Executive Summary

The mapping document is part of Task 3.1. of Work Package 3—“Authors and Performers”, titled “Perspective of Creators and performing Artists on Digitization, Copyright and the Digital Single Market”. The objective of this document is to address the income development of authors and performers and their experience with digitization and copyright reversal. The task is divided into two parts. Part 1 provides an overview of the existing literature with regards to income/earnings of authors and performers, their experience with digital platforms and AI as well as the effects of Covid. Part 2 of the document reviews all provisions in EU countries for reverting rights to authors and performers, a potential legal lever for increasing income.

In Part 1 our focus was to understand existing theoretical and empirical research on authors and performers. We provide an overview of notable studies from various countries over the last 40 years and identify how authors and performers struggle with their earnings and how they lead portfolio lives to supplement their artistic income. Consistent with the aim of this task we have also discussed the experience of digitization on artists’ income/earnings specifically with regards to digital platforms. Digital platforms themselves are complex and lack transparency which makes artists position more vulnerable. We further identify the role Artificial Intelligence (AI) plays for artists and whether it is seen as an opportunity or a threat to artists. Another significant challenge that is highlighted in this document is that of the COVID-19 pandemic and how it has influenced artists and their earnings till now.

Part 2 of the report is on Reversion Rights authored by Ula Furgal from CREATE, University of Glasgow in where she discusses the full list of identified national provisions (per 19 Nov 2020). The provisions are presented in the form of tables, with each Member State having its own section.

The next step to this task involves a survey that will be distributed to artists all over the European Union (EU) on the issues addressed in this report. Because of the nature and ongoing changes in digital trends and COVID we will be including any new updates while developing the survey. We expect to deliver this survey to participants via social media for higher reach. Once the data is collected, we will analyse the data and results will be delivered as a final report.

PART I

1 Scope and definition of artists

The creative world consists of a wide variety of creators and performers: writers, dancers, visual artists, and so on. But categorizing creators and performers is not an easy task. Quite often, they engage in different activities: e.g. an actor can also be a singer or director. Also, within professions we can see varieties amongst artists, such as a visual artist also being a traditional artist or a novelist also writing screenplays. Defining an artist is complex and scholars have been unable to agree on one definition of an artist. Neither have they achieved a consensus as to who should belong to what profession (Baldin and Bille, 2021) and where to draw the line between professionals and amateurs. Frey and Pommerehne (1989, p.146) list at least eight criteria that may be used to define an artist:

1. the amount of time spent on artistic work
2. the amount of income derived from artistic work
3. the reputation as an artist among the general public
4. the recognition among other artists (peers)
5. the quality of artistic work
6. membership of a professional artists' group or association
7. professional qualifications (graduation from art schools)
8. the subjective self-evaluation of being an artist

However, Frey and Pommerehne also conclude that none of the eight criteria or combinations of them would qualify everywhere and that they should be selected contextually: based on the objective of the study and the data available (Karttunen, 1998). Therefore, any study that requires to understand artists, faces the problem of defining who is included as an artist and who is not (Steiner and Schneider, 2013).

Previous studies have used different criteria including the aforementioned ones, when trying to define artists. Many of these include a large and highly heterogeneous group of artists (Baldin and Bille, 2021). One such study (Poort et al., 2015) addresses a wide range of “creators and performers” that ranges from photographers to journalists and from translators to video artists. They purposely strive for diversity in their sample, instead of focusing on one particular artistic field such as for instance Kretschmer and Hardwick (2007) focusing on authors and Throsby and Petetskaya (2017) focusing on the degree of professionalism an artist has achieved. Lena and Lindeman (2014) state that the title of “artist” is given to those workers who associate themselves, and are identified by others, as individuals who produce artistic objects and ideas.

According to The International Standard Classification of Occupations (ISCO-08) classification, two specific groups of cultural occupations are distinguished: one is known as “artists” which includes creative and performing artists (including visual artists, musicians, dancers, actors, film directors, and so on) and the other is labelled as “writers” which includes authors, journalists and linguists.

Like Poort et al. (2015) the current study includes a wide range of creators and performers. However, we will be using “artists” as an umbrella term with the sole purpose of having an inclusive set of individuals that are identified as artists, by themselves and society, belonging to every artistic occupation, directly or indirectly.

2. Studies on Artists’ earnings: total income and portfolio lives

Artists’ earnings has been a topic of debate in the academic literature since the early 1970s: relevant questions are for instance what income artists acquire relative to people in other professions, what sources of income they have and how income levels differ within groups of artists. According to popular belief, the majority of artists can hardly make a living from their artistic work, while a happy few earn enormous amounts. Nowadays, due to digitalization artists may have more ways of earning income, but this also means they face new challenges. What do studies have to say about this?

A study by Filer (1986) claimed to debunk the myth about the “starving artists”, proclaiming that artists were younger and happy and that they did earn, more or less, similar to people in other occupations. Filer stated that artists were younger due to the rapid growth of the artistic sector in the 80’s, rather than due to the vast number of former artists that had left their field for other jobs at an older age. Furthermore, he concluded that there was no basis that pointed towards artists earning any less on average than if they were to be working in any other field.

Studies on artists’ earnings typically use surveys or Census data. However, Wassall and Alper (1985) found two issues with studies using Census data. The first is rather prosaic, namely that the definition of ‘artists’ in the Census data did not entirely match the artists represented in their research: it excluded one of the categories of artists they were studying while including other categories that were not part of their study. More profoundly, and importantly, the use of Census data masks the fact that artists often hold other non-art related jobs while working as artists, which implies that artists may spend time on and earn more from non-art related jobs. Thus, there are often disparities between the income that artists derive from their arts related work, and their personal income which often contains earnings from non-arts related sources (see studies by Felton, 1978; Kingston et al., 1981; Wassall et al., 1983). Therefore, to understand artists’ incomes, it is vital to distinguish between arts related, and other income sources.

In another study, Throsby (1986) uses a human capital approach to explain artists’ earning distributions, both from arts and non-arts income. This is followed in most of his studies with his peers (Throsby and Mills, 1989; Throsby and Thompson, 1994) where surveys were carried out to study the earnings of Australian artists. Throsby (1994) highlighted the issues existing in the labour market for artists, where artists were seen as more driven towards creativity and oblivious to financial benefits as compared to the conventional ‘homo economicus’, as assumed by the labour market. He claimed that artists’ labour supply decisions are based on their primary desire to create art as a principal occupation. However, he acknowledges that in the majority of cases, the professional work pursued by artists may likely lead to lesser earnings over a period of time, because of low hourly earnings and/or the non-availability of remunerative work opportunities. Based on this notion, Throsby constructed a “work preference” model and conducted an empirical study to test the theory. From this study he highlighted that artists supply to two distinct labour markets, the arts and non-arts, with different objectives and motivations, thereby having multiple jobs. He further states that artists need to be provided support (such as grants) to raise their “art wage” and that equitable payments, that is, a consistent wage should be provided in terms of their social value. However, the model though simplified is rather complex as it ignores many aspects of the artistic labour market which may limit the model’s viability.

When studying artists’ earnings, the standard theoretical framework of work/leisure choice is complicated since artists hold multiple jobs, and most artists can potentially be active in three distinct labour markets; 1) creative work, 2) arts-related work such as teaching, and 3) non-arts market (Throsby, 1996). Robinson and Montgomery (2000) tested Throsby’s model in their study on artists in the US and concluded that artists’ responded to economic incentives that made them change their time allocation between arts and non-arts work. On the other hand, Rengers (2002) stated that the work-preference model is flawed as it does not take into account that high paid artists may also work on other non-art related jobs, and does not explain the highly skewed income distribution of artists and cultural workers. In 2011, Throsby and Zednik focused their attention on multiple job holdings of artists, where artists earn through their non-arts work. Kretschmer et al. (2011) coined the term ‘portfolio lives’ to refer to this. Most artists are unable to earn enough from their primary creative work and they have to seek other income-earning opportunities, mostly related to their art field, such as a musician gaining employment as a music teacher or a visual artist working as an art teacher (McLain, 1978; Throsby 1994; Robinson and Montgomery 2000; Menger 2006; Kretschmer and Hardwick, 2007; Casacuberta and Gandelman 2012; Poort et al., 2015; Bille et al., 2017).

