: George Hele and Company of Plymouth. The idea which became the Southern Cathedrals' Festival arose from the concert on 28 September 1904 which celebrated the end of the restoration: choirs from Salisbury and Winchester joined Frederick's own cathedral choir at that concert.

Frederick was so busy at the cathedral and elsewhere that he only published one more piece of music, and that not an original composition. In 1905, the second of his Dvorak adaptations appeared, the Stabat Mater.

It's possible that Frederick was a member of the Chough Musical Society at this time. Information is lacking on the Society but it seems to have been founded around 1880 to give a series of concerts in London each winter. At least in the years immediately after the first World War, the concerts were held in the Great Hall of Cannon Street Hotel.

I couldn't find dates for this, but while he was at Chichester Cathedral Frederick also acted as internal examiner at Reading University department of music, and was on its board of studies.

And lastly (where he find the time?) Frederick wrote a series of articles for The Musical Courier, on well-known cathedral organists.

Sources for Frederick's later career:

Who Was Who volume 3 p312.

The Musical Times volume 46 January- December 1905. Published London: Novello and Co Ltd; New York: Novello, Ewer and Co. In its issue of 1 February 1905, the article: Chichester Cathedral: pp81-88. As it's based on an interview with Frederick, I give the date of birth included in it as probably the right one: 31 December 1862. There is a registration on freebmd for a Frederick William (no Joseph) Crowe, in the quarter January-March 1863; but it was in the St Luke's district of Middlesex; not what I'd expected. On p88 there's a photograph of Frederick taken in Devon. No beard! - very unusual for the time; but a full set of moustaches.

Cathedral Organists Past and Present by John Ebenezer West. Published by Novello and Co 1925: p25.

See wikipedia for a short page on Hele of Plymouth aka Hele and Co and Hele and Sons, based on information in The Freeman-Edmonds Directory of British Organ Builders by Bernard Edmonds published 2002.

Southern Cathedrals Festival, comprising the cathedrals of Chichester, Winchester and Salisbury: see wikipedia again for its career, which took rather a dive after Frederick retired. It was resurrected in the 1960s and is still going.

Chichester Cathedral Oratorio Society. Not much information on this but there's a reference in The Musical Herald numbers 766-777 1912 p13: at its advent concert the Chichester Cathedral Oratorio Society had sung Gounod's Redemption (definitely outside the normal repertoire).

Chichester Orchestral Society. Again, not much information on the web - there will be more locally - but I found a reference to it in Musical Times and Singing-Class Circular but it was from 1929 when I would suppose Frederick had retired as its conductor.

Bishop Otter College:

See wikipedia.

Via www.jstor.org to The Musical Times volume 54 number 843, issue of 1 May 1913 pp1-4 a special Supplement on the annual meeting of the Association of Competition Festivals, held at the University Hall Leeds. Bishop Otter College's all-women choir, conducted by Frederick, gave a concert.

The Chough Musical Society:

The Freemasons' Library has an item listed under Frederick Crowe referring to Chough Lodge number 2264. I read through a history of the lodge, which said that it had grown out of the Chough Musical Society. However, the book made no mention of Frederick ever being a lodge member. Perhaps he was just a member of the Society and - knowing so many freemasons - knew some of Chough Lodge number 2264's founders.

At amazon you can buy lots of different lists of the Chough Musical Society's yearly sets of concerts. Though the Society was founded around 1880, I couldn't see lists of concerts from earlier than 1898. The concerts were still going in 1924.

The Musical Times and Singing Class Circular volume 38 no 648, issue of 1 February 1897 p73-80 the Chough Musical Society is in a list of current music societies.

At www.forgottenbooks.com a reproduction of William Purdie Treloar's A Lord Mayor's Diary 1906-07 originally published in 1920: in January 1907 Lord Mayor Treloar went to a Chough Musical Society concert at the Cannon St Hotel.

At www.haydnwoodmusic.com Haydn Wood played violin at a Chough Musical Society concert in the Great Hall of Cannon St Hotel on 10 October 1919.

ANY MUSICAL PUBLICATIONS? See also the 'profession' section above.

I listen to some Radio 3 but have never heard a work by Frederick being played.

The British Library catalogue has these works:

- 1888 Magnificat and Nunc Dimittis in E Flat. London and New York: Novello, Ewer and Co.
- 1892 Romanza. Duet for Violin and Pianoforte. London: Ransford and Son.
- 1896 Angels from the Realms of Glory. Crowe as composer with words by J Montgomery etc. London: Weekes and Co; Number 2 in its Carols for Christmastide Series.
- 1896 Shepherds Leave Your Flocks All Sleeping. Crowe as writer and composer. London: Weekes and Co; Number 3 in its Carols for Christmastide Series.
- 1897 The Story of the Passion, with the “Seven Words” of Jesus Christ. Set to simple music for the use of parish church choirs. Scripture selections and hymns by Rev H J Warner MA vicar of Brixton. “Fred J W Crowe” as composer; organist and choirmaster of Upton Church Torquay, St Mary Magdalene. Price 1 shilling if you buy the music; 1d for words only. Published London: Weekes and Co; Chicago USA: Clayton F Summy Co. A set of recitatives and hymns making 17 pieces in all and needing tenor and bass soloists.
- 1897 A Song of Harvest Thanksgiving for the use of parish church choirs. Hymns written and texts selected by Rev H B Clark MA curate of Tor Mohun Torquay. Music by “Fred J W Crowe” organist and choirmaster of Upton Church Torquay. Dedicated to Rev E P Gregg MA rector of Upton Church, and rural dean. Published London: Weekes and Co; and Chicago USA: Clayton F Summy Co. It’s a set of recitatives and hymns, making 17 pieces in all; needing tenor, bass and soprano soloists. Same price as the Passion set.
- 1902 By Thy Glorious Death and Passion. Anthem for Lent. Music by Dvorak; Crowe as producing a version for parish church choirs. London: Novello and Co as number 742 in its Octavo Anthems Collection (which had been running since 1876). NB there’s a wiki listing Dvorak’s compositions but I couldn’t identify this particular anthem in it; it must have been one item in a larger work.
- Just noting that Musical Times volume 46 1905 unnumbered page has an advertisement for Novello’s Octavo Anthems. Number 742 is still available. Crowe’s name doesn’t appear on it, only Dvorak’s.
- 1905 At the Foot of the Cross, an adaptation of Dvorak’s Stabat Mater. Crowe’s English-language version for church choirs published London: Novello and Co. A wiki on Dvorak’s compositions says that the Stabat Mater was written 1876-77 for large forces: 4 soloists, chorus and orchestra.
- 1910 The Training College Song Book. Crowe as editor. London and New York: Boosey and Co.

This isn’t strictly a musical publication, but does arise from Frederick’s time as an employee of Chichester Cathedral: at www.westsussex.gov.uk a reference to his The Authorised Guide to Chichester Cathedral published by R J Acford 1925.

WORK/PROFESSION (2)

I’ve decided to include Frederick’s publications on freemasonry as ‘work’ rather than ‘leisure’. I’m sure Frederick was not paid to write them, so they’re not ‘professional’ works in that sense; though some at least were for sale. Even a short article does require a lot of effort, though, if it’s going to be good and something you can be proud of: something I’ve learned all too well since I started doing these GD biographies!

ANY PUBLICATIONS AS A FREEMASON?

Plenty. Most publications on freemasonry were written by freemasons for freemasons. They tended to be published privately, with a small print-run, and copies were not usually sent to the statutory libraries so most of Frederick's work is in the Freemasons' Library only. His set of 'master masons handbooks' is an exception, with copies sent to the British Library. As you can see, some of the handbooks went into a second or third edition. They formed the basis of Frederick's reputation as an authority on the paraphernalia of freemasonry, and also on the duties of a senior freemason.

List of publications in the British Library:

Firstly there's the 'basic' set of three 'master mason handbooks', all with an introduction by W J Hughan:

The Master Mason's Handbook. 1st edition 1890 2nd edition 1894 3rd edition 1915. All London: George Kenning.

The Scottish Master Mason's Handbook. 1st edition 1894 2nd edition 1910. Both London: George Kenning and Son.

The Irish Master Freemason's Handbook. 1st edition 1895; 2nd edition 1909. Both London: George Kenning and Son.

Then there's one based on items in Frederick's collection:

1897 Masonic Clothing and Regalia, British and Continental. This was a high-quality production with 36 color plates. Edinburgh: T C and E C Jack.

Then a couple reflecting on the duties of a freemason:

1909 Things a Freemason Should Know. With some plates. London: George Kenning and Son.

1920 What is Freemasonry? A Word of Advice to Masters and Candidates. 1st edition 1920 2nd edition 1935. Both London: Gale and Polden.

Then one of several works printed as a booklet after originally being a magazine article:

1910 The Caledonian Lodge number 134. Number 3 in the Masonic Tracts Series which was published 1906-26. London 1910; originally published in The Freemason 1910. Lodge histories are one of the most popular freemason publications; but this was the only one Frederick wrote.

The second edition of a book in which Frederick prepared for publication the work of a very well-known historian of freemasonry, one of the founders of Quatuor Coronati lodge 2076:

1951 Robert Freke Gould's The Concise History of Freemasonry. Its first edition was published in 1920 but the British Library doesn't have a copy of that.

The Freemasons' Library has copies of all the books listed above. It also has:

Some more instances of articles being published as booklets:

1888 originally in The Freemason of 3 November 1888: Brother Hughan at Home.

1914 originally in Ars Quatuor Coronati 1914: The Free Carpenters.

Undated originally published in Windsor Magazine: Freemasonry.

At various times Frederick had produced catalogues of his freemasonry collection:

- Catalogue of Masonic Certificates numbers 515-1584. Collected by Frederick around 1890.
- A second Catalogue of 500 Masonic Certificates Frederick. Published 1894 in the Masonic Catalogues series and later re-issued in the Masonic Pamphlets series.
- Some Rare Certificates. London: 1900

And finally, the 1924 edition of A Concise History of Freemasonry, by Robert Freke Gould (1836-1915), prepared for publication by Frederick. First edition: New York: 1924. 2nd edition: London: 1951

Frederick was also a regular contributor to QC2076's magazine, whose full title is: Ars Quatuor Coronati: A Concise Index to the Transactions of the Quatuor Coronati Lodge Number 2076. AQC's Catalogue of Volumes 1-80 compiled for the Lodge by A R Hewitt and H G Massey 1971 lists these articles:

| page | vol | year | title                                   |
|------|-----|------|---|
| 21   | 3   | 1890 | Freemasonry in Holland                  |
| 21   | 5   | 1892 | Masonic clothing/1 of 3                 |
| 21   | 6   | 1893 | Masonic clothing/2 of 3                 |
| 21   | 7   | 1894 | Continental lodge jewels and medals     |
| 21   | 7   | 1894 | Masonic clothing/3 of 3                 |
| 21   | 8   | 1895 | Freemasonry in Brixham Devon 1781-1840  |
| 21   | 14  | 1901 | A curious certificate                   |
| 21   | 16  | 1903 | A curious Carbonari certificate         |
| 21   |     | 1903 | A French prisoners' lodge               |
| 21   | 17  | 1903 | Masonic certificates of the Netherlands |
| 21   | 17  | 1904 | Colours in freemasonry                  |
| 21   |     | 1904 | An interesting engraving                |
| 21   | 18  | 1905 | A forgotten Masonic charity             |
| 21   | 19  | 1906 | King Solomon and the Queen of Sheba     |
| 20   | 20  | 1907 | Another French prisoners' lodge         |
| 21   |     | 1907 | The Scottish lodge at Namur             |
| 21   | 22  | 1909 | The Fendeurs                            |
| 21   |     | 1909 | Giorgione's Three Wise Men              |
| 20   | 24  | 1911 | The Charta transmissions of Larmenius   |
| 21   | 27  | 1914 | The free carpenters.                    |

In addition, Frederick appears as the subject of two articles:

|    |    |      |   |
|----|----|------|---|
| 21 | 22 | 1909 | a profile of him, on his installation as the lodge's WM |
| 21 | 44 | 1931 | an obituary.  |

I don't think it was in Frederick's nature to be a controversialist, but occasionally he felt he shouldn't resist the desire to correct poor work on freemasonry published by others. In The Co-Mason volume IV issue of April 1912 p82 a letter from Frederick appeared. A recent co-masonry publication, The Knights Templars, had argued in favour of a connection in the middle ages between the Knights Templar and medieval freemasonry. Frederick's letter said that there was no proof at all of such a thing. He also disagreed with the book's assertion that mysticism had been an important feature of freemasonry as early as the 17th century, saying that in his opinion pre-17th century ceremonies were "of the simplest description, and the 'secrets' confined to modes of recognition, and perhaps one or two 'trade secrets'." These are still hotly debated issues, of course"!

FAMILY

Frederick was married twice.

Census information from 1891 says that Frederick's first wife, Sara Elizabeth Stevens, was born around 1860 on Alderney in the Channel Islands. I haven't been able to find a birth registration for her; I also haven't been able to identify her on any census before her marriage. So like Frederick's, Sara's social and family background is a mystery.

Frederick and Sara Elizabeth were married in Newton Abbot in 1886 and began their married life in Ashburton. By the day of the 1891 census, Frederick had changed jobs and they had moved to a house called Marsden, on Thurlow Road in the Upton district of Torquay. They had a visitor that day - Mary Bond, from Alburgh in Norfolk; perhaps a friend of Sara's as they were the same age. The Crowes' income was enough for them to employ the basic one general servant.

Frederick and Sara didn't have any children. The problem was with her rather than him. Perhaps she was ill: she died early in 1899, aged only 40.

Frederick's second wife, Faith Tombleson, was born in Barton-on-Humber, Lincolnshire, a daughter of Thomas Tombleson and his wife Margaret. Thomas farmed 512 acres and was a JP. There was enough money in the family for Thomas and Margaret to employ a governess on census day in 1881, for Faith and her two older sisters. Two general servants and the farm shepherd were living with the family on that day. The Tomblesons, particularly Thomas, were prominent members of the congregation at the Wesleyan Chapel on Chapel Lane Barton-on-Humber.

Frederick Crowe and Faith Tombleson would not normally have come across each other, I suppose. But on the day of the 1901 census Faith and her sister Hetty were staying at a boarding house in Upton, Torquay. Perhaps Hetty had been ill and Faith was not just there as her sister: Faith told the census official that she was a trained sick-nurse. Frederick was still living in Upton, at the house he'd shared with wife Sara; his friend the bass-baritone Robert Watkin-Mills was visiting him.

So Faith and Frederick met in Torquay. There was still the religious question to be resolved. A Methodist marrying someone who worked for the Church of England - that could still be a big issue, around 1900. But they resolved it, and were married in the summer of 1901. They had two children: Geoffrey Gilbert Crowe, born 1905; and Margaret Faith Muriel Crowe (later Canton), born 1910. On the day of the 1911 census they were all living at St Peter's House, 64 North Street Chichester; with a cook, and a nurse/housemaid.

Sources for the family section: freebmd; census 1861-1911

An interesting side-light on Faith Tombleson:

www.lincolnshire.gov.uk in the Lincolnshire Archives as their reference: Meth/C/Barton on Humber, Chapel Lane /A/4/1. It's a Seat Rent Book, originally in use at the Wesleyan Chapel, Chapel Lane Barton-on-Humber between 1833 and 1842. It was re-used c 1883 by Hetty Tombleson as a 'commonplace' book - as a diary, for notes and for pressing flowers. A second such 'commonplace' book, reference /A/4/2 originally the Seat Rent book for 1842-57 was re-used for similar jottings, by Faith Tombleson.

LEISURE INTERESTS?

Frederick did manage to squeeze some leisure time into his busy life. He was the Hon Sec to the West Sussex branch of the NSPCC. He was a Captain of the First Devon and Somerset Royal Engineers; a voluntary regiment; and later served as Captain of the Chichester Division of the National Reserve. He enjoyed astronomy, and a game of billiards.

Source:

Times 11 April 1931 p12.

DEATH

Frederick enjoyed a decade of retirement before dying very suddenly, while on a train to Cosham, on 9 April 1931. Faith died in January 1962, in the house she and Frederick had been living in, in 1911.

Sources:

Times 11 April 1931 p12.

Probate Registry entries 1931, 1962.

BASIC SOURCES I USED for all Golden Dawn members.

Membership of the Golden Dawn: The Golden Dawn Companion by R A Gilbert. Northampton: The Aquarian Press 1986. Between pages 125 and 175, Gilbert lists the names, initiation dates and addresses of all those people who became members of the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn or its many daughter Orders between 1888 and 1914. The list is based on the Golden Dawn's administrative records and its Members' Roll - the large piece of parchment on which all new members signed their name at their initiation. All this information had been inherited by Gilbert but it's now in the Freemasons' Library at the United Grand Lodge of England building on Great Queen Street Covent Garden. Please note, though, that the records of the Amen-Ra Temple in Edinburgh were destroyed in 1900/01. I have recently (July 2014) discovered that some records of the Horus Temple at Bradford have survived, though most have not; however those that have survived are not yet accessible to the public.

For the history of the GD during the 1890s I usually use Ellic Howe's The Magicians of the Golden Dawn: A Documentary History of a Magical Order 1887-1923. Published Routledge and Kegan Paul 1972. Foreword by Gerald Yorke. Howe is a historian of printing rather than of magic; he also makes no claims to be a magician himself, or even an occultist. He has no axe to grind.

Family history: freebmd; ancestry.co.uk (census and probate); findmypast.co.uk; familysearch; Burke's Peerage and Baronetage; Burke's Landed Gentry; Armorial Families; thepeerage.com; and a wide variety of family trees on the web.

Famous-people sources: mostly about men, of course, but very useful even for the female members of GD. Oxford Dictionary of National Biography. Who Was Who. Times Digital Archive.

Useful source for business and legal information: London Gazette and its Scottish counterpart Edinburgh Gazette. Now easy to find (with the right search information) on the web.

Catalogues: British Library; Freemasons' Library.

Wikipedia; Google; Google Books - my three best resources. I also used other web pages, but with some caution, as - from the historian's point of view - they vary in quality a great deal.

13 March 2016

Email me at

Find the web pages of Roger Wright and Sally Davis, including my list of people initiated into the Order of the Golden Dawn between 1888 and 1901, at:

www.wrightanddavis.co.uk

***

Alexander Gordon DAVIDSON was initiated into the Isis-Urania temple in London on 2 November 1901, taking the Latin motto 'Lux et tenebris'. By this time, the GD administrative records are not noting down what level new members subsequently reached; but he did not become a member of the inner, 2nd Order as far as I can tell.

Alexander Davidson was born to Samuel and Margaret Davidson in January 1860 in Rayne, Aberdeenshire, the youngest of nine children, six boys and three girls. Samuel Davidson was a doctor and also ran a small farm, so on the days of the 1861 and 1871 censuses, his household was a large and varied one: as well as his wife, younger children still living at home, older sons on their Easter vacation from university, a housemaid, a kitchen maid and a nursemaid, it also included two agricultural labourers. Two of Samuel Davidson's sons followed him to Aberdeen University to study medicine; Alexander Gordon was the younger of the two, graduating in 1881. He registered with the General Medical Council for the first time in 1884 but did not actually pass his MD until 1887. He later gained a diploma in Public Health (DPH). Local councils were being given wider powers and responsibilities to check food and hygiene standards and collect medical statistics, and the DPH was a new qualification, to prepare physicians to take work in this expanding area of employment.

During the 1880s and early 1890s, Alexander Gordon was still living in Aberdeenshire; his father had retired from his general practice by 1881 and Alexander Gordon may have taken it over. Around 1893 or 1894 he married Jane Napier Grant, daughter of Richard Robb Grant who ran an engineering and boiler-making firm in Port Dundas Glasgow. Their first child, Jean Evelyn, was born in Scotland but between 1895 and 1899 the family moved south and settled at 57 Crouch Hall Road north London. I suppose this must mean that Alexander Gordon had found a new job; but I haven't been able to find out what it was. Alexander and Jane's two sons were born in London: Erroll Gordon Davidson in 1900 and Archer Grant Davidson in 1902.

Sometime during the early 1900s, Alexander Gordon Davidson accepted a job as medical officer with the Tarquah Mining and Exploration Co Ltd and moved to what is now Ghana. This next bit is rather speculative but it's possible that he heard of the job through Dr Robert Felkin, who had been initiated into the GD in Edinburgh but by 1896 had moved to London. From 1886 to 1896 Felkin had taught tropical medicine at the University of Edinburgh and when he set up in general practice in London he also acted as medical consultant to firms with operations in tropical countries. I can't actually prove that Felkin and Davidson knew each other but around 1899 they were both living in Crouch Hall Road, north London and I wonder whether that's not a coincidence.

Exactly which year Alexander Gordon Davidson took the job with Tarquah M and E I'm not sure. 1903 was the last year in which he was registered with the General Medical Council, so he might have gone abroad at that stage, but I believe he probably got the job in 1906. His son Erroll died in London early in January 1907, and I think the family left Britain soon after.

Perhaps as part of his preparation for life in west Africa, Alexander Gordon Davidson was initiated into the Anglo-Colonial freemasons' lodge (number 3175). He was certainly a member by 1911. Anglo-Colonial lodge 3175 was founded in 1906, especially to provide contacts abroad and a meeting place in London, for Britons living abroad. He also joined Quatuor Coronati Lodge 2076 in 1911 as a 'distance' member, entitled to receive its magazine (which covered aspects of the history of freemasonry) and attend its meetings when in London.

The Tarquah Mining and Exploration Co Ltd played its part in the scramble for Africa. The town and district now usually spelled 'Tarkwa' were part of the lands of the Ashanti in the 1890s (they're now in Ghana) but the area had long been known for its goldfields and was thus being gradually annexed by the British, already well established further along the coast at Accra. In addition, the area had cotton and cacao - it was irresistible to the British Empire. Companies to exploit the gold reserves were being founded as early as 1897 and at the same time, Manchester Chamber of Commerce was hounding the British government for easier access to the area's cotton production. A railway between Tarkwa and the nearest port, Sekondi, was completed around 1901; it was mostly built by Scottish engineers and surveyors and this might have been how Alexander Gordon Davidson learned of the employment opportunities available on the Gold Coast to those who didn't mind its climate. In 1905 a regular shipping service run by Elder Dempster was started up, bringing gold but also cotton to the UK; only one ship was involved in it, but she made three trips per year to and from West Africa. In fact, this level of exploitation of the goldfield led to an early spike in finds, followed by a long decline, but Tarquah Mining and Exploration was still in existence in 1924 and still employed Alexander Gordon Davidson in Tarkwa. Although he and Jane, and Jean and Archer were in England on the day of the 1911 census, living at 83 Prince of Wales Mansions in Prince of Wales Road Battersea, they were in the country on a long period of leave. The family did buy a house in Crouch Hall Road, and Jane Davidson was living there late in 1924. The purchase was probably part of a retirement plan, but if so, Alexander Gordon Davidson didn't survive long enough to live there permanently. He died on board ship on 1 April 1924, returning to West Africa after another period of leave.

Who had Alexander Gordon Davidson known who recommended him for initiation into the Golden Dawn? Normally, when I've found evidence that a GD member was a freemason, I've been able to assume that it was contacts in freemasonry who were the link. However, I don't think this is true of Alexander Gordon. GD member Robert Palmer Thomas was also initiated as a member of the Anglo-Colonial lodge number 3175 in its first year, but the two men had probably met through the GD, rather than the other way round. There's no evidence that Alexander Gordon Davidson was a freemason before he joined the GD, either in Scotland or in England. He had also never been a member of the GD's Edinburgh temple. However, with some caution (as I have no direct evidence) I suggest that the GD member Alexander Gordon Davidson knew was Robert William Felkin, who lived at 6 Crouch Hall Road during the 1890s and had been a prominent doctor in Edinburgh before moving to London around 1894.

**

BASIC SOURCES I USED for all Golden Dawn members.

Membership of the Golden Dawn: The Golden Dawn Companion by R A Gilbert. Northampton: The Aquarian Press 1986. Between pages 125 and 175, Gilbert lists the names, initiation dates and addresses of all those people who became members of the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn or its many daughter Orders between 1888 and 1914. The list is based on the Golden Dawn's administrative records and its Members' Roll - the large piece of parchment on which all new members signed their name at their initiation. All this information had been inherited by Gilbert but it's now in the Freemasons' Library at the United Grand Lodge of England building on Great Queen Street Covent Garden.

Family history: freebmd; ancestry.co.uk (census and probate); findmypast.co.uk; familysearch; Burke's Peerage and Baronetage; Burke's Landed Gentry; Armorial Families; thepeerage.com; and a wide variety of family trees on the web.

Famous-people sources: mostly about men, of course, but very useful even for the female members of GD. Oxford Dictionary of National Biography. Who Was Who. Times Digital Archive.

Catalogues: British Library; Freemasons' Library.

Wikipedia; Google; Google Books - my three best resources. I also used other web pages, but with some caution, as - from the historian's point of view - they vary in quality a great deal.

Sources specific to Alexander Gordon Davidson:

From the Mormon family history website at familysearch, a brief baptism record for Alexander Gordon Davidson: born 17 January 1860 at Rayne, Aberdeenshire. Parents Samuel Davidson and Margaret née Watson.

Medical Times and Gazette volume 2 1883 p252 Alexander Gordon Davidson is included in a list of people who'd passed "the Second Professional Examination".

Aberdeen University Review volumes 11-12 1925 p286 a list of obituaries of graduates of the university includes that of Alexander Gordon Davidson. He had died on 1 April [1924] during a voyage from the UK to West Africa. He had passed his MA in 1881, his MD in 1887 and had also taken the Diploma of Public Health (though no date was given for that). At the time of his death he had been working as a Medical Officer in the Gold Coast of West Africa. He had been born at Rayne, son of Dr Samuel Davidson MD, also a graduate of Aberdeen University.

Possible connection with Robert William Felkin:

That they lived in the same street in the late 1890s: see their GMC Registration addresses for that period.

Felkin as a specialist in tropical medicine: plenty on the web and also his obituary in the British Medical Journal issue of 12 February 1927 p309 which specifically mentions his tropical health consultancy work.

Alexander Gordon Davidson as a freemason:

Ars Quatuor Coronatum 2076 issue of 1916 p32 Alexander Gordon Davidson appears in its list of corresponding members, as member of lodge 3175. He had joined Quatuor Coronati lodge 2076 in May 1911, probably during that long leave. His current address was c/o Tarquah Mining and Exploration Co Ltd of Gold Coast W Africa.

The name of lodge 3175, found through Lane's database, available through the Freemasons' Library: 3175 is the Anglo-Colonial Lodge, consecrated in London in 1906. Information on this lodge:

The First Twenty-One Years of the Anglo-Colonial Lodge number 3175. The lodge's motto is 'hands across the sea'. An un-numbered page at the back of the booklet says that the compilers of it were T J Oldland, J H Hack and H Corp. Publication undated but must be circa 1927.

Anglo-Colonial Lodge 3175: To Commemorate the Fiftieth Anniversary of the Lodge. No author. Undated but must be 1956. Page 11-12 has a list of those who signed the petition to the United Grand Lodge of England requesting permission to found the new lodge. Robert Palmer Thomas and A E Waite are both on that list but Alexander Gordon Davidson isn't. P7 says that 8 new members were initiated as part of the lodge's consecration ceremony, and 7 other men were initiated during the lodge's first year. Unfortunately none of the 15 is named in this booklet and there's no full list of lodge members either.

Alexander Gordon Davidson's wife Jane, daughter of Richard Robb Grant of Glasgow:

Edinburgh Gazette 18 April 1856 p362 notice issued 30 June 1855 that John Paton had ceased to be a partner in Paton and Grant of Glasgow. The other partner was Richard Robb Grant of Paton, Grant and Co of Melbourne.

Edinburgh Gazette 31 August 1880 p794 a notice announcing the retirement of John Turnbull from the firm of Turnbull, Grant and Jack, engineers, millwrights, iron founders and boiler makers. The firm will continue in business under the management of R R Grant and Henry Jack.

