

The book is eminently worthy of serious consideration. The author's premises, I think, are too narrow; but in the main his conclusions cannot be successfully controverted.

C. S. GARDNER.

Evangelism and Social Service. By John Marvin Dean, Minister of the Second Baptist Church of Chicago, and of the Settlement work of that church at Aiken Institute. With an Introduction by Clarence A. Barbour, Mr. Dean's Colleague in the Men and Religion Continental Campaign. Philadelphia, Griffith & Rowland Press; 1913. 71 pages. 25 cents net.

Attention has been strongly directed of late to the relation of evangelism to social service. Shall the new and just emphasis upon the latter lead to the neglect of the former? How can they be properly related to each other? Mr. Dean discusses this problem well. He shows that there is not only no inconsistency between them, but that each is needed to supplement the other. What evangelism needs to give it more depth and meaning and a stronger appeal to the practical minds of this age is to be correlated with social service. And this also will give more sanity and spirituality to social service.

C. S. GARDNER.

2. PEDAGOGY.

The Religious Development of the Child. An Evangelical Study from the Scientific Viewpoint. By Rufus Washington Weaver, M.A., Th.D., D.D. New York, 1913. Fleming H. Revell Company. 274 pages. $1.25 net.

Many thoughtful students of religious psychology will be grateful to Dr. Weaver for his clear and vigorous treatment of such a persistently vital theme as the Religious Development of the Child. It is a healthy sign of the times when a busy, scholarly pastor will devote sufficient time and thought to the psychological and scientific aspects of the unfolding of personality to enable him to produce a volume that easily ranks among the ablest treatises dealing with similar topics. While thoroughly