Several studies into artists' earnings have been performed by Kretschmer and peers (Kretschmer, 2005; Kretschmer and Hardwick, 2007; Kretschmer et al., 2011). The 2007 study by Kretschmer and Hardwick was one of the largest comparative studies that took place via a survey amongst UK and German Authors. By combining information from surveys with data from statistical offices and collecting societies, it provides systematic and comparative data on author's income and makes a comparison with the earnings in other professions. Kretschmer et al. (2011) studied the earnings of visual artists in the UK. They found a comparable pattern of lower wages, portfolio lives and a more skewed distribution as compared to other sectors.

Studies on artists' earnings took a new turn with the advent of digitalization. Poort et al. (2015) conducted a survey amongst creators and performing artists in the Netherlands, where the main theme of the study was to understand artists' earnings and to observe how artists perceived digital developments in relation to their creative process. On the one hand the survey revealed that due to developments such as unauthorised file sharing, a majority of artists perceived digitalization primarily as a threat rather than an opportunity. On the other hand, some creators and performers were more positive of digital technologies as a means of becoming more independent from publishers, by having more control over their work.

Technological progress and digital transformation have brought changes in the way artists work, perform and create worldwide. Throsby and Peteskaya (2017) conducted a survey in Australia amongst professional artists. This is Throsby's sixth consecutive survey over a time span of 30 years. In the survey, they highlighted how the digital environment presented both opportunities and challenges for artists'.

Kretschmer et al. (2019) did a re-run of their survey on the earnings of UK Authors to reflect on the changes overtime with a specific focus on digital changes in the professional market. The most important new development for authors that was kindled by digitization, is self-publishing. The survey revealed that within the group of primary occupation authors (those authors who spent at least 50% of their time on writing), 18% self-published in the year 2018. Within this group, the most popular format for self-publishing was electronic (53%) followed by traditional publication (print) (40%) and other publications (7%), such as audiobooks, Indies, electronic pages etc. Those authors who had not paid towards self-publishing had an average earning of £30,626, compared to £21,623 for those who did in the last year. The average cost paid for self-publishing amounted to £1,713 which, included various related costs such as hiring personnel for proof reading, buying software, hiring book cover designer etc. From their survey they concluded – again – that most authors were leading portfolio lives and mostly supplemented their income from a second job or from their partner's earnings. The survey saw a decline in not only the median earnings of authors as writers but also a decrease in authors becoming full time writers.

To conclude, over the last 40 years, artists and their income has been a topic of interest and controversy within different countries, both from a theoretical and from an empirical perspective. The idea of the "starving artist" has gained a lot of traction and has garnered varying opinions. Based on the studies discussed above it can be concluded that many artists struggle with their earnings and are on average earning less than people in other professional fields. However, artists aren't as poor as they seem to be based on their artistic income, since they do supplement their incomes by leading portfolio lives. Although artists are able to earn from multiple sources, an overall conclusion is that many artists cannot survive purely on the money they make from their artistic work. Moreover, the income distribution of artists is notoriously uneven which makes their position highly vulnerable.

3. Income sources for Artists

In the previous section, we have provided an overview of some notable studies that have looked into artists' earnings and their development. This section discusses the sources of earnings of artists in more detail.

Scholarly studies (such as by Throsby, 1994; Karhunen, 1994; Alper and Wassall, 2006) have established that many artists hold multiple jobs. Often, three types of jobs are distinguished, corresponding to three separate labour markets:

- i. The market for creative work, including time spent on preparation, practice, rehearsal, research etc. related to creative work.
- ii. The market for arts-related work that is not part of the core creative output, but that uses the artistic skills of artists in areas such as art teaching (especially relevant to visual artists, instrumental musicians, singers and dancers).
- iii. The non-arts labour market (e.g. working as a taxi-driver or a waiter in a restaurant).

According to Throsby and Zednik (2011) the typical portfolio career of an artist is a blend of various work arrangements that range from working on original creative work, applying skills extensively in other areas, collaborations, team participation, as well as travelling, research, or study etc. It can be expected that artists might opt to go down this path if this enhances their career and income. Whether it be working in non-profit organizations, commercial enterprises, being self-employed or working for free, artists nowadays are crafting a portfolio of jobs that allows them to not only harness their creativity but also enables them to earn a living (Lingo and Tepper, 2013).

Focussing on the first broad income category above – the market for creative work – several income sources can be distinguished:

A. Employment contracts, self-employment and freelancing

B. Royalties

C. Copyrights

D. Passive income

E. Subsidies/Grants/Prizes

F. Patronage

These are discussed in more detail below.

A. Employment contracts, self-employment and freelancing

While some artists have employment contracts like most people in the non-artistic economy, many artists are self-employed (Menger, 1999; Woronkowicz and Noonan, 2017). According to Eurostat Data around 45% of creatives (authors, journalists, linguists, creatives and performing artists) in the European Union were self-employed by 2019<sup>1</sup> (Eurostat, 2021). In the USA, it is 3.6 times more likely for artists to be self-employed than for other workers. 34% of all artists were self-employed during the time period 2012-2016 as compared to 9% of all workers. For fine artists and photographers, self-employment levels even exceeded 50%. Self-employed artists tend to have the flexibility to work on their own terms and usually work for both art and non-art related fields. While being self-employed may bring in more independence, compared to other artists who work on an employment contract, they may earn less or more and their earnings may also fluctuate, while they may not profit from benefits that an employment contract has to offer (National Endowment for the Arts, 2019).

Most times artists who are self-employed are also freelancers. A freelance artist has the same flexibility as being self-employed but instead of creating and selling their own independently produced work, they create works for their clients. There may be one client or multiple clients and each client will have a specific contract with the artist. The contract includes information such as what the project pertains, what the terms and conditions are as well as the payment details and any copyright related matters. Many artists, especially graphic designers or those who do digital art, can be seen offering their services as freelancers on their personal websites or through freelance websites such as Fiverr, Toptal, Dribbble and Behance. Nowadays artists some self-employed/freelance artists have found an innovative way to earn income on their digital works through “Non-Fungible Tokens” (NFT’s).

Non-Fungible Tokens

NFT’s are bought and sold online, similar to cryptocurrencies, and they represent real-world objects like art, music, in-game items and videos. Although they are similar to cryptocurrencies their mechanisms are different as NFT’s have digital signatures that makes it impossible for them to be exchanged, therefore, non-fungible (Conti and Schmidt, 2021). Websites like Super Rare, Foundation and Nifty Gateway give buyers the opportunity to choose curated work they like and give artists the chance to earn 10% royalties on their work (Kay, 2021). Artists of all kind (authors, musicians, filmmakers) are rooting for a future where NFT’s not only transforms their creative process but also brings more value to their artwork, since now it is possible to “own” and sell digital arts for the first time (Chow, 2021). However, NFTs create challenges for artists, users and right holders if they are expecting that an NFT transaction and an off-chain transaction are similar for the same work (Mezei et al., 2021).

Contracts between organizations and artists tend to differ between artistic fields. That is, different forms of contracts typically exist between visual artists’ and art galleries, authors’ and publishers’, musicians’ and record labels’ etc. (Caves, 2003). The theory of contracts in standard economic theory is closely related to the concept of incentives. This implies that one party (A) can persuade the other party (B) to carry out tasks that are beneficial to party A provided that proper incentives, usually financial payments, are given to B (Watt, 2010). A standard contract between one or two parties determines factors such as each party’s responsibilities, obligations, compensation, duration and what the project involves. The project and payment terms, including taxes and other service charges, are included. This is very similar to the way many other people in the service sector earn a living.