Edinburgh Gazette 24 November 1891 p1326 bankruptcy notices: at an Extraordinary General Meeting held at the offices of Turnbull Grant and Co Ltd of 2 Charlotte St Port Dundas Glasgow, it was agreed that the company's debts exceeded its ability to pay, so that it would be put into voluntary liquidation. Richard Robb Grant, engineer, and Patrick Hamilton Aikman, chartered accountant would be the firm's liquidators.

The marriage of Alexander Gordon Davidson to Jane Grant took place in Scotland so I haven't got full details of it. Probably 1894.

The Record of Old Westminster covering its beginnings to 1927; vol 1 pubd 1928 p249 Archer Grant Davidson was at the school 1917-19. At time of pubn he was working at the Gold Coast colony of Ashanti for the African and Eastern Trading Co Ltd. B 27 Oct 1902. Son of AGD and Jane Napier dtr of Richard Robb Grant of Hillside Gardens Glasgow.

Tarkwa.

Most of my information on mining in what is now Ghana came from the Times - I did a sweep covering 1894 to 1924. A note to anyone wanting to follow this up: the town and district now spelled Tarkwa is always spelled Tarquah in the Times of that period. There were hardly any references to the company Alexander Gordon Davidson worked for, the Tarquah Mining and Exploration Co Ltd, so the information I gathered was general rather than specific. I'm quite comfortable with the dates that I suggest, however.

Colonial Reports - Annual Number 725 Gold Coast Report to Parliament for 1911. Published HMSO August 1912. P4 a branch line had just opened linking Tarquah to Prestea. P17 is in a section on exports: there's a table of exports from the Gold Coast which makes it clear cocoa was far and away the biggest earner; gold was a long way behind in second place.

There are no export figures in the table prior to 1907 which I suppose is the first year for which statistics were available. The Tarquah Mining and Exploration Co Ltd was one of only two firms (out of about 8 listed) which had been operating throughout the period 1907 to 1911. The company had a fabulous year in 1908; then output of gold from its field halved in 1909; it halved again in 1910 and 1911 had been very poor in comparison.

The Mining Magazine volume 30 1924 p229 the news section includes the whereabouts etc of people known in the mining industry. A short item announces the death of Alexander Gordon Davidson, who was on his way back to the Gold Coast after a period of home leave.

15 August 2012

AMandragora@attglobal.net

Jane Anna Davies was initiated into the Order of the Golden Dawn at its Isis-Urania temple in London in September 1891, choosing the Latin motto 'Excelsior'. She was initiated into its inner, 2nd Order in March 1893, but then resigned from the Order in July 1894.

Jane Anna Davies was born in October 1834, the eldest child of Edward Greenaway, who with his father Thomas, ran a business selling hats and hosiery at 38 Bishopsgate in the City of London. Jane Anna was named after two Janes already in the family, her mother Jane Anna and her grandmother Jane Greenaway. The business run by Thomas and Edward Greenaway had been established in the mid-18th century and was a flourishing concern. In 1837 it could afford to spare £500 to buy shares in the London and Blackwall Railway and Steam Navigation Depot Company, which built and then operated the first rail link into the City; it ran from the ferry stop at Blackwall, through the heavily populated areas of Limehouse and Shadwell north of the West India Dock, and then into Fenchurch Street station. No doubt the Greenaways thought that the tunnel would bring their firm more business; but all the same, £500 was serious money. In July 1845 Thomas Greenaway retired, and from then until his own death in 1872, Jane Anna's father Edward was head of the business.

Both Thomas and Edward Greenaway were well-known in the City; Thomas Greenaway slightly more so as he was elected to the City Corporation (the City's equivalent to a town council) and served on the committee which dealt with the City's pavements and sewerage system. In due course both Greenaways became members of the Drapers' Company. The Company was run by an elected Master, who served for 12 months, and a group of Wardens. Thomas Greenaway served as a Warden during the 12 month period 1836 to 1837. Edward Greenaway first became a member of the Company in 1853. He spent 12 months as a warden in 1860-61 and served as Master (a great honour and it meant presiding at all the banquets and other official functions) in 1862-63.

Edward Greenaway was a cultured man. He loved music and was also interested in the science of his day. He was a member of the London Institution, a more London-focused equivalent of the Royal Institution, which held evening conversazioni and ran lecture programmes and classes taught by scientists such as T H Huxley. At its premises in Finsbury Circus were rooms and equipment which scientists including Humphrey Davy and Michael Faraday used for their experiments. Edward Greenaway became a member of the Institution's management committee in 1834 (so he will have known the Thomas Baring of Baring Brothers' bank, who was its chairman) and was still a member in 1872, attending his last meeting only weeks before he died.

As well as being a mainstay of the London Institution for almost forty years, Edward Greenaway was also a manager of the children's charity run by St Paul's Cathedral; treasurer of the charity school run by the parish of St Ethelburga, where he had grown up; a member of the governing committee of a savings bank, the London Provident Institution of Blomfield Street; and an auditor of the Zoological Society of London.

Edward Greenaway married Jane Anna Cox at St Helen Bishopsgate in December 1833 and Jane Anna was born on 7 October 1834. Her sister Fanny was born in the City too; but by the time the youngest daughter, Emily, was born in 1838, although the family business stayed at the same address the Greenaways had moved out from living over the shop and moved to Islington, then a suburb of London. In 1841 they were living in the parish of St Mary, near Upper Street; by 1851 they had moved to Finsbury. How much the three daughters understood or even knew about the ideas regularly discussed by their father and his acquaintances at the London Institution is debatable - such get-togethers tended to be 'all male' affairs. However, Jane Anna and her sisters had a good education, even a quite expensive one, by the (low) standards of the day for women: their parents employed a French governess to teach them not only the language but also the manners of the country seen as the most cultured in Europe; and French governesses did not come cheap. Although there was no son to work with Edward Greenaway in the business, there was never any question of any of the daughters working in it at any level. By 1856 the Greenaways had moved even further from Bishopsgate in any case, to Kensington, where in the autumn of 1856 Jane Anna Greenaway married Charles Maurice Davies.

Charles Maurice Davies (always known as Maurice rather than Charles) came from a very similar background to Jane Anna, though I think not such a financially comfortable one: his father ran a drapery business in the cathedral town of Wells in Somerset. She and Maurice also had a shared interest in music. Maurice played the violin; and Jane Anna should have been taught to play the piano - it was a standard part of the education of a middle-class girl at that time. Even if Jane Anna had not shown any talent as a musician herself, she inherited her father's enjoyment of the playing of other people, and at least during the 1870s, she and Maurice held musical parties for their friends, regularly on Friday evenings.

Maurice's family had made efforts to ensure that their sons got the best education they could obtain and afford. Maurice had been sent to live with two maiden aunts while he attended King's College School in London; from there he had gone to Durham University, graduated with a degree in classics and become a Fellow of the university before being ordained as a priest in the Church of England. In this way he had done what his parents had no doubt intended and stepped out of the merchants' class, into the professional one; rather like Jane Anna Greenaway.

In many ways, Jane Anna's life after her marriage was typical of married women in mid-Victorian England. She gave birth to 11 children: Charles and his still-born twin, 1857; Arthur 1859; John 1860; Robert 1861; Mary 1863; Dora 1865; Frederick 1866; Amy 1870; Rosalie 1872; and lastly Edmund 1873. And she managed a large household on a budget which seems to have got more limited after the early 1860s as her family and its expenses grew. For example, Jane Anna never employed a cook after the early 1860s, and it's likely that the cook who was a member of the household on the day of the 1861 census was taken on to cook for more than just the family; and she never employed a nursery nurse at all, though she did employ a governess for a few years in the early 1880s. This implies that Jane Anna will have been doing a great deal of the housework herself: daily management, hiring and firing, childcare, shopping, cooking; while a general servant - two if the family income could cover it that year - did the cleaning. None of this was unusual. However, in other ways Jane Anna's life was not especially typical, and that was down to the character of her husband.

Not for the Rev Maurice Davies the normal working life of a priest in the Church of England: moving on from periods spent as a curate to find a patron and be appointed vicar or rector of a parish, and stay working in that parish for life unless promotion intervened, doing no other work. A job in the Church of England did give a man an understood place in the community, and a guaranteed income, however small; this would be important to the son of a provincial shop-keeper trying to make his way through the shifting social sands of London. However, it's clear from my research, that a life as a priest didn't satisfy Maurice Davies; in particular, it couldn't contain his curiosity and his urge to communicate with and about his fellow men and women. From the year of his marriage, Maurice Davies never did just do the work of a priest. From 1858 to 1860 he wrote three novels. In the 1860s he was headmaster and a teacher at the West London Collegiate school and his family lived on the school's premises. As early as 1861 and as late as 1891, he also taught private pupils, about four at any time, who lived as part of the Davies' household. From 1856 to the early 1880s at least and maybe later, he did reporting, journalism, leader-writing and editing for a variety of newspapers and magazines including the Daily Telegraph and the Western Morning News. In the 1850s he did translations of some Latin texts; and his last paid work, in the 1890s, was as managing editor of a group translating the texts used by Gibbon for his Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire. You can see from this paragraph that he was often doing several of these different types of work at the same time. And there were also periods where he wasn't doing any work at all and wondering where the next year's income was going to come from. If Jane Anna had been wanting the busy but quiet life of the conventional vicar's wife, she should definitely have married someone else.

During the late 1860s and early 1870s, Maurice Davies became well-known for the newspaper articles he wrote in which he reported on his visits, firstly to the services of all the different Christian sects he could locate in London, and later to what he considered as the main alternatives to Christianity that he knew of in the capital city, for which purpose he went to meetings of Fenians, Secularists, Muslims and the Cooperative movement amongst others. On the borders between the two categories lay the Mormons and the Unitarians. Maurice Davies went to meetings of both of those groups and interviewed a Mormon newly arrived from the USA to begin what most have been the sect's first attempts at proselytising in Europe. The articles were later published as a series of books and it's to them that I owe almost all of what I've found out about Jane Anna Davies; particularly about her and Maurice's life in Spiritualism.

Maurice and Jane Anna Davies went to Paris for their honeymoon and stayed there nearly a year. Maurice was unemployed when they arrived but soon got his first newspaper job, as the Paris correspondent of a London weekly paper. This took him out of the flat a lot and Jane Anna got bored. To help make ends meet, they had let one of their rooms to Jane Anna's ex-governess. When Maurice was out in the evenings the two women started to try out some of the methods that were supposed to put you in touch with spirits. The method called automatic writing worked the best: you all sat at a table and asked questions of the spirits, and one of you acted as medium, writing down the spirits' answers. Her ex-governess thought that Jane Anna seemed to have a talent for acting as the medium. At first Maurice was inclined to laugh at them, but when his brother came to stay he was persuaded to join in a seance and his curiosity got him hooked. Maurice and Jane Anna started to hold seances regularly.

Maurice Davies makes it very plain in both his books that Jane Anna's talent as a medium caused her much anxiety, on several counts, and she discussed her concerns about it very often with her husband. Firstly, she felt that automatic writing - with the writer passively writing what they were told by the spirits - was a most unsatisfactory way of communicating with the world beyond. When one particular spirit replied to a tricky question by causing her to write that the purpose of the spirits in communicating like this was to encourage people to believe in God, Jane Anna told Maurice that if people wanted to get in touch with God, they should use what she called the "regularly ordained" channels - that is, prayer and going to church services. Many years of seances later, she still felt that. In addition, she was always worried about whether she was quite as passive, during the automatic writing, as everyone assumed: could she be sure that the spirit was in charge of what was being written? Or was she, in some way, controlling the pen herself and "simply writing down her own ideas"? As their involvement in spiritualism grew, Maurice began trying out other ways of allowing messages from the spirit world to get through to this one. Jane Anna was particularly alarmed and unnerved during several sessions in which Maurice successfully hypnotised people. And during one particularly highly-charged seance she felt an atmosphere so negative that she got quite hysterical and rushed out of the room. However, despite all her reservations, Jane Anna continued to act as a medium in seances at home with people she knew well, and there was a very good reason for this.

Jane Anna and Maurice's own sons were educated at the West London Collegiate school during the years they ran it (1861-68), and slept in the dormitories with the other pupils. In the autumn of 1865 the worst happened - the school had a scarlet fever outbreak. As was customary at the time, Jane Anna and Maurice sent those who were ill into isolation in the country. Their own son Johnny had caught it and had to go with them, and he died shortly afterwards with neither of his parents with him. They had been sent a telegram warning of Johnny's dangerous state and had set out at once but arrived too late. The day after their son's death they had sat down to a seance, and Jane Anna had written down a comforting message sent by Johnny, now in the spirit world.

Even 30 years after Johnny's death Maurice Davies still felt his loss acutely - Johnny had been his favourite child. But he was able to look back and think that perhaps the message Jane Anna had received might have been a reflection not of spirits in the world beyond but of the intensity of her grief and her guilt at not being with her son as he was dying. In 1894 Maurice was able to reflect that they had never had another message direct from the dead child, despite all their attempts to reach him; they had only had messages from a spirit that had claimed to be a spirit-world guardian of Johnny. My own researches have found that in the spring of 1865, Jane Anna's mother had died, so even before Johnny's death Jane Anna had already been in a period of mourning, of heightened emotion. The message from Johnny gave her some relief from her misery. She still felt all the uncertainty she had always done about the whole spiritualist business but she kept on using seances to make herself available for any other messages he might send her, and by the 1870s she was also receiving messages from her other dead child, her eldest son Charles' still-born twin. She was also sure that on one precious occasion, she had seen Johnny's ghost.

Despite the ambivalence she felt about her talent at automatic writing, Jane Anna started to use it to help others, though she never took any payment for it. During the early 1870s Maurice Davies was working again as a curate, at St Paul's Kensington. Jane Anna started going to seances organised by her husband's parishioners, using her talent as a means of getting to know them better. She also acted as a medium, when asked, for other parishioners whose children had died.

The message from Johnny also made a big difference to Maurice Davies, though not in the same way. Whereas he had been sceptical before it, about the existence of the spirit world, and had kept his interest in spiritualism within the family, he now acted convinced and became a well-known figure in the wider social world which had sprung up around spiritualism, attending seances with its celebrity mediums and with the professionals (not always the same people as the celebrities), who charged for their services. He also accepted invitations to seances organised by people he only knew through mutual acquaintances, and he started writing about his experiences for the papers. Exactly how often Jane Anna went with her husband to these more public spiritualist occasions is difficult to tell, even from Maurice Davies' books, but I think that he went to most of them on his own. He mentions particular occasions when his wife went with him to the seances he was invited to, but these seem quite rare (after all, she did have her own very busy life). It's still possible that in this way, Jane Anna may have met the Rev Hugh Haweis and his wife Mary Eliza; and the scientist William Crookes. Years later, both Mary Eliza Haweis and William Crookes were initiated into the Golden Dawn.

The Rev Hugh Haweis and Maurice Davies were the two members of the Church of England most associated with what came to be known as Christian spiritualism. However, spiritualism was a topic that divided the church and its congregations, and Maurice Davies lost one job as a curate because of the way he publicised spiritualism and openly believed in it; and neither man was not offered any promotion within the Church of England. Throughout the 1870s Maurice Davies continued to believe in both the Church of England's Christianity and the existence of the spirit world, and he undertook an experiment in which he hoped he would bring the two together: an experiment he called a "mystic oratory". It's not clear whether Jane Anna played a part in the mystic oratory experiment: Maurice does not name anyone who made up the congregation. Only a few, very carefully chosen people were involved in it. Some ordinary rooms were hired and prepared, and Maurice Davies held two religious services per week, complete with a sermon and followed by a seance. As he describes it, the idea was that the spirits of the dead should come from the spirit world into this one and take their place amongst the living at these services and seances; so that the congregation would be made up of both the living and the dead. The start of the experiment has been dated to early in 1881 but in that case, it had lasted only a month or two before Maurice Davies left the country.

In March 1881, fired up with enthusiasm as the mystic oratory experiment began, Maurice Davies wrote to the two Church of England archbishops defending spiritualism and arguing that it was possible to be both a spiritualist and a Christian; and offering to speak on the subject at the forthcoming Church Congress. And then - he was gone, at the end of May, to start a new job in South Africa. So suddenly did he depart that his family was left behind in England; in August, the readers of the spiritualist magazine Light were being asked to find the sum of £250 for Jane Anna and the children to follow him. I haven't been able to find out what job it was that Maurice Davies did in South Africa; nor do I know whether Jane Anna managed to join him there. All the family were back in England in 1891.

If the mystic oratory continued after Maurice Davies rushed away to Africa, it must have been under someone else's auspices. In any case it was a failure. The dead did not come. At the end of the lease on the rooms, the congregation went their separate ways. And Maurice Davies lost both his faith in spiritualism and his faith in God. He never held another post with the Church of England, and dropped out of spiritualist society as well. I'm not sure whether the family-centred seances also stopped but it sounds from Maurice's writings that they did. His own belief in God and the spirit world now in tatters, Maurice envied Jane Anna's own faith, which he described as "all along so utterly unshadowed by doubt". She had never tried to force her own beliefs on anyone, however, and she did not do so now, even when - perhaps - her husband might have been grateful for being persuaded.

As with acting as a spiritualist medium, so with astrology: it was Maurice Davies who had the greater interest in it, but Jane Anna who turned out to be better at it. They both went for lessons in its techniques to a Mr Hockley. Maurice soon gave up the lessons, seeing he did so badly in them, but Jane Anna continued to learn. However, when Maurice wanted astrological advice, he went to an astrologer called Mr Wilson when he wanted to discover what future could be seen in the stars (like, would he be offered a job soon? - to which the answer was yes).

Meanwhile the wheels of family life were turning. Jane Anna's father had died in 1872 and later in that decade her children began to leave school and find work - including two of her daughters. By 1881 Arthur Davies had gone to work in the offices of the Prudential Mutual Assurance Investment and Loan Association (the 'Pru') and in due course Amy and then Edmund also got work there. The tradition was continued into a second generation when Arthur's sons Dudley and Roy worked there too. Charles worked for an estate agent; Robert for a firm of solicitors and Frederick for a trading company; and Rosalie became a teacher. It's likely that three of Jane Anna's sons went abroad to work: I can't find Charles or Frederick on any census after 1881 and Edmund after 1891, though they may just have liked to take their holidays around census day (which was usually near Easter).

In due course all of Jane Anna's sons and daughters who were still living in England married. Arthur and Robert married two sisters, Mary Clara and Edith Georgina Killik (sometimes spelled Killick on the census). Dora married one of Maurice Davies' living-in pupils, Charles Otto Dubois (known as Otto) who despite his French surname was actually Swedish. Amy married a senior bank official, Clarence Ravenscroft. And Rosalie married Henry Carr, though not until 1915. Mary married and produced (in 1882) what was probably Jane Anna's first grand-child, a daughter; but I can't read Mary's married surname on the 1891 census, or find her in the two later ones, so I don't know who her husband was.

By the day of the 1901 census, only Rosalie was still living with Jane Anna and Maurice Davies. It's possible that she was still working as a teacher and the census official didn't ask her about it; but she may have given up work to look after her parents. Jane Anna and Maurice had always changed their address fairly regularly, moving steadily out through west London from Notting Hill to Hammersmith; now they were at 7 Acton Lane on the fringes of Bedford Park where several GD members had been living in the 1890s. During 1901, Maurice Davies retired from work. He and Jane Anna made one more move, to 50 Connaught Road Harlesden, where Jane Anna died on 17 September 1908. Maurice survived for two more years, dying in September 1910. Rosalie went to live with her sister Amy.

I've indicated above that Jane Anna may have known, as early as the 1870s, several people who were subsequently initiated into the Golden Dawn. However, Jane Anna's contact in the GD in the months before she was initiated was someone else entirely: Anne Carden. Jane Anna asked the GD to send correspondence addressed to her to Anne Carden's house in Leinster Square. Anne Carden and her husband Alexander were initiated into the GD in March 1891; in 1892 a third family member was initiated, their daughter Pamela, who later married another GD member. Maurice Davies never mentions the Cardens in any of his writings that I've read and I think they may have been friends of Jane Anna rather than Maurice. Anne Carden, Alexander Carden and Jane Anna Davies all made the step up into the GD's 2nd, inner, Order during March 1893 and probably prepared for it together. The subjects GD initiates studied were difficult, and candidates for the 2nd Order were tested on their knowledge and understanding, so it reflects well on Jane Anna's education and application that she reached 2nd Order level in only 18 months (though she probably sailed through the astrology, being well-trained in it already). But then, all three only stayed as members of the GD for just over a year longer before they all resigned, the Cardens in June 1894 and Jane Anna in July (Pamela Carden continued as a member). None of the books on the GD that I've read discuss this sudden walk-out by three senior members; so I've no idea whether it was as a result of one of the bouts of in-fighting to which the GD was all too prone, or whether problems arose in the rest of their lives. My feeling is that the problems, if there were any, were in the Cardens lives; and the GD without them was just not going to be the same for Jane Anna Davies so she gave it up too.

BASIC SOURCES I USED for all Golden Dawn members.

Membership of the Golden Dawn: The Golden Dawn Companion by R A Gilbert. Northampton: The Aquarian Press 1986. Between pages 125 and 175, Gilbert lists the names, initiation dates and addresses of all those people who became members of the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn or its many daughter Orders between 1888 and 1914. The list is based on the Golden Dawn's administrative records and its Members' Roll - the large piece of parchment on which all new members signed their name at their initiation. All this information had been inherited by Gilbert but it's now in the Freemasons' Library at the United Grand Lodge of England building on Great Queen Street Covent Garden.

On the GD's history:

The Magicians of the Golden Dawn: a Documentary History of a Magical Order 1887-1923 by Ellic Howe. London: Routledge and Kegan Paul 1972.

The Golden Dawn Scrapbook: the Rise and Fall of a Magical Order, another book on the GD by R A Gilbert. York Beach Maine: Samuel Weiser Inc 1997.

Family history: freebmd; ancestry.co.uk (census and probate); findmypast.co.uk; familysearch; Burke's Peerage and Baronetage; Burke's Landed Gentry; Armorial Families; thepeerage.com; and a wide variety of family trees on the web.

Famous-people sources: mostly about men, of course, but very useful even for the female members of GD. Oxford Dictionary of National Biography. Who Was Who. Times Digital Archive.

Catalogues: British Library; Freemasons' Library.

Wikipedia; Google; Google Books - my three best resources. I also used other web pages, but with some caution, as - from the historian's point of view - they vary in quality a great deal.

ON THE GREENAWAY FAMILY

At www.londonancestor.com there's the text of the 1794 directory for London, Westminster and Southwark; Thomas Greenaway, hosier and hatter, is already in business at 38 Bishopsgate.

House of Commons Papers number 37, printed 7 March 1837: Private Bills presented to Parliament during 1837. On p160 there's a list of subscribers to the share issue of the London and Blackwall Railway and Steam Navigation Depot Company. The list includes Edward Greenaway, hatter, of 38 Bishopsgate; he bought 10 shares for a total of £500.

For more information on the London to Blackwall Railway: London's Local Railways by Alan A Jackson. Newton Abbot, London and North Pomfret Vermont: David and Charles publishers, 1978; pp160-165. The stations were designed by William Tite, who was later employed as Secretary of the London Institution. The engineering contractors who built the railway were George Parker Bidder and George Stephenson.

Post Office Directory for London issued of 1846 p254 has the business called Edward Greenaway.

London Gazette, there was no date at top of page but the page must date from July 1845 and after the 25th; p2277 in a list of legal notices dissolving business partnerships includes one issued by Thomas Greenaway and Edward Greenaway, trading as Greenaway and Sons, hatters, of Bishopsgate Street. Their partnership was dissolved and in future Edward Greenaway would continue the business "on his own account". Signed by both men and dated 25 July 1845.

For general information on the Drapers' Company, see www.thedrapers.co.uk. The Hall is at Throgmorton Avenue EC2N. I found the details of the Greenaways' membership in The History of the Worshipful Company of the Drapers of London, by Rev A H Johnson. Oxford: Clarendon Press 1922. Details of the Greenaways' membership are in Volume IV p438 and p444.

Annals of Science volume 39 1982 pp229-54 has an article on the life of William Robert Grove who was Secretary of the London Institution from 1841 to 1845 by M L Cooper and V M D Hall. P238 the London Institution was run on a daily basis by 4 managers; in 1840 Edward Greenaway was one of the four.

Journal of the London Institution volume 2 1872 published London: Unwin Brothers 1873. On p74 is an obituary of Edward Greenaway, who'd died on 25 April 1872. Virtually all my information on Edward Greenaway's varied interests and commitments came from this and it was also very informative about his father.

At the website www.richardfordmanuscripts.co.uk in August 2012 I found a Report of the Auditors of the Zoological Society of London. The auditors had been appointed on 21 January 1869, Edward Greenaway was one of them.

Via the Mormon family history website familysearch.org, details of the Greenaway family from the original records of St Helen Bishopsgate:

- Edward Greenaway was born on 12 January 1789, son of Thomas Greenaway and his wife Jane.
- Edward Greenaway married Jane Anna Cox at St Helen Bishopsgate on 14 December 1883
- Jane Anna Greenaway was born on 7 October 1834 and baptised, at St Helen Bishopsgate, on 1 November 1834
- Fanny Cox Greenaway was born on 13 August 1835 and baptised, at St Helen Bishopsgate, on 19 August 1835.

There was no record of the baptism of Emily Greenaway at St Helen Bishopsgate.

MAURICE DAVIES

Times of Friday 9 September 1910 p11b has a short obituary but my researches since I read it have made me a bit worried about one or two details. It also makes no reference at all to his family life - in the way of obituaries at that time.

Dictionary of National Biography 2nd Supplement volume 1 A-E p474. This also has no reference to Maurice's family.

MAURICE DAVIES AS A CHURCHMAN

Issues of Crockford's Clerical Directory from 1851 to 1880 list his career to date. I looked at the issues of 1886 and 1904; both did not have a listing for him, so he was not employed by the Church of England in those years. The evidence that he did not work as a priest after 1881 comes from his writings on spiritualism - see below.

At the outset of Maurice's career he seems to have had very 'high church' views: wikipedia's page on Rev Charles Lowder says that he and a group of other young trainees for the priesthood founded the Society of the Holy Cross in 1855. The others in the group were: Charles Maurice Davies; David Nicols; Alfred Poole; Joseph Newton Smith; and Henry Augustus Rawes. Several of the group converted to Roman Catholicism later in their lives but Maurice had left the Society altogether by the late 1850s; his writings indicate a very 'broad church' attitude.

MAURICE DAVIES AS A NEWSPAPER-MAN

Most of the evidence for the various journals and papers he worked for comes from his own writings - see below.

Website www.victorianlondon.org has a Dictionary of Victorian London containing a number of Maurice Davies' newspaper articles, including one in which he describes the execution by hanging of the baby farmer Margaret Waters; he'd got special dispensation from the Home Office to be present.

MAURICE DAVIES AND SPIRITUALISM

The two texts from which I've drawn my account of Jane Anna as a practising spiritualist are: Mystic London; and The Great Secret.

Mystic London: Or, Phases of Occult Life in the Metropolis by Charles Maurice Davies. London: Tinsley Brothers 1874. This is not as 'occult' as its title suggests: there's nothing about hermeticism or magic or freemasonry or Rosicrucianism in it, although p205 begins an account of Maurice's visit to an astrologer, not the one who taught him and Jane Anna. By 'occult' Maurice really means spiritualism: pp290 to the end of the book on p406 are concerned with different aspects of it and on p406 Maurice sums up his beliefs (this is before the Mystic Oratory experiment) by quoting from S C Hall's poem Philosophy which is arguing that belief in spiritualism is a belief in Christ; and that death is a release into a Celestial Life free from pain and sorrow. S C Hall was one of Maurice's parishioners.

The Great Secret and its Unfoldment in Occultism. Published London: George Redway 1895. In fact, it was published anonymously, as by "a Church of England clergyman".

