

Author: Michelle Ramirez Lopez

Language Variation

Languages can vary in many ways there are many characteristics that can certainly change through the time the speaking variations are a way to provide examples of the dialogues or dialects. These are very specific features of cultures and their ways of seeing language which it implies several factors that create a sense of variation on the way that our language is perceived.

Furthermore, language variation tells us very important things about languages in how they change the study of people who speak different languages has been one of the biggest challenges in history for linguistics and people in general who is interested on communication. Variations should not be seemed as a challenge for education instead it should be seen as an opportunity to create more window to knowledge because is in the classrooms, we have a rich diversity culture for instance we are going to have many dialects. However, for some people this might be seemed as a problem for learners who are trying to adapt to a new model or a new technique in their educational centers but this strategy is planned by the professors must show the importance in not only must show but they must apply the benefits acquired from a different language that for second language learners can be highly beneficial for their opening to a more in real world.

In fact, It is true that in this model of language change and dialect differentiation their differences are abysmal characteristics on not only one language but two. Due to factors like time and distance have impacted Language one clear example is the British English and the American English accent which both are recognized as English language, but they share many varieties in the dialects people speak or use. Two different countries that are far away from each other and that many years of independence have stated difference between Them.

A closer example of the Costa Rican situation when it comes to language variation it can be the rural areas versus the urban areas. basically in the rural areas the communication or the types of words that are used and sometimes the pronunciation clearly state up lower level of education this does not mean that everyone ,in every rural places, is going to have this characteristic but it is more likely to be like that. In the other hand, we have people from the urban Parts of the country where their language in some specific places can be very high but better also some variations between high and standard language and they vulgar language that sometimes is very popular on the streets of the different urban cities where the majority of the population is located. Besides, since most of us realize that it is not only where you come from that affects your speech but also your social and cultural background, age, gender, race, occupation, and group loyalty, the traditional bias toward geographic origin alone now appears to be a serious weakness.

In general in education there are many things that can affect your way of speaking in not only where you come from but things such as your social and cultural background, age, gender, race, occupation, speech community and other features can influence on the way you learn the second language and the way you visualize yourself to the outside world that at the end one way or another affects the learning process.

References:

Wardhaugh, R. (2006). An Introduction to Sociolinguistics. Fifth edition. Blackwell Publishing.