An important aspect of contracts is, however, that the terms will depend on the power balance between contract parties. A beginning artist who dreams of a professional career may sign almost anything to take his or her first steps in the industry. Moreover, contract parties may experience information asymmetries, causing them to sign away rights without being aware. Various EU countries have introduced legislation aimed at improving the contractual position of authors and performers.<sup>2</sup> The recently implemented Directive on Copyright in the Digital Single Market (DSM Directive) has several provisions to the same end.

B. Royalties

Artists’ contracts often have a variable component, which depends on the sales figures or commercial success of the exploitation of their work. Such royalties are typically a percentage of gross or net revenues, which may increase as revenues increase and often relate to and compensate for a transfer or licence of copyrights (see below). It enables artists to share in the commercial success of their works. Royalties are offered on a range of creative works which includes music, performances, writings, digital art, photography etc. Different kind of royalties exist for each type of creative work.

C. Copyrights and related (neighbouring) rights

Copyright law grants the author of a work of literature, science or art moral rights and economic rights. The economic rights granted by copyright usually comprise the exclusive rights of reproduction, communication to the public and distribution. In principle, these economic rights are attributed to the creator or creators of a work, but much like any other property right, they can be subject to a licence or transfer. Irrespective of such transactions, the rights in question typically last for seventy years after the death of the last surviving author, in both the EU and the US. Similarly, performers such as musicians, actors and dancers enjoy related (neighbouring) rights over their performances.

These rights can generate revenue streams for artists over time, depending in the use of their works and performances, for instance by playing music on the radio and in public places, lending books by libraries and copying of works by individuals for private use, study or practice. These revenues may be collected from the users of works by Collective Management Organisations (CMOs), also referred to as Collecting Societies, and redistributed to creators and performers. Given the duration of copyright and related rights, such revenue streams can provide a source of income for authors even after their retirement, as well as to their heirs after their death.

By law, in Europe visual artists and painters can receive a monetary claim whenever their art is resold in the secondary market. This is called 'resale right' or 'droit de suite' in French. In 2006 a uniform system was introduced within the European Union but it proved to be inefficient in its application as it did less to help artists who needed the support (Gaster and Stamatoudi, 2021).

D. Passive Income

Passive income refers to income an artist generates from work that requires little or no effort, for instance from products and services such as digital prints, online courses, blogs etc. Traditionally, passive income usually refers to rents or dividends that result from ownership on an asset such as a house, stocks and shares. Now in digital times, the options have expanded, especially for artists, as they can create and own assets through digital products (Moyo studios, 2020). Many artists have resorted to earning passive income by selling their artwork as digital products on various digital platforms such as ETSY or by offering art skill courses on platforms such as Skillshare and Domestika.

E. Subsidies, grants and prizes

In continental Europe, state support plays a significant role in creating opportunities for artists. Subsidies are mostly provided to arts organization, but in some countries like the Netherlands and Flanders, the government also awards grants to individual artists (Segers et al., 2010). Abbing (2002) states that in mainland Western Europe, Britain and the US, structurally subsidized classical music, dance and theatre on average earn about 85% of income from donations and government subsidies. According to Towse (2006), subsidies are usually direct grants of monetary aids that are provided to arts and cultural organizations (such as theatre and opera companies, orchestras, museums, etc.), which in Europe are mostly owned and operated by the state. However, only a small proportion of the grant is spent on individual artists, as government bodies generally prefer channelling funds through cultural organizations. One reason for this is that support for individual artists involves higher transaction costs. A second relates to the moral hazard problems of supporting individuals, where the reward system may lead to low quality or overproduced art.

Copyright and subsidies, coupled with prizes and awards, complement each other. However, according to Abbings (2002) subsidies do not really raise income levels, rather they mostly encourage people to enter the field of arts. Subsidies by government are offered in a way to curb or reduce poverty in the arts but this attracts more "would-be" artists and most artists end up gearing their activities towards the government rather than the market. From an economic perspective, this leads to an oversupply of artists and their work, causing the average income of the individual artists to decline.

Apart from being a potential source of income for artists, prizes and awards are also a sign of recognition, which may further their career.

F. Patronage

In the past, such as during the Italian Renaissance, many artists were provided financial support by wealthy individuals, such as kings and queens or people in power. Having a powerful patron meant that you as an artist had financial security and depending on the project you were funded for years (artworkarchive, 2020).

Nowadays, patronage has also gone digital. Artists can join Patreon, a membership platform specialized in enabling creators to monetize their content. The model works on the same idea where patrons assist artists by supporting them financially. Only now it's just not kings and queens, it's anyone who is their fan. This can provide a more sustainable source of income for artists.

4. Impact of digital transformation on Artists (income/sources)

In the previous section, we have discussed the different sources through which artists earn their income. In this section we discuss the effects of digitalization and its impact on artists' income with a specific focus on digital platforms.

Digital transformation has affected societies and industries worldwide and creative/ cultural industries have felt the impact even more (Mangematin et al., 2014). This may stem from the fact that in the creative industries, not only the work processes have been affected by digital technologies, as they have in many industries. This is something that is referred to as digitalization (Rachinger et al., 2018). In the creative industries, also the primary products and services have in many cases 'gone digital', which is referred to as digitization. Waldfogel (2019) states that digital technologies have democratized the cultural marketplace leading to the overproduction of books, songs, tv shows, movies creating a digital renaissance.

Poort et al. (2015) claim that digitization and digitalization bring both opportunities and challenges for artists. First, the advent of digital media products (digitization) and home copying technologies led to substantial levels of unauthorised distribution, commonly referred to as digital piracy, which had a negative effect on revenues from recorded media. Second, digitalization disrupts the traditional vertical set-up of media institutions into a more horizontal paradigm, allowing artists to work more independently from publishers and other traditional actors. Social media allows many artists to disseminate their works to a wider audience without these traditional intermediaries, which gives them a stronger bargaining position with producers and publishers. On the other hand, artists face increasing competition from debutants and amateurs who tend to bypass all intermediaries. Moreover, the social media and other platforms that artists can utilize have turned into the new intermediaries that stand between them and their audience and that shape the market. According to Peukert (2019) despite the increase in the storage, dissemination and/or production of artistic content, due to technological advancements, there is less attention in the literature on the usage of digital platforms, such as Facebook, Instagram and Youtube. Furthermore, he discusses how Artificial Intelligence is an emerging creative technology that can not only affect the supply of cultural products and welfare but also lead to challenges regarding the incentive compatibility and industrial structure of the cultural markets.

4.1. Artists' experiences with digital platforms

From the early 2000s, new production tools and online distribution platforms came into existence (Kjus, 2019) leading to the emergence of the digital platform economy. Gawer and Cusumano (2013, p.417) state that "platforms are distinct in that they are often associated with "network effects": that is, the more users who adopt the platform, the more valuable the platform becomes to the owner and to the users because of growing access to the network of users and often to a growing set of complementary innovations". Many platforms offer different functionalities and digital platforms such as Google and Facebook not only provide search social media, but also act as platforms where other platforms are created (e.g building of applications on Facebook). Platforms like Amazon, Etsy and eBay act as marketplaces where users and producers buy and sell. These and many other online structures are therefore encouraging a wide range of activities (Kenny and Zysman, 2016). For artists, platforms are media through which they interact and disseminate their work and for fans they serve as a source of consumption (GIA reader, 2010).

Categorizing platforms isn't simple. Their functionalities typically overlap, and they provide multiple uses to those using them for their specific reasons. For some, a digital platform might be used only as a means of networking while for others it is a means of distribution of products and services. For the sake of simplicity and to understand the role of digital platforms and how artists interact with them, we distinguish the following types of digital platforms in this report:

A. Social Media Platforms

B. Marketing/Retail Platforms

C. Digital Streaming Platforms

D. Publishing Platforms

These are discussed in more detail below.