However, the author is taken to be Rev Charles Maurice Davies by Janet Oppenheim in her The Other World: Spiritualism and Psychic Research in England 1850-1916 published Cambridge University Press 1985; and certainly various events described in it are the same as events that appear in Mystic London, including an account of the seance Jane Anna and Maurice held the day after the death of John Davies in 1865. The start at least of the Mystic Oratory experiment was dated by Janet Oppenheim very precisely to February 1881: see her footnote on p411.

Although Maurice Davies constantly refers to 'my wife' in both books, he never mentions her name.

The flight to South Africa:

Light: A Journal Devoted to the Highest Interests of Humanity, both Here and Hereafter. London: Eclectic Publishing Co Ltd of 4 New Bridge Street Ludgate Circus. Volume 1 January-December 1881: p93 issue of 26 March 1881; p108 issue of 9 April 1881; p164 issue of 28 May 1881; p253 issue of 13 August 1881. Neither Rev Maurice nor his family were mentioned in any subsequent issue; so I don't know whether Jane Anna went to South Africa or had to remain in England. Just noting that I've looked at volumes of the magazine for 1881, 1885, 1890, 1895 and 1900 and haven't seen any reference to Jane Anna attending any functions of the British National Association of Spiritualists or the London Spiritualist Alliance. And after this 1881 volume, I don't actually remember seeing any references to her husband either.

GENERALLY ON SPIRITUALISM

Janet Oppenheim's book as above; it has a section on Maurice Davies. And more specifically on women in spiritualism: The Darkened Room: Women, Power and Spiritualism in Late Victorian England by Alex Owen. Chicago and London: University of Chicago Press 1989.

9 August 2015

">

Find the web pages of Roger Wright and Sally Davis, including my list of people initiated into the Order of the Golden Dawn between 1888 and 1901, at:

www.wrightanddavis.co.uk

***

Caroline Dora de Blaquière (always called Dora) was initiated into the Golden Dawn at its Isis-Urania temple in London, choosing the Latin motto 'Spero meliora'. She was one of the GD's earliest members, joining in 1888, but was not especially active. In 1889 she was even judged to have let her membership lapse though in fact she was abroad, visiting North America, and may just have forgotten to pay her yearly subscription. The GD's archive at the Freemasons' Library suggests that she may have been a member of the GD's Edinburgh group, the Amen-Ra temple, at some stage; though she left England for good in 1900.

March 2014. A big update to Dora's file has been required! In February, Martin Atkinson of Calgary in Canada contacted me to tell me of a friendship Dora had with someone I'd never heard of before: the poet, writer on theology and expert on embroidery, Sophia Frances Anne Caulfeild. As a result of Martin's tip-off, I also discovered another previously unknown friendship for Dora - the family of GD member Mary Briggs. So many, many thanks to Martin - I don't often get 'light-bulb' moments like I the one I had about Dora and the Briggs's. He also located a photograph of Dora's gravestone for me. Martin is a descendant of Sophia Caulfeild's sister Louisa Lavinia (1828-96) who married Rev Hans Atkinson.

June 2014 brings another update to my file on Dora - a correction and some amplification to the section on her family. This second revision is the result of my being contacted by Sally Thomson, who has worked out that she's Dora's fourth cousin, three times removed - Dora was Sally T's great-grandmother's fourth cousin. A historian and writer, Sally T has traced her Bettridge ancestors back to late 17th-century Gloucestershire and Warwickshire, using local history and family history sources.

THE BETTRIDGE FAMILY

Dora's Bettridge ancestors were living in the part of the Cotswolds where Gloucestershire meets Oxfordshire by the end of the 17th century; though how long they had been there is unknown. Dora's father did inherit a small amount of land when his mother died in 1829, but in general the family were labourers and husbandmen, a social group which had been the backbone of so many rural communities but whose future was being made increasingly insecure by land enclosure. The younger sons of such families had a particularly uncertain future. The career of Dora's father illustrates how, in his case, that uncertainty led him to abandon Gloucestershire for an extraordinary working life that illustrates in miniature the expansion of the British empire during the early and mid-19th century.

WILLIAM CRADDOCK BETTRIDGE was a son of John and Elizabeth Bettridge of Wick Rissington in Gloucestershire. He was baptised in Stow-on-the-Wold in 1791 but left there to join the army in April 1813. He fought through the tail-end of the Peninsular War and ended up, as a Major, in charge of the garrison at Brussels while Waterloo was taking place in the countryside nearby. He could have stayed in the British army and ended up (if he had lived that long) as a general. Instead, he retired on half-pay and spent several years working and studying in Europe. Almost nothing is known about his life in those years but they were obviously a key period in his thinking. He worked as a mercenary, but also studied and in the end, was moved to give up soldiering for the church. His marriage to Mary Hounsfeld, in 1823, may have helped him make up his mind to this big and surprising change of career. He was ordained as a Church of England priest in 1825. For the next few years he worked as minister at one or possibly two churches in Southampton: he was appointed to All Saints Proprietary Chapel in 1828; and was minister at St Paul's Chapel in 1834 (they may be the same church, renamed - I'm not clear on that point). However, the restless, adventure-seeking nature that had caused him to join the army in time of war hadn't quite left William Bettridge. In 1834 he took the offer of a job with the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel and went with a group of ex-military colonists to the town of Woodstock in what is now Ontario, but was then known as Upper Canada. Mary and their family went with him.

William Bettridge's job in Upper Canada was to set up a parish based on Woodstock. This he did, fighting the Church of England and colonial authorities to ensure the parish a secure income, and getting the town's residents to fund the building of a church, St Paul's Woodstock. The church still exists, built in deep red brick; you can see it at Woodstock's website at www.city.woodstock.on.ca; there's also a good account of it on wikipedia. William Bettridge became the new church's first rector, a post he held until his death in 1873. He also started a number of businesses in the town, including a shop. As the Church of England's grip on Upper Canada expanded, he became a rural dean of the diocese of Huron.

Caroline Dora Bettridge was the last-but-one (I think - she was certainly one of the youngest) of William and Mary Bettridge's family, born in Woodstock in 1840. I haven't been able to find out anything about her life in Woodstock as a child and young woman. As her parents were not well off and Dora was only the latest of several daughters, I would suppose there was no money to send her away to school, even if there had been a school to send her to, this early in Canada's history. I think she learned whatever she did learn, in Woodstock. From her later writings I would deduce that she had an education based on reading, writing, the bible, and domestic tasks. The impossibility of finding (let alone keeping) servants was a perennial middle-class complaint in the colonies in the 19th century, and in her later life Dora displayed a knowledge of laundry, mending and cooking on a tight budget that suggests she knew how to do all of those, the sort of tasks the servants would do in a vicar's household in England.

Although, as one of the rector's daughters, Dora would have known Woodstock's best families, that would have been a rather limited number of people, so that the number of suitable husbands known to her - or rather, to her parents - was probably small. It seems from the family gravestone that only two of William Bettridge's daughters married. Dora was one of them: in 1865 she married one of her father's church wardens, Charles de Blaquièrre. He was about twice her age, and a widower with three young children.

THE DE BLAQUIÈRES

Although in 1851 Charles de Blaquièrre was working as Woodstock's post-master (he probably still was at the time of his marriage to Dora) the family was a grander one than that implies. Dora was marrying somebody who, if he lived long enough, would become the 6th Baron de Blaquièrre of Ardkill in county Derry. The de Blaquièrres were descended from French Protestants who had fled to northern Ireland to escape religious persecution in their homeland. In 1800, Charles' grandfather had been made the first baron de Blaquièrre. Charles was the son of the first baron's younger son, Peter Boyle de Blaquièrre who, after a career in the British navy, went to Canada and settled in Woodstock in 1837. He bought property in the town and became an influential supporter of the Church of England's efforts to establish itself in the district - an important ally of Dora's father. In 1841 was appointed a member of the legislative council of the Province of Canada, which advised the governor-general. He later became the first chancellor of the University of Toronto. He died, in Toronto, in 1860.

I don't know anything about Dora's married life except that she seems to have stayed in Canada, probably in Woodstock where her husband was probably still the post-master. She certainly knew her three step-children before she married their father - Peter, born in 1849; Louisa, born in 1850; and William, born 1856 - as the whole de Blaquièrre family were members of her father's congregation. Perhaps she had taught the three children at Sunday school and established a rapport with them. She doesn't seem to have given birth to any children of her own, so all her motherly instincts would have been focused on them. How long they were in her care, though, I wouldn't know. They did have other relatives and Dora's marriage was a short one. Her husband didn't live long enough to inherit the barony and catapult Dora into the British peerage. He died in 1869.

The period of Dora's life that is the biggest blank, is what happened to her in the years immediately after her husband's death. Where was she living? Did she go home to her parents? What was she living on? What about her step-children? They were all still under-age when their father died. What arrangements were made for them? Did they stay with Dora? Or did they go to their grandmother (Peter Boyle de Blaquièrre's second wife, who died in 1881) or to other relatives? I have no idea.

A snippet I found on Googlebooks seemed to be suggesting that Dora was living in Paris by 1880 and was writing regular articles called 'What to Wear' for the English journal Cassell's Family Magazine, not under her own name but as "Our Paris Correspondent". Another snippet went further, suggesting Dora had been Cassell's "Our Paris Correspondent" since 1876. When I tried to follow up the snippets at the British Library, though, I couldn't find Dora mentioned by name as an author in the volumes for 1880 or 1876. However, the 1870s were a time when many magazine and newspaper articles were printed without any clue as to the name of the writer. So I'm not dismissing Googlebooks' suggestion; but on the other hand I think I'll just say it's possible it may be right but I wish I could see some more evidence. The column Dora's alleged to have been writing continued in the magazine in the same format until 1885, before being revamped a couple of times and finally reappearing with a named author, who wasn't Dora, in 1893. I'm assuming that Dora wrote the column, certainly around 1880 and possibly from 1876 to 1885 despite moving to London during that time. At this early point in her career, she also wrote a short book on an ill-fated attempt by Irish landowners to establish a silk-worm farming industry in Ireland.

There's no doubt, however, about Dora's main source of income from 1880 onwards, because from that year on, the articles she was writing were published with her name on them. From 1880 and for the next 20 years, she was one of a group of women who wrote regularly for Girl's Own Paper - the most widely read magazine for young women of its time, with about 250,000 readers in the years before World War I, of all ages and living all over the world. Great Grandmama's Weekly: A Celebration of Girl's Own Paper, by Wendy Forrester, is my source for Dora's work for GOP. On p21 of Forrester's book there's a small picture of Dora, rather heavy-chinned and looking as though she's wearing mourning - a dark or black dress with a high neck and a narrow ruffle just under her ears. And I rather think that the way she appears in the picture gets to the heart of why Dora became one of GOP's regular writers. GOP was started up as an equivalent to the Boy's Own Paper by BOP's publisher, the Religious Tract Society, a Church of England missionary society very surprised to find itself a successful publisher but delighted with the revenue, which rapidly became the financial bedrock on which their missionary activities depended. For its girls' paper, the Society wanted articles which reflected their view of the proper life for young Christian women: based on hearth and home, emphasising domestic skills and practical usefulness; nothing too challenging, and no politics. As a vicar's daughter, now in her forties, the widow of a man with aristocratic connections, but no better off financially than most of the GOP's readers were, Dora was exactly the kind of woman writer the Society was after.

When I started my research on the GD members in 2010, there was virtually nothing written by Dora on the web. Since then, however, a lot of issues of Girl's Own Paper have been put on the web so that if you want to have a look at examples of her work, there are plenty to choose from; for example, at www.mostly-victorian.com which seems to be putting every issue of GOP up to be viewed. At www.abebooks.co.uk there's another GOP article by Dora from the volume covering October 1895 to September 1896: The Dress for Bicycling. And there's one at www.tumblr.com. published originally in the GOP of 23 December 1899: The Trousseau of Today (with a picture of lacy underwear).

The University of East Anglia has a list of articles in GOP by author, which shows Dora writing more than almost any other contributor - see the Sources at the end of this biography for the full details. The Mostly Victorian website and the UEA list of articles give a good feel for the kind of article Dora specialised in when writing for GOP. In 1882-83, for example, under the excruciating overall heading The Fairy of the Family, Dora wrote a series of articles on housekeeping skills; including one on how to take care of the household linen; and another, Spots and Stains, that was so useful I started noting down the details to try them on my own stubborn stains. She wrote 'how to make'-type articles, for example on winter clothes, summer drinks, Christmas decorations and others. In 1881-82 her article Samplers Past and Present was typical of another side of her work. In it, she mentions a variety of books from the Bible to Book II of Philip Sidney's Arcadia as containing references to samplers; and uses Randal Holme's Academy of Armory Book III, published in 1688, to describe the different stitches that were used in the sampler work of Holme's day. The use of a 17th century source-book suggests Dora was a regular visitor to the British Library; I can't imagine where else she might have got a copy. Dora's inspiration for the article had been a visit to the previous year's Exhibition of Ancient Needlework at the Royal School of Art Needlework, in which the earliest exhibit was sewn in 1666.

As well as the magazine, the Religious Tract Society also issued annuals, and several books containing articles on one subject by its usual GOP writers, including How to be Happy and Married, in 1888 (it was still selling in 1892); and How to Make Common Things: A Handy Book for Girls, in 1890. Dora contributed to both of those volumes and her contribution to the second one is the only work by her listed in the British Library catalogue.

Although most of Dora's work in the 1880s and 1890s appeared in GOP, she did write for other magazines: Frank Leslie's Popular Monthly; the Church of England Temperance Chronicle; the Argosy, owned and edited by the author Mrs Henry Wood; Murray's Magazine; the Journal of Education; the Contemporary Review; and the Review of Reviews, owned and edited by W T Stead. These were articles of a rather different type, looking at dress items (fans for example) as art objects or collectors' items; and considering jewellery as display and noting changes in taste. And two articles published by Dora in the magazine Leisure Hour looked at the social implications of what women wore, discussing the arguments being put forward by the Rational Dress movement: Modern Dress Reformers, and How Should We Dress? New German Theories of Clothing, both published in 1884.

I've tried to discover whether Dora actually belonged to the Rational Dress Society, or its more radical off-shoot the Rational Dress Association; but I haven't had any luck finding lists of members. I imagine she was, but I can't prove it. I know the names of two women who were definitely members of the Rational Dress Society: Mary Eliza Haweis, who wrote books about interior design and dress; and Constance Wilde, who held popular 'at homes' during the late 1880s and 1890s and promoted the idea of rational dress at these social occasions and through magazine articles. Both Mary Eliza and Constance were initiated into the GD. Dora must at least have known of Mary Eliza Haweis' work, even if they hadn't met; writing on similar topics. But there's clear evidence that Dora knew Constance Wilde, and probably her husband as well, by 1889. In 1890, Dora had a series of articles published in the magazine Woman's World, which had been edited by Oscar Wilde for the last two years. Oscar Wilde will have commissioned Dora's articles. Three of them were on topics that by this time she was well-known for covering: Modern Jewellery, Geneva and its Jewellery, and Foreign and English Housekeeping. The fourth one was a bit of departure, however. Inspired by the writings of the American poet Joachim Miller, whose log-cabin near Washington DC she had visited, Dora decided that she too would find somewhere to escape to when the city got her down. In A Cottage in the Country she describes her search for the perfect setting - she eventually picked a Sussex labourer's cottage with a view of Chanctonbury Rings - and how she did up her cottage, with the help of one handy-man (who had to make good rather a lot of neglect) for a total budget of £50. The article resonates with the pleasure it gave Dora to do the kind of housekeeping she wrote about for GOP: choosing the material and then sewing her own curtains, painting the rooms Egyptian blue, seeding the lawn and slinging a hammock between the trees. She ended the article by urging her readers to live as near to nature as they could, happy in the simple life.

Dora moved to London at around the time she began contributing to Girl's Own Paper and her first home in the city was a rented a house at 7 Osnaburgh Terrace. She wasn't at home on the day of the 1881 census, however; she and her friend Sophia Caulfeild (of whom more below) were in north-west England visiting George Clayton and his wife Caroline. George Clayton owned and ran a brewery and lived with his wife and family in the wealthy district of Broughton Park near Salford. While Dora was staying with them she and Sophia probably met their neighbours, Thomas Briggs and his wife Emily. Thomas Briggs had taken over the management of the twine, tarpaulin and oil cloth-making business founded by his father. His half-sister Mary Briggs became a member of the GD, perhaps through friendships she made by knowing Dora; though she and Dora were not in the GD at the same time.

I don't know when Dora met Sophia Frances Anne Caulfeild, but it was almost inevitable that they should be introduced at some stage because they had so much in common. Sophia was related to the Irish earls of Charlemont but her father was an officer in the navy. It was the kind of family background that Dora had married into: the not-especially-wealthy younger sons of younger sons of the upper classes.

Sophia had established herself as a writer in 1870, with two volumes of poetry. A work that's either a novel or a travelogue followed, but the magnum opus that made Sophia's name was The Dictionary of Needlework, on which she worked with Blanche Saward, contributing most of the entries on domestic needlework and stitch types herself, while Blanche did the entries on church embroidery. A group of women described as "various ladies" had also made contributions to the work; Dora must surely be one of that anonymous group. The Dictionary was first published in monthly instalments in the magazine The Bazaar and probably developed from individual articles on sewing that Sophia wrote for that magazine. The Dictionary was then issued in book form in 1881. Another edition was needed in 1882, several more have followed since and the book is still in print. As well as writing for The Bazaar, Sophia also wrote for Girl's Own paper, The Queen, Cassell's Domestic Dictionary and other similar journals - the sort of magazines Dora wrote for, and the type of subject-matter that Dora also covered. However, Sophia also published books on theology, a subject Dora didn't venture to write on; and didn't write on clothes and accessories as fashion or collectables.

Dora also knew Sophia's sisters and their children. Martin Atkinson tells me that he had an aunt named Enid Dora Caulfeild Atkinson; and a cousin called Helen Clarice de Blaquière Northcott. Two compliments to Dora in the Caulfeild family.

Dora and Sophia were close, so close that in 1884, when Hyde Park Mansions was finished (it was the latest of the big blocks of flats being built on Marylebone Road) they both moved into it. I haven't been able to establish whether they were actually sharing a flat - the evidence isn't clear on the point - but they were living on the same staircase from 1884 to about 1900. They may have travelled abroad together on the sort of journeys that made their way into Dora's articles on trends in jewellery and clothes; for example, neither of them appear on the 1891 census. However, Sophia did not share Dora's esoteric interests and was never a member of the GD; her publications suggest that she had the more orthodox approach of the two of them, to matters religious and spiritual. And though I'm sure Sophia visited Dora's rural hideaway, Dora does seem to have used it mostly as a place to go to when she wanted time on her own.

DORA AND THE OCCULT

The simple life might have been a welcome change from the social life Dora had in London. I've already suggested that Dora knew Constance Wilde by 1889. They could have known each other several years before that, however, as they were both members of the Theosophical Society. As, indeed, was William Wynne Westcott and Dora must have known him too. In his memoir of his life in occult social circles, Shadows of Life and Thought, A E Waite describes Dora as a member of the TS and a personal friend of Helena Petrovna Blavatsky - that was how it looked to Waite, when he joined the TS in the mid-1880s. He noted that when Dora was there, Blavatsky "never exhibited or mentioned supposed miraculous gifts". I'm not quite sure what Waite means by that, but I suppose he's suggesting that Blavatsky was restrained by Dora's presence, perhaps even intimidated, by a certain scepticism on Dora's part. Waite says that at these TS meetings he had several chats with Dora; but she doesn't figure again in his book, so there was certainly no meeting of minds; perhaps he too found Dora's attitude an uncomfortable thing to live with.

I'm suggesting that Dora was sceptical of Blavatsky's wilder flights of fancy, because in 1884 she joined the Society for Psychical Research, recently founded by a group of Cambridge academics to investigate exactly the sort of miraculous gifts Blavatsky and others were claiming to possess, with a view to proving - or disproving - them scientifically. Blavatsky and other senior personnel at the Theosophical Society hated the whole idea. However, Dora was still a member of the Society for Psychical Research in 1895 although her membership had lapsed by 1900. If Dora doubted whether people's occult powers were genuine it might explain why she never followed up her initiation into the GD. However, there might be other reasons for that: she was from a Christian background, and that anyone should claim occult powers may have seemed irreligious to her.

Dora continued to live very near or with Sophia Caulfeild, to write for Girl's Own Paper and other outlets, and to slip away to solitude at her cottage, through the 1890s; but the last article I can find that she wrote for GOP was published in 1901. It was called Luggage up to Date and was in the nature of a farewell: in 1900 or early 1901 Dora had returned to Canada. She died at Lambton Ontario on 6 May 1901 but was buried some distance away, at Strathroy Cemetery, Middlesex county. Her gravestone has been photographed as part of the Canada Gen Web's Cemetery Project and you can see it via their website: a surprisingly austere block of polished red granite with a simple inscription rather than the more usual Victorian sentimentality. Who commissioned it? Perhaps it was the youngest of Dora's step-children, William (1856-1920) who by 1901 had succeeded as the 6th Baron de Blaquière. Or perhaps it was Sophia Caulfeild.

Sophia Caulfeild was Dora's elder by several years, but survived her. She was not in England on the day of the 1901 census but by 1911 she had moved out of Hyde Park Mansions; perhaps she had left the Mansions when Dora went back to Canada. On the day of the 1911 census Sophia was living at 75 Abingdon Road Kensington, a lodging-house run by Sarah Ann Rudd. One of the other lodgers, a woman called Mary Ann Clark, described her occupation as "companion". Sophia was in her late 80s by this time and perhaps not very mobile. She was paying Mary Ann Clark to help her, perhaps physically, but perhaps as a secretary, as Sophia had kept working - her last books had been published as late as 1909. Sophia Caulfeild died at 75 Abingdon Road in November 1911. In her Will she asked that her nieces Louisa Mary Northcott and Lucia Caulfeild Surridge be buried with her; and that inscriptions should be written on the grave's headstone to honour three friends - her two nieces, and Dora de Blaquière.

BASIC SOURCES I USED for all Golden Dawn members.

Membership of the Golden Dawn: The Golden Dawn Companion by R A Gilbert. Northampton: The Aquarian Press 1986. Between pages 125 and 175, Gilbert lists the names, initiation dates and addresses of all those people who became members of the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn or its many daughter Orders between 1888 and 1914. The list is based on the Golden Dawn's administrative records and its Members' Roll - the large piece of parchment on which all new members signed their name at their initiation. All this information had been inherited by Gilbert but it's now in the Freemasons' Library at the United Grand Lodge of England building on Great Queen Street Covent Garden.

Family history: freebmd; ancestry.co.uk (census and probate); findmypast.co.uk; familysearch; Burke's Peerage and Baronetage; Burke's Landed Gentry; Armorial Families; thepeerage.com; and a wide variety of family trees on the web.

Famous-people sources: mostly about men, of course, but very useful even for the female members of GD. Oxford Dictionary of National Biography. Who Was Who. Times Digital Archive.

Catalogues: British Library; Freemasons' Library.

Wikipedia; Google; Google Books - my three best resources. I also used other web pages, but with some caution, as - from the historian's point of view - they vary in quality a great deal.

SOURCES FOR DORA

THE BETTRIDGE FAMILY

My data on the Bettridges of the Cotswolds is from local archives consulted by Sally M Thomson of Codford, Wiltshire; information sent to me in a series of emails 29 May 2014 to 25 June 2014. The ancestors common to both Dora and Sally Thomson are Richard Bettridge and his wife Mary (née Minchin) of Lower Swell. Dora was descended from Joseph, their fourth son; Sally Thomson is descended from Stephen, their eighth son.

WILLIAM CRADDOCK BETTRIDGE

Online Dictionary of Canadian Biography has an entry for him though it doesn't mention his family.

The Clergy Reserves: their History and Present Position... by Charles Lindsey and John Rolph 1851 p29-30 is an Order in Council issued January 1836 giving grants of land (and therefore income) to the clergy of Canada, including "29 acres in the Town of Woodstock" to the Rev William Betteridge.

Journals of the Legislative Council of the Province of Canada volume 23 1864 p42 mentions William Bettridge as now being a rural dean. Charles de Blaquièrre is one of his church wardens.

Ontario Library Review vols 16-20 1931.

Mémoires de la Société Royale du Canada published by Royal Society of Canada 1938; good on his Peninsular War career.

Tavern in the Town: Early Inns and Taverns of Ontario by Margaret McBurney and Mary Byers. Univ of Toronto Press 1987 p180.

Some records found via familysearch:

Marriage record: Mary Hounsfild to William Bettridge on 24 Dec 1823 at St James Westminster.

Baptism records; but not for all the children - familysearch didn't have ANY baptism records for 1830s Ontario. Baptism records for children born to William and Mary Bettridge in England:

Mary Eleanor Bettridge, December 1825 in Elvington York

Emily Bettridge, October 1826 Elvington York

William Bettridge, May 1828 Elvington York

Julia Bettridge, December 1829 Millbrook Hants

These child also had parents William and Mary Bettridge but I'm not quite so sure whether they're part of Dora's family:

Edward Bettridge, December 1831 St Philip Birmingham

Emma Bettridge, October 1832 St Leonard's Shoreditch.

I haven't been able to find a baptism record for Caroline Dora Bettridge. However, familysearch did have her marriage record. The marriage took place in the Church of England church at Woodstock Canada (that is, St Paul's Woodstock) on 10 April 1865. The groom was Charles de Blaguière (sic and it must be a transcription error), born 1819 in England. The groom's parents: Hon P B de Blaquièrre and wife Eliza. Bride: C Dora Bettridge, age at marriage 25, born 1840 Canada. Parents: William and Mary Bettridge.

Via www.woodstockmuseum.ca, details of its Accession Number 2007.06.40b: the gravestone on the Bettridge grave, which is in Woodstock. William Craddock Bettridge born 30 August 1791 died 21 November 1873. At freepages.genealogy.rootsweb.ancestry.com there's a photo of the gravestone from which I just about made out the details of the other people buried in the grave:

- Mary Hounsfild Bettridge born 24 February 1800 died 13 April 1878
- daughters of William and Mary Bettridge:

Mary Eleanor born 1826; couldn't see her date of death on the right of the photo, because of the light

Emily born 1826 died 1866

Grace Elizabeth (I presume she's a daughter not a grand-daughter) born 1845 couldn't see what her date of death was

- Charles de Blaquièrre.

Dora de Blaquièrre is not in the grave and neither are any of her step-children. I don't know where Dora is buried.

THE DE BLAQUIÈRE FAMILY

Wikipedia on the barony which is Baron de Blaquièrre of Ardkill in co Derry, created in 1800. The 6th baron (that's Dora's step-son William) succeeded a distant cousin in 1889.

Peerage and Baronetage of Great Britain and Ireland issue of 1837 P277 on the family's early history: family had emigrated from France following the Edict of Nantes. The hon Peter Boyle de Blaquièrre was born in April 1783, a younger son of the first baron. He was married twice:

1 = Eliza daughter of Dennis O'Brien. Their children were: Peter; George; Eliza; Anne Maria; and Elinor. Eliza died in 1814 and Peter married again:

2 = 1818 Eliza, daughter of William Roper of Rathfarnham Castle county Dublin. Their children were: Charles (Dora's husband), born 7 November 1819; and another son, not named in this book, born 1832.

Plantagenet Roll of the Blood Royal seen via the web and I couldn't see which volume it was (there are several) but p410 says Peter Boyle de Blaquièrè died in 1860. His second wife, Eliza Roper, must have returned to Britain because she died 18 February 1881 in Bath Somerset.

Peter Boyle de Blaquièrè is in the online Dictionary of Canadian Biography. His entry also gives a feel for what Woodstock was like when he was living there - more English country town than new colonial settlement.

Eliza O'Brien de Blaquièrè knew the Irish political radical Daniel O'Connell: The Correspondence of Daniel O'Connell 1775-1845; volumes 1-8. Irish Manuscripts Commission, for the Irish University Press 2010. P390 has at least one letter either from or to O'Connell from Eliza de Blaquièrè née O'Brien.

