

to Jesus and a high conception of the worth of human nature, led to the complete rejection of the trinitarian idea of the term "Son of God" (p. 136). This is not a just appeal. Those Anabaptists were not Baptists. There are some Unitarian Baptists to-day in England, but they are not allowed in the Baptist Union. The author tells of the "deep satisfaction" (p. 233) that he has in coming "to the conviction that Jesus of Nazareth actually existed."

I conclude this review with the remark that the tone of the book is one of insufferable dogmatism and intolerance.

The Letters of Christ.

By Charles Brown, Minister of Ferme Park Baptist Church, Hornsey, London. James Clarke & Co., 13 and 14 Fleet St., London.

The author treats the letters of Rev. II. and III. as actual letters of the glorified Christ and the churches, and as one reads he feels that there is no other adequate source. Mr. Brown writes in the full light of present-day scholarship with much spiritual insight and teaching skill. The divine "goodness and severity," as revealed in these sternly gracious messages of Christ, are brought out with great clearness and force.

Perhaps there is no one thing the churches need more at this time than to take heed to these letters and "hear what the Spirit saith." Mr. Brown's little book should help us all so to do, for it breathes the spirit of faithfulness and tenderness in which such searching messages should be given.