A. Social Media Platforms

Social media platforms have provided artists with developments in the form of virtual communities and innovative practices. Unlike the earlier version of Internet technology consisting of static, non-interactive individual websites, artists now have the opportunity to interact with Internet applications such as social media in ways that can enhance and supplement their creative practices (Budge, 2013). For emerging and independent artists, the widespread use of social media platforms also makes it easier to develop and forge co-creative relationships (Morris, 2014). Artists from every discipline have most likely been using social media platforms to sell and promote their works and services by targeting consumers directly (Warrington, 2020).

Social media platforms have given artists (mostly painters, crafters, visual artists, photographers) new ways to find support and earn income. Traditionally, artists had to find support from the art world elite such as critics, galleries and famous collectors that would generate opportunities for exhibitions in museums (Fleming, 2014). In 2000 DevianART, the largest online community for artists (professionals and non-professionals) was launched which allowed emerging and established artists to showcase their artwork (Buter et al., 2011). In the past few years, new platforms have emerged and Instagram has become one of the to go places for most contemporary artists, galleries, auction houses and collectors, to promote art work especially for new and emerging artists (Siegal, 2015). Similarly, some aspiring musicians have been able to bypass record labels by gaining fame via social networks.

Instagram has allowed artists to make their own virtual art galleries, displaying their creative process in real time, while they act both as dealer and curator and their followers are their critics and collectors (Fleming 2014). The social media platform has not only helped launch and promote the careers of countless artists, it is providing a new avenue for dealers to sell their artworks to a global audience (Beinhacker, 2020). According to the Hiscox Online Art trade report (2020) 68% of art buyers use Instagram for art-related purposes, as seen in Figure 1. While it may seem that Instagram unlocks the prospects of earning income, it is not that simple. To be able to generate a revenue stream, artists are dependent on having engaged followers and to have more followers, artists need to overcome algorithms.

How images are circulated within a network is based on a certain set of rules which is determined by algorithms. These rules are invisible but over time users tend to learn how they work through observations of the flow of their content within their network (Carah, 2014). Put simply, an algorithm automatically decides which social media post will make it to the top and which won't and in most cases this sits on engagement that is the level of interaction a post gets (pick&mix, 2020). Using social media platforms means devising a strategy that works well and creates engagement that leads to revenue generation. Artists need to make sure they use the right hashtags, tags, captions, stories, time of posting content, posting content that has value, etc. Many artists selling their art and services online are frustrated and struggling with algorithms as it restricts their reach to potential clients on the platform. Scolere (2019) conducted a qualitative study on 56 professional graphic designer who used social media platforms. In her study, she explained how the pressure to build their creative portfolio had intensified causing artists to be in an "always designing" mode. She further explained how graphic designers face the challenge of educating their clients on the value of their designs and simultaneously negotiating their pay rates. According to Campbell (2019), most of these platforms are continuously updating their terms and conditions and while most users may have full ownership of their original work, there is a possibility that these sites may fully "utilize", "manipulate" and "exhibit" the users work at any given time without their consent and without informing them. In short, artists who use social media platforms are unaware that their content can often be shared without them being compensated for them or without their permission.

Instagram

On Instagram, artists can post visuals of their work and start gaining followers. If the purpose is to earn income, then the user needs to make a business account. This gives the opportunity to promote or market your product by creating ads. These ads range from Photo ads, Video ads, Stories ads, Carousel ads, Collection ads, Ads in explore and Slideshow ads. Recently, Instagram has placed a particular focus on creators by providing them with support through a mix of monetization tools to help both emerging to the more established creators. This includes:

1. Introducing Badges in Live

2. IGTV Ads
3. Live Shopping

However, these tools are currently still under process and available only in certain regions.

To be able to monetize on Instagram, creators need to comply with Instagram's monetization content policy. According to the Instagram website:

"We provide features and products that help creators and publishers monetize their content. This content must comply with certain rules.

All content on Instagram must adhere to our Community Terms and Guidelines. These are our rules against sexual, violent, abusive or hateful content. However, content that is generally appropriate for Instagram is not necessarily monetized.

Creators and publishers must follow our partner monetization policy and our content monetization policy in order to monetize their content. Your content must meet these guidelines to be eligible to monetize.

If your video complies with our content monetization policy, advertisers can prevent their ads from appearing in sensitive content."

B. Retail/ Marketing Platforms

Social media platforms like Twitter, Facebook and Instagram give artists the chance to build their presence by connecting with their followers. These platforms are used interchangeably and allow artists to reach a mass audience and bring traffic towards their social media handles. Once artists are able to create a community of followers, they can promote their works and direct their audience towards other platforms where their products or services are available. For example, a visual artist may use Instagram and Facebook to promote their digital products and once they have acquired their followers they can direct them to a retail platform such as ETSY, where they can purchase the digital products. Some artists provide professional courses on other selling platforms such as Skillshare and Domestika.

ETSY

On Etsy, artists can sell their products by placing their listings for a nominal fee of $0.20 which can be renewed after every four months. From each sale, a 5% transaction charge is deducted from the total amount by Etsy. Apart from that, there are certain other costs involved depending on the region such as US Tax, VAT etc. Recently the European Union has implemented the Digital Service Tax (DST) to ensure that fair tax policies are used on the digital business activities. However, it is as yet unclear who would bear the burden of this tax (Bauer, 2018). Etsy sent a petition to its sellers in early February 2021 pleading them to encourage the EU commission to not levy the tax, as it may mean that the seller may have to bear the costs of DSTs. Whether this would be the case or not is something that would be known once the tax is levied.

C. Digital Streaming Platforms

Digital Streaming Platforms (DSPs) have become significant players in various fields such as in the music sector (Spotify, Apple Music), live videos (TikTok, Twitch), movie and television (Hulu, Netflix, Amazon Prime), book and magazine (Kindle Unlimited, Comic Blitz), and video games (PlayStation Now, Xbox Game Pass, Google Stadia) (Bender et al., 2021).

The music sector is not unfamiliar with the advent of digital technologies and their impact. Over the past decades, the business model changed from selling music on physical carriers (records and cd-s), to selling digital music files (iTunes), to selling access instead of ownership on the basis of a subscription. Streaming platforms such as Spotify, Tidal, Amazon music, provide listeners a service to stream the music by artists through a subscription. From the record labels side, streaming is praised for stopping the seemingly never-ending revenue decline that the industry experienced since the advent of digital file sharing platforms such as Napster, Kazaa and Bittorrent from 1999 onwards. On the other hand, artists have not quite figured out how these platforms fit into their business models (Bender et al., 2021). Some artists such as Bono, the lead singer of U2, have come out in support of such services, while artists such as Taylor Swift are critical of platforms such as Spotify, as they claim they do not compensate writers, producers, artists and music creators fairly (McCarthy, 2015).

This project has received funding from the European Union's Horizon 2020 research and innovation programme under grant agreement No 870626

Prior to streaming services, 8tracks was a music sharing and discovering platform where users had the choice of making their own mixes of 8 tracks. This allowed users to discover music from others' playlists which they hadn't heard before. However, with the advent of streaming services, 8tracks shut down in 2019. It has, however, relaunched recently in the US (RouteNote, 2020). The enormous number of artists on the major subscription services as well as their programmed recommendation playlists, such as Discover Weekly or New Music Friday on Spotify, enable customers to find and listen to artists, whom they would not have easily discovered before. Spotify presents this as a chance for artists to reach a wider audience (Erlandsson and Perez, 2017), whereas one could argue that it also enhances competition on these platforms significantly (Mulbach and Aurora, 2020). However, it is often stated that streaming has made it very difficult for artists (song writers and performers) to make decent earnings as they have less control over streaming platforms, specifically for those whose deals are not made by Copyright Management Organizations (CMO) (Towse, 2020). Recently, a UK based professional musician, Tom Gray, started the #BrokenRecord campaign to address the issue related to streaming revenue and demanding a larger share from the platforms (musicbusinessworldwide, 2021). An inquiry was launched in October 2020 by the UK parliament in response to the impact streaming services were having on artists. A broad range of legislation reforms and regulation changes have been recommended, ranging from providing equitable remuneration to artists, providing revenue parity, analyzing market power in the music industry, fair and transparent algorithms and normalizing licensing agreements<sup>4</sup> (House of Commons Committees, 2021).