DORA'S HUSBAND Charles de Blaquièrè

The Baronetage and Knightage of the British Empire for 1882 by Joseph Foster, published 1882 p78 says that Charles de Blaquièrè was married twice:

- 1 = September 1848, to Agnes widow of W Lawson. Agnes died in 1864, leaving 3 children.
- 2 = 18 April 1865 to Caroline Dora youngest daughter of W C Bettridge. They had no children.

At www.halhed.com, the Halhed Genealogy and Family Trees quotes Edmund's The Peerage of the British Empire 1848 as giving a DOB of 7 November 1819 for Charles.

Via the web, a Directory of Woodstock and other Canadian towns, undated but post-1851, lists Charles de Blaquièrè as postmaster for Woodstock and church warden of St Paul's Woodstock.

Burke's Genealogical and Heraldic History of the Peerage Baronetage and Knightage; uncertain of the date of edition but post-1869: P581 Dora's husband Charles de Blaquièrè died on 16 July 1869.

Charles de Blaquièrè's children details from website www.thepeerage.com has:

- Peter Henry 1849-1887; unmarried
- Louisa Agnes born 1850 married 1875 John Matheson who died 1878; he was a barrister based in Woodstock
- William born 1856; succeeds as the 6TH baron de Blaquièrè in 1889 and moves to England. He marries Lucienne Desbarats at Christchurch Cathedral Montreal in January 1888. They have 3 child:

John born 1889 killed in action March 1915

Kathleen born 1891

Alan born 1895, joined the Royal Navy, lost at sea in the wreck of the HMS Laurentic January 1917.

At William's death, in 1920, the barony went extinct. William's wife Lucienne is a French-Canadian Catholic: The Catholic Who's Who and Yearbook volume 34 1941 p117 in what is probably a death notice, has Lucienne as widow of the 6th Baron de Blaquièrè and eldest daughter of George Desbarats of Montreal.

DORA'S DEATH: via the web to Ontario Death Registrations 1869-1937: she died on 6 May 1901 at Sarnia, Lambton Ontario.

DORA IN EUROPE, AS A JOURNALIST

Scoop! Database of 19th and 20th century journalists, held at BL, did not have an entry for Dora. However, the database seems to be based on the records of the Society of Journalists, and not every reporter was a member. I found that quite a few other GD members whom I knew to have done work as journalists, were not in it.

University of East Anglia has a Girl's Own Paper archive, online at www.uea.ac.uk/~h720/GOP/fnd/htm with a list of contributors with the titles of the articles they wrote and the volumes they appeared in. Dora's list was one of the longest of any contributor and included

- |     |   |   |
|-----|---|---|
| vol | 2   | 1881 Occupations for invalids                               |
|     | 5   | 1884 Turkish and Bulgarian needlework ((done by yng girls)) |
|     | 11  | 1890 On the Purchase of Outfits for India and the colonies  |
| 13  | 1892 Magazine and Book Clubs and how to manage them |   |
|     | 14  | 1893 Amateur Upholstery                                     |
|     | 16  | 1895 Crazy china: what it is and how to make it             |
|     |   | Fashion in girls' christian names                           |
|     |   | Reminiscences of Norway                                     |
|     | 17  | 1896 The names of houses                                    |
|     |   | Popular quotations from the poets                           |
|     | 18  | 1897 Autographs and their use                               |
| 19  | 1898 After School Clubs in America                  |   |
|     |   | Two-acre estates, or villa farms                            |
|     |   | Apotheosis of the pocket-handkerchief                       |
|     | 20  | 1899 Books before travel                                    |
|     | 22  | 1901 Luggage up to date                                     |

NB volume 1 of GOP was published in 1880.

The set of four articles Dora wrote for The Woman's World. Published London Paris Melbourne: Cassell and Co Ltd 1890. The editor's name is not mentioned in the volume. During 1888-89 Oscar Wilde had been editor. I think he might have been replaced by 1890 but I'm sure it must have been him who suggested Dora write her articles.

The Silk Industry in Ireland and England published 1880. The British Library doesn't have a copy of this; I found a reference to it online at //openagricola, the USDA National Agricultural Library, so I guess they have a copy.

MODERN SOURCES WHICH MENTION DORA'S WORK

Magazine Phaedrus volumes 8-9 1982 p61 has an article on Girl's Own Paper. Dora is mentioned as a regular contributor to the magazine, among many women well-known in their lifetimes but forgotten now.

Great-Grandmama's Weekly: A Celebration of The Girl's Own Paper 1880-1901 by Wendy Forrester. Guildford and London: Lutterworth Press 1980 . P13 the first ever issue of GOP was published 3 January 1880. GOP's publisher was the Religious Tract Society but GOP was in marked contrast to RTS's other publications, which included Leisure Hour and Sunday at Home.

Reforming Women's Fashion 1850-1920: Politics, Health and Art by Patricia A Cunningham, published Kent State University Press 2003. The book is good on the Rational Dress Movement. On p67 Bloomers were born in 1851! But there was no organised dress reform movement until 1881 when the Rational Dress Society was founded by Viscountess Harberton and Mrs E M King. The RDS's objectives were to promote clothes which:

- gave the wearer freedom of movement
- put no pressure on any part of the body
- weighed only as much as was necessary for warmth
- were comfortable and convenient to wear, as well as graceful and beautiful
- BUT didn't depart too obviously from current fashions.

DORA AND THE OCCULT

Shadows of Life and Thought: A Retrospective Review in the Form of Memoirs by Arthur Edward Waite. London: Selwyn & Blount of Paternoster House EC4 1938 p87 and a footnote on that page.

Proceedings of the Society for Psychical Research Volume II 1884. London: Trübner and Co of Ludgate Hill. P317 begins the list of the Society's members at December 1884: p318 Mrs Charles de Blaquièrre of 1 Hyde Park Mansions London SW.

Proceedings of the Society for Psychical Research volume XI 1895 has a full list of current members. On p606 Dora is still a member, and still living at 1 Hyde Park Mansions. However Proceedings of the Society for Psychical Research volume XV 1900-01 does NOT have her on the list of members.

MORE ON DORA'S ADDRESSES IN LONDON

Post Office Directory of London 1880 in the court directory section p2077 Mrs de Blaquièrre is at 7 Osnaburgh Terrace.

Debrett's Peerage, Baronetage, Knightage and Companionage edition of 1884 p199 gives Dora de Blaquièrre's current address as "now of 1 Hyde Park Mansions NW".

Details of Dora's time as a resident from Post Office Directories 1880-99 though the street directory sections have no entry for Hyde Park Mansions until 1885; its address when it does appear is Marylebone Road but it was in that section of the road that's now called OLD Marylebone Road. The entry for Hyde Park Mansions in Post Office Directory of London 1885 street directory section p486 Hyde Park Mansions, Marylebone Road, with the lists of residents organised by doorways/staircases. The residents of 1 Hyde Park Mansions are: Miss Sophia Caulfeild; Edmund Lane; Mrs de Blaquièrre; John Richardson; Miss Bass; Alexander Johnson MD; William Weldon; Edward Arthur Carpenter; Miss Worsley - which is not quite enough residents for the number of modern flats (which go from a to m). Perhaps the flats on staircase 1 were not all occupied as yet. If the list of names is that of those people who are paying the rent, Sophia Caulfeild and Dora are occupying separate flats on that staircase.

DORA'S GRAVESTONE

It's in Section G of Strathroy Cemetery, Middlesex Ontario. See it via www.geneofun.on.ca, the Canada Gen Web's Cemetery Project site; using the index which is by surname.

SOPHIA CAULFEILD

Family history details: series of emails sent February and March 2014 by Dr Martin Atkinson of Calgary.

DORA'S 1890 TRIP TO NORTH AMERICA

Information from findmypast and I accept that it may not refer to Dora: the officers on the ship hadn't filled out the forms completely, and even the woman's initials are not given, let alone date of birth or anything else decisive.

1890: a woman named de Blaquièrè sailing from Southampton to New York.

SOPHIA CAULFIELD

List of publications in the British Library.

1870 Aveneale and Other Poems. London: Longmans and Co.

1870 Desmond and Other Poems. London: Longmans and Co.

1880 By Land and Sea. London: Cassell and Co; in the same binding as a work by another author.

1881 The Dictionary of Needlework. London: L Upcott Gill. Caulfeild is the main author but a section on church embroidery was contributed by Blanche C Seward.

1882 another copy of The Dictionary of Needlework; perhaps a 2nd edition.

1885 Sick Nursing at Home. London: The Bazaar office.

1886 A Directory of Girls' Societies, Clubs and Unions, Conducted on Unprofessional Principles. London: Griffith Farran and Co.

1887 The Lives of the Apostles. London: Hatchards.

1888 True Philosophy; a reply to certain statements made in Scientific Religion by Laurence Oliphant. London: Hatchards.

1888 Restful Work for Youthful Hands. London: Griffith Farran and Co.

1890 The Dictionary of Needlework, author details as 1881 but publisher now London: A W Cowan and A Bradley.

1902 House Mottoes and Inscriptions: Old and New. London: Elliot Stock.

1903 The Home Nurse, which is a reprint and 3rd ed of Sick Nursing at Home. London: Elliot Stock.

1905 The Voice of the Fathers. London: S C Brown and Co.

1909 The Dawn of Christianity in Continental Europe. London: Elliot Stock.

1909 The Prisoners of Hope; apparently a series of 26 lectures. London: Marshall Brothers.

1972 The Dictionary of Needlework. London: Hamlyn.

LOOKING FOR DORA IN WORKS BY SOPHIA

The Dictionary of Needlework London: L Upcott Gill of 170 Strand 1882. Endpapers which were covers of the original issues of The Bazaar. Sophia Caulfeild does the entries on plain sewing, textiles, dress-making, appliances and terms. Publication I refer to as 'the bazaar' is fully The Bazaar Exchange and Mart, and Journal of the Household. Published Mon, Wed, Fri; 2d or by subscription.

Restful Work for Youthful Hands by Sophia F A Caulfeild. London and Sydney NSW: Griffith, Farran, Okeden and Welsh 1888.

SOPHIA CAULFEILD: status of Mary Ann Clark, headstone inscriptions and request for nieces to be buried with her: Sophia Caulfeild's Will; details sent by email by Dr Martin Atkinson March 2014.

29 June 2014

Amandragora@attglobal.net

Find the web pages of Roger Wright and Sally Davis, including my list of people initiated into the Order of the Golden Dawn between 1888 and 1901, at:

http://pws.prserv.net/Roger\_Wright/

***

Anna Elizabeth, Comtesse de Brémont was initiated into the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn at its Isis-Urania temple in London on 13 November 1888, together with her friend Constance Wilde. Though most GD members opted for a motto in Latin, Anna chose one in French - Fait bien - les dire - a language that she spoke well. She began to work through the study necessary to reach the GD's inner, 2nd Order; and found it interesting and rewarding. But then William Wynn Westcott, who kept the GD's records at that time, wrote "Demits by order" against her name in his files. She had been expelled, though Westcott didn't give the reason why. Anna thought she had been carrying the can for the indiscretions of another GD member.

This file is part 1 of 2 of a life-by-dates of Anna; it covers her early life in the USA and ends with an account of her time in the GD. When I'm doing a life-by-dates, I type what's going on in the person's life in Italics; and details of the sources, and any comments I want to make, in my usual Times New Roman.

It's difficult to write a life-by-dates without dates! And in Anna de Brémont's life, attested dates have been hard to come by. I've had other, inter-connected problems as well. Too many of the events in Anna's life are written up in one newspaper or magazine report; often long after the event; without those attested dates that I like; and without any explanation of where or who the information came from. In addition, Anna had a vivid imagination and less social poise than she admitted to in public. Particularly after she left the USA for Europe, she reinvented her life in America, to give herself a wealthier and more romantic background than she'd actually had. Hence the French title, comtesse de Brémont, which she used in Europe but almost certainly not before.

PART ONE: 1852 TO 1888-ish

1852

Anna was born Anna Elizabeth Dunphy. Her parents were Patrick and Mary Dunphy, Irish-American Catholics. Though Anna also claimed Danish ancestry, she thought of herself as Irish. She had at least one sister.

A quick comment by Sally Davis on Anna's original surname. All sources agree on the surname Dunphy or Dunphie. I've seen it spelled DunphIE in one or two places but that does seem to be a mistake.

A much longer comment by Sally Davis, on the lack of data for Anna's life in the USA.

She's been lucky, historically speaking - registration and census data is virtually non-existent for her. Even the details that appear on her marriage registration - the only item about her that is in Familysearch's collection - are called into question by newspaper reports of her from a few years later. For example, the marriage registration gave her place of birth as Cincinnati Ohio. Newspaper articles from 1894, however, say her mother only moved there after Patrick Dunphy had died; and one says Anna was born in New York - which I couldn't prove. By the 1890s Anna was also knocking a few years off her year of birth, saying she was born in 1856 when the marriage registration gives 1852 - something else I couldn't prove.

Information from the end of Anna's life which implies her father was wealthy:

Via //paperspast.natlib.govt.nz to Hawera and Normanby Star issue of 30 December 1922 p9 item: Countess' missing Will: inherited two fortunes. I guess the report has to be taken with a pinch of salt because the information in it was supplied by one of those anonymous "intimate friend" sources - they're not a modern phenomenon! The "friend" said that Anna had inherited money from her father, "an Irish-American in a big way of business"; presumably Anna had told him so. I tried to find evidence of a Patrick Dunphy running a business in Cincinnati in the 1850s. It was a long shot and I didn't find anything; but other evidence - see below - suggests he didn't live in Cincinnati anyway. I think a wealthy father was one of Anna's inventions.

Anna mentioned her Danish ancestry in her own writing a couple of times:

Pearls of Poesy London: Elliot Stock 1911: p48 in a very short profile above a sonnet by Anna, who also wrote the Foreword.

Oscar Wilde and His Mother: A Memoir. London: Everett and Co Ltd of 42 Essex Street Strand 1911: pp40-41 she describes herself as 'Norse' because she enjoyed the rather stormy passage across the Atlantic.

Anna only made one mention, of one sister, in all her writing. She didn't even give her name; so I've found it impossible to discover anything about her.

Oscar Wilde and His Mother: A Memoir. London: Everett and Co Ltd of 42 Essex Street Strand 1911: p 40-41.

That there may have been more than one sister;

Via Anna's wikipedia page to fultonhistory.com, the Rome Semi-Weekly Citizen of Tuesday 11 December 1894 p6: Material for a Libretto. Anna was news amongst the English-speaking visitors to Rome because of the libel suit she was bringing against W S Gilbert. The report had information on Anna's background which only one other source gives. It contradicts other accounts. It says that Anna was the "oldest sister"; implying that she had more than one sister. In this account Anna was not born in Cincinatti, her mother moved there after she had been widowed. Mrs Dunphy had kept a boarding house in Cincinatti; and had made a second marriage, to a Thomas Malloy of Lexington. No mention was made of Anna inheriting money from her father, and indeed the account gives the opposite impression: wealthy widows don't keep a boarding house.

Via google to www.coloradohistoricnewspapers.org to the Herald Democrat of 7 December 1894 which has the same report, with more or less the same wording, except that it gave Anna's place of birth as New York City.

DURING ANNA'S CHILDHOOD

Anna's father died. Later, her mother remarried.

Sources: see above.

DURING ANNA'S CHILDHOOD

Her interest in music began - on the assumption that Anna herself is the child Anna is referring to in the source I found.

Source:

The World of Music by Anna Comtesse de Brémont. London: W W Gibbings of 18 Bury Street WC; 1892 edition, in 3 volumes. In the volume The Virtuosi p9 when talking of violinist Ole Bull 1810-80, she mentions "the Opera House of a great Western city spread along the banks of the Ohio" where "a child sat one night entranced beneath the spell of a musician's bow".

??LATE 1850s/EARLY 1860s

Anna was educated at a Convent school, where she had won prizes for her essays and verses.

Source:

Anna's own Oscar Wilde and His Mother: A Memoir. London: Everett and Co Ltd of 42 Essex Street Strand 1911. Chapter V p53 with Anna saying she had also written "childish verses that pleased my mother".

PROBABLY LATE 1860s to EARLY 1870s

Anna was in the Cincinatti Cathedral choir and became a soloist; before moving to a similar but more high-profile job in New York.

Sources:

Via Anna's wikipedia page to fultonhistory.com, the Rome Semi-Weekly Citizen of Tuesday 11 December 1894 p6: Material for a Libretto and same information via google to www.coloradohistoricnewspapers.org to the Herald Democrat of 7 December 1894: Material for a Libretto. Both reports clearly have the same origin, but I don't know what that origin is!

We get onto firmer ground when Anna moves to New York:

UNCERTAIN DATE BUT PROBABLY EARLY TO MID 1870s

For two years Anna was a member of the choir at the Plymouth Church in Brooklyn.

Sources:

Web pages at www.plymouthchurch.org are the website of Plymouth Church of the Pilgrims at 75 Hicks Street Brooklyn Heights; which is a congregational church, founded in 1847. Henry Ward Beecher (1813-87) was its first pastor. Church is still very active musically.

For her being in the choir:

Extract from Anna's own memoir Oscar Wilde and His Mother; which I read in Oscar Wilde: Interviews and Recollections. Editor E H Mikhail, published in 2 volumes, London and Basingstoke: Macmillan Press Ltd 1979. Volume 1 p102.

Another reference in The Conservatory volume 1 1905 p122. Magazine published by the Royal Conservatory of Music, Toronto University.

On the importance of Plymouth Church to would-be professional singers:

Annals of the New York Stage volume 9 1870-75 by George C D Odell. New York: Columbia University Press 1937 pp504. Odell remarks that Plymouth Church's pastor, Henry Ward Beecher, drew "many celebrities" to his services and church concerts. Odell's books show that being in the Plymouth Church choir led to very successful musical careers as professional singers, for some.

BY DECEMBER 1873

Anna Dunphy was trying to forge a career as a singer.

Comment by Sally Davis: I don't think she was very successful as a professional singer. She doesn't really appear enough times in Annals of the New York Stage to be making a good living from concert appearances; though most of her work may have been done out of town, of course. As to whether she was living in New York with her parents or a surviving parent, or was an orphan by now; I couldn't find any evidence one way or another.

Sources: a couple of volumes of the Annals of the New York Stage, a work which covers music and theatre performances for most of the 19th century in astonishing detail; except that it doesn't mention whether or not people were paid for appearing in the concerts it lists; and doesn't itemise concerts so that you can tell who sang what.

A reference by Anna to the difficulties of attempting a career as a professional musician; which might be based on her own experience:

The World of Music by Anna Comtesse de Brémont. London: W W Gibbings of 18 Bury Street WC, 1892 edition in 3 volumes. In the volume The Virtuosi p241 Anna describes a musical career as "pursued over a stony road, rough with thorns".

16 DECEMBER 1873

Anna was a contralto soloist in a testimonial concert at the Plymouth Church in Brooklyn.

Source:

Annals of the New York Stage volume 9 1870-75 by George C D Odell. New York: Columbia University Press 1937 pp504. Odell doesn't list what was sung at the December 1873 concert, but as well as a large number of soloists, a male singing quartet also performed - a busy night.

1 DECEMBER 1874

Anna sang in another testimonial concert, this time at the Athenaeum.

Source:

Annals of the New York Stage volume 9 1870-75. George C D Odell. New York: Columbia University Press 1937: p635. The concert was for the pianist Augusta Hillman. Again, there's no information on what was sung.

11 FEBRUARY 1875

Anna was a soloist in a performance by the Handel and Haydn Society, of Mendelssohn's oratorio St Paul, at Plymouth Church; conducted by Dr Damrosch.

Annals of the New York Stage volume 9 1870-75. George C D Odell. New York: Columbia University Press 1937: p638-39.

See wikipedia for Mendelssohn's St Paul, his opus 36; first performance May 1836. It has a part for a mezzo but not a contralto; so Anna's voice could manage some mezzo-soprano roles.

17 MARCH 1875

Anna sang in a concert of music by J S Bach, at the Church of the Holy Trinity Madison Avenue/42nd Street.

Source:

Annals of the New York Stage volume 9 1870-75. George C D Odell. New York: Columbia University Press 1937: p618. The evening was actually that season's 18th Grand Organ concert so it was mostly organ music that was played. Anna sang some contralto solos and the violinist Leopold Damrosch also played.

An advert for the concert is at //fultonhistory.com: extract from the New York paper the Daily Graphic of Monday 15 March 1875 p11 though it calls Anna "Annie".

22 APRIL 1875

Anna appeared in another concert at the Plymouth Church.

Annals of the New York Stage volume 9 1870-75. George C D Odell. New York: Columbia University Press 1937: p640.

AUTUMN 1875 TO SPRING 1882

Anna made no public appearances as a singer in New York.

Source:

Annals of the New York Stage volumes 10 and 11 which cover 1875-82. George C D Odell. New York: Columbia University Press.

20 FEBRUARY 1877

Anna Elizabeth Dunphy married Émile Léon, Comte de Brémont, in Jersey City New Jersey.

Source for the marriage and also for Anna's year and place of birth, and the names of her parents:

New Jersey Marriages 1678-1950, New Jersey EASy source film 494159; seen via Familysearch. On the marriage registration, Anna's husband's title was noted down and his parents' names were given: Charles Henri le Compte de Brémont and his wife Maria Augustina de Vintinulle. Born 1833 in France.

Comment by Sally Davis:

The question of whether Anna's husband was or was not a Comte - ie an aristocrat - and thus whether Anna had a right to style herself a Comtesse, was the basis of a later court case; and there has also been a lot of scepticism about it amongst biographers of two of the men she encountered in England. However, the rules of inheritance of titles in France aren't necessarily the same as they are in the UK; and I think the title was genuine. There's not much doubt that Anna's husband was a member of the aristocratic de Brémont family, close friends of Empress Eugenie; if he had not been a member of that family he would not have had to flee to the USA.

Léon de Brémont (as he was known in the USA) was born in 1834, the son of an officer in the French artillery. He'd qualified as a doctor in Paris and served as a surgeon with the French army in the Crimea and the Franco-Prussian War. He was awarded the Légion d'Honneur. However, his family had been too close to Napoleon and Eugenie and when they were deposed, many of them opted to go into exile. Léon went to New York where he worked in the city's French Hospital and also ran a dispensary for poor people. His funeral was attended by many of the city's French ex-pat community. When he died, his remains were sent to France and interred in the family vault.

Anna never mentioned having any children and the life she led does not suggest that she was ever encumbered with any; so I suppose she and her husband were childless.

Sources for Anna's husband:

Lettres de la Marquise de Brémont a Eugénie edited François Lacombe, just to indicate the closeness of some of the family to the regime of Napoleon III.

New York Times of 24 May 1882: report of his death and funeral; and a short obituary.

Gilbert: His Life and Strife by Hesketh Pearson, Methuen 1957 p178 says that in 1895 "the Baron de Brémont, then alive in Paris, repudiated her right to the title". So there's someone called a Baron de Brémont out there. That's W S Gilbert: see the second part of this life-by-dates; 1895.

Several articles on fashion by a writer calling him/her self the Baron de Brémont; all in English, all from the 1890s, all in US newspapers:

- St Paul Daily Globe 14 August 1892 p12: Girls and Fashions
- The Pittsburgh Press 3 November 1895
- Crawfordsville Star 20 May 1897 p7: Spring Fashions.

Not sure who this person is; a relative, I suppose. Perhaps he is the Baron de Brémont of the book on W S Gilbert.

Anna's husband may be the person referred to in this source:

Hearings before the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization Washington DC: Government Printing Office 1927. It actually covers the case of Augusta Louise de Haven-Alten which was heard January-February 1920. Papers relevant to the hearing included a letter from Helen Penniman to a Baron de Brémont; written in New York in 1874. However, following the downfall of Napoleon III and Eugenie there were other de Brémonts on the loose in Europe and the USA; so the recipient may have been one of Anna's relations-by-marriage - the one of the articles on fashion, for example.

Helen Penniman existed and if the letter is to Anna's husband, she must have been a friend of Anna: at //governors.library.ca.gov there are biographies of all governors of California so far. The one in post during the San Francisco earthquake was George Pardee 1857-1941, Republican governor 1903-07. He married Helen Penniman in 1887. Helen's dates are 1857-1947. She was born and grew up in Oakland. She trained as a teacher but was also a landscape artist and quilter. Before her marriage she belonged to a rather riotous theatre group. She was a Free-thinker.

Two novels Anna published in 1899 are both dedicated to her husband; nearly two decades after his death:

In The Gentleman Digger she described him as a "hero of the Crimea" and "a friend of suffering humanity"; and in A Son of Africa: A Romance she referred to him as "an explorer of the Great Sahara Desert".

Comment by Sally Davis: one source says that she actually proposed marriage to someone else, once (see the last entry in this Part 1). After that relationship, Anna seems to have developed a tendency to think of her dead husband as her ideal man; and to compare other men unfavourably to him. She never married again.

MAY 1882

Dr Léon de Brémont died from a cold he had caught from a patient. He had been in poor health for some time.

Source: New York Times of 24 May 1882: report of his death and funeral.

Comment by Sally Davis: most sources seem to agree that Léon de Brémont left his wife very well off - presumably printing information Anna or people who knew her had given them. For example: Via //paperspast.natlib.govt.nz to Hawera and Normanby Star 30 December 1922 p9 item: Countess' missing Will: inherited two fortunes - an initial one from her father; and a second from her husband.

However, one report at least says she spent her inheritance from her husband within a very few years, beginning a pattern of acquiring wealth and then losing it, that was repeated several times in her life:

Via Anna's wikipedia page to fultonhistory.com, the Rome Semi-Weekly Citizen of Tuesday 11 December 1894 p6: Material for a Libretto. Via google to www.coloradahistoricnewspapers.org to the Herald Democrat of 7 December 1894: article also called Material for Libretto and clearly from the same original report. It says that Anna had run through her husband's money by the mid-1880s. Her need for an income was the reason for her attempt to resurrect her career as a professional singer (see below), and her decision to become a professional writer.

AUTUMN 1882

Anna met Oscar Wilde at a dinner party in New York; probably one of the first social engagements that she attended after her husband's death.

Comments by Sally Davis: the dinner party was given by a friend of Anna and her husband, who had known the Wilde family in Ireland. Also invited to meet Oscar Wilde that evening were Oliver Wendell Holmes, General Ulysses S Grant, Louisa M Alcott, Henry Wadsworth Longfellow and Henry Ward Beecher: a formidable bunch!

Anna is best known these days for her relationship with Oscar Wilde. Several years after his death, she wrote a Memoir of him which has been much quoted by his biographers; but also much despised. Anna did a lot of being wise after the event in her Memoir. She also suggested that the two of them had a special relationship - that she saw, immediately, through the façade to the real man behind it. I don't think that was true, and her claiming it was has infuriated some of Wilde's biographers, who really don't like her saying that Oscar Wilde had "a feminine soul" and that in a single glance she had "read his secret".

I don't think Anna liked Oscar Wilde very much; nor he her. She preferred a manly man. They were not friends, and they did not meet very often. However, Anna did seize the opportunity to make money out of having known him.

Sources:

Anna's own writings on the relationship; not having seen a copy of the first of them, I'm not quite sure whether they are the same book with different titles; or two separate accounts.

Oscar Wilde: A Memoir published Everett and Co 1910.

Oscar Wilde and His Mother: A Memoir. English Biography Series Number 31. London: Everett and Co; Torquay: William J McKenzie 1911. You can also read long extracts from this book in Oscar Wilde: Interviews and Recollections in 2 volumes, both edited by E H Mikhail, both published London and Basingstoke: Macmillan Press Ltd 1979. Volume 1 p102 et seq; including pp102-03 for the dinner party and p103 for the quotes.

For the biographies of Oscar Wilde that use Anna's Memoirs of him: see 1911 in the 2nd part of this life-by-dates.

