In 2020, Israel received priority vaccines from the Pfizer laboratory in exchange for epidemiological data on its population.

The Israeli Ministry of Health claimed in court that it was unable to locate the agreement signed with the pharmaceutical company Pfizer regarding the sharing of epidemiological information on coronavirus vaccines, and

In a petition currently pending in the Jerusalem District Court, the Health Ministry has admitted that, although extensive research has been conducted, the vaccine agreement signed with Pfizer has not been located. "We have not found a signed agreement," said lawyer Ahava Berman of the prosecutor's office, on behalf of the Ministry of Health. "We searched all places, including the CEO's office and the legal department."

The agreement was made public in January 2021, but many of its clauses were then hidden. In the published agreement, space had been left for the signatures of then Health Ministry Director General Hezi Levy and another person from Pfizer, whose name has been blacked out – but their signatures were not not appear there. In the Department of Health's response to the court, it is claimed that the Department therefore does not know whether the agreement has been signed... or not.

In Israel, more than 6 million people have received doses of the Pfizer vaccine.

While the Blues are preparing to face Argentina in the final of the World Cup, the first coronation of the France team in July 1998 remains questionable for some.

Seeing Les Bleus in the World Cup final has almost become a norm now. But when in 1998, the French team, which had failed to qualify for the two previous editions, won the first star in its history by beating Brazil in the final (3-0), the surprise was cut. Too much for some, who consider that the match was necessarily arranged. And the strange malaise suffered by Ronaldo the night before the final necessarily arouses their suspicions.

Twenty years after the historic coronation of the Blues, Michel Platini has recognized a scheme. During the draw, the one who was co-president of the organizing committee of the World Cup had indeed arranged for France and Brazil not to meet before the final. "We are not going to be bored for six years organizing the World Cup if we cannot do a few little shenanigans. Do you think the others didn't do it in the other World Cups? You think...", he had launched. In fact, Brazil, the reigning world champion, and France, the host country, had been automatically assigned to groups A and C, which prevented them from facing each other before the final if they finished first in their group.

Emmanuel Petit's doubts

But for some, this trick was only the tip of the iceberg, imagining a corruption scandal. Recently, Declan Hill, an American journalist specializing in corruption in sport, comforted supporters of the conspiracy theory by claiming to have information about the 1998 World Cup final between France and Brazil. "Match Fix Alert: Stay Connected. I have had interviews with corruptors. Interesting things about the 98 World Cup final are going to happen", he wrote without saying more for the time being.

out... Am I just getting paranoid and thinking, 'Were we puppets to run the economy? Did we really win this World Cup?' I think so. We, the players, have done everything for this. Afterwards, I don't know if there were any arrangements. What to maintain the doubts of some.