Currently, Napster, TIDAL and Apple Music hold the top 3 positions in when it comes to per stream pay-outs. As seen in Fig.2, Napster, on average, paid out $0.019 per stream which means an artist will require 77,474 total plays to earn the monthly minimum wage amount in the US of $1,472. TIDAL, fell from $0.01284 per stream earlier this year to $0.0125, according to more recent data. Artists' on TIDAL now require 117,760 total plays to earn $1,472. Apple Music has increased its pay-out rate from $0.0064 per stream to $0.00783 which means artists' require around 147,200 plays to earn the US monthly minimum wage amount. Deezer, a French streaming platform, came fourth in the ranking by paying artists' around $0.0064 coming close to Google play music. Spotify holds the worst position when it comes to the pay-out which ranges from $.003 and $.005 for each stream (Sanchez, 2018).

The lower end of the pay-out breakdown is occupied by the local digital services on the developing streaming markets: Indian JioSaavn ($0.0013), Russian UMA and Yandex ($0.00102 and $0.0005, respectively) and Tencent's QQ — with the lowest observed rate at $0.0004 per stream (Pastukhov, 2019).

Hesmondhalgh (2020) highlights three main ways in which music creators may be able to earn greater income under the pro-rata system (pay per stream)<sup>6</sup>; “(a) for the total pot (subscriptions and advertising) to grow, through increased revenue; (b) for the music streaming services to pay out more to rights holders; and (c) for rights holders to provide better contractual terms to musicians” (p.8). Auito (2019) states that streaming revenues are just not enough to fully support artists despite them rising significantly, due to the complex pro rata system. To counter the inequality between “superstar” artists and independent artists a user centric streaming mode<sup>7</sup> has been proposed, as it is used by Deezer. This method claims to pay less to superstars, without harming them (Auito, 2019) and more to less streamed artists. It favours local musicians and there is more transparency where users can actually understand how their usage effects payments for right holders (Hesmondhalgh, 2020). User centric studies were conducted by Maaso (2014) to understand the distribution of income from music streaming in Norway and another one by Muikku and Durgam (2017) in Finland to compare the current pro rata system to a user centric system. Both studies proposed user centric models as favourable for artists as it promotes a fairer distribution of income.

Spotify

Artists wishing to use the Spotify platform have three options that gives them access:

1. Either a team member that already has access sends you an invite
2. A distributor sends you an invite that gives instant access.
3. As an independent artist which goes through a manual review and takes time as it requires verification.

Once an artist profile is verified, the artist receives a blue tick mark and a profile is created where the artist can upload their work. Spotify provides a list of distributors for artists to choose so that they can handle the music’s licensing, distribution, and pay the streaming royalties based on a fee or commission. For example, DistroKid has a fee of $19.90 that allows the artist to upload unlimited songs and albums in a year without paying anything from the sales of the songs. Two kind of royalties are earned on Spotify; Recording royalties and Publishing royalties. The rights holders receive royalties whenever a song is played on Spotify. The platform calculates royalties by tallying the total number of streams that occur within a given month as well as how many of those streams were people listening to music owned or controlled by a particular rights holder. Artists get paid based on their agreements with the labels and distributors (collection societies and publishers, in the case of songwriters).

<sup>6</sup> In the pro rata model the subscription fee from users is collected as a total amount from which the money is distributed according to all listening times.

<sup>7</sup> In the user centric model the user has more influence in deciding where their money will be allocated depending on whom they listen to.

Streaming music has gained enormous popularity and has provided easy access, but another medium that is being used by artists to express themselves and interact with their fans is through video streaming platforms. Live-video sharing through social media platforms is providing added benefits to artists where they can create, share and repurpose content leading to an additional stream of revenue for their work (AWAL, 2018). It allows users to upload and broadcast their videos in real time which have now become an important component as it allows more interaction with the creator’s audience (Shahzeidi, 2020). Some of the popular video streaming platforms include YouTube, Facebook, Instagram, Vimeo, Twitch and TikTok. TikTok, a music centric app, allows users to upload short videos of themselves. The platform has also launched careers of artists, such as Lil Nas X, where their songs are used in dances, memes and challenges on TikTok by other users (Leskin, 2020). The platform itself does not offer any monetization to creators but what it does offer is the opportunity to secure sponsorship and brand deals for their content, provided they have a large number of followers. Furthermore, creators can link their social media accounts such as YouTube, Instagram to divert more traffic and engagement (Hayes, 2020).

Other digital video streamers such as Netflix and Amazon Prime usually pay content producers by paying a licensing fee for the audio-visual content based on a specific period of time. Netflix has developed a literary connection with Maria Campbell Literary Associates and has been on a book acquisition spree by forging deeper relations with publishers and authors to turn books into movies and series, for example The Witcher, Shadow and Bones and more (Boog, 2019). According to the Netflix site: “we only accept submissions through licensed literary agents, or from a producer, attorney, manager, or entertainment executive with whom we have a pre-existing relationship. Any idea that is submitted by other means is considered an unsolicited submission.”<sup>8</sup> Lissner who got her book Carrie Pilby adapted into a Netflix film wrote in her blogpost that book authors rarely became wealthy for a movie deal and when the screen rights are sold the writers receive a sum of about 2.5% of the budget not to mention the agent fees and taxes which results in sum lower than six figures (Lissner, 2017).

YouTube Live

Before creators can monetize their live stream or premiere, their channel must participate in the YouTube Partner Program (YPP). You can make money on YouTube through the following features:

- “•Advertising revenue: Get ad revenue from display, overlay, and video ads.
- Channel memberships: Your members make recurring monthly payments in exchange for special perks that you offer.
- Merch shelf: Your fans can browse and buy official branded merchandise that’s showcased on your watch pages.
- Super Chat & Super Stickers: Your fans pay to get their messages highlighted in chat streams.
- YouTube Premium Revenue: Get part of a YouTube Premium subscriber’s subscription fee when they watch your content.”

Artists can enrol themselves in the YouTube Partner Program and use ads to generate revenue. In order to be eligible to apply to the YouTube Partner Program, a channel must have 1,000 subscribers and received 4,000 watch hours in the previous 12 months. Other options include affiliation with a distributor or a signed record label who are responsible for paying the share to the artist. Because music composition rights are separate, YouTube also has agreements with music publishers and copyright collection societies. Through these deals, YouTube pays royalties to affiliated publishers and songwriters.

D. Book Publishing Platforms

Digital platforms have also penetrated the book publishing sector. In 2007 the launch of the Kindle e-reader by Amazon caused a dramatic stir in the traditional book publishing process. Pre-digitization, it was hard to imagine authors opting for self-publishing at any large scale, as it was expensive. This changed with the arrival of various internet-based services (such as Kindle Direct Publishing (KDP) by Amazon, iBooks, CreateSpace, Kobo, Lulu, Smashwords) making self-publishing a convenient and viable option for authors. This is due to the fact that companies like Amazon are interested in taking in self-publishing authors by providing them access to consumers directly. Furthermore, in the last decade or so, these emerging intermediaries either provide assistance to authors by converting books/manuscripts into e-books or provide them with relevant software and support which allows them to do this themselves (Hviid et al., 2019). The process of self-publishing allows authors to perform the core publishing related functions on their own. This means writing, designing, editing, marketing and selling of their books is their own responsibility. Authors have the option to outsource these functions via different online platforms, but the marketing control remains with them. The majority of the self-published books are provided in e-book format as they are easy and low cost when it comes to e-publishing, marketing and selling online. Some authors also utilize print on demand (POD) services, which gives them the option to print and order their books once they get and order from their clients (Matulionyte, 2017). While authors may pay less for editorial and marketing services when self-publishing, as compared to industrial publishing, the question remains whether they are able to earn enough (both professionals and amateurs) (Elkin-Koren, 2011). All in all, digitization has changed the way authors deal with the publishing and distribution of their books. They are no longer dependent on publishing houses to have their books published as they can now get them self-published. Furthermore, due to access to largescale crowd-sourced reviews they can generate large sales and gain more readers. This may have impacted the book publishing industry and the way publishing deals are made nowadays (Peukert and Reimers, 2021).