A biography of Oscar Wilde's mother that uses Anna's reminiscences while describing her as a "questionable authority":

Speranza: A Biography of Lady Wilde by Horace Wyndham. 1951. London and New York: T V Boardman and Co Ltd: p179.

AUGUST 1883

Anna went to the New York première of Oscar Wilde's play Vera, or The Nihilists; at the Union Square Theatre.

Comment by Sally Davis: Anna thought the cast and the acting were good; but neither the critics nor the New York audiences liked the play, so it flopped.

Source: Oscar Wilde and His Mother: A Memoir. English Biography Series Number 31. London: Everett and Co; Torquay: William J McKenzie 1911: pp38-40.

5 MAY 1885

Anna was a soloist at a concert at the Metropolitan Opera House.

Comment by Sally Davis: this concert was Anna's only appearance in Annals of the New York Stage between 1882 and 1885. Anna was the first listed of the soloists so perhaps her part in the concert was greater than the others. Odell doesn't give details of what the programme that day was, but from the details of those who took part, the music was songs, with piano accompaniment.

Source:

Annals of the New York Stage volume 12 1882-85 by George C D Odell. New York: Columbia University Press: p551, p556.

DECEMBER 1885 ?TO JANUARY 1886

Anna was a member of an opera company put together by the singer Alfa Norman, to revive Balfe's opera The Enchantress. The production was performed in Chicago, Cincinnati, Philadelphia, Boston and New York.

Sources:

New York Times 13 December 1885 Theatre World column: announcement of the tour, which was being backed by Charles Frohman, previously impresario at the Madison Square theatre. Gustave Kerker would conduct the opera; Alfa Norman would take the leading role; and other roles would be sung by Henry Peakes, Rowland Buckstone, Anna, Annie Kellogg and Henry Hallam. The report remarked in passing that Norman's voice had improved a great deal since her New York debut; and a similarly dim view of Alfa Norman's talent was expressed in the UK theatre magazine The Theatre volume 1 1886 p345.

Alfa Norman is in Famous Stars of Light Opera by Lewis C Strang 1995. She seems to have done more work in the USA than in Europe.

Information on The Enchantress:

A search of google showed several early editions, for example: The Enchantress: An Opera in Three Acts. Published New York: Samuel French of 121 Nassau Street in 1854, after performances by the Pyne and Harrison Troupe at the Broadway Theatre with Louisa Pyne as Stella, the title role. Music was by Michael William Balfe, setting words were by Jules-Henri Vernoy St Georges and Alfred Bunn - which I think means that they were Bunn's translation of a work originally in French.

What was probably the first edition was published in 1852. This edition said that the opera's first performance had been in 1845 at the Theatre Royal Drury Lane.

Wikipedia on Michael William Balfe: 1808-70 born Dublin, long career in Europe and then England. The song I Dreamt I Dwelt in Marble Halls comes from his 1843 opera The Bohemian Girl. The wikipedia page doesn't mention The Enchantress, probably because it was not his original work.

Comment by Sally Davis: if this was an attempt to resurrect a career as a professional musician, it failed; and Anna doesn't seem to have done more than sing at the occasional charity do from then on; though she did still move in musical social circles, in the US and in Europe.

BY 1886

Anna's sister was living in London. Anna decided to pay her a visit.

Source:

Comment by Sally Davis: Anna describes the visit to her sister as an attempt to seek solace in travel - she was still finding it hard to come to terms with her husband's death. However, some newspaper reports say that in a very few years, Anna spent all the money she inherited from her husband; so it's perfectly possible she left the USA to escape her creditors. She might have started out intending to be away for a short time only, but Anna never lived permanently in the US again.

Oscar Wilde and His Mother: A Memoir. London: Everett and Co Ltd of 42 Essex Street Strand 1911: p 40-41.

For Anna's having spent her inheritance from her husband:

Via Anna's wikipedia page to fultonhistory.com, the Rome Semi-Weekly Citizen of Tuesday 11 December 1894 p6: Material for a Libretto and same information via google to www.coloradohistoricnewspapers.org to the Herald Democrat of 7 December 1894: Material for a Libretto. Both reports clearly have the same origin, but I don't know what that origin is!

13 MARCH 1886

Anna left New York for Europe. She had a rough Atlantic crossing but enjoyed it. She took with her letters of introduction to people in London, amongst whom was Lady Wilde, Oscar Wilde's mother.

Source:

Oscar Wilde and His Mother: A Memoir. London: Everett and Co Ltd of 42 Essex Street Strand 1911. I'll just note here that the book is dedicated to Speranza - Lady Wilde's writing name - "in Remembrance of her beautiful friendship for the author". Pp40-41.

SPRING 1886

A month after arriving in England, Anna made use of her letter of introduction and went to one of Lady Wilde's famous Saturday afternoon 'at homes'.

Source:

Oscar Wilde and His Mother: A Memoir. London: Everett and Co Ltd of 42 Essex Street Strand 1911: p42-45.

Comment by Sally Davis: Jane Francesca, Lady Wilde, was still living in Park Street Mayfair in 1886, so that's where Anna will have gone. Anna later saw that afternoon as a key moment in her life; and the close friendship that developed between her and Lady Wilde as one that enabled the new start she made in her life around 1890.

A source for Lady Wilde: Speranza: A Biography of Lady Wilde by Horace Wyndham. 1951. London and New York: T V Boardman and Co Ltd. Though as I've said above, it isn't very charitable towards Anna.

More comment by Sally Davis:

Lady Wilde's at homes are well-known now because so many people wrote about them, and partly because of the number of people who attended them regularly who either were, or later became, famous. A few guests became GD members: Oscar Wilde's wife Constance; W B Yeats; Isabel de Steiger; Anna; and I'm sure there were others but I haven't found actual evidence for them - I'm pretty sure, for example, that John Todhunter was a regular guest, but I can't prove it. Anna may not have met Isabel at Lady Wilde's at homes because Isabel and Lady Wilde fell out; but she did meet W B Yeats at one, and possibly Constance Wilde; and she met Oscar Wilde again.

Another guest at Lady Wilde's:

Bernard Shaw: The Diaries 1885-1897 in two volumes, annotated and edited by Stanley Weintraub. University Park Pennsylvania: Pennsylvania State University Press 1986: p31, which covers November 1879. GBS recorded that he had met the novelist Eliza Lynn Lynton at Lady Wilde's. Anna doesn't say she met GBS at any of the afternoons she herself attended, so perhaps he had stopped going to them by 1886. GBS knew a lot of GD members though he was never one himself.

And another:

Oscar Wilde and His Mother: A Memoir. London: Everett and Co Ltd of 42 Essex Street Strand 1911: on p49 Anna mentions that Robert Browning was often a guest at Lady Wilde's at homes; though she doesn't specifically say that she ever met him.

And another American visitor:

Speranza: A Biography of Lady Wilde by Horace Wyndham. London and NY: T V Boardman and Co Ltd. 1951: p 182. The future novelist Gertrude Atherton was taken to one of Lady Wilde's at homes when she first arrived in London.

POSSIBLY AS EARLY AS THE LATE 1880s; DEFINITELY EARLY 1890s

Anna went to the musical soirées given by Mary Frances Ronalds at her home in Belgravia.

Source, though without a date, and Anna identifies her hostess only as "Mrs R".

Oscar Wilde and His Mother: A Memoir. London: Everett and Co Ltd of 42 Essex Street Strand 1911: pp59-60.

Comment by Sally Davis: Anna actually preferred Mary Ronalds' evening concerts to Lady Wilde's afternoons: they were more exclusive, and Mrs Ronalds could afford to pay for more servants to distribute the food and drink. Anna may have known Mary Ronalds in New York; but a friendship with her had definitely developed by 1892.

Source for the identity of "Mrs R":

The World of Music by Anna comtesse de Brémont. London: W W Gibbings of 18 Bury Street WC 1892. Volume The Great Composers. On the inside cover of the British Library copy is the calling card of Mrs Ronalds and her daughter, with printed address 7 Cadogan Place.

Mary Frances Ronalds (1839-1916) amateur singer and hostess, is important enough to have her own wikipedia page. When she was giving her evening concerts in Mayfair she was separated from her French husband. She had two long relationships - with Leonard Jerome, father of Jennie Jerome who married Lord Randolph Churchill; and then with the composer Arthur Sullivan, whose The Lost Chord became her signature song though he didn't actually write it for her.

New York Times 31 July 1916 p5 short obituary of Mary Frances Ronalds, describing her as someone who in London in the 1880s could "make or mar a musician".

?JULY 1886

Anna was invited to an 'at home' given by Lady Wilde's daughter-in-law Constance, wife of Oscar Wilde. She was delighted to receive an invitation, but found the informality of the occasion very nerve-racking.

Comment by Sally Davis: Anna doesn't mention going regularly to Constance's at homes; though she continued to go to Lady Wilde's. From then on she regularly came across Constance and Oscar at other social events; but they weren't close friends.

Source:

Oscar Wilde and His Mother: A Memoir. London: Everett and Co Ltd of 42 Essex Street Strand 1911: pp86-88. Anna describes Constance's at home as a "crush of fashionable folk".

1886 AND 1887

Anna and Lady Wilde became very close. Lady Wilde encouraged Anna to make a career as a writer. Oscar Wilde got Anna her first writing commission and gave her advice on how to manage the hard work of writing - advice she was very grateful for.

Source

Oscar Wilde and His Mother: A Memoir. London: Everett and Co Ltd of 42 Essex Street Strand 1911 p51, pp71-72. According to this account, Anna's first commissioned article was a piece on Christmas. As she didn't say where it was published, I haven't tried to look for it.

MAY 1887

The earliest pieces of writing by Anna that I have been able to trace were published in The Theatre magazine: an article on American actresses and a better-known one Beecher's Histrionic Power; and a poem.

Comment by Sally Davis: Henry Ward Beecher died on 8 March 1887 - see his wikipedia page.

Source:

The Theatre magazine, published London: Casson and Comerford of Strand; editor is Clement Scott, who founded the magazine and is considered the father of modern drama criticism - see his wikipedia page. New Series volume IX January-June 1887: April pp324-26: American Actresses; May p248: Beecher's Histrionic Power; and July p27-28 this poem which I think is her earliest published one. I reproduce it here, to give a flavour of her writing style. Anna's poetry was considered a bit too hot to handle by many during her lifetime - something that was used against her in a court case. It's too florid and overblown for my liking, and I find the language rather antiquated; but I'm no judge of poetry.

A Fantasy

In my low and narrow bed,
Every dream for ever fled;
Cold earth pillowing my head,
Shall I sleep when I am dead?

Oh! that sweet unceasing rest,
While the world above my breast,
Struggling with its cares oppressed,
Wakes no echo in my nest.

Then: o'er me slowly stealing,

As I sleep, unheeding feeling,
Past regret and vain appealing
Creeps decay, its spell revealing.

In the shimmer of my hair,
It shall weave its grayness there,
Touch my cheek, so found and fair,
With a blemish past repair.

And my eyes shall droop and melt,
And my lips, where kisses dwelt,
Wither 'neath the cruel stealth
Of that long last kiss unfelt.

And each curve and supple grace
Of my form shall it efface,
And Death's hideousness replace
All resemblance to my race.

Then the Earth's mysterious power
With new birth shall me endow'r
And I'll wake some sunny hour
On her breast - a beauteous flow'r!

And the sun's caresses sweet,
Stir my petal'd heart to beat;
'Till my perfumed soul shall fleet,
Swift my lost love's kiss to meet.

And our mingl'd souls shall soar,
Far away the wide world o'er,
On through Heaven's golden door,
Into bliss for ever more!

The poem later appeared in Anna's Sonnets and Love Poems collection.

LATE 1880s

Anna was living in a flat in Cavendish Mansions, Portland Place.

Source:

Collected Letters of W B Yeats Volume II 1896-1900: p583 footnote 2 but the editors 1) spelled her surname as DunphIE and gave her the wrong father; 2) got her DOB wrong; and 3) couldn't trace her husband and seemed to be suspicious that she might be making him up. However, I daresay the address is right.

DURING 1888

Lady Wilde moved from Mayfair to Oakley Street in Chelsea; her at homes continued at the new address.

Source:

The Parents of Oscar Wilde: Sir William and Lady Wilde by Terence de Vere White. Hodder and Stoughton 1967: p245.

17 MAY 1888

Anna made her only public appearance as an actress, playing Rosalind in the forest scenes from As You Like It at a matinée at the Globe Theatre.

Source: via www.archive.org/stream to The Theatre magazine, New Series volume XI January-June 1888; editor Clement Scott. Published London: Strand Publishing Co: issue of 1 June 1888 p319, p330. The scenes were part of a varied programme and none of the rest of AYLI was done. Lewis Waller played Orlando to Anna's Rosalind; Bassett Roe played Jacques and the Count. The anonymous reviewer said that Anna's Rosalind had been "sprightly and intelligent", but that Anna had shown clear signs of her lack of experience, in her "nervousness and want of repose". As part of the performance, Julia Neilson had sung a "new and rather pretty song" with lyrics by Anna: Have You Forgotten?

?MAY 1888

Anna's lyrics for Have You Forgotten? were published; music by Alfred Benjamin Allen.

Source:

British Library has the score, published London: Boosey and Co.

3 JULY 1888

Anna sang at a concert in aid of the Gordon Boys' Home; held at the Prince's Hall.

Source: Times Saturday 30 June 1888 p1e: an advert for it. Madame Liebhardt would also sing; and Herr von Czeke would conduct them. The concert would also include the first public recital of Bishop Trench's poem Haroun al-Rashid.

IN THE GD, and just to save you going to the top of this file to look it up: Anna de Brémont and Constance Wilde were initiated into the GD on 13 November 1888 - only a few months after the GD came into existence. The date of Anna's expulsion isn't clear.

Who recommended Anna and Constance as suitable members of the GD? In some ways the most obvious candidate is W B Yeats; but he wasn't initiated himself until March 1890. I'm going to leave the question open, except to say that it was likely to have been someone who knew both women through Lady Wilde's at homes.

Many years after the event, Anna wrote of the few accounts of how the Order operated by any GD member; though true to the oaths she had sworn at her initiation, she didn't name it or give any details of its rituals. She described its formation as part of a "wave of occultism" that was passing through London at the time; defining occultism as "the profound instinct of the unknown and the invisible". I'm sure that becoming a member of such a secret society appealed to a desire Anna often displayed in her life: to investigate the 'new' and relay the details of it to those who weren't so quick off the mark - the qualities of a journalist. She didn't name the person she understood to be the GD's leader, but said of him that he was a "clever disciple of Egyptian lore" who had researched "biblical mysticism" and had written a book "on the occult science of King Solomon" - meaning Samuel Liddell Mathers. She was unaware of the contribution of William Wynn Westcott.

Despite her curiosity, Anna considered the offer of initiation quite carefully before accepting it. She thought the initiation ritual "would have been amusing had it not been taken so seriously". Although Anna was by no means as self-assured as she wished to appear in social situations in England, she refused to be over-awed by the ritual, remaining "composed" throughout; but she could feel how nervous Constance was. Although she had later been thrown out of the Order, she was glad that she had been a member, because she had done "very serious study in Oriental and scientific subjects" and developed "a habit of concentrated thought" that had been an asset in her writing career. Anna also thought that membership of the Order had also resulted in a closer relationship with Constance Wilde. The closeness can't have lasted long - firstly Anna went abroad; and then there was Dorian Gray and the portrait in the attic.

Anna must have been in South Africa when The Picture of Dorian Gray was being written. The story burst upon the reading public in July 1890 when its serialisation began, in Lippincott's Monthly Magazine. The main prop of the plot is a portrait that ages by unexplained means while its sitter continues to look unchanged by the passage of time and a dissolute life; a picture that is somehow imbued with elements of its sitter's character that he wishes to hide from the public and from himself. Anna was not the only GD member who later believed that Constance had repeated to her husband information on the GD that he should not have been allowed to know as a non-member; and that some of what she had told him had found its way into Dorian Gray. Anna said that some even GD members thought that what happened to Oscar Wilde and Constance was vengeance exacted through the forces of magic; though she thought that attitude was "absurd" herself.

Looking back in 1911, Anna now thought that Constance had never really been all that interested in occultism, and had joined the GD with the intention of telling her husband what was going on in it. And yet it was Anna who was ejected from the Order; while the note on Constance's GD records merely says that her membership was "in abeyance with the sympathy of the chiefs". My point is, I think, one that Anna made herself: that Constance was a very feminine, unthreatening woman who could easily be seen as a woman over-dutiful to her husband; while Anna was financially independent and assertive. Anna was easier to blame.

Sources:

For the initiation date, and notes on the GD records of Constance and Anna: R A Gilbert's The Golden Dawn Companion p142; see the main 'sources' section below for further details.

Anna's Oscar Wilde and His Mother: A Memoir. London: Everett and Co Ltd of 42 Essex Street Strand 1911 Book II Chapter II is on Occultism in London: pp95-97; p98-99.

Even Aleister Crowley found the GD initiation ritual alarming. Writing about it much later in his life, he remembered asking GD member Julian Baker if people often died during it. Source for that: Ellic Howe (see the main Sources section for full details) p193 quoting Crowley's Confessions p176.

On Anna's self-confidence:

Oscar Wilde and His Mother: A Memoir. English Biography Series Number 31. London: Everett and Co; Torquay: William J McKenzie 1911: p66 at her first Lady Wilde 'at home'; on p77 making a horrible social blunder - bringing a guest who proceeded to insult her hostess; and pp87-88 feeling that she didn't understand the rules of the game, at one of Constance's 'at homes'.

1889

Anna was living in South Africa.

See Part Two of this life-by-dates.

?LATE 1880s or possibly EARLY 1890s

W B Yeats was a regular visitor to Anna in her new flat. They got very friendly and she proposed marriage to him. He turned the proposal down; and never visited her again.

Source, though without naming the woman in question or giving specific dates: WB Yeats by letter to Lady Gregory; thence to Lady Gregory's diary: Lady Gregory's Diaries 1892-1902 edited and with an introduction by James Pethica. Gerrard's Cross: Colin Smythe 1996: p151; and p151 footnote 134 in which the editor identifies the anonymous marriage-proposer as Anna. The gist of the story as Lady Gregory noted it down was that Anna told W B Yeats that her rather dubious reputation wouldn't necessarily be a handicap to him if they married. She reminded him that T P O'Connor had (to quote Lady Gregory) "married a woman of no character" who had been a great help to him in his political career.

Comment by Sally Davis on dating this intriguing but not-well-documented relationship: I've been turning over in my mind Anna's assessment of her own reputation; and how Lady Gregory envisaged her, who had only heard of her through W B Yeats. If it was true that Anna thought of herself as a woman of rather risqué reputation, it might have been because of the poem I've reproduced above; and because she'd taken on the 'breeches' role of Rosalind. So I've put Anna's proposal and its rejection, later than those two events.

END OF PART ONE. PART TWO covers the late 1880s to Anna's death. Return to the main GD web page to reach it.

BASIC SOURCES I USED for all Golden Dawn members.

Membership of the Golden Dawn: The Golden Dawn Companion by R A Gilbert. Northampton: The Aquarian Press 1986. Between pages 125 and 175, Gilbert lists the names, initiation dates and addresses of all those people who became members of the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn or its many daughter Orders between 1888 and 1914. The list is based on the Golden Dawn's administrative records and its Members' Roll - the large piece of parchment on which all new members signed their name at their initiation. All this information had been inherited by Gilbert but it's now in the Freemasons' Library at the United Grand Lodge of England building on Great Queen Street Covent Garden. Please note, though, that the records of the Amen-Ra Temple in Edinburgh were destroyed in 1900/01. I have recently (July 2014) discovered that some records of the Horus Temple at Bradford have survived, though most have not; however those that have survived are not yet accessible to the public.

For the history of the GD during the 1890s I usually use Ellic Howe's The Magicians of the Golden Dawn: A Documentary History of a Magical Order 1887-1923. Published Routledge and Kegan Paul 1972. Foreword by Gerald Yorke. Howe is a historian of printing rather than of magic; he also makes no claims to be a magician himself, or even an occultist. He has no axe to grind.

Family history: freebmd; ancestry.co.uk (census and probate); findmypast.co.uk; familysearch; Burke's Peerage and Baronetage; Burke's Landed Gentry; Armorial Families; thepeerage.com; and a wide variety of family trees on the web.

Famous-people sources: mostly about men, of course, but very useful even for the female members of GD. Oxford Dictionary of National Biography. Who Was Who. Times Digital Archive.

Useful source for business and legal information: London Gazette and its Scottish counterpart Edinburgh Gazette. Now easy to find (with the right search information) on the web.

Catalogues: British Library; Freemasons' Library.

Wikipedia; Google; Google Books - my three best resources. I also used other web pages, but with some caution, as - from the historian's point of view - they vary in quality a great deal.

27 March 2016

Email me at

Find the web pages of Roger Wright and Sally Davis, including my list of people initiated into the Order of the Golden Dawn between 1888 and 1901, at:

www.wrightanddavis.co.uk

***

GD MEMBER ANNA COMTESSE DE BRÉMONT: PART TWO OF MY LIFE-BY-DATES which covers 1889 to her death in 1922.

Some repeats in case you didn't read Part One.

Anna Elizabeth, Comtesse de Brémont was initiated into the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn at its Isis-Urania temple in London on 13 November 1888, together with her friend Constance Wilde. Though most GD members opted for a motto in Latin, Anna chose one in French - Fait bien - les dire - a language that she spoke well. For her time as a member of the GD, see Part One.

Problems with the data:

It's difficult to write a life-by-dates without dates! And in Anna de Brémont's life, attested dates have been hard to come by. I've had other, inter-connected problems as well. Too many of the events in Anna's life are written up in one newspaper or magazine report; often long after the event; without those attested dates that I like; and without any explanation of where or who the information came from. In addition, Anna had a vivid imagination and less social poise than she admitted to in public. Particularly after she left the USA for Europe, she reinvented her life in America, to give herself a wealthier and more romantic background than she'd actually had. Hence the French title, comtesse de Brémont, which she used in Europe but almost certainly not before.

And a word of warning about the publications listed below. Quite a few of them came out in later editions from different publishers, with the title slightly changed. I've found it difficult to discover how many of the later publications were reissues and how many were first editions.

UNKNOWN DATE

Anna went to India, Australia and South Africa, on a singing and lecture tour promoted and managed by the English actor and theatrical impresario Walter Brandon Thomas.

Source: via Anna's wikipedia page to fultonhistory.com, the Rome Semi-Weekly Citizen of Tuesday 11 December 1894 p6: Material for a Libretto. Via google to www.coloradohistoricnewspapers.org to the Herald Democrat of 7 December 1894: article also called Material for Libretto and clearly from the same original report.

Comment by Sally Davis: no other source mentions this tour; and I can't see how it fits in Anna's life - I don't think she will have met Brandon Thomas before 1885, and there doesn't seem time in her life between 1885 and 1894 for a tour to such far-flung places. See Walter Brandon Thomas' wikipedia page for his career - he's the co-author of Charley's Aunt. Thomas' first attempts at theatrical promotion don't seem to have come until the early 1890s; and naturally enough, the first things he promoted were his own plays and acting. There's no mention of Anna on the wikipedia page, and no indication he ever promoted the kind of lecture tour Anna supposedly undertook. Perhaps the whole tour is one of Anna's flights of imagination.

ALSO UNDATED except that they took place at Anna's flat in Cavendish Mansions, which she had left by 1893

Anna joined the 'at home' circuit, holding hers on Sunday evenings.

Source: via Anna's wikipedia page to fultonhistory.com, the Rome Semi-Weekly Citizen of Tuesday 11 December 1894 p6: Material for a Libretto. Via google to www.coloradohistoricnewspapers.org to the Herald Democrat of 7 December 1894: article also called Material for Libretto and clearly from the same original report.

Comment by Sally Davis: at Anna's at homes the focus is likely to have been on music rather than conversation. See Part One if you haven't already done so, for her career as a singer.

Restating a bit from Part One:

1887-88

With the encouragement of Oscar Wilde and his mother Jane Francesca, Lady Wilde, Anna embarked on a career as a professional writer.

1889

Anna went to South Africa and worked for a newspaper based in Johannesburg. She was the only woman journalist in the Rand. She got her first book of poems printed while she was there. Some poems she wrote might indicate she had an affair. And one source from much later in her life says that she made a fortune while she was there.

Comment by Sally Davis: an important period in Anna's life, even if information on exactly what she did there is lacking. She doesn't say so but I think Anna would not have chosen to go to South Africa if she could have found journalism work in London. She didn't say which newspaper she worked for or whether she was paid; but she looked back on her "course of arduous journalism", the "drudgery" of her daily work, with gratitude, and never regretted her time in South Africa. It matured her as a writing professional and provided a mass of ideas for future fiction works. I think she also enjoyed the hell-for-leather atmosphere of a town in the midst of a gold rush, the lack of social rules and etiquette, even the lack of social graces - before she arrived in Johannesburg she was already finding London society "unromantic" (I don't know what she'd been expecting). Many of the poems which were published in Sonnets and Love Poems (1892) were written during her stay; and a crime and trial that happened while she was there gave her the plot of her first novel. She came back to England at the end of 1889 "richer in experience and in pocket". She had never intended to stay, and as far as I know she never went back.

Sources:

For Anna's time in South Africa, though without firm dates:

Oscar Wilde and His Mother: A Memoir. English Biography Series Number 31. London: Everett and Co; Torquay: William J McKenzie. Chapter V p43 for London society; pp120-23 for Anna's time in South Africa and the date by which she had returned.

For the possible affair: in Anna's Sonnets and Love Poems there is a set of sonnets charting the life and death of such an affair. The affair might well have happened, but I'd never take a set of poems as evidence of anything - after all, they're meant to be flights of the imagination. There are also two poems mourning the death in South Africa of a particular man, an English actor. Perhaps he was her lover - if she had one.

For her having made a fortune in South Africa:

From Anna's wikipedia page to fultonhistory.com, The Telegram published in Elmira New York State issue of 11 January 1920; the page number wasn't visible. Short report dated London 10 January [1920] following the publication of The Black Opal: Woman of 70 Writes a Book. It describes Anna as having made and lost several fortunes in her life; one of which was gained in South Africa but lost in the Boer War. It doesn't say what this fortune was based on - land, shares, gold, diamonds?

Immediate results of Anna's stay in the goldfields:

Love Poems privately printed Cape Town 1889: Argus Printing and Publishing Co.

The Gentleman Digger: A Study of Johannesburg Life by Anna Comtesse de Brémont. Published by Sampson Low and Co 1889. The copy I skimmed through at the British Library was from its reissue a couple of years later: datestamp "19JU91". Just noting that the book is dedicated to "the memory of my husband, le Comte Émile Léon de Brémont, a hero of the Crimea, a friend of suffering humanity". The Preface is dated Johannesburg 1890.

1890

Back in London, Anna returned to her flat in Cavendish Mansions Portland Place. As a now-experienced journalist, she found plenty of journalism work. She also worked on fiction and poetry.

Sources:

Oscar Wilde and His Mother: A Memoir. English Biography Series Number 31. London: Everett and Co; Torquay: William J McKenzie. Chapter V pp121-123. Anna had been back in England several weeks by 30 January 1890 when she contacted Lady Wilde for the first time since her return.

For the address, which was the same place that she was living in when she and W B Yeats were close:

The Gentleman Digger: A Study of Johannesburg Life by Anna Comtesse de Brémont. Published by Sampson Low and Co; no publication date but British Library stamp "19JU91": note by Anna on the book's Scenario.

1890

Anna's The World of Music, first edition. In three volumes: The Virtuosi, The Composers, The Singers. London: W W Gibbings.

Comment by Sally Davis: there were more reviews for the 1892 edition, which I think was a larger print-run. But I thought I'd list the contents of the three volumes here. The British Library copies of all three volumes were originally owned by Anna's acquaintance Mary Frances Ronalds: Mrs Ronalds' calling-card is inside their front covers. Inside volume 2 is a handwritten note by Anna to Mrs Ronalds, dated 20 March 1893 and accompanying a six-line poem by Anna, in praise of song.

