

Religion and the School. By Emil Carl Wilm. New York and Cincinnati, The Abingdon Press. 35 cts net.

This is an essay of 52 small pages upon a view of religious education which is treated at length in the author's "The Problem of Religion" and "The Culture of Religion".

There is a discussion of the moral and religious possibilities in the teaching of the sciences, the humanities, physical and moral training, and in the discipline of a school. There is very brief mention of the Bible as a part of a school curriculum and of the recent plans for giving credit in the schools for Bible study done in the Sunday school.

The Master Quest. By Will Scranton Woodhull. New York and Cincinnati, 1918, The Abingdon Press. 186 pp. 75 cts. net.

An eloquent, popular, modern argument for the reality of Christian truth and its inspiration to man in his quest of greatness. "The end of the quest in all things is God." "Nor is there satisfaction for the aspirations of man this side of Him." "And the continuance of the quest is God also. For all things lose their significance if God be denied." Such is the theme of the six lectures. They are full of epigram and of inspiration.

African Missionary Heroes and Heroines. By H. K. W. Kumm, Author of "From Hausaland to Egypt", "The Lands of Ethiopia", "Tribes of the Valley", "The National Economy of Nubia", "The Sudan". New York, 1917, The Macmillan Company. xvii-|-215 pp. $1.25.

This volume comprises a course of six lectures to the College of Missions at Indianapolis. Each lecture deals with two subjects. The result is a full dozen biographical sketches with inspiring, practical application and exhortation based on the facts of the life under review. The style is popular and impressionistic. Not always strictly accurate, the accounts touch on the main features of life and service of each hero and heroine in such a way as to awaken enthusiasm for their character, sacrifice and service.

It is a splendid volume for use in connection with various missionary meetings. Africa affords a fine roll of the noblest missionaries.

Maps, chronological tables, bibliographies, and an index add to the value of the volume. W. O. CARVER.

Russia in Transformation. By Arthur Judson Brown, Author of "Unity and Missions", "The Foreign Missionary", "New Forces in Old China", etc., etc. New York, 1917, Fleming H. Revell Company. 190 pp. $1.00 net.

For the many who want a quick, general view of Russian conditions up to the middle of 1917, this will prove a very valuable book. It is not to be commended for exhaustive analysis of detailed facts and features of Russian forces that are producing the transformation. The author, like many others, was entirely too optimistic about Russia, as current developments abundantly bear witness.

The ten chapters give us, for the most part, very clear pictures and outlines of political, religious, economic and social features of the decadent and the emergent orders in that unhappy country.

The author is most fully in sympathy with the general socialistic ideals. He has allowed his optimism to blind him, at least partially, to some of the more serious aspects of the unrest there, and of the ignorance of the masses. Russia is yet a very long way from an orderly democracy. If they had but been far enough along to see the day of their visitation they were within sight of realizing the long dream of the more enlightened that Russia should be admitted to the commerce of the world on a basis of freedom and hope. Blind leaders of the blind have plunged the whole mass into the ditch, to be delivered who can guess when? It is a pitiable spectacle. The average man will find this book helping him to understand the better elements of the present situation. The thoroughly informed man will not find it dull. W. O. CARVER.

Here is a running story of science in its various phases from that of early civilization down to the beginning of the twentieth century. Science ought to hold a fascination for every preacher. In this time