According to Carolan and Evain (2013) with the creation on wikis and the upsurge of Google Books as well as other book sharing platforms, information is readily available, which means people have more access as compared to before, making content alone insufficient to generate revenue. With increased interaction with users, content creators and providers have to determine what users are willing to pay for. Indie authors<sup>9</sup>, as compared to those authors that work for traditional publishers, earn more per sale. The average trade-published author earns a royalty of approximately 7.5% of their books cover price, and those with agents lose a further 15% of that. Self-publishing platforms like Amazon, Apple Books, Ingram Spark and Kobo pay up to 70% of each book sold to authors. Indie authors who sell directly to readers from their own websites take in up to 96% of the value of the book (AskALLI, 2020). Hviid et al. (2019) state that Amazon dominates the e-book market: they estimate Amazon's share of US e-book sales at 74%, Apple's iBooks store at 11%, Barnes & Noble's Book Store at 8%, Kobo's US bookstore at 3%, and Google Play Books at 2%, while 2% of sales go via other avenues. While authors may likely benefit from self-publishing, there is the probability of an adverse effect from over-entry in the book industry, which means there may be a huge number of books that hardly make any sales and that are rarely reviewed by professional reviewers and/or readers.

Kindle Direct Publishing (KDP)

Kindle Direct Publishing offers two options to authors for royalty payments of their e-Books: 35% and 70%. To qualify for the 70% royalty option, books must meet these requirements:

- The author or publisher-supplied list price must satisfy list price requirements.
- The list price must be at least 20% below the list price on Amazon for the physical book.
- Titles must be made available for sale in all geographies for which the author or publisher has rights.

<sup>9</sup> Indie authors self-publish books without signing exclusive contracts with publishers and retain and control their publishing rights. <https://www.allianceindependentauthors.org/what-is-an-indie-author/>

- Titles must also be enrolled in KDP Select to be eligible for 70% royalty on sales to customers in Brazil, Japan, Mexico, and India.

All books are still eligible for the standard 35% royalty as long as the title meets list price requirements.

Royalty calculations

If you select the 35% royalty option, your royalty will be 35% of your list price without VAT for each unit sold. If you select the 70% royalty option, your royalty will be 70% of your list price without VAT, less delivery costs (average delivery costs are $0.06 per unit sold, and vary by file size), for each eligible book sold to customers in the 70% territories, and 35% of the list price for each unit sold to customers residing outside the 70% territories. If we sell your digital book at a price below your list price without VAT in order to match price with a third party selling any digital or physical edition of the book, or to match Amazon's price for a physical edition of the book, you will receive 70% of our sale price for each eligible book sold to customers in the 70% territories, less delivery costs, and less any applicable VAT.

70% territories

The 70% royalty option only applies to books sold to customers in the listed countries. You do not need to live in one of the 70% territories in order to receive the 70% royalty option.

Public domain

The 70% royalty option is for in-copyright works only. Works in the public domain or consisting primarily of public domain content are only eligible for the 35% royalty option. If you add substantial original content or publish an original translation so that your book is not primarily public domain, then it would be eligible for the 70% royalty option.

4.2. Impact of digital platforms on the position and earnings of artists

The adoption of digital technologies is more dominant in the music, films, books, photography and design fields, and in sectors such as gaming, than in the performing arts sector (stage or theatre arts). It changes the way artistic labour markets work and impacts the outcome of these markets. It also affects the way new works are financed, how collaborations take place and are generated due to changes in the cost structure for artists in the digital environment (Cuntz, 2018).

According to Mazziotti (2020), social media services have given creators the opportunity to build their digital audiences, but the underlying logic of online platforms penalises the creators systematically. First, the algorithms and filter bubbles create more inequalities between superstars and other professional creators as these technologies tend to promote only selective works based on user behaviour or user preferences and suggestions. Second, although social media provides opportunities for artists' and creators to build their own brand and reputation, it also creates a price disparity of the content that is produced. Since social media is open to everyone, it allows users to make any kind of content available to the public creating what has been labelled a "value gap", where value created is largely monetized by platforms and may not benefit the artists. This value gap is a prevalent issue within the music industry where music streaming platforms such as Youtube and Spotify have created more disparity when it comes to remuneration of the work provided to the artist (Lawrence, 2019). The 2018 global report by IFPI considered the value gap to be a big threat to the future sustainability of the music industry (IFPI, 2018)<sup>10</sup>. Third, within the creative sector, especially the music industry, the remuneration for creators is still complex due to a lack of proper information infrastructure. This makes it problematic for online streaming platforms to ensure proportionate remuneration. Finally, there is the issue of information asymmetry across online platforms, where the platform owners keep information about artist and content producers' compensation as a trade secret. The information is either obtained when an artist breaches their confidentiality contract with these platforms or when tech companies provide spontaneous statements. This creates a toxic environment for the creators as it makes negotiation of deals difficult. Artists have no precise knowledge of the value of their works and how platforms by exploiting them are earning more.

Digitization has disrupted the creative industry and digital platforms are becoming giants that are on the one hand providing opportunities to artists and on the other hand are controlling them through their "lock-in mechanisms". Amit and Zott (2001) explain that lock-in basically is a switching cost that deters customers and strategic partners from moving to competitors, which creates value for the platform. Digital platforms utilize a similar strategy by locking-in artists (as well as end users) and making it inconvenient for them to leave the platform. For example, when book authors publish via the Amazon Kindle Publishing Platform they are locked-in in the sense that anything published on that platform is usable only on Amazon (Choudary, 2018). For example, starting 2011 on Amazon via KDP select, authors were offered a 70% royalty with some conditions attached such as having a price range between $2.99 and $9.99, and to agree to not sell their books through any other channel digitally, not even through their own website (Guion, 2018). Recently, an inquiry was held by the UK parliament where the issue on creators remuneration was highlighted in relation to how revenues are transferred from streaming platforms to the music industry. The concern was raised that although streaming services had brought forward profit for the music sector the music creators (performers, songwriters, and composers) did not receive similar benefits (Parliament, 2021).

Another issue that has gained recent traction are the policies implemented by digital platforms when it comes to what type of content is allowed to be posted. Facebook and Instagram demote content that they think is "inappropriate" or "borderline" according to their community standards. This means that the content is harder to find and the algorithms work against the user (Kozłowska, 2019). On Instagram, pictures are considered offensive if they fall within three categories: violent, shocking or sexually suggestive. Many times artists and photographers who work with content related to nudity have had their content removed or demoted (Dawson, 2020). There is a push from artists and other art advocates for Instagram to be more transparent when they demote or remove posts or accounts and as to why some accounts are given less visibility (Duran, 2019). Apart from that there is a greater call for transparency when it comes to content moderation policies and decisions. This means that platforms need to provide a meaningful transparency that leads to a better understanding of what the content moderation process really is and that too at a systematic level (Suzar et al, 2019).

The current community guideline on Instagram related to nudity reads as follows:

"We know that there are times when people might want to share nude images that are artistic or creative in nature, but for a variety of reasons, we don't allow nudity on Instagram. Nudes in the form of pictures of paintings and sculptures are also allowed."<sup>11</sup>

Thus, the community guidelines only allow certain types of art to post nude art, and disregards any other form of medium such as photography and performance based art.

In an effort to avoid censorship, deletion and demotion from social media, a campaign called "Don't Delete Art" was launched. It is a collective movement by artists and virtual art galleries. Don't Delete Art provides a comprehensive guide for artists on how they can comply with vague and unjustifiable rules put forward by social media platforms when they post their artwork. They are calling out social media companies to provide consistent, transparent and accurate principles in the way art content is handled on their platforms. Demands include improved notifications for all content that is removed and/or demoted, as well as appeal procedures for decisions regarding post removal, demotion, account deletion. The aim should be to encourage and motivate rather than discouraging artists to post their content on platforms (NCAC, 2021).