Sources:

In an edition of Walter Scott's Redgauntlet whose date I couldn't see from the snippet: an advert for The World of Music and I think this is probably the 1892 edition because it's now being published in the USA by Brentano's of Union Square New York. The advert describes Anna as an ex-New York resident "now residing in London", and says that she "numbers among her acquaintances more members of the musical world than any other living writer".

There's a review of The World of Music in The Musical Times and Singing Class Circular volume 34 number 603 p297; see it on Jstor.

The contents of the three volumes:

Volume One: The Great Composers

As the first of the three volumes it contains Anna's preface to all three, in which (pv) Anna describes herself as recording the lives of genius "in all humbleness". The composers she chose were: Auber; Bach; Beethoven; Chopin; Gluck; Handel; Haydn; Mendelssohn; Meyerbeer; Mozart; Rossini; Schubert; Schumann; Wagner.

Volume Two: The Great Singers. Singers' fame doesn't last like that of composers but I give the names of the singers Anna chose, for what they are now worth: Braham 1774-1856; Catalani 1779-1849; Giuglini ?-1865; Hayes 1825-61; Jenny Lind 1820-87; Mario 1808-83, who married Grisi, another singer on the list; Pasta (married name of Negri) 1798-1865; Ronconi 1810-83; Sontag 1805-52; Billington 1770-1818; García 1775-1832, father of Malibrán, another singer on the list; Grisi 1811-69, wife of Mario; Lablache 1794-1858; Malibrán 1808-36, daughter of García, wife of de Bériot whose career Anna covered in the third volume of the set; Parepa-Rosa 1836-74; Rubini 1795-1854; Schröder-Devrient 1804-60; Tietjens 1831-77.

Volume Three: The Great Virtuosi. Some of the people Anna chose are better known to us now as composers: Ascher 1831-69, a pianist; Ole Bull 1810-80 p9 a violinist whom Anna heard play when she was a child; Buxtehude 1637-1707; Clementi 1752-1832; Chopin 1810-49; de Bériot 1802-70 who was a violinist; Ernst 1814-65 with (p60) an assessment of his personality, using phrenology; Gottschalk 1829-69; Gung'l 1810-89 who was a bandmaster; Herz 1806-88 pianist and also a teacher; Hummel 1778-1837; Kalkbrenner 1788-1849, a pianist-composer; Liszt 1811-86; Moscheles 1794-1870; Paganini 1784-1840; Spöhr 1784-1859; Tausig 1841-71 composer and arranger of Wagner's orchestral works for piano; Thalberg 1812-71; Vieuxtemps 1820-81, another violinist.

1891

An article by Anna was published in the Scientific American: the Decorations of the Hotel Metropole in London.

There's a reference to it on worldcat - Scientific American volume 11 number 5; either issue of 1 May 1891 if worldcat's dates are UK ordered; or 5 January 1891 if they're US ordered, which is more likely.

Comment by Sally Davis: I haven't read this article but from its title, it doesn't sound particularly scientific. However, it might involve new technology. Anna was very interested in some new inventions - moving pictures, for example, and aeroplane flight (see below for more on those).

CENSUS DAY 1891

My only sighting of Anna on any census, at 1 Cavendish Mansions, Portland Place.

Source: census 1891.

Comment by Sally Davis: when I searched for Anna's block of flats with google, nothing in Portland Place came up; so I guess it's no longer there. It did still exist in 1959 though: at www.orbern.co.uk is p2 of an article: A Tour of Broadcasting House in 1959, by Mike Chessher. Cavendish Mansions was mentioned as being next door to Egton House, which in 1959 housed the BBC News Division. If it was next to the BBC, Cavendish Mansions must have been right at the south end of Portland Place, near to where it turns into Regent Street.

Anna was the sole resident at her address on census day 1891, and I find it a bit odd that she wasn't employing any servants that lived in. There might not have been room for them, I suppose. Perhaps she was about to move, though, after living in the flat for several years, and didn't want to bother hiring servants until she was settled at her new address: by 1893 she was living in Bloomsbury, and she did have servants there.

DURING 1892

Anna paid to have her Sonnets and Love Poems printed by J J Little and Co of Astor Place, New York City. She dedicated the book to “Le Comte Léon de Brémont” as chevalier de la Légion d’honneur, whose “tender love and passionate devotion” was the inspiration for “these poems - the solace of many sad hours”.

Comment by Sally Davis: I wonder if Anna paid a visit to New York to supervise the printing process and meet up with old friends. No source I looked at seems to know how many copies Anna had printed; but on 23 March 2016 I saw number 131 for sale at abebooks, with a high price tag because it had two extra poems in it, handwritten by Anna in 1893 before she gave that copy to the singer and song-composer Lawrence Kellie. The longer handwritten extra poem was The Singer’s Soul; 32 lines in 8 stanzas “written for and inspired by the sweet singing of Lawrence Kellie, May 16th 1893”; unfortunately you couldn’t get to see this poem at abebooks’s website. The other poem you could see; it was part of the dedication. Anna doesn’t use apostrophe although 2 are needed:

“To Lawrence Kellie Esq

The simplest songs a thing

More potent than a King!

It conquers by the right

Of sympathys vast might.”

Signed “Anna de Brémont, London May 14th 1893”.

I also print here the short poem on the book’s title page; it’s anonymous but I’m assuming it’s by and about Anna herself:

For she is a daughter of Odin’s line

With the Norseman’s blood in her veins;

And her soul it is bound to the souls of the Gods

That reign o’er the boreal plains!

Comments on the poems, by Sally Davis:

Many of the poems in the book are dedicated to specific people. One is dedicated “to an English actor who died of fever Johannesburg South Africa 1890” - the man she had the affair with, perhaps, if she had an affair at all.

One or two people are the subject of poems in the book. There’s Clement Scott on His Book of Lays and Lyrics; and also the poem She, which has the subtitle “Dedicated to Miss Sophia Eyre on Her Impersonation of Mr Rider Haggard’s Heroine”. Anna was thrilled with the novel She, and the female god-queen Ayesha; you can see the book’s influence on Anna’s own novels, especially The Lioness of Mayfair. Sophia Eyre was the first person to act the role of Ayesha, in a version of the novel adapted for the stage. Anna was also a fan of Cleopatra: there are three poems on the ‘Cleopatra’ theme in the book: Cleopatra; Cleopatra’s Dream and Cleopatra’s Night on the Nile.

Although Anna doesn’t seem to have had much of a record as a charity volunteer, there’s a poem called The Children's Christmas Dinner at Victoria Hall, which seems to record an real event organised by Anna's editor at The Theatre magazine, Clement Scott. Although she doesn't say so, Anna may have helped finance the dinner, or helped out on the day.

The last poem in the collection is To My Mother; who is assumed to be "in the realms of the blest". I'm not sure this is cast-iron evidence that Anna's mother had died by this time; but perhaps she had.

Two poems that had already published were printed again in the collection: A Fantasy; and Have You Forgotten?, a poem which was set to music in 1887 and published as part of the song's score.

Extant copies of the 1892 printing of Sonnets and Love Poems

Copy numbers 94 and 131 seen at www.abebooks.co.uk 23 March 2016; the British Library has copy number 55. Modern printings of the book are easily available through forgottenbooks.org.

Sources for the people mentioned above:

Information on the dedicatee Lawrence Kellie was hard to find: 1862-1932, singer, and composer of songs.

At prabook.org there are some very scant details of Kellie's life, without any clue as to sources.

The British Library catalogue has 95 entries under his name. One was a dud; 93 were songs though I didn't look through them so there may be duplicates.

Seen at victorianripper.niceboard.org there's the text of a review in The Courier 26 May 1887 p10 of a concert at the Steinway Hall in which Lawrence, his wife, and singer Mary Davies all played or sang. The web page was speculating that Mary Davies was related to one of the Ripper's victims.

At www.bbc.co.uk/proms/events/composers lists a handful of songs by Kellie that were sung during Proms concerts; none recently.

At www.lieder.net there's a list of 5 songs by Kellie including one to lyrics by Oscar Wilde: Oh! Beautiful Star.

The Heritage Encyclopaedia of Band Music volume 1. William H Rehrig and Robert Hoe. Integrity Press 1991: p285 and p394.

Edith Sitwell: Avant Garde Poet, English Genius by Richard Greene. Virago 2011. Via google, with no page numbers but in a couple of pages talking about the Sitwells as a musical family: Lady Ida corresponded with Lawrence Kellie in the period 1898-1910. Lady Ida Sitwell, née Denison, was the niece of GD member Albertina Herbert.

See wikipedia for Clement Scott; or 1887 in Part One of this life-by-dates.

She first appeared - as so many novels did - as a serial in the magazine The Graphic, from 2 October 1886 to 8 January 1887. Source for that is H Rider Haggard: A Voice from the Infinite by Peter Berresford-Ellis 1978. London and Henley: Routledge and Kegan Paul Ltd: p108; and p117 where Anna's poem She is mentioned.

New York Times of 7 September 1888 p4 a report from their London correspondent issued 6 September 1888 about the first night of a play version of She at the Gaiety Theatre; with Sophie Eyre in the title role. The correspondent thought the play was “utter rubbish”. The audience agreed, and Rider Haggard - who was there for its first night - got a barracking from them when he made a speech defending it.

At //cabinetcardgallery.wordpress.com a picture of Sophie Eyre on a postcard, with a few details about her career. At www.npg.org.uk a photograph of her.

DURING 1892

A new edition of The World of Music was published. This time it had publishers in New York as well as London; and there was probably a bigger print-run than the 1890 edition.

Sources:

Book Chat volume 7 1892 three adverts for the forthcoming edition of The World of Music; on p232, on p269 and on p281. Anna described as “well known in musical circles in England, her house forming one of the centres of musical life in London”, a place where English and foreign musicians gathered.

An edition of Walter Scott’s Redgauntlet 1892: The World of Music published in the USA by Brentano’s of Union Square New York City.

English edition: The World of Music by Anna comtesse de Brémont. London: W W Gibbings of 18 Bury Street WC 1892.

A not particularly enthusiastic review:

New York Times of 8 January 1893: Music and Writers of It. The reviewer didn’t like Anna’s writing style. He or she quoted at length from Anna’s section on Beethoven’s Eroica symphony to illustrate his view that Anna “smothers our souls with this ecstatic vision” which had not been observed by any other writer on Beethoven; and ended by summing the work up as “confessions of a music eater”.

20 FEBRUARY 1892

The first night of Oscar Wilde’s Lady Windermere’s Fan. Anna sent Oscar a good luck telegram; but she was visiting a friend in Brighton, and couldn’t go to the performance.

Source for Anna’s not being able to go to it:

Oscar Wilde: Interviews and Recollections in 2 volumes. Editor E H Mikhail, both published London and Basingstoke: Macmillan Press Ltd 1979: p183 in the middle of a long extract from Anna’s own Oscar Wilde and His Mother, in which I seem to have missed it.

DURING 1893

Advance notice was given in the publishing press of a book of short stories, by Anna, with the title South African Tales.

Source for the advance notice:

The Bookman volume 4 1893; I couldn’t see the page number on the google snippet.

Comment by Sally Davis: I haven’t been able to find any evidence that South African Tales was ever published. I think it must have turned into The Ragged Edge, which was published in 1895.

NOT DATED BY ANNA, EXCEPT AS HAPPENING A YEAR AFTER THE OPENING OF LADY WINDERMERE'S FAN; so ?spring 1893

Anna and her guest, an "old author and soldier of the mutiny" attended a dinner at the Authors' Society. There she met Oscar Wilde for the first time in three years. Anna remembered the evening as a series of shocks to her system. She was made aware that Oscar was becoming persona non grata.

Comment by Sally Davis: that's how Anna tells the story of that evening, in Oscar Wilde and His Mother. Her first shock was how much Oscar Wilde had changed, physically: she didn't recognise him until he came up to speak to her. Then she became uncomfortable that Oscar wasn't being celebrated as she felt he should be. It wasn't until a little while after her exchange of politenesses with Oscar that Anna realised that he'd been 'cut' by her guest. Her guest then had an altercation with one of the news reporters who was present, who was making it rather obvious that he thought Oscar and Anna had come to the dinner together. Anna's guest had been so anxious to put the reporter right on that one that Anna realised that being acquainted with Oscar Wilde was becoming a social risk. This account is all with hindsight, of course. I imagine that at the time, Anna had no idea of the real cause of Oscar's ostracisation. I imagine, too, that her protective guest didn't enlighten her. Anna summed up the evening as "one of the most painful moments of my life".

Source for Anna's difficult evening:

Oscar Wilde: Interviews and Recollections in 2 volumes. Editor E H Mikhail. Published London and Basingstoke: Macmillan Press Ltd 1979 and quoting Anna's Oscar Wilde and His Mother at great length: pp184-85.

Oscar Wilde and His Mother: A Memoir. English Biography Series Number 31. London: Everett and Co; Torquay: William J McKenzie: p137-40.

Information from Oscar Wilde's wikipedia page: Oscar met Lord Alfred Douglas in 1891. He became besotted with the younger man, and was introduced by Douglas to London's gay sub-culture.

Comment by Sally Davis: Oscar was never particularly discreet, it seems to me, and though sources for Constance Wilde say she didn't realise why they were becoming estranged, I imagine what Oscar was up to was widely rumoured in male social circles.

BY JULY 1893

Anna had moved to Bloomsbury Mansions, Hart Street. She left London on 11 July. While she was away, her servant let in some men who stole clothes jewellery and other goods from Anna and sold them in shops in Seven Dials.

Source: Times 8 September 1893 p7.

SEPTEMBER 1893

The thieves were caught, and Anna gave evidence at their trial. All four defendants were found guilty.

Source:

Times 8 September 1893 p7 London County sessions.

Comment on Anna's address, by Sally Davis: the block doesn't seem to exist any more. There is a block of flats called 'Bloomsbury Mansions' but it's in Russell Square and is a post-war building. Hart Street has been renamed - it's now Bloomsbury Way.

Anna was a regular contributor to the weekly St Paul's Magazine. She wrote on a wide range of subjects, including electric cookers and heaters; the Californian novelist Gertrude Atherton; and on one of the first ever showings in London of cine film.

Comment by Sally Davis: St Paul's Magazine's full title is An Illustrated Journal for the Home. It was published from 1894 to 1900; so Anna got in on its ground floor. I haven't been through all its weekly issues during 1894 and 1895 to see exactly which articles Anna wrote, and how many. Here are references to articles by Anna in St Paul's Magazine which were mentioned in other magazines:

Electrical Engineer volume 15 1895 p437 refers to Anna's article on electric cooking and heating appliances manufactured by Messrs Crompton.

Current Opinion volume 17 1895 p564 refers to an article by Anna on the American novelist Gertrude Atherton. See Part One of this life-by-dates, and Atherton's wikipedia page: Gertrude Atherton went to one of Lady Wilde's at homes while she was on a visit to London in 1889. It's likely that Anna met her there.

Adventures of a Novelist by Gertrude Atherton. London: Jonathan Cape 30 Bedford Sq 1932 covers her visit to London on pp169-184; she doesn't mention having met Anna, and her acquaintances in London seem more on the art side than the music side.

For the article on the Lumiere brothers' film evening see FEBRUARY 1896

SEPTEMBER OR OCTOBER 1894

Anna's request for an interview with W S Gilbert was turned down. Gilbert sent copies of their exchange of letters to several newspapers and they were published at least in the Times.

Source:

Times 23 October 1894 p6 for the letters. And see DECEMBER 1895 below, for coverage of de Brémont v Gilbert.

Comment by Sally Davis: I'm sure Anna had it in mind to write a profile of Gilbert for St Paul's Magazine. His Excellency had its première at the Lyric Theatre on 27 October 1894: a light opera in the G and S style with words by Gilbert BUT music by F Osmond Carr. Information on His Excellency from its wiki.

BY DECEMBER 1894

Anna had felt that the letters published in the Times and elsewhere had impugned her good name. She had decided to sue W S Gilbert for libel. de Brémont v Gilbert (as the case was known) was exciting a good deal of interest and amusement. A profile of Anna, with a line drawing of her, appeared in some newspapers, giving some details of her life until now.

Information seen via Anna's wikipedia page to fultonhistory.com, the Rome Semi-Weekly Citizen of Tuesday 11 December 1894 p6: Material for a Libretto. Via google to www.coloradohistoricnewspapers.org to the Herald Democrat of 7 December 1894: article also called Material for Libretto and clearly from the same original report and including exactly the same line drawing of Anna's head (though it could be anyone). Neither of these papers gave any details of where they had got the information from. I'm not sure that the information came from Anna, because the report was not especially flattering to her. For example, it mentions her having spent all the money she inherited from her husband - not something I think she would have wanted to be widely publicised.

1895 - A YEAR OF MANY TRAUMAS

14 FEBRUARY 1895

The first night of The Importance of Being Earnest; at St James's Theatre.

Source:

Oscar Wilde and His Mother: A Memoir. English Biography Series Number 31. London: Everett and Co; Torquay: William J McKenzie: p146. Though Anna doesn't actually state that she went to it, her mentioning it suggests she did.

3 APRIL 1895 TO 26 APRIL 1895

Wilde v Queensbury: in which Oscar Wilde sued the Marquis of Queensbury for libel.

Source for the information on the trial: Oscar Wilde's wikipedia page; but there are websites and books on the two trials. As I'm sure everyone knows: the Marquis was Lord Alfred Douglas' father; and the trial verdict was in the Marquis' favour. The police arrested Oscar as soon as the verdict was given. Oscar refused the advice of his friends to flee the country and was charged with sodomy and gross indecency. Lady Wilde wanted him to stay and fight the charges; but I'm not sure that Oscar stayed because he wanted to take that advice.

The level of publicity and public excitement surrounding the libel trial and the two subsequent criminal trials were extraordinary for their time.

26 APRIL 1895 to 1 MAY 1895; and 20 MAY 1895 to 26 MAY 1895

The two criminal trials of Oscar Wilde. He was found guilty at the second trial and sentenced to two years' hard labour.

A good source: law2.umkc.edu/faculty/projects/trials/wilde/wilde.htm - the World Trials web pages of the University of Missouri at Kansas City, Law School. The site has transcripts of the evidence and discussion of the legal points raised.

BY MAY 1895

Anna was no longer renting the flat in Hart Street. She didn't have a permanent home and was staying in a London hotel.

Oscar Wilde and His Mother: A Memoir. English Biography Series Number 31. London: Everett and Co; Torquay: William J McKenzie: p158.

26 MAY 1895

Anna sat in the gardens of the Temple, next to the Embankment, waiting to hear the verdict in Oscar Wilde's second trial. Oscar's brother Willie was also waiting there. Once she had heard what the verdict was, Anna went to call on Lady Wilde; but Lady Wilde was not receiving any visitors. Anna's sympathy was with Oscar - writing in 1911, she saw him as being punished for having transgressed the mores of the society they were both living in.

Comment by Sally Davis: the precincts of the Inner Temple are very close to the Old Bailey. If Anna felt in 1895 that Oscar was a helpless victim of anti-gay prejudice, she was holding views quite a lot in advance of her time. Her main anxiety at the time of the trial was for her friend Lady Wilde. Just noting here that Constance Wilde changed her name (to Holland) and took her two sons abroad; this isn't mentioned in Anna's memoir and the two women probably never met after the trial. I'm not even sure that they met all that often in the two or three years before it.

Source for Anna's actions on that day, and her feelings then and later: Oscar Wilde and His Mother: A Memoir. English Biography Series Number 31. London: Everett and Co; Torquay: William J McKenzie: pp153-56.

I think it's here that I shall give details of a recent biography of Constance that focuses on her as an individual, not on her as the wife of fame and tragedy: Constance - The Tragic and Scandalous Life of Mrs Oscar Wilde by Franny Moyle. London: John Murray 2011.

SEPTEMBER 1895

Anna's short story collection The Ragged Edge was published.

Source:

Times Tuesday 24 September 1895 p10 Publications To-Day column includes Anna's The Ragged Edge: Tales of the African Gold Fields. 3/6, published by Downey and Co.

A couple of reviews:

Times Friday 11 October 1895 p6 an advert for The Ragged Edge, quoting The Scotsman - "A bright and interesting book"; and The Sun (not the modern one) - "A simple, stunning book".

18 DECEMBER 1895

Anna's own libel trial reached court: de Brémont v Gilbert. She gave evidence in her own defence and was cross-examined by Gilbert's lawyers.

Source for the exchange of letters, and Gilbert getting his defence in first:

Times 23 October 1894 p6 printed 2 letters. The top one was from W S Gilbert to the Times dated 20 October [1894], in which he said Anna was "known to me by repute" - which Anna took to imply that her repute was 'ill' and I think she was correct in taking it so.

Times 18 December 1895 p4 cases to be heard today in the Queen's Bench Division, before the Lord Chief Justice and a jury.

Coverage of the trial: Times 20 December 1895 p13. Gilbert's barrister was Sir Edward Clarke QC MP; Anna's was Mr Bowen Rowlands QC. Gilbert's argument was that Anna had misunderstood him. See above and I'm sure she hadn't. The evidence established that he'd sent the letters that appeared in the Times, to the Daily Telegraph; and even to Anna's employers at St Paul's Magazine, telling the editor to keep "a careful eye" on future articles Anna might write on his work. Anna's case was that the published letters gave the impression that she was calling herself the Comtesse de Brémont without any legal justification; that Gilbert had attacked her good taste; and that the letters were "calculated to injure her professional reputation".

Comment by Sally Davis: inevitably, the trial became one of Anna's reputation. She was asked whether she thought her poetry was in good taste; she described her poems as passionate but pointed out that they were dedicated to her husband, the proper object of a married woman's passion. Her editor at St Paul's Magazine described Anna's articles as "invariably marked by discretion and taste". About the title 'comtesse', which Gilbert had implied was a fake, Anna explained that her husband was a perfectly genuine Comte but when living in egalitarian New York City, had called himself just plain 'doctor'. She told the court that W S Gilbert knew that, as he'd employed Dr de Brémont to attend one of the D'Oyly Carte Opera's singers when the singer was taken ill in New York. Cross-examined, Gilbert admitted he hadn't asked Anna's permission to publish the letters which appeared in the Times. He came over (to one reporter at least) as “apparently...less humorous in the box than upon the stage”.

None of that made any difference: the jury went with Gilbert. The court report in the Times didn't say whether Anna was ordered to pay Gilbert's costs as well as her own; but that was the usual outcome when you lost a civil case of this kind.

Some trial coverage more sympathetic to Anna, in The Critic aka North American Review; New Series volumes 25-26 1896 Published weekly in New York; established 1881. Issue of 11 January 1896 pp13-14; though the report was written in London on 21 December 1895 by Arthur Waugh, the magazine's London correspondent. It was Waugh who commented on Gilbert's lack of any sense of humour, in the witness box.

Most biographies of W S Gilbert believe that Anna was the adventuress he implied she was. Here's one that doesn't:

W S Gilbert: Appearance and Reality edited by David Eden. Published Sir Arthur Sullivan Society. On p184l, the editor feels that Gilbert's "treatment of her was deliberate" and wondered if he had "felt a tincture of shame for the cunning cruelty of his own behaviour". Eden says that Anna's apology for having inadvertently caused him offence "can hardly have been more sincere" and that "reports of the case show her as standing up well for herself".

Final comment by Sally Davis: what a very ungentlemanly, ungenerous man W S Gilbert was! But Anna shouldn't have got herself entangled with a man whose own wikipedia page describes him as "confrontational", and one of whose biographies is subtitled 'his life and strife'.

3 FEBRUARY 1896

Jane Francesca, Lady Wilde, died.

Information from her wikipedia page.

Comment by Sally Davis: Anna must have felt this deeply: not only the loss of a "beautiful friendship" but also because of the manner of Jane Francesca Wilde's death, her last months made hideous by what had happened to Oscar. However, writing in 1911, Anna only mentions the death in passing in her memoir of Oscar and his mother; and she doesn't say whether they ever met again after Lady Wilde had refused to let Anna in, on the day Oscar was found guilty of homosexual offences.

Oscar Wilde and His Mother: A Memoir. London: Everett and Co Ltd of 42 Essex Street Strand 1911: dedication to Speranza; and p163.

MONDAY 24 FEBRUARY 1896

Anna went to the Marlborough Hall to see a film programme put together by the Lumière brothers, pioneers of cinema in France. She wrote an enthusiastic article on it for St Paul's Magazine which has been quoted in histories of early cinema.

Anna's own article: St Paul's Magazine: Living Photography; in issue of 7 March 1896. She particularly mentioned the excitement the films caused amongst the photographers in the audience. She named two of them: van de Weyde and Downey; I mention them - they seem to be acquaintances of hers - in case they are well-known.

Source for the date and place of the showing Anna went to:

Cinema: The Beginnings and the Future edited by Christopher Williams. London: University of Westminster Press 1996. Article by Joost Hunningher: Première on Regent Street: pp41-54. The set of films had first been shown on 21 February 1896 at the Polytechnic Institution. Hunningher doesn't give a reason for the change of venue: perhaps the Marlborough Hall was bigger.

Anna's article is also mentioned in The Tenth Muse: Writing about Cinema in the Modernist Period by Laura Marcus 2007. This was a snippet and I couldn't find any page numbers. Anna's article was mentioned in footnote 180.

Comment by Sally Davis on the rest of this life-by-dates. Whereas there are plenty of sources for Anna's life during the years 1886-96; from 1896 on, they start to dry up and I'm left more and more to the publication dates of Anna's books - which do at least show how she was spending her time.

18 MAY 1897

Oscar Wilde was released from prison.

Information from his wikipedia page.

7 APRIL 1898

Constance Wilde - now calling herself Holland - died in exile in Genoa.

Information from wikipedia.

Comment by Sally Davis: I'm not sure whether Anna would have been much affected when she heard of Constance's death. They had only been close for a brief period in all the time Anna had been so friendly with Lady Wilde. I can't make up my mind whether or not Anna actually liked Constance much. If she didn't, maybe the feeling was mutual. They were very different types of women.

1899-1901

The Boer War led to a demand for information on South Africa; and several books by Anna were reissued. According to one much later source I found, Anna the war resulted in Anna losing a fortune she had made while in South Africa in 1889.

Sources: see immediately below and for Anna having made and lost a fortune: From Anna's wikipedia page to fultonhistory.com, The Telegram published in Elmira New York State issue of 11 January 1920 page number wasn't visible. Short report dated London 10 January [1920] following the publication of The Black Opal: Woman of 70 Writes a Book. It describes Anna as having made and lost several fortunes in her life; one of which was gained in South Africa but lost in the Boer War. It doesn't say what this fortune was based on - land, shares, gold, diamonds? There's no indication in the report about where the information in it came from.

1899

Anna's novel A Son of Africa was published.

Source, though I haven't been able to pin down the exact date:

A Son of Africa: A Romance. By Anna. Published London: Greening and Co 1899, with a 2nd edition was published in 1902. The British Library has a copy of the 1899 edition, which is dedicated to Anna's husband as a hero of the Crimea but also as "an explorer of the Great Sahara Desert".

There's a review of the 2nd edition in Dramatic Criticism volume 3 1902 p338.

Comment by Sally Davis: I haven't read any of Anna's novels thoroughly - I don't like her style much! But I'll say about A Son of Africa that some of the major characters in it, including the son of Africa himself, are native Africans; and one is a female baboon! There's also a character, Muriel Warwick, who might have elements of Anna herself in her: pp219-20 describes Mrs Warwick as living in Johannesburg's city of "canvas tents and shanties; she's a smoker (so was Anna) who says of herself, "You know I am a Bohemian and delight in roughing it" (this while having a staff of four servants!). Muriel has travelled to Africa in pursuit of a "blasé young rake", Frank. Muriel encourages the son of Africa to convert to Christianity and when he has done so, pays for him to attend the Church Missionary College in Durban. He subsequently spends time in London and refuses to marry the woman he loves because her (white) father's business sells in African slaves. The story ends with the son of Africa revisiting his African origins, meeting up with the baboon again and giving his dead mother a second, Christian, burial. It's a curiously imperialist tale.