Some argue that by implementing block chain technologies (e.g. in the context of NFT or as an alternative to CMOs), artists will have more control over their work, which would allow them to manager their revenues, royalties, and intellectual-property rights into smart contracts that provide a quicker and more transparent way to allocate revenue to contributors (World Economic Forum, 2018). Several authors argue that regulators also need to make platforms more accountable by becoming more data driven so that platforms are more transparent to the artists and users. World Intellectual Property Organization (WIPO) can promote a better understanding by being proactive and develop efficient ways to protect the rights of artists and for the creative sector to grow (Jewell, 2018).

4.3. Emerging role of Artificial Intelligence (AI)

Artificial Intelligence (AI) has gained a lot of traction as an advanced technology capable of performing high-performance tasks with some form of human-like intelligence. In the last five years are so, the creative industry has seen a dramatic increase in the implementation of AI technology for the development of creative works (Anantrasirichai and Bull, 2021). According to Russell and Norvig (2020), AI consists of a set of codes, techniques, algorithms and data that allows a computer to adopt a human like behavior thereby allowing it to make decisions (perhaps even better ones) the way humans would. Within the creative sector we see the implementation of AI within the creative value-chain (creation, production, dissemination, consumption) at every phase leading to examples in the form of music, text, images and/or vidoes (Caramiaux, 2020).

AI can be seen playing different roles within the creative sector. First, it provides creative tools to artists through different software and programs. Second, it allows machines to create digital artworks, as well as poems and literature in some cases. Third, it is taking over work that is traditionally done by artists in the broad sense. AI is slowly emerging within the creative sector, such as the movie industry, and we see many artists implementing the technology in the content they produce. In 2015, Google developed a pattern finding software called DeepDream, which provided a set of tools to explore different AI algorithms for creators to produce visual content. Adobe and Celsys have followed suit, making industry standard creative tools that include AI features within their digital software's. They believe that AI tools will enable artists' and will work for their best interests rather than replacing them (Lee, 2019). A recent survey by Adobe showed that in US/Europe, 23% of the participants showed strong interest in AI based creative assistants while in Japan the response rate was 50%. AI has also been used to restore paintings that have been damaged or lost such as recently the painting "The Night Watch" by Rembrandt: parts of the painting that had been cut off ... years ago, were reconstructed with the help of AI (Boffey, 2021).

However, AI has become more than a mere tool. In 2018, Christie's, an auction house in New York, announced the sale of an artwork titled "Portrait of Edmond de Belamy" made by AI, and estimated to sell between $7000 to $10,000 (Schinder and Rea, 2018). The artwork was sold for $432,500. This motivated some artists to explore their creativity by producing AI generated paintings. Inspired by AI, a group of tech savvy art lovers started an "Art AI" project at Cambridge University which created AI original art. It now serves as one of the world's largest gallery of AI generated art. Artists that create AI art write and tweak an algorithm where they feed the algorithm a number of images and then generate the desired output (Elgammel, 2019). Some musicians have also been involved in creating AI generated music such as Francois Pachet, the French scientist, composer, director and long-time AI music pioneer, who composed the first AI based pop-album (Chow, 2020). Es Devlin, a London based media designer, co-created POEMPORTRAIT, with Google Arts and Culture Lab and coder Ross Goodwin using AI where an algorithm was trained to generate poems (Vincent, 2019).

AI assists artists working in music, art, fashion and film by performing difficult or time-consuming tasks, allowing them to focus on more creative ideas. This can be seen in the gaming industry, where through automation AI helps designers with game development tasks such as testing programs (Marks, 2019). Digital artists are using AI enabled photo editors that makes their work easier for them by editing pictures in matter of a few clicks. Some AI Visual editors are equipped with machine learning software that assists in locating unique video frames while some apps can paint an entire artwork in matter of minutes (Bishop, 2020).

The use of AI however, has mixed reviews as some artists believe that it is an opportunity to capitalize on (Fagelson, 2019) while others believe it will be a threat especially if it takes over or de-values their creative skills (Pfeiffer, 2018). Artists need to be open to the idea that some aspects of their roles may change. For example, Jonathan Follet, a musician explained how he had to transform his role from a keyboardist to an arranger, when AI automation emerged. There is the possibility that with AI the creative task associated with the creative job may lessen or be completely removed with the introduction of AI. What artists need to do is to recognize where they can provide their real artist value and where they can develop or advanced their craft using AI (Leonard, 2019).

With the increased use of AI to generate artworks the question of authorship and copyright has also become problematic. The question of whether AI assisted creative works should be protected by copyright law is a topic of debate as it brings forward technical, legal and philosophical questions relative to creativity and whether machines can be given the title of authors producing original works (Quintais et al, 2021).

5.The Pandemic effects

The Covid-19 pandemic has hit most artists and cultural and creative industries harder as compared to other industries, which has led to a fall in revenues in mostly every artistic field. This implies that over the next two years, there could be a sharp fall in earnings for artists (Henley, 2021). CMOs have done their best to protect artists during this crisis but these organizations themselves have suffered greatly and expect assistance from Europe and European institutions. The more vulnerable artists include those who work as freelancers and/or are self-employed, particularly musician and other performing artists who were not allowed or able to do their work for more than a year. As a result, many artists are now forced to find work elsewhere, particularly in non-arts jobs (Rebuilding Europe, 2020). Some artists' have easily switched to digital forms of their work by establishing their presence on digital platforms. In other cases, however, such as those artists' belonging to the contemporary art field, the challenges are more complex (Amorim and Teixeira, 2020). During the pandemic, artists in the EU were faced with difficulties with regards to their working status and eligibility for unemployment and other benefits. A Europass-type registrar was brought forward as a solution in the 2007 EP Resolution but this didn't address the structural challenges that have emerged due to the pandemic and that may continue to intensify. These challenges range from income loss, uncertainties, inequality, social fractures marginalisation, and increased social polarisation (Culture Action Europe and Dâmaso, 2021).

In an effort to combat the effects of the pandemic, European Commission has launched a number of initiatives, such as the Creatives Unite platform, to provide support, solution and relief to artists. Many theatres, dance venues, music organizations and museums have gone digital since the pandemic by providing audiences digital access, which is mostly free. The European Parliament resolution<sup>12</sup> indicated that apart from the economic recovery of the cultural sector, efforts need to be put in recognizing other social issues, specifically the working conditions of artists (Polivtseva, 2020).

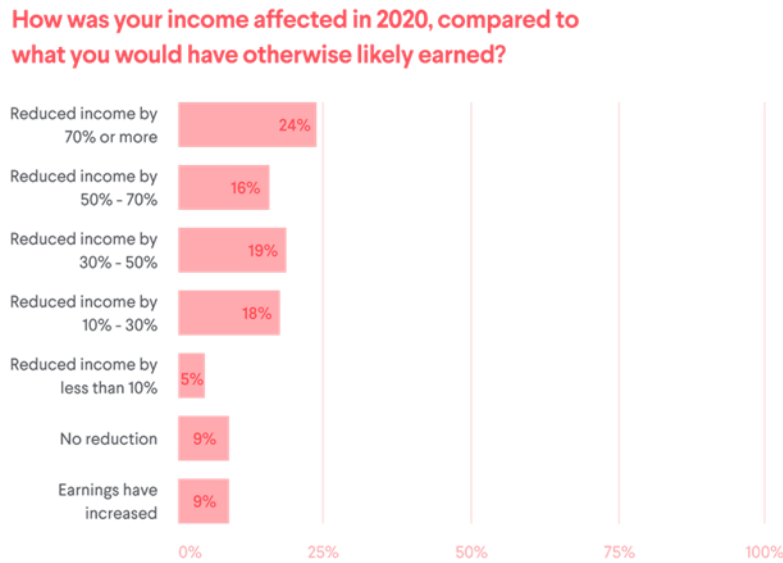

A recent survey was conducted by Genero, a global platform for creatives, to understand the impact of COVID-19. They surveyed around 430 creatives (creative directors, producers, directors, production companies, agencies, animators and more) from 61 different countries in the late 2020s where 81% of the respondents stated that they faced a reduction in their income from March 2020 till September 2020. This lead to many creatives to opt for alternative employment, 72% of the respondents had to change their ways of working, either temporarily or permanent, due to the pandemic. Figure 3 below gives an overview of the results of the survey (Genaro, 2021).