1899

Anna's novel The Gentleman Digger was reissued.

FROM AUGUST 1900

Anna spent several months in Paris, covering the Great Exhibition. While in Paris she stayed with an American woman friend.

See its wiki for much more detail on the Paris Exposition Universelle. It ran from 15 April to 12 November 1900 and nearly 50 million people visited it. Talking pictures, telephones, escalators, diesel engines, the first Olympic Games to be held outside Greece, and Art Nouveau were all featured.

Source for Anna's time in Paris:

Oscar Wilde: Interviews and Recollections in 2 volumes. Volume 2 includes a series of long extracts from Anna's Oscar Wilde and His Mother. Edited E H Mikhail, published London and Basingstoke: Macmillan Press Ltd 1979: volume 2 p447.

Comment by Sally Davis: just noting that Anna didn't name the woman friend she stayed with in Paris.

?AUGUST ?SEPTEMBER 1900

Anna and her woman friend went to the Spanish Café. Oscar Wilde was also there. To save her woman friend embarrassment, Anna pretended not to have seen him, and they didn't speak to each other. Later, she was overcome with remorse for having 'cut' him in public. The following day, she met Oscar again - by accident - at St Cloud.

Source, written with what must surely be a great deal of hindsight:

Oscar Wilde: Interviews and Recollections in 2 volumes. Volume 2 includes a series of long extracts from Anna's Oscar Wilde and His Mother. Edited E H Mikhail, published London and Basingstoke: Macmillan Press Ltd 1979: volume 2 pp447-451.

Comment by Sally Davis: this was a social dilemma that few women could have negotiated successfully. It was made worse for Anna by the other people in her woman friend's party, who soon got the story out of her, and were terribly excited, wanting her to point Oscar out to them. Up until then, Anna had been enjoying the evening very much. The Spanish Café was well-known for its displays of Spanish dancing; Anna was thinking of Salome while she watched it.

Anna describes herself as having cried all that night. The following morning she went to St Cloud to get away from her friend's house. Her conversation with Oscar at St Cloud was the last time they spoke.

NOVEMBER 1900

Anna's article The Physical Development of the Boer was published in the magazine Physical Culture.

Source: I didn't see it in the original magazine. It was also printed in the New Zealand newspaper Taranaki Herald issue of 15 Kohi-tate 1900 which you can read on the web.

30 NOVEMBER 1900

Oscar Wilde died in Paris. Anna went to the hotel he was staying in after reading about his illness in Le Journal. He had already died by the time she got there, but his friend Robert Baldwin Ross took her up to see the body. Hearing from Ross that Oscar's hotel bill was still outstanding, she offered to help pay it.

Date of his death from his wikipedia page.

Source for Anna's doings on the day of Oscar's death; again with hindsight and artistic licence.

Oscar Wilde and His Mother: A Memoir. English Biography Series Number 31. London: Everett and Co; Torquay: William J McKenzie. Chapter V p170, pp189-196.

Comment by Sally Davis: in her memoir Anna describes Oscar's funeral cortège as it left the hotel for his funeral at St Germain des Près. It's not clear from the book whether she actually attended the service, or the burial at the cemetery at Bagneaux. In later years she maintained that Oscar had died of grief, not of any illness; and that in his De Profundis and The Ballad of Reading Gaol he showed that what she called his feminine soul had triumphed over all his troubles. Anna had not met Robert Ross before, but their encounter over Oscar's death bed led to a friendship between them.

See wikipedia for Robert Baldwin Ross: 11869-1918. Openly gay and thought to be Oscar's first homosexual partner. Oscar's literary executor, published a definitive edition of Oscar's works and commissioned Jacob Epstein to do a sculpture to put on Oscar's tomb.

A final comment on Anna and the Wilde family, by Sally Davis: all those friends Anna had had in the Wilde family were now dead.

CENSUS DAY 1901

Anna was not in the UK. I daresay she was still in Paris.

Source: census 1901.

1901

Anna's novel Daughters of Pleasure was published in book form and another edition of A Son of Africa was issued.

Comment by Sally Davis: I say 'in book form' because the copy Daughters of Pleasure that I looked at in the British Library was laid out, and had a typeface, reminiscent of a journal or magazine; though I haven't been able to find it published in episodes anywhere.

Source: Daughters of Pleasure: Being the History of Neara a Musician, Athene an Actress and Hera a Singer. London: Greening. A 2nd edition was published in 1903.

1903

Anna's novel Mrs Evelyn's Husbands was published; with the subtitle 'A Problem in Marriage'.

Mrs Evelyn's Husbands: A Problem in Marriage. London: Greening and Co. There was a 2nd edition of this in 1909.

Comment by Sally Davis: like Daughters of Pleasure, the copy I saw of Mrs Evelyn's Husbands was laid out in 2-column form as if lifted from a newspaper. The novel is about wealthy ex-pat Americans not having an especially good time in contemporary Paris: man and wife, man getting bored with marriage and having affairs, wife running away and bigamously marrying someone else. The first husband gets a divorce and custody of the children. Wife remarries her bigamous husband and lives relatively happily in the French countryside.

1905

Hutchinsons issued one of the three volumes of Anna's The World of Music as a stand-alone book.

The Great Composers. London: Hutchinson and Co.

1906

Anna's novel Was It a Sin? was published.

Was it a Sin? London: Hutchinson and Co.

1907

Anna's novel Lady Lilian's Luck was published, by Greenings.

Lady Lilian's Luck: A Romance of Ostend. London: Greening 1907. Hutchinson and Co published a 2nd edition of it in 1909 and a 3rd in 1912.

1909

Anna's novel The Lioness of Mayfair was published.

The Lioness of Mayfair. Everett; dedicated to "SM", someone I haven't identified. A 2nd edition of this was published in 1913.

Some comments on the book in contemporary reviews. I found these in the back of the copy I read at the British Library; suggesting that a second print-run was done later in the year.

Westminster Review focused on its "exquisite yet exotic style" and its "lavish use of symbolism” and the wide variety of locations, from Africa to a medieval castle. The reviewer summed up the plot as “a tale of selfish love turned to bitter hatred”.

Bystander said it “glows with rich colour” but summed up the plot differently, as: great woman sculptor torn between art and the need for love - not what the Westminster Review reckoned at all!

The Glasgow Herald likened Anna’s writing style to that of Edgar Allen Poe, meaning that it “combines luxury and a dreamlike quality with a hard limpidity”. That must have pleased Anna.

The Yorkshire Post was not so enthusiastic, describing Anna as the most likely successor to “poor Ouida”.

The Lady’s Pictorial called it an “extraordinary book” full of “wild sensationalism”, recommending it to readers who liked excitement on every page.

The Court Journal is more restrained, as you would expect; I’m surprised at it reviewing the book at all. Its reviewer said the book had “much dramatic power” and “some thrilling situations”.

Comment by Sally Davis: I found more reviews of this book by Anna than anything else she wrote; and I think it was her most successful fiction work. There’s more than a hint of occult powers in it. The fire alarm went off at the British Library while I was skimming through the book and we all had to stand about in the cold for 45 minutes, so I may have missed some of the plot’s finer points! but here’s an outline of what’s going on. There are four main characters. Aimie Desmond who’s the sculptor who gives up her art to be a wife; the title of ‘wife’ “proudest title a woman can bear”; her husband drags her to Africa where she dies in “the wilderness of the Zambesi” quite early in the plot. She leaves behind her master-work, the sculpture of a lion. Victor Danielli is the dead Aimie’s husband. Helene, Marchioness of Belvedere is the Lioness of the title - Danielli’s lover before his wife’s death; his wife after it. Bamralulu is an African native, a slave and bound to celibacy; part of whose responsibility is the safety of Danielli. The end-game is a fight between Helene and Bamralulu after Danielli has died and Helene has bound Bamralulu to her with spells. Bamralulu sees Helene as Aimie Desmond’s lion-sculpture come to life. Helene demands that Bamralulu becomes her sex slave. He’s released from his enchantment by her demands; and kills her.

It sums up Anna’s imagination rather well, I think.

Anna wrote a long introduction to this story, describing herself wandering through the Faubourg St Germain in Paris in search of a good plot; and buying a lioness-skin from a chance-met Carmelite monk. Sitting with the lioness-skin in a room lit only by firelight, Anna experiences an extraordinary power coming from its eyes. She finds a secret cache inside the lioness-skin’s head, containing “a bulky roll of manuscript” with the basics of the plot on it... Just noting here, that this Introduction is the source for Anna as a cigarette smoker.

ALSO IN 1909

Anna’s translation from the French of a novel by Colette was published.

The Doctor Wife. A Novel by Colette Yver translated into English by Anna Comtesse de Brémont. London: Hutchinson and Co and please note the correct title: it’s not The Doctor’s wife, the protagonist IS a woman doctor.

Comment by Sally Davis: I do wish Anna had written an introduction to this book, the only work of translation she did. I'd like to know why she chose it. Or, rather, to have confirmed why she chose it, as the basis of the plot is whether a woman can have a career and be a wife; and Colette's conclusion is that she can't - a wife has to be a wife, not a working woman, or risk alienating her husband. It's a very anti-feminist sentiment, I'm surprised at Colette. I'm not surprised at Anna, though: she does seem to have believed that a wife-to-be should give up any career she might have hoped for. She gave up her own career as a singer when she got married and although as a widow she lived a life which was quite liberated for its time, it's clear to me that she would rather have stayed married.

Problems with publications:

1910 sees the first of a series of books by Anna that I haven't been able to find copies of. They are all listed in the 1922 edition of The Literary Year Book as being by her; but I haven't spotted any copies at libraries in England; nor on the web, either in their entirety at websites like mocavo, or for sale. My best guess is that they were privately printed, and no one thought to send the British Library (for example) one of the copies.

1910

The first of only two plays written by Anna was published.

Barbara the Scout which was a play. Published London.

Comment by Sally Davis: I couldn't find a copy of this; and I also couldn't discover whether it had ever been performed in a theatre. It might have had a private performance in someone's house; that's harder to prove.

ALSO 1910

Anna published a new collection of poems. The book's frontispiece is the only painting of Anna that I've come across.

Sonnets from a Parisian Balcony. London: Gay and Hancock.

Comment by Sally Davis: it's a head-and-shoulders portrait, reproduced in colour from a miniature Anna had done by Esmé Collings of Bond Street. She has blonde, heavy hair and plump shoulders. She's wearing a décolleté dress or light wrap, and either another wrap or a veil hanging from back of her head. There's a pink artificial flower on the left of her corsage.

The poems in the collection fall into two main groups: the sonnets from a Parisian balcony, and a companion set of sonnets of London town; with a miscellaneous group of poems at the end, some of which also appeared in Anna's 1892 poetry collection. Not many are dated, but one has the date 1900 on it and another is from 1897; so they're not all recent works. Poems are dedicated to Auguste Rodin and Sarah Bernhardt; to Oscar Wilde; to George Washington on his birthday; and Queen Victoria on her birthday.

Information on Esmé Collings, the professional name of Arthur Albert Collings.

See www.victorian-cinema.net/collings.htm

For his cinema partnership with William Friese Green: www.victorian-cinema.net/friese-green.htm

CENSUS DAY 1911

Anna was not in England on this census day either; probably in Paris where she may even have been living permanently by this time.

IN 1911

The first of Anna's memoirs of the Wilde family was published; and also several collections of poems.

Oscar Wilde: A Memoir. London: Everett and Co and apparently a different volume from Anna's more well-known Oscar Wilde and His Mother.

Coronation Sonnets to Her Most Gracious Majesty Queen Mary. London: privately printed, using an unknown printing firm at 27 Warwick Lane.

Comment by Sally Davis: 1911 was a coronation year. Sonnet I sums up Anna's attitude to the new queen; and to the role of woman in society:

..."woman, mother, wife,
A glorious trinity..."

The seven sonnets are: Mary - Sacred and Historic Name; Girlhood - As in a Fragrant Garden; Love - the Season of Youth's Mystic Dreams; Marriage - When England Paused to Hear; Wifehood - Halcyon Days in Honeymooning Lands; Motherhood - The Garden of Thy Happiness; Queenhood - Beneath Westminster's Storied Roof.

I don't think Anna knew Queen Mary very well.

Sonnets at His Majesty's Theatre. I couldn't find any publication details for this; nor any copies.

Pearls of Poesy. A Biographical Birthday Book of Popular Poets of the Period. Compiled for the coronation of George V and Queen Mary. London: Elliot Stock. Editor, C F Forshaw, identified by the British Library catalogue as Charles Frederick Forshaw. Anna wrote the book's Foreword, dated "London September 10th [1911]"; and contributed one sonnet to the collection.

Source for the editor Charles Frederick Forshaw: see www.masonic-poets-society.com.

Comment by Sally Davis on Anna's Foreword, in which she describes poetry competitions as a mental equivalent to golf; and views the current state of poetry as not, perhaps, reaching any dizzy heights, but as being better than it was a few years before. She saw the present time as a high point of material and intellectual progress, and mentioned in particular "the conquest of the air and its elements" as "the greatest achievement of our age". However, the sonnet was a favourite poetic form of Anna's and she did hope that it would not be left behind by modern progress, and noted that many modern poets had "no love for the system of poetic construction...they wander from the recognised road that leads to poetic excellence". She was sure that if a great woman poet was going to make an appearance in the next few years, the sonnet would be the road she would take. Anna's own sonnet was on p48 and seems to be selected from a set Anna had written on a favourite subject of hers - Cleopatra, this time seen with Antony.

Poets' Club Book is another work supposedly by Anna and published in 1911; not having been able to see any copies of it, I don't know what was in it and I'm wondering if it was Pearls of Poesy by another name.

1911

Anna's most often-quoted work was published: her Oscar Wilde and His Mother.

Oscar Wilde and His Mother: A Memoir. English Biography Series Number 31. London: Everett and Co; Torquay: William J McKenzie. Dedicated to Speranza - Lady Wilde's writing name - "in Remembrance of her beautiful friendship for the author". A sonnet called Oscar Wilde, written by Anna, was on one of the title pages.

Some books that have used Anna's memoir:

The Real Oscar Wilde by Robert Harborough Sherard, who was a nephew of GD member Florence Kennedy's husband. T Werner Laurie Ltd of 8 Essex St Strand. No publication date but the British Library has stamped it "3APR17".

The Parents of Oscar Wilde: Sir William and Lady Wilde by Terence de Vere White. Hodder and Stoughton 1967. De Vere White is very hostile to Anna in this book, describing her memoir as full of "unconscious comedy" (p243). On p247 he even calls Anna an "ass", "grandiloquent" and "absurd" - which I take to mean that he feels very uncomfortable about her repeated assertion that Oscar Wilde had a feminine soul.

Oscar Wilde: Interviews and Recollections in two volumes. Editor E H Mikhail, published London and Basingstoke: Macmillan Press Ltd 1979. It reprints long extracts from Oscar Wilde and His Mother.

1912

One source has Anna going every day to lay flowers on Oscar Wilde's tomb.

Comment by Sally Davis: I've only found one reference to this: via newspaperarchive.com to the Oakland Tribune issue of 6 October 1912 p32. The context was an article on the controversy surrounding Epstein's sculpture for the tomb, commissioned by Robert Ross. I do think it's a bit excessive of Anna - flowers every day? She was not Oscar's widow, after all; and it's clear from her writings about the Wilde family that Oscar's persona, with its ambivalence of gender and sexuality, had made Anna feel very uncomfortable. Perhaps she felt bad about that, now he was safely dead.

Sources:

See www.poetsgraves.co.uk for a photo of Epstein's sculpture. In July 1909, Oscar's tomb had been moved to the Père Lachaise cemetery, where he's near Jim Morrison.

See wikipedia for Epstein.

CHRISTMAS 1912

Anna gave a copy of Oscar Wilde and his Mother to a friend, Anne O'Sullivan, as "the dearest and sweetest of all me dear and sweet wild Irish girls".

Comment by Sally Davis: that presentation copy is now in the collection of the State University of New York so I guess that Anne must have been American, perhaps someone Anna had met when she was living in New York City.

Source: Research Monograph volumes 21-23 issued State University of New York at Buffalo 1953; p12 item 61.

1913

Anna had four books published, including the script of her second play.

Sources. I can't find any publication details for these, nor any copies of any of them. They are listed in the 1922 The Literary Year Book as being Anna's work:

Beauty Boy.

Oscar Wilde and his Critics.

Adventures of a Yellow Cat.

Ishtar's Descent to the Land of No Return. While trying unsuccessfully to find a copy of this most intriguing work at the British Library, I did notice this: The Descent of Ishtar translated by Diana White. London: Eragny Press; New York: John Lane 1903. Perhaps Ms White's translation was what Anna used as the basis for her play.

MAY 1913 but not published

Anna sent a set of sonnets to Robert Ross, as a 'thank you' after he'd sent her some flowers.

Source:

Sonnets to Robert Baldwin Ross. Four leaves of manuscript, dated May 1913. Item 150 in Oscar Wilde and his Literary Circle: A Catalog of the Manuscripts and Letters in the William Andrews Clark Memorial Library. Compiled John Charles Finzi. Berkeley and Los Angeles: University of California Press 1957. Ref B836MIR825. Anna sent a note with the poems saying they were "inspired by his gift of lilies and golden iris reminiscent of his friend Oscar Wilde".

1914

Another set of poems by Anna was published.

Love Letters in Verse to a Musician. Printed in the USA and published in New York and London by D Appleton and Co.

Comment by Sally Davis: the poems were a selection from a much larger group of poems that Anna wrote at the rate of one every day, to Thuel Burnham during his first visit to London. On the book's (unnumbered) title page Anna described Burnham as a "faun of music", and her poems as the "tribute of one artistic soul to another".

I didn't find many sources for Thuel Burnham. He doesn't have a wikipedia page. At www.findagrave.com there was a photo of his tombstone in the Oak Memorial Gardens Charleston; with the dates 1875 (so he was young enough to be Anna's son) to 1961. Via google I saw several mentions of him in American music magazines, mostly as a piano teacher.

He was one of the musicians featured in Piano Mastery. Talks with Master Pianists and Teachers by Harriette Moore Brower. New York: Frederick A Stokes Co 1915. Brower describes him as a "musical thinker", prominent in Parisian musical life as a teacher; and known for his technique. You can see Brower's section on him at www.max.grenkowitz.net.

ALSO 1914

Anna's book The Healing Power of Music was published.

Comment by Sally Davis: this book is one of those whose publication details I haven't been able to find. It's listed as by Anna in the 1922 edition of The Literary Year Book p705.

WORLD WAR 1

Anna probably spent at least part of the War living in London. She had nothing more published until 1918 but that was probably more due to a shortage of paper and publishing infrastructure, than to a shortage of ideas. Wealth that she had built up after 1900 was lost due to the war. She was working on her last novel as the fighting and the air raids continued.

Sources for Anna's whereabouts for at least some of the war:

On p6 of her novel The Black Opal Anna mentions trying to forget "the war in the air over London". She was probably living in the flat in Earl's Court, where she died in 1922.

Also: from Anna's wikipedia page to fultonhistory.com, The Telegram published in Elmira New York State issue of 11 January 1920 page number wasn't visible. Short report dated London 10 January [1920] following the publication of The Black Opal: Woman of 70 Writes a Book. It describes Anna as having made and lost several fortunes in her life including one in shares which lost value drastically during WW1. The report describes Anna carrying on writing through a night of air raids, having refused to join her friends taking refuge in the Duchess of Marlborough's house which was being used as an ad hoc air-raid shelter. There's no indication in the report about where the information in it came from.

June 1918

Anna's novel The Black Opal was published - her last written work.

The Black Opal. London: Jarrolds. P6 dedication is dated "June 1918". There was a 2nd edition in 1919.

Advance publicity for it, with some details of Anna's life: via Anna's wikipedia page to fultonhistory.com, The Telegram published in Elmira New York State issue of 11 January 1920 page number wasn't visible. Short report dated London 10 January [1920] following the publication of The Black Opal: Woman of 70 Writes a Book. As if that was something extraordinary.

Comment by Sally Davis: skimming through Anna's last novel, the writing style does seem to be less florid than her previous books. As with The Lioness of Mayfair, she introduces an element of the occult into the book - an old man, fabulously wealthy, who lives in a vast basement, pretending to be an astronomer but really an alchemist and magician and take-over-the-world crackpot. He kidnaps the heroine and teaches her some of his occult knowledge. The central part of the book is the struggle between the magician and the heroine, whose attitude to the knowledge she's gaining seems rather ambivalent! In due course, the magician teaches the heroine to fly a monoplane - she flies over London in it. But she's been awaiting her opportunity, and when she gets it, she pushes him off a high building to his death. She is able to release her fiancé - the magician has been holding him prisoner. They destroy the magician's plans for world domination, and escape to live happily ever after.

Anna dedicated the book to the journalist and editor Hannen Swaffer. See his wikipedia page and he's also in ODNB.

A review of The Black Opal:

The Bookman volume 55 1918 p90 calling it "extraordinary...a combination of fantasy and realism".

LAST FEW YEARS OF ANNA'S LIFE

Two newspaper articles say Anna was very short of money and was living on the generosity of her friends. The League of British Artists was acting as her agent in arranging public appearances for her.

Information:

Via Anna's wikipedia page to fultonhistory.com, The Telegram published in Elmira New York State issue of 11 January 1920 page number wasn't visible. Short report dated London 10 January [1920] following the publication of The Black Opal: Woman of 70 Writes a Book. It's not clear where the information in the report came from.

Via //paperspast.natlib.govt.nz to Hawera and Normanby Star 30 December 1922 p9 item: Countess' missing Will: inherited two fortunes. The source of the report is an unnamed close friend of Anna. Better than no source at all I suppose.

Information on the League of British Artists, which seems to have been founded after the first World War:

The Librarian and Book World volume 14 p1925 p212 its offices were at 4 Fitzroy Square Bloomsbury.

The Publisher volume 122 1925 p9 it was run by a Mr Brown and a Mr Hedley-Drummond, and organised musical and literary evenings.

JUNE 1921

Anna hosted a musical soirée at the Steinway Hall.

Times 18 June 1921 p13 Court Circular column; events "To-day".

Comment by Sally Davis: I presume this was one of the paid appearances that the League of British Artists was organising for Anna.

JUNE 1922

Anna was one of the guests at a soirée held by the Anglo-French Club in Paris. The host was the Comte de Bourbon-Busset.

Source:

Times 27 June 1922 p7e report from the newspaper's Paris correspondent dated 26 June [1922].

AUTUMN 1922

Anna de Brémont died at her flat in an apartment block in Earl's Court. The League of British Artists organised a whip-round of its members to prevent her having to have a pauper's funeral. She was buried in the Roman Catholic section of Kensal Green cemetery.

Sources: freebmd; Probate Registry records on Ancestry.

W S Gilbert: Appearance and Reality by David Eden. Published Sir Arthur Sullivan Society 2009 p184. Rather ironic that a book on W S Gilbert should mention the whip-round.

AUTUMN 1922 AND POSSIBLY UNTIL MUCH LATER

Anna's friends searched the various London flats she'd lived in, trying to find a Will.

Via //paperspast.natlib.govt.nz to Hawera and Normanby Star 30 Dec 1922 p9 item: Countess' missing Will: inherited two fortunes; which the report said she had lost through "bad speculation", rather than bad luck. The report mentioned that "two old friends" of Anna were trying to find her Will. Neither of the friends was named, but perhaps they are the two men who were running the League of British Artists in 1925.

There's no record of a Will for Anna de Brémont at the Probate Registry. That's not to say that she never wrote one. It does suggest one or more of three things though: that she did never write a Will; that her friends never found it; or that they did find it, but the amount of money she had to leave fell below the point at which the Registry needed to make a record of it.

1929

One of the pieces Anna published in Sonnets and Love Poems (1892) was used as lyrics to a song called Love's Desire.

Source: Ms score for Love's Desire, now at the State Library of New South Wales and listed on worldcat under Raimund Pechotsch, Anna de Brémont and Charles Lullin. The words of the song are attributed to Lullin on the Ms. However, the diligent cataloguer at the Library has put a note on the Ms's catalogue entry saying that the words are probably Anna's.

BASIC SOURCES I USED for all Golden Dawn members.

Membership of the Golden Dawn: The Golden Dawn Companion by R A Gilbert. Northampton: The Aquarian Press 1986. Between pages 125 and 175, Gilbert lists the names, initiation dates and addresses of all those people who became members of the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn or its many daughter Orders between 1888 and 1914. The list is based on the Golden Dawn's administrative records and its Members' Roll - the large piece of parchment on which all new members signed their name at their initiation. All this information had been inherited by Gilbert but it's now in the Freemasons' Library at the United Grand Lodge of England building on Great Queen Street Covent Garden. Please note, though, that the records of the Amen-Ra Temple in Edinburgh were destroyed in 1900/01. I have recently (July 2014) discovered that some records of the Horus Temple at Bradford have survived, though most have not; however those that have survived are not yet accessible to the public.

For the history of the GD during the 1890s I usually use Ellic Howe's The Magicians of the Golden Dawn: A Documentary History of a Magical Order 1887-1923. Published Routledge and Kegan Paul 1972. Foreword by Gerald Yorke. Howe is a historian of printing rather than of magic; he also makes no claims to be a magician himself, or even an occultist. He has no axe to grind.

Family history: freebmd; ancestry.co.uk (census and probate); findmypast.co.uk; familysearch; Burke's Peerage and Baronetage; Burke's Landed Gentry; Armorial Families; thepeerage.com; and a wide variety of family trees on the web.

Famous-people sources: mostly about men, of course, but very useful even for the female members of GD. Oxford Dictionary of National Biography. Who Was Who. Times Digital Archive.

Useful source for business and legal information: London Gazette and its Scottish counterpart Edinburgh Gazette. Now easy to find (with the right search information) on the web.

Catalogues: British Library; Freemasons' Library.

Wikipedia; Google; Google Books - my three best resources. I also used other web pages, but with some caution, as - from the historian's point of view - they vary in quality a great deal.

28 March 2016

Email me at

Find the web pages of Roger Wright and Sally Davis, including my list of people initiated into the Order of the Golden Dawn between 1888 and 1901, at:

www.wrightanddavis.co.uk

***

Vyvyan Edward John DENT was initiated into the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn in November 1896, at its Isis-Urania temple in London, taking the Latin motto 'Migrabo'. He progressed very rapidly through the necessary study and exams, and was initiated into the inner, Second Order in January 1898. However, he was unable to make any sustained contribution to the Golden Dawn's meetings and rituals because he lived in China.

THE DENTs - WESTMORELAND AND THE FAR EAST

By the 19th century the Dent family had been farmers in Westmoreland for generations, leasing land at Maulds Meaburn and Crosby Ravensworth. Farming in so remote an area was a hard life, and since the 17th century at least, there had been a family tradition of younger sons leaving the farm (which they wouldn't inherit anyway) and going into trade in India. Four of the younger sons in the 1780s and 1790s generation of Dents were particularly lucky: they went out to India and China in the years after Waterloo, with Britain left ruling the waves and the Chinese empire weakening. They got in with a group of men, the future founders of Magniacs, Jardine Matheson, Baring Brothers bank and the Hong Kong and Shanghai Banking Corporation - rivals, friends and in-laws, all trading between Britain, India and China.

The four Dent brothers didn't all work together: Thomas and Lancelot ran the company best known as Dent and Co; William traded alone, and moved into English railway finance; and Robert worked first on his own, then with some partners none of whom were Dents. Opium into China and tea and silk out again - you'd think that it couldn't fail; but businesses involving the Dents had a tendency to go bankrupt down the years, in a welter of legal cases and disputed Wills which meant the Dents never kept as much money as they had made.

Vyvyan Dent was a grandson of two of the four brothers; and his father, Henry William Dent, had worked for two more of them.

Vyvyan Dent's father's father: ROBERT DENT

Robert was the eldest of the brothers Dent, born in Maulds Meaburn in September 1893, and should have inherited the family farm. It seems, though, as if he didn't want to take up that burden. The writer of the Stepneyrobarts family history website thinks that - despite the lack of evidence for this - Robert must have gone into the India trade, and at a very young age, because in 1820 he spent £30,000 buying himself a partnership in Rickards, Mackintosh, Law and Co, which went through a variety of names in the 1820s but always described itself as a 'general agent'. I agree with the Stepneyrobarts writer - you wouldn't have got that kind of money out of farming in Westmoreland. Rickards Mackintosh (as it was by 1830) specialised in making deals for goods and money transfer between India and Britain. It went bankrupt in 1833, owing eye-watering sums not only to traders but also to individuals. Around the time that the partnership was beginning to unravel, Robert also tried his hand at investing on a different continent, buying a copper mine on the border between Venezuela and Colombia. Like many an investment in 19th century South America, especially in unseen mines, it promised far more than it delivered; though the land remained in the family until 1866.

Law suits about money owed by Rickards Mackintosh were still being fought in 1839 and the fact that the firm was struggling shortened several of its partners' lives: one of them, William Fulton, died in 1830 - perhaps his hand had steadied the tiller; Robert Rickards died in 1836; and Robert Dent died in 1835 with his youngest child, Henry William, only a year old.

Vyvyan Dent's mother's father: WILLIAM DENT

I haven't found out much about this particular William Dent. William is a common fore-name in the clan and it's been hard to identify this one amongst all of them. He was youngest of the four trading brothers, born in 1798. Like the three older ones, he was involved in trading between Britain and the East. However, unlike the others he seems to have concentrated on India rather than moved into Hong Kong or China, and I think he never went into partnership with anyone, at least until he came back to England. I haven't been able to find any details of his marriage to Mary, and I don't know her surname. I hazard that they married in India. They were still living in India in the late 1830s and both their daughters were born there, Catherine in 1833 or thereabouts, and Emma Sabine in 1839. By the early 1850s William had brought his family back to England. By this time William was a seriously wealthy man. He was still involved in trade with India and was living in St Pancras parish near where Euston Station is now. By the end of the decade, though, he had moved out of London to Bickley Park (at that time in Kent) and perhaps he had retired, because in 1861 he described himself to the census official as a landowner and magistrate, not as a businessman. He was still involved in one business project however: he was the prime mover behind the district's first railway, the Mid-Kent Railway which ran from Bromley to St Mary Cray; he became the railway company's first chairman. He could still afford to pay a butler, a housekeeper as well as a cook, two housemaids, a kitchen maid and a lady's maid to tend his wife. Both his and Mary's daughters had married in the mid-1850s. Catherine married George Welstead Colledge, who worked for the Indian Civil Service; and Emma Sabine married Henry William Dent.

Vyvyan Dent's father HENRY WILLIAM DENT

Henry William Dent, always called Harry, was the youngest child of Robert Dent and his wife Charlotte. He was born in Mitcham Surrey on 7 February 1834. After his father's death his mother moved back into London for a few years, to the area just north of Regent's Park. In the 1840s she lived in Blackheath, and then she moved out of town again to Kent, where she died in September 1861. She tried to leave her money to Harry and his older brother Thomas but I'm not sure how much they actually saw of it, as so much of her inheritance from both her husbands was tied up in 'Jarndyce-versus-Jarndyce' law suits.

As he happened to be at school on the day of the 1851 census I know that Henry William Dent attended Rev Edward Selwyn's school in Victoria Terrace Lee in Kent. It was inevitable, I suppose, that on leaving school Henry William would follow the family trend and go East. However, he didn't go as a trader, he joined the Bengal Civil Service. It must have been during his years as a civil servant in India that he qualified as a barrister - I haven't been able to find out when he passed his exams or which inn of court he became a member of; and I'm not sure he ever practised law, either in Britain or anywhere else. I just haven't been able to find any information on that side of his life.

First cousins Henry William Dent and Emma Sabine Dent married each other on 10 July 1856 in Bromley and went, probably almost at once, to set up as a couple in Calcutta, where their elder son, Ernest William, was born in April 1857.

It's possible that Henry William Dent became a barrister in order to work for his uncles in the family firm. Either that, or the idea of having a barrister on the staff - moreover, one who was closely related to you - appealed to Thomas and Lancelot Dent. One way or the other, in 1859 Henry William Dent left the Indian civil service and went to work for Dent and Co as the senior employee in the firm's Shanghai office. He quickly established himself amongst the English community there, becoming a consul, getting involved in the syndicate that set up Shanghai's second race course (though that was soon bought out by a more ambitious scheme), and being elected one of the first chairmen of the Hongkong and Shanghai Banking Corporation. Long separations were part of the territory for families where the breadwinner earned his crust in the Empire, and on the day of the 1861 census Henry William was in China while Emma Sabine and Ernest William were staying with her parents in Bickley. Emma Sabine may have made the trip to England to leave her son with his grandparents while he went to school - although he seems rather young for that, aged only four. On the other hand, maybe he was ill: after this one appearance on the census he disappears from history. With or without Ernest William, Emma Sabine returned to Shanghai and died there in 1863, a year after the birth of her second son.

VYVYAN DENT

Vyvyan Edward John Dent was born in May 1862 in the Dent hong in Shanghai. What's a 'hong'? Used in this kind of context, the Chinese word means a warehouse. As I'm sure that the Dent family didn't live on the top floor above the firm's tea and opium cargoes, I think of it as something more like a compound, with a warehouse but also living quarters standing in their own grounds. Even at this early period, some western residents of Shanghai were building homes on a grand scale. The most interesting thing about the Dent hong is that it was not in the British concession in the city, it was in the French one, on the corner of what were then the Avenue du Roi Albert (which I think is now Nanlu Shanxi) and Route Vallon (now Nanchang Lu). The property was still owned by the Dent family in the 1930s.

I do think Vyvyan's early years must have been rather lonely: with his mother dead, his father with his own problems, and living thousands of miles from other family members, the child's closest ties may have been with his nursemaid, who was almost certainly Chinese. His future life was also diverted from whatever his parents had planned for him by Dent and Co's bankruptcy, which happened when he was four. A new Dent and Co was set up some years afterwards, by Vyvyan's cousin Alfred (a younger son of Thomas Dent); but Vyvyan never worked for the family firm. Of course, he may not have wanted to! Henry William Dent seems to have stayed on in Shanghai for a short time after Dent and Co's collapse, perhaps trying to sort out the mess, but then he returned to England and lived in London from the early 1870s until his death. On the day of the 1871 census, Vyvyan was living with his grandparents, William Dent and Mary, who had moved to 7 Palace Road Surbiton Park. William Dent was still able to employ a butler, cook, kitchenmaid, housemaid and a nursemaid for Vyvyan, so life was comfortable enough. However, it was an elderly household, with both his grandparents over 70. They both died in 1877, while Vyvyan was at school.

The old East India College where Henry William Dent most probably went to be prepared for the Bengal civil service had closed down as part of the changes that were made in the wake of the Indian Mutiny. Haileybury School had been founded on the old College site, in 1864. Vyvyan Dent spent three years at Haileybury, from 1875 to 1878; he then went to the Realschule in Cassel in Germany, and also spent some time in France. Such an education, adding German and French to the English and Mandarin Chinese he already knew, would have been a good preparation for a job with Dent and Co in Shanghai. They were also a sound basis for the completely different kind of career Vyvyan chose. Whereas you can view Dent and Co, Jardine Matheson and others as poachers, Vyvyan opted to be a gamekeeper instead: he joined the Chinese Imperial Maritime Customs department in 1882 and remained on its staff until his retirement, with the rank of Commissioner, in 1916.

The Chinese Imperial Customs department had been set up in 1854. It was run from Peking by the imperial government, but most of its senior staff were foreigners; the first two of its inspector-generals were English. For most of Vyvyan's career the inspector-general was Robert Hart, who expected sophisticated use of the Chinese language and high standards of both expertise and morality from his juniors. The department had been founded to ensure the government was able to collect its taxes but it soon diversified into a range of allied fields, everything from harbour management, customs and excise collection, financial record-keeping and loan negotiation. By the time Vyvyan reached the summit of his career in the department its bureaucracy was gigantic, with 738 British employees, 170 German ones and 12,389 Chinese. A typical career for a European employee involved short periods of time in a number of towns in your early years, leading (hopefully) to promotion to posts at the headquarters (Peking, where the inspector-general was based) and in the most important office (Shanghai, where the inspector-general's immediate deputy worked) as you became more senior and experienced. Pay was always a problem, because the actual amount you received in any year was linked to the fluctuating price of silver. To make matters worse, at their retirement employees would not get a departmental pension; they had to save up for an annuity themselves out of their unpredictable pay. For these reasons, employees tended not to take the generous periods of leave they were entitled to - for example, two full years (admittedly on half-pay) for every 10 years worked.

All Vyvyan's postings were in the area of China which spoke Mandarin Chinese. He began his working life with a spell at Hankow; he was based at the port of Chefoo (now Yantai) during the first Sino-Japanese war (1894-95) which the Chinese essentially lost; then he went to Kiukiang; then to Foochow; then on to head office in Peking; and finally, by 1908, to the Shanghai offices in the Customs House on the Bund - a very English-looking tudorbethan building with a Big-Ben style clock - as Acting Deputy Commissioner with responsibility for outdoor goods, bonding, and returns. Here's a bit more information on the cities in which Vyvyan worked, and what they are called in modern Chinese usage:

- Hankow is now Hankou but no longer exists, being one of three towns merged to make the modern metropolis Wuhan. Wuhan is in Hubei province at the confluence of the rivers Han and Yantze.
- Chefoo is what foreign residents of China called the town the Chinese know as Yantai, one of the ports set up by the Treaty of Nanking. It is in Shandong province, north of Shanghai, and in Vyvyan's time was a centre of the silk trade. There was a strong German presence in the town and later the whole province was ruled by Germany. Chefoo did not have a foreign concession area as such, and social amenities for Europeans were rather thin on the ground.
- Kiukiang is now Jiujang. It's a town on the Yangtze river in Jiangxi province and was a treaty port from 1862. It is situated in an important rice-growing area and rice was one of its main exports. In Vyvyan's time there were also two, Russian-operated factories making brick tea for the Russian market. Kiukiang was a centre of the opium trade; I wonder what Vyvyan thought of that?
- Foochow is now Fuzhou. It's in Fujian province. During the 18th century Foochow had been the centre of tea exports to Europe but by Vyvyan's time this trade had been largely replaced by exports of camphor and lacquer-ware goods. The town was an important centre of Protestant missionary work - something Vyvyan would have had little sympathy with. Unlike Chefoo, Foochow had a proper European concession area and social life was sophisticated, with a race course, a Club, a freemasons' lodge and facilities for sports; there was even an English-language newspaper.

In 1892, during his period working in Chefoo, Vyvyan married Ada Battinson. The marriage took place in Shanghai Cathedral, which made me think that Ada came from a family based in China. Not so, however. Ada had grown up in London and Vyvyan had probably known her since they were both teenagers, as her family lived very close to Henry William Dent's home in Talgarth Road West Kensington. The Battinson family came from Halifax and Ada's father Isaac drew his income from several patents he had been granted for improved machinery to comb wool, linen and other cloth. Ada and Vyvyan had one child, Robert Vyvyan, born in Chefoo in 1893.

I wonder whether Vyvyan had any qualms about marrying Ada and taking her - an Englishwoman with no experience of the far east at all - to China in the 1890s? He was not to know, I suppose, that the Qing dynasty's end (the last emperor abdicated in 1912) was going to be followed by ever-more-violent and politically partisan fighting for control of the power vacuum that was being created; which only finally ended in 1949. Although I think that Vyvyan's promotion to Peking probably came too late for it, he and Ada may have been living in Peking in 1900, when the city's foreign residents were besieged in their residential quarter during the Boxer rebellion. Shanghai, his last promotion, was safer, at least up to the 1920s, being tantamount to a foreign city in China. Vyvyan's time there will have been a very busy one, as Shanghai was the point at which money and goods flowed into China during the economic boom which followed concessions made by the dowager empress (China's de facto ruler at the time) in 1900.

Vyvyan and Ada seem to have led a life very similar to any other foreign couple living in Shanghai between 1900 and 1930, one based around very western-style leisure and venues - clubs, tennis, the race-course, dinners, charity concerts... Almost like being in England; or the USA - baseball teams started to visit Shanghai before the first World War. The friendships of most foreign residents would be made through work, and wouldn't involve the city's Chinese residents at all; though Vyvyan also sought out the few foreigners in Shanghai who shared his interest in Chinese history and religion.

One of the things that had brought Vyvyan and Ada together was a shared delight in music and they were both accomplished musicians. Ada sang well enough, and was brave enough, to do it in public at charity concerts, though she was never professional; and Vyvyan had several musical compositions published (I haven't been able to find out anything about these unfortunately). Ada must also have been a notable hostess, as Vyvyan had already gained a reputation for hospitality and for the large number and variety of his friends. Many of these friends were Chinese - I'm not sure how common that was, amongst Europeans living in China at that time. Some of Vyvyan's interests also set him at a distance from the more imperially-minded members of China's English community, and (although the writer of the obituary I found was discreet about it) Vyvyan does seem to have had a reputation as an eccentric. His collection of china probably didn't raise many eyebrows, but Vyvyan was also interested in Tibetan tantric buddhism and collected objects connected with that, which were exhibited at the Liège World Exhibition in 1905 and also at the Louisiana Purchase Exposition of April-December 1904, better known as the St Louis World's Fair (of 'Meet Me in St Louis' fame). The writer of Vyvyan's obituary described his religious views as more Confucian than Christian, and he visited Chinese temples - not something many European residents were prepared to do. He was also interested in the sexual-psychological basis of mythology and folklore, and in the occult, though he was sceptical about the genuine-ness of spirit manifestations and the like.

Between 1896 and 1898, Vyvyan and his family were living in Brunswick Square Bloomsbury, on a two-year spell of leave. Henry William Dent had died late in 1893 and Vyvyan may have needed to make a trip to Europe to help wind up the estate. Robert Vyvyan would also have been able to meet his Battinson grandparents for the first time. Vyvyan had brought with him some of his collection of Chinese artefacts, and during his stay he donated a set of four silver and enamel lucky charms to the British Museum. He had also brought some seeds of the Chefoo lantern creeper, which he sent to the Royal Botanic Gardens at Kew.

It was during this long leave that Vyvyan was initiated into the Golden Dawn. Who recommended him? There are several possibilities. One goes back as far as Bromley, where not only William Dent was living in the 1860s but also his brother Thomas, of Dent and Co. Bromley's social round at that time will have included William Farr and his family. Two of William Farr's daughters were later members of the Golden Dawn. It's possible, too, that both the Dent brothers knew relations of Mrs Farr from their time in the far east: her surname before her marriage had been Whittal; and a man called Whittal was known to Henry William Dent in Shanghai. So that's one possibility. Another is that Ada Dent knew people in the Golden Dawn from her pre-marriage days in Fulham; several Golden Dawn members lived there. I'm not so keen on that as a route, because Ada was never in the Golden Dawn herself. It's more likely that Vyvyan Dent was introduced to the GD through freemasonry, a good source of GD members, though more in its first two years than later. I haven't found any evidence that Vyvyan was an active freemason in England - he hardly had any time to be, after all; but he may have been a freemason in China (impossible to find anything out about that) and during a period of leave in 1886 he went (as a visitor) to a meeting of the lodge Quatuor Coronati number 2076. William Wynne Westcott was a member of QC2076 and Samuel Mathers often attended the meetings as a guest. The symbolism of freemasonry was a common topic for talks at QC2076 meetings. A shared interest in the subject may have led to a chat between Westcott and Vyvyan after the formal part of the meeting was over; and they may have kept in touch in the following years.

VYVYAN'S LATER LIFE

For most Europeans employed in the far east, retirement meant packing up and returning home. However, in Vyvyan Dent's case things were not that simple. He retired 1916, when Europe was two years into the supposed war to end all wars, so the time was not auspicious for starting again in England. In addition, there were financial reasons for staying - I've mentioned above the financial problems that working for the Chinese Maritime Customs department could give its employees when their careers were over. On the other hand, the struggles of the various factions to take control of China's ex-empire showed no signs of reaching any conclusion. I think, though, that Vyvyan never considered the option of going home. Robert Vyvyan was working in Shanghai. And any annuity Vyvyan had saved up for, would stretch a lot further in China than in England. I think, too, that for Vyvyan, England wasn't 'home', he was more at home in China, where he had spent most of his life. He opted to stay in Shanghai.

Vyvyan Dent died, in Shanghai, on 20 February 1929. Ada and Robert Vyvyan stayed in China until some time in the late 1930s. By that time an invading army from Japan was in control of some parts of China; and the Communist Party, led by Mao Zedong who'd risen to prominence in 1934, were looking increasingly likely to step into the power vacuum if only the Japanese could be ousted. Ada died in Surrey in 1940.

**

BASIC SOURCES I USED for all Golden Dawn members.

Membership of the Golden Dawn: The Golden Dawn Companion by R A Gilbert. Northampton: The Aquarian Press 1986. Between pages 125 and 175, Gilbert lists the names, initiation dates and addresses of all those people who became members of the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn or its many daughter Orders between 1888 and 1914. The list is based on the Golden Dawn's administrative records and its Members' Roll - the large piece of parchment on which all new members signed their name at their initiation. All this information had been inherited by Gilbert but it's now in the Freemasons' Library at the United Grand Lodge of England building on Great Queen Street Covent Garden.

Family history: freebmd; ancestry.co.uk (census and probate); findmypast.co.uk; familysearch; Burke's Peerage and Baronetage; Burke's Landed Gentry; Armorial Families; thepeerage.com; and a wide variety of family trees on the web.

Famous-people sources: mostly about men, of course, but very useful even for the female members of GD. Oxford Dictionary of National Biography. Who Was Who. Times Digital Archive.

Catalogues: British Library; Freemasons' Library.

Wikipedia; Google; Google Books - my three best resources. I also used other web pages, but with some caution, as - from the historian's point of view - they vary in quality a great deal.

SOURCES FOR VYVYAN DENT

THE rest of the DENTS

Before I start, a note about the website www.stepneyrobarts.co.uk. I drew heavily on this site for my history of the Dents and their doings. It was a well-researched site, clearly based on original documents, family and otherwise. However, by January 2014 it had disappeared completely from the web and I couldn't find all the information that was on it at any other website. A dreadful loss. I can only suggest that anyone wanting to try to find out more about particular members of the Dent family, or Charlotte Lloyd Robarts, should google their names and see what comes up.

Dent and Co

Oxford Dictionary of National Biography Vol 15 p841 lamented the lack of information on the Dent family of Hong Kong and Shanghai, especially compared to the amount of archives relating to (for example) Jardine Matheson. However ODNB did give some basic information on the brothers who founded the firm last-known as Dent and Co: Thomas Dent who died in 1872 but had returned to live in England long before; and Lancelot, who joined him in the 1820s. P842 after the collapse of the original firm, Thomas' 3rd son Alfred (1844-1927) began again, becoming head of the renamed Dent Brothers and Co and chair of many other industrial and financial concerns. Oxford DNB is now (January 2014) online at www.oxforddnb.com;; when I searched using "William Dent" "Jane Wilkinson", I was able to go straight to the right page..

-

Wikipedia on Dent and Co, which the article saw as the third of the 3 original Canton-based companies who moved first to Hong Kong and then opened up in Shanghai as well; the other 2 being Jardine Matheson, and Russell and Co. The firm had had several names before being called Dent and Co.

The first Dent, Thomas, went out to Canton/Guangzhou 1823 as partner in Davidson and Co. Davidson left the partnership 1824; it was reformed as Dent and Co 1826. The next Dent, Lancelot, went out to join Thomas, and when Thomas left 1831 became senior partner, still based in the East. An arrest warrant issued by the Chinese Imperial authorities in 1839 for Lancelot, for opium smuggling, began the Opium Wars. Lancelot and T C Beale worked as partners in the firm 1840-57, it being known during those years as Dent Beale and Co; then Beale left, and Lancelot carried on with the firm as Dent and Co. The firm moved its HQ from Canton/Guangzhou to Victoria Hong Kong in 1841. It was then one of the first companies to set up in Shanghai, starting there 1843 at 14 The Bund and exporting silk and tea. (Addition 17 Oct 2012 by S A Davis: most sources on Dent and Co skip lightly over the fact that what they were importing into China was opium.)

Lancelot Dent was one of the committee of Far Eastern businessmen which founded the firm that became the Hong Kong and Shanghai Banking Corporation, in March 1865. The collapse of Dent and Co began with a run on the bank Overend Gurney and Co which spread to other banks. Dent and Co had to shut its Hong Kong office in 1866 before ceasing trading in 1867.

-

A Legacy of Opium by Douglas Fraser. Tenby Heritage Pubns 2010 p5 by 1831 the firm that would become Jardine Matheson, and Dent & Co, did 2/3 of non-government trade between Britain and China. At this time all such trade went through Canton, the only Chinese port open to foreign shipping. P20 in the 1830s Dent & Co was one of several British enterprises carrying on a completely illegal trade in opium along the Chinese coast. P23 the company undercut their British trade rivals and reneged on a price-fixing agreement reached with them (about opium) so they were neither liked nor trusted by other trading companies.

-

From elsewhere on wikipedia, 2 dates of importance in the history of Dent and Co, Jardine Matheson and other far eastern businesses:

- 1834: the year that the East India Company lost its monopoly of British trade with China
- 1842: date of the Treaty of Nanking, which ended the opium wars and made concessions very important to British traders: the cession of the island now called Hong Kong to the British; and permission to create five treaty ports on Chinese territory.

Dent and Co's collapse doesn't seem to have worried the Times very much:

Times Thur 8 November 1866: the Money Market and City Intelligence that day was the first time the Times had mentioned that something was wrong at Dent & Co. The report contained one small paragraph saying that Dent Palmer and Co (a completely separate business from Dent & Co) had refused "yes" to take any more draughts on "Messrs Dent and Co., of China". An even shorter note in Times Fri 9 November 1866 p6 Money Markets and City Intelligence says that the draughts refused were to a value of £30,000.

Times Sat 10 November 1866 State of Trade noted that the failure of Dent and Co was being "reported" quite widely, though it gave no further details. The report was more concerned that the firm's failure was adding to the atmosphere of gloom in the City but it tried to reassure readers by saying that relatively few British companies had been affected by it. In saying that, the Times demonstrated how out of touch it was with how the failure was being felt elsewhere: Times Sat 12 January 1867 p7 item State of Trade was a report from a correspondent in Manchester that people there were worried about affect of the "failure of Dent and Co" on local businesses dealing with China.

Times Thur 15 August 1867 p7 a letter to the business column was talking about the difficulty of getting money owed, out of the wreckage of Dent and Co.

Family history of the Dent brothers, composed 2011 from two web pages: Stepneyrobarts and //parsonsfamily.blogware.com/indiI, neither of which can now (January 2014) be reached. The information held at //parsonsfamily.blogware is still on the web. I eventually found it by googling "Thomas DENT 1796-1872"; amongst the responses was a web page beginning archive.is/D121 and when I clicked on that I found a page with a reference to parsonsfamily.blogware. The Dent brothers are all children of William Dent (1762-1801) of Trainlands, county Westmoreland and his wife Jane née Wilkinson:

Robert Dent 1793-1835 who married Charlotte Robarts née Lloyd.

John Dent 1795-1845; neither website knew who he had married but his children were

John DOB unknown

Robert Cecil born 1826.

Thomas Dent 1796-1872, of Dent and Co. He married Sabine Ellen Robarts and had a large family: 4 daughters and 8 sons including Alfred.

William Dent 1798-1877 (see below) father of Emma Sabine Dent.

Lancelot Dent 1799-1853, Thomas Dent's partner in Dent and Co; he died unmarried.

Wilkinson Dent 1800-86 died unmarried.

Documents now held at the Cumbria Record Office indicate that there was also a sister, Elizabeth Dent, who died unmarried in 1847. Wilkinson Dent took over the farm on her death.

ROBERT DENT was never a partner in Dent & Co

The ex-website

www.stepneyrobarts.co.uk/149858.htm looked at Robert Dent's life from the point of view of his wife Charlotte Robarts, née Lloyd and her life as the widow of two men who'd made money and lost it in trading ventures in the Far East. It had specific birth data for Robert Dent: 21 September 1793 in Maulds Meaburn Westmoreland.

Charlotte's dates were c1793-1861. Her first marriage was to James Thomas Robarts (1784-1825) who'd worked for the East India Company in Macão and Canton. Charlotte Robarts' 2nd marriage, to Robert Dent, took place in 1826 in St Pancras old church. For most of their married life they lived at Mitcham House, Mitcham Surrey. Their children were:

Charlotte Dent born 1828

Thomas Wilkinson Dent born and died 1829

a second Thomas Wilkinson John Dent born 1830

Robert Wilkinson Dent born 1832, who died in India

Henry William Dent, Vyvyan's father, born 7 February 1834 in Mitcham.

Robert Dent died in 1835. Charlotte Dent lived north of Regent's Park for a few years before moving to Lee Terrace Blackheath in the 1840s. She died in 1861; her money was left principally to her sons by Dent, Thomas and Henry William, who was known as Harry.

Stepneyrobarts listed the partners in Rickards Mackintosh Law and Co, traders between London, India and China, as: Robert Rickards; Eneas Mackintosh the uncle of James Matheson; James Law; and John Williamson Fulton. The company's London offices were at 15 Bishopsgate. Robert Dent also invested in land in Venezuela. It had a copper mine on it but the venture failed.

Evidence to back up Stepneyrobarts about Robert Dent's venture in South America. Amongst papers held at Cumbria Record Office in Kendal there are:

- letters to Robert Dent 1831-32 from Brian Adams in Caracas about mines in Venezuela
- details of the sale of the Bolívar estate to the Quebrada Railway and Mining Co in January 1866.

The collapse of Rickards Mackintosh:

Asiatic Journal and Monthly Register volume 17 1835 p211 in the middle of long article detailing the financial mess the collapse of the company had left behind it, mention of the first meeting held by the company's creditors, on 17 May 1833, and a reference to its owing over £1million.

I found a reference on the web (whose details I've now lost) saying Rickards' dates are 1769-1836.

The Legal Observer volume 18 1839 p123: article on cases involving money owed by Rickards Mackintosh in London, which have still not been resolved. Many private citizens were owed money because they had used the firm as a bank when moving money from Calcutta to Britain. It was Mackintosh and Co c 1819-20; then Rickards Mackintosh and Co, general agents, from 1823. Fulton was a partner in it from 1823 until his death in January 1830.

WILLIAM DENT 1798-1877 brother of Thomas, Lancelot and Robert:

Marriage of Katherine Mary (registered a second time, as Catherine Mary) Dent to George Welstead Colledge registered Cheltenham Jan-March quarter 1854. Allen's Indian Mail vol 9 1851 p466 list of 8 men who'd passed the September exams to enter into the East India College next term included George Welstead Colledge.

Via web: www.londongardensonline.org.uk item on St George's churchyard Bickley. The church had been built 1863-65 on land formerly owned by William Dent "chairman of the Mid-Kent Railway Co".

Via googlebooks: The Economy of Kent 1640-1914 by Alan Armstrong 1995; p224 says that William Dent had been the prime mover in getting the company that built the Mid-Kent railway started. At its Bickley/Bromley end, it ran from the station called Mason's Hill which opened in 1858.

London Gazette 27 November 1857 p4152 announcement required by the the Mid Kent Railway (Bromley to St Mary Cray) Act 1856, giving details of the route the new railway would follow. The railway would go across land currently owned by William Dent "of Bickley Park".

HENRY WILLIAM DENT son of Robert Dent and wife Charlotte:

Allen's Indian Mail 1856 issue of 18 July 1856 Marris p436 incl Henry William Dent of the Bengal Civil Service to Emma Sabine Dent daughter of William Dent of Bickley; on "July 10" [1856]. The same details appeared in the Times Mon 14 July 1856 p1a.