Optimism is being expected by the vaccination as it will curb the spread of COVID-19 and Member states within the EU have started considering lifting restrictions in the creative and culture sector by re-opening of venues, activities and events. However, it is not that easy as there are differences between the various measures taken at the national level. The EU commission on 29 June, 2021 published guidelines<sup>14</sup> that would help facilitate the safe opening of activities in cultural and creative sectors to provide a coordinated approach in line with the specific national, regional and local conditions. They are expected to guide the design and implementation of measures and protocols in EU countries and cover two key dimensions: the safe reopening of the cultural sectors and their sustainable recovery.

It must be noted that recovery scenarios are not just dependent on the effects of the vaccine and government polices but also how the players in the sector are able to cope with the public requirements. “If well-established and more structured businesses (e.g. national theatres or top-performing artist crews) suffered, smaller and independent entities faced even stronger challenges due to the lack of skills, resources and overall capacity to adapt their businesses to health demands in times of a pandemic. This increased the already consistent inequalities that characterise the sector” (de Vet et al., 2021, p.32).

6. Conclusion

Understanding the experience of artists in terms of how they generate their income, how they cope with digital developments as well as the impact of unforeseen situations is an important topic that needs attention. The creative sector is a diverse sector where you will find a blend of artists and fitting them into one field is difficult. Artists tend to hold multiple jobs which may or may not be related to their art. Artists often have fluctuating earnings, unless a fixed wage job. However, artists tend to mostly work as freelancers or be self-employed which means most of the financial burden and risk is carried by themselves and state dependency is less, specifically in terms of receiving unemployment benefits.

The increased use of social media has brought opportunities for most artists as they are able to promote their content more freely and openly and build their community with their fans. However, digital platforms lack transparency and sometimes may end up exploiting artists rather than helping them. The power of algorithms may end up hurting the artist and the use of artists' content by platforms without any monetization is an issue that requires attention. Apart from digital platforms, the emerging role of AI in the creative field has brought forward new opportunities as well as challenges for some artists. While for some artists it may help in capitalizing their existing art skills, for others AI may be a competitor rather than a tool. In addition, AI generated artworks face the issue of authorship and copyright issues.

While artists in general have faced income disparities due to their creative fields, empirical research seems to indicate that the impact of the pandemic has made it worse. Many artists lost their sources of income and state support programmes, in some cases, were either insufficient or unavailable. The pandemic also highlighted the vulnerability of artists and the need for new policies and a focus on digitalization to better protect their interests and to provide more sustainable sources of income.

This mapping document highlights the previous literature on the income development of artists' as well as their experience with digital platforms, AI, copyrights and the pandemic. The next step in the project will be the development of the survey questionnaire, distribution of the survey to artists across EU, collection of data and analysis followed by a final report with the main results of the survey.

Part II

8. Reversion rights in the European Union Member States

The second part of the paper presents all mapped provisions allowing rights to revert back to the authors and performers, which are currently or were historically a part of the national laws of the EU Member States. The provisions are presented in the form of tables, with each Member State having its own section. Each table, with the exception of countries whose official language is English, consists of three columns: 1) provision in the original language, 2) English translation of the provision, 3) summary of the provision. Whereas the first and second column cite provisions verbatim, the summary included in the third column (marked grey) uses author's own words. A short version of the summaries is featured in the comments accompanying the map and the table presenting the mapped provisions available on the CREATE's Reversion Rights Resource Page.<sup>15</sup>

Member States are discussed in the alphabetical order.

Selected terms used in the summaries of provisions:

Termination: automatic termination of the agreement following occurrence of a trigger.

Right of termination: right to terminate the agreement; termination of the contractual relationship requires an action of the author/performer/legal successor.

Exclusive to non-exclusive: provisions providing for a change of an exclusive assignment into a non-exclusive one.

Reversion: situation where rights revert back to the author absent explicit agreement concerning a work.

Work for hire: provision concerning employee works

Odstoupení od smlouvy pro nečinnost nabyvatele  § 2378 (1) Nevyužívá-li nabyvatel výhradní licenci vůbec nebo využívá-li ji nedostatečně a jsou-li tím značně nepříznivě dotčeny oprávněné zajmy autora, může autor od smlouvy odstoupit. To neplatí v případě, že nevyužívání nebo nedostatečné využívání licence je způsobeno okolnostmi převážně spočívajícími na straně autora. (2) Autor může z důvodů uvedených v odstavci 1 od smlouvy odstoupit teprve poté, kdy nabyvatele vyzve, aby v přiměřené lhůtě od doručení výzvy licenci dostatečně využil, a nabyvatel oprávnění dostatečně nevyužije ani přes tuto výzvu. Na možnost odstoupení jako následek marného uplynutí přiměřené lhůty musí autor nabyvatele ve výzvě upozornit. Výzvy není třeba, jestliže využití oprávnění nabyvatelem není možné anebo jestliže nabyvatel prohlásí, že licenci nevyužije.	Withdrawal from licence agreement due to inactivity of the licensee  § 2378 (1) Where a licensee does not use an exclusive licence at all or where he uses it insufficiently, thereby significantly adversely affecting the legitimate interests of the author, the author may withdraw from the agreement. This does not apply in case the failure to use or insufficient use of the licence is caused by circumstances dominantly attributable to the author. (2) An author may withdraw from a licence agreement on the grounds set out in Subsection (1) only after he has sent the licensee a request to sufficiently use the licence within a reasonable time limit after delivering the request and the licensee fails to do so despite the request. In the request, the author must notify the licensee that the author may withdraw from the agreement upon expiry of the reasonable time limit within which the licensee fails to sufficiently use the licence. No request is required if the use of the licence by the licensee is impossible or if the licensee states that he will not use the licence.	Right of termination          Exclusive licences only. § 2381 (1) Nedošlo-li k využití licence vůbec, vrátí autor nabyvateli odměnu, kterou od něho přijal na základě smlouvy, od které odstoupil; došlo-li k využití licence pouze nedostatečně, vrátí autor odměnu sníženou o část, která s ohledem na poměr mezi skutečným a mezi ujednaným nebo zákonem stanoveným rozsahem využití licence připadá na uskutečněné využití. (2) Byl-li nabyvatel povinen licenci využít a porušili tuto povinnost, zůstává právo autora na odměnu odstoupením od smlouvy pro nečinnost nabyvatele nedotčeno. Byla-li odměna ujednána v závislosti na výnosech z užití autorského díla, má se za to, že autorovi vzniklo právo na odměnu v té výši, v jaké by mu vzniklo, kdyby nabyvatel v době před odstoupením od smlouvy licenci dostatečně využil.	§ 2381 (1) If a licence has not been used at all, the author shall return to the licensee the remuneration which he received from the licensee under the agreement from which the author withdrew; if a licence has only been used insufficiently, the author shall return the remuneration reduced by the part corresponding to the actual use, based on the proportion between the actual scope of use of the licence and the stipulated or statutory scope of use of the licence. (2) If a licensee is obliged to use the licence and breaches this duty, the author's right to remuneration remains unaffected by the withdrawal from the agreement for the licensee's failure to act. Where remuneration based on yields from the copyrighted work has been stipulated, the author is presumed to have become entitled to remuneration in an amount equivalent to that to which the author would have become entitled had the licensee sufficiently used the licence before the withdrawal from the agreement.
